Mr. KNOWLES: But my hon. friend is right in asking me what I meant about the first one. I thought I made it clear that the mineral resources of the northland are great, and there is great wealth to be made there. I can prove nothing. I do not know the relationships of these various companies, but I should like to know. I have a strong suspicion that there probably is some kind of connection that makes it an advantage right now. Certainly my hon. friend will agree with me that there must be some advantage either now or in the future, or else the Canadian Pacific would not throw money away.

Mr. ISNOR: May I inquire of the minister whether any action has been taken in respect of the representations made by the maritime transportation commission concerning the service between Moncton, Greenwood, Yarmouth and Halifax? If I remember rightly, it was in the latter part of July that they telegraphed the minister in reference to the continuation of this service and pointed out the importance of it to the people in that district. Does he recall that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The service is continuing and will continue until another hearing is held, when the question of public convenience and necessity will again be studied. The fundamental fact is that, if people will not use an air line, they can hardly expect it to be continued. There is the further fact that, before many weeks go by, a service will be in operation between Boston, Yarmouth and Halifax, which will serve the Yarmouth-Halifax leg of that route as far as public convenience and necessity are concerned. However, the air transport board will hear all interested parties and study public convenience and necessity and bring in its finding as the facts warrant.

Mr. ISNOR: Can the minister give the date for the Halifax-Yarmouth-Boston service?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot give the exact date, but I understand that it will be some time this autumn.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—

432. Control of civil aviation, including the administration of the aeronautics act and regulations issued thereunder, $388,200.

Mr. SKEY: I wish to ask the minister, first, how long he anticipates the control of civil aviation will remain under another department rather than that of the Department of Transport.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. The Prime Minister assigned it to me and, if he wishes to take it away, he will exercise his prerogative in that regard.

Mr. SKEY: I ask the question because I notice that under item 432 we have the administration of the Aeronautics Act and regulations. The point I wish to call to the attention of the minister is that there is at the present time a great potential in this country which may be stopped from developing our aerial companies and their abilities if the regulations are too closely followed. I refer to the instructors, engineers, pilots, radio operators, navigators and other specialists, including flying control specialists who have come back from overseas. I understand that the regulations under which they must now obtain licences are in some cases antiquated, while in other cases these returned men are required to pass examinations, for which they have already qualified in the service, but examinations such as perhaps you, Mr. Chairman, or the minister might have passed in your youth, he in engineering and you possibly in agriculture or some other line, examinations in connection with which you have forgotten a great deal though your knowledge goes well beyond that. These men are also required to go through some practical tests on machines which at times are not of modern design.

My point is this. In the United Kingdom the regulations regarding the licensing of various specialist air personnel are handled through the air ministry, and a uniform standard is set throughout the whole country. The results of the examinations, whether set by civil authorities or by air authorities, are fed into the air ministry, and the whole thing is controlled from a central point under an authority which is up to date and knows what the requirements and regulations are for the future.

I feel that at this time some men are being forced to go back and study for possibly six months before they can get a licence to be an engineer. I can quote one case which may startle the committee and the minister. There is a Pathfinder pilot who was able to pinpoint his way into Germany and drop his bombs within 100 yards of the mark, the target for his aircraft following him, and yet when he came back from overseas he was not licensed to fly at night. He had a great struggle with the air transport department to get a licence to fly at night—a Pathfinder pilot from overseas!

I need say no more. The minister will readily see that there should be some tie-up between the air force and the civil aviation division, so that there may be a standardization of licensing and those men qualified in the air may immediately receive civil qualification.

Mr. HOWE: I might point out that if, on discharge from the air force, a man is given a certificate of competency in any field, that certificate is honoured by the civil aviation branch, but he must take his examination in air regulations. After all, he may know a great deal about many things, but he must know his air regulations in Canada, and he must take the physical examinations which are required every year. I cannot believe that the United Kingdom is any more up to date in civil flying than Canada. It does less of it. I would challenge that statement.

Mr. SKEY: I am speaking of administration.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot imagine a closer coordination than there is between the two branches, because each honours the certificate of the other in the field in which it is issued.

Mr. SKEY: The minister has made a statement, but I am not talking through my hat. I happen to know that these men are forced to go back and try examinations although they may be qualified engineers, graduates of Canadian universities, who have served with squadrons or groups and commands overseas. They are forced to go back and write examinations in the very subjects in which they are qualified. Perhaps in the last few months there has been some change; but, as regards a few months ago, what I have said this afternoon is perfectly true. Of course, as the minister says, the man must have his medical examination and he must understand his air regulations and international regulations as well. There is no pilot or technical man who will dispute that. I am talking about a purely technical matter. I know that my information was accurate up to a few months ago.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend speaks of an engineer who had pinpointed his way over Germany.

Mr. SKEY: A pilot who failed to qualify as a pilot to fly at night in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: As a transport pilot?

Mr. SKEY: Yes. Second, I was speaking to an engineer who is not a pilot. He was in the technical branch. This man serviced the whole station overseas and had forty or fifty squadrons of men under his control. He was forced to go back.

Mr. HOWE: The finest pilots in the world come out of the air force and join Trans-Canada, but they are not allowed to sit on the lefthand side of a Trans-Canada plane until they have taken at least six or eight months of training. That is simply because the routine of warfare is not the routine of transport work. It is quite conceivable that a man could pinpoint his way all around Germany and yet could not conform with the established technique of landing at night a transport plane filled with passengers. That must be demonstrated. It is quite a different art. Surely my hon. friend is sufficiently familiar with both transport and military work to know that a man cannot come off one job, and do the other job well, whichever way he moves. Each calls for a separate training and a separate technique. That separate technique must be learned. I do not think there is any lack of coordination just because one cannot step into the other field immediately.

Mr. SKEY: I shall give the minister in private the name of the man to whom I am referring. I know he does not want publicity. He was a civilian pilot before he went with the air force, and he came out. He had this trouble, although he was not flying passengers; he was flying cargo. I am sure the minister will know of his case when I tell him the name in private. I am sure of my facts. I say that there must be coordination to have fairness. That must be demonstrated jointly if you are to be fair to the men who have been overseas and to the men who have civil licences as well. I know I am right.

Mr. HOWE: Let me ask the hon. member this. Is he advocating that the Minister of National Defence for Air shall be in charge of civilian air services?

Mr. SKEY: I am merely advocating that the licensing of pilots, technical personnel or radio personnel and so on should be coordinated, so that if a man in the air force qualifies, then he is given a civilian standing as well. If a civilian qualifies he will have a standing in the air force should he be called up at any time. It is a perfectly simple thing to do; it is merely a question of administration.

Mr. HOWE: Without prolonging this discussion any further, I might say that the examinations are the same for the same kind of service. If a man gets a certificate from one branch it is honoured by the other branch; that applies both ways.

Mr. SKEY: I definitely challenge the minister's statement on that, because I know. I have had these men speak to me. When they enter civilian work they do not receive credit for their training and technical abilities which they received in the air force.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I draw the minister's attention to the fact that on pages 58 and 59 of the estimates we have expenditures for civilian aviation totalling $9,600,000. On pages 76 and 77 there are other expenditures for civil aviation totalling $12,000,000. I observe certain differences. The second item is under the heading of demobilization and reconversion. Will the minister explain the reason for the second appropriation in connection with civil aviation? It is not clear to me.

Mr. HOWE: The air service estimates are the estimates covering the services which were carried on pre-war. We had a certain line of airports which were built as civil airports. This item covers the operation and maintenance of these airports. The second group of services were built definitely as military services. For instance, there are a number of airports up the Mackenzie river which were built for service purposes which have been turned back to the Department of Transport with all their appurtenances such as radio beams and weather services. The second vote provides funds to take care of these airports, which formerly were not part of the civilian group. At the present time we are trying to consolidate the two. We are trying to work out a pattern which will be the civilian pattern for the future. That takes time. I am hopeful that this will be the peak of the estimates for future years. I hope that we shall get them down, as we can coordinate the services and reduce expenses. To-day we have a vastly larger air network than we had before the war, and until we can consolidate all into one civilian estimate, discard certain airports, turn them back to other uses, and until we can consolidate our weather and radio services, we require these funds to make a transition.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I take it that the necessity for the division is that there is a different history back of each. Now that you have your civilian services, I hope that they will be consolidated in the near future; that we shall not need to have this separation very much longer.

Mr. HOWE: I think the next estimates which come down will have only the one group.

Mr. ADAMSON: I realize the minister's difficulty with the DC-3 over the mountains from Lethbridge on. Has he in mind another aircraft to take the place of the small Lockheed Lodestar for the Rocky mountain trip, or does he care to make a statement on that now?

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada has on order a number of aeroplanes that will do a ceiling of 35,000 feet on two engines, and they are the plane for the future over the mountains. That is the series which has been named the North Star.

Mr. ADAMSON: A Lockheed?

Mr. HOWE: No, a Canadian-built plane.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister tell the committee of the progress which has been made with the airport at Yellowknife, the size of it, whether it is of concrete and whether it has all the necessary incidentals for flying?

Mr. HOWE: The airport is nearing completion. It has two 5,000-feet runways.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of concrete?

Mr. HOWE: No, grass.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee what the government is prepared to do to assist municipal airports?

Mr. HOWE: The government has not announced a post-war policy. Before the war, there was a policy of assistance to municipal airports. At the moment the government has so much in hand, to bring its present airways up to standard and to take care of the military airports that have been turned over, that at this time it is not particularly anxious to become involved with municipal airports. So I think all I can say is that a more definite policy will be announced in future.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Carried. Item 433.

Mr. SKEY: I was just going to speak on item 432, and I let my hon friend get in ahead of me.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are on item 433 now.

Mr. SKEY: With the minister's permission, I should like to revert to item 432. I had another point in connection with dual control that I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister, in the field of flying control and duplicate facilities. For instance, at most airports which are shared by the R.C.A.F. and the ministry of transport I believe it is necessary for the military machines to have permission from the civil aerial controller before they can take off, and they are sometimes unnecessarily delayed in their operations by having to get permission from the civil authorities to fly from the airport. This usually occurs because of weather conditions, since the air force does fly in worse weather than civilian machines will fly in. Sometimes they do it on purpose; it is necessary in their operations. That is one field where, within the next few months, the air force and civil authorities will have to meet and iron out their difficulties. There is another matter in connection with such facilities as radar and blind landing equipment. They will have to agree on that as well. It seems to me that the government will have to make up its mind within a short time whether it will share airports with the R.C.A.F. or whether it will develop civilian airports for its own operations. I should like to ask the minister if he would comment on that at this time.

Mr. HOWE: Civilian and military flying have shared airports throughout the war. At certain airports there is military control; at certain other airports there is civil control. Some one authority must clear a plane from an airport, as I think my hon. friend will agree. I have heard complaints from civilian aircraft that the military control delayed them; and I have heard complaints such as my hon. friend made this afternoon. I dare say the man in the control tower does the best he can for both. I must say there has been an extraordinary lack of friction between civilian and military aviation where both use the same airports; and both have used a great number of airports throughout Canada. I think it has been amply demonstrated that it is desirable that they continue to do so.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—

433. Airways and airports—construction and improvements, including radio facilities—(revote $562,200)—Capital, $3,837,425.

Mr. PROBE: I wanted to speak on a topic similar to that mentioned by the hon. member who preceded me, under item 432, but perhaps I can bring it up under this item. I want to draw to the attention of the minister the conflict that exists at the Regina airport. This is a municipal airport whose facilities are used by T.C.A., C.P.A., and the Saskatchewan government, which has an aircraft there for emergency flights to outlying districts, to bring people into hospital when there is such need. I happened to be out at the airport last January when there was a sudden call for this emergency hospital ship to go to a remote corner of the province. The C.P.A. plane was due in one hour from the time this call was received; the Saskatchewan government plane was ready to take off: but in spite of the emergent nature of the flight the control tower refused this ship permission to leave the landing field. I understood from the pilot, to whom I spoke at the time, that this was not an unusual occurrence, and I feel that there is something wrong with control arrangements when such a thing comes to pass. May I ask the minister to explain to the committee just what are the arrangements for the control of the landing and taking off of aircraft at a field such as that in Regina, so that I may get the picture a little more clearly? I understood that C.P.A. have exclusive rights, and decide who shall come in, and when, and how.

Mr. HOWE: The man in the control tower is in full charge of all flights entering and leaving the field. In deciding whether or not he can clear a plane he takes into account the ceiling, which must be 800 feet to allow a plane to come in, and he takes into consideration other planes in the vicinity. As soon as he considers it safe for the plane to take off under the regulations, the plane takes off. I think he treats all planes alike. I do not think he worries very much about who is in the plane, or whether it is a civilian or military plane or a plane belonging to the Saskatchewan government. If it is the turn of the plane to take off, it takes off as soon as it can safely do so.

Mr. PROBE: I am aware of the facts in the case I have mentioned, through first-hand knowledge. It seemed to me that a C.P.A. passenger plane one hour away from Regina would still be somewhere near Saskatoon, and certainly there would not have been any conflict in that case. This would appear to be an unnecessary stricture, if it is possible for military planes to take off within thirty second intervals or so. It seems to me that with competent flying personnel it should be possible for civilian planes to take off under similar conditions. This delay had, of course, nothing to do with the weather; it was a straight matter of priority in the use of the landing strip.

Mr. HOWE: I must say that I am not accepting my hon. friend's word that the reason the plane was delayed was that a C.P.A. plane was an hour away. At LaGuardia field planes are dispatched every minute. At Dorval airport they are dispatched every few minutes.

There are always planes coming and going, but they still dispatch planes promptly, and I am sure the dispatcher at Regina is just as competent as the dispatcher at Montreal. I think my hon. friend had better check his information before he asks me to give further information. There must have been another reason.

Mr. PROBE: Then may I ask who is in charge of the control tower?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Transport.

Mr. PROBE: The federal department?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: The details of this item appear at page 240 of the estimates. I should like to ask the minister to give us a breakdown of the item of $1,483,200 for field services—construction and improvements, and $2,173,290 for radio services—construction and improvements.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Seven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With the consent of my colleague and the committee, and in accordance with the promise I gave to the leaders when I made the motion, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at seven o'clock p.m.

DIEPPE

MEMORIAL TO CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—LAYING OF CORNERSTONE THIS DAY BY THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house, which I hope I shall have, I should like to mention that at this very moment as we meet in this chamber this morning, another meeting is taking place in the town of Dieppe to lay the cornerstone of a memorial which the citizens of that town are erecting as an enduring tribute to the memory of Canada's armed forces who invaded those shores four years ago to-day.

At the invitation of the president of the government of France and the mayor of Dieppe, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) is being given the honour of laying that cornerstone.

I think it is fitting that we in this house should join in spirit the company assembled around the base of that memorial to recall one of the most gallant exploits in the annals of war.

May I be permitted to read into the records of our proceedings to-day four or five paragraphs of the speech which is being delivered there on behalf of the people of Canada by the Prime Minister.

After recalling that the men of Canada's army who landed at Dieppe that day, the men of Canada's navy who escorted them by sea, and the men of Canada's air force who covered the attack, were among the bravest of Canada's sons and that to a man they were prepared for any suffering, any sacrifice their task might demand, the Prime Minister goes on to say:

Dieppe four years ago was a momentary flash from liberty's revolving light. For an instant that light shore forth like some long awaited signal of hope. Almost as suddenly it vanished. For a while in the darkness of those fateful years it seemed to be totally extinguished. Then came the Dieppe of 1944.

To-day we see the Dieppe of 1942 as only time could reveal its true significance—a beacon light prophetic of victory. That light now shines in the fullness of its glory over the freed and free peoples of Europe.

Here in Dieppe on this anniversary we have in mind the valorous deeds of all arms of the fighting services of all the free nations. But Dieppe has yet another significance for France and Canada and for the world. It marks a relationship between our two countries which is not without its message of hope to future generations. Three centuries and more ago brave and adventurous souls from Normandy sailed from this port of Dieppe across the uncharted Atlantic into the waters of the St. Lawrence. On its banks they helped to lay the foundations of settlement and government in the Canada discovered by the hardy mariners of France nearly a hundred years before. In the course of time the Canada of Cartier and Champlain was to witness the clash of rival arms led by Wolfe and Montcalm. But the country to which these Norman pioneers and their descendants contributed so greatly was to give another beacon light to the world. It was to give, as it gives to all nations to-day, the example of a people of different races, of different languages, and of different religious faiths, once at enmity with each other, now united as a single nation, rich in the blending of their separate cultures and cherishing above all else a common heritage of freedom.

In the first world war the people of France saw the sons of Canada joined with their own sons and those of other liberty-loving nations fighting for freedom on European soil. In the war of liberation the world witnessed the armed forces of Canada and France again fighting side by side on the battlefields of Europe. In the mind of France to-day the Canada of Wolfe and Montcalm has become the Canada of Currie, McNaughton and Crerar.

It was not the men of Old France only who three and more centuries ago crossed the Atlantic to face unknown perils and privations; nor in our day was it the men of Canada only who crossed to Europe to share the vicissitudes of war. The women of both our lands, no less brave and venturesome, have played their role in the epic tale of early and present day relations between France and Canada. Many were the missions of mercy in which Sisters of the religious orders of France risked their lives in the days of early settlement in Canada. Centuries later nursing sisters in two world wars came from Canada to minister to the sick and the wounded on the battlefields of France and Flanders. What woman's part has been in all the services we know full well. This page of history has not passed unnoticed. In the hall of fame of the parliament buildings at Ottawa may be seen in marble relief a representation of the part women have played in the founding and restoring of nations. There one sees depicted the Sisters of Old France ministering to the needs and education of the children of Indian tribes in the wilds of North America. There also is depicted the service of nursing sisters of Canada in caring for the wounded on the battlefields of Europe. In the foreground, as the central feature of this relief, is a figure symbolical of humanity; in the background, wholly subdued is another figure symbolizing history. Beneath the memorial appear the words:

> "To perpetuate a noble tradition in the relations of the Old World and the New, led by the spirit of humanity across the seas, woman by her tender ministrations to those in need has given to the world the example of an heroic service embracing three centuries of Canadian history."

It is the tradition of mutual service in the many relationships of nations that above all else Canada seeks to perpetuate in Paris to-day. The representatives of many nations are assembled in an effort to silence enmities bred of racial distrust and international strife. They have met to lay the foundations of a new and happier world. To this conference Canada brings as a beacon light of encouragement and hope the story and the example of her own national life. Canada seeks to see the rich rewards of international understanding, friendship and good will shared in ever fuller measure by the peoples of all nations. The people everywhere are praying to-day that those concerned with the making of peace may find it possible to lay well and truly the foundations of a better world.

This memorial will stand to future generations as a symbol of enduring friendship between France and Canada. Is it too much to hope that its foundation stone may also be a record of the country and the year in which the warring nations of our time had found a way out of conflict into co-operation? What could speak more eloquently of the wisdom of our day and generation? What more substantial hope of an enduring peace could be given to a war-weary world?

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the thanks of the Canadian people from one side of the nation to the other will go out to the citizens of Dieppe for the tribute they are at this moment paying to the Canadian forces, particularly the forces which attempted to find a way to get into the continent of Europe when it was so strongly held by the German forces. It was my privilege eighteen or twenty months ago to visit the site of that invasion. I remember very well walking through the streets of Dieppe, filled as they were with debris, and fenced off at nearly every corner by concrete barriers. I remember standing on the beaches and wondering how any man could come back alive after the fire that must have been showered upon them. I remember standing on the heights and looking down on those beaches where so many were killed. In the midst of that environment I could not help but think that only a miracle made it possible for any of the Canadian forces to come back from the inferno of that raid.

I wondered what it must have felt like to be a member of the Canadian force on that occasion; and it is a matter of regret that at this moment as I look behind me I do not find in his seat one who took part in that invasion and who as a result of his contribution was awarded the Victoria Cross. I am sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) is not in his place.

One memory above all others that I carry with me from that visit to Dieppe was a story given to me by the people of that community. I have forgotten what the official called himself; he was in charge of the affairs of the city after the Germans had been driven out but before the war was over. I was told of the circumstances of that day in 1942 when our boys suffered such heavy casualties—over 3,000, including, if my memory serves me aright, some 700 dead. The story was that the Germans were about to bury our dead in a common grave, when, as I am sure all Canadian people will be glad to remember, the citizens of Dieppe, at that time in a defeated and occupied country, asked for the privilege of giving our boys an honoured burial each in a grave of his own. So they picked out a field for a cemetery on the gentle slope of a hillside two or three miles—perhaps more; I am speaking from memory—from Dieppe; and there, if you go to-day, you will see the graves of the honoured dead of the Canadian forces who fell in that assault. As I moved up and down among the white crosses I saw, as I had seen at other cemeteries in France where the name of the soldier was not known, these words on his cross, "Known unto God."

Mr. Speaker, I think it is peculiarly appropriate that we should be meeting in this house here in Canada when our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is laying the cornerstone of a memorial to our forces, a memorial erected by the citizens of Dieppe. I think I can say with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that Canada stands to-day where she stood before, for the right of each nation to determine the character of its own future. We are glad that our men had a part in liberating France. We appreciate this expression on the part of the citizens of one section of France for the part our forces paid in liberating their country; and we trust that our relationship with that old land will continue to be what it has been for so many years—one of mutual trust and confidence and good will.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party I should like to join in the expressions of appreciation of the action of the citizens of Dieppe in erecting a memorial to the men of Canada who fell on the beaches in the operation which took place there four years ago to-day. It is peculiarly fitting that accompanying the Prime Minister to-day in Dieppe is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who lost his eldest son in that raid. In spite of the turmoil of political controversy our sympathy went out to him then; the laying of the cornerstone of this memorial must bring back to him poignant memories.

With the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I too had the privilege of visiting Dieppe on the second day of October, 1944, when the debris was still in the streets. Like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), I marvelled how it was possible for any of the men to have survived when I saw the cliffs above those beaches: indeed, one of the officers who participated in the raid and took the tanks over, and who showed us the beaches, shrugged his shoulders and said, "You might just as well have attempted to take the rock of Gibraltar." And so it seemed to us.

I am sure that all hon. members of this house appreciate the tribute being paid to the men of our armed forces by the citizens of Dieppe, and particularly to those who were sacrificed there. We shall always remember them with gratitude, and our hearts go out to relatives and friends who lost sons, brothers, husbands in that operation.

I visited the cemetery near Dieppe. It occupies a commanding site looking toward the Atlantic ocean on the west—towards Canada, as it were—a place reverenced and beautifully kept by the citizens of Dieppe. As I walked up and down among the crosses I saw, among others, the names of boys of the South Saskatchewan regiment, which suffered such heavy losses in that adventure.

Here, I thought, was an example of national unity which we should always bear in mind. I read names obviously of boys of English origin, of Scottish origin, of Irish origin, of Welsh origin; but there were names too of the sons of immigrants who had come to us from the Ukraine, from Czechoslovakia, from Germany itself. Sometimes when I think of the anti-semitism that is spread across the country I remember that there I saw too the unmistakable Jewish names of boys who had fallen in that battle. Quebec regiments too were decimated there; the crosses bore the names of many boys of famous French Canadian regiments. If we could only take that lesson to heart, the lesson of those boys dying together and resting in the same foreign soil, the unity of Canadians of all origins being there symbolized, and if only we could carry that lesson into the future, we could yet build a Canada which would be worthy of the sacrifices they made.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): At this hour the hearts of thousands of Canadians turn to Dieppe where loved ones or friends or acquaintances who were members of the Canadian armed services fell in battle. Though we cannot be there in body, I feel certain we are all there in spirit. Our Canadian hearts swell with pride and thanksgiving when we think of the achievements and the sacrifices of our men at Dieppe. We remember especially to-day those who made the supreme sacrifice and who now lie buried in or near that French city. We remember also those who, though they may not have made the supreme sacrifice, paid with wounds and suffering which they will bear to the end of their days. Nor do we forget those who were quite willing if the need arose to make any sacrifices they might have been called upon to make.

I should like to join with all the others in thanking the citizens of Dieppe for the tribute which this day they are paying to fallen Canadian heroes. I feel quite sure from what has been said and what I have read, that the sacrifices of these Canadian heroes will not have been made in vain, and that as the days go by we shall see evidence that their achievements have helped to bring into this world permanently a spirit of freedom and liberty which we should all share.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): May I say one word? In the first place, I should like to express my deep and abiding appreciation of the moving tributes from all the leaders of this parliament. He has not taken his seat yet, but I see the hero of Dieppe—I wish he would take his seat now—in our moving Canadian story. In all the episodes of heroism on various battle-fronts throughout the world, there is nothing more stirring, more appealing, more heroic than the figure of Cecil Merritt of Vancouver dashing gladly and fearlessly across that terrible bridge.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have just a word to say on behalf of the rank and file. The leaders have spoken well; the Minister of Veterans Affairs has also spoken well of the heroes of Dieppe, and particularly of my hon. friend the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt), who deserve the tribute that has been paid them. However, I wish to say a few words on behalf of one who was with him, who was born in my own constituency, Colonel Dollard Ménard, D.S.O., who is now in Ottawa. He was with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in the same experience, but in that experience the boys of Canada paid the promissory note of Great Britain to Stalin in preparing the way for the landing of troops on the continent. That is the first thing for us to remember, and to recall it is not to diminish the glory of those who participated in that raid. Nevertheless, this is one more occasion on which Canada has paid what was promised by another government to a third government. That, I repeat, is the first thing to remember.

I listened to the beautiful speech delivered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who spoke of the unity of men of different origins, men from all parts of Canada, of all races, who joined in a common enterprise and now lie under white crosses in a cemetery in France. It may be an inspiration, and of course I sympathize deeply with those who have relatives resting in those graves. Blood is thick, and it is the most natural thing that our sympathies should go first to the parents and relatives of those who fell in the raid. Moreover, it is proper that fitting tribute should be paid to those men as it has been paid to other heroes of great distinction.

But beautiful speeches will not bring our dead to life; they will not restore those boys who were the future strength, the future pillars of the state. They are dead for ever; a new generation is growing up, and the lesson that we must not forget from our experience of the past is that certain things that have happened shall not happen again, at least for a very long time. But if we read the current press we see that to-day there is no progress over yesterday, yesterday there was no progress over the day before, in the dealings of men who are now praising the dead but who do nothing to prevent the death of our young men of future generations, and of those who are now of military age. If the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the boys of the Mount Royal regiment and all the others who were there, it was not to make a sacrifiec; it was to beat the Hun. I am sick of hearing of sacrifice or that the soldier thinks of sacrifice at the moment of battle. They are not Isaacs going to the altar of sacrifice; they are men of flesh and blood who go there to defeat the enemy. I am sure that if they were asked what they were doing there they would say that they were doing a job. They were fighting so that there would be no more war. That was said of world war I, and it was repeated of world war II, but no progress has been made.

I sympathize with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who lost his son during the Dieppe raid. My heart is with him; he has the sympathy of all of us. But all that sympathy will not bring his son to life. It will not prevent his other son and the other Canadian boys from engaging in these wars which are decided by old men, men above military age who forget that God restrained the hand of Abraham when he was about to sacrifice Isaac. That is the history of the past, the history of the Old Testament, and it should not be forgotten in our time. We see these old men coming here making speeches, telling us of the sacrifices which we should not forget. That is true; I am all for praising these men, but something should be done so that history will not repeat itself a third time and the boys shall not be sacrificed to the fire-eaters and the warmongers of Europe. This is a time when it is more important than ever to understand that the only way to do something in proper relation to the marvellous task which has been performed by our boys and by the boys of all the united nations, is to act in accordance with what they have done, to be practical and to put a stop to that warmongering spirit which has been the disaster of the world, so that it shall not rise again.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am wondering whether the house would not welcome a brief word from a private member who lived through the Dieppe raid.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for their more than kind reception of me this morning, which I would like to accept on behalf of all those who took part in the raid. Had I realized that anything like this would happen I can assure you that I would have been upstairs in my office. Many things have been said about the difficulties and the peculiar circumstances which we faced at Dieppe, but I know that everybody who went there was delighted to go. Despite all that happened we all felt that what was done was worth doing, in that from the operation great lessons were learned. In remembering the large number of Canadians who fell at Dieppe I should say that in the opinion of one who was there, the sacrifice which they, and their relatives who remain, made through their deaths was one that was well worth while.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. S. M. CLARK (Essex South) presented the third report of the sessional committee on railways and shipping, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

3. This information is confidential to the companies concerned and could not be disclosed without their consent.

4. Nil; with the exception of No. 6 air observer school which was closed prior to the revision of the contract and the earned surplus retained amounted do $39,761.79.

CANADIAN ARMY—OFFICERS AND OTHER RANKS ON STRENGTH—TANKS

Mr. PEARKES:

1. How many officers, and how many other ranks were on the strength on August 1, 1946, of (a) the active force; (b) the interim army; (c) the army in Canada, exclusive of (a) and (b)?

2. How many tanks, and of what type are there in Canada?

3. How are these distributed as among (a) units of the active force; (b) central schools; (c) reserve army?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I have asked the hon. member to drop parts 2 and 3 of this question, and I shall furnish him with the information he is seeking in part 1.

1. According to returns as at 31st July, 1946:

	Officers	Other Ranks	Total
(a) Active force (C.A.S.F.) (excluding interim army)	4,947	33,201	38,148
(b) Interim army ...	2,613	10,905	13,518
(c)	Nil	3,736	3,736
	7,560	47,842	55,402

Mr. SPEAKER: Parts 2 and 3 dropped.

WHEAT—PAYMENTS TO BROKERS AND COMMISSION MERCHANTS

Mr. FAIR:

During each of the crop years 1939-40 to 1945-46, what amount was paid by the Canadian Wheat Board to brokers and commission merchants on the sale of wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON: I suggest that this question be dropped, because the information is given at page 4830 of Hansard of August 15.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

PRICE CEILINGS—HORSESHOEING

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is there a ceiling for horseshoeing?

2. If so, what is such ceiling?

3. Is such ceiling uniform throughout the country?

4. If not, what are the various ceilings for horseshoeing, and why is each of them different?

5. When were such ceilings established and modified, if such is the case, and what was the reason in each instance?

6. When establishing these ceilings, did the wartime prices and trade board take into account the increase in the cost of iron, steel and nails?

7. What was the price of horseshoes and nails for horseshoeing in September, 1939, and what is the said price to-day?

8. What is the ceiling for horseshoeing (a) in Toronto, and (b) in Rivière-du-Loup?

Mr. MAYHEW:

2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

5 and 6. Ceilings on horseshoeing were established for individual operators at levels established by their charges during the basic period, September 15 to October 11, 1941. Such ceilings were established by the wartime prices and trade regulations, which became effective December 1, 1941. Maximum prices for new entrants after the basic period were established at levels comparable to other operators in the same area. Horseshoeing was suspended from price control effective July 8, 1946.

7. The board has no information as to the prices of horseshoes and nails in September, 1939. Both horseshoes and nails have been subject to price control since December 1, 1941. The original basic period ceilings established by prices charged by the individual seller during the period September 15 to October 11, 1941, were adjusted upward on April 1, 1946, to reflect the increased cost of production of iron and steel, 10 per cent in the case of maximum prices of horse nails and $1.00 per hundred pounds at the manufacturers' level with corresponding amounts for subsequent sellers in the case of horseshoes.

8. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation purchased a site near Montreal, at Outremont, for radio headquarters? If so, what was paid for the site?

2. Has the government reconsidered since last session, 1945, the decentralizing of radio in Canada so as to include two radio cities, one at Toronto and one at Montreal?

3. What plans has the corporation for carrying out such an arrangement?

Mr. McCANN:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 3.

3. The corporation's plans include a building in Montreal to house the services now in three different rented premises and a permanent structure in Toronto to replace the present building bought and adapted for use a year and a half ago.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

COURT OF RENTAL APPEALS—APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES BY WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

Mr. FULTON:

1. How many judges or persons holding judicial office have been appointed up to date by the wartime prices and trade board as a court of rental appeals under Order in Council P.C. 9029, or any other such authority?

2. What are the names of such judges, the dates of the appointment of each, the region, county or province for which appointed, and the date of termination of appointment if any, in each case?

3. How much money has been paid to each judge for the duration of his appointment under Order in Council P.C. 9029, or such other authority as is applicable (as now consolidated under Order in Council P.C. 3122 of 1946) for (a) a supplement for additional duties; and (b) transportation expenses (including automobile) in the performance of such duties?

Mr. MARTIN: Return tabled.

WAR ASSETS—BREN GUN CARRIERS

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. How many Bren gun carriers have been declared surplus, and to whom have they been sold?

2. How many are still held by any department?

3. How many types of army tanks were manufactured for war purposes?

4. How many of each type remained in Canada at the close of the war, or since that date?

5. What has been done with these tanks?

WAR ASSETS—CASH REGISTERS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Is War Assets Corporation responsible for disposition of cash registers surplus after use in (a) canteens and messes of abandoned military camps in Canada, and in (b) dining and recreational services in munitions factories operated by the Department of Munitions and Supply?

2. If not, what disposition is planned for these cash registers?

3. Are these cash registers available for purchase in single units by the general retail trade?

4. Do veterans' applications for surplus cash registers receive any special considerations?

5. At what average price have all surplus cash registers been sold to this date?

CANADIAN SECURITIES HELD IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COCKERAM:

1. What was the amount of interest paid during the years 1944 and 1945 to residents of the United States by the dominion government on dominion government securities held by United States residents?

2. What is the amount of dividends and interest paid by Canadian corporations to residents of the United States, during the years 1945 and 1946?

HOUSING—WOMEN WITH OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What priority is granted to women with overseas service who might wish to secure a house under any of the government programmes?

2. May a woman veteran, on being married, add her priority points to those of her husband with a view to securing housing accommodation?

CEMENT

Mr. MOORE:

1. What was the total production of cement for the years 1943, 1944, 1945 and 1946 in Canada?

2. How much was exported in each of these years, including 1946?

3. Has any branch of the construction industry priority on the purchase of cement?

4. How much cement was imported to Canada from abroad in the years 1945 and 1946?

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

CORPORATION TO RECEIVE LICENCE FEES—ADVANCES ON ACCOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National War Services) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend The Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide (a) that the chairman shall be eligible to become a contributor and entitled to benefits under any established pension fund of the corporation; (b) for the tenure of office and reappointment of the general manager; (c) for the deposit to the credit of the corporation all fees received from private receiving licences and private station broadcasting licences, without deduction of costs of collection and administration, and (d) authority to advance to the corporation sums up to two million dollars during the present fiscal year and such sums in subsequent years as may be authorized by parliament from time to time on account of capital expenditures.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION OF REPORT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister when an opportunity will be given to discuss the report of the industrial relations committee?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): It is hoped that the estimates of the Department of Labour may be called to-morrow, and that this would afford a convenient opportunity for discussing the report as well as other matters connected with industrial relations.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is it thought that this procedure will be followed in preference to a motion to concur in the report?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That would depend upon the pleasure of the house, but I should think it might be assumed that at this time the house would desire to have the whole debate on labour relations take place at the same time; and it was thought that if the estimates of the Department of Labour were called at the time this report of the committee was being considered, the whole debate on labour relations could take place then.

Mr. BRACKEN: All I wanted was some indication from the government as to the procedure that will be followed. I was not here Saturday afternoon, but I gather that some intimation was given that there would be a motion to concur in the report, and that it would be moved to-day. I am not suggesting what should be done, but I think the house should be advised as to the plans of the government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A question was put to the chairman of the committee, who said it was his intention to move concurrence. Later in the day, however, he told me it would not be possible for him to be back this morning, and I said I thought it might suit the convenience of the house to have that motion and the estimates given consideration at the same time in order to avoid a duplication of debate on industrial relations. It is hoped that this may be done to-morrow, though as the first item to-morrow morning hon. members of the other place have asked that we call third reading of the bill dealing with the Income Tax Act, so that it may get over to them and they may have an opportunity to give it full consideration. Immediately after that it is the intention to have done all that may be necessary to bring before the house for consideration the report of the industrial relations committee, and also the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think it desirable that the labour estimates and this report be dealt with at the same time. May we now understand that there will be a motion to concur in this report, probably to-morrow?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I rise to a point of order? I do not think you can have a motion to concur in the report and then go on with the labour estimates, because that means either that a vote will be taken on the report or that we will debate the report and discuss the labour estimates later. You cannot do the two things at once.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: You cannot perhaps do the two things as one, but if they are done in sequence it will avoid duplication of debate.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "TELEGRAM"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am very lenient with regard to the expression of opinion by the press concerning my utterances in parliament. I believe in freedom of speech, and one must be tolerant with regard to the expression of views by colleagues, by the press and by people outside of parliament generally. But this time I hold in my hand a clipping which is an editorial—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —of the Toronto Telegram—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows the rules in regard to questions of privilege. When a member rises he should state the question of privilege and be brief and to the point.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly, sir; and I was just about to read the editorial when you rose. It is under date of August 6, 1946:

> Mr. Pouliot has taken cowardly advantage of the privileges of the house to use language and make accusations which he must know would likely submit him to an action for slander had he expressed himself in similar terms elsewhere. It is surprising that the Speaker, who is so meticulous about his own privileges, failed to rebuke Mr. Pouliot for abusing the privileges of the house.

—which was done this morning. With all due respect for the Chair, Mr. Speaker—and you know I have the deepest respect for you—

I cannot stand for an accusation of cowardice by the editorial writer of this newspaper. The House of Commons has been my battle ground, where I have carried on my fight against the quacks of the medical corps of the army. Of course I made laudable exceptions, but they are few.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member will agree that it is against the rules to make a speech on a question of privilege. He should state his point of privilege briefly and then resume his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: My point of privilege is that the last man to be called a coward is the member for Temiscouata. If I made those statements in the house it was because in this house I have been fighting for the soldiers who were so badly treated by quacks like Chisholm, and I denounce him. I refer those interested to sessional paper 818 of this session; and I tell the writer of the Toronto Telegram that if he considers Chisholm, the cruel Chisholm, the criminal Chisholm, a great man, he himself is a jackass.

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO RETURN RESPECTING CAMP BORDEN ARMY REJECTION OR MEDICAL DISCHARGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I rise once more to a question of privilege in reference to the omission of certain letters from a return brought down the other day having to do with Camp Borden army rejections or medical discharges. I think I can simplify the matter by asking that the letters omitted from the file be produced. I do not want to return to this matter on future occasions, but you, Mr. Speaker, are the custodian of the privileges of parliament; and through you, in support of those privileges, I ask that those letters which were omitted be produced. It is not a matter of anyone's opinion as to whether the letters should be produced, for when the return was passed by this house there were no qualifications. The order was that a copy of all correspondence be produced. The correspondence produced indicates that on March 22 Mr. Robinette gave an opinion in regard to prosecutions being taken in this matter. That appears in the letter of March 26, 1945, from Mr. Miall to the director of mobilization. The same letter is referred to in a letter of April 5, 1945, from Mr. Anderson to Mr. Miall. Secondly, there is the omission of Mr. Robinette's letter of October 12, which is referred to in the communication of Mr. Varcoe, deputy minister of justice, to Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour. There is also the acknowledgment of that letter on November 13 from Mr. MacNamara in a letter to Mr. Varcoe, which is as follows: "November 13, 1945—"

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; I would ask that the hon. member do not read the letter. I understood that he was rising to a question of privilege with respect to certain papers which he says have not been produced. I do not think he should use that as an excuse to read letters into the record.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I submit to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I was showing that the letters did refer to other letters. There is no need for any show of ill-feeling on the part of my right hon. friend. This is a matter which affects the prerogatives and privileges of parliament; for according to sessional paper 258A, two counsel were of the opinion that the report indicated a prima facie case.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member rises to a question of privilege in connection with an order of the house which has been passed for the production of papers, he should state his question of privilege, ask what he wishes, and then resume his seat.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. My question of privilege is this, that law officers of the crown, or counsel, proposed action. The Deputy Minister of Labour first directed postponement of action and finally that action be proscribed. It is because the absence of these letters from the files is in contravention of our rights that I am asking the minister to produce them now.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend speaks about ill-humour. There is no ill-humour at all. There is some regret that he did not wish to wait until I get the memorandum from the law officers in order to give a more complete answer. But since the hon. member insists, I shall give such answer as I can at the present time.

The hon. member complains, first, that an order of the house has not been complied with. The order of the house was for the production of all correspondence between the Department of National Defence and/or the Department of Labour, and/or the Department of Justice, and between any one or more of said departments since January, 1944, to date, in connection with certain things.

The hon. member's complaint is that the report tabled referred to four documents which were not produced, and he listed them. The first of them is a letter from Mr. Robinette, K.C., of Toronto, addressed to the Department of Justice. That is not correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Department of Labour or any other department. That is a confidential report made by counsel to the Department of Justice. It always has been the rule there, and so long as I am minister I shall endeavour to have it observed, that counsel whom we consult may give us their report and their opinion in a confidential manner, as lawyers do to all their clients, without feeling that later those reports or opinions will be tabled in parliament.

The next is a letter from Mr. Miall to Mr. Anderson, dated March 26. Mr. Miall was assistant deputy to the Minister of Justice, and Mr. Anderson was another law officer of the Department of Justice. That is not correspondence covered by the order which was made. The order is for correspondence between different departments. It has always been the well-recognized rule that communications prepared for a minister by an official of his department are privileged and are not tabled. There was no reason for making any reservation on this motion because the motion does not call for such documents. The motion calls for correspondence passing between the Department of Justice and/or the Department of Labour and/or the Department of National Defence, and not for intradepartmental correspondence between officials of the Department of Justice.

The third item mentioned is a copy of a letter from Mr. Robinette, K.C. That was a letter addressed by him to the deputy minister of justice and addressed by him as counsel retained by the Department of Justice, and what I said with respect to the first item applies.

Respecting the fourth item, I have not yet been given an explanation of why it was not presented in the return. It would be a letter of the deputy minister of justice to Mr. MacNamara. I saw the deputy minister of justice about it Saturday morning, but I told him he need not give up his Saturday afternoon to look into it. I called this morning to find out if he had been able to do so this morning, and was told he would have the explanation for me to-morrow morning. So with respect to that item I have not yet the information, and that is because I did not think it was a matter of such urgency that I should ask the staff in the department to work Saturday afternoon to get it for me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not a question of asking the staff to work Saturday afternoon. I have reference to—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has stated his question of privilege, and the Minister of Justice has answered. I will not permit a debate on a question of privilege.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know whether you will permit me to say anything more, but I will say this, that I submit I have a right to say what the minister has stated is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is against the rules to debate a question of privilege, and I will not permit it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TYPOGRAPHICAL DISPUTE—SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS —LETT REPORT

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Labour has tabled a copy of the report of the Card commission, which was made some months ago, will he also table a copy of the report of the Lett commission, which was made more recently, in connection with the typographical dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to do so, and would point out that a copy of Commissioner Lett's report was forwarded to both parties, and a press release issued on it. I shall table the report, however.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask a supplementary question in regard to this matter. I understand the Vancouver Province is a party to this report, and has given notice to its employees. Will the minister say if he has made an attempt to bring the parties in the dispute together as recommended in the Lett report?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; I have requested Mr. Justice Richards to endeavour to bring the parties together, based on the findings of the Lett report.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Demobilization and reconversion—
570. Naval services, $72,817,856.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the wish of the committee would be with respect to the method of dealing with these estimates, but in past years when we have been considering them under the war appropriation it has been customary to take the various main headings which are to be found on page 275 of the estimates such as civil salaries and wages, pay and allowances, travel, transportation and freight, and so forth. It seems to me that it would make for orderly discussion, if the committee approves, if we were to consider the naval service vote under these twelve or thirteen separate items, having the general discussion take place, as has been the case in the past, on the item for civil salaries and wages. But I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it the purpose of the minister to make what we have been accustomed to look forward to as an annual statement with regard to the position in which the Royal Canadian Navy to-day stands?

Mr. ABBOTT: It had not been my intention to do that. I had thought that we might treat these estimates in the usual way in which the ordinary estimates are considered. I made a fairly complete statement last session as to the naval position, and subsequently in a number of public addresses, press releases and the like I have indicated the general character and size of the post-war navy, and my plan had been to proceed with these estimates in the ordinary way.

Mr. STIRLING: Then I would like to take a few minutes to make one or two general remarks as we have been accustomed to do in previous years.

Last year the minister described the then position of the navy with regard to strength, and gave figures as to what he believed the navy would arrive at in the course of the next year or two. He told us that the government's policy favoured an interim force for two years, at the end of which it might be possible for the government to develop a larger and longer policy. He gave the figures which he then had of an authorized strength of 771 officers and 8,003 ratings. He stated that the actual strength at that time was 534 officers and 3,383 ratings. Then we had a return made the first of this year which increased these figures to 751 officers and 4,364 ratings. In the course of the discussion of these items I have no doubt that the minister will give us the latest figures. The figures he has given indicate that he has very nearly a sufficiency of officers, but there is a great lack of ratings, and I am given to understand that that lack is principally in what I might call the middle ranks. The recruiting is bringing in a certain number of boys, fresh recruits; there are chief petty officers, some of them of the permanent service, and some having received their training and having developed themselves during the war years have come in through one of the reserve services. But between those two there is a considerable lack of able-bodied seamen and of those who have begun to specialize in their training courses.

The minister also indicated that new rates of pay and allowances would shortly be put forward, and they were subsequently, but they do not seem to have been of sufficient attraction to bring in the required number of recruits. The minister was looking forward to augmenting the ranks of the permanent service by those from the reserve forces who might desire to continue, at least for the two years, and also by those who had already gone back to civil life but might reconsider their position and return to the uniform. The minister will describe, I hope, what progress has been made in that direction. My information is that a certain number did follow that line but they did not remain in uniform again very long. They slipped out again for various reasons which the minister may be able to explain.

He also told us what he believed the Canadian navy would attain in the number of vessels in commission. There were to be two light cruisers, probably two light fleet carriers, ten to twelve destroyers and the necessary ancillary craft, and he hoped to have frigates in reserve. There again we should like to have the figures of the commissioned ships of to-day. If I am not mistaken they do not reach anything like that number, and probably cannot reach anything like that figure because of the shortage of ratings. We had quite an argument when the minister was discussing this last year on the figure which he gave of 10,000 officers and men, which he hoped would be sufficient to serve on the vessels described. I think it is more than evident to-day that he has not sufficient officers and men to take care of the work ashore as well as keeping these various vessels afloat.

The position of the Canadian navy is in essence just what it has been over the years. Its main duty is surely that of protecting the trade routes, the incoming and outgoing commerce on which Canada, being an export nation, so largely depends. She has that duty to perform on both coasts, and the minister will describe how nearly in his opinion government policy will provide for protecting those trade routes. During the war Canada's navy received a magnificent tribute from the allies because of the services which she rendered. From very small numbers at the beginning of the war she developed extremely rapidly and she provided the vessels necessary for the convoys, not only for convoying the materials which were passing from Canada but taking care to a large extent of the convoys on the Atlantic, at first half way across and then two-thirds of the way, up to Iceland, across to Scandinavia; and after the United States came into the war, they being so short of vessels, Canadian naval vessels had to be used to take care of tankers in the Caribbean. Canada, then, starting from very small numbers, was able to creep up to very considerable numbers, and she carried out a magnificent work.

But we must never forget that, even though the world had a second dreadful lesson of unpreparedness for war, we and the allies were able to overcome that lack of preparedness only because of what a famous United States citizen described as "the phony war," and if war does hit us again we must truly believe that we shall not have any period in which we can slowly, carefully, methodically develop our forces; in other words we must be prepared. And what must we be prepared for? We must be prepared to provide such naval strength as will enable us to look after Canada's interests in whatever war may come. As in the past, so in the future: we can only think of doing that by collaboration with allies.

Next month, I believe, in London there will meet the heads of the services of the commonwealth defence forces. They will speak each for themselves and prepare plans in collaboration with each other for the part which each will be ready to play if war comes, and even in the years of peace during which preparation can be made. I do not know whether at this stage the minister will be prepared to give the committee any indication of the line of argument which our naval representatives will take at that conference.

Besides that, there is still in existence the joint defence committee of the United States and Canada, to which I think representatives of the United Kingdom come, at least in a consultative capacity. I hope the minister will indicate what the government's policy for the future is with regard to the Royal Canadian Navy, in that cooperation with the United Kingdom and the United States, because in those two navies, with which we must collaborate, there will be differences of training, equipment, weapons, munitions, and general conduct of naval affairs. I should be very much interested therefore in learning in which direction in those regards the Canadian navy is expected to lean. If she is going to collaborate principally with the United Kingdom navy, she will be so guided in her actions with regard to equipment and training and ammunition; but if on the other hand it is expected that on the Atlantic and the Pacific she will principally collaborate with the United States navy, the answers to these questions will undoubtedly be different.

There is another matter on which I hope the minister will inform the committee with regard to his proposals for the future, and that is the great necessity, which exists more than ever after this second great war, to arrange that the navy and the air force shall be most cooperative. It is true that Canada has provided herself or is providing herself with two light fleet carriers. That goes some distance towards the cooperation which I seek. But in the manoeuvres which, small as they have been in the past, will I hope be very greatly increased in the future, both with the United Kingdom fleets and the United States fleets, there will be opportunities for a great deal more cooperation between navy and air than there has ever been yet. I should like the minister to describe the government's policy with regard to the training of pilots for the air arm of the Canadian navy, and to give us the assurance that cooperative action between those two members of the defence forces is to be carried out with greater intensity in the future than in the past.

Further remarks I think I will leave until we reach the items; but I should like the minister to give us some understanding of what the actual position to-day is with the Canadian navy.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the minister answers I would ask the hon. gentlemen who compose the committee to look at page 275, "Naval Services," and something will strike them: it is that "pay and allowances," meaning the pay and allowances of the crews of the ships, have been reduced from $98 million to $16 million. That means either that the crews of the ships will be six times less than they were during the war, or that there will be a considerable reduction of pay, that they will receive only one-sixth of what they had during the war—which would be an absurdity. I address my remarks through the Chair to the hon. member for Lake Centre, to my hon. friend from Skeena, whom I like and everybody likes very much; to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, to my genial friend the hon. member for Trinity, and all those who fight against bureaucracy; to the hon. member for Nanaimo, and to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, whom we have hailed to-day.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this a new party you are building up?

Mr. POULIOT: I might make a suggestion on those lines. But no; I make a special appeal to all those in this chamber who complain about bureaucracy, that now the time has come to curb bureaucracy. I admire the sailors. I tried to have some accepted in the department, but always there are very high obstacles to cross before a French Canadian is admitted, and not in the department but on a ship, to get his training. All sorts of qualifications are required. It seems to me that the high officials of the department—I except the minister and the deputy minister, for whom I have great respect—do not want a single French Canadian to get on board the ships. That is my idea of it. We receive silly replies from these brass hats; they procrastinate.

Here is my case. Let us look together at page 275, "Naval Services." Last year the amount for pay and allowances was $98 million. This year it was reduced to $16 million, less than one-sixth, which means that there are fewer men on the ships. That is my first point. Yet, incredible though it seems, Mr. Chairman, the salaries of the brass hats are twice what the amount was last year. I expected the minister to announce some kind of reform, the curtailment of useless branches and sub-branches of the department, and what do we find? Civil salaries and wages have increased from $7,000,000 last year, when apparently the crews were six times as large, to $13,000,000, or nearly twice as much. How can anyone who will not denounce it, who will not oppose it, say a word against bureaucracy afterwards? Opinions are free, surely. But this is an encroachment, an enlargement of bureaucracy, and I denounce it bitterly because those who are in charge of the department down there, except the minister and his assistant, are procrastinating asses, and it is impossible to make them move. They are stupid, and it was in spite of them that the men in charge of the fleet made a success of the Canadian navy after Admiral Nelles had left. When Admiral Nelles was there he was a real man.

Here we are, listening to academic speeches about the work the navy has done. It is all right; I agree with that. I agree with all the praise given the navy—but the navy on ships, not the navy on H.M.C.S. Ottawa.

An hon. MEMBER: Bytown.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, H.M.C.S. Bytown. This morning we honoured one of our colleagues, a hero of Dieppe, and I am glad also to give all praise to-day to the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois), who did supremely well in the navy. If very few have heard about it, it is because of that hon. gentleman's exceptional modesty, but he served his country very well and he knows his business. Besides that, he made personal sacrifices when he joined the navy to do what he accomplished on the high seas for the protection of the homeland during the war. History will tell, and I regret very much that history in this regard has not yet been written. The new members do not know it, but those who were here during the war remember very well how procrastinating the minister of naval services was at that time. His idea was that the first duty of the navy was to act as convoys, and that nothing had to be done for the protection of the homeland until the German U-boat came into the St. Lawrence river within a short distance of the city of Quebec. We had to urge him to protect our shores, and after repeated representations to him and repeated requests to the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet, we succeeded in getting some kind of protection for this country. But the country did not exist in the then minister's mind. All he thought of was to provide convoys. Hon. members will admit that I do not exaggerate when I say that. I was shocked when I heard him say so, but now he has gone. He was expressing the idea of some brass hats, but I hope the opinion of the brass hats of the department of naval services will not prevail and that the minister will give them the good common sense reproach which they deserve.

What is the distinction one can make between a brass hat who had no military service, or someone sent here from England to direct the Canadian navy, and our own Canadians who can do just as well as brass hats who never had any service on the high seas? We have gallant men of our own, like the member for Gaspe, who is most unobtrusive and modest, and he has nothing to say about the policy of that department. I am anxious to see who will rise and protest against the bureaucratic requests for twice as much for civil service salaries as was paid last year. It is a scandal and I denounce it bitterly, It it twice as much, as will be seen at page 275. It is nonsensical to table civil salaries of this size, after the war, when the sailors receive six times less than last year.

Mr. JAQUES: For full employment.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for his support. I wonder who will be number two to support me in the fight against bureaucracy. Will other hon. members remain silent and consent to it and afterwards go out and say that bureaucracy must be curbed? I am against the encroachments of bureaucracy, and I wonder what support I shall receive. I have the support of one hon.

gentleman from the west, and I thank him. I do not always agree with him, but everyone will admit that he has the courage of his convictions. Now I appeal to all hon. members, not only Liberals but all those who have a sense of democracy in their minds and hearts, to protest against it and join me in suggesting that the vote be reduced to an amount $1 less than it was last year. That at least would mark some progress. Instead of doubling the amount paid to the bureaucrats of the department of naval services, let us reduce it to $1 less than the amount paid last year. That would mean a reduction from $13,043,806 to $7,038,333—instead of 334. It would represent progress to that extent. It would be slight progress, but it would give us some reason for hope for the future. But if members swallow it as it stands they will have indigestion. They cannot swallow such increases without protest. What is the reason? How many sailors will gain an advantage? Here we are facing an absurd and ignominious bureaucratic enlargement, and I leave it to the members of the committee to decide what will be done. I wonder if the hon. member and I will be the only two to protest against it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before we go any further, perhaps I should reply to some specific points raised by hon. members. If not I am apt to lose track of them. The hon. member for Yale raised a number of points relating to the present strength of the navy regarding the number of ships on commission, and it might be well for me to dispose of that first. As at July 31 the actual strength of the navy was 8,216, made up as follows: Permanent force, 6,005; interim force personnel, that is those enlisted for the period up to September 30, 1947, 1,137; hostilities only, approximately 1,000; nurses 74. That makes the total I have mentioned. Since the first of the year recruiting has amounted in all to 2,631, made up of 1,430 new entries, 429 transferred to hostilities only personnel, reentries of 380, and enrolments of 392 from September, 1945, to January, 1946.

In terms of ships, as I have indicated during the past year, it is contemplated that when recruiting has been fully completed our strength will be two light fleet aircraft carriers, two six-inch gun cruisers, twelve destroyers, eighteen frigates and twelve escort minesweepers. At present there are in commission one aircraft carrier—the second, as the committee knows, is still under course of construction in the United Kingdom—one cruiser, two destroyers, one frigate and three algerines, that is aside from ancillary craft. When recruiting has been completed the strength will be as I have indicated, with a certain proportion of the fleet always in reserve.

The hon. gentleman asked me to give some indication as to what the future policy will be. That I can give only in general terms. As I have said on a number of occasions, our plan is to have a relatively small but modern navy of ships of the most modern type capable of operating in close cooperation if need be with either the British navy or the navy of the United States.

As to whether our equipment will be of the type used in the British or United States navy, I can only say what the condition is at present. As the committee knows, our ships have been constructed largely in the United Kingdom, with the exception of the destroyers which are being constructed at Halifax, but they are British type destroyers. At the present time the equipment is British type. There is no indication that that will be changed in the near future, but that does not mean that the navy cannot operate in the closest possible cooperation and collaboration with United States navy. The policy will continue to be as it has been in the past, to endeavour to assure that the closest possible relations exist between our navy and that of the United Kingdom and our great ally to the south.

As to the matter of civil salaries and wages, referred to by the hon. member for Temiscouata, the position is that while there is an apparent increase from last year, from $7 million odd to $13 million odd, there is a very good explanation for that apparent increase, and I emphasize the word "apparent". It is not an actual increase in expenditure; it is simply a regrouping of figures which were shown under different headings in previous years. In previous years the practice was to show under the first item, that is, "civil salaries and wages", only the civil service position; in other words, positions coming under the Civil Service Act. The item of $7 million odd for last year included only the cost of those positions. I may say the estimated cost for the same item this year is $4,421,005, which is the figure which should really be compared with the figure of $7 million odd of last year. Added to that figure of $4 million odd for civil service positions is another figure of $8,622,801, which includes all other salaries and wages with the exception of wages of people engaged in ship repairs, to which I shall refer in a moment. The two amounts of $4,421,005 and $8,622,801 make up the total of $13,043,806 shown in the estimates. These miscellaneous salaries and wages of $8 million odd to which I have been referring, or equivalent items, have been included in every year's estimates, but they were dispersed under a number of other headings, such as the fourth item in these estimates, operating expenses of properties, which included the salaries and wages of labour engaged in maintenance work; also the twelfth item, "miscellaneous stores and services" previously included the wages paid for all storekeeping labour, magazine workers, civil watchmen, truck drivers, boom defence workers, civil maids, waitresses, laundry workers, and the like. It was felt that the previous practice of segregating only civil service positions under the first heading was somewhat misleading to the committee, judging from the questions which have been asked on previous occasions. I repeat that the first item for this year includes all civil salaries and wages paid for naval work, with the exception of the amount estimated to be spent on wages to ship repair workers.

It is evident, I think, that in the transfer from war to peace we shall now carry on under civil labour a number of matters which in war time it was necessary to carry out with uniformed personnel. A great many jobs which in peace time should be civilian jobs had to be carried out in war time by men who were put in uniform not only to ensure that the necessary discipline could be applied, but also to ensure that these men could be moved from place to place. That is now no longer necessary, and it will be found that a good many men who during the war were uniformed personnel have now become civilians.

When we speak of the navy employing some 10,000 civilians, which was the figure roughly as of March 31, 1946, to look after 8,000 personnel in uniform, and that was the figure as at the end of June, it has to be remembered that a very large number of these civilians are engaged in the work of repairing and servicing naval ships and naval armament which do not come within the category of progress to which the hon. member for Temiscouata has referred. In a moment I shall give a breakdown showing how this portion of civilian jobs is made up. The navy dock yards at Halifax and Esquimalt constitute what are really two very large industrial plants, and they involve the investment of a great many millions of dollars. They provide practically all the mechanical facilities, except the dry dock, which are required to repair, refit and maintain not only the warships, but ships in time of peace. The employees of these establishments are not civil servants in the strict sense of the word, but they are civilians in the employ of the government, and that side of the navy is therefore a large industrial plant. As of the 31st of March, the number of hourly paid tradesmen engaged on ship repairs was almost 3,000. It should be remembered that the navy has not only to operate—

Mr. ISNOR: Is that for both dock yards, east and west?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: Will the minister subdivide it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall do that in a moment—I do not know if I have it—if my hon. friend will allow me to complete this general statement on civil labour and civil salaries and wages.

It has to be remembered that the navy has not only to operate, maintain and service its ships and train its men, but it has to look after this industrial plant to which I have referred, to maintain its buildings and shore establishments. Perhaps I might give a breakdown of the civilians employed in the navy as at June 30, 1946. Civilians, that is tradesmen, engaged in the repair of ships and armament, 2,188; civilians engaged in the repair and maintenance of dockyards and depots, 644; civilians engaged in the naval magazines, 626; civilians engaged in stores depots, 1,579; civilians employed as guards, 492; civilians employed as firefighters, 199; civilians employed as crews in harbour craft and auxiliary vessels, 439; civilians engaged at the reserve divisions throughout Canada, 123; headquarters civil staff, that is here in Ottawa, 1,197.

Mr. POULIOT: What was that number last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: The highest number was 1,702, as at July 31, 1945. I think the figure for last year would be in that neighbourhood, and to-day it is 1,197, down about 600.

Mr. POULIOT: Have any establishments in Ottawa been dispensed with since last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better be clear as to just what my hon. friend means by "establishments".

Mr. POULIOT: I mean office branches.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might just complete this enumeration of numbers and then answer my hon. friend's question, and after that the question asked by the senior member for Halifax. Other clerical workers numbered 791; other hourly paid civilians engaged at small depots, boom defence works and so on, as cooks, timekeepers and so on, 994; and civilians at Newfoundland, 129, making the total of 9,401 as at June 30. In the three months intervening between March 31 and

June 30, civilian personnel strength was reduced by approximately 1,000, representing approximately a four per cent reduction per month.

Two questions were asked, the first by the senior member for Halifax, as to the division of these men between the two coasts. I shall see if I have that information here; if not I may have to give it a little later. Perhaps this will give a pretty fair idea. On June 30 the number of hourly rate employees at Halifax was 3,313 and at Esquimalt, 1,690. These include hourly rate people engaged in ship repairs. Then the hon. member for Temiscouata asked if any establishments had been discontinued. I do not know that it is possible to say to my hon. friend that any separate department at naval service headquarters has been discontinued, but there has been a steady and fairly rapid shrinkage in the total staff, and that is still continuing. Some of the purely wartime activities have been discontinued, but the broad framework of the organization is that which is needed in peace time as in war time: the intelligence branch, the operations branch, the armament branch and so on. I am just picking those names out of the air; actually I do not know that there are branches bearing these names, but branches or directorates of that kind would be needed at any headquarters, army, navy or air force.

Mr. POULIOT: But what wartime establishments have been discontinued, please, if any?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into that question and give the answer a little later.

Mr. PEARKES: Last year the service estimates were presented to this house in an extraordinary piecemeal manner. We started off with one service, then switched to another, then came back to the first one, then switched to the second. Hon. members on this side of the house urged that the minister give an over-all picture of our defence requirements and explain the relationship of the three services, one with the other. I should like to emphasize the fact that though there are three services and the personnel of those services wear different uniforms, they must be inspired by a common doctrine; and I do feel that this house, before giving consideration to the estimates of the separate services, should have the assurance that these estimates have been prepared in cooperation and not, as in days gone by, behind closed doors with one service competing against the other for the meagre funds which could be made available. Can we have the assurance that the estimates for the three services have been coordinated?

Then I should like to ask the minister to give some further information as to the fleet air arm in Canada, or whatever it is to be called. I should like to know what aircraft the personnel of the Royal Canadian Navy are to be equipped with, whether they are to be equipped with aircraft by naval service or by the R.C.A.F., because I see no item in the details here as to types of aircraft or as to funds being made available under the naval estimates for aicraft.

Then there is just one other matter I want to refer to, a matter raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I regret that the minister did not see fit to relieve a degree of anxiety which may be caused in the country by the remarks made by the hon. member, who intimated that the policy of the Royal Canadian Navy was being directed by a class of official to whom he referred as brass hats who had seen little or no service afloat. If that is a fact it is a most serious charge against the administration of the department of naval affairs, and I regret that the minister did not see fit, when replying to the hon. member for Temiscouata, to reply to that charge. I hope he will now relieve the country of any anxiety which may be brought about by that statement.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better do that at once. This, I think, just emphasizes the desirability of allowing me to answer various members one at a time. The hon. member for Yale spoke; then the hon. member for Temiscouata. It is very difficult for me to retain in my mind the points raised by four or five different members in sequence, and reply to them all. I want to try to do it. That is the only point I wish to make. And I have heard the hon. member for Temiscouata so often talking about brass hats.

Mr. PEARKES: It is high time someone in this house pointed out that the permanent officials in the various service departments who have risen to the top of their profession have done so by hard work. The majority of them have risen from quite humble beginnings. I think I may be charged as having been a brass hat at one time, and I should have liked someone else to get up to speak on behalf of these senior officers. It is unbecoming for ministers of the crown to sit by and let these charges be made without any attempt to stand behind the senior permanent officials.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thank my hon. friend for the little lecture with respect to brass hats. I have been in the house four or five years, and in my experience I have had occasion to speak in their defence. If I remember correctly, the hon. member made reference to brass hats at naval defence headquarters, and I intended—and I still intend—to take issue with him on that point. However, as I say, I thank my hon. friend for the little lecture he has read me.

As the hon. member for Temiscouata has made his annual attack upon brass hats in the navy, and I feel sure he will do so with respect to the army—

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: —I suppose it is necessary for the minister to get up each year and answer these charges, seriatim, and I shall be glad to do that. So far as his remarks are concerned about the navy being directed by men who have had no sea service, that of course is all nonsense. The present head of the naval service is a distinguished sailor who has had a distinguished record, and a record which I do not think requires any elaborate defence before the House of Commons. This is a hardy perennial every year, when one has to speak about high ranking army, navy and air force officers, and I do not think the hon. member for Nanaimo would expect me to rush to their defence. I will say that we have a very efficient staff, in all three services, and they are men, so far as I can speak for the two departments with which I am concerned, in whom we have the utmost confidence.

I do not know whether any other point was raised, but perhaps I should refer to the future of the fleet air arm. Before doing so let me say that on previous occasions, both in the house and in public statements, I have announced the projected strength in the army and navy, and, broadly speaking, the general composition of the air force. That is not news, and it does not need to be stated again. The house knows it; the country knows it, and there is no change in that policy.

I do not know just how complete have been the details I have given with respect to the fleet air arm, and perhaps it might be appropriate to make a statement on it now. The present plan is for four first-line squadrons of aircraft, plus a fleet requirement unit squadron, and for shore facilities to be shared with the R.C.A.F. The naval air component is to consist of two light fleet carriers, as has been announced, one of which has already been acquired and manned, and is on her way to Montreal on a good-will tour.

In establishing the naval air arm, every effort has been made to avoid duplication of facilities which are already available in the Royal Canadian Air Force. An agreement has been reached between the navy and the air force based on this essential premise, and naval squadrons have already been operating for some six weeks from the air force station at Dartmouth. Under this agreement the navy operate all aircraft normally operating over the sea which are carried seaward in His Majesty's Canadian ships. In addition they will operate a fleet requirement unit made up of shore-based non-operational aircraft of various types to meet fleet training requirements which could not economically be carried out by the air force. The air force operate all aircraft normally operating over the land and the sea which are normally based permanently on shore with the exception of the fleet requirement unit just mentioned. Further to this, the air force, through their existing organizations, have undertaken the procurement of aircraft and stores for the navy, and also are handling major repairs.

The naval air arm complement has been laid down and approved in principle by the cabinet at about eleven per cent of the total man-power of the navy, but it has been emphasized that the percentage of air strength may in the future have to be raised to perhaps twenty-five or thirty per cent of the over-all naval complement. At the present time we have one light fleet cruiser in full commission, H.M.C.S. Warrior, but a small percentage of the air complement of this ship are Royal Navy ratings, shortly to be replaced by Canadians.

The fleet requirements unit just mentioned is in the process of forming at Dartmouth. This unit, in common with some air force units, is suffering from lack of air mechanics. Two additional first-line squadrons will be formed early next year—we hope about the time the second carrier is in commission.

In general it may be said that the air personnel situation is shaping satisfactorily. There has been no difficulty in obtaining volunteers for air crew. A number of naval pilots already flying are ex-R.C.A.F. men. The development of the air arm component is progressing satisfactorily, and it is intended to continue the closest cooperation with the R.C.A.F. as regards joint facilities and training.

In addition it is intended to make a close study of army support, and arrangements are already in hand for army liaison units to be placed in our ships. This of course is in line with what the hon. member for Nanaimo was saying a few minutes ago. The object at present of the air component is to study and equip themselves for any role which they may be called upon to play, including anti-submarine warfare, air cover, convoy protection, ground support of the army, striking and interception forces, and the like.

With regard to the future of air personnel, it is the intention that officers who enter this arm shall be also trained as naval officers. They will occupy executive positions in Canadian ships in the intervals of their tours of flying duty so their opportunities to attain high executive command in the navy will be the same as those of an officer in any other branch. That, I think, is of great importance, because the normal combat flying time of an officer is limited; and I think it is therefore important that the men coming into the navy as naval flyers should have a full naval career open to them, and that they should be not only flying officers as such but should also be fully trained to take command of naval vessels in the same way as any other naval officers would do.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the size of a naval air squadron?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have that information at three o'clock.

Mr. PEARKES: What types of aircraft are being flown?

Mr. ABBOTT: Seafires and Fireflies, and there is a possibility we may get some other types of aircraft for training. That is now under discussion. They are the latest type of British aircraft.

Mr. PROBE: Under what item will it be possible to discuss the general post-war policy? I share somewhat the confusion experienced by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said in my opening remarks—perhaps I did not make it clear—that our practice in the past has been to discuss general policy under this heading of salaries and wages. It is hoped that next year we may go back to a full civilian basis, but in the past we have had our general discussions under that item. I should be glad if the hon. member would follow that practice here. After finishing the item we will stick more or less closely to the particular item under consideration.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few remarks to make at the present time, and they are personal. The minister spoke before luncheon of my annual attack on the brass hats. I will tell him that it is not annual, it is not monthly, it is not weekly, it is not daily; it is a constant denunciation of an absurd regime in which the irresponsible have control over the destinies of the nation. I will tell him, and he must take my word for it, that I am not any more impressed by jocular remarks than by insults of the kind I got the other day when I was called a nuisance, an attack which did not go any higher than the sole of my boot. The task I am performing now I hope will not be a task that I shall perform alone. I am most grateful to the hon. member who gave his support to the cause we are fighting for, and I hope we shall not be alone in trying to curb bureaucracy in the war departments as well as anywhere else. Some progress may be made; maybe not, but I will ask as a special favour from the other members who do not give their support to that cause, which is the cause of the people at large and of the taxpayers, at least not to denounce bureaucracy if they are ready to swallow it entirely. Let them keep their eloquence to themselves or act in accordance with their words.

I will tell the minister that confusion has been caused in the minds of the people by the mixing of the various employees in the department who are described as civilians precisely to prevent the Canadian people from seeing that there is no effective reduction taking place in the Ottawa staff of the naval service, any more than there is any important reduction of staff in the other war departments. Either the war is over or it is not. If the war is over, there are many, many men who have earned fat salaries and bonuses for themselves and their dependents during the war without risking their lives, not even their little finger, who must be told that the war is over. That news must be announced to them. The war is over and your usefulness has ceased. I wonder if the minister speaks to them with the genial smile that is his characteristic when he pilots his estimates through.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not always.

Mr. POULIOT: He should learn to frown.

Mr. ABBOTT: He does.

Mr. POULIOT: And he should practice reform in his department. The country expects it. If there are departments where reforms should start right away, it is precisely the war departments.

I have a word to say to the hon. member for Nanaimo, and it is this. I ask him for a loaf and he gives me a stone. I have already praised him. I have the highest personal regard for him, but I hope that he will realize that just because he was once a brass hat, and probably a good one, he should not feel that he must protect and take under his wing all the bad ones. For there are bad ones, and by bad ones I mean men who are getting fat stipends from the state and are doing nothing, sitting on swivel chairs here in Ottawa and being considered more important than a Canadian citizen who runs the risk of election and is here to do his duty and protect the rights of the taxpayers of this country. This cause is very important. It is the cause of reform, the same cause for which our forefathers fought a hundred years ago. There on the other side of the house I see a friend of mine who not long ago showed me a testimonial dating back nearly a century ago. His parents were in politics at the time. They were fighting precisely against bureaucracy, and they won their fight, and it is just as sure that we will win, even if it takes time, our fight for freedom, liberty and responsible government. I may be called wrong precisely because I take this matter seriously. If I do so, I do so as a Canadian citizen.

I realize the losses the navy has made. To-day we have paid homage to the heroes who landed at one of the most dangerous places on the European continent at that time. They were supported by the navy, and the navy has suffered losses. But I remember very well that when Great Britain offered us ships because of what Canada had done during the war, Canada was unwilling to accept that gift. The government said that we should not accept those ships, that we must pay for them. We would not even accept gifts from Great Britain. What an idea!

The other day I was dumbfounded by the statement made in Paris that Canada expected nothing from the meeting of the united nations. I protest against that. It is not within the power of any nation to compensate us for the losses of life that we sustained, but there can be compensation for our losses in ships and other material. I believe that we must get something. If we do not get any material advantage from the united nations at least we should put our own house in order before teaching others to do so.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister said that there were 6,005 of the permanent force enrolled in the navy at the present time. I have here a press clipping dated April 15 last, which shows that at that time there were 5,200 in the regular navy. That means a change in four months of only 800, or at the rate of 200 a month. At that rate it would take two years to recruit 10,000 of all ranks. I should like to ask the minister what the recruiting plan is, and whether there is a campaign on foot, and if so, whether it is going to be stepped up. Just what practical steps are being taken to get men? Is the minister satisfied with the present rate of intake? If not, does he propose to take any more energetic steps to get recruits? At the same time would he tell us something about the recruiting of the reserve navy? This same press clipping says that the reserve establishments are to be recruited up to sixty-five per cent only. Will the minister explain how that sixty-five per cent is arrived at, and whether it is contemplated that later on it may be 100 per cent? Perhaps he would give a general statement of how the reserves establishment is getting along.

Mr. ABBOTT: The figures I gave before lunch for the permanent navy as at July 31 were 6,005. Recruiting there has been proceeding at a satisfactory rate. The difficulty in the navy is the same, I know, as in the army and, I assume, in the air force; it is to get specialists, mechanics, engineroom ratings, and so on. But recruiting is proceeding satisfactorily and if as we complete the changeover from war to peace and more ships are put into commission more active steps are required to obtain recruits, those steps will be taken. My officers tell me that they are satisfied with the rate at which recruiting has been proceeding. They are being fairly selective in their choice of men. A lot of recruiting is being done through the divisions. That was the plan—that the divisions would be used as recruiting agencies. A certain amount of publicity material in the way of explanatory booklets, and, I think, posters, was prepared for use by the divisions, but there has not been what one might call an intensive recruiting campaign. It was felt that the time was not yet ripe for that. As I say, the recruiting is proceeding satisfactorily.

As to the reserve divisions, here again we are to some extent still in the reorganization phase. As the committee will appreciate, in some districts where we have good reserve divisions the quarters which are available are temporary, that is to say they are rented, as they are clubs or something of the sort which have been taken over. One very real problem we have to face at the moment is the provision of suitable permanent quarters. It is a problem which, I may say, is also faced by the army in connection with armouries. Under existing conditions it is neither practicable nor desirable to proceed with any building campaign. So in some sections where we have keen reserve divisions we have a very real space problem. There is also the problem of changing over from a wartime to a peacetime command arrangement, getting suitable men who will take on the command of the divisions in peacetime. That, I understand, too, is coming along nicely. There is the usual difficulty that in some cases men who spent several years on active service away from their homes are reluctant for the time being to take on the responsibility of directing a local unit. But we feel sure that a good many of them, after they have had a brief change and rest, will be only too glad to lend a hand there, and I think it is desirable, as in the case of the army, to try to have as many reserve officers as possible who have had operational experience to take charge for a time of local reserve units.

As to the active list of the reserve part of the navy, the progress since recruiting started on April 15, which is when we renewed our recruiting campaign, has not been as promising as we should have liked. The strength as of July 31 was only 1,080. But as I say, with the divisions settling down from their job of demobilization, and with reserve training becoming active during the summer months, better results are anticipated, and I understand that several hundred applications are now on hand. The actual new entries are 254 officers and 208 men as at July 31; and the retired list as at August 1, 1946 on the reserve side is approximately 3,200 officers, in the Royal Canadian Navy permanent force, 123, and the Wrens, 231.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that apply to the reserve which the minister gave last year, 18,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is our objective. At the present time we have only 1,080, or maybe somewhat higher, of that projected strength.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: How does the navy intend to dispose of the naval buildings in Prince Rupert? A rumour is going around that they are to be torn down, and the people are much concerned, because there are many semi-permanent or permanent buildings which would be useful for housing, or for factories, and so forth. Another question which has been bothering the city of Prince Rupert for some time, about which I have had correspondence with the minister, is this. When is Brigadier Walsh's report on the damage to the streets of Prince Rupert to be put in the hands of the city council? I think the question was last asked in May, and we were then told that it would come out some time in the future. Well, the future is going on and on.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the first question, it is always difficult to arrange these discussions in strict order, but I think my hon. friend's question would more properly come under one of the later items.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Well, will the minister hold it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will take a note of his question. I may say that two of the buildings to which he refers are to be used for the naval division in Prince Rupert. Perhaps I had better deal with the question when the proper item comes up.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the attitude of the department towards men who at the beginning of the war joined the service for say seven years, have now served five and a half or six years, and are anxious to leave to go to universities and become rehabilitated? I know that there are a number of applications for release from the navy, and the attitude seems to be to retain them in the navy against their wish.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am familiar with some of these cases; they have come to my attention, of course. The period of enlistment was seven years, and they signed on as permanent force sailors for that period. They are highly trained, we need those men in the service, and the general rule is that unless there are strong compassionate grounds which would permit of the man being released from his contract, he should stay in the navy for the term of his enlistment. Unfortunately it is that very type of highly trained sailor that we need in this transition period when we are turning over from war to peace, because our permanent force navy was pretty small and we are having to recruit it up to a strength far greater than we had before, so we need these men. But my direct answer to my hon. friend's question is that each case is considered on its merits, and if there are strong compassionate grounds upon which it is felt that a man should be relieved of his contract, the application is granted.

Mr. BROOKS: It was not of compassionate grounds that I was speaking; it was in connection with going to university. That has not been considered by the government a compassionate ground?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not considered as a ground, no.

Mr. SKEY: The minister spoke of the navy being an active force of about 10,000 and a reserve force of about 18,000. Will he tell the committee on what basis the decision as to this strength was made?

Mr. ABBOTT: These figures were selected after the decision had been taken as to the size of our post-war navy in terms of ships, and the officers were asked to prepare a man-power programme for manning those ships, assuming that so many were to be kept in commission at a given time, so many in reserve, so many for training, so many for shore establishments, and so on. The proposed establishments after being put forward were reviewed by the defence committee of the cabinet and ultimately approved by the cabinet. That is the basis on which that figure was selected. The same thing, I may say, applied to the other two services.

Mr. SKEY: That is the reason I ask the question. If we are to build any military force in peace time it must be based on a survey of Canada's man-power. I do not think it should be based altogether on the number of ships we intend to man. We have twelve million people in this country. Every military force is supported by the industrial effort and the population behind it. Therefore if we want to build a good peacetime force, whether army, navy or air force, we must have in mind all the time the man-power potential in Canada, and we should so design the force that it shall be capable of expansion to the limits that the man-power in the country will permit. That is a factor to be considered as well as simply the ships they are to man. We must have in mind also the expansion and extension of the force to an economic unit. In the United States they found they had less than ten per cent of trained men in the American navy when they went into the war, and they found that was spreading the trained personnel far too thin. If the navy were again to expand to the 100,000 mark, perhaps an active force of ten per cent of its potential expansion, and a reserve force of 18 per cent of that potential, would be sufficient to man it properly and have a trained personnel to handle the ships and the administration of such a force. Can the minister tell me whether there is any department at naval headquarters under which combined planning takes place—combined operational planning with both the army and the air force?

Mr. ABBOTT: That would come under the chief of naval staff. The coordinating group, as my hon. friend knows, is the chief of staffs committee, which consists of the chiefs of staff of the three services, with their advisers, and which meets regularly.

Mr. SKEY: If I might be so bold as to advise again, I suggest that this is the wrong level on which to start planning. It should begin right down in the roots of the service. In my small war service I was on coastal operations, and it took over two years, perhaps three years, in England before the air force properly combined with the navy in an attack which eventually negatived the German submarine. Planning has to begin certainly at a lower level than the chiefs of staff if policies and training are to be coordinated and carried out with understanding by the junior ranks. May I ask the minister what proportion of the naval department personnel is now engaged in caretaker functions for War Assets Corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give that information a little later.

Mr. SKEY: Do the naval service plan to use jet aircraft on their carriers?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the same principle will be followed there as in the air force. Aircraft carriers will be equipped with the latest type of aircraft suitable for that particular vessel. That is the case at the present time. We have the latest type of aircraft flying for these carriers, a type which is manufactured in England. One cannot prophesy in these things. All one can say is that we will endeavour to have the latest and most up to date equipment. The trend seems to be towards jet aircraft on land, and no doubt in sea operations, and if that type is used in sea operations Canada will use them.

Mr. SKEY: Does the naval department plan to continue Royal Roads as a cadet naval training establishment?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: Is the history of the development of the Canadian navy being written?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: Does the naval department expect that Canada will ever develop industrial capacity to back our operational naval force without having to purchase machines, ships, equipment, scientific apparatus and technical supplies abroad?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have never claimed the gift of prophecy. Canada has made very rapid industrial development over the past few years, and I feel that that development will continue. As far as being able to give an assurance to my hon. friend or anyone else is concerned, that we shall be in a position fully to back our navy without getting any type of equipment or material from elsewhere, I would hesitate to make that assertion now.

Mr. SKEY: Can the minister give the committee an assurance that Canadian industrial firms are given an opportunity to tender on naval contracts for equipment?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no question about that. Canadian industrial firms are furnishing large quantities of equipment for destroyers which are being built in Halifax, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. HARKNESS: Of the establishment of 10,000 in the permanent navy, how many are officers and how many are ratings? Also, of the 6,005 we have at the present time, how many are officers and how many ratings, particularly ratings below the rank of petty officer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I gave some of that information this morning.

Mr. HARKNESS: But there was no breakdown below the total figure.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps that question had better stand and I can give the information later. Do I understand the hon. member wishes to have a breakdown as between officers and men in the authorized establishment of 10,000 and a breakdown of the present total figure of 8,000 in the navy, as between officers and men?

Mr. HARKNESS: The actual breakdown of the 6,005 in the permanent navy and interim. The others do not enter into it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give the breakdown of strength as at May 31, 1946, of those actually serving, and I will get the other information later. Officers: 775 permanent force; interim force, 293; hostilities only 557; Wren officers, 43; nursing sisters, 67. That gives a total of 1,735. These will have been reduced since that day. I have not the latest figures. Other ranks: permanent force, 5,028; interim force, 1,172; hostilities only, 1,194; Wrens, 407; nursing sisters, nil, or a total of 7,801. The totals are: 5,803 permanent force; interim force, 1,465; hostilities only 1,751; Wrens 450; nursing sisters 67, a total of 9,536, which has since been reduced. I will get the others and put them on later.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to tell a brief story of the efficiency of somebody in the department of naval services. Last session the minister said that if any boy was necessary to farm work he would be relieved at once or as soon as possible. Some days after that I interviewed officials of his department telling the story of a farmer who needed his boy at home. Less than three days after the interview the boy was brought back home from the occupational forces in Germany and landed on the shores of Canada. Not all the work done by the Department of National Defence is blundering. To me that was efficient service, and it helped a farmer who otherwise would not have been able to put in his crop.

Mr. MUTCH: I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. The question might appropriately be asked also on the estimates of the Department of National Defence, Army. It has to do with the matter of demobilization. Unfortunately I have not before me the naval order which is involved. I am assured that a similar situation exists in the army. The question has to do with army routine order 2232 and appendix and some amending P.C.'s—the numbers of which I can give the minister if he requires them—and with members of the various services who were discharged from one branch of the service in order to serve in another. To my knowledge the interpretation which is being put on this routine order as amended by these seven various P.C.'s is that personnel serving in one branch of the service, in the army itself, the air force or the navy, on being discharged for the purpose of being commissioned or appointed to another, would not, according to the terms of the routine order, be given a discharge button for the service which they performed in the original branch to which they were attached. My information is that those in authority in both the army and the navy branches, which are under the minister, are interpreting the routine order to apply to those who were discharged in order to enlist in another branch of the service. But it has happened that some members who served creditably in the army or navy, and some for a considerable period of time, were selected for service in another arm for which they volunteered and for which they were adjudged fit, but for one reason or another they did not succeed in serving meritoriously in the branch of the service to which they went. A considerable number of these persons are now in the position of having meritorious service in the army or navy and have been discharged as a result of misconduct or their service no longer required in the navy, and they are unable to obtain anything to show that they did have a period of meritorious service. Is the minister aware of this condition, and will he look into it in both branches of the service in order that the situation may be rectified? May I point out that it has already been accepted in principle by the board which reviews the service of persons who were dishonourably discharged in order to see whether or not the benefits which Canada has awarded to those who served with merit should go to these other men. The practice is now that if a man has meritorious service in one branch of the service and is discharged and reenlisted or reappointed to another branch of the service from which he is dishonourably discharged and thereby deprived of these benefits, he does in fact receive them for that period of meritorious service which he had in the former branch. That being so I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that this consideration is being denied at the present time to the men to whom I refer. I speak positively with respect to the army, and I am informed on reliable authority that the same applies to the navy. I should like to have the assurance of the minister that provision will be made for bringing the matter of service buttons on the same level as the benefits which are available for the period of meritorious service.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into the whole question which has been raised by my hon. friend and make a statement a little later. I was not aware that action was being taken in the way he has indicated, but I shall give a statement in the course of these estimates or on the army estimates.

Mr. HARKNESS: This morning a certain amount of discussion took place on the number of civilian employees in the naval branch of the department. I have two or three questions that I should like the minister to answer if he can. Are some of these people employed because the permanent navy is not up to full strength? If so, what numbers of these civilian employees are actually covering off jobs which would be carried on by the regular navy if it were up to strength?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can answer that very quickly. None of them are being employed to fill jobs which would be filled by the navy if it were up to strength.

Mr. HARKNESS: If none of them are used for that purpose, are many of them used in demobilization activities which will presumably come to an end this year? What likelihood is there of a reduction in the number of civilian employees?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite a number have been used in connection with various demobilization activities, which, as my hon. friend points out, are being reduced all the time and which should be largely at an end by the end of this year. As he will appreciate, there is quite a good deal of work to be done in storing, classifying equipment, and that sort of thing, and after it has been done and the equipment has been turned over to War Assets we sometimes have to guard it for a time. It should be possible to effect a further considerable reduction in the number of employees. As I pointed out this morning, quite a few are employed in permanent activities in the dock yards and in the east and west coast naval magazines, the principal ones being at Renous, New Brunswick, and Kamloops, in British Columbia, and in things of that kind.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will the minister tell us what the reduction is likely to be, approximately, when demobilization activities come to an end? I was thinking particularly of one item which showed that 1,197 of these civilian employees are at naval headquarters. Probably it would be possible to get rid of a considerable number of these.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear. I thank the hon. member for Calgary East. We are three now; we are making progress. I appreciate what he has done, and I thank him on behalf of those who would have less to pay in taxes if we had not such an abnormal number of do-nothings in the department of naval services in Ottawa. I am no better informed now than I was this morning and at three o'clock, and it is now twenty minutes to four. I still expect a right and clear answer from the minister showing the reductions which have been made in each of the units or establishments or branches of the naval services department compared not with July but with September, the month which followed V-J day last year. We must know how the minister has been working to cut the ties of bureaucracy in the department; it is not a matter of expressing vague sentiments and cloudy ideas about the reductions which have been made. I want to have the information in black and white; I want to know how many of these do-nothings were in each branch last year and how many are there this year. The minister will not put in my head the thought that after both wars are over, the war against Germany and the war against Japan, the usefulness of all those in his department has not ceased. I do not cast aspersions on all, but naturally there must be some the minister can dispense with. I do not know the number of men who have been dropped from office since September of last year, and I should like to have a tabulation of those figures. It should be easily made up, if the personnel is as efficient as it has been described. This is for those engaged in civilian occupations, sitting in swivel chairs here in Ottawa.

With regard to the sailors, brave as they can be, let me tell the minister of an experience I had many years ago. I spent a Yuletide at a dock yard, and I saw the number of servants the commanding officer had at his disposal. They were fine boys. One was shining silverware; another was shining brass; another was shining boots, and one could not interfere with the work of the other. One was cleaning silverware; another was cleaning china; another was cleaning the porcelain; one had the key to the wine cellar; another was serving wine; another was serving water and another was serving bread and butter. They were like the sands of the sea and the stars of the sky. I do not cast any aspersions on the navy, but I know the work being done by those men could have been done by a butler and a handyman; two men could have done that work very easily. But there was a cloud of servants, and we cannot say anything because they are in the navy. Well, even if it is done that way in England why should we follow that example here in Canada? It is time to stop those practices. It is unfortunate that they should be carried on when men are needed in agriculture, in the forests and everywhere else, when work is not done because we have not enough men at our disposal. There we have these men serving their country shining silverware, shining brass, the one shining the brass and not shining the silverware, another shining the boots without shining either the brass or the silverware. This is very important, and they take it very seriously. They take it for granted; that is the noble tradition.

Coming to that noble tradition, is there anything more foolish than that they should wear a black tie to mourn the death of Lord Nelson? Not only that; they wear the most absurd trousers, with seven creases to indicate the seven seas. Those uniforms are most uncomfortable; they are ridiculous, and they are not changed because it is the navy tradition to wear trousers symbolic of the seven seas and a black tie to mourn Lord Nelson.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why not?

Mr. POULIOT: Because we live in modern times. The Victory was a great ship, but it is tied to a wharf in the south of England. Does my hon. friend belong to another age, or does he live in the year 1946? I should like to see him in a sailor's uniform.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As a matter of fact I excel my hon. friend, because I have been in a sailor's uniform and he never has been.

Mr. POULIOT: That is true, but now my hon. friend could not wear the same uniform, which is very unfortunate. Here we are with the hon. gentleman who leads the house, who is most congenial, but who still mourns Lord Nelson. Let him mourn Lord Nelson.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why not?

Mr. POULIOT: Surely; let him mourn Lord Nelson as much as he likes.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are proud of him.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely, we are all proud of him; he was a great man. I would not say a word to the contrary, but the sailors of the Canadian navy should do something else than mourn Nelson, and wear those long pants that are like bells.

Mr. KIDD: They have done something else.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, I know, and I do not deprecate what they have done. I admire them, but they are most uncomfortable. They complain about it, and when I speak like this I express the grievances of the sailors of this year 1946, the sailors who did so well during the war and who survived it. Somebody should improve their lot by at least making them comfortable. Perhaps there are many young men who would be ready to enlist in the navy but do not do so because they think they would look foolish in that uniform.

Mr. QUELCH: You would not want them to wear kilts, would you?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I leave that to the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mr. MUTCH: Don't worry; I'll be back on that subject.

Mr. POULIOT: I leave to him the little petticoat which adorned him when he came into the house during the war, and I leave to him the other article mentioned by my hon. friend. But, sir, we are here for reform, and to reduce the number of idle men in this department. I suppose there must be some who will be idle, since there are some everywhere, but let us have as few as possible. And let us give the boys in the navy a chance to be comfortable when they go out, a chance to dress properly according to modern times and in accordance with modern uniform traditions of the nation. This is not a joke; I am talking seriously. I believe in the comfort of these men and the comfort of all those who are in government employ. The other day I asked for some improvement. I was not successful; I was told it was not desirable, but I still believe it is desirable to make men comfortable.

The minister is not a fanatic or a bigot; I hope he will change the policy of the department which now requires that no Canadian may apply for enlistment in the navy unless he is as learned as Pico della Mirandola. Why should a man need to have a university degree in order to be a sailor on a ship, or a stoker, or an assistant to serve meals?

Mr. ABBOTT: He does not.

Mr. POULIOT: Some fine fellows whom I knew personally applied and were turned down because their education was one year short of the standard required by the department; the minister knows that. Therefore I hope the navy will become modernized, not only with regard to the guns on the ships but also in regard to the comfort of the crews, so that all ideas of bygone days may disappear and the navy shall live in our time, in the year 1946.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I believe it was suggested by the minister this morning that we should deal with the items as they appear on page 275. The first item is civil salaries and wages. Shall this item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No, sir.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister was going to answer my question.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am a little lost in the maze here. I gave some figures this morning on this item of civil salaries and wages, made up to June 30, which is about six weeks or so ago. As the committee will realize, these estimates seem to be a kind of movable feast; you have to make fresh estimates every now and then, and it is a little difficult to know just what will be wanted. I will have a more up to date estimate made, if it is possible to do so, and give it to the committee either later to-day or at a later date. Speaking generally, however, our estimates for the year are based on the assumption that there will be a further reduction of at least one thousand civilian employees from the present figure. I hope and believe that the reduction will be substantially in excess of that, but these estimates were prepared some time ago, and obviously it is difficult to know just how rapidly the demobilization, both of men and materials, can proceed, so it is necessary to make provision for the situation that may exist. However, I say now that our financial estimates are based upon a further reduction of at least one thousand, and I believe it will be greater than that. I think that answers the question of the hon. member for Calgary East, and I shall try to get a little later information for the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I was amused to hear the hon. member for Temiscouata, whom many of us consider one of the older traditionalists of the house, criticize the traditions of the navy.

Mr. POULIOT: Not at all.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I rise to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in my constituency we have a well-organized and efficient sea cadets corps. They did excellent work in the last few years. The boys are being trained in navigation, seamanship and general administration connected with ships. The community has purchased a large headquarters, and has provided some cutters and other equipment. They have excellent opportunity for training because of their proximity to the Columbia river. I suggest to the minister that naval stores be made available to these corps, and that the naval department do everything possible to supply these sea cadets corps with available equipment such as small boats, navigating instruments, and life preservers. There are many small items which could be transported for the use of these sea cadets corps. What is the policy of the naval department in this regard?

Mr. ABBOTT: I agree with what the hon. member has said about the sea cadets corps in his own district and the sea cadets movement generally. So far as equipment is concerned, the practice is to make modern up-to-date equipment available for sea cadets corps. The method is to issue it to the reserve division nearest the point where the cadets corps operates, and the division issues the supplies on loan as required. In other words it is decentralized to the extent that the local division is given the responsibility of accounting for the equipment lent to the local corps, but naval headquarters determine how much should be provided. I can assure the hon. member it is the policy of the department to be as generous as possible in making suitable equipment available.

Mr. STEPHENSON: We had the same experience in my constituency with the sea cadets corps. We wanted to get a ship which would be suitable for training, because we are located right on the lake front, with a good harbour. The corps offered as much money as it could get together, but it was told that the amount collected was not sufficient to purchase the ship. It would seem to me the department should give some assistance to the sea cadets corps so that they could continue. I suggest the navy department give some consideration to this matter, so that suitable boats may be made available.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall look into the points raised by the hon. member. There is a generous provision, to the extent of $829,000, in this year's estimates for the sea cadets corps. As the committee knows, this is a joint enterprise. The sea cadets corps are under the auspices of public-spirited private citizens who give direction and guidance. The navy assists in the work of the corps by furnishing a financial appropriation to help with instructors, equipment and so on. However I shall look into the point the hon. member has raised.

Mr. KIDD: What are the plans for the fleet air arm? Where does the minister intend to get recruits?

Mr. ABBOTT: I discussed that matter at some length just before the luncheon adjournment. It was put on the record in some detail, so that if the hon. member will look at Hansard to-morrow he will find the statement there. If he does not find covered the point he has in mind, I hope he will ask a supplementary question.

Mr. HARKNESS: I hope the minister realizes that the questions I have been asking about these civilian employees have been in an attempt to get a reasonable explanation as to the apparent disparity between the amount of money being spent by the naval branch and that spent by the army and air force on civil salaries. I have suggested two possible reasons, one of which was that some of these men were being used to cover up vacancies which exist in the permanent naval ranks. The minister says that is not so. If it is not so, and if there is to be a reduction of perhaps only a thousand in the number of these men—and the minister hopes it will be greater—it must be that there is still a considerable disparity, even if we accept the figure of $4,424,000 for civil servants alone and $8 million odd for people who do not come under the civil service generally. The amount for civil salaries and wages in the air force, with a lot more men to begin with, is still $5 million odd and in the army, with a very much larger number, it is $7 million odd.

Mr. ABBOTT: But they do not operate dock yards.

Mr. HARKNESS: In the air force and navy there are a considerable number of establishments of one kind or another partly operated with civilian help, and I suggest that offsets this dock yard element. Is there any other reason for this apparent disparity? —because there certainly is a disparity of some considerable amount.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suggest that if my hon. friend analyses other estimates he will find that there are some civil salaries and wages carried in the army estimates, for instance, under other headings. We have attempted this year in connection with the navy to bring them under this one item. As I said this morning, that differs from the practice in previous years. I agree with everything said by the hon. member, or by any other hon. member, that it is desirable to cut down the number of civilian employees. Let me assure the committee that I am driving at that every day. I realize that the proportion appears high, although I am not prepared to say it is too high. Indeed I do not think it is, to-day. I am told that in the navy, by reason of the operation of dock yards, and some other activities, the ratio of civilian employees is higher than in the other two services. I am advised that that is true in the case of the admiralty, although I have no personal knowledge of that.

I am glad this matter has been brought up, because it will second my own efforts to cut down the number of civilian employees to the lowest possible number consistent with the maintenance of a strong and efficient navy. I take no exception to the criticism of the hon. member respecting civilian employees, but I am only doing my best to explain why there are these numbers. I assure the committee I am doing my best to see that they are kept within proper proportions.

Mr. HARKNESS: I thoroughly agree with the minister that all civilian employees should be listed under one heading so far as civil salaries and wages are concerned. He has indicated that that is being done for the navy. If it has not been done in the army and air force estimates I would request that civilian salaries under those departments be brought in under a separate heading, so that we may have a better opportunity to make comparisons and to know to what extent civilian salaries and wages are being paid in those two services.

Mr. MERRITT: Going back to the matter of recruiting, on what date does the minister say that the 10,000 men will be enlisted?

Mr. ABBOTT: We rather hoped that we would be close to that objective by about the end of the present fiscal year. The staff tell me that that would suit their plans very well in arranging the manning of various ships and changing over from war to peace. It will certainly not be earlier than the end of the present fiscal year, and probably not until a bit later. To be more specific, we hope to have something around 8,700 by the end of this current fiscal year, March 31. Our second carrier will not be in commission, we expect, until some time next year. That of course has a direct relationship to the number of permanent force personnel we wish to take into the service. She carries a complement of about 1,000 men.

Mr. MERRITT: In February the minister was quoted as saying that one carrier and four destroyers will probably have to be carried in reserve because of the 10,000-men limit. So from the figures he gave this morning it appears there are very few destroyers in commission—only two out of twelve—and one frigate out of eighteen. Therefore it would seem to me that the 10,000 objective will not be much affected by the carrier.

Mr. ABBOTT: We cannot just leave her standing idle. Even in reserve she carries men.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand that, but not a full complement.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. MERRITT: At the present rate of recruiting, 200 a month, it will take twenty-five months to reach 10,000. If we are going to have 10,000 in this fiscal year, as there are only about six months left the rate will have to be quadrupled and you will have to take in about 800 a month. I throw out this suggestion. As an extra aid in recruiting I cannot think of anything better than that the minister himself should go out and speak in some of the principal cities in Canada and encourage young Canadians to join the service. With such encouragement I am sure that a large number would come forward. The minister can be the best recruiting agency we could possibly have, and probably he will cost less than others.

Mr. ABBOTT: I sincerely thank my hon. friend for his very generous tribute to my oratorical and persuasive powers. Nothing would please me better than to do the sort of thing he suggests, but he will appreciate that for the last four or five months it has not been easy for me or for any minister to get away from Ottawa. I hope that the session will soon be concluded—and while I am frank to say that I do not intend to go on any recruiting tour immediately after the session is over, I appreciate the suggestion my hon. friend has made. I was hoping long before this to make at least a trip to each of the two coasts and see our establishments there. I have done it only in a quick sort of way, spending a day or two only in each place—not from any lack of desire on my part, but solely because of more pressing duties at Ottawa.

Mr. MERRITT: I did not offer the suggestion lightly, and I hope the minister will not only visit the establishments but speak publicly in aid of recruiting.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sincere when I say I appreciate my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. MacNICOL: Quite a number of Canadians are now serving in the British fleet air arm, continuing their training over there perhaps more extensively since the war is over. Is it part of the minister's programme to bring these young men back to serve in our own fleet air arm?

[Mr. Merritt.]

Mr. ABBOTT: We have a very considerable number who served with the British fleet air arm during the war. It would not be possible to take all of them, because there were a larger number of them than our complement would permit, but that is the source from which we have been drawing most of our flying personnel.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister in reply to the hon. member for Trinity stated that the liaison or cooperation between the three services was on the chief of staff level. I want to make a comment on that. It is the practice now in the United States and in the United Kingdom forces that every officer who attains command must have a knowledge, and in the United States a very extensive knowledge, of the functions and limitations of the other two branches of the service. While the navy in the United States has not a separate air force, nevertheless the liaison is at a much lower level than chief of staff, and I suggest that the minister consider seriously establishing a joint staff college so that every officer at the commander level or the squadron leader level, or even lower, may have the opportunity to understand the operations and limitations of the other two services. It is obvious that as war becomes more and more scientific and the velocity of projectiles much greater, a knowledge of the operations and limitations of weapons, and a knowledge even of the outlook of the other services, is very important for any officer in command to have in any future war. I think every one of them should have that. At the chief of staff level you find officers who are very jealous of their prerogatives, and the cooperation is apt to be on the surface rather than genuine. A man on the chief staff level is inclined to take the view: That is all very well, but I am running the navy. The same attitude will no doubt be found in the other services at the chief of staff level. But if all officers who are likely to take command had a knowledge of the functions and limitations of the other two services, I believe you would have a much more effective and efficient defence service. I suggest that to the minister. I do not know what plans have been made in that regard. I merely heard his reply to the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thank the hon. member for his suggestion, and I can assure him that thinking along those lines, and probably something more than thinking, will develop in the not very distant future. We have an army staff college at Kingston which representatives of the other two services attend; also an army training station at Carberry and an operation school at Courtenay, British Columbia. On both coasts the air force and the army are cooperating closely with the navy. Anyone who has seen anything of war realizes that no army in the future is ever going to fight without an air force in close liaison.

Mr. ADAMSON: And no navy in the future will fight without an air force.

Mr. ABBOTT: Right, and under certain conditions no army will fight without a navy. I agree that there should be the closest possible liaison between the three branches of the service, and that is what we are endeavouring to achieve. I mentioned the chiefs of staff committee, but that liaison is carried on at all levels. The director of plans for the navy is constantly in touch with his opposite number in the other two services. The personnel members committee meets regularly to discuss personnel problems. The research and development branch, as the committee knows, is headed by Doctor Solandt, who was formerly Colonel Solandt. That branch coordinates research development for the three services. So we are making real headway in attaining good liaison between the three services.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think every junior officer should know the functions and limitations of the other two services.

Item agreed to.

Mr. HARKNESS: Before we proceed to another item, Mr. Chairman, the minister was going to give the war establishment showing a breakdown of the 10,000 officers and men.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will give that later, or perhaps on the army estimates.

571. Defence research. Subject to allocation by the treasury board, $14,495,861.

Mr. ADAMSON: What does this item contain? I see there is no reference in the back of the book.

Mr. ABBOTT: We have been proceeding so expeditiously here, Mr. Chairman, that I have not even got my estimate book here, but I shall have it in the course of a few minutes. Meanwhile I can explain briefly what this item of defence research includes. We have taken in this item the amounts which were included in the different services for research and development and have included them in one item which is to be voted as a separate item. The sub-department of the Department of National Defence, research and development, as I said a moment ago, is under the direction of Doctor Solandt, who has been appointed director-general of research and development for the armed services. This is the appropriation on which those activities will be carried on for the remainder of the current fiscal year. I think, speaking from memory, this is for a special amount to cover the expenses of the director and his staff.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do I take it that this concerns research into new weapons?

Mr. ABBOTT: Speaking broadly, perhaps that is a fair statement. The branch will conduct in close liaison with the national research council research into new weapons, as my hon. friend says, although a great deal of that work will be carried on in the individual departments, in the three branches of the service under the direction of the specialists there. In addition this appropriation will cover operations such as the Suffield development in Alberta, chemical warfare branch research, and development there, and the general supervision of and inquiry into all branches of research as they affect the defence services.

Mr. ADAMSON: Including, I presume, the newest of weapons?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I think it is fair to say that. Doctor Solandt, director-general of research, was in the United Kingdom not long ago, when he attended a conference of the research and development people in other parts of the commonwealth. One of the leading research and development men in the United Kingdom was out here shortly before that; and just recently we had a visit from Major General Bevis, of Australia, who is the master-general of the ordnance in the Australian army and who is keenly interested in research and development in his country, and spent some time with our people here learning the plans which they have for handling it in our service.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I stepped out for one second, and because of the phenomenal speed with which things are going through here—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not forgotten my hon. friend's question. I have asked the deputy minister to get me the information, and I may have to give it a little later, when we are discussing the army estimates. But I will give him a complete answer.

Mr. MERRITT: I notice that in the estimates for the three services there is roughly $60 million for ammunition and bombs. Do I understand that this $14 million is the total amount for research, and that that $60 million which is in the three service estimates is for the production of present operational equipment entirely? Is that all new production?

Mr. ABBOTT: Most of the item to which my hon. friend is referring under ammunition and bombs is a carry-over of commitments from the previous fiscal period. We had very large contracts outstanding for ammunition and bombs, and this is largely an item for unliquidated commitments. When I have my estimate book I may be able to give the breakdown of that. This item of research and development is completely apart from that; and incidentally I may say that included in those other items there would probably be, indeed I know there are, considerable expenditures for the actual production of items which might be classified as development, if you will, but which can be used for operational purposes as well. But the $14 million under item 471 covers, as I say, the amounts appropriated in the three services for research and development as such, together with an additional amount to cover the costs of the work which will be undertaken by the new head and his staff.

569. Army and related services (commitments $25,843,524), $283,170,171.

Mr. PROBE: The estimates of the Minister of National Defence for the current fiscal year include, according to this document before us, $104,793.40 on ordinary account and some $488,608,641 on demobilization and reconversion account, roughly a half billion dollar requisition, and, compared with estimates we have been talking about before, roughly 200 per cent of our federal expenditure on health and welfare. This estimate is doubtless considered necessary by the Minister of National Defence to implement the financial outlay implied in the resolution, which has been standing on the order paper now for some months, which reads:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Militia Act whereby provision will be made for a permanent force of officers and men in number as may be authorized by the governor in council, and for the employment during the period of demobilization of such members of the military forces as may be deemed necessary for the orderly carrying out of such demobilization.

In connection with this expenditure I wish to remind the committee of a resolution presented to parliament by the minister of defence in the government of 1919. In that resolution the minister of the day sought to provide for a permanent force not exceeding 10,000. That number was a 100 per cent increase over the force authorized prior to world war I. The argument of the then minister of defence in support of his resolution was that the internal unrest in Canadian labour—the Winnipeg strike was in progress at that time—as well as the defence of Canada against foreign aggression, necessitated that increase from 5,000 to 10,000 in the personnel of the permanent force.

The estimates of the Minister of Justice this session showed an increase in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police requirements of nearly $4,000,000, or fifty per cent over last year, a total amount equal to roughly the full permanent force requests following the first world war. I presume therefore that the Minister of Justice has judged that his department is now properly equipped to attend to the peace, order and good government within Canada's borders, so we may conclude that after the demobilization expenditures of the Minister of National Defence have been paid, the balance of the half billion dollars for which he is asking will go to the maintenance of Canada's post-war navy, army and air force.

From the facts I have stated, it must be most evident that the government of Canada has somehow committed its people to an extremely large peacetime expansion of armament from the custom of the past. One third roughly of all the money to be voted by parliament this session goes to the Minister of National Defence for expenditure in the second year of peace. The permanent force is not limited in number, as it was in 1919, but permission is being sought by the minister this session to create a force in numbers as may be authorized by the governor in council. Such a procedure is contrary to all peacetime precedent.

Many of the most bitter conflicts between the people and their king in English history dealt with the peacetime maintenance by the king of a standing army. The Bill of Rights of 1688 contained this clause:

> That the raising of a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of parliament, is against the law.

Civil war has been waged in England over this principle in past centuries and now the Minister of National Defence in effect asks for a blank cheque on which he will place his own figures. With this power of the minister I must disagree, as did the citizens of England disagree with Charles I and James II.

The story of frontier America portrays an evolution in the maintenance of law and order that I feel I must recall to the house. In the unorganized frontier areas, each citizen by his own strength, and acting on his own concept of law or of right, protected his domain or pillaged his neighbour. Individual strength was the law. From the confusion of this system, in which might was right, a delegation of law enforcement powers was made, after considerable trial and error, properly to empower delegates of the community as a whole. The individual was protected in his lawful aspirations by the combined strength of the community, and under this system the strong and the weak, neighbour and stranger, lived in a security that was lacking when each man was his own sheriff.

A similar evolution is in making in the world community. The feudal barons who protected or pillaged their dependents and neighbours, have yielded their powers in the common good to a national authority. National military leaders in past conflicts have for the duration of the war accepted assigned military tasks from a supreme commander selected for his qualities proper to the occasion. In peace time the same delegation to an international authority must be made by national bodies; for it has long been self-evident that no single national state can defend itself against an aggressor, nor can a single aggressor state successfully strive against the combined forces of defending allies. Darius, Napoleon, Wilhelm II, Hitler, have all failed to disprove this thesis. The professional general does not defeat the citizen army. The volunteer strength of Canada's civilian turned soldier has matched Wehrmacht in the past and is quite capable of doing so again should the necessity ever once more arise.

All arguments for the maintenance of a permanent peacetime force are invariably based on the need for preparedness against some foreign attack. To use such an argument on behalf of any peacetime force, that this country is able and prepared to equip and maintain for action against any possible aggressor nation, is ridiculous. Modern methods of warfare would make the defence of Canada, with its huge land areas and small prepared forces, an impossibility, and this I am certain that no exponent of military strategy could safely contradict.

Why then is the Minister of National Defence asking the house for an appropriation for such a peacetime military force? The Canadian people have no interest in becoming an aggressor nation. By ourselves we cannot repel an aggressor. The duty of the Canadian parliament to organize modern armed forces arises not only or even mainly out of our defence needs but out of our obligations as a member of the world community, pledged to help the maintenance of peace. In the Atlantic charter the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States held out to all the people of the world the hope of four freedoms based on a world organization for the maintenance of peace and of security. This world organization, the united nations organization, is struggling to achieve that which its predecessor the league of nations failed to do. In its aim to secure international security it already has many powerful unfriendly critics. Not the least vocal of these critics are the proponents of nationalism and national armaments. The C.C.F. party feels that Canada must play a positive part in making the united nations organization the effective instrument for which it was designed.

At the opening of the San Francisco conference last year, President Truman said:

> This conference will devote its energies and its labours exclusively to the single problem of setting up the essential organization to keep the peace.

The charter of the united nations, drawn up at that time and concurred in by Canada, states, in article 43:

> (1) All members of the united nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the security council on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements armed forces, assistance and facilities including the rights of passage necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.
> (2) Such agreement or agreements shall govern the number and the types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.
> (3) The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the security council. They shall be concluded between the security council and the members, or between the security council and groups of members, and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their constitutional processes.

While no indication has been given to the members of this House of Commons as to agreements, as mentioned in article 43 of the united nations charter from which I have just quoted, respecting Canada's role in an international protective plan, and while no such agreements have as yet been presented to this house for ratification, the C.C.F. members of the house are prepared to support a negotiated contribution by Canada to such a protective force, and are prepared conditionally to approve the mustering of suitable armed components in anticipation of such agreements being secured and ratified by the House of Commons.

The conditions which the members of the C.C.F. group feel should be assured to support such an interim set-up are as follows:

1. That the number of officers and men be set, not by governor in council but by the parliament of Canada.

2. That the Canadian force be recruited on a volunteer career basis with candidates accepted on an aptitude basis only.

3. That the terms of service be such that promotion will be based upon general personal ability, or upon special ability in scientific military research; that upgrading of personnel in military science and technical research be continuous for all ranks throughout the entire period of service, with syllabi drawn up to include studies in history, economics and world citizenship, as well as technical studies solely applicable to the service.

4. That the present undemocratic forms of drill and discipline be reorganized in favour of rational treatment of all ranks.

5. That pay scales of pay and allowances, amenities while in service and pension privileges on discharge be more nearly equalized for all ranks than is the case at present.

6. That the basis for admission to, and study in, all military institutions be individual ability only, without regard to race, creed or colour; that the curriculi of these institutions be based on modern social and military needs, to include the historic study of the causes and results of war, and that all permanent force personnel be automatically eligible for admission.

7. That all scientific discoveries of the Canadian force or of military research laboratories be made available to the united nations assembly on a reciprocal basis, and where research results have humanitarian value, that the findings be passed on for the general benefit.

8. That army, navy and air force be integrated into a unified group for combined operations under a single staff, under direction of and through continuous liaison with the united nations protective force as required and when established.

9. That non-technical staff (of high ranking officers) be drastically reduced and senior staff officers regularly reexamined and retired from the service to make way for younger and more efficient officers.

10. That the present military districts headquarters staffs be retired on discharge of active army, and that the complements of area staffs and national defence headquarters staff be reduced to such number and with such functions as to maintain efficient military requirements.

11. That all activities of and appropriations for the Canadian armed forces be subject to continuous review and control by a standing committee of the House of Commons. In that connection may I say I regret that under item 571 not one word was said by the Minister of National Defence with respect to parliamentary review, other than by officers of the treasury board, of the defence research estimates in that section amounting to $14,495,861.

12. That no members of Canada's armed forces, by virtue of such membership, shall be debarred from full exercise of the normal rights and responsibilities of Canadian citizenship.

13. That the Canadian government establish crown companies for the sole manufacture and use of armaments, and that our ultimate aim be that such manufacture and use be under control by the united nations organization.

The members of our group feel that to implement the policy I have broadly outlined will be an effective way to realize Canada's duty to maintain the obligations toward world security under the united nations organization, provided further that our spokesmen at the conference press for early implementation of section 43 of the charter. Not one word has thus far come from the conference to the effect that Canada is vitally and honestly interested in securing implementation of section 43. Without this implementation the united nations will succeed no better than did the league of nations. The world wants no more national armaments, and the discovery of the atomic bomb has made national armaments a fallacy. Fighting forces are for attack only. Modern warfare makes the civilian population bear the whole brunt of defence, whether it be fire fighting, first aid or anti-aircraft defences. The minister apparently is presenting no plan to prepare Canada for defence; therefore, if it be for attack, let it be according to plan of the united nations.

It was Pascal who said:

> Strength without justice is tyrannical
> And justice without strength is a mockery.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman has made a very interesting speech. I agree with part of what he has said, and thank him for his support in reducing the number of brass hats. There are other suggestions with which I do not agree. The Department of National Defence is made up of men who are of the same type as those who were in charge during the first world war. I should qualify what I said about brass hats. Brass hats are men whom we see only in time of war. Beside that they are ignored and we do not know where they are. They are like rats which hide behind the walls and in time of war come out and eat the good Canadian cheese.

On occasion, sir, I have spoken outside the house, and I deeply regret the feeling that the eight provinces have against Quebec. I will explain to you, sir, why such feeling exists. It is precisely because of conscription. I congratulate the minister and his assistant on what has been done with regard to amnesty for soldiers and the draftees, but, as always, that measure is not entirely satisfactory to the men. In the first place it is unsatisfactory because it comes too late, and second because national registration was abolished at the same time that the amnesty was proclaimed. When I congratulated the hon. member for Lotbiniere on what he did with regard to the soldiers and draftees I told him that the amnesty proposal was apparently a good thing, but it was drafted in such ambiguous terms that no one could know what it meant; and it comes late. Now there is at least partial amnesty, or words mean nothing. Men who want to be discharged will get out of the camps at an early opportunity, but, sir, it was a long fight against conscription—but it was not described as military conscription. It was a long fight that was carried on; it was carried on mostly against prejudice which had been created by government agencies, by the radio, by the vicious information board, and by all other means—propaganda to teach Canadians that their duty was to join the colours, and that if they did not do so they were not acting as good Canadian citizens.

The matter was taken up from a racial angle. The English-speaking members of the Quebec legislature were so silly as to say, I think with only one exception, "As we are of British allegiance we must be in favour of conscription," meaning military conscription. So it was put on a racial basis; the matter was discussed on those lines from beginning to end, on the stump, over the air, in the press, and all those who did not agree with that policy, which was exactly the same as the policy propounded by the brass hats in the first war, were not good citizens, not good Canadians. That was the policy; it was brought into the mind of everyone, one after the other. Everyone had to believe that the duty of all Canadians, and the only duty, was to join the colours; if he did not do so he was not doing well, he was not doing what he should. Here in this house, from the seat I occupied at the other end of the alley, I asked the Minister of Labour what was the duty of each Canadian citizen during the war. His answer was quick; he said his duty was to join the colours, to enlist in the army, and suggested that those who were not enlisting were not doing their duty. That was most absurd. There was a law; we had the Natural Resources Mobilization Act, to the effect that the boys should report to the registrar for medical examination, and that they should report to the camp when they were called by the registrar. They did so; nevertheless they were covered with shame just because they were not enlisting. Those who were sick or unfit went in to enlist. Some of them were discharged at once, but they were considered as heroes just because they had signed a paper for overseas service.

The propaganda went on and on. There were full pages in the newspapers asking the boys to enlist, to do their duty. From the start a distinction was made between those who enlisted and those who did not, though they were complying with the law. That distinction was maintained. A button was given to those who had enlisted. Those who did not enlist could not get a job unless they had been discharged by the army for medical reasons. They were put aside; they were in a category by themselves; they were like the untouchables of India. Because some farmers believed in the promise made in this house by the Prime Minister himself that farmers would be exempted, a promise that was denied the following day by the Minister of Labour; because they took it for granted that the word of the Prime Minister was the solemn word of the government and of those in charge of the business of this country, those men were run after by army police and were given treatment that is a shame in a civilized country.

To come to my proposition, to the principle I was explaining, it is that there has been a vast amount of propaganda in this country to create the opinion, the same opinion that was created during the first war, that all men of military age who were physically fit should enlist in the army. After that was done; after all those who did not believe that the farmers, the railway men, the fishermen, the miners, those making munitions and arms, those making clothing and shoes for the soldiers, those working on ships at sea and building ships in the dockyards, should enlist were publicized as slackers; after some parents had lost children and friends in the war and there was a veil of mourning over the country, then it was said that conscription, the only thing that was needed for the prosecution of the war, was not imposed because of the province of Quebec. That is the type of propaganda that has been so strong in the other provinces against the province of Quebec, because in Quebec during the war the people kept their senses and thought exactly as I am sure all members of this committee now think. But during the war there was great excitement. Everybody was beating the drum; everybody was waving the flag. Then the opinion was different from what it is now, when the war is over. How many times have I and the other members who were fighting for the farmer been insulted and humiliated in this house, just because we had the firm conviction that the army alone, brave as it could be, could not win the war by itself. It deserved the help of all those men who were not slackers, all those men who were doing their duty. There is now a reaction, perhaps, in the minds of some people; but many still believe the province of Quebec is not the loyal province she actually is, that the province of Quebec has not done her duty, not because her sons did not enlist just the same as they abided by the law, but precisely because of that propaganda which has worked against the province of Quebec and which has been instigated by men who lived upon the money voted to support those who were in the fighting lines. It is most disgraceful; and it is precisely because that propaganda has been going on during five years of war that it will take a long time to redress the wrong that has been done to my native province in the minds of the Canadian people and in the minds of other nations as well. I ask the hon. gentlemen who are members of this house to think of us, to think how much the province of Quebec has suffered, precisely on account of the propaganda which has been instigated by a few men who are known as jingoes and junkers in this country.

We have been told many times that the province of Quebec was ruling the country, that everything was done to please that province. It was not true; the province of Quebec was slaughtered under the roses. The province of Quebec never had the influence to rule the government, because we had conscription when we were told there was no conscription. My hon. friend was not a minister of national defence during the war, but all ministers of national defence during war time, after the death of Hon. Norman Rogers, who had been a private during the first great war and who was a great man, were just the puppets of the brass hats, the junkers and jingoes who infest national defence headquarters at Ottawa. That is all they were. Ralston and McNaughton were just puppets of the men in N.D.H.Q.; no one can deny that. Those men at headquarters were ruling; they were the brass hats; they were the war lords; they were the war criminals. When I think of war criminals there is one I have to denounce to-day, and denounce bitterly. It is that man Chisholm, who made soldiers suffer so much during the war. And now Chisholm, shame to us, shame to the world, has been appointed to the united nations in charge of health. I wonder if he is playing a game of bingo at the casino Monte Carlo with the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the present time. I do not know; it may be so. They are like Siamese twins; we cannot separate them.

But, Mr. Chairman, I receive abuse; I receive humiliation. I received it during the war, when I was alone, fighting for the railway men. There were members in the House of Commons who belonged to the unions; there were members in the House of Commons who were real labour men. But none of them raised his voice. I was surprised when the presidents of the two great railways said exactly what I have said on behalf of the railway men who were doing their duty in the war.

I could say much more, but I shall conclude by reading a letter I received to-day from a military organization. I shall not read all the letters I received. But when I fight for the men who are sometimes called the underdogs I do so in fulfilment of my duty. I fear no one in the fulfilment of that task. I consider that we in the House of Commons have a task to perform. I realize that there are progressive thoughts in the minds of my hon. colleagues, even if they do not speak aloud, even if for one reason or another they do not dare to express themselves. But I know they are progressive, because otherwise they would not be so kind to me as they are now, and as they so often are.

This letter to which I have referred comes from the Canadian Combat Veterans' Association in British Columbia. It is dated at Vancouver, British Columbia, August 16, 1946, and says:

Jean Francois Pouliot, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:—

I have just read your remarks recorded in the Hansard debates of August 1, 1946. I have particular reference to your pertinent observations concerning the defects in the administration of the Canadian (Military) Pension Act, pages 4154/4158 of the debates. You will, I know, well understand why this association assumed the responsibility of bringing to the attention of parliamentarians, of all political affiliations, the defaulting character of the administration in question. These conditions, as you well realize, have not grown up overnight but are implicit in the administration and call for the most drastic remedies.

On behalf of the membership of my association, who are men with actual service in a war theatre, without exception, I would like to express our very deep thanks for your courage in illustrating to parliament—by concrete cases—that, for some reason, justice does not freely operate for those who have sustained injury and disablement and handicap of ruined health as members of the armed forces of the nation. In so far as the criticism of the Minister of Veterans Affairs is concerned, interrupting your remarks, you may discount what he says, as while he is a man of very wide attainments of a scholastic nature, he is not representative of the front-line veterans of Canada, as his war-time history shows he was "temperamentally unfitted for front-line service" . . . With this knowledge, you will now perhaps understand why unnecessary evils have grown up in the administration in question as the outgrowth of political expediency rather than justice being honoured. I mention this fact in passing, but it is necessary you should possess this information if you are to succeed in your endeavours in fighting for the under-privileged classes.

English-speaking Canadians who have seen service in either world wars I or II, hitherto have gathered the impression that little assistance would be forthcoming from French Canada in the herculean task of streamlining the administration of the legislation in question. Your stand, however, in the dominion parliament—the first of its kind—on these vital issues is a definite assurance to men like myself, representing influential groups of ex-servicemen, that the public opinion of French Canada is slowly but surely being oriented to the literally gigantic task of streamlining the process of justice, so that, in the very near future we may indeed build for our children and the generations who will follow us a democracy " of which no citizen need blush." Your address in parliament, if publicized, will be, I believe, a substantial factor in merging all men and women of goodwill to our common objectives of a Canada united in spirit and in truth, where injustice has no place. To-day, injustice is enthroned, and hence our national disunity.

From what has transpired in parliament, it is obvious there is a rising tide in the country led by able and fearless men who are determined that the peace is going to be won, where it can only be won, in the spiritual sphere, and that injustice, as such, has no place in the peace. As you so clearly point out, the call now is for men to stand on their feet for what is right and the Great Guidance will direct our path to the goal of a true Christian democracy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who signs that?

Mr. POULIOT: Walter H. Kirchner, secretary of the association. I could say much more than that; but, before closing, I wish to express my thanks to the minister for the interest he has taken in some cases which I have submitted to him; and my thanks also go to his able parliamentary assistant, who has shown patience in the correspondence I have had with him. But that correspondence would not have been necessary if we had not had in charge of some branches of the department men who were incompetent and unworthy of that office.

It is time to clear up the situation and to follow the suggestions already made by four members of parliament, three in connection with air services and one in connection with the army. It is time to make a check on the progress that is made, not in vague terms, but a check made to abolish some of the establishments. I know of some where the girls have been knitting since the close of the war, but they are receiving salaries just the same. The country has no need to pay them. I do not see why we should have any sympathy for people whose task is over. They did very well during the war, but there is no more work for them. There are many men in the country who were faithful servants and helped do a job, but their job is over. Men should be set back, and women should be set back until there is another job.

I hope that war will never call for more personnel in N.D.H.Q. than in any of the other war departments. I read that letter precisely to prove that point, and if I cannot secure the assistance of parliament I will get it from outside—and it will be very easy. I will get it, not from the officers of the last war—very few of them—but perhaps from some non-commissioned officers, and certainly from the soldiers in the ranks, those who have been outside and who want parliament to accomplish something.

Until now, what are members of parliament to say to their constituents, except that they have passed a series of books of legislation, a Justinian review of past action by the parliament of Canada in the year 1946? We have passed legislation by the bushel. But the people are not interested in legislation, legislation that is passing in such quantity that no one can read it.

The people want reform, and I have tried for a long time to get it. In the interests of reform I have appealed to those who are Liberals and who call themselves Liberals. I thought their number was large enough to accomplish reform. But it is in the hands of the jingoes and the Junkers of N.D.H.Q., who were so well represented in parliament during the war by the megaphone of Arthur Meighen, when he was leader of the Conservative party.

I appealed first to the Liberals, and then I appealed to the Liberal-minded members of other groups in the house. Then I tried to do something for Canada, seeing that Canada was ignored, and that we should have a Canadian spirit—but without success. Party ties were too strong.

I now make an appeal for reform. Whether a man belongs to the Social Credit group, the C.C.F. group, or the Progressive Conservative party, and especially if he belongs to the Liberal party, he must have in his heart a strong desire for reform. I appeal to all those who are the grandsons or the great grandsons of reformers, and I ask them to listen to the voice of Canadians from coast to coast asking for reform in government, asking not for more government but for less government, and for more efficient and more competent government. This was my request, and it is not my yearly performance. It is a performance that I intend to give every time I have an opportunity to act here in accordance with what I say in my constituency and in addresses outside this house which I have had the honour to be invited to give. When hon. members try to raise matters earlier in the session they are told to wait until the estimates come before the house, that they will have full opportunity to discuss the matter then. It is now the 19th of August, toward the close of the session, when these estimates come up. Earlier in the session it was the seeding season; then it was the berry season; we have now reached the apple and plum season and we are still discussing estimates, and members are tired and sick of it as I am myself. If I speak now it is because I have a duty to fulfil. It would be much more pleasurable for me to be at home, and if I am here to-day it is in an endeavour to obtain reform.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh!

Mr. POULIOT: Hear the obstacle, the big obstacle, in the way of reform. Let us put them out and send them back home, so that other ministers who are ready for reform can accomplish something. I am not going to stand any longer for interruptions from any quarter. What I do now I do from a sense of duty. I have a duty to perform.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The only one.

Mr. POULIOT: No, I am not a Pharisee; I am a publican. This duty should be done by a minister of the crown who is good only to make jokes. I did not know who was the guilty party, the obstacle in the way. I thought of some ministers, but I never thought it was the Minister of Veterans Affairs. But now the cat is out of the bag, the big cat, the big tomcat. We know now, and I hope the Prime Minister will get rid of him at the first opportunity so that we can progress and reform this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I would hesitate very much to delay the progress of a very hard-working parliament; but in all my years in this house, and they are rather long now, I never listened to such twaddle in my life—twaddle—that is what it is. Hon. members here are anxious to get on with the real business of the nation, and they have to sit and hear an attack made as it was made by the hon. member for Temiscouata on gallant officers, very gallant officers, in the Department of National Defence, an attack which demeans him and does not enrich the parliament of Canada. I know these officers. They may be brass hats; some of them have been brass hats according to their stations and their capacities.

Mr. McIVOR: They are good heads.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: They have patriotic hearts; they have fought for Canada, and I despise and condemn as strongly as I can the demagogic attack make by the hon. member for Temiscouata upon great Canadians. They are grand Canadians, Canadians who would die for their country to-morrow. You, my hon. friends in this house, know that what I say is true and that the hon. member's attack is twaddle. More than that, it is a condemnation of our parliament and of our democratic system, and I am one member of this house who is not going to tolerate it. I will fight it as long as I am a member of the house, whether a minister or not. I will fight such unutterable and demagogic nonsense on the floor of this house every time, regardless of party.

Mr. PEARKES: Is the Minister of National Defence at this stage going to make a general statement on his estimates?

Mr. ABBOTT: I had not proposed to do so any more than I did on the naval estimates. I thought that the general outline of our plans given last session and in statements since had pretty well indicated the general policy and that it would expedite the business if I were rather to answer specific questions asked by hon. members.

Mr. PEARKES: Since the opportunity to debate defence matters has been rather limited during this session I should like to make a few remarks on the army's role in defence generally and to keep them as applicable to these estimates as possible.

I imagine that a large proportion of the moneys that are to be voted in these estimates has to do with the demobilization of the personnel and the cleaning up of various bills outstanding. I think I would be voicing the opinion of members on all sides of the house when I say that we were pleased that the demobilization has been carried out as expeditiously as possible and we rejoice with those people in the country who are welcoming back their loved ones who have been overseas. Generally speaking, I do not think there is any doubt that demobilization has been carried out as expeditiously as it was reasonable to expect. We realize the difficulties there have been regarding shipping, and if there have been some disappointments with personnel not being home as soon as was expected, in the great majority of cases perhaps these were unreasonable expectations.

There are, however, or two points in connection with the demobilization programme which have not met with the entire approval of the country. It will be remembered that last session members from this side of the house urged a more general application of the principle that those who had seen the longest and hardest service be returned to Canada first. We realize that it was not possible to carry out entirely the principle of "first in, first out". But we feel that more consideration might have been given to the proposal which was made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that those men who were entitled to wear campaign medals should be given a greater degree of priority in being brought back.

There is a group of men to whom I feel special reference should be made, and those are the individuals who have been referred to as key personnel. Although they had a high point score, many of them were retained in the forces against their wishes in order that others might be demobilized. I refer to the clerks, the provost corps, the cooks, and a certain number of officers, regimental and staff. I feel that a word of praise should be coming to this class of men, because the speedy demobilization to which I referred earlier was due very largely to the sacrifices that this class of men made.

I should also like to express regret that it was found necessary to demobilize entirely, I believe—I can go only by press reports—the C.W.A.C. Those girls in the service did remarkable work. The majority of them are also anxious to return to their homes. But some were willing to stay on in the service. I believe it would have been well worth while maintaining a small nucleus of girls in the service upon which we could build, and so develop the experience in the years to come that, in the event of the unhappy circumstances arising again of Canada being plunged into war and our having to utilize the woman power of the country, we should not have to go through the difficulties which we met with, owing to lack of experience in the middle of this last war when the C.W.A.C. was first organizing. There are many branches of the army work which women can undertake, and the chances are that by study and experience in times of peace we could find that, if another war broke out, the women of the country would be better prepared to take their place in the ranks with the men than they were during this war.

One other aspect of demobilization to which I should like to make reference is the position of the permanent force personnel who, by means of their satisfactory service during the war, gained promotion and now find, in some cases, that they have to resign their commissions and join the ranks, if they still wish to stay on, at a very much lower grade of rank than they had earned during the war. I realize that in many cases it would be necessary for officers and non-commissioned officers to step down a rank or two, but it is difficult for the man who has earned a commission on the field of battle and has perhaps risen to the rank of captain to find, when he wants to continue his service in order that he may reap the benefit of the pension to which he regards himself as entitled, that he will have to step down in some cases to almost the lowest ranks in the army.

One other aspect which has some connection with demobilization, and to which I referred earlier in the session, is the withdrawal of the Canadian occupational force from Germany. I feel that some criticism on that action should be advanced, or at least that we should demand a full explanation—an explanation which the Prime Minister promised when I raised the question some months ago—as to why that force was withdrawn at that time. There was a feeling, expressed in a Gallup poll which was held some months ago, that Canada was in some measure abandoning her responsibilities in the great and vital task of the recivilization of Germany, in years when the German people would have to decide whether they would adopt a form of democracy or some form of totalitarian government. I realize that men who had had long service in the field would be anxious to return home and might be loath to continue their service in the occupational forces. A certain number of volunteers was obtained for the purpose of providing the numbers to which Canada had agreed. Other men were detailed for that duty from the establishments in Europe or in England. But apparently there were not sufficient personnel available to make up the numbers which were required, without imposing hardships on men who had seen a good deal of fighting. There is the feeling amongst some of our allies, which to a certain extent was expressed in the British House of Commons, that perhaps this country, which had never let down any of its allies during the war, was rather letting them down during this critical stage, the early days of peace. When it was suggested that it was hard that our allies should have to bear the burden alone, the reason advanced for our withdrawal was, I understand, that it was for administrative reasons. If Canada hopes to hold a position and to carry out any commitments which the united nations may call upon her to do in the future, we must learn how to overcome "administrative difficulties".

Leaving that: on a question of general policy, it has not been easy for the members of this house to follow the general pattern of our defence policy, because many of the announcements regarding policy and the developments which are to follow have been made outside this house, and it is only by press reports that one has been able to glean information in the endeavour to patch the pieces together so that one might get the over-all picture. But I gather that it is the policy of the government, a policy with which I feel all parties will agree, that Canada must take every practical step which is possible to defend her own territory and to be prepared to meet any obligations which may be assigned to her by the united nations organization when their defence committee starts to function properly. I believe the country as a whole is anxious to support such a policy. The country realizes that we are close to a great war, the issue of which at times was very much in the balance. The country also realizes that modern armaments cost a great deal of money: huge expenses are required for modern equipment in the air force, in the navy and in the army. I do not believe that our people would object to voting the sums which are necessary, but they want to be absolutely certain that the money is being spent as judiciously as possible and in a way which may be expected to achieve the results for which it is voted.

In order to ensure the efficiency of our fighting forces, during the last session hon. members on this side of the house made certain suggestions. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that there be a standing committee on questions of defence, made up from all parties in this house. When that suggestion was repeated at the beginning of this session the Prime Minister made remarks to the effect that he thought that might be a very good idea. However, nothing has happened. We have urged that there should be a closer coordination of the three services. I cannot help feeling that there is no evidence that there is a closer coordination at the present time. There is on the order paper a resolution to continue the two ministers of defence. Well, an argument may be put forward for retaining a minister for air for a limited period while demobilization is going on and while the air force is readjusting itself to peacetime conditions. But if we are to have any common doctrine between the three services, I think the first step should be to get those services under one minister.

As other indications of lack of determination to have the three services properly coordinated, I suggest the location of some of the headquarters of the new commands is indicative that the importance of a close liaison between the different services is not fully realized. I can refer only to conditions on the Pacific coast. During the war, the army, the navy and the air force all had their headquarters at Jericho beach in Vancouver. These headquarters have dispersed. The air force remains at Jericho; the navy has gone over to Esquimalt, and the army has gone to Edmonton. A similar condition exists on the Atlantic coast. There may be administrative reasons for this, but it seems to me that it gives one the impression that perhaps the great importance of a close liaison between all the services is not fully appreciated.

Another point which was emphasized during the last session was the recommendation I made myself that, in order to ensure as far as possible that we drew up the right pattern for our defence forces, the heads of the services, the heads of industry and of the professions and sciences, should be assembled to form what I referred to as a Canadian Haldane committee in order to decide the general pattern for the three defence services. None of these recommendations was adopted. One is almost forced to the conclusion that perhaps the government has failed to realiize the effect of the development of new weapons and of changing conditions, and the effect that should have upon the position of our forces, with the result that to-day the government is committing the nation to a long-range programme of heavy expenditure without having fully realized the new position in which, I suggest, Canada now finds herself.

That new condition, I suggest, is this. Prior to the outbreak of this war. Canada's defence policy had for many years been based on the assumption that, if war broke out, she would be required to send a force overseas to fight what I may describe as an empire war, certainly a war fought in conjunction with other empire forces, somewhere other than on the North American continent. For years it has been our proud boast that we have not had to defend our southern frontier, that our relationships with the United States have been so satisfactory that it has been quite unnecessary for us to make any real preparations against the possibility of attack by our neighbour to the south.

Therefore it has been possible for the general staffs so to arrange their organization, so to arrange their plans, that the main purpose of the Canadian defence forces would be to take part in a war, not in Canada but in some other part of the world. The years 1914 and 1939 bear out the efficiency with which those plans were made, and their effectiveness. Those plans were based mainly on the assumption that there would be a period of rather leisurely mobilization and a period of further training which would be available to the troops that Canada was going to send overseas. And as in 1914 there were many weeks before the Canadian troops were actually engaged, so in this war, in 1939 and 1940, there were fortunately many months before our forces were required to be battle-worthy.

I wonder if these conditions exist to-day. If one stops to ponder for only a moment, he is forced to the conclusion that there are only three powers which could possibly launch this world into world war III—the British commonwealth of nations, the United States and the Soviet Republic of Russia. You may take any combination of those three powers you like, and it is inevitable that Canada then becomes a major theatre of war and that Canada's shores are on the highway between any of the combinations of these opponents. There would be no time for leisurely mobilization; there would be no question of sending troops away from our shores. If the tragedy of world war III comes, then world war III is going to be fought in Canada. Therefore our Canadian organization for defence must be based on the premise that we have to fight here, and we have in peace time to make our plans, not for the same leisurely mobilization, not for that period of training after the outbreak of hostilities, but for an organization which will be able to stop the bomber from coming to Canadian targets without warning.

That, I submit, requires most careful thought before we commit the country to any type of defence forces which does not have that primary factor as the first consideration for the organization which is prepared in peace time. As I say, we have never had an over-all picture; but I am forced to the conclusion, from the information I gather from the press, that the government's policy is not visualizing any great departure from that policy which has stood us in such good stead under entirely different circumstances in the past. We are still basing our peacetime army organization on an increased non-permanent militia and an increased permanent force. I see in these plans, in what I know of the type of unit which has been authorized either for the permanent force or for the non-permanent militia or reserve army, as it is now being called, little which would indicate that it will be ready to meet a sudden attack on Canadian shores, launched with the new weapons of the scientific era.

I feel, so far as details are concerned, that they will make the non-permanent militia a little bit brighter and a little bit bigger, but I am afraid that the non-permanent militia officer has still to make great sacrifices both in time and in money. He will find that he will have to devote a great deal of his time to bringing the units up to strength. His efforts will be largely devoted to recruiting and holding the men by social activities rather than to training the men to take the field at a quick and early notice. I feel that while the proposals, as far as I can gather them from the press reports, indicate that the permanent force is to be divided into what I should call three sections; one, to look after the administration; two, to be central schools and, three, to be a brigade group or a small field force, that field force at the present moment is terribly under strength; it is short of equipment; its armour is obsolescent and the units will be starved of trained personnel in exactly the same way as they were starved during the years between the two wars.

The field force is referred to as a brigade group. A brigade group is not a modern formation, although the grouping of certain specialized units might be referred to as a brigade group. The whole virtue of brigading together certain units was that the personnel of these units would be familiar one with the other and would be exercised in working together.

A few weeks ago I asked the Minister of National Defence whether these units were to be concentrated or distributed across the country. I suppose, for administrative reasons, he said that they were to be distributed across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I fear that we are going back to the same old story of little companies of permanent force troops at various provincial capitals prepared to put on a guard at the opening of the legislatures, prepared to provide some sort of little display at county fairs and so forth. If we are to have a field force which is to be of any value at all, that force must be concentrated and trained together so that one may know the other. Skeleton formations will not be the answer to these sudden attacks.

I have grave doubts as to the effectiveness of the grouping of these units. We have not been told exactly which units are to form the permanent force. Again one can only get the information from the press reports. I feel that this field force is woefully short of the technical units. During the last years of the war just ended, the principles which were enunciated by such great leaders as Alexander, Montgomery and Crerar were for the overwhelming concentration of supporting arms behind a small group of infantry or armour which conducted a penetration on narrow fronts. From what I can learn of the organization of this field force, it is lacking in the technical units and in the supporting arms which would be able to adhere to this policy.

To date, I think one must admit that the numbers joining the permanent force and the numbers of those who are in the interim force and have expressed a desire to join the permanent force are disappointing. I do not know why that is. On the whole, the new rates of pay are satisfactory. The standard of education which is required of perhaps both officers and men may hardly be practicable of achievement.

In regard to the various items in the estimates, there will be some room for criticism in regard to administration particularly. There is justifiable questioning as to whether this new command organization will make the necessary reductions in personnel in the districts and in national defence headquarters which one would believe that it was designed to do. We cannot have greater commands superimposed upon the districts unless we see a reduction in the number of personnel either in these districts and subordinate staffs or in the staffs at national headquarters.

In conclusion, I am forced to say that I believe the organization is faulty because the government has not taken a realistic view of the up-to-date requirements of the type of defence which Canada needs to-day, which is not the type of defence organization that was in vogue twenty-five years ago. I doubt whether the government has realized the danger of modern warfare. Therefore I feel that some of the expenditures in these estimates are definitely wasteful and unwarranted because they will fail to be effective.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand a commonwealth military conference was held in Britain last week, presided over by Field Marshal Montgomery. I wonder if the minister is prepared to say what were the problems discussed there, what policies, if any, were agreed upon, and whether Canada was represented at such conference.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I would call it a commonwealth military conference. What did take place was that Field Marshal Montgomery was having a meeting with his chiefs of staff and senior officers, and invited our chief of the general staff to attend. No questions of policy were discussed; it was not a conference at which matters of policy were to be discussed. It was more an exposition of tactical problems and a general discussion of matters of that kind. It was not a discussion of matters of policy, but a general round-table conference, discussion or exposition of modern tactical procedure. The chief of the general staff returned this morning. I understand that at the same time Sir Arthur Tedder held a discussion with his senior air officers. The chief of the air staff was invited to attend that conference, and did so.

Mr. KIDD: I was hoping that on item 1 the minister would say something with regard to the Royal Military College at Kingston. Since he did not do so, perhaps he would answer one or two questions in that connection. First, why was the Royal Military College at Kingston closed for the training of gentleman cadets? When was it closed? On whose authority was it closed, and when does his department expect to reopen it? If the minister would answer those questions I shall have one or two more to ask later.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not recall just when it was closed, but it was during the war, I think in 1940 or 1941. The question as to when it will be reopened and under what circumstances, has, as my hon. friend knows, been brought up in the house on a number of occasions. In answering the various questions I indicated that it was the intention of the government to continue the Royal Military College, but that under what conditions had not been determined. In order to assist me and the officers of my department in arriving at a sound conclusion in that respect, a special committee was set up under the chairmanship of a distinguished soldier, Brigadier Sherwood Lett of Vancouver. That committee completed its hearings in July; there was prepared and submitted to me some two or three weeks later a report, which I now have and which is being studied. It is an excellent report, which I found extremely interesting and which is going to be of great assistance. I am not yet in a position to state on just what basis the Royal Military College will be reopened. I announced, of course, that it would not be reopened on the old basis this fall. We have ample supplies of officers, for the moment, for our post-war forces. I hope to be able to make an announcement perhaps before parliament reconvenes; but, if not, certainly at the latest before the end of the next session.

Mr. KIDD: I wish to impress upon the minister as strongly as I can the fact that the public are expecting an announcement, and I think that announcement should have been made this session. It is now getting late in August. I do not agree with what the minister has said. He did not answer my question, on whose recommendation the college was closed for the training of gentleman cadets, whether it was the recommendation of the chief of staff or of the committee. It was not closed in the last war, but it was closed during this war. I am informed, though I believe there is a difference of opinion in that regard, that the closing of the college was a mistake. Many young men across Canada are to-day being deprived of the opportunity of attending the Royal Military College because, as the minister and his officers well know, a young man cannot enter the college when he is nineteen, twenty or twenty-one. It is these boys of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen who are losing that opportunity. For that reason, if the committee will bear with me for a moment, I should like to place on record something of what the college has done. I do so because only a few days ago we in Kingston celebrated our 100th anniversary of the founding of the city, and for seventy years the Royal Military College has played an important part, not only in the life of that city, but in the life of the whole country.

The motto of the Royal Military College is "truth, duty, valour." This challenging motto is the anvil upon which the destinies of gentlemen cadets have been shaped since 1876 at the Royal Military College, Kingston. The carefully kept records of graduates' careers tell something of the success the Royal Military College in preparing Canadian youth for tasks of leadership, but the sum total can never be stated. If the purpose of the founding of the college was to train young men in the profession of arms in order to provide leadership in times of national crises, then that purpose has been and is continuing to be served.

Following an enviable record in the first great war, the cadets and ex-cadets brought even more honours to their college with their service in the second conflict. A total of 1,419 cadets were engaged in service, including sixty-two who were doing special war work. One hundred and thirteen gave their lives in action, 637 awards and honours to R.M.C. alumni have been announced to date. The Victoria Cross was won by Lieut.-Colonel Cecil Merritt, the George Cross by Air Commodore A. D. Ross, and a Companion of Honour by General H. D. G. Crerar. As a result of their service in the second conflict, knighthoods were awarded to four ex-cadets: Lieut.-General Sir G. N. Cory, K.C.B.; Lieut.-General Sir A. E. Grasett, K.B.E.; Brigadier C. F. Carson and Brigadier E. O. Wheeler, the last of whom is the present surveyor general of India. Commander of the Bath was awarded to fifteen graduates, Commander of the British Empire to fifty-five, and Distinguished Service Order to seventy-seven. Other awards included sixty-nine foreign orders. A total of 199 ex-cadets held the rank of colonel or above in the army or equivalent rank in other services. Altogether 280 graduates of the college have attained such rank since the college was founded. Twenty-nine attained the standing of general in the second war, twenty-eight in previous wars. This number includes those serving in both the British and Canadian armies and in other services.

The first step in the history of the college was the passing of an act to establish a military college in one of the garrison towns of Upper Canada by the imperial parliament in May, 1874. The Royal Military College was founded in 1876 by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, then prime minister of Canada. The linking of Alexander Mackenzie's name with the R.M.C. recalls one of the delightful bits of personal history from the early years of Canada's development. Thirty years before his choice of the site for the college, Mr. Mackenzie was employed as a stone mason on the self-same site when Fort Frederick was being erected. As he worked he could see the great natural beauty of the site as well as its strategic position in the military scheme, so what more natural than to select it for a military training school when he became prime minister?

Cadets have come to Kingston from all parts of Canada and, upon graduating, all have entered for a time into a life of duty to the country and to the empire in the military, air and police forces. The story of their exploits in the interests of the great commonwealth is a wonderful one. Mention might be made of a few; of Girouard and Rhodes in South Africa; of Bridges, the first G.O.C. of the Australians in the first great war and founder of the R.M.C. of Australia; of Luard and Straubenzee in China and Malaya; of Kirkpatrick, Heneker, Cory, Nanton, Lotbinière in India; of Perry, Sanders and Macdonnell in the R.C.M.P.; of Stairs who died in 1892 while with the H. M. Stanley expedition in Africa; of Massey-Baker in Papua; of Bishop, Twining and Burstall, Macdonnell and Panet; names to conjure with during the heroic struggle of 1914 to 1918.

During world war II, former cadets held strategic positions on all fronts. General Sir G. D. Rhodes, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O., was in charge of military transportation in Iran from the Persian gulf to the Caspian sea. At the same time Brigadier Sir C. F. Carson, C.B.E., M.C., also an R.M.C. graduate, was directing similar activities in Iran.

Two chiefs of general staff of the Canadian army, Lieutenant-General K. Stuart, C.B., D.S.O., M.C., and Lieutenant-General J. C. Murchie, C.B., C.B.E., are also graduates of the college, as are Major General J. V. Young, C.B., C.B.E., and Major General J. H. MacQueen, C.B.E., masters general of ordnance, and Major General N. E. Rodger, C.B.E., quartermaster-general of the Canadian army. Major General Chris Vokes is also a graduate of the famed military college.

Though the teaching at the college has been primarily for the purpose of training officers for the army, the accomplishments of its graduates are by no means limited to the military field.

Amongst those, past and present, who have achieved distinction in civilian capacities are: Sir Percy Girouard, one-time governor of the East African Protectorate; Lieutenant-General Sir A. E. Grasett, lieutenant-governor of the Isle of Jersey; Colonel P. C. H. Primrose, one-time lieutenant-governor of Alberta; Colonel Colin Gibson, present air minister; Major-General A. B. Perry, C.M.G., former commissioner and S. T. Wood, C.M.G., present commissioner of the R.C.M.P.; F. H. Peters, former surveyor-general for Canada; Lieutenant-Colonel R. E. Kent, alderman and several times mayor of the city of Kingston; R. T. M. Scott, and W. Heighington, well-known writers of fiction, and numerous other lawyers, doctors, engineers, editors and industrial men.

For many years the command of the college was held by imperial officers, but that practice was discontinued in 1919. The present commandant is Brigadier J. D. B. Smith, C.B.E., D.S.O.

The grounds comprise a peninsula between Kingston harbour and Navy bay and consist of about forty acres. The buildings are grouped on three sides of the square. The oldest and most historic building is the "Stone Frigate", a dormitory, and one of the original buildings of the old naval yard; the newest is the mess hall and gymnasium. At the entrance to the grounds on highway No. 2 is the memorial arch, erected by the R.M.C. club in 1923. This is undoubtedly one of the finest memorials in America. The splendid sturdiness and strength of its aspect dominate the approach to the college. Its panels in bold relief, its groupings of military attributes, its helmeted head sculptured on the keystone, its inscriptions and tablets—all will repay close inspection. The arch is a fitting memorial to the memory of former cadets who died in the first world war.

The college has accommodation for 200 students, and it was planned to have the "Stone Frigate" supplanted by a modern dormitory adjoining the new mess hall. The excavations in solid rock had been made for the new dormitory, when all work at the college was suspended in favour of more urgent activities following the outbreak of war in 1939.

I thank hon. members for giving me their attention, and I have placed these facts on the record only because I believe some recognition is due the Royal Military College. Therefore I make no apology in offering my appeal to the minister. I suggest if the Royal Military College is not used, why is Royal Roads being used for boys in the navy.

Before taking my seat, I should like to refer to two other matters which affect my riding of Kingston. First, I would associate myself with other hon. members who have referred to the manner in which the minister's staff, or some in the department, are dealing with men who are returning from overseas and who wish to join the permanent force. There is something wrong about this. The men I have in mind enlisted in the permanent force before the war, and perhaps served for five or ten years before going overseas. I have in mind one man particularly who joined the army as a profession. He was in the R.C.H.A. when war broke out, and proceeded overseas, first as a lance-sergeant, and then, after getting overseas, receiving his command as a subaltern. Following that, he was promoted to the rank of captain. This man, in his early thirties, led a battery in France during the present war.

This man is now back here, and I am asking the minister what he is going to do for him. I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs will agree with me that in our committee on veterans affairs which passed on twelve pieces of legislation we had to ask civilian employers to take some of these men from the service. When they come back, and show a desire to continue in the permanent force, they are told that they must lose their commission. Surely there is something wrong with that. Surely a man in his early thirties should not be asked to revert to a lower rank, particularly when there is no guarantee of employment in civilian life. This setup is wrong. I know there are various depots across Canada manned by men who are new in the service.

Then, these men who are making their applications are orphans. The R.C.H.A. is established at Petawawa, and a man going to the depot must be paraded before his officer commanding, only to find that he must leave the service. And what is happening at Petawawa is happening everywhere. No one is acting for these men, with the result that, as I have said, they are orphans. A man with fifteen years' service before the war comes back from overseas, and expresses a desire to give more service.

Then, when a man is put back in the ranks, what happens? This man has gone out to fight for Canada and the empire, but upon returning to his own country he finds that he must become a junior to some officer or non-commissioned officer or warrant officer, and must take instructions from him.

I appeal to the minister to issue instructions so that this may be changed. I am afraid there are too many young men on the general staff to-day who are not taking a kindly or fatherly interest in these returning men.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are trying to build up an efficient army.

Mr. KIDD: I say that the minister should find appointments for these men who came back from the last war. It should not be difficult to find a place for a man who has been a competent officer—and I am not referring to those who have been incompetent. Surely there should be some place for them in the interim army.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are accused of having too many officers.

Mr. KIDD: A reply to a question I put on the order paper shows that ten per cent of the officers in the army at the present time did not serve outside Canada. There are ten per cent with the rank of subaltern and five per cent with the rank of captain who, I say, have places found for them. Someone looked after these men. Men who rendered service in the permanent force and during the war have been replaced by them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KIDD: When the house rose at six o'clock I had been speaking of the Royal Military College at Kingston and of returning permanent force officers who had fought gallantly overseas and who are not now getting the breaks they should get. Some of them are in their early thirties, and if they could continue in the service for another four or five years they would be eligible for pension. Employers of labour are compelled, under legislation parliament has passed, to reinstate their civilian employees who have returned from overseas service, and I submit to the minister that his department should set the example in looking after these returning permanent force officers. The same question was raised when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police estimates were before the committee. Some of these permanent force officers returning from overseas have lost promotions which they should not have lost, and that fact should be recognized. Some of them have had fifteen years' experience in the army, and surely they should receive more consideration than a boy who has been in the service for only four or five years. Instructions should be issued to the general staff that these men deserve and should receive more consideration than they are getting.

I also want to say a word or two about bands for the permanent force. What is the policy of the department in that matter? Are the bands being demobilized, or is it intended to continue them? Personally I think they should be continued. I think we should have a band to every one thousand or fifteen hundred men in the interim army. Back in the dark days in the 1940's the bands were being dismissed. It was a shame and disgrace to whoever was administering the army at that time to let the bands go out of existence, and a great deal of credit is due to the units themselves in maintaining bands out of the canteen funds. But I do not think we should have to depend on the militia units across Canada to maintain the bands, and I should like to know what the policy of the department is in regard to them.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I have already said all I can say at the moment as to future policy with respect to the Royal Military College. I agree wholeheartedly with what my hon. friend has said as to the outstanding record which has been won for the college by its graduates. They have served with distinction in the two great wars in the last thirty years, and what my hon. friend said was certainly no overstatement of the magnificent record which the graduates of the college have won for themselves.

As to the promotion of permanent force non-commissioned officers and other ranks during the war, there has been some criticism on the other side of the matter, namely, that promotions have been too rapid and too great and that a good many permanent force non-commissioned officers have been retired on substantial pensions which in some respects are out of proportion to the rank which they held at the beginning of the war. I know that what my hon. friend is referring to are the permanent non-commissioned officers now in their early thirties who in some cases have been found unsuitable by the selection committee as commissioned officers in the post-war army. Any minister of national defence, indeed any minister, is obliged to rely on the advice of his officers, and a selection committee was set up for the selection of personnel to form part of the post-war force. I would not for one moment constitute myself a one-man selection committee for the post-war army. That would be most improper. But I have looked into the question of the selection of officer personnel for post-war army, and in a number of cases where permanent force non-commissioned officers have not been found suitable for retention in their present rank I find that in every case they have been given the opportunity of reverting to the rank they held before the war. It is understandable that some of them would not be suitable for the post-war army. In war time there is a largely expanded personnel and one can use a great many officers in operational duty who, by reason of educational standards or otherwise, are not suitable for the comparatively small number of highly specialized officers required in peace time. That is the case with a good many of the permanent force non-commissioned officers to whom my hon. friend has referred. It has been found that, by reason of educational standards or in a great many cases lack of operational experience, they are not suitable for retention in the post-war army. We must proceed on the assumption that, with a small army for the post war, we must make that army as efficient as possible, and we cannot afford to be influenced by consideration of sentiment. We must endeavour to get the ablest and most suitable material that we can possibly get for the officer corps. Unfortunately, because we had such a small army prior to the outbreak of the last war, we were obliged to use a great many permanent force non-commissioned officers as instructional officers in Canada. We have a great many officers who, through no fault of their own, were not able to see overseas service. We had to keep them in Canada for instructional purposes. I can only answer my hon. friend's plea that consideration should be given to this class of soldier by saying that it is being given and that the selection committee for officers in the post-war army is doing its best to see that the officers selected are the very best possible, taking into account educational qualifications, operational experience and the like.

On the subject of bands I agree with my hon. friend that it is extremely important that there should be adequate bands. Through no one's fault in particular it was felt early in the war that bands were not necessary, but that lack was early recognized and I can assure my hon. friend that we will see that proper provision is made in the post-war army for a suitable number of bands.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thus far no member of the Social Credit group has had anything to say on this occasion in regard to defence, not because we are not intensely interested in the subject. I believe that many Canadians are in grave danger of becoming unrealistic toward the matter of defence. I was alarmed when I heard the speech of the hon. member for Regina city, because it indicated that there is already developing in a considerable number of people a tendency to become victims of phantasy regarding matters of defence. Here are we, Canadians, eleven and a half or twelve millions of us; we have the finest land on earth, stretching thousands and thousands of miles. That land has to be defended. Someone must defend it. There are only three ways in which it can be defended.

One is by our cooperating with the members of the British commonwealth, the greatest team for defence of freedom the world has ever known; another is by cooperation with the United States and the other American countries in a scheme for western hemispheric defence; or, standing alone and trying to defend ourselves. There are a good many who will be somewhat offended because I have left out of consideration the united nations organization. I do not hesitate a minute to say before this house, and before the country in so far as anyone is interested in what I say, that the united nations organization is going to be just as useful in defending the peace of the world as the league of nations was, and no more. So that, if we rely on that organization, we shall by just so much betray the trust which is placed upon us in this fateful time. That is the point of view which Social Crediters take.

I was very much pleased with the speech delivered by the hon. member for Nanaimo. It indicated a disposition to face facts as they are; it indicated that the speaker knew what he was talking about, that he was living in a world of realities and intending to face that world realistically. I think we Social Crediters must associate ourselves with the words of the hon. member.

As I recall it, the minister stated that our navy is to be prepared to cooperate effectively either with the United States or with Great Britain. I assume that the minister has a similar aim as regards the Canadian army and the Canadian air force. I gather that the minister plans to make each of our three fighting services into a high-grade, efficient fighting unit, a unit adapted to defend our country with the greatest measure of striking power economically possible for Canada as a nation. With such a policy the Social Credit party is fully in agreement; and I wish to assure the minister that, in going forward with the responsibilities of his exceedingly difficult task, so long as he continues to face in the direction he now is facing and so long as he continues to go forward with " full speed ahead", he will have our complete support.

Mr. BROOKS: I hope I may be pardoned if I say a few words regarding a matter which was discussed this morning, namely, in connection with the services at Dieppe to-day. I had an opportunity about eighteen months ago of being in the town of Dieppe. I saw the graves that were spoken of this morning, of the men who died there; I saw the beach on which they died; and I saw the hills and fortifications surrounding that beach. I am not going to elaborate on this, but the thought occurred to me then and it has occurred to me many times since, that the sacrifice which was made there was hardly worth while for the information that was obtained. I felt then and I feel now, that the price which was paid for that information was too high, and I believe it could have been obtained by other means. As a surprise attack, I think the operation would have been impossible: with the surprise element gone—and we all know the Germans knew our men were in the English channel and about to attack—it did appear to me, and I am sure it must have done to a great many, that the task they were asked to accomplish was almost as hopeless and possibly as brilliant as the charge of the Light Brigade.

I agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge in the statement he made regarding the hon. member for Nanaimo. I listened to his statement this afternoon: it was one of the best summing-up of any situation, military or other, which I have heard in this house. We of the House of Commons are fortunate to have a member with the practical experience in military matters of the hon. member for Nanaimo. Few men in Canada have his experience or his knowledge of such problems, and this house and the country should be very grateful for the information which he has given us this afternoon. He outlined the situation; and I congratulate the hon. member for Lethbridge upon his very short speech in which he also outlined the situation as we see it in Canada. He mentioned what he regards as the two alternatives. Well, we live in a time of hope, though possibly in years to come it may seem like wishful thinking. But I am not one of those who despair of the united nations; I hope and expect that they will accomplish something as far as world peace is concerned. If they do not, it will be a very sad thing indeed for this world. We can only wait and see; we should know in a few months what the situation will be as regards the united nations' programme, and what are to be the military commitments as far as Canada is concerned to the organization. If we have full assurance from the united nations and are satisfied that their ideas are practical, perhaps we can then base our defence programme upon what we learn at that time. But there are two other alternatives, as has been mentioned here. The first is, coordination and work with the British commonwealth of nations. We have cooperated with the British commonwealth in two great wars, and I wish to say here that I feel, and I know practically every hon. member and everybody in Canada feels, that we were justified in entering both of those wars, that we had to enter them not only for the defence of our country but in defence of the ideals for which we stand. We cooperated, as I say, with the British commonwealth of nations. In the future, whether we have a united nations' programme or whatever we have, the British commonwealth of nations must stick together, and our entry or whatever our contribution is to the united nations should be more or less upon a commonwealth programme.

I might also say that if it had not been for the unity of the British empire and the British commonwealth of nations in the early part of the recent war it is doubtful whether we would have the freedom we enjoy to-day; and had not England, Canada, Australia and New Zealand fought for that freedom in 1941 it is unlikely that the United States or even Russia would be in the position in which they are at this time. The empire saved the world.

The third alternative is cooperation with the United States. Well, we can cooperate with the United States as a commonwealth of nations; and if the British commonwealth of nations and the United States stand together, the freedom of the world will be assured whether we have a united nations' programme which is satisfactory or whether we do not.

My main object in rising was to obtain from the minister, if I could, information regarding a matter which I know has occupied the minds of a good many people in recent months. It was reported here some months ago that either the parliament of Great Britain or the war department there, I do not know which, had put out feelers to see whether Great Britain could train troops in Canada. We remember that a few years before the war it was definitely stated that Great Britain had asked to be allowed to train airmen in this country. I know it was denied in this house that Great Britain had made that request. I am satisfied that she did not make the request, because countries do not make requests, even sister countries in the British commonwealth of nations. But I am also satisfied that some intimation was given that Britain would like to have trained airmen in this country before the last war. Limited as she was in her own borders, with her small area, it was only logical and reasonable that she would like to train her airmen in some country where there were greater opportunities for the purpose. I ask definitely now: Has Great Britain in any way intimated that she would like to train troops in Canada? I can see the benefit it would be to us.

The hon. member for Nanaimo this afternoon demonstrated logically to the committee, as I am sure he has demonstrated to the rest of the country, that the world situation to-day being what it is, if another great war broke out our soldiers would be fighting, not on the continent of Europe or in some other part of the world. We can reasonably expect that in such an event they would be fighting here on their own soil and in defence of their own country. What greater asset would there be in the defence of this country if a sister nation like Great Britain or Australia, or any other sister nation within the commonwealth, had men trained in this country, men who had been acclimatized here, men who knew the terrain, the climate and the people?

If Great Britain has not asked to be allowed to train troops here, it would not be out of place for Canada to suggest that she might do so. We have the report, and it is in the press, that having failed to obtain this opportunity in Canada, Great Britain is sending troops to Australia for training, where there are large areas and great opportunities for combined and operational training.

We have been jealous of our sovereignty in Canada. We have heard a good deal about that. I remember in 1938, one of the reasons advanced why Canada could not allow Great Britain to train her airmen here was that it affected the sovereignty of the dominion. Well, Australia is not afraid of her sovereignty. We did not lose our sovereignty because airmen from all parts of the commonwealth trained here during the war, and we shall not lose our sovereignty if Great Britain or any other sister nation of the commonwealth trains men here during peace time. I am not going to labour this point.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer it as soon as you are through.

Mr. BROOKS: I expect the minister to answer it. The hon. member for Nanaimo spoke about wars to-day not having the acquisition of territory in view. That is very true. In the old wars one nation, for territorial or other reasons, fought another, taking away part of its territory. The last war, however, was fought between fascism and nazism on the one hand and democracy on the other. If there are wars in the future they will be more for the purpose of advancing some ideology than for the purpose of acquiring territory; and if we wish to preserve, as I know we all do, our present way of living, then the nations that love freedom and democracy must combine to work hand in hand in every way possible to preserve their freedom and their ideals.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I am glad the hon. member for Royal has brought up the question of the training of United Kingdom troops in Canada, because I saw the press reports to which he has referred. May I make the statement that there has never been any request, formal or informal, that United Kingdom troops should be allowed to train in Canada. A week or so after these reports appeared in the paper, Major-General Keightley, who is director of training for the British army, was in Canada; we had an opportunity of discussing the matter with him, both the members of my staff and myself personally, and he definitely ruled out any question of British troops training in Canada. In saying that, I do not preclude for one moment the exchange of personnel, which I hope will take place between our forces and those of the United Kingdom; but I am glad of this opportunity to dispel once and for all these rumours that the Canadian government has been requested to allow United Kingdom troops to train in Canada and has not allowed them to do so.

Mr. BROOKS: Can the minister explain, then, why United Kingdom troops are now training in Australia?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can explain it, but I have a shrewd idea. There are certain conditions there which are peculiarly suitable for the training of troops in the new weapons of warfare and which do not exist in Canada. May I put it in that way.

Mr. HERRIDGE: There are a few questions I should like to ask the minister, but before I state them I must express strong disagreement with the lack of faith which the hon. member for Lethbridge has in the united nations organization. I will not say much on that question at this time, except to observe that if his view were shared generally, the united nations organization would be bound to fail. If the organization is not successful in developing techniques for world peace, with all the difficulties involved, then this generation will not know a world worth living in.

The questions I should like to ask the minister are these. In British Columbia we had the Pacific coast militia rangers, a branch of the militia, which I am sure the minister will agree did splendid work. Since the war has ended, members of the Pacific coast militia rangers have formed an incorporated body, and I should like to know whether the minister is considering this and similar organizations as civilian rifle clubs when it comes to granting the benefits which the Department of National Defence has extended to civilian rifle clubs in the past. Again, I notice in Reynolds News of London, England, of July 14, that the United States is forming an arctic army of 4,500 officers and men, who will be trained in Alaska and in arctic waters. These men will comprise land, sea and air forces. Can the minister tell the committee whether any arrangement has been made for cooperation between the Canadian military authorities and those of the United States with regard to manœuvres and operations of that type? One other question. Are there going on in the north at the present time any manœuvres which can be regarded as a summer supplement to the Musk-Ox exercise?

Mr. ABBOTT: At the present time there are no operations which could be considered comparable with Musk-Ox.

On the second question which my hon. friend has raised, as to whether we are cooperating with the Americans in the training of troops, that is a matter which would normally be discussed through the permanent joint board for defence. I shall have to see whether there is anything in that regard, but I doubt whether it would be desirable or necessary to make a public announcement in the house.

As regards the Pacific coast rangers, I will ask my parliamentary assistant to reply. He is more familiar with the question than I am.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The question of the Pacific coast militia rangers has received considerable study by the department. My hon. friend will recall that at the last session there was a question of permitting the members to retain the rifles which they had used, and that was eventually settled. The question of perpetuating the P.C.M.R. and other similar organizations which were established during the war and providing for the reactivation in time of war is under consideration at the present time as is that of the different rifle clubs and associations which existed before the war. The question is receiving the active consideration of the general staff at the present time and a solution should be had shortly.

Mr. HARKNESS: This afternoon I expected that the minister would make a few remarks in reply to the extremely pertinent questions posed by the hon. member for Nanaimo. One of the matters which he dealt with is of such importance that I should like some information on it. I refer particularly to the composition of our permanent force. I have read the newspapers fairly carefully and all that I know about our permanent force has been gleaned from newspaper sources. From that source I gather that it will consist of 25,000 men, and that included in it there will be a brigade group. Apart from that, hon. members and the country generally know practically nothing of it.

The term "a brigade group" is an elastic one. I should like to know what the group is to consist of. On occasions during the past war a division was broken up into brigade groups. Such groups ordinarily consisted of three infantry battalions and their headquarters, a regiment of field artillery, a battery of anti-tank artillery, ack-ack batteries, company engineers, army service corps, a field workshop, field ambulance, along with several other minor odds and ends of various kinds. That was a brigade group. When it was actually performing in a fighting role it ordinarily had attached to it an armoured regiment and sometimes more artillery. I should like the minister to tell us what the brigade group of the permanent force is to consist of. Is it to be a brigade group such as I have just outlined, which would consist of about 4,500 men, or, with the addition of an armoured regiment, about 5,200 men? Is it to consist of a lot more units? That is a matter upon which we should have further information.

I should also like the minister to tell us where this brigade group is to get its training; where is it to be concentrated, if it is to be concentrated. When this plan came out first I understand that the brigade group was to be held in one particular spot where it could carry on the training and be available as a striking force to go immediately into action. I believe those were the words by which it was described when we first heard of it. My understanding now is that it is to be split up into units spread all over the country, and quite evidently it is not to be a force which is to be available for immediate action at any time. If you have a brigade group and another group of people spread across Canada and you want to concentrate them for immediate action it will take considerable time.

I know that from experience. These are questions in connection with the brigade group on which we should have some information.

Furthermore, if the brigade group is as large as the one I have described; in other words, if it is to consist of approximately 5,000 men, what is the remainder of the permanent force going to do? Before the war we had an authorized permanent force of 10,000 men. Actually I do not think we had at any time any more than 5,000 men in the permanent force before the war. If you allow 5,000 or 7,000 men for the brigade group it will still leave between 18,000 or 20,000 men in our post-war permanent force. I should like to know what they are to do. From my knowledge I presume generally that part of it will be used in administrative work of various kinds; part of it will be on the staff of national defence headquarters, Canadian military headquarters, and so forth, and part of it will be used to train the reserve army, but it is really not very much good. The reserve army, so far as I can see, is going to be a glorified pre-war non-permanent active militia, as stated by the hon. member for Nanaimo this afternoon, trained, as well as everything else being done, by 5,000 men. I have, as a matter of fact, a shrewd suspicion that a large number of these 18,000 men are to be what I would call wasted away in holding down a whole lot of administrative jobs, which will consist chiefly of men sitting behind desks and signing an innumerable number of forms of various kinds, on the bottom of each the following words will be found "passed to you". It would go to somebody else in the department, and he would also sign the form and pass it on to somebody else.

As one who took a considerable interest in the militia before the war and who is taking a considerable interest in it now, actually I am fearful that that is what will happen to a large number of these 18,000 to 20,000 men who will not be in this brigade group. I should like some clarification of that, and perhaps I shall have a few remarks to make on the matter later.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With regard to the first part of the hon. member's remarks concerning the composition of the proposed active force, may I say I believe that the information has been given in various press releases. Possibly it did not give all the information which my hon. friend wishes, but he will understand why. This information is of a technical nature and normally would not be given in such releases. However, if my hon. friend desires it I shall be pleased to give him the type of units which it is proposed will form the brigade group to which he has referred.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. HARKNESS: Is it the type of thing I have just described, or something else?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a little more detailed than what my hon. friend mentioned. It has been given to the press, as I have already stated. Besides the brigade group headquarters, it will consist of two armoured regiments, three infantry regiments, one artillery regiment, one medium battery, two anti-aircraft batteries, two coast batteries, one anti-tank battery and the various signal sections and troops of a single brigade group. I think my hon. friend knows what I mean when I say "E" section, "X" troop and "Y" troop. There will also be a R.C.A.S.C. infantry brigade group company, one independent brigade ordnance field park, then the various R.C.E.M.E. units, which will go under the heading of the composite brigade workshop, and five various "L.A.D.'s" who serve the units which I have just mentioned. I think my hon. friend will agree that this is information which could not very well be given in a press release, and neither would it interest the general public.

Mr. HARKNESS: How many men all told?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Approximately 8,000. I am having that figure looked up to give the accurate one.

As regards the remainder of the 25,000 men to which my hon. friend referred as doing practically nothing, may I say that they form part of various static establishments which are dispersed in the various districts and commands, and which are necessary for the maintenance of the brigade group and for the various army schools established throughout the country. For my hon. friend's information, may I say there are thirteen engineer companies, one for each district, and a district signal section for each district. There is also a supply and transport company, R.C.A.S.C., for each district. Perhaps it will make the position clearer for my hon. friend if I tell him that in each district the following units will exist: a district headquarters; a works company, R.C.E.; district signals; district company, R.C.A.S.C.; district medical company, R.C.A.M.C.; district workshop, R.C.E.M.E.; detachment of the pay corps; detachment of the dental corps, and also personnel of the Canadian provost corps as might be detailed for a provost section in each district. It is also proposed to have schools for the various corps which will compose the brigade group, and I think my hon. friend will agree that all these establishments can very well absorb the remainder of the personnel to which he was referring.

With regard to the brigade group, I now have the figure, which totals 7,259 as being the establishment for the proposed field force.

Mr. HARKNESS: The brigade group seems essentially the type of brigade group we knew overseas, except that it has two armoured regiments instead of one, as is normal. But there is a terrific anomaly here; it has two coastal batteries. How they are going to pick up these big, heavy coast guns and gallop about the country with them, I do not know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will permit me, I gave him the field force, and it includes two coast batteries.

Mr. HARKNESS: In future, when the parliamentary assistant is talking about this group, perhaps he would be wise to leave out these coastal batteries, because I can assure him they are extraordinarily difficult to get mobile.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know that; I am not an expert on the subject, but I have seen them.

Mr. HARKNESS: Apparently this brigade group is really simply the normal brigade group we became so familiar with overseas during the war, except that it has two armoured regiments instead of one, but that sometimes happened over there as well. It takes in 7,259 men. Apparently the remaining 18,000 men are to be scattered about the country in engineer detachments, signals, army service corps and so on in each military district. We had detachments of all these people in each military district before the war. That is nothing new; that is the same old thing. Probably we are to have more than we had before the war; but the point I am getting at, the thing that struck me in reference to this set-up from the beginning, is that if you have a permanent army of 25,000 men it seems to me the organization and set-up is extraordinarily bad if you have only 7,259 men with whom you can fight. In addition, I should like to know whether these 7,259 men are to be concentrated in a brigade group which might be used as a small striking force, or if they are to be scattered across the country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will quite understand that in the period of organization these various units may be stationed wherever their permanent stations happen to be, without any need to group them together. But it is proposed that this brigade will undergo periods of training as a group.

Mr. HARKNESS: I still do not think I have had an answer. The parliamentary assistant says they will undergo periods of training as a group. That is what we did before the war in the non-permanent units which had companies or batteries or whatever it was scattered over quite a section of the country. We were brought together and went to camp to train for seven days; and we did a fair amount of reasonably effective training. But if you are to have a brigade group that is any good at all you must have them together; you must be training them, not for a week or two weeks or three months or some other period some time in the future; they have to be together all the time. The group must be training and working together, particularly if there is any truth in the rumour I have heard that this is intended to be an airborne brigade group. If this brigade group is to remain scattered across the country from Vancouver to Halifax it is not a brigade group at all; it is a few scattered units who are on permanent army pay and, as the hon. member for Nanaimo said this afternoon, are available to put on demonstrations from time to time, on July 1 and other festive occasions. As a fighting force it is not of much use. I really think the minister should take back this scheme for a Canadian post-war army, take a look at what happened during the last war and what may happen in the future, with the technical advances in warfare which have been taking place, and then bring in something that will do us at least some good. If we had a brigade group that could be a fighting force and that was ready to go some place and do something I would say that would be at least a good start. But if we are to have a so-called brigade group which is scattered all over the country in dribs and drabs and in that position, is no good for anything as far as fighting is concerned, then the government have done nothing and are wasting the money of the taxpayers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not notice in the remarks of my hon. friend any very helpful suggestions. I might point out to him that at the present time the only logical thing to do is to have the units of this brigade group mobilized and recruited in various parts of Canada. I do not think my hon. friend could achieve any good results at this time if he tried to organize that field force or fighting force in one section of Canada. Not only that; as I have told the hon. gentleman, it is proposed that this group will be brought together for collective training. My hon. friend has had personal experience in that type of work. He spent a good deal of time training in England during the last war. He knows that, however you might have been brigaded or in a division, the amount of time any unit spent in actual collective training as a group, a brigade group or a division, was much limited. Each unit was left to train by itself most of the time, except for special manoeuvres which were part of the collective training, and that is what it is intended to do under the present proposal.

Mr. SKEY: The hon. member for Calgary East mentioned that this brigade group which is being so thoroughly discussed was widely mentioned in the press as being the nucleus of an airborne group. May I ask the parliamentary assistant or the minister whether it is the intention to make this group into an airborne mobile group?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed it is proposed that this group might be trained in airborne operations, and to that end an establishment is being created to permit of possible training in that line.

Mr. SKEY: How does the parliamentary assistant propose to transport this group in airborne operations?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand the establishment proposes to have a joint training scheme with the R.C.A.F. in Carberry, Manitoba.

Mr. SKEY: That is the answer I expected and the one which, as a matter of fact, I had been seeking.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why did you not ask right away? We would tell you.

Mr. SKEY: It might interest the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence to know that it requires at least six squadrons of thirty transport aircraft to transport a group of 5,400 men, and that the R.C.A.F. at the present time proposes to have only two squadrons of transport aircraft of a much lesser number than the thirty with which they operated during the war. Therefore all I wish to say is that it is farcial for the Canadian army to develop an airborne group which the Canadian air force cannot carry.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the hon. member wants to be fair. I told him it was intended to train that brigade group as an airborne group. I believe that for purposes of training it is not quite necessary to have the squadrons to which my hon. friend refers. I quite agree that if this group were called upon to go into action as an airborne group, possibly he would be quite right. But I only said the group would be trained. I am informed that adequate facilities exist to carry out that training.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. HARKNESS: While we are talking about a brigade group, I should like to ask another question. I was wondering if the parliamentary assistant could translate his delightfully vague statement, the fact that this brigade group will be drawn together for training, into a definite and specific statement as to when it will be drawn together, and if it will then stay together.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is proposed that the group will be brought together summer and winter, and I believe the present localities being considered for such are Wainwright and Borden.

Mr. HARKNESS: Does the parliamentary assistant mean this coming winter?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be necessary to get the group together first.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Last session we were slowly winding up the estimates for world war II. These estimates now coming down may very well be the first estimates for world war III. We here this evening are discussing estimates from the point of view of national defence. In other words, a majority in parliament has accepted the principle that national defence is necessary. According to the estimates, we are to get a few more tanks, a few more planes and a few more ships; and we are calling that national defence.

Mark you, this is costing the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money. But I would look at it from this point of view: Is it national defence, in the light of modern technology? I have before me a clipping from the New York Times magazine of June 23, 1946. This article is by Albert Einstein and states:

> Being an ingenious people, Americans find it hard to believe there is no foreseeable defence against atomic bombs. But this is a basic fact. Scientists do not even know of any field which promises us any hope of adequate defence. The military-minded cling to old methods of thinking—

How true!

> —and one army department has been surveying possibilities of going underground, and in war time placing factories in places like Mammoth cave. Others speak of dispersing our population centres into "linear" or "ribbon" cities.
> Reasonable men with these new facts to consider refuse to contemplate a future in which our culture would attempt to survive in ribbons or in underground tombs. Neither is there reassurance in proposals to keep a hundred thousand men alert along the coasts scanning the sky with radar. There is no radar defence against the V-2, and should a "defence" be developed after years of research, it is not humanly possible for any defence to be perfect. Should one rocket with atomic warhead strike Minneapolis, that city would look almost exactly like Nagasaki. Rifle bullets kill men, but atomic bombs kill cities. A tank is a defence against a bullet but there is no defence in science against the weapon which can destroy civilization.

Further to that line of argument I have here a heading from an article appearing in the Saturday Evening Post, of July 13, 1946. The heading states: "Your flesh should creep." The article is by Joseph and Stewart Alsop, and the head note is as follows:

Did our national safety die at Hiroshima? Can we protect the country against atomic warfare? Experts of the general staff, after calmly studying frightful possibilities, see no military defence—and only one hope. Here are the facts —cold turkey.

In the light of that, I submit that the setting up of a few more tanks or a few more aeroplanes is useless. What you are seeing to-day is the atomic bomb brought into actual warfare. Yet in your selfishness, your fright of modern planning in society, your fear of giving up your little pieces of private property, you are going to wait until the crisis develops; then we shall be catapulted into the war, and the military will take over and do the planning. Democracy will not be allowed to work to bring in a planned order of society.

When that day comes the civilian population will take the rap, and where will your army be? It will be away out somewhere with all the cities and communications cut out behind it. I rather pity the Minister of National Defence in this day and age when he comes to the House of Commons with a defence scheme such as this. It reminds me of the English comedian who describes Harold at the battle of Hastings, when he said, "There sat 'arold, on his 'orse, with 'is eye full of arrer, and 'is axe in 'is 'and." What we are doing has just about as much application to our modern scientific age.

If this nation is to survive this period of war and strife—and seemingly capitalism does produce wars—there is still hope of raising democracy among the people of the world, so that they will be able to stop it in time. But if they do not, we shall get well paid for it. A planned society would plan our cities and plan our life, and we have yet time to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just as in Russia.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: That in itself would set the pattern for the rest of the world to follow, because there are other things which stem from a planned society. World trade takes a definite pattern when you operate in a planned society, as we did during the war. We would not be going out trying to cut the other fellow's throat; we would be back on the old lend-lease principle that we had during the war when we were trying to survive, a principle of trade under which we went out to help the other fellow as well as to help ourselves, rather than try to beat the other fellow to it. We know we can expect a depression or a falling off in trade, a struggle for world markets, and so on. Let us not kid ourselves. In the international markets of the world there are two systems competing with each other. There is the barter or bulk sales system, wherein the total state trades with the other states, and there is the method of laissez-faire.

The planned order at the present time has not the majority of governments on its side. But remember this, that it is winning victories among the people. In the backward countries of the world our society has a tendency too often to stay with the old landlord, money-lending classes in those countries. And the revolutionary psychology that comes in and says, "We will redistribute the land among the people", is the one trend influencing the people, with the result that we are losing them.

When we go out to try to establish business relationships we have to use armed force in order to establish trade among those populations. Here on the home front we consider labour as a cost factor in production. Remember this, that the day war breaks out this time it will be a different set of circumstances. I think it was Hegel, the German philosopher, who said that history repeats itself twice, first as a tragedy and then as a farce. We have had two world wars; look out for the third.

Keyserlingk, who is the managing director of British United Press, points out in an article that there is a boundaryless conflict going on between the communal method of living and the individual method of living. If you want to establish a society in which you can get the support of the people you will have to deal out a great deal more justice at the present time than you are doing. Your total war will not just take on national proportions; it will split society right down the middle, on an international plane, and you will have a class war on your hands. However, if people of good will control any such organization as the united nations we shall not face that catastrophe. But let us not insult our intelligence by calling this national defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have listened with interest and some amusement to the doctrines of the hon. member for Skeena, which are nothing but indoctrinated communism. It is all very well to speak in Canada of a planned society. There has been much done by various administrations toward certain measures for a planned society, but Canada is never going to stand for a system of government that will drive us into a brutal system of communistic control. We still believe in Canada in a measure of freedom and free enterprise, combined in certain cases, of course, with a measure of control by the orderly processes of government. But as one to whom Canada has been very kind, and as one who has benefited from the orderly processes of democracy in this free and generous land, I must repudiate with all the strength at my command such dangerous doctrines as those just enunciated to this parliament by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. LENNARD: Several weeks ago the minister said that he would welcome any suggestions that would curtail spending either by the government or by the Department of National Defence. I therefore draw his attention to the Canadian inspection board.

On April 1 of this year the United Kingdom and Canada inspection board ceased to exist, and from then on it carried on as it does now under the name of the Canadian inspection board. From April 1 to July 1 that inspection board cost this country over $600,000. At that rate it will cost Canada this year over $2,500,000.

On that board, as of July 1, 1946, there was a personnel of 1,180, made up of civilian employees, hourly paid, 275; civilian employees, salary paid, 865; seconded service personnel, 36; on loan, not paid by Canada, United Kingdom staff, four. Of that seconded service personnel twenty-six from the army—one major-general, one colonel, five lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, nine captains and one lieutenant. How that one lieutenant got in there I do not know.

An hon. MEMBER: He had to do all the work.

Mr. ABBOTT: He must have been a Liberal.

Mr. LENNARD: Besides those, there were air force and navy personnel to bring the total of seconded staff to thirty-six. The breakdown of pay and allowances shows that the pay and allowances for this year increased from $53,688 to $212,000, or an increase of $158,312. My thought is that apparently up to April 1, the United Kingdom were paying the greater part of the shot, but now that the Canadian authorities have taken over, they have reduced the personnel considerably, and those seconded from the army, navy and air force have been reduced in numbers, so that there should be no need for this great increase in pay and allowances.

In addition, this board maintains expensive offices in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto and perhaps elsewhere. The board maintains also a laboratory for research work, in spite of the fact that the government has already a research council to do such work.

I come to one branch of this inspection service, that dealing with leather inspection. What leather have they to inspect to-day other than boots? We have no mounted regiments. They were all mechanized during the war. Nor have I heard of any leather upholstery being put in tanks, and even if it were, we are not building any tanks to-day. So that brings us down to boots. I would imagine that we have enough boots in defence stores to-day to last any one of the permanent force services for years to come. I suggest that the present inspection staff in the leather branch are on enforced vacation. In Toronto —and I presume the situation is the same in Montreal and other inspectional centres—the staff appear at the office in the morning and, if there is nothing to do, they are told to get out, go home, fade away. That is happening day after day. I urge the minister to go through this inspectional board from top to bottom, and I am sure that, if he does so, he will be able to save this country one million dollars without in any way impairing the efficiency of the organization.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps I might be permitted to say a word in answer to the hon. member for Wentworth. The staff of the inspection board has been considerably decreased. I wish to assure the hon. gentleman that that matter is still under review and that further decreases will take place.

As regard the officers of the army and R.C.A.F. who, during the period of the war, were seconded to the inspection board, that matter again is at present being reviewed. If their work is necessary on the board it is proposed that the organization will absorb them and they will cease to be seconded from one of the services.

In a consideration of the requirements for inspection during peace time, it must be borne in mind that the inspection organization was an integral part of our war production scheme. However, the extent of its activities should not be related solely to the size and requirements of the armed services, nor does the fact that these services are being considerably reduced decrease by so much the activities of the board. In the assignment of duties to the inspection board this has been taken into consideration. But another factor which has been considered is the coordination of inspection facilities with other government departments. Furthermore, in addition to its normal direct inspections, the board is also required to carry out such development or trial and test work as it may be expedient to allot to it. I can assure the hon. member that such research work—it may be laboratory work—which may be done by the board is not such as is duplicated in the other research establishments, under either the army or national research, but that in fact the creation of the defence research and development sub-department of national defence has in mind the coordination of the research work in order not to permit such duplication to take place.

Mr. LENNARD: May I refer the parliamentary assistant to the fact that for the item in connection with machine guns, rifles, et cetera there is no amount required this year, and also that many of these proving grounds where shells and armaments were inspected have been closed down.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is not any item this year for that.

Mr. LENNARD: I said that, but I am just answering the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was not my intention to say anything here, but I am not going to let the Minister of Veterans Affairs get away with calling "communism" when confronted with arguments that he cannot answer. I happen to know the hon. member for Skeena well. I know the hon. member is not a communist, and it is not communism to warn this house that we are living in the age of the atomic bomb; it is not communism to urge that we make full use of the united nations; it is not communism to urge this house that we should plan our affairs so that we shall avoid some of the disasters of the kind we have got into in the past. None of these things is communism.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs says that he is one of those people to whom this democracy has been very good. I, too, am one of those people to whom this democracy has been very good. But there are people in this country to whom this democracy has not been good. That is not necessarily the fault of democracy. There are two kinds of people to be feared: those whom a system has treated too well, and those whom a system has treated badly. One will try to keep a bad system which has been good to them, and the others will try to overthrow a good system which has not been good to them. It is between these two that we have, as intelligent human beings, to try to steer a moderate course. This term "communism" can be used so easily and so flippantly without any meaning. Just about a year ago no less a man than Winston Churchill was calling such a man as Clement Attlee, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, a communist, also Herbert Morrison, Ernest Bevin and those other men who to-day are doing yeoman work in the interest of democracy. Intelligent men should speak in intelligent terms at a time as serious as the one in which we are now living.

Mr. MERRITT: I want to ask the minister a very short question; will he say for what purpose Canada's post-war defence forces are being designed; to fulfil what purpose?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, I can answer that very easily. Canada's post-war defence forces are designed to provide, first, a representative group of all arms of the services. We need them now as a permanent professional trained army. In addition they are to provide a force to train the citizen army, the non-permanent active militia, the reserve army—whatever you want to call it—which has been the basis of Canada's fighting force in two wars and would be the basis of our force in any war we fight in the future, assuming we fight a war with an army, which I take it we would. The purpose of this relatively small force is to provide a small but highly trained and skilled professional force which can be expanded in time of war, primarily to train the citizen soldiers who would have to fight that war. That is about as briefly as I can put it.

Mr. MERRITT: Then, I understand, the permanent force is designed for training purposes only and not for the defence of Canada or for an overseas commitment. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, if—which may God forbid—we should get into a war in the next two or three years they would be available to the extent of their numbers, but obviously a force of eight or nine thousand troops together with training cadres and administrative personnel would not have any perceptible effect in any war that we can contemplate. So that I think we must look upon our permanent force as a small, highly trained unit to perform the functions which I have mentioned. Obviously, if our commitments under the united nations call for something more than appears to be now indicated we may have to reconsider our plans, but I think it is fair to say that we should try to make our policy as flexible as possible in order to meet changed conditions with respect to the type of armed forces that are needed, with respect to new weapons, or whatever it may be. There is nothing static about the thing. I do not think I can answer my hon. friend's question more directly.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister in answering my question need not have any heat in his voice.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not intend to put any heat into it.

Mr. MERRITT: My question was directed, entirely without any guile, to get some information which was not in any of the press releases.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not intend any heat; I may have been a little more forcible than was required.

Mr. MERRITT: Then I suggest to the committee that the minister's answer leaves open, as I thought it would, the whole question of the defence of Canada, and that we should not consider that these forces are in any way adequate or even designed to defend Canada in case her borders were attacked.

I want now to go on to another question. I have here two reports, dated May 17, with respect to proposed standardization of equipment with the United States, and in these press reports it is stated from "official circles" that a programme is under discussion between the Canadian government and the United States government for the standardization of equipment of the armies of the two countries and for coordination of training methods and military organization and a joint erection and staffing of defence and weather stations in the continental arctic zones. Would the minister make a statement as to whether or not there is any truth in this report, and if there is, what progress has been made toward such standardization?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I have seen the particular report to which my hon. friend refers. I know there have been a number of reports relating to the standardization of equipment between our armed forces and those of the United States and also those of the United Kingdom, and I know there was a group of officers and civilians from the United Kingdom out here some months ago who were looking over the field. I am sure there have been no definite decisions taken as to standardization of equipment. As I think I have said on other occasions, it is an end which we in Canada are extremely keen on; we should like to see it.

Mr. MERRITT: It is most desirable.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is most desirable. We should like to see, so far as it may be practicable, standardization of equipment between our forces, those of our neighbour to the south, and those of the other members of the commonwealth. Naturally, as a junior partner we are not in a position to initiate such a move, but we can do everything in our power to encourage it, and that is what we intended to do. Considerable headway has been made along those lines. I cannot conceive of any war we would be fighting in which Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States would be fighting on opposite sides, and therefore it is pretty self-evident that we all have an interest in standardizing equipment as far as possible in order that the industrial potential of our countries can be available one to another.

Mr. MERRITT: I entirely agree, of course, with the policy of standardization, but I should like the minister to tell the committee if he can, what is in the mind of the government as to high policy in this connection. Is it proposed to standardize on a commonwealth-United States basis or upon a Canada-United States basis, or would both methods be used? Is there any decision on the policy level with respect to that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can add very much to what I have already said. Both the United States and the United Kingdom are studying the matter now and we are studying it with them. There is nothing I can add to that.

Mr. MERRITT: My next question relates to the Canada-United States defence board. I understand that we have a military mission in Washington, a considerable establishment in London, and of course we have our own chief of staff here. In addition, there is the United States-Canada joint defence board which was set up during the war. Would the minister state how that board fits into the other activities which presumably are carried on separately from the actual board itself; that is, the activities of the mission in Washington and C.M.H.Q. and the more normal forms of liaison between countries?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will see if I can answer that, not in complete detail but in broad general terms. Canadian military headquarters in London is purely a wartime organization which is being rapidly run down and should be pretty well cleaned up by the end of the year. Just what our permanent arrangements will be in London, I am not yet in a position to say. Normal arrangements, as my hon. friend knows, with other countries are to have our military attachés with the embassy or diplomatic mission. They would ordinarily look after our military interests in a foreign country. In the United Kingdom the military staff would ordinarily be attached to the high commissioner's office. In the United States, in Washington, since some time early in the war, we have maintained a joint staff mission which has had representatives of the three services. That has been in addition to the ordinary military attaché staff at our embassy in Washington. It is proposed to continue that mission for a time at any rate, because it was found extremely useful during the war. It can handle matters rather more easily than can be done through the usual diplomatic channels. Just what the final size of the joint staff mission in Washington will be, I am not yet in a position to say. It is, however, being substantially reduced from what it was during the war. My idea would be that if it is continued as a permanent feature we should have one top man, a senior officer who might alternate between the three different services. At one time we might have a senior officer from the army, and then from the navy and then from the air force, with appropriate subordinates in the other services. The permanent joint board, as the committee knows, was set up on August 17, 1940, in order to advise the respective governments with regard to joint plans for the defence of this continent. It was created, as its name implies, to be a permanent joint board of defence, following a discussion between the late President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister (Mr. King), and the thought would be that it will continue as a permanent instrument for an exchange of views between the two countries, to advise the respective governments with respect to the defence of this continent. It is an advisory body pure and simple; it does not determine matters of policy. It is composed of men who have experience in military matters, experts in that line, capable of advising their respective governments, but it is not a policy-making body. From my own limited experience it seems to me it has performed a useful and necessary function and I would hope, and I believe, it will continue to do so in the future.

Mr. MERRITT: I wish now to turn to an entirely different subject, and that is the question of the non-permanent militia or rather the reserve army. Any information I have is to the effect that the reserve army is not getting men at the present time and that it is becoming very difficult for some units to keep up any kind of interest or esprit de corps with a slate of officers and practically no men. It appears to me—and that was really why I asked the original question as to the future purpose of the armed forces of Canada, what purpose they were designed to fulfil—that the most important thing the minister could do to help the reserve army come up to strength, apart from what I asked him to do this afternoon about going around drumming up some recruits for us, would be to make an over-all and public statement as to the role of Canada's reserve army in the future years.

The hon. member for Nanaimo pointed out this afternoon how that role might quite easily have changed from one of a force which would provide an overseas striking force to a force designed to defend the confines of our own country against an aggressor. It is my view that the hon. member for Nanaimo is very likely right and that is the real role of our reserve army, which the minister properly said is our chief bulwark of defence. It seems to me that if that statement were made it would have a very good effect in bringing men to join up in the reserve army. But so long as they do not know exactly why they are in the force, or are invited to join it, and so long as no one has asked them in Canada's name so to do, I feel that we may easily go along as we did in the first ten years after the last war.

I well remember joining the militia myself in 1929, and I like to think we were a fairly good unit. Yet there was a total of thirty men in the company to which I was posted, of whom fifteen men paraded, and that was ten years after the war. We increased that very much indeed in the next ten years when these young Canadians had a consciousness that there was a job ahead of them. I am quite sure that statement of the basic purpose of the reserve army and of the training policy which would be followed would do wonders to build up the kind of reserve army of which the keen officers who have taken up reserve army duty are thinking.

Assuming that by his one-man recruiting campaign and statement of policy the minister recruits these men, how are we to keep them in the militia? I have had considerable experience with that, a very happy experience in one way and an unhappy one in the other. It was a happy experience in the chaps I met, even though they were few, and the mutual interest we had in our unit, and a very unhappy one in the support given by the government to the effort which was being made by the officers and men in the reserve army.

What we needed more than anything else was, of course, the sinews of war, the money To keep a man in the reserve army you must pay him. He must have his pay. Before the war, as the minister knows, we just handed it over to the regimental fund to pay for the light in the armoury on the extra night in the week that we paraded. We were allowed to put on our lights one night in the week. If we wanted to use them for two nights the men put up their pay for it and for other barrack purposes. I think it might be a good idea, if it could be arranged, that men training in the reserve army be paid a day's pay for each parade, and be paid perhaps more frequently than the way we got it before the war, which was once a year. Of course we never saw it; the exceptional time we did see it we blew it in all at once. It would be a great advantage to the men to know they would get that cash periodically. It would be a splendid way of helping the officers to keep the turnout on parade up to scratch during the training season.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It cost every officer lots of money in the old militia days.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister is indeed right; it cost every officer a considerable sum out of his own pocket. I was not making much money and therefore I did not pay much out, but I paid out much more than I could afford.

The next important thing is to provide the men with training equipment. In an infantry battalion before the war we had six Lewis guns. The rifles, such as we had, were not allowed out of the armoury. They were filled up with grease. No man could ever learn how to look after his rifle because he was not allowed to look after it. Further than that, there were not enough to go round. We have now all sorts of much more modern training equipment. I hold in my hand a newspaper clipping. I follow the minister from Cornwall to Ottawa and to the other places where he gives these press releases.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was a speech I made at Cornwall, not a press release.

Mr. MERRITT: It suggested that only fifty per cent of the reserve army will be recruited and that apparently equipment will be provided for only fifty per cent in the case of the infantry; and in the case of the artillery and armoured regiments only thirty-three per cent of the equipment will be provided. I take it, from the fact that we are having only fifty per cent of the men, that they will get only thirty-three per cent of the fifty per cent.

Mr. ABBOTT: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. MERRITT: I am quoting from an Ottawa press release dated April 16. If I am not making myself clear I shall read it. It says:

> About 50 per cent of the reserve force will be recruited so equipment will be provided for 90,000 troops during the initial period of organization.
> The reserve force infantry will be armed with 100 per cent of its equipment; the artillery and motors 33⅓ per cent; field and medium artillery, 50 per cent; anti-aircraft artillery, 25 per cent; armoured fighting vehicles, a small scale of tanks and self-propelled guns.

I suggest to the minister that this year, if ever, is the time for a more generous scale of equipment for training purposes to be provided to these units. I think he knows and I know that when we get rid of the demobilization vote in these estimates there will not be as much money available for the armed forces as there is this year. It seems to me that when you take into consideration wear and tear and breakages in training the thing to insist on for the reserve army is a much higher percentage of equipment than thirty-three per cent of fifty per cent. I assure the minister that in a reserve army the presence of training equipment is the thing that makes the training go. When you are doing it as regular soldiers you cannot improvise and imagine everything, and with a Monday-night soldier it becomes altogether too difficult. If you do not have the equipment the simple answer is that you do not train in that particular arm. The probability is that the battalion does ceremonial drill where you otherwise might be doing training on one of the weapons.

The next suggestion I wish to make is that the time element is important in the training of a militia unit. You have two or three hours one night a week in which to do all your training. In that time you must have an inspection and roll-call and do a certain amount of administrative work. In the cities the armouries are downtown and the facilities for training outside the four walls of the armoury are indeed limited. I suggest to the minister that, as an aid to the training of the reserve army and to make the training more interesting there should be in each city certainly, and possibly in many towns, a troop-carrying company R.C.A.S.C., as a permanent part of the active or reserve army, which would be available to lift the unit which wants to go out of its armoury to train in the field. Thus it could do so in its training time and not be forced by lack of mobility to sit around in the armoury. I am sure that the men would respond and find their parades much more interesting and useful to them if they could take advantage of the outdoors to get some of their training and not have to wait, as they did before the war, until the summer camps to do their outdoor training. They never had a chance to do it at all in the winter.

The last matter that I want to bring to the attention of the minister has also to do with keeping the men interested in the reserve army. I refer particularly to another means of transportation, namely boots. Before the war we had a very difficult experience with our boots. In depression times the men were wearing out shoe leather. We went to our camps in low shoes and all sorts of absolutely ill-suited footwear. It was a great tribute to the men that they ever managed to last out one of these camps with the kind of thing that they had on their feet. There was no free issue of boots by the Department of National Defence. I ask the minister not to hesitate to give a pair of boots to a man who joins the militia. The officers will look after getting his kit in if he tries to run away with them and does not attend parades. They have always done that with his other kit; and a free issue of boots with no reservation would be a wonderful thing for the reserve army.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt my hon. friend to say that I commenced that policy before the war, the free issue of boots.

Mr. ADAMSON: Did you ever get them?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: On repayment?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. MERRITT: I have no recollection of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think it was in 1938.

Mr. MERRITT: I am afraid it was not started quite early enough to come within my experience. This business of boots is a very homely subject, but there is nothing more important to a reserve army soldier. I want to conclude by telling the minister of the difficulties we had in the first three months after mobilization. Because there were no boots for the militia there were no boots for the active army. The particular battalion of which I was a member went overseas in December, 1939, and of course we had trained from September 1. We got our battle dress and our boots about one week before we went overseas. In the meantime we had to excuse men from parade, men who were keen and wanted to parade, because they were literally walking around in their bare feet, with only the uppers of their boots still in working order; and none were available from ordnance stores. Of course that is another reason why the reserve army should have boots during peace time.

Just to sum up, I am certain the minister will get a fine reserve army, which he has not now because he has not the men coming in, if he declares the purpose and policy of the reserve army and provides pay, training equipment, transport and boots. If he just looks after those five things I think he will have very great success; if he does not I am sure he will not.

Mr. ABBOTT: I want to thank the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard for what he has said about the reserve army; and I thank him also for the suggestions he has made, all of which are most definitely constructive. With him, I do not think we can over emphasize the important role the reserve army, the non-permanent active militia, plays in the military set-up of Canada. As I said a little earlier, it has been the backbone of our fighting force in two wars, and I cannot contemplate any future war in which it would not carry out a similar role. The young men, officers and other ranks, who give of their time and energy in training with the reserve army are rendering a real form of public service. I am glad he has brought that point forward, because it enables me to add emphasis to what has already been said.

We are going to try to make service in the reserve army more attractive than it was before the war. Rates of pay will be the same as those for the active force which, as the committee knows, have been increased. We now have available ample supplies of what to-day is modern equipment. It may not be modern a year or two years or three years from now, but it is modern to-day. We are not so fortunate with respect to accommodation. I realize that in a great many centres there are not suitable quarters for reserve army units, and it is difficult to ask men to turn out and train when they are not furnished with the proper surroundings in which to do so. At the moment we cannot do very much about that, because with the existing shortage of labour and materials it just is not possible to do very much to add to existing facilities in that respect. That handicaps us, too, on this question of equipment. One of our most serious difficulties to-day is to provide suitable storage space for the very large quantity of mechanized and motorized equipment used in a modern unit; and we have that difficulty all over the country. That is one reason, among others, why it is not possible to issue full equipment according to the establishment for all reserve army units, because in a great many cases there is simply no place to store it.

I do not know that I can comment in detail on the other points raised by my hon. friend. As I say, I think all the suggestions he has made are decidedly of a constructive nature, and I can assure him they will be given careful consideration both by myself and by the officers of my department.

Mr. MUTCH: I am not so unwise as to attempt, in the presence of so many distinguished soldiers, to discuss the technical aspects of a defence force. But I do consider myself competent to say a few words about the problems relating to personnel; and on that account I am grateful to the honourable and gallant member who has just spoken for bringing the discussion back from the stratosphere to the man who wears the boots. In what the hon. member said to the minister he wisely emphasized the importance of maintaining interest and esprit de corps in the army which he called the Monday-night army. We used to call it the Friday-night army; but it is the same army, the chaps who come out once a week.

At the moment it is true, as it was true after the last war and as it will be for some little time yet, that much of the glamour is gone from the uniform, so far as those who have seen actual service and those who are older members are concerned. But if the scheme which has been outlined is to succeed in the future we shall depend eventually, and very quickly, upon the chaps who are now fourteen or fifteen years of age, in whom we must develop an interest in the non-permanent militia, or whatever it may be called, so that they will seek to join it. Those who have had some experience will realize the importance of boots, the importance of being properly shod. Those who have had the experience of being improperly shod will never forget it. In my judgment it is absolutely true that it is necessary to offer the young fellows of this generation, as it would have been wise with a previous generation, the inducement of pay to make it possible and profitable for them to sacrifice their leisure time in training.

There is, however, something else. I do not think it is any accident, and certainly the fact has some significance for me—I believe it is a fact—that the first or second regiment to be mobilized in each district at the outbreak of war was a kilted regiment. When the Minister of Veterans Affairs rose to take part in this discussion this evening I thought, "Here it comes," but he got off on another tack and did not mention one of the most important morale building features of the army. A little later another Scotsman, the hon. member for Vancouver East, took part in the discussion. Again I thought, "Here it comes," but he too forsook the argument I am about to make and with which I am sure both those hon. gentlemen will heartily agree. I refer, of course, to the restoration of the kilt. For centuries almost, the British army, under the influence of the Irish or sometimes of the Sassenach himself, attempted to abolish the kilt. It is true that during a period of the war they did succeed in getting the soldiers into these battle rompers for purposes of uniformity and for other well established reasons. At this moment I am not going to say anything about the use of battle dress under service conditions, but certainly there is no condition of training which will equal or supersede the experiences which members of the kilted regiments, not only in the British isles but in this country, have been able to endure. If you are to attract the youth of the country into the permanent forces as well as the non-permanent forces you must make the conditions of service attractive.

Something was said about the kilt this afternoon, and I was reminded of a circumstance in connection with one of the kilted regiments in the city from which the minister himself comes. I was there at the time; I know something about it. It was almost impossible for a Canadian of Scottish descent to get into that regiment, because there was a line-up of volunteers blocks long, composed of French-Canadians, Irishmen, and compatriots of that gallant Scotsman from Windsor who now represents Spadina in this house. The popularity of the kilt is beyond question. If anyone needs any further indication of that I would refer him to the record of the regiment whose uniform I have had the honour of wearing, although I never had an opportunity to fight with them. When they lost the kilt in Canada, and were put in what they used to call battle rompers, and were sent to England, the first thing that the rank and file of the regiment did when they got to England was to buy out of their store of money which, as everyone knows, was none too plentiful, sometimes at outrageous prices, a kilt, to wear when they went on their first leave.

There is something about the kilt which appeals to those with Scottish blood in their veins, which others profess to laugh at, which most admire, and which nearly everyone tries to crawl into whenever Highland regiments are open for enlistments.

I spoke about this matter at the close of the last session, when the minister said to me—very graciously, I thought, but not very satisfactorily—that the Highland regiments would be permitted to wear the kilt when they were walking out. Since when has the descendant of a highlander, or anyone acting in his name, been "permitted" to wear the kilt?

I do not make these remarks with any intention of being flippant or of amusing the committee, but rather to discuss a point which has been brought to my attention by representatives from a considerable number of kilted regiments in Canada. I think I can promise the minister prolonged, serious, repeated, possibly I should say endless raids on his time and patience until there is some recognition of the desire of Canadian youth, whether they be of Scottish descent or not, to wear what is traditionally the costume of fighting men.

I think one of the things that happened in Canada was that when we dismounted the cavalry we remounted too many of them on swivel chairs in various positions of authority. While I admit the distinction with which they served—and without spurs, in those places—I think they lost something of their appreciation for the traditional garment of fighting men.

Therefore I am not happy about the suggestion which has been made that they are going to continue to issue the kilt to the bands, and to permit the officers and other ranks to wear it while walking out. I know, from my experience and observation in the past, which of the cadet corps in the various centres were the most quickly brought up to strength. I know which regiments were, leaders in most of the districts of Canada, in the period immediately preceding the war. I know the ones which were high in their rating of proficiency, partly because they often had the greatest numbers. The reason they had those members was not unconnected with the historical privilege of wearing the kilt.

To the minister and his parliamentary assistant I would say that this is a warning of things to come. This matter will come up again and again and again, until you take those battle trousers away from the Highland regiments in Canada, and begin again to issue traditional dress. I speak, not threateningly, but as a promise. With all his undoubted ability and popularity, I am quite sure that the present minister or whoever may eventually succeed him will not succeed in downing this request.

There is one other matter which I think is important to training; perhaps I should say there are two things. The first is to sustain interest. One of the things which killed interest in nearly every non-permanent militia regiment or battery, or whatever it was, in the time between the two wars, was the lack of material with which to work, and a lack of changing and constantly modernized manuals of training. It did not take the bright lad who was interested in his unit very long to learn as much or more than his instructor, when the only things taught were those which were in the book. Consequently I point out the importance and the urgency of a constantly changing manual of training.

That leads to the other point, namely a constantly alert and constantly brought up to date instructional cadre. We have laid a great deal of emphasis upon formal education, sometimes unfortunately upon social connections, in the selection of officers and, in fact, the selection of rank and file in the permanent service. Someone has suggested that we have set the educational standards too high. I do not know whether that is so or not. They are idealistic. I should think that if we are to get the numbers we want we may have to reduce them to some extent. But there is one place I hope the minister will not reduce the requirements; that is, in this cadre. If we are to make of casual training something with a continuing interest—and reserve army training has to be casual—we must have good instructors. At the non-commissioned level we should have boy leader types, scout leader types, with instructional ability. I may be setting a high standard, but when a young soldier reaches the point where, with justification, he knows that he knows the score as well as the man whose official position it is to teach him, he may become dissatisfied, lose interest and quit. So that we must provide men who can keep ahead of these lads, or we will lose the interest of those who are there to learn. When you lose their interest, you lose them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will not take long, because I have not worn the kilt since I was nine years of age. I agree with what the previous speaker has said. We must not curtail the length of the kilt. After having listened for what seemed like about an hour and a half I wish to tell the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that if he follows out and models his future army after the 29th battalion, which won the last war, he will have sufficient reserves to carry him along.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Here come the Irish.

Mr. COCKERAM: I have been informed that in speaking this afternoon the minister made some reference to my calling senior officers at headquarters brass hats. If he will read the speech I made in the house recently he will find that I did nothing of the kind. If he will look at the remarks I made last fall he will see that I had a good word to say for them.

However, my reason for bringing up the question of officers and senior officers was that in my opinion there was a surplus of senior officers in the services. I think it is the duty of the minister at this time to curtail expenditures and to get down to normalcy as soon as possible.

Something has been said regarding commands. Five new commands have been set up. There are eleven district commands, and another one has recently been established at Whitehorse. It is my opinion that since parliament is going to vote money to have a permanent force and interim army of 25,000 officers and men, we shall find that a great proportion of them, instead of training in the field, will be carrying on jobs in offices, with the result that the actual training force will be limited.

I should like to speak with respect to some aspects of training. I was at Whitehorse recently, and I found that the Royal Canadian Air Force signals had taken over the signal services from the United States army, whereas the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals had, during the years prior to the war and during the war, carried on the signals services in the northwest, and had given good service to the people of that community. If there is to be a signal service in the northwest it should be run by one of the services. You can go right down the line and find duplication of services all along. One thing the minister should set himself to do is to cut out duplication wherever it exists. For example, are there to be headquarters for the three services in the city of Toronto, M.D.2, and the same throughout Canada? If so, it means that we shall have thirty-three district officers commanding the three services throughout Canada and a corresponding number of headquarters. It does seem to me—and I am sure that the hon. member for Nanaimo must have brought this up—that the commands are likely to get top-heavy. I should like the minister to look into that at the first opportunity.

I come now to the question of Whitehorse. I do not know what commitments Canada made regarding the maintenance of the Alaska highway. But there is a very small force of men in Whitehorse and, if that small detachment of men is to maintain the highway, it will not be long before it gets into disrepair. If we have to maintain that highway, that section of the country offers great opportunity for the training of engineers in bridge-building, roadwork and many other types of experience which they cannot get in eastern Canada. It is a great potential training ground, not so much for infantry as for the outside engineering services. I do not know what latitude is allowed to the officer commanding in Whitehorse, but I know a number of men in Whitehorse desired to get back into the service and they were told that they could not get back unless they were first sent to Calgary to take their basic training. The idea of sending them to Calgary for basic training, after they have been several years in the army, seemed to me a little stupid. I wonder whether the minister is going to carry on all these senior officers in defence headquarters as well as the districts—deputy ministers of this and that, holding the rank of major and brigadier?

Mr. ABBOTT: No deputy minister holds that rank.

Mr. COCKERAM: Every deputy minister is a brigadier, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not one of them.

Mr. COCKERAM: Then you must have replaced them in the last few days.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have never held that rank.

Mr. COCKERAM: I meant deputy branch heads, not deputy ministers.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; all directors are colonels.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is fine. Would the minister give us a list of the commitments for $25,843,524 mentioned in the item? The reason I ask is that the hon. member for Wentworth brought up this evening the question of the Canadian inspection board, and I am wondering why 1,180 men should be kept on the strength of the board to look after a small number of contracts. Will the minister give us a list of the items?

Mr. ABBOTT: Answering some of my hon. friend's other points first, I know he paid a visit to Whitehorse and had an opportunity of meeting at first hand some of our personnel on the Alaska highway. In April of last year it became necessary for the Canadian government to take over the Alaska highway, the northwest staging route, the air fields on the way to Alaska and the land lines providing communication with those air fields. There was no organization capable of taking on the Alaska highway other than the Canadian army, and the army agreed to take it over. We have set up special facilities, engineering units, to do that work, which is under the direction of Brigadier Walsh, a capable permanent force engineer officer, and, by the way, a graduate of McGill, which is in his favour. The air force naturally took over the northwest staging route and the maintenance of the air fields. The land lines were the means of communication between those air fields, and the air force took them on too. That required a considerable number of technical personnel, details of which my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air would be in a position to give. It was no easy task for the air force to take on. They were not anxious to do it. They do not want it now and they are keen to turn it over to a civilian agency as soon as possible. The same applies to the Alaska highway, although we are glad to get experience there for our engineers.

Mr. COCKERAM: I did not suggest that the highway be turned over to a civilian agency, but that it would be a good training ground for the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals, operating in the northwest territories.

Mr. ABBOTT: The Royal Canadian Corps of Signals continues to operate in that district, but we have not the personnel to operate the specialized job of handling the land lines between the aerodromes.

As to the inspection board, I do not know whether my hon. friend was in his seat when my parliamentary assistant gave some information about the work the board is now carrying on. May I add to what he said the general statement that the staff is being reduced and will continue to be reduced just as quickly as possible. But, as the committee will appreciate, we still have some 45,000 to 50,000 men in the services and they require considerable quantities of material. There are also a considerable number of contracts outstanding on which inspection work has to be done. But I am satisfied the staff will decrease pretty rapidly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I feel that this would be an opportunity under this general item to secure some information that I found some difficulty in the last few days in being able to secure. The matter has become almost an impenetrable wall of mystery. I am sure that the Minister of National Defence will be able to furnish at least a portion of the information that I have been trying to secure. It has to do with a matter that I have been asking questions about, connected with certain army rejections or medical discharges which allegedly were signed in blank by Major J. A. Elliott, A 19, R.C.A.S.C., at Camp Borden. In the return that was brought down, the answer given by the Department of National Defence was that this matter would be fully covered by the correspondence which would be brought down by the Department of Justice, and the Department of Labour furnished the same answer.

To begin at the beginning, possibly I can secure from the minister a report on any investigation that took place in the army in connection with these army rejections or medical discharges and also what disposition, if any, was made of Major Elliott as a result of the investigation.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow that question to stand for a few minutes because I have not the information here at the moment. I am advised that all the correspondence in the Department of National Defence was produced. I have no report here as to what happened to Major Elliott. I can probably give my hon. friend an answer a little later this evening.

Mr. ADAMSON: I want to say one thing to the minister with regard to the reserve army, or militia, or whatever name it is to go by in the future. I ask him not only to give the civilian soldiers an opportunity to have, to handle and to use the weapons which are considered modern at the present time, but, as new weapons are invented and manufactured, to allow the reserve army to have those new weapons. I say this with a particular experience in mind. A week after the fall of Dunkirk, and later, I was training with an N.P.A.M. and at Niagara camp, and we did not have any rifles which would fire. By a stroke of good fortune, the D.O.C., M.D. 2, at that time was able to get some new rifles, or at least he thought they were new; they were in their original cases; and the morale and enthusiasm of the entire battalion grew at a tremendous pace, until we opened the boxes containing those rifles and found that they were Ross rifles Mark II, or perhaps Mark III; anyway they had been declared obsolete and useless in 1917. But all the same they were "new" rifles. I have never seen anything which destroyed the morale of a unit so much. Admittedly they were new rifles, but we expected something quite different; what we got were Ross rifles made as far back as 1915, or perhaps 1914. At that time, after the fall of Dunkirk, the entire camp expected an invasion of the United Kingdom; and nothing could have damaged the morale of the troops more than the kind of weapons which we had in the year 1940.

So I say to the minister, no matter what new weapons are invented, let your civilian soldiers see them and use them. If there is another war it will be your civilian soldiers who will fight it. That has always been so in our history. We are not a country of great standing armies; we never can be; we are a country of civilian soldiers. So through you, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister, on behalf of these civilian soldiers who train one day a week, please give them an opportunity to use the new weapons. If there is a war, they will have to fight it. Do not supply them with old Ross rifles or the weapons of the Crimean war; give them an opportunity to use jet weapons, and, as the new science of atomics expands, let them, if possible, see the weapons it produces and use them. Do not condition your thinking as of the year 1945, when the last war ended. New weapons are being constantly invented, and it is a peculiarity of the human race that they will continue to be invented and will become more deadly and devastating as time goes on. Let your civilian army see these weapons and train with them.

Do not treat your reserve army as something that goes to camp for a holiday for two weeks in every year. Do not treat the camp as a social attribute or a social function. Your reserve army in the next war will require to be far more efficient than it has ever been before, and the men of the reserve army must have a degree of knowledge of modern weapons, the weapons which may be produced in 1948, 1949, 1950. You cannot all of a sudden start to teach them the use of jet weapons if they have had nothing but impulse weapons to train with. I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, that unless that is done the training of the reserve army will be largely wasted.

The science of warfare is moving at a constantly accelerated pace. We cannot afford to take another chance. If there should be a third world war we shall not have months, perhaps not even weeks, to prepare. Your civilian army must be trained; it must be keen; it must know the weapons or the prototypes of the weapons with which they will have to do the fighting. I ask the Minister of National Defence not to allow the reserve army of the next few years to degenerate,—I will not say "degenerate", but "deteriorate"—because there was nothing degenerate in the old N.P.A.M.; it was a fine force, but it did not have weapons. Nor did it have boots; at least my battalion did not have boots. We helped to provide them with boots, and for years the officers paid money to take them to camp. Do not ever let us get into that state again. Let us never again lower the guard of this country, for the enemy will be more vicious than man; the weapons will be more terrible than any we have yet seen. I say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister and to his staff, particularly the director of military training, keep up your training of the reserve army; give them modern weapons; see to it that they are kept keen, and also see to it that being a member of the reserve army is not a social function but a patriotic job, a job as indispensable to the safeguarding and security of this country as the highest of our democractic processes.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is a matter in connection with the selection of officers for the permanent army on which I should like to ask the minister a few questions. My information, as well as my experience, is that a certain amount of dissatisfaction exists among men who served overseas as officers, and there is a widespread feeling among them that there have been appointed as officers in the permanent army a considerable number of men who had no service except in Canada or in England; in other words, that quite a number of officers of the permanent army are men who had no actual battle experience and did no fighting. They have been appointed to the detriment of men who actually did fight overseas. I took up with the minister two cases which he will remember. Both of these men had special qualifications; both had applied for the permanent force, and both had been turned down on the question of age. One man was about a year over age and the other, nearly two years. I understand that a considerable number of officers who rose from the ranks and who did extremely well in the army overseas have been turned down for admittance to the permanent force as officers.

In this connection, I should like to point out that some of these men, while they may be a little over age, while in some cases their educational requirements may not be up to the standards now demanded, have a large degree of technical knowledge which I know personally it would be absolutely impossible for any man to obtain under peacetime conditions. One of these men to whom I refer served as technical adjutant of S.P., an artillery regiment, which is essentially an armoured regiment equipped with tanks. He was one of five or six such men in the army, and in virtue of his job he acquired a vast amount of technical knowledge which it is extremely difficult for any man to get, and more or less impossible unless he gets it under active service conditions. One of the men turned down for a commission was this very man I have in mind.

I do not care whether the national defence headquarters gets a man who passed with honours in mathematics or in any subject in a university and then trains him for four years afterwards, he will not be as good a man on that particular job as the type of technical man about whom I have spoken. It is a great pity, therefore, that this policy is being pursued. In connection with it I would ask a few questions. I think the minister has this case in mind, because I wrote to him with reference to it and intimated that I would ask some questions regarding it under the estimates. First, how many officers have been accepted for the permanent army?

Mr. ABBOTT: The number was 2,027 as at August 8.

Mr. HARKNESS: Second, how many of these have had service in Canada only?

Mr ABBOTT: Perhaps I can break that down. The number who served in theatres of operations was 1,140; the number who served in England for a year or more, 259; the number who served in England for less than a year but over sixty days, 295; and the number who served in Canada only, 333.

Mr. HARKNESS: I take it that out of the 2,027, 1,140 had actual fighting experience; in other words, about half. How many of these officers have had merely what we call a Cook's tour in the actual fighting area?

Mr. ABBOTT: None of these.

Mr. HARKNESS: And how many in actual fighting formations? Does the minister say none had merely the so-called Cook's tour?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. HARKNESS: My information is that a little more than half of the officers so far accepted have had actual fighting experience, and 240—is that the number?

Mr. ABBOTT: 333 served in Canada only.

Mr. HARKNESS: There were 333 who served in Canada only. I submit that when we finished the war we had the finest young men in Canada in our fighting forces, the majority of them at any rate having served overseas, and it is a serious lapse on the part of the Department of National Defence army that only half the officers had fighting experience, or little more than half, while 333 never left the shores of Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: A good many of those are specialists, R.C.E.M.E. staff and that sort of thing.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have already mentioned, however, that quite a number of highly trained specialists, men who gained knowledge by virtue of battle experience which cannot be obtained otherwise, are the very men who are being turned down. This afternoon the hon. member for Kingston City spoke of certain officers, and I have no brief as far as that particular matter is concerned, but the minister at that time made an interjection and said, "We are trying to build an efficient army". I was glad to hear that, but when I learned that upwards of half of the officers accepted in the permanent force had no fighting experience, while a considerable number never went outside Canada, whereas on the other hand men with a wealth of fighting experience, men who demonstrated their work, are being refused, then I say that the minister is not giving any evidence that the department is trying to build an efficient army in regard to the reserve.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will reply to my hon. friend briefly. As I said this afternoon, I do not personally select the officers in the army and it would be improper besides being impossible for me to do so. There is a selection committee in which I have confidence, who carefully review all applications for commissioned ranks in the post-war permanent force. I may say we have a great many applications, something over 6,000 already, and up to August 8 there have been 2,395 accepted. These have to cover all categories, all age groups, all types of service. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the selection committee is doing a careful, conscientious job in endeavouring to select the most competent officers for the post-war permanent force. That is all I can say. Lines of policy are laid down. Overseas service and operational experience are very much in a man's favour; nevertheless those are not the only qualifications, and I hope and believe that we shall have a competent, highly skilled officer corps in the post-war army.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many are graduates from the military college, and how many have risen from the ranks?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information but I could get it. A very small proportion would be graduates of the military college because it has been closed since 1940 or 1941, and out of the total of 2,395, I would think a comparatively small number were graduates of the military college. If I may hazard a guess, I believe a substantial number would be men who had started in the ranks. As I say, however, I am only offering a guess because I have not the figure.

Mr. MERRITT: May I interrupt to say that even those who were in the military college rose from the ranks, and they were fairly severe ranks too.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am aware of that.

Mr. FRASER: What are the regulations in regard to the use of army vehicles by personnel and those workers employed by the army? What I am getting at is this. In Ottawa as well as in other parts of the country army vehicles have been used for personal purposes. Here in Ottawa, I know of a couple of cases where army trucks were used to take furniture from a home in this city out to a summer cottage, and they have been used to cart stuff from one place to another, even beer to a man's home.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to have a case of that kind brought to my attention, because it is strictly contrary to the regulations. Every time we find out about it we take appropriate action.

Mr. FRASER: I have cases here that I shall let the minister have.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad if my hon. friend will let me know about them.

Mr. FRASER: I had correspondence with the minister in regard to an army vehicle smashing into a civilian car. If these cars or trucks are being used for civilian purposes, or not authorized to be used, the minister's department can say: "The use of this truck or vehicle was not authorized by the department and therefore the department is not liable for any damage." The minister said in a letter to me, dated July 5, regarding an accident:

> A very thorough review of the facts and circumstances surrounding the accident involving the accident to Mr. Long has now been made. It appears that the action of Private . . . in taking the departmental vehicle was entirely unauthorized.

Therefore they did not do anything at all about the matter and no redress is given to the person whose car was damaged. I do not think that is right. The army, the navy or the air force should be responsible if it is their vehicle which was responsible for the accident.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend will appreciate that the army is in the same position as any other employer. If an employee of a civilian firm takes his employer's automobile and goes out on a joy ride, and it is not for the purpose of the work for which he is employed, the employer is not responsible. Vicarious responsibility extends only if the employee is in the performance of the work for which he is employed. There is no difference there between the army or any other employer.

Mr. FRASER: These accidents have happened in working hours, because these people have taken their vehicles out when they are supposed to be on duty.

Mr. LENNARD: With regard to the matter of the signal corps in the northwest territories, which was mentioned a few moments ago, I wish to refer particularly to some lads who are stationed at Yellowknife. I understand that they have been there for over a year. I would urge the minister to draw that fact to the attention of the proper authorities and that these boys should have some leave. Some of them are married men and have not seen their wives for over a year. We are not now in a war period and these men should get some leave. How many men of the signal corps are in Whitehorse, Dawson City and Yellowknife?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to get that information and give it to my honourable friend a little later. With regard to the other point he mentioned, I shall take note of his remarks. We have had two or three cases of compassionate releases of personnel of the army stationed at Yellowknife.

Mr. LENNARD: I am not asking for release.

Mr. ABBOTT: Leave. I shall look into the question. I imagine that some of them are highly skilled men and difficult to release.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to refer to the matter of selection officers. The minister said selection was made by a personnel selection board.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is called a committee.

Mr. HARKNESS: Can the minister give the names of the officers who are on that board? I should be interested in knowing who they are.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give the names, but it will take a minute or two to get them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We have heard of the splendid part played by the artillery services in the peacetime army, but I wish to draw attention to what is happening to men who in the past joined the army with the intention of making it their career. In one case I have in mind the man spent years in the service and was within sixty-nine days of receiving his pension when he made application to be retained in the services. He joined the non-permanent forces back in 1926. Then he entered the permanent force in 1935 and joined up for the active service forces in 1939. He fought throughout. He rose from the ranks to the position of captain. Up to October 8, 1946, his pensionable service would be fifteen years and 296 days. He made application to join the army with the intention of making it his career. There has never been a black mark against his record. In fact all his service all the way through has been such that it has been recognized in the form of promotions from the lowest rank to the position which he now holds as commissioned officer. In spite of his efforts to remain in the army, he has been told he does not come up to the standard of some assessment officers or some group of officers who make the assessment. He is definitely out and he has no redress. He has been doing his best to find out what his crime is or what the difficulty is. All he is told is that he did not come up to the assessment, but he does not know the particulars. An example of this kind certainly works to the detriment of those who would like to make the army their career. He feels that he has been discriminated against, because he has examples of other men with less service and much lower qualifications, and certainly without the experience that he has had, who have been retained in the permanent force. It is utterly impossible for him to get any information. I suggest to the minister that, with that type of treatment, he is not going to get men to make the army their career, and this is the type of men who are needed.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will give me the particulars of the case I shall look into it personally. We do not keep men in the service solely for the purpose of giving them a pension. At any rate we should not do so. There may be cases in which it is done. There may be some injustice in this case and I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am not suggesting he is being cut off before his pension is due. I am sure the man does not want to remain in the army just to get his pension. I have already given the case to the minister, and his reply was that it has been handed over to a certain selection committee and that he has every confidence in it. And that is all there is to it. There is no redress for this man; he is just stuck. This is the kind of thing which does not reflect well on the officials of the army and which deters other good men from making the army a career, which it should be.

Mr. COCKERAM: There are two other matters which I should like to bring up. First, I should like to bring to the attention of the committee sessional paper 153-G, dated April 23, 1946. The question dealt with pensions paid to retired members of the permanent armed forces. I do not bring this matter up for the purpose of criticizing the pensions, but to show how actuarially unsound the whole scheme of army pensions is. These figures are only up to the early part of April. From September 1, 1939, to April 1 of this year a total of 235 officers who had been non-commissioned officers in the ranks in the early days of the war received pensions totalling $701,524.96. I imagine the figures are possibly double to-day. The reason I bring this up is that a non-commissioned officer as such pays nothing into the pension fund. Until they become officers there is no contribution. It is interesting to look down the list. One finds one sergeant-major, W.O.1, who retired with the rank of captain with a pension of $2,798.35 a year. Of the people included in this list, 115 are men who were in the ranks either as non-commissioned officers, warrant officers or privates in the early days of the war, and therefore paid nothing into the fund. I notice there is one man who is a private and who paid nothing into the fund. The pension he receives to-day is $2,273.25. I wonder just how long the pension fund of the dominion government can stay sound under those circumstances. When the minister brings in his new bill I think some study should be given the whole pension act for the permanent force. Where a man gives service, we believe in a pension.

Mr. ABBOTT: We shall have first reading to-morrow morning of a bill in that regard.

Mr. COCKERAM: The second point is in connection with the educational qualifications required of men joining the armed services to-day. I believe the hon. member for Nanaimo also mentioned that point. It occurs to me that if the minister desires a permanent force of 25,000 men, together with the surplus officers he expects, something will have to be done with regard to educational requirements, because I cannot see young men who have their senior matriculation joining the armed forces to spend the rest of their lives there. I believe the minister should take men with less than the high degree of education he appears to require to-day, and have a corps of schoolmasters such as they have in the British army to give these men part of their training along educational lines. It would be good for the men, and I am certain it would be good for the services. I would ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to the creation of a corps of schoolmasters to teach these men, so that while in the service their education may be brought up to a certain level.

Mr. ABBOTT: On the last question, we are continuing the educational service in the army to try to bring up the educational level of those who join the forces.

Mr. COCKERAM: Pardon me; in other words, you are reducing the requirements?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, not yet; but we are taking in a good many men, in several specialized corps, who perhaps do not have the minimum requirements we would like.

As to the question of pensioning non-commissioned officers, they had a statutory right to that pension, and we would be committing a breach of faith with them if, assuming they were no longer required in the army, we did not retire them on the pension to which they were entitled by law. In that respect we have paid the penalty, perhaps, for having such a small army before the war, because we were obliged to promote men to commissioned rank in order to use them as instructors and otherwise, who were not capable of holding those commissions in our post-war army. Briefly that is the explanation in that regard.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked the names of the members of the selection board. They are Brigadier Graham, deputy adjutant general of administration; Brigadier Gibson, Colonel Fleury, Lieutenant-Colonel Cherrier, and in each case a representative of the corps to which the officer applicant belongs. If he is a member of the infantry corps, there would be a representative of that corps, or the artillery corps, and so on.

Mr. LENNARD: There is just one further question I should like to ask the minister. When the Canadian government started recruiting for the Pacific campaign they set out certain advanced rates of pay for those who volunteered for Pacific service. Later certain personnel of the air force and those of H.M.C.S. Uganda were granted Pacific rates of pay, though the personnel of the Uganda did not volunteer for Pacific service. I am referring particularly to some three hundred army personnel who served in Australia and certain actual theatres of war, of whom about eighty or a hundred were radar personnel, radar mechanics. Has the department definitely decided what it is going to do with these men? Are they to receive Pacific rates of pay? They did not on demobilization, but will they be granted those rates?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the answer is that they will not; they were not part of the Pacific force. That matter was considered over some period of time; I think it came up on my estimates last year, and the decision was that they would not receive Pacific rates of pay.

Mr. LENNARD: Some are receiving those rights who did not volunteer for Pacific service, while on the other hand those who were expecting to fight in the Pacific war, just because they were a month or two ahead are being deprived of this special rate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wonder if the minister is in a position now to answer my question?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that to-day. I have made inquiries, and the only information I have is that the officer referred to, Major Elliott, is no longer in the service. I shall give my hon. friend whatever information we have, either on my own estimates if they should not be concluded this evening, as I would hope they would be, or I am sure it would be in order for me to do so when the estimates of national defence for air are being considered. I shall have to get the information in the morning; we do not have it here.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is another matter with which I should like to deal at this time; I do not think it has been dealt with as yet. It has to do with the men in the armed forces who committed military offences and were sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment. I brought this question up last fall. I am not now dealing with offences which would be offences under the civil law; I am referring particularly to offences under military law. Last fall I brought up the question of the setting up of a judicial or semi-judicial board, and the minister advised that a board had been set up under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay, with two distinguished co-members. That committee sat for a period of time reviewing sentences, and then I understand their work was discontinued. My question is, what is being done in reference to these prisoners who to-day are in gaols and penitentiaries, in regard to a further review of their sentences?

At the moment I have in mind particularly a man from the province of Saskatchewan. I am not going to give his name, though I shall give it to the minister privately, but his number was L-36119. He is of German parentage. He served overseas for two years. In the district whence he came there were several who found their way into an internment camp following their disloyal conduct at the beginning of the war. This man served throughout the Italian campaign, and later throughout the campaign in France and Germany. He had a fine record; he became a sergeant and then went over to England en route to Canada. There he became involved in the riots at Aldershot and received a sentence of three years' imprisonment. The provincial command of the Canadian Legion in Saskatchewan interested itself in this man, because while at the end of the war those who had been disloyal returned home from the internment camps, these men who served and who received very long sentences remained in prison. As a matter of fact I read over the evidence; and while in connection with military offences sentences are generally longer than they would be for civil offences of a like nature, I want to say that no counsel reading that evidence could but conclude that a maximum of three months would have been the normal sentence in a civil court. The provincial branch of the legion in Saskatchewan reviewed the matter and came to the same conclusion; and they came to the further conclusion that what he did at the time, impeding an officer, was the result of his nervous condition following service. It is the considered opinion of the provincial command that in his case the ends of justice would be met—and other cases are also mentioned—without any further imprisonment being exacted. I suggest this, that the time has now come for further review of those sentences imposed for purely military offences. I should like to ascertain from the minister how many soldiers who served overseas are to-day imprisoned, first in penitentiaries and, second, in the common gaols. In how many cases were sentences reviewed, and how many pardons granted, or reductions or diminutions in sentences passed by the court martial allowed? And a further question, in review, as to what further action will be taken in this connection.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not believe I can give the information exactly in the form requested. As at August 14 the total number of soldiers serving sentences and detention in Canada was 981. Of this total, about fifteen per cent, or 151, was for offences other than desertion or absenteeism, which would leave, roughly, 830 serving detentions for desertion or absenteeism.

The total number reviewed by the court martial board of review, which was presided over by Mr. Justice Mackay, was 1,895. Of those 1,895, those in which immediate release was recommended numbered 574; those where release was recommended at a future date, for remission of sentence, numbered 1,156, and those in which no recommendation for remission was made numbered 165. The cases of those still in detention are still under constant review by district officers commanding as well as by the adjutant general's department here in Ottawa.

Particularly in view of the announcement I made a day or so ago, it is my intention that a further complete review of all those ceases is to be made. I think the committee can be assured that clemency will be exercised in cases where it is considered appropriate. I shall look into the particular case to which my hon. friend has referred. He has given me the number, and I shall look into it personally.

Mr. JAQUES: I have a question to ask respecting pensions for the permanent force. When shall I have an opportunity to ask it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am bringing in a bill to-morrow to amend the Militia Pension Act. It will be given first reading, I would expect, and that would be an excellent opportunity for my hon. friend to raise the question.

Mr. KIDD: I do not wish to delay the committee, but I have been reading Hansard and I wish to make a correction. When the committee resumed its duties at eight o'clock I drew the attention of the minister to his policy respecting permanent force bands. I understood him to say that certain units would continue to have permanent force bands. Hansard so far—and I do not think the minister has had an opportunity to read it—does not reveal that. I thought the minister said that Canadian Ordnance Corps headquarters would continue to have a band.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say headquarters. I said there would be bands for such corps units as the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps and the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps.

Mr. HARKNESS: Having heard the names of the members of this selection board, I should like to say, first of all, that I could hardly disagree more strongly with them or with what they have done, than I do. I would strongly recommend to the minister that he call the members of this board together and have a talk with them over the matter of the selection of officers, to see if they cannot devise some type of selection system which will put into our army more officers who have had some experience and fewer who spent the war in passing red tape over desks—which is apparently what is happening.

Mr. ABBOTT: Probably we should appoint the hon. member as sole member of the board.

Mr. HARKNESS: You might do worse.

Mr. ABBOTT: You are too modest.

Mr. HARKNESS: I will say that I was extremely glad to see Brigadier Graham's name on the list. I presume his presence there is what has caused as many as 1,140 men who did see fighting to be appointed. It is too bad that all the members of the board have not had the same experience as he had.

I should like to learn from the minister how recruiting from the permanent force is coming along. He told us that we have 2,027 officers. How many O.R.'s are there?

Mr. ABBOTT: About 700 this last month.

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the total?

Mr. ABBOTT: The total to date, as of July 31, is 13,518 all ranks.

Mr. HARKNESS: In this 2,027 the total you will have, or are there still more to be appointed?

Mr. ABBOTT: As I say, the total to date is 13,518 all ranks, of which officers are 2,613, and the total establishment of officers when we are up to strength will be something over 3,000.

Mr. HARKNESS: I wonder if the minister could be a little more accurate. When we were talking about this matter before I asked the number of officers who had now been accepted for the permanent army, and he gave me the figure of 2,027. Now he says it is more than 2,600.

Mr. ABBOTT: The figure is for the interim force as of July 31. We have not taken anyone into the permanent force as yet.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is this figure of 2,027 the right one, or is it 2,600?

Mr. ABBOTT: I say that 2,027 is the number accepted for the permanent force. The figure of 2,613 is the number who are in the interim force. Probably the difference is accounted for by some of the remainder being still under consideration.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am glad to have that cleared up.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is eleven o'clock; eight hours is long enough.

Mr. HARKNESS: Apparently there are something like 11,000 O.R.'s in the permanent army. I should like to know something about their distribution, because I have it on very good authority that, as short a time as two months ago, the only permanent force field regiment we have did not have enough O.R.'s to clean their guns. They had to hire civilian labour. Perhaps that is still the case. I do not know, but I should like to. I am wondering whether all these 11,000 men are distributed around the country in offices of one kind or another, and permanent force units have not enough men to do even the essential duties.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—RETURN RESPECTING CAMP BORDEN ARMY REJECTION OR MEDICAL DISCHARGES

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have now had an opportunity of investigating that grave matter of a breach of the privileges of the house about which the hon. member for Lake Centre and several newspapers have been so seriously concerned.

On Friday last the hon. member, after reading the terms of order for return No. 258, said:

> A perusal of the documents produced yesterday shows that in spite of the fact that parliament passed the order without any qualifications that any documents should be refused, a number of the letters have been deliberately omitted and the file is in the position of having been stripped and denuded of four known letters, as well as others. The four letters which do not appear in the file are the following:
> (1) A letter from Mr. Robinette, K.C., of Toronto, dated March 22, referred to in letter of March 26.
> (2) Letter from Mr. Miall to Mr. Anderson, dated the 26th of March.
> (3) Copy of letter, October 12, from Mr. Robinette, K.C., sent to Mr. MacNamara, the deputy minister.
> (4) Letter of the deputy minister of justice to Mr. MacNamara, dated the 19th of October, 1945.
> These four letters are referred to in the correspondence produced, but have not been produced.

When the hon. member made that statement I felt, as I am sure all hon. members who heard it must have felt, that it must be serious or no hon. member would be making it. On examining the file this is what it reveals: two of the letters which were alleged to have been deliberately omitted, of which the file had been "stripped and denuded", which, according to the statement, do not appear on the file, are there and were there all the time. One of them is the letter from Mr. Miall to Mr. Anderson dated the 26th of March; it is document 4 of the file; another is the letter of the Deputy Minister of Justice to Mr. MacNamara dated the 19th of October, 1945; it is No. 6 on the file. The other two documents, being letters from Mr. Robinette to the Department of Justice dated, one, March 22 and the other October 12, are, as I explained yesterday, not letters from one department to another—which were the only things called for in the order—but letters written to the Department of Justice by a lawyer acting as such for the department and which, according to the invariable rule, are not produced in parliament. Now, if there has been any "affront to parliament and to the privileges of parliament", it would seem to be only in the fact that the hon. member has once again allowed his zeal about cases which he calls cases having "odoriferous characteristics" to outrun his discretion and has made, quite inadvertently I am sure but nevertheless without sufficient care, positive statements to this house about a document which on its face shows that the statements are just not true.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust you will allow me to place the record before the house and the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not at all impressed by the jeers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Neither is anybody else.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And truculence is no substitute for information. The attitude adopted by the Minister of Justice to-day indicates one thing, that there is a very good reason why the government, through the instrumentality of the Minister of Justice, does not produce the record in this case. And I am going to produce the record because it indicates this, sir, not only was there a deliberate attempt to interfere with the course of justice, but that it is connived at and approved and condoned by the Minister of Justice.

An hon. MEMBER: "Very loud cheers."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right: I will give you the facts and then I will read the record, and I will allow the country to decide whether it was I who made the mistake or whether it was my right hon. friend, who to-day participates in the concealment which I criticized the other day. Let me say this to him: I defy him to produce the record; I defy him to produce those letters which have been taken from the record. He dare not do it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He may laugh and hon. members may jeer. But to-day, when we speak so much of lawlessness in the land, lawlessness on the part of the government is as serious as lawlessness anywhere else.

Here is the record. In the first place, sir, I asked the question:

Have any criminal proceedings been taken or are any contemplated in connection with an alleged conspiracy arising out of the improper use of army rejection or medical discharges at Camp Borden since 1943?

The answer is no. The next question was:

Was the matter investigated by the R.C.M.P. and did they recommend prosecution?

Here is the answer:

The R.C.M.P. investigated and reported, which report was reviewed by counsel who was acting as agent for the crown in a prosecution case having to do with mobilization regulations. Counsel expressed the opinion that a review should be made by another counsel although he was also of the opinion that the reports indicated a prima facie case.

Counsel in question was Mr. Robinette, K.C., who I am informed was counsel for the prosecution in the case of one Lennox, on March 22, 1945, at the city of Hamilton, Lennox having been charged with having passed one of these fake medical certificates, and he gave evidence there that he paid one Joseph Bagley at the Humber Hotel in Toronto $1,200 for the certificate. He was charged with uttering a false document and received three months. My information is that Mr. Robinette, K.C., an outstanding counsel, set forth the facts and indicated that there was a prima facie case and then another counsel was brought in. What his report was it is not for me to say, but my information is that it too advised that there was a prima facie case.

Now we go on with the record. As far as the Department of Justice is concerned, Mr. Varcoe, the deputy minister, made sure that the responsibility did not rest on that department. Here is the correspondence from the beginning. The first letter is dated October 19, 1945:

Re: Major James A. Elliott, et al.
National Selective Service
Mobilization Regulations

Dear Sir: I enclose herewith copy of a letter of October 12 from Mr. J. J. Robinette, K.C., the agent of the Minister of Justice of this matter. I shall be pleased to receive your comment thereon.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) F. P. Varcoe,
Deputy Minister.

The order of this house was for the production of all documents. Is that order met by producing a letter to which an enclosure is referred and leaving out the enclosure which deals with the facts?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is not the letter which the hon. gentleman has just read the very letter which he said on August 16 was not there?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Sir, the record speaks for itself. I am reading the record, and it purports—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does the hon. member say that it hurts him to find out that it is there after he stated it was not there?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that he is absolutely out of order. It is the practice of the house, when a member receives an answer, to refrain from debate upon it. It is not supposed to be debated, nor is a statement made by a minister debatable either. I have permitted the hon. member to make his reply, but I thought that he would do so in a few words. I am prepared to allow a little latitude to the hon. member, but if I permitted him to enter into a debate on this question he can see what the result would be. Other hon. members would like to do the same.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely I have the right to reply to an allegation by my right hon. friend. I am putting the record before the house and the country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, may I continue to put the record before the house? Here is a letter dated November 13, 1945:

Mr. F. P. Varcoe,
Deputy Minister of Justice,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Varcoe:

With reference to your letter of October 19th relative to prosecutions of Brother Arnold and Major J. A. Elliott of Toronto.

I would recommend that this file be put away for three or four months and then the matter could be reviewed.

I am sure that I will receive the endorsation from the minister for this proposal.

Very truly yours,
(Sgd.) A. MacNamara.

After it has been put away for two or three months a letter is written by Mr. Varcoe a little later in which he sets forth the following on April 10. Your Honour will have noticed that the cooling off period had elapsed:

April 10, 1946.

Dear Mr. MacNamara:

May I have a reply to my letter of March 16, with reference to Brother Arnold and Major J. A. Elliott.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) F. P. Varcoe,
Deputy Minister.

Finally on April 16, 1946 Mr. MacNamara wrote to Mr. Varcoe, the deputy minister of justice, as follows:

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Dear Mr. Varcoe:

I have your letter of April 10th, File No. 146298 and I would recommend that this file be closed and that prosecution be not proceeded with.

Now there is the record; the omission of counsel's letter from the file, which was part and parcel of the file that should have been brought before parliament; the omission of all the other letters to which I have already referred. First you have the prosecution of Lennox in 1945; you have evidence there given, and you have the report of Mr. Robinette, K.C.; you have the report of counsel, as admitted by the government in its answer, that a prima facie case had been made out; then you have the deputy minister of labour advising the Department of Justice, first, that they allow the matter to remain for three or four months, and finally that there be no prosecution.

I say, sir, the record speaks for itself and the record establishes everything I said. What is more, the rights of parliament are still being flouted by the refusal of the government to produce the entire file in this case which, if produced, will reveal interference with the administration of justice, which ought not to be condoned in this house.

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS—C.P.R. EMPLOYEES PENSION RIGHTS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to table copy of the report of the industrial disputes inquiry commission established to look into the dispute between the Vancouver Province division of the Southam Company, Limited, and the Vancouver typographical union, No. 226. I promised to do so at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East.

As I promised the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on Saturday last, I now table the report of H. S. Johnstone, industrial relations officer of the federal department of labour stationed at Winnipeg, on the claim for pension rights by certain employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway company and associate companies. There are also a number of appendices having to do with this matter.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are tabled also?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

AERONAUTICS ACT

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR SEPARATION OF AIR SERVICES FROM RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply with reference to an order in council to which he referred in the course of the debate on August 17. He indicated at that time that an order in council had been passed advancing the effective date contained in section 14 of the act to amend the Aeronautics Act. I have endeavoured to get a copy of the order in council from the privy council office, but they do not seem to be aware of the order to which the minister refers. Will he indicate the number and date of the order in council?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): My legal department calls my attention to the fact that there was no order in council.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Just like the letter.

Mr. HOWE: It was a cabinet decision arrived at on February 16 last.

Mr. KNOWLES: The cabinet decision was taken under what section of the act?

Mr. HOWE: Under the authority of the government. This was the decision:

The cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the time limit for separation of control of air services from that of railways be extended for another year, i.e., until two years after the end of the European war.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege. The section of the act says that it must be done by the governor in council. There was no order in council, and therefore I suggest that the act has been violated.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It does not have to be under an order in council; the government decides in council.

Mr. COLDWELL: Without the authority of parliament? May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction, or the leader of the house, if either of these gentlemen means to imply that the government has authority to do what is not authorized by this house or by statute?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The government of the Dominion of Canada is a responsible body, responsible to parliament and responsible by answering questions on the floor of the house, and whether there is an order in council or not the government can take action and answer to parliament accordingly.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not the way the act reads.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of bill No. 368, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling):

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering subsection 3 of paragraph 3, and subsection 9 of section 13 of paragraph 4 thereof.

It is not my purpose to occupy the time of the house for more than a very few minutes. I simply wish to put ourselves on record as being opposed to the manner in which this measure as it affects cooperatives has been handled from the beginning, and to the form in which it is now found with respect to the taxation of cooperatives. If it was the law prior to the introduction of this measure that cooperatives should be taxed, and if the law was right, it should have been enforced. If the law was wrong, it should have been changed. But the government refused to take either position. It is leaving the impression with the private trade that it is going to tax cooperatives, and it is leaving the impression with the cooperatives that they can so handle their affairs that they will not be taxed at all. The government is simply trying to play both ends against the middle. The net result will be, if this measure is passed in its present form, that cooperatives will be turned into investment enterprises.

The three remaining objections I have to this bill I shall deal with very briefly. Some of the objections the government has already agreed to have removed, but I should like to refer to three remaining objections.

The first objection is to subsection 3 of paragraph 3, which I suggest with all deference is discriminatory. It provides that new cooperative organizations will be exempt from taxation for three years if they organize after January 1 next; but it does not provide for any exemptions for new organizations formed prior to that time but not yet three years old. I say that this is a discrimination against new cooperatives. If it is a good policy to apply for three years to cooperatives organized after January 1 next, it is a good policy to apply to those not yet three years old.

The second objection is to subsection 9 of section 13 of paragraph 4. As this now stands it amounts to nothing more or less than a financial farce. It will produce little if any revenue and its effect will be to destroy co-operative enterprise, to turn cooperative enterprise from its real cooperative function and try to make it attractive as an investment enterprise. The fact is that every cooperative wheat pool organization which pays out all its savings in the form of patronage dividends will now be taxed. A second fact is that if these cooperative organizations proceed to function by operating on borrowed money and by paying out their savings as interest and by turning themselves into an investment enterprise they can thus escape taxation. Therefore the net result of this legislation is one or other of two things—it will either tax the cooperative which continues as a real cooperative, or it will drive it out of the field of cooperation into the field of investment enterprise.

The third objection I have is to another aspect of the government's policy respecting the taxation of cooperatives which is not expressed in the bill itself but is found in the government's plan for taxing certain co-operatives for years that are now past. If the measure as it stands now expresses what the government wants to do with respect to taxing the Canadian wheat pools in the future, why does it propose to tax them five or ten times as heavily for two years that are past? If the law in 1944 and 1945 was to tax cooperatives, they should have been taxed. If the law was not to tax them, they should not have been taxed. If the government is now going to compromise, the only fair basis on which to tax them in 1944 and 1945 is that on which they have decided to tax them for 1946 and later years. But instead of doing that the government is proposing to apply a tax for the last two years which will probably be five or ten times as heavy as for future years. I asked once before, and I ask again, if the government had been bringing in this taxation measure two years ago would it have said that these cooperative organizations would have to pay five or ten times as much for each of the years 1944 and 1945 and then continue on this much lower basis for the future years? One has only to ask that question to get the answer. It would, of course, be no.

Now what is the situation? Because of this dispute three large cooperative wheat producing organizations which held back the payment of their patronage dividends for a number of years, held back $10 million or more, which, but for this dispute they would have paid out to their members, will find themselves in this position. The government comes along and says that it is going to tax them for two years on money which belongs not to the cooperative organizations but to the farmers. It belongs to the 150,000 farmers who by the policies of this government have been required to take $1.55 a bushel for their export wheat when it is worth $2.05, and to take $1.25 a bushel for their domestically consumed wheat when it is also worth $2.05. The policies of the government have required the farmers to accept these prices. The farmers accepted the government's policy patriotically, and now what is their reward? Out of a saving of some 3½ cents a bushel made by the cooperatives over the past few years, the government now comes along and says it is going to take about half of it in taxes. The government says it is going to tax the cooperatives from five to ten times as heavily for that period as for the future. Mr. Speaker, there can be no justification for treating these cooperatives in one way in regard to the past and in another way in regard to the future.

That is all I wish to say. I protest against the manner in which this taxation measure as it affects cooperatives has been dealt with since the time it was announced in this house, and I object to the form in which it now stands, for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to spend a long time dealing with this matter this morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. BENTLEY: I hear cries of "hear, hear" but I do not mind that. I would not take any time at all if I did not consider it a very necessary duty in the interests of the people of this country. Before saying what I had planned to say may I just remark in passing that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), occupying the position he does, being closer to the Speaker, and wearing a light coloured suit of clothes, caught the eye of Mr. Speaker before I did; otherwise I would have moved an amendment similar to the one he has moved. However, we shall take a little different attitude than that taken previously by the Progressive Conservative party; we shall support his motion, though the other day, when we had a similar motion up for discussion, they did not support us. I want to remind the leader of the opposition that everything he said here this morning is about a month and ten days late, because I set out the whole position in my budget speech on July 10.

I regret very much that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is not in his place this morning. When he was speaking the other day he took a tremendous amount of credit to the Liberal party for the growth of co-operatives. At page 4724 of Hansard, when this matter was under discussion, in the last paragraph of his remarks he said:

> All I wish to say now is that the whole record indicates that the real founders of the cooperative movement in the Dominion of Canada were the members of the Liberal party. Their policies have been behind the cooperative movement; they are still behind it, and when this legislation gets through it will have the support of the very people who my friends of the C.C.F. party are trying to lead us to believe are opposed to it in the province of Saskatchewan.

Since this matter has been under consideration, and particularly since the minister made that speech, I have had many letters from people in the province of Saskatchewan concerned with the cooperative movement, but none of those letters bear out the minister's statement that they support this action. The minister took occasion to refer to a gentleman who was very highly regarded in the province of Saskatchewan, Hon. W. R. Motherwell, and I heartily endorse every personal tribute he paid to that notable gentleman of the prairies. The members of this party take second place to no one in honouring and paying tribute to Bill Motherwell; everybody in Saskatchewan who follows things will do that. He was a grand old rebel, and in the front line of the farm forces all the time in the early days of the century, and he always had the interests of the farmers and cooperatives at heart. If he had any fault at all it was his loyal belief that his hopes could be realized through the Liberal party, and he tried to move that party in this direction. Because of his personal ability he achieved a remarkable degree of success, and we honour him for that. His successor, however, cannot lay claim to any such achievement. He has had to be pushed into every progressive movement ever undertaken in our province, and only the fear of the loss of votes ever made him take a stand in support of the progressive movement. So when he takes to the Liberal party credit for building up cooperatives he is far from the facts. The cooperative movement in Saskatchewan was built by the people of Saskatchewan, of all shades of political opinion. It is open to all people, of both sexes, of all colours, all races, all creeds. Those are the people who built it. Hundreds of them went out on horseback and on foot in the early days in support of these cooperatives.

If the Minister of Agriculture had been correct in his statement it never would have been necessary to remove the Liberal party from power in Saskatchewan. I want to give the house a little history in regard to the record of the Liberal party with regard to cooperatives in that province. A very close personal friend of mine, my seat mate, the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton), sat in the Saskatchewan legislature from 1938 to 1943, during which time he served on the public accounts committee. During that time the public accounts showed that the provincial government purchased large quantities of petroleum products for their power commission and other government departments, but not a dollar's worth during that five-year period was bought from the consumers' cooperative refinery in Regina, right at the seat of government. Nor did the Liberal government during that period give any business to any co-operative enterprise in the province except in those few cases where farmers who were on relief took their meagre relief slips and spent them at cooperative stores. Practically no government printing was given to what was at that time the only cooperative owned newspaper of that province, the Western Producer, owned by the Saskatchewan wheat pool. In fact their whole record has been one of lip service, with absolutely no record of active, good support.

The bill before us for third reading is a vindication of what I have said previously in this debate and what I am saying now. I have said before, and I say again, the introduction of the provision compelling a co-operative to show a three per cent profit before it can pay dividends and so on is in itself a clear indication of the antagonism of the Liberal party toward the building up of this great cooperative movement. Had it been my good fortune to catch your eye first, Mr. Speaker, I was going to move that this bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that it have power to reconsider the provisions already set out in the amendment of the leader of the opposition, and also those having to do with the three per cent tax on cooperatives. As I have said already, our group are going to follow a different line from that of the Progressive Conservatives or of the Liberals. We are not only going to give lip service; we are going to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, as we would have hoped—rather faintly—that perhaps some of them might have stayed in the house and voted for our amendment had we been able to move it.

Mr. A. W. STUART (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, during the discussion which has taken place on this matter I have sat quietly in this chamber and said nothing. In the county of Charlotte, as I have tried to point out in this house, we have a big fishing industry. During the past five or six years all those fishermen have paid income tax. By way of comparison let me say that in that county, with its population of 25,000 people, the fishermen have paid more income tax in the last six years than have all the farmers in the province of New Brunswick.

In my county there are four or five owners for each sardine fishing right. There is no reason in the world why those fishermen could not form a cooperative and clear themselves from paying income tax, like the farmers in western Canada are trying to do. I believe in fairness; and if one group in the country is going to be compelled to pay income tax—and I have every respect in the world for hon. members who will rise in their places and look after the interests of their constituents—other groups should pay also. There are hon. members in the house who would tax one class of primary producers although excluding another, and in my view that is most unfair. I believe that if every hon. member votes according to his principles he would vote to tax all the primary producers in Canada on exactly the same basis.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have held the view throughout that the budget legislation dealing with cooperatives was detrimental to the growth of a movement to which thousands of people in this country have devoted a great deal of time and attention, and which they have endeavoured to build up to meet their own needs.

On July 8 we moved a subamendment to the amendment moved by the official opposition. The official opposition of course had already moved its amendment, and in it there was no criticism of the taxation of cooperatives. May I point out that in our subamendment we said:

> That the budget fails in its tax proposals to recognize the principle that cooperatives are non-profit-making organizations.

I have been unable to understand why, at a late date, the official opposition suddenly picked up this view, a view they had officially opposed by voting against it. My experience throughout the years, when this has been under discussion, has been that Mr. Thorvaldson, president of the Income Tax Payers Association, so called, who was responsible for the circulation of thousands of cards in this country, and also the only Progressive Conservative member from the city of Winnipeg who sits in the Manitoba legislature, represents the point of view of the party rather than the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken).

However, I am glad indeed to have an opportunity of voting for reference back to the committee this morning, because that is precisely what we had intended to do had the amendment not been moved first.

I do say this, in the interests of open, free and frank discussion, that hon. members who sit in the house—on all sides of the house—who have expressed disagreement with the position we take regarding the taxation of cooperatives, should rise and express their opinions so that the country may know exactly where they stand in this matter.

I think this proposal transcends party issues; we have said that throughout. It so happens that this party, in common with others, and in common with other people in various parts of Canada, takes the view that these non-profit organizations should neither be taxed nor compelled, as the leader of the opposition has said, to operate as investment corporations.

To my mind, apart altogether from any other provision of the bill, the proposal to compel cooperatives to compute interest of three per cent on the capital employed strikes at the very roots of cooperative philosophy, cooperative thought and cooperative endeavour.

I shall not prolong the discussion, because I believe this matter has been thoroughly discussed, and little more could be added to it. I do say, however, as leader of this party, that we intend to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would say just a word on behalf of the Social Credit group respecting the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). I am not at all interested in the fight for place that seems to be going on between the two parties sitting to my right. It does not matter to me who receives the credit—

Mr. COLDWELL: Or to me.

Mr. LOW: —for the moving of this amendment. I find however that this group is favourable to the amendment proposed this morning. Because of the fundamental differences between cooperatives and corporations it is our opinion that, with justice and equity, cooperatives simply cannot be placed in the same category as corporations for taxation purposes.

We are definitely opposed to anything which would be prejudicial to the growth and continuation of cooperatives as a vital force in the Canadian economy. We believe the bill as it now stands before the house for third reading is prejudicial to that growth and continuation. We reiterate the recommendation offered some days ago by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when he spoke for the Social Credit group in this house. Perhaps I might outline quickly what he said. In the first place we hold that the government should withdraw the bill as it applies to cooperatives, and should concern itself for the next year with the drafting of a new cooperatives act, which act should carefully define what is meant by a true cooperative. In that act it should be made definitely clear that the wheat pools would not be required to pay income tax retroactively. The act should also lay down the conditions which in fairness and equity would make possible the continuation in the future of true cooperatives as a vital organization or group of organizations in the Canadian economy.

Because of the failure of the present bill to do those things, the Social Credit group will support the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not hear clearly what was said by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), but from what I did hear it would seem that he was saying something that has become familiar to those of us in Saskatchewan—that the great friend of the cooperatives is the C.C.F. party. That has been said over and over again, and anyone who has lived in Saskatchewan for any length of time knows that it is an attempt to put something across on the people of Saskatchewan and the people of Canada. Our people know, for example, that long before the C.C.F. was ever heard of, Saskatchewan was noted for its support—particularly under the Liberal party—of the cooperative movement. They know that long before the C.C.F. was ever heard or thought of, one of the greatest cooperatives in the whole world, the Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator Company, had had its beginning. They know that the Liberal party set up a branch of one of its departments of government for the purpose of promoting, developing, supporting and encouraging cooperatives.

We have been deluged with the suggestion that the present government in Saskatchewan is the first one in that province to have a department of government directly concerned with the development and promotion of cooperatives. Of course everybody in Saskatchewan laughs at that suggestion because the present deputy minister, Mr. Arnason, has just been given another title. Previously he was in charge of a department which had to do with the development of cooperatives, a branch of another department. But by changing the name and making him a deputy minister, by actually appointing a man to be minister of cooperatives, they tried to put the idea across that they are the first people who have actually intervened in the promotion and development of cooperatives. Every C.C.F. member in this house knows that for many years we had a branch of government under Mr. Arnason, the present deputy minister.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How large a staff?

Mr. TUCKER: How large a staff? We do not judge the effectiveness of our work by talking about the large number of civil servants drawn from all over the world who are there. Perhaps that is the idea of the C.C.F., and it looks like it. Consider the number of experts they have imported from all over the world. It looks as though they had no confidence in the home grown product; in fact I have heard them boasting about the number of people they have brought in from the outside.

I want to say, and I say this after some study of the development of political affairs, that any movement which feels itself constrained in order to develop itself to base its development upon fallacies, upon partial statements of fact, upon half truths, is bound to be found out in the long run. I want to tell hon. members that that is actually happening to-day in Saskatchewan. Mr. Arnason, the present deputy minister of cooperatives, has been an employee of the Saskatchewan government for at least the last ten or fifteen years.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As what?

Mr. TUCKER: As director of cooperatives. He is doing exactly the same work now as he did ten years ago under the Liberal government. There has been no real change of principle in regard to government support and help. The Saskatchewan government supported and helped cooperatives. In that regard there has been nothing but misrepresentation of the facts. That cannot be denied, and every hon. member knows it. They know also that public moneys are being spent by the Saskatchewan government to propagate that idea all across that country, that half truth, that misrepresentation. I say to the C.C.F. party that if they have to base themselves upon half truths like that they are not going to get very far in the long run.

I come back again to the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, one of the greatest grain handling cooperatives that had ever been developed anywhere in the world up to the time of its being taken over by the pool. Every C.C.F. member who knows anything about the situation knows that the Liberal government of Saskatchewan assisted in the development and promotion of that great cooperative institution. They know that they assisted in the development of the pool elevators, which also was developed before the C.C.F. party was ever heard of.

Mr. McCUAIG: May I ask the hon. member who said "for God's sake read your contract"?

Mr. TUCKER: The man who said that asked the people who were signing contracts with the wheat pool to read their contracts so that they would know what they were signing. Had some of them read their contracts perhaps they would have known that they were agreeing to join a cooperative institution to which they were pledging themselves to deliver their wheat for a definite period of years—three years I think it was. Perhaps had they read those contracts many who signed them would not have claimed later on that they did not know what was in them and refuse to carry them out. I do not know what was in the mind of the gentleman who said, "For God's sake read your contract", but I do know that that same man was the man who was placed in charge of the Saskatchewan Cooperative Elevator Company and who brought it from small beginnings to the place where it became one of the greatest farmer-owned and cooperatively-controlled grain handling institutions in the whole world.

One of the bases of the development of the C.C.F. movement in Saskatchewan has been the pretence that some of the great servants of the farmers and of the cooperative movement were at heart really not their friends. I have listened to the maligning of great founders of the cooperative movement such as the late Mr. Motherwell.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody maligned him.

Mr. TUCKER: Oh, yes; I have heard him maligned all over Saskatchewan by the C.C.F. who claimed that they were the friends of the cooperatives, that they were the friends of the farmer, and that this man who had given his whole life to the service of the farmers and the service of the cooperatives had sold out, that he was a traitor to the west. We have heard those claims in the west about people who served the west.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. TUCKER: I can understand that hon. members hate to be told the truth, because it is coming home a little bit too close. That is the whole trouble. Every C.C.F. member knows that one of the bases on which that movement is founded is the pretence that the people who faithfully tried to serve the farmers and the cooperative movement turned against them. I want to tell them this—

An hon. MEMBER: Wait until you get to Saskatchewan.

Mr. TUCKER: I am anxious to get there and tell them.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you go? You have a chance.

Mr. TUCKER: When I get there some of these half truths and misrepresentations are going to be nailed. Every hon. member here knows that what I say is the truth. One of the reasons why the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) supported the Liberal party in days gone by was that he was a great supporter of the cooperative movement. He cannot deny that; I defy him to deny that. I repeat that every man in this house from Saskatchewan knows that the Liberal government of Saskatchewan—

Mr. BENTLEY: What Liberal government of Saskatchewan?

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend was another who supported the Liberal government of Saskatchewan and voted for it because he was a believer in the cooperative movement. There is a proud history behind the Liberal party in Saskatchewan in regard to its support of cooperatives.

Mr. KNOWLES: A long way behind it.

Mr. TUCKER: I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he reminds me of a meeting which I attended in Rosthern, my home town, and which was addressed by a man for whom I have the greatest respect, the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). I remember that one of my arguments at that time was that if liberal-minded men, men who did not believe in socialism but who believed in advanced Liberalism, in reform, would stay in the Liberal party and help fight to make that a real party of reform instead of splitting the forces of Liberalism, we might accomplish what we would not be able to otherwise. My hon. friends of the C.C.F. remember that. It is upon that basis that I have modelled my life in politics.

An hon. MEMBER: He was a Tory.

Mr. TUCKER: No, I do not think the leader of the C.C.F. was a Tory.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes, he was.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was before I cut my political teeth.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member had good judgment then.

Mr. TUCKER: Before you cut your political teeth—

Mr. HOMUTH: Now he has lost his teeth altogether.

Mr. TUCKER: I found that at that time the hon. member seemed to believe that the salvation and the whole hope for the future lay not in the reform of our present system, but in the government taking over the ownership and control of all means of wealth production. That is laid down in their platform.

Mr. HOMUTH: You had better move over with the C.C.F.

Mr. TUCKER: Don't worry; I do not belong to them and I never did. That was the beginning of the C. C. F. party. All liberal-minded people had to look into the situation very carefully, and I tried to do it. I said to myself that a party is what the members of it make it; that if all liberal-minded men throughout Canada would join the Liberal party they could make it exactly the type of Liberal party they wanted to make it.

Mr. JAENICKE: Did you ever try it?

Mr. TUCKER: There was this new organization—I know hon. members hate to hear this, because it must bring back searchings of conscience to any people who are conscientious about such things. The point that had to be decided was, am I a Liberal and do I believe in the reform of our present system; or do I intend to start to destroy the foundations of our present system under the pretence that I am advocating reform? I say this to hon. members opposite that when they fight and work to get the support of reformers, of people who believe in the reform of our present system, in order to put into power people who believe in socialism and want to destroy the present system by taking over all the means of wealth production, they are preaching something which is fundamentally false.

Mr. BURTON: Who is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. TUCKER: I am talking about the C.C.F. The hon. member understands only too well. I can say that he is one who, I am sure, must be struggling with his conscience day after day; because the hon. member for Humboldt, if I mistake not, is not a socialist. If he is a socialist, let him get up and say so; if he is not a socialist, he should not be in the C.C.F. party. I say this to the hon. member for Humboldt, that when he asks people to join a party that believes in socialism, on the pretence that it is a reform party, he is getting them into his party on false pretences.

Mr. BURTON: That is not right. I object to the hon. member saying that I induce people by false pretences to belong to this party.

An hon. MEMBER: Come over here.

Mr. TUCKER: Let the hon. member tell us whether he is a socialist.

An hon. MEMBER: And let him say why he has joined the socialist party.

Mr. BURTON: I am a socialist according to my conscience, and maybe that is more than the hon. gentleman can say—

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member sidestepped the question whether he is a socialist or not. The basic principle of the C.C.F. party is that they will not rest until they have eradicated capitalism and established a full programme of socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear!

Mr. TUCKER: I notice that the hon. member for Humboldt did not applaud that. Once the people of Saskatchewan know the sort of basis upon which they are being asked to join the socialist party—

Mr. MacINNIS: They know it now.

Mr. REID: But they won't tell the farmer.

Mr. TUCKER: —and when they realize where it is leading, they will reject that party. Let me tell the hon. member for Humboldt that he cannot kid himself. If he thinks that the people of Saskatchewan believe what he believes in, let him tell them what he actually believes in, and it will finish the C.C.F. party in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PROBE: You hope!

Mr. REID: They are soft-pedalling socialism to the farmers.

Mr. TUCKER: Let him (Mr. MacInnis) go out to Saskatchewan and make some of the speeches he makes in this house, if he believes in socialism. I give the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) credit for believing in the principles of the party he supports. He believes in socialism, and when he asks people to join the socialist party—

Mr. MacINNIS: I would not.

Mr. TUCKER: He is working for things he believes in. But let him go to Saskatchewan and preach the same doctrine and see what happens to his party.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. member believe in the legislation which is now before this house with respect to the taxation of cooperatives?

Mr. TUCKER: I will answer that very shortly. It brings me back to the little meeting which I started to talk about. I said to the hon. member leading the C.C.F. party to-day that there were just about enough Liberals in this country to fight the forces of reaction.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where are they?

Mr. TUCKER: A good many of them are here; I will tell you that; and they are not vitiating their desire for reform by pretending not to be socialists and at the same time actually being socialists in fact. You cannot be a socialist and a true reformer of our system at the same time. Once you go far enough along the lines of socialism, along the line of bringing in state control of the means of wealth production and of the ownership of the natural resources of the country, you have got to the point where the government is so all-powerful that there is no possible distinction between it and a communist dictatorship.

Mr. KNOWLES: Come on, answer the question.

Mr. TUCKER: Once your government owns the means of wealth production, once it owns the assets of the country, I defy any C.C.F.'er to tell me the difference between that and communism.

Mr. REID: Get up and tell us.

Mr. TUCKER: That is why I say that the C.C.F. is the way-maker for communism.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then why not encourage cooperatives?

Mr. TUCKER: The C.C.F. is not a party of real reform; it is a party which is moving back towards dictatorship by way of loss of personal liberty, and all the rest of the processes which are associated with dictatorship.

Mr. BENTLEY: What has this to do with the tax on cooperatives?

Mr. TUCKER: I am coming back to that question. One of the amazing features of the situation is this, and it is coming to a head in Saskatchewan—

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't forget the question.

Mr. TUCKER: The Wawanesa is one of the oldest mutual life companies in the west.

Mr. COLDWELL: Fire insurance.

Mr. TUCKER: Fire insurance—right. It had many policies on school buildings throughout Saskatchewan. What did the present socialist government of Saskatchewan do? Because it gave a grant to the schools of Saskatchewan, it insisted on these schools taking that business away from this cooperative company and giving it to a government-owned company.

An hon. MEMBER: Bribery.

Mr. TUCKER: Is not that dictatorship?

Mr. BENTLEY: No; he said it was bribery.

Mr. TUCKER: I know that when I mention that it is seemingly funny. But is it not striking at true cooperation? That action of the Saskatchewan government is not true cooperation. These individuals banded themselves together and worked together to help cooperation along.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what Saskatchewan is doing.

Mr. TUCKER: When the state steps in and forces the schools to take business away from a cooperative company and give it to the government, is that true cooperation? And that is just the beginning. I repeat, that is just the beginning. They have not started yet. If Saskatchewan to-day is one of the greatest cooperative provinces it is largely due to what a Liberal government has done in the past.

An hon. MEMBER: In spite of it.

Mr. TUCKER: Hon. members may laugh at that, but they know in their hearts that it is true. The present government is beginning to take over control of other businesses as it has done of insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Horses.

Mr. TUCKER: Then what is going to happen to the cooperatives of Saskatchewan?

Mr. KNOWLES: What is going to happen under this legislation? Do you believe in it?

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend is very anxious to hear about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you believe in it?

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend's anxiety to hear about it brings me back to this meeting. I said to the leader of the C.C.F. that there are just enough Liberals in this country—

Mr. KNOWLES: That is all.

Mr. TUCKER: —to hold their own.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To form a government.

Mr. TUCKER: And over there we see some people who may pretend to be Liberals but are really masquerading and are actually socialists, or vice versa; nobody knows what they are. They have got to be one thing in one place and another thing in another in order to catch votes. But what are they in their hearts? Where do they stand? Where does the hon. member for Humboldt stand in connection with the interference with the Wawanesa company, when the government takes insurance away which the people wanted to go to a cooperative and insists that it be given to the government?

Mr. BURTON: What about all the other businesses?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member is wrestling with his conscience, unless he has almost managed to kill it and thus perhaps give himself some sort of ease of mind. However I do not think he has killed his conscience. He is one of those whom I am hoping to see rejoin the Liberal party, which his hon. leader himself seems to be thinking about so much.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite the opposite.

Mr. TUCKER: When I think of the remarks I have heard as to joining our party—

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't forget my question.

Mr. TUCKER: The leader of the C.C.F. party must be a true Liberal at heart, and if so I can understand his preoccupation about rejoining the Liberal party, and in that attitude he is right. I would say to the hon. member for Humboldt: Listen to the teachings of your conscience.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Be a little more definite than that.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, let him listen to his conscience. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Humboldt are not true socialists, if they do not believe in paving the way for this country to be a communist country, if they do not believe in that, then what have they done?

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't forget to answer the question. Your time is running out.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friends have persuaded many true Liberals to turn down good things, they have persuaded sincere reform Liberals from Saskatchewan to turn down those things, and you have the result over there—people who do not know whether they are Liberals or Socialists, people who, when it comes to a question of true Liberalism, still have to try to meet other people like the member for Vancouver East half way, because they cannot let him down. And then he of course has to be careful about what he says in Saskatchewan for fear of letting them down. There is no doubt about it. And what is the result? I want to say this, Mr. Speaker: If it had not been that we had eighteen C.C.F.'ers in this house from Saskatchewan, which pleases the hon. members; if we had eighteen Liberals here instead, I want to tell hon. members that in the councils of our party this thing would have been fought out and I think this particular clause in regard to the tax on a minimum income of three per cent would not be here. It bears out what I have said many times, that by splitting the force of Liberalism, by getting people to join other parties, they have weakened the forces of Liberalism in the country, and particularly is it so in regard to western Liberalism. Western Liberalism has been in the past and will be in the future one of the real forces for progress and true Liberalism in Canada. The place of Liberalism is not in a truncated opposition that sits there year after year, session after session, pretending to be the friend of reform, but actually being led by people who believe in socialism, people who are not making a real contribution to the formation of the policies of the country. I admit that some of them have the ability to make good speeches. I admit they can appear in the eyes of the country as putting up a real fight. But if they believe in reform and Liberalism they should be in the party that can do something.

Mr. IRVINE: And vote for this bill.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking. I know this argument may bother him. He hates to hear it, but he and his ilk will hear it and they will hate it worse and worse in the days that lie ahead in Saskatchewan. Nevertheless the truth will be spoken; it will not be silenced by derision and sneers and laughter. The truth will be heard in Saskatchewan.

And now I wish to say a word to the hon. member for Swift Current. If the true Liberals who should have been in this house as representatives of Saskatchewan had been on this side it could have modified this legislation. There is great anxiety as to how I am going to vote. Well, I feel so strongly against this particular provision that I do not really know what I should do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Now who is battling with his conscience?

Mr. TUCKER: I know that statement of honesty amuses hon. members; it amazes them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Amazes is right.

Mr. TUCKER: Because, of course, they are so ready to take their conscience out of the corner and kill it, voting for everything they are told to vote for, that any simple statement of fact surprises them. I want to say that on this particular principle I would gladly vote to take out this three per cent principle because I never believed in it and do not believe in it now. But there is more than that involved—other useful sections of this act; and also my hon. friends know very well that this is parliamentary government, and I would rather have—

Mr. KNOWLES: Who is battling with his conscience now?

Mr. TUCKER: —the Liberal party, with its great past and its record in the provision of social security in this country, unemployment insurance, old age pensions—

Mr. GRANT: And family allowances.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, family allowances, prairie farm assistance and all those great measures, not forgetting its programme, which it laid before the dominion-provincial conference, with all that it offers in the way of security to the people, health insurance, and so on—

Mr. KNOWLES: When?

Mr. TUCKER: I would rather have the Liberal party, which has not hesitated to lay that programme before the people, and which is ready to stand and fight for it, as no other party is doing to-day—I would rather have that party in power than any other. I hear it said by some people: "Why don't you call another conference?" Well, why do not those people who are talking say what they would like to do at such a conference?

Mr. KNOWLES: Why doesn't the government go ahead and act?

Mr. TUCKER: There speaks the dictator, Mr. Speaker. There is the dictator speaking. Why doesn't the government go ahead and act, with the provinces unwilling to agree? Yes. The hon. member would act all right; I have no doubt about that. He would tell them what to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: The people of Canada want better old age pensions, and my hon. friend knows that.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend believes in dictatorship, but the government believes in trying to get people to agree. The government believes in the constitution of the country, and not overriding it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do the thing the people of Canada want.

Mr. TUCKER: As I said, I want it distinctly understood that when I vote against this resolution I am voting for the general policy of the government. I want to see this government stay in office because I believe in what it has done and what it promises to do, and it is the only party that has a real chance of carrying out these great programmes for the benefit of the people in the future. Let me say to my hon. friends over here who do so much talking that if this government were defeated and a general election held, they know in their secret hearts that they have no chance of forming a government in the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: None.

Mr. COLDWELL: Sure.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend over there is too honest to say "sure" with the vehemence of some of his followers. Now, what is the alternative to this government if it is defeated on a measure like this?

Mr. MacNICOL: The Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. MARTIN: There is no Conservative party.

Mr. TUCKER: Did somebody say the Conservative party?

Mr. MacNICOL: I said the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. TUCKER: Where is it in Quebec, in Saskatchewan, in Alberta?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is strong enough in Ontario.

Mr. TUCKER: Where is it anywhere but in Ontario? Where is it in Nova Scotia, in Manitoba? Is there any hope of their forming a government without some dickering with somebody else, without some deal with somebody else, which might bring this country we know not where? Just let anyone answer me this question: What is the alternative to this Liberal party of ours?

Mr. MacNICOL: I repeat, the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. TUCKER: Where is there any hope for the future there?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, I would suggest that the hon. member address himself to the chair.

Mr. TUCKER: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. When I see such anxious faces across from me, anxious to hear what I am going to say, I am prone to forget myself and speak directly to them; but I hope it may be taken that when I look at my hon. friends across the way, in spirit I am looking at the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not fair to the Speaker.

Mr. TUCKER: I have hopes that the dominion-provincial conference will be reconvened and will bring forth the fruits which it should have brought forth in the first place had it not been for the opposition of certain people. I believe the only party that has any hope of putting the dominion government behind these proposals is the government of the Liberal party. I do not think there is any question about that.

An hon. MEMBER: How far behind?

Mr. TUCKER: That being so, no matter whether I like this particular little provision or not—little as compared with the bill as a whole—and I admit I do not like it; I admit I was against it; I admit that if I had ten or fifteen Liberals to support me in fighting against it, it would not be here. Where were they? They are across the floor—

Mr. KNOWLES: What an admission that is!

Mr. COLDWELL: Have you not fifteen Liberals in that party?

Mr. TUCKER: Not from Saskatchewan. I started out by saying that Saskatchewan has been a great cooperative province under the leadership of the premiers and leaders of the Liberal party of Saskatchewan since it became a province. Everybody knows where the Liberal party of Saskatchewan stands.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friends may make hollow laughs, but they know in their hearts that it is true. But here is the very situation that I pointed out to the leader of the C.C.F. in days gone by: that they had no hope of forming a government of Canada with a socialist party; that if he were a true Liberal or a true reformer he should join with others of like mind who are working to mould and reform the government of this country; but he saw fit to go off in another party. Now year after year and election after election they are making predictions that they are going to increase their membership. The only reason that they increased—

Mr. BURTON: It is gaining all the time.

Mr. TUCKER: Let us admit that was so in Saskatchewan. But when they went to the people did they not have a member from Ontario? They lost the only member they had. They had a member from Nova Scotia; they have him yet. They had some members from British Columbia whom I know well; they are not here. The only place in which they really gained was in Saskatchewan; it was a temporary gain, a gain based upon the troubles that we went through.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about Manitoba and British Columbia?

Mr. TUCKER: I would say to the leader of the C.C.F. party that he knows in his heart that his increase in membership from Saskatchewan is not based upon an actual acceptance of the doctrines of his party by the people of that province.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said so?

Mr. TUCKER: He knows in his heart it is true that Saskatchewan is not socialist; that the farmers of Saskatchewan are not socialists. He knows that his party there is a very ephemeral thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, he knows that; that is why he is talking all the time of going back to the Liberal party himself.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is not going back to the Liberal party; you wish he were.

Mr. TUCKER: There is the situation. And when I am asked whether I would rather take the great programme of our party in the past and its great programme looking to human betterment, human security, human welfare in the future, or by my vote attempt to turn the government out of office in these crucial times in our nation's history, I say that I will vote with the government in this, although I do not agree with it on this one point, rather than turn this government out of office.

Mr. KNOWLES: What did you say about conscience?

Mr. TUCKER: But I will say that I shall reserve the right in the days ahead to ask for a change in this section, and I hope—

Mr. KNOWLES: Now is the time to vote against it.

Mr. TUCKER: I hope that as a result of my work in Saskatchewan I shall send back or help to send back to this parliament fifteen or twenty Liberals.

Mr. KNOWLES: What a hope!

Mr. TUCKER: Who will sit within the Liberal party of this country to help to make it an advanced reform party and government which will set the pace for Liberalism throughout the whole world in fighting for the common man.

Mr. KNOWLES: Who is whistling in the graveyard now?

Mr. TUCKER: We in Canada are going to draw the line between the people who say that the hope of the future is in state control, state domination, and those who say that it is not. We are going to turn our faces definitely against that teaching, as they are doing in western Europe.

Mr. PROBE: Try it in an election.

Mr. TUCKER: Yes, I shall try it in an election, and with great success, I hope, because it is truth.

Mr. KNOWLES: When are you going to take the chance?

Mr. TUCKER: Already the truth is being realized in western Europe and in Great Britain. For example, the young people in the universities of Great Britain are realizing that socialism is the way back to dictatorship, the way back to absolutism, and that the hope of the future is in Liberalism, in reforming our present system. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the wave of the future is with us, the hope of the future of mankind is Liberalism, not in the hateful system of state dictatorship and state control. I will not support that sort of thing. I pin my faith to Liberalism, the hope of the future.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am sorry that the time of the house has been wasted for the last forty minutes—

Mr. McCANN: Take another guess.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You think so.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is going to be properly used now.

An hon. MEMBER: Wasted for the C.C.F.

Mr. GILLIS: —and I trust that I do not hear any more from the other side of the house until the close of the session about sitting until twelve o'clock midnight in order to conclude our business.

The speech just made by the aspiring premier of Saskatchewan—

Mr. MACKENZIE: You mean "inspiring".

Mr. GILLIS: —was completely out of order. It had nothing to do with the motion before the house. I think that ninety-nine and a half per cent of what he had to say—

Mr. McCANN: Is true.

Mr. GILLIS: —would have done him a lot more good in his ambitions to beat the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan than it will on the record, having in mind the discussion of this morning. There is one thing which encourages me greatly in his prediction. I saw him stand in his place in the house and shake his fist at us and say that Tommy Douglas would never become premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. TUCKER: I rise to a point of order. I never said such a thing, and I defy the hon. member to show that I did. I think he should not resort to that sort of thing to score a point.

Mr. GILLIS: I imagine—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You are imagining, all right.

Mr. GILLIS: —that under the leadership of the hon. gentleman who just gave us a demonstration of hysteria—

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —the province of Saskatchewan or any section of the country would be in danger, in my opinion. Those who lead people must at least have stability themselves, and we certainly did not get a demonstration of stability by the injection of the kind of discussion which was carried on on this particular question.

I am a member of the C.C.F. party. I think I have as much intelligence as the hon. member who has just spoken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You think so; does anybody else think so?

Mr. GILLIS: I carefully examined its platform and I have no illusions as to where it is going. I want to tell the hon. member that during the past two years many overtures were made to the C.C.F. party by the communist party.

Mr. TUCKER: They will get you yet.

Mr. GILLIS: And on the eve of the election—

Mr. MacINNIS: Whom did they support in the last election?

Mr. GILLIS: On the eve of the election we threw their proposals in their faces, because we have no illusions as to what their programme is.

Mr. TUCKER: The government in Saskatchewan is employing communists to teach the people of that province.

Mr. GILLIS: Let me remind my hon. friend that the communist party were largely responsible for sending back to this house many hon. members who sit over there. You had an official alliance with them. There are very strong rumours that you paid most of their election expenses.

An hon. MEMBER: Who paid yours?

Mr. GILLIS: I paid them myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. GILLIS: That rather surprises you fellows, because most of you got your election expenses either from St. James street in Montreal or Bay street in Toronto.

Mr. BRADETTE: You know nothing about it.

Mr. GILLIS: I know this, and I can speak with authority on it. I had one of these commie boys running against me. I know he would take the air and tell the electors, "If you don't vote for me, vote for the Liberal candidate." The Liberal candidate would take the air and make the same statement: "If you don't vote for me, vote for this other fellow." I know your agents worked together at the polling booths.

Mr. TUCKER: I venture to say that no Liberal candidate in Canada did that.

Mr. GILLIS: I am telling you it was done in my constituency.

Mr. TUCKER: What was the name of the Liberal candidate who said that?

Mr. GILLIS: He was the official candidate; you had him in this house at one time. I can show you the newspapers during the North Grey by-election; I can show you almost every known communist in Canada, members of their national executive, in newspaper advertisements paid for by the Liberal association of that riding advocating the election of the Liberal candidate. You see, when you make statements of that kind, as I said a moment ago, you do yourself a disservice.

Mr. TUCKER: Will you explain the difference between your party when it finally gets everything socialized, and the communist party?

Mr. GILLIS: All the difference in the world.

Mr. TUCKER: Just different people, that is all.

Mr. GILLIS: No; the difference is this. We believe in parliamentary government. We are prepared to fight for it. We do not intend to throw any of its principles overboard on the eve of an election, or at any other time, as you have demonstrated you are prepared to do.

Mr. TUCKER: When you get an all-powerful government what will be the difference?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of getting into this sideline discussion. When the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was waving his arms so energetically —he has undertaken a difficult task, as he well knows—he reminded me of Nero fiddling while Rome burned, because this country is in a sorry mess to-day. I am not concerned about party tags. I am concerned about some honesty in the application of government to the problems that confront us. I am going to say this, with regard to the question of taxing cooperatives. I am afraid that if any hon. members over there believe in a continuation of the cooperative movement in this country, they are taking the initial step to kill it. In this legislation you are definitely classifying the cooperatives as profit-making organizations and corporations. When the McDougall commission sat, they did not have a precedent like this before them. They examined the question as it really existed and brought in recommendations which in my opinion were fair and reasonable. The crux of the whole matter is this three per cent and the classifying of cooperatives as profit-making organizations. If another commission sits —and there will be another—this is the thin edge of the wedge driven in by those who want to destroy the movement; for when the next commission sits on this question it will be placed in the position, whether it likes it or not, of saying that the government of Canada by this legislation has already classified the cooperatives as profit-making organizations. Then it will go on and take the next steps to tax them as such, and will gradually force them out of the picture. I have no illusions as to how far this step goes. Neither do I doubt that many hon. members who may not have been actively associated with these organizations think this is only a gesture, and that it is going to stop there. It is not. As I see this legislation it is going to preclude the payment of patronage dividends by most of the organizations across Canada, if they are required to set aside that three per cent.

Mr. TUCKER: No.

Mr. GILLIS: That may not be the intention.

Mr. MARTIN: And it will not be the result.

Mr. GILLIS: But based upon these recommendations there will be regulations, and unfortunately neither the hon. member for Rosthern nor the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) will be administering that legislation. You are merely developing another tangle that will have to be untangled by a commission later on. You are setting a precedent that is going to tie your hands. That is all.

The test of whether or not you believe in cooperatives is going to be very simple this morning. The hon. member for Rosthern cannot say that he thinks they should not be taxed. I judge that he is opposed to this particular legislation; but he admits that the party whip places every member over there in the position that he has to support the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The party whip has gone home.

Mr. GILLIS: Nevertheless the principle is there.

Mr. TUCKER: If I may ask the hon. member one question, does not this legislation exempt patronage dividends from taxation, and is it not a fact that if the legislation does not go through they will be subject to taxation?

Mr. GILLIS: No, I do not interpret it in that way.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, that is the case.

Mr. GILLIS: And unfortunately those who are writing these regulations may not interpret it in that way either; they may see it the way I see it and apply it in that way.

I just want to make the point that I think the time has come in this parliament when members should be prepared to show their independence. I would not care what the members of this group thought about any question; if I thought it was wrong I would get up and say so and vote against it. I believe, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, the question we are now considering is a bigger issue than party labels. I believe we should exercise our own discretion freely on this matter, and if we do not think it is right we should not vote for it. Any hon. member who votes for the motion is merely asking for reexamination of the question, for the postponement of a decision, for the matter to go back to be further considered and, following that further consideration, to be brought back to this house. Any revenue the government is going to get will not amount to anything, but in my opinion they are establishing a principle that is going to halt the cooperative movement in this country, while in the case of the consumer stores it is apt to bring about a price war. It is the principle of the thing that should be sent back for reexamination. You can get up and try to excuse yourself any way you like, but the test of the matter this morning is whether you vote for it or against it, because in my opinion if we pass this legislation here to-day we are driving in the initial wedge that is going to halt the expansion of this movement in the country.

Why am I so anxious that this should not be done? The hon. member speaks about communism. I am just as much opposed to communism as he is, and I know perhaps just as much about it.

Mr. TUCKER: So was Kerensky against communism in Russia.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, we have had the lesson of Kerensky, and we have learned something from it.

Mr. TUCKER: We should have.

Mr. GILLIS: We have.

Mr. TUCKER: I think the people have.

Mr. GILLIS: There is only one alternative in this country, in my opinion; that is, you have to start lifting up your people. Give them a start. Give them some ownership. Give them a chance to drive their roots into the soil. Give them a stake; and in the cooperative movement they have that opportunity. I have heard many people, not Canadians at all but from outside Canada, after looking over the cooperative movement in this country, with particular reference to that movement in Nova Scotia, say that it was building in this country the basis for a new order, and that to destroy it would be to destroy the only alternative to what Stalin has to offer. We have to consider that very carefully, because if this wedge is driven in and that movement is disrupted, that movement which offers a middle course, the alternative may be violent revolution and the overthrow of everything we know that is clean and decent. If we pass this legislation we are going to harm people who have sacrificed a great deal for the cooperative movement, because there is a storm of protest from every cooperative leader in this country as well as the rank and file of the movement, by letter, by telegram, by brief and in every other way. This is going to be looked upon as a hostile act on the part of the government in behalf of the larger monopolies in this country, to smash the only bulwark that exists to-day to guard the consumers against a small group at the top who have control of everything in the field of distribution. That is the principle, as I see it, in the two sections concerning which the amendment has been moved. I suggest to anyone who believes in it and who wishes to go forward in a democratic way in this country, that a reexamination of those two sections is necessary. Everyone should exercise his own judgment, and should vote without regard to party labels.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. However, while the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was speaking, I had occasion to consult the record to see how accurate he was in some of his statements. First of all I would refer to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, a paper which is known not to be particularly hostile to the present government. In giving an account of the recent convention of Saskatchewan Liberals, at which the hon. member was chosen provincial leader, it has this to say about the new platform of the party. First of all it says:

And then it goes on to say:

> Three-quarters of the resolutions adopted, by actual count, might just as well have been passed by a conclave of C.C.F.'ers.

Mr. TUCKER: They stole our platform when they started. Then they added socialism to it, and that was what I found fault with.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am not going to argue about who is doing the hijacking in this case, but it appears evident that for some reason or another the Liberal party of Saskatchewan has changed its leadership, and changed its policy, too. In which direction did they go? They went to the left. Those are the words in the editorial of the Free Press, which I believe the hon. member will accept. If he denies that we will have to—

Mr. TUCKER: The Liberal party has always been a reform party, or it would not be a Liberal party.

Mr. MacINNIS: It always had a lot to reform.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The hon. member for Rosthern has been almost an hour setting up straw men and knocking them down, and in that time I believe he made many statements which he will have reason to feel sorry for. One of them was when he accused the Saskatchewan government of leading toward a dictatorship. I never heard anything more ridiculous or nonsensical in my life. Here is a government that has been in power a little over two years, and has already had three by-elections. It has given the people of Saskatchewan three opportunities either to endorse or condemn it. And, incidentally, it won all the three by-elections in which the Liberals participated—

Mr. TUCKER: All former C.C.F. seats.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is not as though the government were not giving the people an opportunity to throw them out of power. Only recently the premier of Saskatchewan made an offer to the hon. member for Rosthern for which the hon. member does not seem a bit grateful, or even gracious. The premier offered that as soon as any of the Liberals in Saskatchewan saw fit to resign, thereby leaving a seat for the hon. member for Rosthern in a by-election, he would be glad to call a by-election immediately, in order to get the hon. member in there in a hurry, and be able to give it to him personally—which I hope he will.

Mr. TUCKER: Give what to him?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The hon. member did not express his gratitude for that. He did not reciprocate in a good spirit of sportsmanship.

Mr. TUCKER: What is there to be grateful for? If there is a vacancy, the people should have a chance to be represented.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should have thought that the hon. member would be a good enough sport to show some appreciation to the premier of Saskatchewan for what was offered by him.

Mr. TUCKER: I will get there in due course.

An hon. MEMBER: That's what you think.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: But it is going to be a zigzagging course, I can see that.

The hon. member talked about Saskatchewan as though it was the only province in Canada interested in cooperation, and that the issue was being fought out only in Saskatchewan. May I inform him that the issue is nation-wide. It affects also the province of Manitoba, from which I come. Where does the Liberal party in Manitoba stand on this question? I have not a full record respecting every member from that province, but I have a letter in my hand which was written to the hon. member who represents Brandon constituency. This is written by the acting secretary of one of the credit unions in Manitoba. I think I should put it on record, because it shows where at least one of the Liberal members from that province stands. The letter is addressed to J. E. Matthews, M.P., Brandon constituency. It is dated at Virden, Manitoba, July 26, 1946, and sates:

> At a meeting of cooperative representatives of the organizations named, the enclosed resolution was passed and forwarded to the M.F.A.C. for copies to be sent to all Manitoba members. We believe this to be a very vital matter and have certainly no intention of meekly accepting a brushoff, as your letter replying to the one submitted by myself from Hargrave Cons. Co-op. was considered. The meeting to-night wished you to know they were not satisfied with your answer and will request your attendance at a meeting this fall to account for what happens in this proposed legislation. This committee represents approximately one thousand voters in this area and desire an accounting.

That sets out where at least one of the Liberal members from Manitoba stands on this question. Apparently he gave the co-operatives the brush-off, to use their own expression. And that is what the hon. member for Rosthern tried to do to-day: He tried to give the whole house the brush-off. He got up to discuss the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), and after talking for more than forty minutes, trying to tell us what to do about it, he ended up by saying, "I do not know what I am going to do." I do not know what kind of leadership that is.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not say that. I said I had difficulty in making up my mind.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I took his words down when he said it. He said, "I do not know what I am going to do." Now, if he tells the people of Saskatchewan that he does not know what he is going to do, he is not going to get very far.

Mr. MARTIN: That is honest leadership.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It may be honest leadership, but I am reminded of the Nimrod who said that if you aim at nothing you are sure to hit it.

Then there is one other thing I want to refer to, and that is that the cat is finally out of the bag—and it is not the same tom-cat referred to yesterday. Yes, the cat is out of the bag. The hon. member for Rosthern raved about Liberalism and tried to leave the impression that if it had not been for the Liberals on the other side of the house there would be chaos. Well, we have them both. But what I want to point out is this, that a little later on he admitted there were not even fifteen Liberals on that side of the house.

Mr. TUCKER: From Saskatchewan.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Because he said if he had fifteen supporting him—

Mr. TUCKER: I said fifteen Liberals from Saskatchewan.

An hon. MEMBER: No, you didn't.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: No; if I heard the hon. member rightly he tried to correct it by saying that he meant Liberals from Saskatchewan.

Mr. TUCKER: I said "with me", and I meant from Saskatchewan.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Oh, I did not know there were different brands of Liberals from the different provinces in Canada. I thought if they were Liberals, they were all Liberals.

Mr. TUCKER: There are certainly different brands of C.C.F.'ers.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He wants the Saskatchewan brand in here. I am afraid he is going to be disappointed.

Mr. TUCKER: Do you all think alike over there?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is a serious charge, and I wish to protest to him on behalf of the rank and file Liberals on the other side of the house. Such an insult should not be thrown at them. Just imagine being insulted by the aspiring—or perspiring—leader of the Saskatchewan Liberal party when he tells his colleagues that they are not Liberals any more! What are they, if they are not Liberals?

Mr. TUCKER: I did not say that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You implied that. You said there were not even fifteen there.

Mr. TUCKER: From Saskatchewan. You jump at a half truth like a cat at a mouse.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have no intention of playing cat and mouse with the hon. member.

One more thing in closing which I also consider was a mistake on the part of the hon. member. He seemed to take advantage of the occasion to take a few stabs at the leader of this group when he asked him why he did not come over and join with the Liberals, why he did not try to reform them from the inside.

Mr. TUCKER: I was just gently pleading with him.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Apparently we cannot both speak at the same time unless we say the same things. I do not know with whom he would join over there if there are no Liberals left. I should like to know how the hon. member can invite anyone to join the Liberals when he admits himself that there are no more than fifteen of them left on that side of the house.

Mr. MARTIN: He did not say that.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Read Hansard to-morrow. The situation is clear after this long debate. The hon. member for Rosthern admits that any member on the other side who was a true Liberal, and there seems to be precious few of them left, would have been opposed to this legislation in the first place and then it would never have got on the order paper. The answer seems to be that the great majority of the members on the other side have deserted Liberalism, have gone reactionary and are trying to snuff out the cooperatives.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have been under the impression that we were to discuss the third reading of bill No. 368, to amend the Income War Tax Act, and not take part in the battle of Saskatchewan. While the battle of Saskatchewan has been interesting up to this point, it is beginning to wear a bit. I suggest that you call hon. members to order and see that the business of this house goes forward as it should.

Mr. SPEAKER: The house is considering the third reading of bill No. 368, to amend the Income War Tax Act, and I would ask hon. members to see that the discussion is relevant to the bill before the house.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, we have a very fine spectacle in this house to-day. The Progressive Conservative party, which has always been the friend and the supporter of private enterprise, to-day takes up the cudgels on behalf of the cooperatives. The anomaly is not so great as it would appear at first sight, because if we consider some powerful organizations from the west, especially the wheat pools, we are less surprised. There is no doubt that such organizations are included in those bodies which can be called big business trusts.

I rise in defence of the Liberal party's policy in this respect. I do so with the conviction that bill No. 368 which is now before this house, can on the whole in no way harm the cooperative movement in Canada and particularly in the province of Quebec.

I am a supporter of the cooperatives. I was brought up in that movement and it is a source of deep satisfaction to me to recall that, as early as 1908, my father, Notary Belzile, of Rimouski, established the second credit union in the province of Quebec.

I shall not go so far as to say that the cooperative idea is a religion to me, but it is certainly part of my economic and political creed. I have studied the cooperative movement for a long time, and I have realized how beneficial it can be to our province and to the country at large. Therefore, when the resolution was first introduced in this house, I made it a point to study it most carefully.

The matter gives rise to much controversy. Some people are in favour of the taxation of cooperatives; others hold an opposite view. All bring up arguments according to their point of view, and they cannot but be conflicting. However, there is one point on which there seems to be general agreement, and it is that in certain cases cooperatives are business ventures and their income must come directly under the Income War Tax Act. They make profits, and this is generally admitted. All transactions between the cooperatives and non-members represent income derived from their investments.

Without any doubt, in the case of operations between members and non-members, there is direct competition with ordinary business concerns, and the reason why the campaign for their taxation was launched lies in the fact that for several years some cooperatives have repeatedly resorted to that method of doing business.

Numerous representations have been made to the government which has duly considered them and taken action. They have appointed the McDougall commission and conferred on it well-defined powers. The members of that body have been chosen from all walks of life. They are Mr. Justice Errol M. W. McDougall, Mr. B. N. Arnason, of Regina, at present deputy minister of the cooperation department in the Saskatchewan government; Mr. G. A. Elliott, of Edmonton; Mr. J. M. Nadeau, a well-known economist from the city of Montreal, and Mr. J. J. Vaughan, of Toronto.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BELZILE: Mr. Speaker, before the one o'clock recess, I explained that the government, in reply to the representations that had been made to them in connection with the taxation of cooperatives, had appointed a commission. I gave the names of the members of that body. However, I wish to emphasize the personality of Mr. Arnason. He is an expert on the cooperative movement, and is well qualified to propound its ideas and aspirations. He is at this time deputy minister of the cooperation department in the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan. The commission has conducted an inquiry throughout the country. It has had a great number of public sittings. Many briefs—more than 175, I believe—were submitted for its consideration. After sitting in many places from Vancouver to Halifax, three of its members have even made a trip to England in order to make a survey of the cooperative movement in that country. They have met British experts in London, Liverpool and Manchester. The object of that trip to England was to ascertain the effect of taxation on the cooperative movement there. As everyone knows cooperatives are taxed in England. In September, 1945, the commission submitted its report. It was unanimous, which is rather surprising, if we consider the opinion of the various members, and the fact that their occupations were quite dissimilar. Its recommendation was to the effect that cooperatives should be taxed. It stated as follows:

> We are of the opinion there is no general class or group of cooperative associations in Canada to-day whose income should be declared not to be liable to taxation . . .

That was the unanimous opinion of the commission. The situation which the commission had to investigate was this. In 1930 the Income War Tax Act was amended by the insertion of section (4) (p), whereby cooperatives were exempted from the income tax. According to a quite authoritative legal construction that provision did not imply complete exemption. Under that interpretation of the clause, the cooperatives could be taxed. As a result, some important western organizations have been advised that they would have to pay income tax. The cooperatives who were so advised have disputed the construction placed on section 4 (p) and they have brought the matter before the courts, where it is still pending. In view of that imbroglio, the commission deemed it necessary that section 4 (p) be repealed and it made in its report a recommendation along that line that was also unanimous. It stated:

> As a result of the ambiguities of language and the difficulty of administering the section, we are of the opinion that the section, in its present form, cannot survive the attacks made upon it. In suggesting its repeal, we do so in the consciousness that enterprises which are truly cooperative in organization and operation, have no need of the exceptive provisions thereof. If they make no profit they are not taxable. Those associations which do not so qualify, should not be accorded a blanket exemption to which they are not otherwise entitled.

That was the unanimous report of the Commission and even Mr. Arnason endorsed that principle. Consequently, the Government has proposed the repeal of section 4(p). Before that recommendation, the position was this: under that interpretation of the act, the cooperatives were liable to the income tax—they have been so taxable since 1931. No prescription can be invoked against the government. A claim for taxes does not lapse in favour of the rate-payer. That is a well known law principle. Therefore, in opposition to the representations made by the cooperatives, the government deemed it necessary to make the latter liable to taxation, and I think they were right. The principle underlying taxation is that equal treatment should be meted out to all taxpayers. Under no circumstances can there be any discrimination as between the various taxpayers. If it is admitted, as the commission did admit, that some of the operations conducted by cooperatives are of a purely commercial nature, and that they compete directly with private concerns, it is obvious that the exemption of cooperatives from taxation would mean a discrimination, and under certain circumstances, an injustice which could not but give rise to discontent. Under the provisions of the provincial laws that apply to cooperatives, the latter are corporations and their members or shareholders are responsible only for the unpaid amount of their subscriptions or shares. The corporation is a person as distinct from the individuals who belong to it. Under the law, the establishment of a cooperative creates a legal entity that is new and distinct from its promoters; it has rights and obligations different from those of its members. It is "a person" as defined in the Income War Tax Act. Its members only have a limited responsibility, which places them on a par with the shareholders of a company. In its operations, the cooperative resorts to the usual business methods; if its operations bring no surplus the cooperative has no income and therefore is not taxable. But if its operations show a surplus, it is an income within the meaning of the law, and that income is therefore taxable. We have to consider where the income ultimately goes; it is a matter of distribution or non-distribution. If the income is distributed, it becomes an income for the shareholder who receives it, and as such it is liable to taxation in the hands of that shareholder. If the income is not distributed; if on the contrary, it is put, by some method or other, into the capital of the cooperative, such action on the part of the board of directors does not change the nature of the income. Consequently, it remains taxable, but in this instance, in the hands of the cooperative. If, out of the income of a taxpayer an amount is put into some kind of fund and that amount is said not to be taxable, this constitutes an inequality as regards the rate-payer and, of course, in the case of all the taxpayers in this country. Such is, in essence, the principle underlying the taxation of cooperatives, and I think it is fair.

To sum up my argument, I may say that the cooperatives are organizations whose immediate object is the elimination of middlemen's profits.

No one will gainsay this statement of principle. Therefore, they operate in order to realize these profits for themselves; and the commission is very clear on that point. Then the cooperatives must pay the tax on the same grounds as the middleman with whom they compete,—if they have profits, of course. To exempt them would be a discrimination in their favour, as far as the law is concerned. Such an exemption would be of no particular advantage to the public at large and its burden would fall proportionately on the rest of the taxpayers, which would give rise to dissatisfaction; as I said a while back, it would be unfair.

In order to implement the McDougall commission recommendations, the government has submitted, with the budget, a certain number of resolutions. These resolutions, as is now generally known, relate to three different subjects. They exempt credit unions, but bring mutual fire, life and accident insurance companies under taxation, except church mutual associations. As for ordinary cooperatives, the commission declared that those that were making profits had to pay the tax, while those that did not were exempt.

These resolutions have given rise to numerous representations from the cooperatives of the province of Quebec.

A large number of representations were submitted to me from supporters of taxation, on the one hand, who pointed out that the government was most generous towards the cooperative movement, in fact, too magnanimous in their opinion. Other representations were put forward by cooperatives complaining of the treatment meted out to them. The problem thus put on a dual aspect, and the two opponents assailed the recommendations of the commission which were incorporated in the budget resolutions.

As I said a while ago, I am in favour of cooperatives. Indeed, a group of members from rural districts submitted representations to the government. We explained that equal distribution of patronage dividends to members and non-members alike might foil the development of the cooperative movement. In fact, since one need no longer be a member of these organizations, that is, need run no risks and assume no responsibilities to draw patronage dividends, non-members would no longer have any incentive to join such an enterprise. These representations, put forward by the cooperatives of my province, were justified. We submitted them to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and to the officers of his department, and they understood our grievances. We also pointed out to the government that the six months delay set for the payment of patronage dividends was too short. In fact, some of our cooperatives, and more especially the creameries and others whose activities are of a rather seasonal character, need most of their funds in the spring. We pointed out, therefore, that under the circumstances, a twelve months period was essential. Here again the government agreed to our representations.

As to cash payments, no more than a method of administration is involved. The cooperative need only, in some way or other, credit the shareholder with the patronage dividend to benefit from an exemption for said amount on which, as I said a while ago, the shareholder will be taxed. The statement of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was based on these representations.

Therefore, since the government has agreed to our proposals. I deem it my duty to support this bill. By means of this bill, and as a result of the amendments allowed, our claims are satisfied in full. It fully meets the requirements of cooperatives. Not only will it cause them no harm, but I would go so far as to say that it will help them, and foster their further development.

The present debate is probably—and even unquestionably—the greatest propaganda ever put forward in Canada in favour of the cooperative movement. It is my hope, therefore, that our cooperatives will appreciate the value of their movement and the advantages of communal endeavour.

But what remains of those resolutions? There remains the very object of the two amendments now under consideration: the three-year exemption clause and the one commonly described as the 3 per cent clause.

As regards the three-year clause, whose removal is sought in order to make the exemption retroactive over three years, its suppression would be unfair. There is no provision for the retroactive application of a legal measure. Legally the proposition is quite unsound. You cannot go back and exempt an organization that might have been liable to taxation.

As for the 3 per cent clause, it has been woefully misconstrued. In a generally well-informed newspaper, I have read, under the by-line of an alert financial editor, an interpretation that was quite wrong. This is what it said:

> The government wants to put a three per cent tax on cooperatives' employed capital. The application of such a measure would be comparable to taxing a farmer on the value of his chattels.

This interpretation is quite erroneous. This is not a tax on capital; it is a tax on income. It is the Income War Tax Act we are dealing with here. The 3 per cent clause is merely a basis, a schedule of taxation. We say to the cooperatives: "You are using a certain amount of capital for the purposes of your business. If you make a profit—there is no commercial profit without capital—and if this profit is greater than 3 per cent of the capital employed, you must pay income tax on your real profit. If your profit is less than 3 per cent, you are left with some income at least, with a real profit subject to taxation. Here is how the rule applies: you may not reduce an income of 10 per cent to less than 3 per cent by subtracting depreciation allowances, by distributing patronage dividends or by paying interest rates. If you bring it down to less than 3 per cent, you will be taxed on the basis of 3 per cent. In other words, if a cooperative tries to reduce an income of $1,000 to less than $300 by means of deductions, patronage dividends, interest payments and depreciation allowances, it will be taxed on the sum of $300 at the current rate. It will pay 30 per cent of $300; or $90, which is far from 3 per cent of the capital.

All in all, I believe that the cooperatives will benefit by the enactment of the present legislation. It will force them to make statutory reserves under provincial laws, to put aside certain taxable funds derived from their business profits.

I am convinced that the implementation of the act will not prove detrimental to cooperatives but will compel them to set aside reserves, thus permitting them to redeem their total debt within a period of ten or fifteen years.

The passing of this measure will lead to the establishment of a standard system of operations in all cooperatives. In such a vast country as ours, laws vary from one province to another and their terms are not uniform. As a result, operations are conducted on a different basis in various cooperatives. They will immediately profit by the adoption of a standard system. I humbly submit that, in view of the situation, the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) should be rejected.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) moved:

That the second report of the committee on industrial relations, presented to the house on Saturday, August 17, 1946, be now concurred in.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in order to restore the house to its usual state of complacency may I say that I rise to support the motion of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde). Inasmuch as I had something to do with the beginning of this committee, or at least having it set up, I assure the house, as I did then, that I intend to consider the matter objectively and without heat.

I hope that you, sir, and the house, will see the distinction between my method of approach and that which we saw this morning. What happened this morning reminded me of the churches we used to have in western Canada, where a boy would pump wind into the pipe organ to make it go. I was one of those boys; we worked in relays. This morning I heard an organ playing with all the stops pulled out and there were at least two boys applying the wind. I trust that I shall not fall into that position this afternoon.

I cannot begin without complimenting and commending our chairman. I realize that it is not a compliment to a chairman of a committee to congratulate him upon his impartiality—the chairmen of all committees in this house surely must be impartial—but I do want to compliment him upon the way in which he administered that impartiality, creating a basis of action which reached a new high both in dignity and generally in the conduct of the proceedings of a committee.

I should like to say something about my fellow members on that committee. My experience in the House of Commons is limited to two sessions, the one which has gone and this one which, let us hope, is passing. Having sat on a number of committees, this was a new experience to me. I think all the thirty-five of us who were there were deeply impressed by the seriousness of the situation—except for the odd momentary outburst which was confined to the first two days in our forty-nine sessions, and we had that many. There was no sign of anyone seeking political advantage. They were a bunch of grand men trying to do something for their country.

In saying this I must also include the members of the press gallery who so fairly and fully reported this matter across Canada. But in saying that to them I stop short of the editorial chairs of the papers of this country. I say about those people, some of them only of course, that I do not envy them their position sitting on their air-cushioned seats in their ivory towers continuing this two-fingered clacking on a typewriter which has lulled them into such a sense of somnolence that they cannot stand the accouchement of a new idea. It is very easy in that position to be always criticizing, but they have been unable to give birth to any new ideas. We have found that throughout the course of the sittings of this committee in some of the newspapers in this country.

I intend to deal briefly with this question of industrial unrest, and in doing so I go away back to the time perhaps when a member of the tribe from rocks and wood fashioned the first instrument of destruction. The creation of the first knife was by an individual for the chief. That was because of industrial unrest, a seeking to get along. We have that now, and I hope we always will have industrial unrest, because therein lies ambition and therein lies improvement. The maker of a mousetrap seeks to make a better mousetrap, and the man who does the work seeks always a larger portion of that dollar which is brought forth by the mousetrap once it reaches the consuming public.

I am anxious to make a clear distinction between industrial unrest and industrial chaos, because that is the position this country is in at the present time. Perhaps here it might be advisable for me to tell the house of a message I have just received. It is supposed to be a Canadian Press message put out about fifteen minutes ago. It indicates that the gates at the steel plant at Hamilton have been opened and that traffic is moving freely back and forth into and out of that plant.

Mr. GILLIS: Have they taken off the picket line?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall read this. It reads:

After first paragraph saying picket line open on authority Stelco, Canadian Press then on own authority says (in paraphrase).

Autos filled with Stelco employees passed through gates escorted by city police.

At least ten cars filled with employees entered the plant.

"We want to stop them, but what can we do?" a picket captain was quoted. The constables told us they have a legal right to go in and out of the plant.

A meeting of union executives was called at the main gate to decide the next move.

A thirty-year employee of Stelco is quoted by Canadian Press as saying that 900 men have telephoned Stelco officials to ask that they be given work.

The growth of the labour movement in the civilized world has been an amazing growth. It has been a splendid growth and, broadly speaking, it has been a very proper growth. But as we know, in all growth sometimes we find a canker, and attached to labour—I do not want to be criticized until I finish this sentence—at the present moment is the canker of communism. I say that that is no part of the labour movement; it is a political movement boring into labour movement, seeking by the instillation of fear, by the preaching of false doctrine, with the ultimate goal of a general strike, to grasp and hold completely political and executive authority in the Dominion of Canada. That is admittedly the end sought by the communist party in this country.

The mere fact that they have sought to go where there are masses of men is not a criticism of those men and the labour movement. It is something which they themselves—on our committee I know there were two men holding union cards, and they were not in my party—are fighting, and have been fighting—there are three individuals because I am looking at another one—in a constant battle against that subversive political movement. It is unfortunate that they have made some progress, but I say that the heart of the labour movement is still sound. It beats with a rhythm both healthy and patriotic. It seeks for itself, and it justly seeks its proper place in our Canadian economy. The action of labour—there were a few blow-offs here and there—throughout the whole war was complete proof of what I have just said, and of the basic soundness of labour in this country. There were excesses, but I am quite sure that there always will be. We must remember when we speak of excesses in the actions of labour that they are no greater and no more than those that occur in other segments of our Canadian economy. I do not care whether you come from agriculture, from the dairy men, from the stock men, from the owners or from the manufacturers, it does not do for you just to speak of one segment of our economy and say: You are blameworthy because you have gone to excesses in the normal conduct of your business.

I must say that I was greatly impressed by one remark made by Mr. Pat Conroy when he was giving evidence during the sittings of the committee. I think I have him accurately, and he said this: "It is plain that aside from this continent all the rest of the world has gone or is going either socialistic or communistic." It seems to me that that is a thought which we in this House of Commons and in this dominion may well ponder. If you look over the map of Europe, if you look over the map of Asia, what Pat Conroy said, gentlemen, you will find is true. Therefore it behooves us here, if we are to continue our way of life—I do not like ordinary expressions, but there is no better one than that—if we are to continue our methods of doing business, to look beyond our immediate business and the colour of the ink at the end of the year in our ledgers, and realize that we have three important interests in this country—the employer, the employed and the consumer, and unless we can find a place where they shall be satisfied, then indeed are we in danger of wrecking all that we so long have held so dear.

Now what of labour organizations? It began of course with the craft unions, and those unions generally speaking were gathered together under the American Federation of Labour. Then we had the Committee of Industrial Organization: you remember that it was set up by Mr. Lewis, and then Phil Murray took over from him, then they quarrelled, and now Mr. Lewis and his coal miners are back with the American Federation of Labour. But the thing was new. It was not an organization of labour by craft; it was an organization of labour by industry. In that it was comparatively new, and with that new method of organization new and sometimes reprehensible methods were adopted. We are fortunate indeed that until very recently we in Canada have been free from such methods. But it must be remembered that these unions are new unions. They are having or they will have their growing pains. That of course is obvious. It is also true that they are largely composed of and certainly led by younger men without much experience in the labour movement. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) explained that situation very well and very clearly to us in our committee. So, growing so quickly, troubles have developed.

On the other side of the picture, what is the position of capital? I make this simple statement to you, that if capital had always been fair to labour there would be no need for the organization of labour. That is a very simple statement which I defy anyone to contradict. Even in recent years what has happened? The market falls off, and men are laid off by the thousands. It is all right to talk about high hourly pay, but if the work is not there so that at the end of the year a man may add up those hours when he did work to provide a decent living for his wife and his family, the talk of high hourly pay is complete nonsense in the budget and in the kitchen of that man and his family. It is all right to say that employment is seasonal, but what has been going on? Take your motor car industry: it does not need to be nearly as seasonal as it is. What happens? The men are out of work and the municipalities are called upon to help them; municipalities in Canada—rarely, it is true—have been paying them when a little different organization in that industry would have had the industry doing the paying for the twelve months, as of course it should.

I opened this matter some weeks ago in a speech which I made to this house. I am going to make a political remark about that speech—and this remark is not picking on anybody, which is unusual in a political remark. But I am just a little bit annoyed at being told, particularly by newspapers that are supposed to be on my own side, that this fellow Smith took a wildcat off the knees of the Prime Minister, or words to that effect. The point I have in my mind is that I am sorry that anyone should think I was quite so dumb. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members, that what I did on that occasion was done after discussion with my chief and after a caucus of this party—why? Because we felt—and it was a unanimous caucus—that the time had come when we dare not play politics, when we had to be Canadians and do what we could in the present desperate situation. If any of you think it is not desperate I commend to you the letter written by Mr. Donald Gordon to either the minister or the deputy minister of labour; if that does not give any man in this room pause, I do not know what will give him pause—whatever "pause" may be. But I mean that it will impress upon him the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time.

On that occasion, the house may remember, a controller had been appointed. And now, having mentioned the word "controller", I want to refer to an article in the Toronto Star of to-day. The heading is:

> Kilbourn would examine every striker secretly.

After giving a recital of this sort of thing the statement continues—I am only reading a bit of it:

> However, if it is put up to him, he said he believed his first step would be to find out the facts of the situation. He said he thought this could only be done by a thorough examination into the desires of the workers. He said he believed this could be done only by having all workers in the affected plants answer a set of questions.
> The survey, he said, would be conducted as balloting in an election is conducted, in complete privacy. The worker would go into a booth and write his answers and the sheet, which would bear no method of identifying the worker, would be deposited in a ballot box.
> He said the survey, if it were held, should be made by entirely impartial people, with even the government eliminated. He suggested young lawyers or a firm of accountants whose impartiality would be beyond question should be employed.

If that is a correct statement of the methods to be adopted by this controller, he could not do that in less than nine months, with fourteen thousand men concerned. If that is the method to be adopted—and I have nothing more than the newspaper statement, the correspondent being Mr. Robert Taylor—if he has nothing more than that, it is time we had a new controller appointed in the steel industry. This of course, as everybody realizes, is just a lot of nonsense.

Now I pass on to this. First, I am anxious to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the speed with which he acted; because you will remember it was in the afternoon that I made the suggestion for reference to a committee, and the committee was set up and met that evening. I do not not need to read again to this house the terms of reference. They were to inquire into industrial unrest, and this committee of yours realized that we were not specially commissioned to settle the steel strike. What we did was this. There it was in an acute form. We were not greatly concerned with any limitation you had put upon us, because we knew that if we could do something towards the settlement of that strike, you would not chastise us; you would probably praise us. So we immediately sent for the people involved in that dispute, first, in the hope of settlement, and second, because we felt that an actual examination of a concrete case would give us a good idea of the broader picture.

In the first instance we failed. In the second we have, we think, accomplished something, and we believe we learned a great deal about the broader picture of labour relations by the action we took in dealing with those who are at present on strike. Aside from specific recommendations which I intend to go over hurriedly before I shall have finished, what else did the committee accomplish? Surely at least it did this. For the first time, I believe, the people of the Dominion of Canada, the broad number who are neither organized labour nor large employers, have received, as I am sure our committee received, a liberal education in industrial relations, and certainly at the moment know a great deal more than they did before the committee met as to what makes the economy of our country tick, what are the problems facing the different segments of our people, all of whom make up our total economy.

In my judgment at least that was worth while, and that is an accomplishment of this committee. I am not one of the I-told-you-so people, Mr. Speaker, but you may remember that last fall, speaking of the matter of labour in this House of Commons, I made this statement, which I think is still true, that no strike and no lockout can long continue in Canada without a certain amount of public support; because after all, these two elements, employer and employee, great and powerful as they are, are as nothing compared with the great consuming public in this dominion. They cannot operate this country. Temporary setbacks to the ordinary fellow may come, because he is unorganized. But, in pursuing the even tenor of their way through people like you and me, those of us who are their parliament, the ordinary people will continue to be the backbone of our democracy, the backbone of our economics. That will always, I hope and believe, be so.

Now I may turn to some incidents, some subjects perhaps, which were discussed in the committee itself, and I am going to criticize, I hope justly and, I am sure, with restraint, two things in our industrial relations picture which I think require amending. In doing that, I think it is esential that I mention the evidence given by two or three of the witnesses.

I refer first to Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. He appeared before us. I had not the honour of his acquaintance prior to that time, and I believe that was true of many members of the committee. We were all greatly impressed by him. I was particularly impressed by his fearlessness and by his power. I am afraid I was not equally impressed—at times only—by his logic. But I give him this credit: he is a man doing a very unpopular job, he is a man doing a very big job. I do not know, as someone said in the committee, who could have been found to replace him. I am anxious to pay him all the compliment I can, but at the end of the road I was unconvinced, even when he was supported by the Acting Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Labour, that he had made a case for a ten-cent maximum in the rise in wages in the steel business.

I am not saying that he is wrong. I do not say that for a moment. His opinion is entitled to very great respect, and it seems to me he would be a foolish member of that committee, thirty-five amateurs, who would disregard it. Now we are being frank about this business and I am sure everybody else will be. Certainly I will be, and I have no hesitation in saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that if Donald Gordon, with all his experience, says, "If I go substantially beyond that, I feel I could not control; it would be dishonest to try", then who am I to say, "You are wrong"? The most I can say is that my judgment, according to the old Scotch verdict, would have been, not proven. On the other hand, and I am frank again, when Donald Gordon says that to me, I, an amateur, am not going to come into the House of Commons and assume the responsibility of saying that he was wrong, because—call it cowardice if you like; call it what you will—if he were right and the collapse did come, I would have difficulty facing you or any other honest people in this country whom I know.

I intend to go a little farther with the ten-cent theory. It was supported by the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—and permit me to say very respectfully of the Acting Minister of Finance that he added nothing at all to the evidence of Mr. Gordon. He merely came there with a statement covering six or seven pages and said that Mr. Gordon was right. That is not said critically. I do not know what else he could do; I do not know what else there was to be said.

I endeavoured—and I tried very hard—to find out from the Acting Minister of Finance whether this ten-cent maximum was a matter of government policy. If it were government policy, the farthest he could go would be to say it was his personal opinion. It strikes me that when a minister of finance, dealing with a matter of finance, gives it as his opinion, it should be government policy whether it is or is not; because, though we heard the other day that this country was not governed by experts, I still think that responsible ministers of the crown, and I am quite sure I am right, should continue to accept responsibility for the things done by persons in the departments over which they have control.

We had a lot of trouble with that ten-cent proposition. Facing us was the fact that in British Columbia fifteen cents had been granted by the regional war labour board. The chairman of the regional board in that province is Mr. Pearson, the Minister of Labour. We had that fifteen cents rate approved by the Minister of Labour on two occasions in the house, who said that it was sound and sensible, and who strongly advised the men to accept it. That put us amateurs in a rather difficult position in trying to form judgments of our own.

May I say at once that the lumber business may be—may be, remember—somewhat different from the steel business. The steel business operates twelve months of the year. The logging end of the lumber business operates nine or ten months a year in seclusion and in far-away places. But let us not forget that there is no ceiling on logs. There is a ceiling on lumber. Fifty per cent of the lumber is exported to places where the owners or the corporation can get whatever prices they care to ask for it. Losses incurred in domestic sales or wages do not matter so very much if they can get it back from Great Britain—because that is where most of it is going—from the United States, and from other places to which these exports go.

May I continue with this ten-cent offer? On the first day of April the prices board granted an increase of $5 a ton in the price of steel. It was plainly said to us by Mr. Gordon that at that time, the first day of April, having made a complete and thorough examination of the position of the steel companies, that in that $5 a ton there was something for an increase in wages. Mr. Hilton of the Steel Company of Canada told us that so far as he was concerned there was ten cents an hour in that $5 a ton. I say this critically of the government. It seems to me—in fact I am sure of it, and it was sworn to in the committee and I believe it—that if at that time ten cents had been given to the steel workers we would have no steel strike in Canada to-day and the committee on industrial relations would never have been set up. I do not think there can be any question about that.

This brings me to a major criticism, namely, that there has been no direct contact, no proper liaison between the national war labour board and the wartime prices and trade board. We realize that to hold down prices we must have a ceiling on them, and as a part of that effort we must stabilize wage positions. I do not think anyone in the committee disputed that. What do we find? We find the wartime prices and trade board operating in an air-tight compartment. We find the wages board operating in another airtight compartment and no practical liaison between them. Just now we expect to hold the price ceiling, admitting that wages enter into that ceiling as a part of the cost, without these two elements coming together somewhere, is something that I have been utterly unable to understand. The government must accept responsibility for that.

Perhaps I had better read another quotation from the evidence taken before the committee, and it will be the last extract that I shall read. It is a brief statement by Mr. Gordon on that point, and there are many of them. These answers were given in response to questions asked by myself. I am reading from page 343 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee:

Q. But there is no direct contact between you?

A. That is right.

Then a little further down:

Q. Then who does?

A. Well, each board looks after its own job. The wage control board of the government, as far as industry is concerned, and the national war labour board and the regional war labour board; it is a completely separate field in that respect than the jurisdiction of the prices board.

Then a little farther on:

Q. Yes, but let us take steel. Would the increase given by the prices board, and as you have said, there was machinery whereby these men might go to the labour board and find out what portion of that increase belonged to them. That, in effect, was what you have said?

A. In respect to that, I do not want to split hairs, but I do not want to leave the impression that there was anything in the price increase which was ear-marked in the wage increase. That was entirely in the hands of the management.

Q. Let us admit that, but what portion of that increase would be determined by the war labour board? You do not fix it?

A. No.

Q. And you leave it to the war labour board to do that?

A. That is right.

Q. There was no liaison between you and the war labour board in this specific case?

A. That is right.

Q. So it could be fairly said, with respect to our machinery in regard to prices and wages, that they are entirely separate and there is no direct contact between them?

A. That is right.

Having read that, may I again say, at the expense of repetition, having regard to these elements which enter into prices, how anyone could ever expect the thing to operate without some meeting place somewhere, particularly in times of stress such as we are in now, is something which is quite beyond me. Let no one think, sir, that I am indulging in mere condemnation of any board. I realized that the regional board and the war labour board have handled and settled many disputes, and have done so satisfactorily. I realize that the prices board has done splendid work in many instances. But here we have reached a pitch, here we are approaching that place in inflation which Mr. Gordon told us may mean collapse. Under these circumstances, the failure to have contact between these two boards at this time is in my judgment inexcusable.

I want to say a word in defence of the position taken by the labour witnesses on the question of inflation. The evidence they brought was roughly that we, the members of the House of Commons, were mentioned in dispatches and that our $2,000 and all these things were contributory factors toward inflation. Mr. Conroy did present three sheets of double-spaced typewriting, all containing instances of price increases. On the other hand he gave us instances of increases in wages. I am not covering the whole period. I realize, as it was proven, that generally speaking since 1941 wages as a percentage matter have risen higher than prices. The thing we were up against is that in this very year, in this very spring, the cost of living index has gone up five points. We have had nothing like it, except after the first great war; five points in a matter of months. That is the situation we are now facing. What they said was this. How is it there can be all these price increases with no strikes—they were not caused by strikes—yet when labour asks for more than ten cents, anything beyond that is inflation? I am not for a moment saying they proved that Mr. Gordon was wrong, but they did prove to a humble individual like myself that there are two sides to most arguments, and they did produce quite a number of facts in support of their position. But I repeat that as far as I am concerned their position also was not proven, and as far as I am concerned I have no intention at this moment of departing from the advice of the man I think best equipped to give us advice at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to inform the hon. gentleman that his time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry to have been so long; I shall try to conclude in a few minutes.

I turn now directly to the report of the committee, whose recommendations begin on page 3 of this loose leaf report, and which also appear in the Votes and Proceedings of August 17.

Our first recommendation is the immediate calling of the proposed dominion-provincial labour conference. It may occur to some that this is a bit of sidestepping. It is not, for this reason. Nearly everyone on that committee was convinced, as I am convinced, that one of the things we most require to take care of industrial unrest is a country-wide labour code. I am for it; there is no doubt about that. Why, in this particular case we are up against differentials at Dosco which do not exist at other places, and so on. But may I add that I am not in favour of seeking any change in our constitution under the British North America Act which would force any province to come under a dominion-wide code if it did not want to do so. That is their own business, and you will never find me arguing that they should be forced to do anything like that. I will add this, however, that I can see no reason why, in regard to those provinces that wish to cooperate, we should not have a code affecting them. We are doing that with respect to taxation. The budget speech dealt with that matter; and I feel sure that if we can evolve something of that kind we can have the provinces pass concurrent legislation as we did with other legislation—I forget the name of it—

Mr. MITCHELL: The old age pensions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): —having to do with the settlement of labour disputes. That was done in several of the provinces, so there are no legal difficulties in the way.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, not the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes. I was not talking about old age pensions; I should like to, but not at the moment. That course could be very easily followed. The next recommendation was:

That in the interval much closer contact be established between the wartime prices and trade board and the regional and national war labour boards.

I have covered that fully, and I need not repeat my argument. That was a criticism, and nothing would be gained by going into it again. The next recommendation was:

That matters coming before the regional and national war labour boards be handled expeditiously.

That is in there for this reason. If my memory serves me aright we were unanimous on recommendation No. 1; I may be wrong, but in any event we were nearly unanimous. That paragraph merely means this. The men who appeared before us did complain of delays. Those complaints were answered by the vice-chairman, I think it was, of the national war labour board; but whether or not they were answered the fact remains that the process was somewhat slow. This is not a judgment against anybody; it is a suggestion, and a very wise suggestion, for expedition in dealing with disputes of this kind.

Paragraph 2 of the recommendations is simple; I do not need to argue the point, because it is admitted:

2. Your committee is convinced that continued price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control.

The next recommendation is:

3. Your committee recommends that a measure of union security should follow certification.

As far as I am concerned I am prepared to accept holus-bolus the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in this house last fall during a discussion of labour matters, in regard to the implementation of this clause. Then I want to spend perhaps a moment or two on the next paragraph:

4. Law being the basis of our society, your committee condemns:
(a) the policy adopted by some unions and some employers of disregarding the legal machinery provided for adjusting wages and settling disputes;
(b) breaches of the law of Canada by the use of physical force or otherwise either by employer or union.

I suppose some bright people will ask, "Why did you include the employer?" Certainly at present all the newspapers are picking on the worker for being in breach of the law; and he is. There is no doubt about that. As far as I stand and those who stand with me, the right of a man to go to work without being molested while going and coming is his; and let me hope and pray that it always will be. On the other side, however, those of us who have lived for some time know there are what are called goon squads, and these goon squads are not confined to labour. They can be hired in the larger cities of Canada to-day, and within the memory of all they have been so hired. So these words are not put in just to get us by; there is meat in each of them, and something should be done on the other side of that picture because surely we are entitled to live in a country where the enforcement of law is in the hands of officers duly appointed to enforce the law be it on one side of this picture or on the other side. If you will look again at the Toronto Star of to-day's date, a little lower down on the right-hand side of the page we see a heading over an interview with Mr. Millard in which he urges the prosecution of the Steel company for triple pay. If a company are in breach of the law in respect to triple pay they should be prosecuted the same as anybody else. But at the end of that article he makes the charge that there were gunmen in that plant who wounded five of these workers; and if that is a fact prosecutions should be launched in that connection. So I think we are all in agreement in this house. We will never permit the law to be used as a strike breaker, I trust, but we will permit it to be used and will insist that it be used so that individual liberty shall remain and a man may go where he will.

Now I turn to the next recommendation, which was put in at the request of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll):

5. Your committee recommends that the law of picketing be studied with a view to its modernization and clarification and for the purpose of making it more effective for the protection of the rights of all elements in the community.

I have promised to assist the hon. member any way I can in respect to that, but I do not think we need weary the house with it just now. Then I come to recommendation No. 6. We had a great deal of trouble with this one, particularly with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who led the attack, in which he was joined by the hon. member for Spadina and one other hon. member whose name I have forgotten for the moment. What we were seeking there was this, and it comes as perhaps the joint thought of all. Perhaps I had better read it:

Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

What does that mean? It means this: It is the right of the secret ballot. To copy the words of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), it is the introduction of the rule of law into these matters. I am not criticizing the upper bunch in the top drawer of union leadership. But I am supporting, and will continue to support, and I trust this house will continue to support and affirm the principle of the secret ballot in any organization of this kind, just as we have it when we are elected to come here to the House of Commons.

It has been suggested that the words "before or after a strike is in progress" are meaningless. Well, let us look into the coal mining business, because I know at least a little about it. There we have what are known as pithead strikes. They are illegal. It simply comes up when someone has been called a son-of-a-gun by a foreman, or something of that kind. Out they go from the washhouse and they say, "Nobody goes down the mine to-day, daddy. We are on strike." In other words, the strike is on before anyone has voted or has a chance to vote.

So what we are saying, in No. 6, is that in strikes of that kind, after the strike is in effect the minister can go in and take a vote of those persons concerned. That is all it means. In my judgment—and I know I will be criticized for saying it—section 6 will be the biggest advance—when it is made into legislation—in labour legislation ever made at one time by this House of Commons. I have no doubt about that. I am told that it will create resentment throughout labour across the country. Well, if it does, I cannot help it. If assuring to the individual, by ballot, the right to determine his own future is a matter of resentment by labour, against me, then let them resent it. I am for the man who wishes to run his own life in his own way.

I now turn to two simple ideas of my own. I have said before, publicly, and I have said it privately, that any man in the Dominion of Canada who is willing to work is entitled to a wage, not just a living wage, but a wage which will keep him and his family in some comfort and with some of the luxuries of life. That is where we stand; that is where we should stand; that is the foundation from which all these wage rates are negotiated.

May I add this—and with this the house will be pleased to know that I shall close—that I think one of our main troubles in industrial relations in Canada lies in the fact that management and labour do not know one another. It seems to me a strange commentary that I am permitted in this House of Commons to rise in my place and say that Mr. Millard and Mr. Hilton, the director of the union and the manager of the company respectively, had to be introduced to one another in this building by Mr. Brockington.

Mr. Speaker, we shall never have decent industrial relations, peaceful industrial relations, until we are ready to credit the other chap with some honesty and some intelligence. I realize that in some places you cannot do that. I realize that we had before us one witness who, in my judgment, did not seek a settlement of the strike, but who sought only continued commotion. But that is not true of the great majority. If we can but get to know one another, and have employers and the representatives of employees really get to know one another, and to learn that the qualities of each are not bad, we shall have made some advancement. The office calls the organizer a communist; then the labour organizer in turn calls the office a fascist, and that is about the way things begin in labour relations in Canada.

So that in this, as in all other things, with a bit of tolerance, a bit of understanding, with a broader outlook aside from our own business, and with an understanding of what we are doing for the future of our whole economy, no one need worry, nor need anyone despair for the future of this great Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I think I have some right and some qualifications to speak on this question. It is a great pleasure to me to follow a former hero of old Wesley college, and an opponent in athletic contests. He gave a good account of himself then, and he has given a good account of himself to-day.

When I sat across the way I stood up and commended the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his appointing a real labour man to the position of Minister of Labour. I said this, Mr. Speaker, that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had a record second to none in Canada as a labour leader, a labour organizer and a man who had backbone enough to stand up and hit out from the shoulder. I do not think there is any man in Canada who has taken more punishment than our Minister of Labour. But when I used to take part in the manly art I found it was the man who could take the most punishment who often won out, because he could bide his time, take it in his stride, and then hit when he had the most chance for success.

If there is a man in Canada who should have the gratitude of the workers of this country, it is the Minister of Labour. I am tempted to quote from Burns these lines:

Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn.

He has taken it in his stride, and has stood for peace, order and good government. I commend him for it, and will support him to the limit. Any angel Gabriel who came down here to-day to take the position of Minister of Labour would have one of four or five organizations, or perhaps all four or five of them, on his back. If that Minister of Labour did not support the C.I.O., then he would not be good enough for them. If he did not support the C.C.L., he would not be good enough for them. If he happened to support the Catholic Union in Quebec, there would be those who would say he was out to hold Quebec for the Liberal party in Canada.

Our Minister of Labour has a job; it is a man's job, a job for a man with a head on his shoulders, a man with red blood in his veins, with lots of health and strength who would not run away from a job like this. That is our Minister of Labour.

It has been stated by many experts that we have the best labour code produced by any country in the world, and for that the minister must be commended. I do not ask the house to take that on my word. When the labour code was passed this appeared in the Montreal Herald:

Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, in a press statement made on February 17, 1944, and which is reported in the Montreal Herald, under date of February 18, 1944, is quoted as follows:

"In my opinion the regulations governing the wartime labour relations, as adopted by the federal government, will go a long way toward meeting the demands of organized labour for a satisfactory labour code and I feel the government deserves credit for its action.

One of the privileges labour unions appreciate most highly, and for the maintenance of which the free peoples of the world are fighting, is the right to criticize a government when its policies or actions are considered objectionable; but it would be unfair if it failed to be equally outspoken in commending any government for what appears to be a sincere effort to promote good relations between workers and employers.

In view of the difficulties which were inevitable in handling the unprecedented problems involved in legislation of this character, it is scarcely to be expected that there will be entire satisfaction at the outset, but I believe the government has done a good job in the circumstances and I do not hesitate to congratulate most heartily both the government and its officers who were responsible for drafting the regulations."

I could refer to what was said by Mr. Harold Crabtree, chairman of the executive of the Canadian chamber of commerce, when he paid a tribute to the minister and to the government. The official publication of the trades and labour congress, namely, the Trades and Labour Congress Journal for March, 1944, contained the following statement on its editorial page in connection with the appointment of a labour relations board:

We have at all times protested and resisted the introduction of orders in council which, in our opinion, were unnecessarily drastic. We will just as readily commend our governments when legislation is enacted which, in our considered opinion, is in the best interests of the many thousands whom we represent, and we state without fear of successful contradiction that order in council P.C. 1003 is a good piece of legislation and warrants expressing our appreciation to the government for its enactment.

The labour congress of Canada expressed its appreciation, and other leading organizations in Canada have paid a tribute which practically amounts to saying, "Thanks to you, Mr. Minister of Labour." I know the Minister of Labour has had his testing times and I confess that I was guilty of putting him through one. When the seamen were on strike I called him at one o'clock on a Sunday morning. I received a call from the trades and labour council of Fort William that eighty-four men were stranded there who had to be at work on Monday or they would suffer a $20 a day fine. Sometimes it is not easy to get a man on Sunday morning because he may be at church or he may be some place else. I took the risk of calling the minister and I told him what had happened. He replied, "Dan, we will do our best for these men." As I say, eighty-four of them were stranded at the head of the lakes because those who wanted to break the seamen's strike had taken away their boats. As a result of the minister's action, these men received their fares and were able to go back to work. So again on behalf of the seamen's union of Canada, I say, "Thanks to the Minister of Labour."

I was surprised and pleased at the discussions that took place in the industrial relations committee. I was surprised to see two leading members of the C.C.F., both keen and honest men ready to do the right thing for Canada, taking sides and voting against each other. It shows that there is some hope even for the C.C.F. notwithstanding what some people may think or say.

Mr. COLDWELL: They vote according to their conscience, which is more than the Liberal side do.

Mr. McIVOR: I stand for a square deal for the man who toils. He should have a living wage. The thing that causes a great deal of trouble in Canada and in other countries is the fact that a man has to toil six, eight, ten or more hours a day and is unable to get more than a living wage. Then he sees the man who employs him able to go to California in the winter time, able to send his children to the university. If the mother of the children of that worker puts up fifty cents an hour for a music lesson for a child, they have to skimp on something else. Somebody has said that he would rather see the great masses of the citizens of our country living in peace, in health, with sufficient food and clothing and opportunities to educate their children, than a few rolling in wealth. I do not think anybody wants the irritable discontent that follows when our workers are not properly looked after.

I stand for a living wage for every toiler. If he does not get it, it is just too bad. I must admit that the fault is not always on the one side. There are those in this house who will remember the Winnipeg strike of 1919. I took part in that strike. I interviewed the striking committee, although I was not one of those in that position. When the strike first started we were sure that the strikers were bound to win. Then the strike committee called out the bread wagons, the milk wagons; they shut off the water in some places, and they called out the firemen. I told the strike committee then, "You have gone too far." Public opinion just came back with a surge and beat the workers. It took them years to get back again what they had lost. It was not until the Liberal party in this house gave labour a square deal that they regained their ground. They have had better success than they ever had in the history of Canada.

The secretary of the trades and labour council of Fort William says that there has never been better legislation than that which was passed by the Mackenzie King government, using my own words. I would pay a tribute to the trades and labour council of Fort William because I do not think there is anything better in Canada. We have been remarkably free from strife. The head of that union was able to find time to lead a campaign to provide $40,000 for a Salvation Army hostel. That shows that he has a heart for the man who is down and I want to pay him a tribute.

As I said, strikes are not always caused by one side. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has suggested that there should be a secret ballot, and I think the same way. I support the resolutions which were passed by our committee. I think they will go a long way to help, and I think we should have a secret ballot. I can tell the story of one man, an employer of labour, who said, "If any man comes to this ballot box to vote in favour of a union in our place he will be kicked to some place out of here." Of the two men who were the first to vote, one had had twenty years service in that plant, and they both lost their jobs. I heard of rival unions that took a strike vote in a plant. They had two boxes with a union man standing at each box, one for "no" and one for "yes". That is not secret enough. A man should have a secret vote; and I think this resolution will be helpful.

In this committee I heard a statement from one of the members about which I have thought a good deal. He said that there were three stages in the development of a union leader. One was the agitation stage. I think we had an example of it in our committee, and I did not agree with that particular individual. Then there is the administrative stage, when he is willing to go a little farther and listen to what the other fellow has to say. Then there is the cooperative stage; and in that class I would put men like the late Tom Moore, who was willing to go all the way and lead his workers in cooperation with capital. Capital and labour must get together. You may have a cure for this trouble; I have it. Labour and capital must get together; if they do not, both will lose out and something else will take their place.

> Perhaps both management and labour in this country still have to learn . . . that there exists a public interest which is over all. The mood of "the public be damned," whether coming from capital or labour, has no place in our modern life, and the sooner capital and labour come to know that and to act accordingly the better it will be for them and for us all. Labour will have to learn that there can be no hope for it, no gain for it ever, beyond processing of our resources, which is our only wealth, at reasonable profit. Capital will have to learn that labour is more than a commodity, more than part of its raw materials, that it is entitled to share justly in the fruits of production.

I cannot close better than by giving a summary of a resolution passed by a group of men in Fort William, headed by a gold medallist, Doctor R. K. Dewar. These gold medallists have a little more grey matter than most of us, and if it runs in the right channel it can do some good. The resolution they sent to me stated that the men who put their money into a business have a right to a fair profit; the management and the labour who put their lives into it have an equal right, not a commodity right, but a living right to a living wage; and if there is anything available over and above that, it must be divided between those who toil and those who put their money into the business. I am glad to know that at the head of the lakes we have business concerns which are sharing their profits with their workers; and, so far from being dead, or nearly so, they are the most vigorous businesses at the head of the lakes. When a man gets a living wage he has more incentive to produce, and the more that is sold, the better it is for him and for those who employ him. The more production there is, the more money is available for the employer and the better the income for the individual.

In closing, I would just say that to my mind the remedy for our trouble to-day is to observe the old injunction, "Love your neighbour as yourself". If you hate your neighbour there is little hope for you; if you follow the leadership of Him who said "Love thy neighbour as thyself", you will go far on the way to personal and industrial peace and good will.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): As one of those who had the honour to serve on the industrial relations committee I wish, in saying a few words, to associate myself with what the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) said in regard to the chairman of that committee. It has been my experience also that the chairmen of our standing and special committees of parliament are always fair and conduct the proceedings with dignity. I may go farther, and associate myself with the hon. member for Calgary West when he said that it was a pleasure for him, to work with all the members of that committee—up to a certain point.

I am sorry, however, that I cannot go so far with him as to approve the recommendations made by the committee. Not that, with one exception, there is anything wrong with those recommendations, but in my opinion the report is an anti-climax, following the urgency of the circumstances under which the committee was set up, and that urgency has not lessened during the time the committee was sitting; if anything, it has become more grave.

Let me quote briefly from the speech made by the hon. member for Calgary West the day the committee was set up. When he proposed the committee he said this as reported in Hansard, at page 3489:

> My suggestion is this, that this house should immediately set up its industrial relations committee. To that committee should be invited—yea, brought if necessary—those persons who might not like to come. I think I am not saying anything very unusual, because there, and only there, can meet the big three, so-called—the three important people, the consumer, labour and management in industry.

A little later on, he said:

> Then it seems to me to these people on strike, and those who are talking strike, such as the meat people, the railway people and so on, this parliament should say: We have given you the last and best tribunal this Dominion of Canada knows. Come there with your problem. Meet your opponents face to face in the presence of that great referee, the consumer of Canada . . .

The consumer of Canada, if that is what the committee is, having met these people face to face, having heard their troubles, comes to this house with a solution. What is it? To call a dominion-provincial conference to set up a labour code; make a recommendation condemning the use of force in the settlement of disputes; urge that a committee be appointed to investigate the law on picketing; recommend that a measure of union security should follow certification; assert that price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control.

All of that, of course, I can support. But there is nothing in it that can do anything toward settling these disputes which are disrupting the economic life of the country at this time. They do not touch the fundamental causes of these disputes. The one I do not agree with—and I might as well deal first with the recommendations of the committee—is No. 6. The hon. member for Calgary West read it; now let me read it:

> Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

I imagine that the words "or otherwise" means, "or continue". The hon. member for Calgary West mentioned the sort of circumstances in which a vote of this nature would likely take place. He said it might happen in a mine where the men might come to the pithead some morning and, if the superintendent or the foreman did not take off his hat to the men as they came to work, they might say, "We will go on strike". Those were not his words, but it might be anything. But that is not what is in this recommendation. It says something quite different and does not refer to a pithead strike or to any particular kind of strike. It refers to any strike, before it begins or after it begins; and if this is approved by this house, the Minister of Labour, having the approval of this house, can take a strike vote in any industry where there is a strike. He can go over the heads of the elected representatives of the workers' organization and take a vote to determine, without reference to the organization at all, whether the men want to go back to work or stay on strike.

If there is a better way of destroying the trade union movement, that way has not yet been called to my attention. I say that as definitely as I can because it is implicit in this recommendation:

> . . . either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise. .

That is, or continue. Before dealing with that, the hon. member for Calgary West referred to the interview of F. B. Kilbourn, the controller appointed in the steel dispute. Mr. Kilbourn says this—and let us see in what respect it differs from the recommendation made by the committee.

> However, if it is put up to him—

That is, the settlement of the strike.

> —he said he believed his first step would be to find out the facts of the situation. He said he thought this could only be done by a thorough examination into the desires of the workers. He said he believed this could be done only by having all workers in the affected plants answer a set of questions. The survey, he said, would be conducted as balloting in an election is conducted, in complete privacy. The worker would go into a booth and write his answers and the sheet, which would bear no method of identifying the worker, would be deposited in a ballot box.

He does not advocate that the government should take the vote, or that it should be taken under the supervision of the Department of Labour, but taken by some impartial individuals. But he did not say who is to choose the impartial individuals? As a matter of fact, Controller Kilbourn is proposing, in this interview, the recommendation made by the committee in No. 6 of the report. If we do not like it we had better be quite sure of that before we adopt these recommendations.

As far as the report is concerned, I think I can leave it at that. The other six or seven recommendations are not of great value; they are neither here nor there. If they have no great value, at least they are not harmful. But as regards No. 6, as I warned the committee, so I warn this house. If you pass this you are putting your stamp of approval exactly on what the hon. member for Calgary West denounced when it was proposed by Mr. Kilbourn.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You do not expect me to agree with you, do you?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry my hon. friend will not agree with that, but I am glad to leave it to any impartial tribunal, that what I say is based on the wording of our recommendation and on the similarity of the method Mr. Kilbourn is recommending, and if my hon. friend cannot see that, he is less logical than I think he is.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One of us is; that is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: I imagine we cannot agree which one is not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I cannot get that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is too deep.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not deep at all. A part of the preamble to the report states:

> An opportunity was thus afforded for the first time for labour and management to present to a committee of parliament such statements as the terms of your order of reference required and such are on record.

It may or may not be strange, but although numerous labour organizations made representations to the committee to be heard—more labour organizations than in fact were heard—no employer, as far as I know, had asked to come before the committee. We had three employers of labour before the committee. They were all asked to appear, and no other employer of labour in Canada expressed any desire or even gave any hint that as far as he was concerned there was a committee of parliament investigating the cause of industrial unrest in Canada. If I may be allowed the expression, Canadian employers treated the committee with the utmost contempt. Perhaps that in itself should give the key to the cause of labour unrest in Canada, namely, that employers want to ignore labour in the same manner as they ignored the parliamentary committee. As far as they are concerned, the industries of Canada should be run for the profit of employers and not for the benefit of the Canadian people.

I do not think any member of the committee will deny or can deny that the real cause of the labour disputes that are at present wrecking the economy of Canada is the demand by the workers for increased wages. That is one side of it. The other side is the insistence of the government that wage increases of over ten cents an hour will not be allowed. That was the question we always came up against in the committee. As a matter of fact other questions really were not of great importance.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary West, the Minister of Labour had intensified the situation by putting his stamp of approval on increases of fifteen cents an hour in one section of Canada and then stating that in other parts of Canada increases of over ten cents an hour would not be allowed.

Mr. MITCHELL: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister says that he did not say anything of the kind. Perhaps in a sense he is correct. In the committee we could never get a direct answer as to whether a ten-cent limit was the policy of the government or not. The fact remains that regional boards—

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend dictate to the regional boards?

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Labour does.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, he does not.

Mr. MacINNIS: The statement of the deputy minister of labour in the committee was that he had instructed the regional labour board. Not only did he do that, but he said that he would give an undertaking that the national board would pass it as well.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us be fair about this. Perhaps my hon. friend will give me credit for this. He may have misunderstood me. We certainly had that out in the committee. There was the definite statement that I would recommend. I said that we were going to do the bold thing to try to prevent this strike. What I said, and what the deputy minister of labour said, was that we would recommend. We argued that out in the committee. To say that I was telling them what to do is to say something which is not right. I think I have more sense than that.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Labour will have to decide for himself just how much sense he has.

Mr. MITCHELL: Be fair about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: When I put the question to the deputy minister of labour he said that he did it and that he would do it again.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, recommend.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not to recommend.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let the record speak for itself.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what I am doing. The record is there and it can speak for itself. I say that that is the root cause of the labour unrest in Canada to-day. It can be put in this way: The cause of all our labour trouble, the cause of all disruption in industry is the difference between ten cents and fifteen cents. The steel workers gave an undertaking that if ten cents were granted now and an assurance that the other would be granted at some time decided upon by an arbitration board, they were prepared to go back to work at once.

Mr. HOWE: When did they say that?

Mr. MacINNIS: It is in the letter from Mr. Millard to Mr. Brockington and in the proposals made by Mr. Millard to the committee itself. They were prepared to go back with ten cents now, on the understanding that the other five cents would be paid later, at some time within the calendar year.

Mr. MITCHELL: With 20½ cents at Sydney.

Mr. MacINNIS: With the differential at Sydney. If my memory serves me aright they were prepared to refer that to arbitration.

Mr. MAYBANK: No; that was ruled out of arbitration.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will not argue the point. Whatever Donald Gordon may say, I am convinced that the labour disputes which are disrupting industry in Canada during the last six or seven weeks, two months in some instances, are doing this country a great deal more harm than the increases which the workers are asking if they were granted.

Let us remember this. I know the minister will not agree with me. He always regales us with what happened in Germany in 1919, and the danger that it may happen here. Really that does not impress me, and I should be very much surprised if it would impress the minister himself if he gave it a little thought.

Mr. MITCHELL: The minister says without equivocation that the working classes always pay the freight when you get into an inflationary period. That has been true in every country where it has happened, just as they are paying the freight in the United States at the moment, in France, in Holland, in Belgium and in any country to which you wish to go. The working classes always pay the freight.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will go much farther than that and say that the workers have paid the freight whether there has been inflation or not. They have always done so. They have carried the world on their backs, and those people who sympathize with labour are prepared to do anything except get off their backs.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member does not mean that.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member does not mean that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course I mean it; there is no reason why I should not.

There are a number of factors which enter into our industrial difficulties. The first is the natural hostility—I say "natural hostility"—which exists between workers and employers.

It is the hostility which exists between buyers and sellers, no matter where you find them. In this country the employers have not yet reached the stage where they are willing to accept their employees as citizens of the community and deal with them as citizens with equal rights with themselves.

One of the things which impressed me in the various documents placed before the committee is that, despite all the education, all the laws and regulations which were passed during the war years, the employers of Canada are still opposed to meeting and negotiating in good faith with their employees. When you have employers acting in that way you will have employees who will use their power to the limit, the moment they feel that they have power. Let me quote briefly from some of the documents which were placed before us. I have in my hand a report on Brunner Mond, by Magistrate J. A. Hanrahan, who was appointed a commissioner in this dispute by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). The report states:

> The contract between this company and workers expired last November. Amendments suggested by employees were submitted last September. Members of negotiating committee complain very bitterly of what they describe as the disheartening delaying tactics of company from then until July of this year—

That is from September of last year until July of this year. Do you wonder there are strikes?

> —which prevented a new agreement being completed and finally made strike action imperative. This is a factor that has undoubtedly contributed to the present very firm demand for some form of union security and warrants the conclusion that it comes from deeply affronted employees rather than having been inspired by union officials.

Then from the same document:

> The general good will and earnest desire of this local to act fairly with company is further evidenced by fact that when strike was called no objection was taken to main office staff, engineers of pump house and purification plant, boiler room and engine room, engine crew to haul coal, crane operators to load cars of coal and remove ashes, the chief engineer, the fire protection chief and the chief electrician for safety remaining on duty. As you are aware this is somewhat contrary to local practice. The company does object to what they describe as illegal picketing.
> I have wired appeals to Mr. Robert W. Atkinson, sales manager of Brunner Mond of Canada, Montreal, and Mr. Carlton Bates, director of operations, Solvay process, Syracuse, N.Y., whom workers believe are really determining company policy in this matter for a modification of their instructions to Mr. J. B. Aylesworth, K.C.

But no matter what the appeals were, these people do not want to deal with their employees, and they are willing to disrupt the industry of Canada in order to defeat the efforts of their employees to organize. I was also interested in the report of Judge Cameron, who was commissioner in another dispute. I thought his report, in putting blame on both parties, was most fair and in that way was in direct contrast to the report on the steel strike, made by Commissioner Roach. In his report, at page 985 of the reports and proceedings of the industrial relations committee, Judge Cameron said:

> The extreme rigidity with which the strategy committee regarded the "seven point programme" is seen in the case of one company which had negotiated a contract in February, 1946, and which resulted in substantial wage increases. The union stated that in spite of wage increases then given and after discussion of the "seven point programme," it still insisted that an additional 20 cents an hour should be granted by that company.

Then he continues:

> On the other hand, I think it fair to say some of the companies have not approached the negotiations in a realistic manner. The union's programme was presented to the companies as a basis for local negotiations more than six months ago—

Those who recall that there is a rubber strike in progress in Canada at the present time, which has been going on for some two months, will remember that the rubber workers had tried to negotiate for six months before the strike was called.

> —and in a number of cases concrete counter-proposals were never made by management. I am satisfied that a more reasoned approach to the problems involved, rather than a mere rejection in toto of all the requests made, would at that stage have brought about satisfactory results on a plant basis in some cases.

The reply of the committee to that is a recommendation that the government take a strike vote, after the employees have been on strike for two months or more, to see how they feel about going back.

A good deal has been said in the press and elsewhere about the attitude of trade union officials. A remarkable report or finding was made by a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Rand, last fall in the Windsor automobile dispute. I do not know how many hon. members have read it, but if they have not already read it I suggest that they do so. They will find that this justice of the Supreme Court of Canada does not agree that the labour leaders or trade union leaders in Canada are irresponsible. He says:

> I have had an opportunity of sizing up the leadership of this union so far as it is represented by the committee of negotiation. The members are all of English-speaking origin and British citizenship. They have impressed me as being made of the stuff of which ordinary Canadians are made. With the exception of Messrs. Burt and MacLean who are on leave of absence from General Motors at Oshawa as international representatives of the union, they are men with seniority in the Ford plant ranging from ten to eighteen years. They conducted themselves in negotiation with intelligence and reasonableness. I have no doubt their dominating interest is the job of those they represent in that industry and that their object is to attain for those employees and their families a secure and self-respecting living, which seems to be the object of most Canadians. That aim is legitimate, whether or not attainment is possible.

It has been suggested that the union officers, as other labour leaders, are primarily concerned with the maintenance of their positions and power and no doubt some of them have experienced stirrings of that nature. But union organization is admittedly necessary in the present set-up of our society and we cannot expect these men who have gifts of leadership—and it is by such leaders that movements against wrongs are initiated—to be quite free of those human frailties from which only a few saints escape. The only effective remedy for abuse of this nature is a greater democratization of the union.

And may I say that greater democratization of the union cannot be brought about by taking away the powers and prerogatives of union members by insisting that the government may take a strike vote at any time it wishes. We cannot get democratic unions unless we give union responsibilities, and insist, too, that they discharge those responsibilities as citizens.

The second reason—and I have dealt with it before—for industrial disputes is the refusal of employers to deal fairly with their employees. The third, in my opinion, is the failure of the government to impress upon employers, upon workers, and upon the public generally, the urgent need for production.

Even before the war came to an end, a cry went up for the removal of all controls—"Let us get back to business as it was". Of course that meant business as it was before the war when employers had hundreds of thousands of unemployed who could fill any jobs which might be offering. Hon. members fell for that sort of thing. Demands were made on the government every day from this side of the house by the official opposition for removal of controls. I was amazed to see how quickly those hon. members were impressed by Donald Gordon when he appeared before the committee.

Consequently there is no recommendation from the committee stating that in its opinion it would be better to grant the increases in industries where they are asked, and get those industries operating. With our improved productive capacity, in my opinion we would in no time catch up with demand. We would not be looking for commodities to meet needs, but for needs which could take the commodities we had to offer.

I do not think we have any idea of how the productive capacity of this country has increased during the war. Even in Great Britain, where the whole economy of the country was put to war uses, they have made a remarkable, one might almost say a miraculous come-back in the production of ordinary consumer goods. But in Great Britain employers, labour, the government and consumers got together to discuss production, and the needs of production.

I have here an item from the London Daily Herald of July 31, 1946, which states:

> Important plans for close consultation at top level on economic matters between industry and the government were outlined in parliament yesterday by Mr. Ness Edwards, parliamentary secretary to the ministry of labour.
> This consultation is to be through the minister of labour's national joint advisory council, on which the trades union congress and the British employers' confederation are represented.
> That council, superseded during the war by a smaller body, is being reconstituted, and will hold its first meeting soon.
> Mr. Edwards said: "there is no intenton of departing from the government's declared policy of entrusting responsibility for determination of terms and conditions of employment to the joint machinery of negotiation between employers' and workpeoples' organizations.
> "But the government considers that it will assist and reinforce this machinery of joint negotiation if there is the closest possible contact between the two sides and the government."

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you are going to tell me my time is up. I shall just say that on various occasions I have urged the Minister of Labour to bring the different factors in industry together and to impress upon them the urgent necessity for production, not only for our own welfare in Canada, but for those things for which our young men died during the war. That is of the utmost importance. But it cannot be accomplished with Pollyanna proposals such as are contained in the report of the committee on industrial relations.

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the hon. members for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) in paying tribute to the chairman of the committee.. Perhaps I could sum up in these words, he was a happy choice.

I enjoyed working in the committee with all its members at all times. I was particularly impressed to-day when the hon. member for Calgary West drew on his wide knowledge and experience, his broad understanding, and gave us a treat in what I believe was a brilliant summation of what took place in the forty-nine sittings of the committee. But it left very little for me to say. To follow the hon.

member for Vancouver East, with his thoroughness and knowledge of his subject, leaves even less.

I do believe this, though, that it can fairly be said the country expected too much and got too little from the committee. Rather than devote myself to a discussion of the various portions of the report, I shall discuss only one or two phases of it. The hon. member for Calgary West has already indicated that I opposed section 6. Members of the committee know that full well. I consider it important, however, that this section be understood by the house; we have already had some misunderstandings.

I feel strongly in the matter, and this prompts me to read the section once again, because each one who has read it has emphasized a different part. It states:

> Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

What does that mean, as a practical solution of labour disputes which have already been carried to the point of strikes? I suggest that we should examine the clause carefully. Let us assume for the moment that a strike is in progress. Hon. members know full well that this means that all or part of the men have walked out. It means, too, that a picket line has been established. It may be that the machinery in the plant is silent, or that machines are being manned by employees who are not on strike. It may also mean that machines are being manned by others who have been brought in as strike-breakers.

The recommendation says that the minister is empowered to order a vote at the request of either party to a dispute. Once a strike has taken place, all the minister can determine is something that is self-evident. A vote by whom? It says, "The men affected." We have the right to assume that "the men affected" means both sexes of all ages. I believe that was the intention of the committee.

Let us see who are the men affected by a strike vote. No one will deny that the strikers, the people who are on the picket line, have a right to vote. No one will deny that those who disagreed and continued production, whether they passed through the picket line or whether they were parties to a lock-in, are entitled to vote. The third group would be the persons who were hired by the company since the strike began and who are dependent upon the company for their present and future livelihood, the people who are commonly known as strike-breakers. The fourth group included in the term "the men affected" would be the office help, the messenger boys, the stenographers, the foremen, the superintendents, the technical people right up to the vice-presidents.

Can anyone suggest that they are not all men who are affected by the strike? Can we afford to accept this recommendation and turn our backs on the Rand formula which brought about a new equation in labour relations, which said in effect that union security equals company security? In my opinion that was the most progressive and socially minded document on labour relations that this country has enjoyed in the forty years since the industrial disputes act was passed. We ought to give it an opportunity to see if it will work before we disregard it.

The decision was first given in the Ford case at Windsor. I have known of the labour relations in that company for twenty years. The annual report of the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited was presented before the committee, and a portion of it indicated that they were in complete and absolute agreement with the Rand formula. More than that, it had brought peace to the plant; it had brought unity to the plant; it had improved the man to man relationships. It has been said that the Ford Motor Company was decentralizing, and one of the reasons offered was its labour relations. However, to-day plants on the outside are being sold and they are moving in again to Windsor. They are doing this because labour relations are such that they once again feel they can carry on in Windsor.

The Rand formula laid down fundamental principles for this country. Mr. Justice Rand made the bold statement that all workers in a plant benefit from union representation; that all should contribute but that they need not join the union unless they so wished. He declared that in case of a strike every employee, whether he be a union member or a contributor, should have the right to vote. No one could quarrel with that and I think this house generally endorses it. In effect he said that those who share the benefits should also share the penalties. If we accept the committee's recommendation we turn our backs on Mr. Justice Rand's decision and the government will be disowning the very child that it brought into being.

The other part of the clause speaks of a vote under government supervision at the request of either party to the dispute. If we have a strike, we have already had a vote and the union has had a mandate. Will the union ask for another vote? Can anyone conceive of any possible circumstance under which the union would ask for a vote? Let us examine the other side for a minute. I think we can appreciate that there will be occasions in a dispute when an employer would consider it advantageous, particularly if all the men affected would have the right to vote. Let the strikers' morale sink to a low point. Let the compaign reduce the resistance of the strikers' families. Let the plant be loaded with strike-breakers. Let the employees who have not gone on strike be paid triple pay. Let those things happen, and the employer will certainly call for a vote.

Let us assume for a moment that the employer has picked the time properly. A vote is taken and the minister then determines that a strike does not exist. What happens when the minister says that there is no strike? It is obvious that it then becomes a disturbance of the peace. It is inevitable, if we are to have law and order in this country, that either the police or troops will have to be called in to deal with the matter of the disturbance of the peace. The only alternative is that production resumes on the employer's terms. That is what I think this clause means and I so submit to the house. I think the government is put in an impossible position, because under these circumstances it may well be accused, not without some justice and some truth, that it is in the business of strike-breaking.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CROLL: Before this house rose at six o'clock, I was dealing with section 6, and pointing out to the house that this section lends itself to many and varied interpretations. My second point is that section 6 in its present form will defeat collective bargaining, which is now the law of the land under P.C. 1003, in that it will result in a greater reliance upon the state, which betrays a lack of faith in collective bargaining and the democratic processes of unions. If section 6 stays "as is", it will inject the government into almost every labour dispute, with the result that in the final analysis it will be fixing not only wages but working conditions, and it may well be interpreted to be attempting a legislative short-cut to bring about industrial peace. That, I submit to the house, has already been tried. May I point out that the German labour front—and I apologize to the minister for even mentioning that as a labour movement in the same breath with our own—was modeled exactly on that principle. In times of a dispute they immediately used a referendum, with the result that unions lost their independence, lost their identity, very shortly became instruments of the state, and faded and vanished from the scene completely. I think hon. members will agree with me that it would be a catastrophe to weaken responsible trade unions, because they have a niche in our way of life and they belong.

My third point is based on the words "before a strike is in progress". I assume that would mean the negotiating stage. Let us assume that the company offers six cents and the union counters with twelve cents. The minister is then put in the difficult position of having to decide if six cents is a fair offer, and he may step in and take the vote. I submit to the house, is it not quite possible that without a dislocation of industry the final result would be that the union would receive nine cents? Those who were members of the committee will remember this particular evidence. Stelco first offered five and a half cents, then ten cents, and finally eleven cents—ten cents straight and a cent for holidays.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Where was the evidence of that?

Mr. HOWE: There is no evidence of that.

Mr. CROLL: Oh, yes; there were six holidays there, which made up another cent. Mr. Brockington's report indicates it. Algoma made an offer of six cents and finally raised it to eight cents. I do not think Dosco ever made an offer; it was consistent throughout. But I remember very well Mr. Justice Roach giving evidence and using words to this effect: "When they close the books you will have had the final offer." It is a matter of judgment whether you have had it or not. He was then talking about a conference which he was holding in Algoma on July 8. As a matter of fact the evidence discloses that at that very time when Mr. Justice Roach thought he had the final offer, an offer of ten cents was being made here in Ottawa. That is not a criticism of Mr. Justice Roach; he had every reason to believe what he did, but it is difficult to say when you have had the final offer.

I think the minister can perform a useful function without departing from his non-partisan role. What we want is a vote of the men who are concerned, a secret vote by qualified voters. We are opposed to telegraphed votes and we are opposed to voting deadheads. With that I think the house and country will generally agree. And, rather than the clause as it stands, it occurs to me that a clause reading something like this would be more useful: "That a strike vote will be taken under government auspices of members of the bargaining agency and other employees within the bargaining unit who contribute to the maintenance of the bargaining agency." There is a natural desire on the part of the non-union employees, the management, the public and the government to find out how great the sentiment is in favour of the strike. Is the strike desired by the members of the bargaining agency, or is it a mockery for the furtherance of minorities' ambitions? There can be no objection to that, and I certainly have none. My objection is that the present clause is so ambiguous that it becomes highly dangerous, and under it unions will be compelled to fight what may appear to them and may actually be unfair or unjust decisions; they will be forced to fight for their very existence, and they will often be placed in the invidious position of striking against the government, with the result that it may lead to such industrial strife that only two sections in this country will profit, the people on the extreme left and the people on the extreme right.

Mr. HOMUTH: How would they be striking against the government after a vote?

Mr. CROLL: If a vote were taken and they continued with their strike they would be striking against the government.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Oh, nonsense, nonsense. The hon. member is too bright to say a thing like that.

Mr. CROLL: Mr. Speaker, my suggestion is that if the clause is not deleted the minister should make a considered statement as to his understanding of that particular section. In its present form the section may well be a menace and may mine the road to industrial peace.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can do that and I do not think I am a fool. I believe my judgment is just as good as the judgment of the hon. member who has just spoken. I am not going to embarrass a trade union and I am not going to embarrass an employer. What I shall endeavour to do is to be fair, and if both sides are "on the up and up", if they are playing the game as it should be played—

Mr. HOMUTH: You will not need to have a vote.

Mr. MITCHELL: —you will not even have the vote. I do not want to take up too much time, but I can tell the committee lots of things about votes. I have sat in on more disputes than any other man in the country, and I can tell my hon. friend a lot of things about votes. It is not only the politicians that are accused of stuffing ballot boxes.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not give us now your interpretation of clause 6?

Mr. CROLL: The fear I had was that some day in the far distant future the present Minister of Labour may not be Minister of Labour—

Mr. HOMUTH: There is no question about that.

Mr. CROLL: —and for that reason—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad the hon. gentleman agrees that it is in the far distant future.

Mr. CROLL: —I thought it would be in the interests of all concerned if we had a considered statement from the minister. I close by saying this. I think it would be very wise that, in our anxiety to correct what appears to be a bad situation, we do not overreach.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In the steel strike and the other strikes in progress or threatened in Canada we are witnessing a clash between the old order and the new, between the old order of scarcity, of want, and of fear, and the new order of plenty and of freedom from want and fear. On the one side we have the government and the companies striving to force this nation back into the shackles of scarcity; on the other side we have the workers' unions struggling to strike from labour's limbs the age-long fetters of poverty. More specifically, it is a conflict between the labour unions and the government of Canada. In a deeper sense the battle is between the workers on one side and the orthodox financial system on the other, between progress and reaction.

The task assigned your committee was, and I quote from the terms of reference:

> to investigate, immediately, all issues connected with and appertaining to the present industrial unrest in Canada.

And again:

> and to report their findings and conclusions to the house.

Before proceeding, I should like to join the other members who have spoken in a word of appreciation of the members of the committee. I found the chairman fair and conscientious; I found the steering committee industrious and thorough; I found the members of the committee devoted to their duty and, in very large measure, tolerant and patient. I enjoyed every minute of the long periods we spent together.

The report of the committee aims to be unbiased, not to take sides. It aims to be judicious, not to aggravate the difficulties, and it aims to be helpful. But the report falls far short of expectations—the expectations of labour, of industry, of the government and of the country. What the committee did was to hear briefs for labour, for industry, and for the government against granting labour's request, and for the government to show why its machinery for dealing with industrial disputes is adequate.

Without desiring to reflect at all on the steering committee, I may say that, as I review the whole situation, it does look to be a peculiar bill of fare for a committee charged with the responsibility with which this committee was charged.

The committee found an apparently impossible situation. I believe every member of the committee was consciously or unconsciously aware of that fact. We had labour demanding in effect fifteen cents an hour increase and a 40-hour week. We had industry affirming that it cannot or will not pay that amount. We had the government insisting that any wage increase above ten cents will cause inflation. We had this fact; that the 15-cent increase to the steel industry would be taken as a pattern all over the country and would cause demands in every industry for similar increases. We found each increase in wages tending to cause a corresponding increase in the cost of goods and consequently in the cost of living; and each increase in costs of goods tending to force demands for higher wages. This was a situation which I think everybody realized and it caused everybody a measure of frustration. There was this additional truth underlying the whole situation, that if costs of production in Canada were increased too far through wage advances, then two serious results would come about. In the first place, Canadian industries would be unable to sell their goods in Canada in competition with goods of a similar nature coming in from outside, and, in the second place, Canadian industries would be unable to sell their goods in competition with the goods of other countries on the world's markets.

It would be extremely difficult to find more complications for one committee of men to deal with in one month. What could possibly be done to provide a square deal for all? The whole Canadian economy was thus in reality found to be in an economic straitjacket. No matter how much we produced, men could get no more. As a matter of fact, the more we increased our production in Canada, the more we increased our real wealth, in all probability the worse would be our poverty. Obviously, something was radically wrong. The committee was not given an opportunity to investigate that which was wrong or what might be done to correct the strange paradoxes which were discovered to exist, the strange conflicts and contradictions.

The committee failed to do a number of important things. It failed to get evidence to support Donald Gordon's contention that an advance of more than ten cents would cause inflation or an increase in the cost of living. I was astounded at the readiness, almost the abject humility with which the committee listened to this man lay down the law to them, accepting him without question. After seeing these same men act in the House of Commons, I found myself at a loss to understand what had happened.

The committee failed to get a clear picture of the situation as regards inflation. Donald Gordon said that an increase of more than ten cents would cause inflation, but we never had clearly defined for us what inflation was. It was never laid down in so many words, and we never demanded that it should be so laid down, that, after all, inflation is only a rise in prices. It was never laid down to us that the ordinary cause of inflation is a shortage of goods. It was implied several times, but never specifically stated. The committee never had given it the causes of inflation. There are three of them; first, the scarcity of goods in relation to the amount of money in circulation in the hands of the consumer and coming into the markets to buy; second, an increase in costs which will force up the price, and third the manipulation or the writing-up of the price. These causes of inflation were never laid down definitely before the committee.

The committee never learned, or never had the evidence brought before it, to show the safeguards which might be used against inflation or the remedies for inflation. It was never shown, in any scientific sense, to what extent the causes of inflation are operating in Canada to-day, the extent to which the safeguards against inflation are being employed in Canada, or the extent to which the remedies for inflation are being recognized and used by the Canadian government, or are available to the Canadian government, or could be made available to the government, or could be used by the government. The result was that the whole concept of inflation was left nebulous.

The committee failed to get evidence to show whether each of the steel companies could, without increasing prices of its products, pay the minimum wage demands of the union.

We had the statements of the companies, but never an examination in any scientific and thorough way by anybody, by men appointed by the government to do just that thing and give a report to the committee. We never learned exactly what is the financial position of each of the companies, how fat it is, to use a common and rather vulgar expression, how much of the fat the Canadian people have the right to oblige the companies to lose. The committee never had set out before it how much capital is legitimately invested in each company, or how much was put into it; how much of its savings had been reinvested in equipment, how much watered stock is in the capital of each company. I was astonished to find that matters of that sort were never outlined to us in any detail.

We never had brought before us how much yearly profit each company had made, or the average yearly profit over say twenty-five years, which I think is an important matter, or whether or not that rate of profit was reasonable; that is, whether it was enough in comparison with what ought to be reasonable. We never had a standard set before the committee to show what should be the reasonable profit of a company. We never had the question answered, is that profit rate large enough to encourage men of means to invest their money in this industry, or is that profit rate large enough to stimulate the company to optimum production, or is the financial strength of the company all that is required to enable it to compete successfully in the Canadian market against steel coming in from other countries; and then to compete in foreign markets? Until these questions could be answered regarding each company, it was obviously utterly impossible for the members of the committee to form any accurate conception whatsoever as to whether the companies could pay.

The committee failed to get evidence to show whether, under the present financial system, it would be economically feasible for the government to subsidize each of the steel companies sufficiently to enable it to pay increased wage demands without increasing the prices of the product, to subsidize either with money from taxation or with money borrowed. This matter was never canvassed, yet is one which I think was an important issue pertaining to the problem which the committee had to study.

The committee failed to get evidence to show whether or not the wage demands of the steel union are excessive. At present prices in Canada what is the wage required to support a family in health and decency? No evidence whatsoever was submitted. Apparently the government gave no attention to that problem, whereas it would seem to me that that matter should have been gone into with great care as applied to Hamilton, Sault Ste. Marie and Sydney.

The committee never did get evidence to show whether, under the present financial system, the Canadian economy can stand to pay the union wage demands, financially or physically. Considering the fact that there would be corresponding increases throughout all industry, when we remember the broad terms of the problem submitted to the committee it must be surprising that no such evidence was brought before the committee which was supposed to examine into all the issues pertaining to the industrial unrest in Canada.

The committee never did get evidence to show whether or not, under the present financial system, it would be practicable to bring down by subsidies the cost of living to the level, say of January 1, 1945. This matter would have had an important bearing upon the wage demands of the union. We never went into that question.

The committee never got evidence to show whether or not each of these steel companies, namely, Stelco, Algoma and Dosco, is essential to the welfare of the Canadian people. It did not get evidence to show whether, and to what extent, the manufacturing of steel for export is essential to the Canadian economy. It failed to get evidence to show whether or not government ownership of these three steel companies and of other companies if necessary would enable the Canadian government to provide the workers with a living standard of decency and health without increasing prices, without impairing production, without jeopardizing the economic and competitive stability of the companies, without curtailing freedom to strike and bargain collectively.

The committee did not get evidence to show whether and to what extent debt-free money created by the state could be safely employed to pay either subsidies requisite for bringing down the cost of living, or wage bonuses to the workers, thereby increasing their incomes without increasing the cost of producing steel. Certainly this would be an important issue pertaining to the whole problem of industrial unrest in Canada. Lacking information as regards each of these important issues which I have mentioned, connected with and as pertaining to the steel strike as a manifestation of the present industrial unrest in Canada the committee, I submit, failed to report conclusions upon the matters of wage rates and hours of labour, the two vital bones of contention in the whole struggle. This fact I think must be looked upon as being surprising.

When the committee commenced its operations I believe everybody realized that the two vital questions being asked were whether we could grant wage increases in the amount demanded and whether we could give the workers hours of labour which they requested. Yet we made no report bearing on either one of these essential matters, largely because we failed to get the evidence which would have enabled us to form a sound opinion upon these two most important matters.

We found, Mr. Speaker, that the problem was exceedingly grave, as I have already indicated.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not think it should be necessary for an hon. member to rise and ask for the courtesy of a decent hearing for an hon. member who is speaking. This thing has gone on so long that it gets under my skin, and I ask that you call order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: From the amount of talking that is going on in and around the chamber one would think hon. members were not the slightest bit concerned about this strike, or that they assume that hon. members of this group know absolutely nothing about it, notwithstanding the fact that they themselves do not know what in the world to do with this problem. If anyone can imagine a more grotesque situation than that I should be glad to have him call me up some morning and tell me about it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Don't two of you jump on us; one is enough.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is good: I hope it will not become necessary again. It is an easy matter just to start talking, you know, and make it absolutely impossible for an hon. member to be heard even by those who wish to hear him.

The gravity of the problem, Mr. Speaker, becomes manifest when you consider the psychology which is abroad in the country at the present time. There is a dangerous psychology on all sides. First, with respect to labour, the present labour leaders in Canada have seen strange things in this glorious country of ours. Let us not forget for a moment that these memories have been in their minds all through this struggle. After the first world war, in the twenties, the labouring people saw a period of almost unprecedented prosperity in Canada. Trade was buoyant; production was bountiful; credit was relatively easy to get. But the incomes of the great rank and file of the Canadian people were meagre; they were shamefully low.

Then suddenly in 1928 and 1929 something happened. Then came the baffling thirties. All the farms, the forests, the mines, the fisheries and the factories were still in Canada. All the splendid people of Canada were still in this country; skilful, ambitious, industrious, patriotic, patient and cooperative; the same people who eagerly produced and gloriously fought in world war I; the same people who within ten years were to dazzle the world with their magnificent production for world war II and their splendid and heroic striking impact wherever they found the foe.

All through the terrible thirties, I say, these great resources were in Canada; the same Canadian people were present in Canada; the warehouses were bulging; Canadian store shelves were sagging with goods. Yet Canadian industries stood half idle; Canadian workers, yearning for work, languished in idleness or rode the rods or camped on the roadside, while a Liberal member of parliament honoured the men who were to become the heroes of Dieppe, of Sicily, of Ortona, of the Falaise Gap by styling them "spineless yaps and street-corner bums."

Canadian misery was widespread. "There is no money" was the plea in parliament and press, on platforms and in the offices of bank managers. The cry was repeated and reiterated dismally, "There is no money."

Then suddenly war broke out. Money soon was everywhere. It sprang up like grass blades in the spring. Whereas previously we had spoken of a million dollars with considerable respect, if not reverence, we now began talking and thinking glibly of billions; billions for tanks, aeroplanes, ships; billions for guns and gasoline; billions for pork and eggs; billions to lend abroad or give away. Government officials and cabinet ministers declared sternly that what was physically possible would be made financially possible. The only factors limiting our war effort were to be materials and man-power.

By 1944, though more than one million of our finest producers were overseas fighting, Canada was able to produce an almost stupendous quantity of tanks, aeroplanes, guns, ships and so on; of food, clothing and other necessities with which to supply our fighting and auxiliary forces; food and supplies to provide for our allies; food and clothing for ourselves, to provide the people at home with a higher standard of living than they ever enjoyed before in history.

Now labour and all thoughtful citizens in Canada want to know; is our Canadian peace effort to be as successful as was our war effort? Is our peace effort, as was our war effort, to be conducted upon the principle that what is physically possible will be made financially possible? And if not, why not?

This question is in the minds of the labouring men all over this country, and the whole situation causes a dangerous psychological set-up. Already labour has been told that the Canadian Liberal government cannot afford money for the payment of subsidies to keep down the price of milk for the poor man's family, to keep down the prices of jams, jellies, corn syrup, corn starch, raisins, prunes and other vital commodities for his table; to keep down the price of clothes for himself or his children.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Two hundred million dollars for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member will have plenty of opportunity to talk when I am finished, but then he will not feel like talking. We cannot find money for anything to help the poor, struggling Canadians who fought or who gave sons to fight; who paid the taxes; who toiled at the wheels. Already men in high places are beginning to think, and soon will begin to say, "There is no money." Common sense clearly tells us that in that direction lies depression, misery and black despair. If anyone supposes that this sort of thinking is not in the mind of practically every labouring man in Canada, then he needs to learn what is in the minds of the labouring men; he needs to get them talking. We experienced poverty in the midst of plenty in the hungry thirties. Are we being led toward an even more hopeless poverty in even more hungry fifties? And shall we, as Canadians, tamely submit to this sort of thing?

With respect to the psychology in industry; the industries of this country themselves, the very industries which are now struggling against labour, saw depression. They saw overproduction; they saw lack of markets; they saw their factories partly idle; they saw increased overhead, and by reason of that fact they sustained losses. Now they see the repetition of that depression coming, in which there will be shortage of purchasing power and failure of markets both at home and abroad. They see productive capacity greatly increased; then they see taxation very burdensome already, and their troubles increasing.

Mr. GRANT: Can't they sell post cards?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now they are full of fear for the future. This was made abundantly clear, I believe, by each of their representatives who appeared before the committee.

Mr. GRANT: Good money in post cards.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; you are deeply interested in solving the problems of the nation; wonderfully interested!

Now, as to the people of Canada as a whole, from coast to coast; they also fear the future. They fear unemployment; they fear depression; they fear an increased cost of living; they fear ruinous taxation which they are now enduring and by which they are being crushed. They fear painful shortages. This is the psychology obtaining throughout Canada; this is the background against which this strike struggle is being carried on.

There simply must be a solution which will be a real solution, not a return to former ways of doing things. Public feeling is running high. There may be grave disorders. There is economic necessity for a solution different from anything we have had before. I am going to quote a passage from the report of the Bank of Canada for 1944, by Graham Towers. This passage indicates quite clearly that the writer saw there would have to be great changes, but we see no evidence of any contemplation of such great changes by the present government. This is one of the things which distress and dishearten the people as a whole. I quote from page 12:

> It seems likely, however, that at least 4,700,000 workers will be available for employment in civilian jobs, or at least 1,500,000 more than the number employed in that sector of the economy at the present time. A working force of this size, at present rates of efficiency, will be able to produce a vastly greater volume of civilian goods and services than Canada has ever known before.

Is it to be supposed, I interpolate, that industry does not realize that?

> By the same token, a vastly increased volume of consumption and capital development will be necessary if this output is going to be fully absorbed and high employment maintained. The adjustments required will clearly be of unprecedented magnitude, and bold planning on the part of labour, farm and business organizations, as well as governments, is urgently needed.

There is a warning of extremely great portent. That was in 1944, but there appears no inclination, and there appeared to be no inclination before the committee to take into consideration matters of that kind.

May I turn to another set of figures at page 9 of Graham Towers' Bank of Canada Report of 1946. A set of figures is given there which indicates the tremendous productive power of Canada. In 1944 she produced $11·8 billion worth of goods and services, and in 1945 $11·4 billion worth. All such amounts of goods and services must be purchased in the post-war years somehow or another. The government spent in 1944 $5·4 billion on those goods and services, and shipped them away to be wasted. And in 1945 the government spent $4·5 billion.

This vast expenditure will fall off, now that the war is over. What is going to take the place of that purchasing power in the Canadian economy to absorb Canadian goods? Any thoughtful person will ask that question with great apprehension. The people of Canada, because of the war incomes they were enjoying in 1944 spent $6·2 billion, and in 1945 they spent $6·5 billion, whereas in 1938 the poor, unfortunate Canadian people were able to spend only $3·7 billion. We are rapidly returning to the 1938 position, as the economic incidence of war is falling off.

Now the question arises: What is going to happen with all this tremendous production? One of the men representing industry definitely referred to that three or four times in his evidence—the anxiety he felt regarding the future.

It is a well known fact that the Canadian income in 1941 was exceedingly low. I have already put on record twice this year evidence to show that in the year preceding June 2, 1941, for all Canada 32·9 per cent of Canadian wage-earners were receiving $450 a year or less; 28·7 per cent received between $450 and $949 yearly, and 91·5 per cent of the total Canadian population received less than $1,950 a year.

It must be obvious to anyone that some tremendous measure must be taken to replace the purchasing power which evidently is going to fall off. What is being done? This whole matter was actually part of the problem. It should have had scrutinizing attention from the committee.

May I offer what would have been the Social Credit proposals, if the Social Credit group had been making recommendations to parliament. We would have recommended, first, that Mr. Millard's wage offer to Mr. Brockington was fair and reasonable. I believe practically everyone agrees with that.

We would have recommended, second, that the government should reopen the plants at once on the basis of Mr. Millard's offer.

In reopening the plants the government should adopt those requisite measures which might appear best calculated (1) to avoid further price increases in Canada and (2) to avoid impairment of the economic stability of the steel companies.

We would have recommended, third, that the government should immediately begin to take all necessary steps to reduce the Canadian cost of living with the objective of bringing that cost of living back to the level prevailing on January 1, 1945. That objective should be attained not later than January 1, 1947, and, if possible, by November 1, 1946.

Fourth, the money necessary to implement these recommendations, the government should obtain by a series of "win the peace" victory loans, the first of the "win the peace" victory loans to be offered in the fall of 1946.

Fifth, the government should appoint a royal commission on industrial relations to examine into each of the issues the committee failed to investigate.

The royal commission should study with care the many issues the committee ought to have studied in order to be able to make an intelligent report on the whole of industrial unrest throughout Canada.

The reasons for the recommendations I have mentioned are these:

First, Mr. Millard's wage offer to Mr. Brockington was not excessive. Canadian industry can produce enough goods to provide a standard of living for Canadians consistent with such an income as this wage rate would allow. This wage will do very little more than give health and decency to workers. Workers ought to be able to save. Canadian producers need more purchasing power in the hands of consumers to supply the producers of Canada with home markets.

The government should reopen the plants on the basis of Mr. Millard's offer to Mr. Brockington, because production in Canada has already been far too much impaired. The loss we have already sustained in the Canadian economy is almost irreparable. Confidence among both employers and employees in Canada ought to be restored at the earliest possible moment, and the government ought to lead the way into the new order of abundance.

All during the war we heard talk about the new order that was to be. Even on one occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) waxed enthusiastic and talked about a new heaven and a new earth. Why in the world does he not come to grips with our economic problems, and lead the way into that new order? Why do his ministers stand as blocks in the way, while labour has to struggle and risk its all in order to force the government into something like a progressive policy? That is a question any ordinary man would ask. The government ought to lead the way.

In reopening the plants it should adopt measures which will avoid price increases. The wage increases could be given as a government bonus, which would not enhance costs of production. Failing that, the government could subsidize plants to enable them to absorb costs of wage increases.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I had more time I would be happy to answer any questions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry to have interrupted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the hon. member would ask his questions when the estimates of the Department of Labour are before the committee, and we will take them up then.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I gather the hon. member does not permit a question; is that right?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member is talking about subsidizing industry. He would go so far as to say that to hold prices he would subsidize all industry in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it should be found necessary. But if the hon. member will wait until I have finished what I have to say, he will see where this money is coming from.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say I did not intend to be rude; I was just looking for information.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I understand that, fully. I wish to say now that hon. members all over the house laugh at any talk about where the money will come from. Mr. Speaker, some new principle must be discovered or this nation is going to economic chaos. It must be obvious to every hon. member that those who laugh at the proposal we Social Crediters make do not understand it; but they have no possible solution of their own. That is the amazing thing one sees in this day in 1946. If hon. members would just listen a little bit, and not be so cocksure that they know everything, it would be better for them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have been listening.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is right; I am not singling out any man. It is easy enough to laugh at someone who is outlining something which people do not understand. But let me tell you, that they will laugh on the other sides of their faces if we do not get this problem solved in due time. There will be no laughing matter about that.

Measures resembling the two I mentioned before interruption, financed ultimately with state-created, debt-free money would enable industry to pay living wages, without adding to the costs to the consumer.

Provided that Canadian production were first stimulated to a point at which needs of Canadians were supplied, the increased amount of money resulting from these measures would not cause inflation through scarcity of goods and services. This is the only genuine, legitimate cause of inflation. All the talk about funny money and rubber money, and all that other contemptible nonsense we hear in the house and in the country has no foundation at all either in logic or in reason. Let men take the pains to get the economic facts into their minds, and form their policies on the basis of those facts. The government could bring down the cost of living to the January 1, 1945, level by subsidizing the prices of certain key products. The withdrawal of government subsidies on certain commodities caused or permitted the rise in prices that resulted in mounting living costs in Canada. The opposite process obviously would reduce living costs. Therefore, to speak of bringing back by subsidies, the cost of living to the standard of January 1, 1945, is not fantastic.

Money for the present should be raised by "win the peace" victory loans because production in Canada is at a low level. Consequently state-created debt-free money could not be used at the present time without inflation because there is a shortage of goods. Canadian supply is too low to meet the needs of Canadians. There appears to be already in the hands of the consumers more money than there are goods and services to buy with that money. This means that there would be an inflationary tendency owing to scarcity of goods.

Scarcity of goods must be overcome. Production must become buoyant, abundant and universal in all our industries. The time will then come when there will be more goods in the markets than there will be money in consumers' hands to buy. Then the state will be able safely to create debt-free money to represent the surplus production. Such debt-free money will then be available to the government to pay subsidies and bonuses to maintain stable and equitable prices and to maintain stable and equitable wages. But industries must go into action immediately. Social Crediters would advocate debt-free money under normal circumstances in Canada but we suggest that debt money be used now, because of shortage of goods and because the people of Canada generally do not understand enough about money to welcome debt-free money. We must tide over the present crisis.

A royal commission ought to be appointed to learn for Canada all the essential facts about our economic and financial system and learn what possible measures can be taken to reform our economic and financial system so that we may be able to go into a new order of abundance. Let a royal commission discover for us the means of ushering in and establishing a new order of plenty for our Canada, a land of plenty in this age of plenty.

Social Crediters earnestly suggest that a way out of our industrial unrest can be found; it has been found. Social Crediters are confident that there is a way by which we can bring into being a new order of abundance and freedom, freedom from want, fear and curtailment of our personal liberties. Social Crediters urge in all sincerity that the road to the new order of abundance and freedom can be found through the applications of the principles and the technique of Social Credit. Let Social Credit point the way.

I say to members of the house who have desired to question me that this matter will come up again when we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour if all goes well. I can and will then answer all questions which hon. members may wish to ask pertaining to the principles, the technique and the philosophy of Social Credit and point out how those principles may be applied to the problem which confronts us.

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): Mr. Speaker, this problem is much more serious than most people realize. I am a farmer and proud of it. I appreciate the opportunity of being a member of this committee. Until the last week, when the C.C.F. finally decided they should have a representative on the committee, I was one of the two members representing agriculture. I want to make it quite clear that I am not one of those hyphenated farmers the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) referred to earlier in the session. I want to say also that I am definitely in favour of trade unions, at least those which have sound and sensible leadership. I have stated on various occasions that until labour, farmer, industry and consumer representatives can sit together and discuss their various problems and arrive at some reasonable understanding there can be no satisfactory settlement of the present economic strife.

Farmers do not understand labour; labour does not understand industry, and the consumer is seldom considered. Each group is inclined to have a selfish attitude, and obviously each is pulling against the other instead of all working as a team for the good of Canada as a whole. I want also to condemn at this time certain trade unions which are allowing themselves to be led around on a string by communists. There are a great many communists in Canada and it seems that they do not want these strikes settled. Who is the loser? The working man, first and always, with the loss gradually spreading to affect every individual in the country except the man causing it.

Many of these communists came from outside Canada to enjoy the privileges of a free country. Some of them even changed their names, which is their privilege under our laws; but, having done this and having acquired citizenship, they immediately set to work to wreck the economic structure of the country which gave them their freedom. They gained the confidence of their fellow workers by the fact that they were able to express themselves on the public platform. They gave them leadership, but unfortunately this type of leadership can lead only to trouble. Apparently that is all the communist is trying to do, cause trouble and thus slow up production in this country. I should like to quote from Responsible Enterprise, special bulletin No. 34:

> The Labour-Progressive party of Canada held its second annual convention in Toronto on June 1 and 2. Tim Buck was reappointed as leader. William Z. Foster, head of the United States communist party, was present on instructions from Moscow which he admitted during the proceedings.

And later:

> In the closed session there was no need for the communists to bemuse and bewilder by verbiage. Foster and Buck defined the real objective of communism on this continent "to make war against the Soviet Union impossible in any circumstances." The method is simple. The moment war breaks out, there will be a general strike, paralyzing all activity, and guaranteeing the immediate triumph of the Russians. And then would come the pay-off; the handing over of the United States of America and the British commonwealth to the communist gangs that had staged the sabotage.

And further down:

> Foster emphasized the importance of more active "rehearsal strikes" in Canada. He said they were reasonably satisfied that there would be no stability of industrial relations in the United States until the moment of "universal liberation." Buck and his leaders solemnly pledged themselves to speed up their wrecking tactics in Canada. The campaign for 10,000 new members is the published objective.

To-day we are faced with a situation where workers not only claim the right to strike, that is to withdraw their own labour from a plant, but assert also the right to prevent other workers who wish to do so from working. In attempting to prevent movement in and out of a plant, recourse has been had to intimidation and even to violence. The present dispute at Hamilton furnishes evidence of an attempt to deprive workers of their free right as citizens to work when and where they wish.

Who else can possibly be responsible for allowing such a condition to continue other than this government? Is it that the Liberal party, being fearful of losing its prestige with the people of Canada will cater to any group for their support at election time? The evidence would indicate such was the case. An editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of August 13, 1946, had this to say:

"O! Unhappy Union"

Prior to the general election of 1945 and throughout the campaign itself, the communist party was allied with the Liberal party and laboured industriously for the reelection of the King administration. This is a fact well known to all who took notice of the actions of the Labour Progressive party, which name was the war-time camouflage adopted by the communist group to "legalize" its existence.

Then further:

The evidence is written into the record of the campaign itself. For example, the Owen Sound Daily Sun-Times on February 3—the Saturday before the votes were cast—published a full-page advertisement. In large type across the top was this heading: "Union Leaders Coast to Coast Support McNaughton." Below there appeared pictures of members of the communist party who are active in the trade union movement and who were urging support for the Liberal party candidate. The advertisement quoted these communists as saying, "The people of this country need General McNaughton in the House of Commons." and further, "They appeal to you, voters of North Grey . . . to vote for General McNaughton on Feb. 5." . . .

At the bottom left-hand corner of that full-page endorsement the following appeared: "Published by the authority of the North Grey Liberal association." In other words, the Liberal party paid for the communist publicity in support of its candidate. It was, indeed, a sad day for Canada when that union was in force,—

Mr. Speaker, it is rather hard for me to speak because there is so much noise in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members not to speak so loudly. The hon. member who has the floor should not be disturbed.

Mr. CHARLTON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

It was, indeed, a sad day for Canada when that union was in force, much too sad to be passed over now as "unutterable nonsense."

On February 9, 1945, there appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail the following:

Buck explains why minister beaten

Tim Buck, national leader of the Labour-Progressive party, issued a statement yesterday attributing defence minister McNaughton's defeat in the Grey North federal by-election Monday to "reactionary Toryism, helped by the suicidal policy of the C.C.F."

Mr. Buck's statement said:

"Only cooperation between the forces of labour and the progressive Liberals can stop the Tory offensive, and appealed to all progressive people and especially honest supporters of the C.C.F. to condemn the policies which are bringing Canada to the brink of disaster."

On March 9, 1945, there appeared in the Toronto Telegram an editorial which I quote in part, as follows:

L.P. Party's Election Manager
Becomes a Canadian at Last.

Word comes from Ottawa that departmental action has been taken to relieve the Labour-Progressive party of the embarrassment of having as its national election manager a man who is not a Canadian. Naturalization papers have been issued to Samuel Carr who has been national organizer for the party. Apparently not a little pressure was necessary to secure this change in status, as vain efforts to obtain naturalization have been made on his behalf through the past fifteen years. Labour-Progressive cooperation with the Liberals in North Grey may have helped in procuring naturalization on the eve of the approaching general elections . . .

Now, at long last, Mr. Carr has become by official decree, a Canadian citizen in good standing. He has his papers, signed and sealed at Ottawa, to prove it . . .

In the Winnipeg Free Press of June 6, 1944, appeared the following:

Buck makes offer to Premier King

Tim Buck, Labour-Progressive leader, said yesterday in an interview that his recent invitation to Prime Minister Mackenzie King to join forces with his party has been misunderstood.

He said he had "intimated" to Mr. King that after the next general election he "might have the support of the Labour-Progressives.

"I merely suggested to him," added Mr. Buck, "that if his legislation become liberalized—and spell that with a small 'l'—that if he played down our alley now we might throw our weight his way when the House of Commons is split many ways after the next election."

Commenting later on Mr. Buck's remarks, A. G. McLean, director of the National Liberal confederation, said the Liberal party "welcomes cooperation from everyone in Canada in putting into effect Liberal principles and policies because we are sure these policies are the only real answer to the problems which face Canada and the whole world and to the problems which will face us in the future."

Now we see in the papers that the leader of the C.C.F. socialist party—

An hon. MEMBER: What has this to do with the committee's report?

Mr. CHARLTON: —has been offered the leadership of the Liberal party. Is this just another carrot on a stick, or could we assume the old adage is correct that where there is smoke there must be a little fire? There must be some truth in what we hear and see, because the Ottawa Journal, on August 15 of this year, contains an editorial under the heading:

Mr. Coldwell does lead them

Mr. M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. chieftain, yesterday came out with this:

"It is true that over the past eighteen months approaches have been made several times to me with the suggestion that I should consider accepting the leadership of the Liberal party or of a Liberal-C.C.F. coalition . . .

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: What has that to do with the committee's report?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is out of order, in that he is not dealing with the question which is before the house.

Mr. LENNARD: It has more to do with it than most people think.

Mr. CHARLTON: Mr. Coldwell's statement as quoted in the editorial continues:

"—but I have always stated explicitly that I would neither consider nor approve it."

Well, why should Mr. Coldwell consider it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I understood that you gave a ruling that this material is irrelevant to the matter before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call to the attention of the hon. member that the motion before the house is:

That the second report of the committee on industrial relations, presented on Saturday, August 17, 1946, be now concurred in.

I would ask him to confine his remarks to the motion which is before the house.

Mr. CHARLTON: I was merely trying to show the house that communism has a great deal to do with the present industrial labour unrest.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has it something to do with the steel strike in Hamilton?

Mr. CHARLTON: I said, strikes in general in this country.

Mr. HOMUTH: What would the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) say? Let him answer his own question.

Mr. CHARLTON: I continue:

Well, why should Mr. Coldwell consider it? Why bother about having something in name which he has in fact?

Here is another editorial, from the Montreal Gazette, dated August 19:

The C.C.F. presidium, with all the force at its command, has repudiated the suggestion that its long-range strategy is a socialist union between the C.C.F. organization and that of the federal Liberal party. The vigour of the denunciation precisely gauges socialist fears that the exact contrary may become a political inevitability. The C.C.F. is not likely to unite with the federal Liberal party as senior partner; it is in danger of being absorbed without trace by the Liberals.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have given great latitude to the hon. member, but I would ask him to confine his remarks to the motion before the house. If he does not do so I shall be obliged to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. CHARLTON: There was a great deal said in this house this morning concerning this very thing, and I do not think it had any more relation to the question on the order paper.

At least we have heard nothing to the contrary from the government either officially or otherwise, therefore we must assume that these reports are correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Reports on what?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is a pretty big assumption.

Mr. CHARLTON: If the hon. member for Mackenzie had not been interrupting so much he would have heard it.

How far will this Liberal tentacle reach out to satisfy its demand for complete control?

This government has had no definite labour policy. If the present laws are not satisfactory, then they should be rescinded. If they are satisfactory, they should be enforced. It would seem that no one in the government has courage enough, or if they have the courage, they are not allowed to say what they really think, or to state a definite policy and stick to it.

The people want leadership, sane, sensible leadership, but it is not forthcoming from the government. So they accept the leadership of radicals and communists who make all kinds of ridiculous promises to the workers but have no responsibility. No doctor can cure a condition by simply treating symptoms. He must find the cause. Likewise, no government can cure the present economic conditions by merely salving over wounds. Too much thought is given to votes—more salve for the open wound, where actually some surgery is required to close the wound.

In recent years labour has accomplished much in the way of improved wages and working conditions, which I believe just and right. But let us compare this with the position of agriculture. Taking 1913 as the base period, when industrial labour and agriculture were equal at 100, the position of labour as of 1945 was approximately 264 while agriculture stood at approximately 162, or a difference of 102 points. I quote from the Searle index:

A bushel of Canadian wheat to-day, according to the records of the Searle Index, has a purchasing power over the things that farmers have to buy for their living and production of only eight per cent more than it had in 1913, whereas the hourly wages of Canadian industrial labour have a purchasing power to-day of 64 per cent more than these same wages had in 1913. Why then, we ask, should not our farmers enjoy the fruits of this increase in the Canadian standard of living that has been brought about by Canada's natural economic progress since 1913, and which increased standard of living is enjoyed by Canadian industrial labour and by many other groups of individuals? In considering all these prices, it is to be remembered that the Canadian dollar of to-day has only the same purchasing power over the things that farmers have to buy as 62 cents had in 1913.

This condition cannot go on. There must be some reasonable equalization, or agriculture will fail to produce and money will mean very little if the necessities of life are not available in sufficient quantities to supply the needs of the people.

Thousands of farmers left their farms to work in industry during the war. They found it easier, fewer working hours, less responsibility, workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance and city conveniences in their homes. But they must eat, and with this added burden of production on fewer farms, and with the cost of production rising steadily, agriculture finds it more difficult to carry on.

I think I can safely say that as far as agriculture is concerned the present demand by labour for a 40-hour week is the breaking point. I am not saying that labour is not entitled to a 40-hour week, but I do say that agriculture cannot compete in the labour market at that figure. It would either require the farmer or his family to do more of the work or put on two shifts, which would increase considerably his cost of production. With price control in effect, agriculture must come to this government for an increase in the price of farm products. This in turn increases the cost of living and labour demands higher wages. In order to meet these demands, industry feels it should have more for its product, and round and round we go; where we stop nobody knows.

I see logic in labour asking a one-cent increase in wages per hour for every one point of rise in the cost of living index, but Mr. Millard, in answer to a question in the committee, did not seem willing to allow wages to go down in the same proportion if the cost of living index went down. He likened it to an insurance policy, but there was no mention of premium payment. If price control is to be continued until we get past the point of dangerous inflation, then everyone must be prepared to sacrifice a little for the sake of Canada and our future. We must plan ahead, not stumble blindly along thinking only of the present.

While I recognize the right of every worker to join the organization of his choice, I also believe in the right of every worker to abstain from joining any organization or to retire if he is a member and if that be his wish. I cannot agree to the view that the right of any individual to earn a living must be dependent upon the payment of dues to any organization. A trade union should see that its leadership and union activities are such that every worker wants to belong. Collective bargaining will never fulfil the hopes held out for it, nor will there be stability in labour relations unless increased right afforded labour is accompanied by the assumption of increased responsibilities, and unless there exists mutual confidence between the parties that an agreement once entered into will be honoured.

Strike action to date has lost for Canada millions of dollars' worth of export contracts. It is clearly the responsibility of the government to settle it. This can be done if our national leaders have the will and the courage to face the problem fairly and fearlessly.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate by reason of my own special interest in restoring industrial peace to Canada. I had taken on the obligation as Minister of Reconstruction which seemed onerous at the start but which became impossible during the last six weeks when labour unrest came to the boiling point.

Let me say that the committee that has been studying the labour situation has been, in my opinion, well worth while. I am not going to give a review of the work of the committee. That was done in a manner both brilliant and accurate by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I want to say I think the members of the committee have a better understanding of the calibre of labour leadership in Canada through hearing the labour leaders that appeared before them, and perhaps a better understanding of the calibre of industrial leadership from the few representatives of industry whom they heard.

I believe there is one thing that struck every member of the committee, and that is that of the labour difficulties which were reviewed by them, all had failed to follow established procedure of government for the settlement of disputes, and everyone of them had to be rated as an illegal strike. Another thing which I think must have impressed itself on the committee was the obstacles put in the path of any possible settlement of the steel strike. That was not an ordinary dispute between employer and employees. It was converted into a dispute among several employees, all with different types of production and different financial problems, and groups of workers in several industries, many of which were quite dissimilar from other groups involved in the dispute. The demand was that all be settled by a common formula.

It was quite impossible for any of the principals in the dispute to settle with their workers by bilateral bargaining. That was obvious. For example, if Stelco had wished to settle its dispute with its employees it was quite unable to do so unless by some means clearly beyond its power it was able to induce Dosco to settle on another formula with its employees and to induce Algoma to do the same. It was obviously a dispute directed toward the government, for only by the exercise of arbitrary powers by the government could the many factors in the dispute be resolved. The dispute was not even confined to basic steel. The problems of basic steel have some resemblance as between one plant and another, though even in basic steel the products turned out by Algoma are not the products turned out by Stelco, and the products turned out by both are not wholly the products turned out by Dosco. But it went far beyond that, because the settlement of the dispute depended not only on the settlement of these three disputes, but the terms of settlement were required to apply for all the subsidiaries of all three companies.

Arguments were used about the hardships of the work in front of a blast furnace, but I personally was unable to follow the logic which said that because the worker at the blast furnace is entitled to high pay, the operator of the tack machine in a subsidiary plant is entitled to the same pay. I simply mention that to show the complications facing anyone who undertook to find a solution of the steel strike in any single plant based on the demands of the bargaining agency of the workers. However, we heard evidence from the labour leaders involved not only in the steel strike but also in the rubber strike, the automobile strike, the chemical strike and the strike in the electrical industries. We all got a view of the leaders; we heard the presentation of their cases. I think we all formed an opinion as to whether labour in Canada is being wisely led in one industry as against another, and we got a fair idea of the problems of management in dealing with its workers under present-day conditions.

In the steel strike we were faced with a situation which was unique. The wartime prices and trade board had recognized that it was unable to hold the line which had been established in February of 1944 and which had been maintained up to May or June of this year. The pressures had become too great; too many forces over which the wartime prices and trade board had no control were operating to bring further pressure on the price ceiling. Canada is a heavy importer of goods, particularly from the United States. In the United States a substantial increase in prices had occurred which was reflecting itself on manufacturing costs in Canada. It has usually been the practice of the wartime prices and trade board to deal with price increases based on proven costs; in other words, the costs must be established first, presented to the wartime prices and trade board, and price adjustments, if considered necessary by the board, are made in the light of proven cost figures. However, when the steel adjustment came along—and the price of steel had not been materially changed except in a few items since 1939—it was realized that an adjustment of wages was imminent. The wartime prices and trade board could not ignore the wage increases in the United States; nor could it ignore the fact that substantial adjustments were being made in other industries in Canada and would be demanded in the case of steel. Therefore, in making an adjustment of steel prices they made an allowance for wage increases.

The committee heard Mr. Donald Gordon on price stabilization and the effect of wage increases on that problem. I think every member of the committee was profoundly impressed by Mr. Gordon's evidence. However, it did emerge that the price allowances which were made when steel prices were adjusted amounted to about ten cents an hour on labour costs, as nearly as the board could determine. I wish to say again that that determination could not be accurate because the costs vary in the case of different steel producers. However, I think members of the committee came to the opinion that a wage increase of ten cents was about all the increase in steel prices permitted. Was that a reasonable increase? The view has been taken that it amounted to nothing much at all. After all, a ten-cent increase in steel across the board is fairly substantial in percentages, particularly as it applies to the lower paid workers. I presume that over the average it amounted to somewhere between twelve and fifteen per cent across the board, and in the case of low paid workers it amounted to considerably more than that. It was considered reasonable, through the fact that a good many settlements had been made or were being made currently on that basis. Great industries such as the pulp and paper industry of eastern Canada, the forest industries of eastern Canada and the great nickel industry had been settled on the basis of ten cents an hour across the board. Therefore management, in presenting its claim to the wartime prices and trade board and the wartime prices and trade board in assessing that claim, could reasonably forecast an increase of ten cents an hour for labour in basic steel.

A good deal of pressure was brought on Mr. Gordon by members of the committee to fix that allowance exactly. Under pressure, Mr. Gordon admitted that ten cents an hour was about the figure that the wartime prices and trade board had in mind. But he also tried to convey the opinion that price and wage stabilization is not an exact science.

Canada has been more successful than any other country in holding down its cost of living and in stabilizing its wages; but it differs from certain other countries in that it has not proceeded by exact formula. In the United States the Little Steel formula was regarded as the formula by which permissible wage increases could be determined. It was a complicated formula. One factor was the date and the amount of the last increase in pay; the cost of living was an element in the formula, and there were certain other elements. However, we all recall that while the Little Steel formula remained the standard for some months, it had to give way under pressures which even that exact formula could not stand.

From the commencement, Canada did not attempt to place wage control under price control. It set up two stabilization boards, one for prices and the other for wages. The intention was that the board in charge of the regulation of wages would make such adjustments in wages as were indicated. The board could not start from a standard base, because everyone did not enjoy the same wage or even the same relative wage in one industry as in another. But that wage board was authorized to make wage adjustments. The wartime prices and trade board had a somewhat secondary position, because it was its duty to make price adjustments which would take account of costs arising out of wage adjustments. The relationship was not as close as certain hon. members of the committee thought should have been the case, but all I can say is that throughout the war period this dual system of control seemed to work and each in its own sphere did a job in stabilizing the commodity under its charge.

Under pressure, Mr. Gordon stated that ten cents was the limit he believed the price index could absorb and still be kept under control. I suppose, if Mr. Gordon had been subjected to close cross-examination he would not have been able to prove that this figure should not have been nine cents or eight cents or possibly eleven cents. However, he was giving his expert opinion as to what he considered to be the breaking point in setting the level of a general wage increase across Canada. I know of no better expert opinion. After all, Mr. Gordon has been in charge of price control since its inception. He had a magnificent record of service before coming to that position, and I think every Canadian citizen will say he has carried on magnificently since taking over that task. It is all very well to say he did not prove his point. I do not think he attempted to prove his point. I think he attempted to give the committee his best judgment, based upon his experience and upon the facts before him, which certainly were more complete than the facts before anyone else on that committee. In any event, the committee in its wisdom decided that it could not overrule Mr. Gordon's judgment.

The committee was not directly charged with the duty of settling the steel strike. However, it felt that this strike was the basic labour problem of the moment, and undertook to do what could be done in that direction. Therefore the committee chose a conciliator of its own to supersede the former government conciliator, and asked Mr. Brockington to bring the parties to the dispute together and attempt to arrive at a solution. I think the committee felt that Mr. Brockington did all that could be done in attempting to reach a compromise settlement. His difficulty was that, before he entered upon his task, management had stated to the committee its maximum offer and labour had stated to the committee its minimum terms, and there was a wide discrepancy between the two. However, Mr. Brockington worked with management and with labour for several days and worked out a compromise settlement which I think members of the committee felt could have been accepted by either side. However, while he drew slight concessions from management and slight concessions from labour, the gap was too wide to bridge and Mr. Brockington had to report that he could usefully offer no further services in settling the dispute.

It has been said during this debate that the dispute could have been settled for five cents. That is, ten cents was ordered by the controller; it was already in effect, and it has been said here that an additional five cents paid at some time in the future would have settled the dispute. Well, I suggest that if hon. members will read Mr. Millard's offer they will find many other conditions involved besides the five cents, which would have been an obstacle to any settlement. For example, there were three "musts". First was the removal of the Sydney five-cent differential. The question of the removal of that five-cent differential has been before the regional board and the national labour board and has been refused by both. To make that a "must" in settling any dispute with the Steel Company of Canada is, of course, to put an insuperable obstacle in the way of any settlement.

Mr. GILLIS: It should have been removed two years ago.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so; nevertheless it had nothing to do with Stelco.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think it has anything to do with the present dispute; it is still before the national board.

Mr. HOWE: Exactly; nevertheless it has been made a "must". The hon. gentleman proves my point, as I am sure he intended to do. Then the general wage increase was to be made retroactive. That was agreed to without difficulty; that is obviously fair, and management accepted it as such. Then there was the adjustment of 5½ cents. That was a "must"; and the only condition that could be arbitrated was the time at which that adjustment would be applied during the current calendar year. Several items were referred to arbitration. I simply mention the extraneous matters that were brought into a dispute, which would have been difficult enough had each company been bargaining with the union separately on behalf of its own employees, and which became practically impossible of solution when no management was free to bargain with its own employees without also bringing about bargains between other managements over which it had no control and other employees over which it also had no control.

I believe the committee brought forth recommendations that will be helpful in future in dealing with labour matters. I believe we were all surprised at the unanimity which prevailed during the in camera sessions of the committee. I will say that during the course of the proceedings of the committee I do not think any member made any move designed to improve his political position. In listening to this debate, I consider it regrettable that many hon. members should talk politics rather than talk a settlement of labour disputes. I hope we can bring the debate back to the high plane of the discussions in committee, as we proceed with this matter. As I say, we attained a high degree of unanimity except with respect to recommendation No. 6. It did not seem to me there was a great area for disagreement in regard to that recommendation. Its purpose was to prevent sporadic strikes, strikes not brought about through the use of normal union machinery, but brought about by small groups acting without notice to the vast body of the workers.

Mr. MacINNIS: It does not say that.

Mr. HOWE: No, but I think my hon. friend will agree that was stated to be the purpose. As to the methods of arriving at the purpose, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had one method and other members of the committee had another. The other method happened to be chosen. The provision is simply this, that if a strike is threatened, or if there is a sudden outbreak of a strike, either side in the dispute may apply to the Minister of Labour for a vote, under government auspices. The Minister of Labour is not bound to take that vote, the proviso being that at his discretion he may order a vote under government auspices.

It has been said, as it was said in committee—and quite properly—that if the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) were always to be Minister of Labour, that would not be a dangerous weapon. But let me suggest this, that the Department of Labour in this country is staffed by experienced labour men. I believe any Minister of Labour would ask the advice of his experienced advisers as to whether in a particular dispute they considered it advisable that a government-supervised vote be taken. Should the Minister of Labour decide that the majority of the employees were being dragooned into a strike through illegal action on the part of certain of their leaders, or a certain group in the industry, there is the possibility of the Department of Labour's stepping in and deciding the question as to whether or not a vote should be held, under democratic methods, and either authorizing such strike as legal, or denouncing it as an illegal strike.

I believe that is a constructive paragraph in the report, and is a paragraph which will not be abused. I must say I find myself unable to follow the argument which says that it is destructive to properly conducted and properly organized labour unions.

Meantime, while the committee was sitting, strikes in a number of basic industries were in progress. Not only have they paralyzed industries directly affected, but they are extending to industries not directly associated with any labour dispute. That situation is most acute at this moment. There is scarcely a section of the country which is not beginning to be affected by these strikes.

It seems to me that a situation can get so bad that it becomes impossible, and I believe this situation has reached that point. I believe there must be an early solution—

Mr. MacNICOL: What did the minister say on that point?

Mr. HOWE: It gets so bad that it is impossible to perpetuate itself. I believe that these strikes are nearing the point when they will either solve themselves or be capable of solution. I believe the work of the committee has contributed toward bringing about that situation, and I can assure the Minister of Labour that anything I can do as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to assist in bringing these strikes to an early conclusion will be done.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the committee I want at the outset to say that I consider the committee to have been of great value to parliament and to the country. Some hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), have criticized its results, and have stated that the committee's report is an anti-climax. I say to him that in my opinion it is anything but that. There are many forward-looking recommendations made in the report of the committee. Although I join with him in regretting that the committee was not able to settle the steel strike—even though it was never charged with the duty of settling that strike—I do not think he can say that the concrete fact that no settlement was achieved amounts to an anti-climax. After all, we were not the body responsible for the settlement of the steel strike: the responsibility for that is and always was that of the government. For the committee to have attempted to suggest in detail what the terms of settlement should be, or to have dictated a settlement, to my mind would have been setting up a 35-headed Minister of Labour—and such a thing would be a monstrosity.

An hon. MEMBER: And how!

Mr. MERRITT: The other criticism is as to section 6 of the report. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) speak about it as he did. His remarks were a sort of fairy story which, in my opinion, distorted the meaning of the recommendation.

I join with the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and the minister who has just taken his seat in saying that all that means is an assurance of a secret ballot in the event that the Minister of Labour is not satisfied that a secret ballot has been taken before the strike.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does it say that?

Mr. MERRITT: That is what every hon. member in the committee, including, I am sure, hon. members who have criticized the recommendation, fully understood it to mean.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, no; why does it not say that?

Mr. MERRITT: Perhaps the wording might not suit some hon. members, but the intent was never anything more or less than that.

I wish to add my tribute for the work of the chairman who presided over the committee in a most excellent manner. I am sure he added to the good will displayed on all sides. I would pay tribute, too, to the witnesses who appeared before us. We heard two senior officials of the government of Canada in the persons of Mr. Gordon and Mr. MacNamara. Then, we heard three most able industrialists involved in the strike, Mr. Hilton, Mr. Anson, and Mr. McMillan. Then, giving the point of view of labour, we heard Mr. Millard and Mr. Conroy.

I was delighted—if I might be so bold as to say this—with the quick and clear way in which they answered all questions, entirely without equivocation. I was amazed at the grasp each of them had of the problem and of his point of view. I was particularly impressed by the decision which all three parties—if I may say there were three parties—displayed in putting forth their respective cases. Whether or not I agreed with everything they said, there was no question that they showed they were able leaders of their respective sides. I was also most impressed by their firmness in sticking to their points.

But much as I admired all those men, I think that, after long private negotiations, after intervention of the government through its conciliation services, and after the sittings of the committee, firmness any longer in the face of urgent public need for the settlement of this strike, and for the resumption of the production of steel, will no longer be firmness but will be obstinacy.

I should like to give the house some of my impressions, after serving on the committee. I do not want to talk politics, and I assure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that I will confine myself to the labour problems that came before us. If I am critical of the government it will not be in any political way but rather because I formed a definite opinion while I sat on that committee. I believe that this industrial crisis—not necessarily this particular strike—arose from three main causes, all of which are the responsibility of the government.

First, there was a proven lack of forward policy to handle labour-management relations and to improve them in the period after the war. Second, there was a great lack of resolution and, in one case I am going to mention, not very adept handling of crises when they came as a result of that lack of forward policy. Third, there was, of course, the inexcusable action of condoning and therefore encouraging the breaches of law that we have come to know so well this year. I should like quickly to run through those specific criticisms that I have made of the government.

As to the lack of forward policy, our report itself is a gentle chiding of the government for not having introduced of their own volition a year ago, some of the very things we are recommending to meet changing needs now that peace has returned and the patriotic impulse is no longer so strongly there to keep down friction. Without reading the recommendations, I say that those things would have helped us. I want to go farther than that. I want to say that wage control, necessary in war and necessary in the transitional period if you are to have price control, is nevertheless a negation of free collective bargaining. Labour looks upon free collective bargaining, I think, as being next in importance to its right to strike. Therefore, when you impose wage control, certainly you must be careful that in some way you make up to labour for depriving it of its full right to free collective bargaining.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does the hon. member think that if you have free collective bargaining it will mean no strike?

Mr. MERRITT: I will answer the minister in this way.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do not stick up straw men and knock them down.

Mr. MERRITT: I am not sticking up any straw men; far from it, I assure the minister. I believe that if we had free collective bargaining, then many of the wage increases which are asked for now would obviously be possible. The management concerned, not being held under a price ceiling, would be able to grant a little more of wage increases and raise prices rather than have a strike.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want my hon. friend to finish his statement; does he believe in the principle of price control?

Mr. MERRITT: I am going to be longer than I thought I would be. I will say to the minister that I am not as ardent a supporter of price control as he is. I think it is obviously wrong in principle. But I would not have taken off price control on V-J day, and under the policy which the government has followed until now I would not be able to take it off to-day if I sat in the seats of the mighty. Let us assume that price control is necessary for the purposes of this argument. Then you must have wage control. But if price control were not necessary, then we would have free collective bargaining. If the government is to maintain wage control, as they must with price control they should realize that such a course would cause irritation to labour. However, the evidence clearly showed that they allowed one of the great congresses of labour to lose all faith in the national war labour board and its members.

The government have failed to coordinate their price and wage control policies in a way that, to me, is incredible. They failed to produce a policy that was always a little ahead of the needs of the moment. Their policy was always six months behind. Thus we have had price control being gradually relaxed over a period of a year since the conclusion of hostilities, and we have had three relaxations of the wage control order. One came in January; one came in April, and the third came in June. The relaxation of price control was always a little ahead of the relaxation of wage control. They could easily have been coordinated had the government taken care that that be done.

For instance, in January they relaxed the rule which prevented any wage increases except where there was gross injustice and inequality, in favour of the rule allowing increases only to equalize rates in an area. At the same time in January the government had the recommendations of the Canadian Congress of Labour, of which Mr. Pat Conroy is secretary, that that second stage should have been relaxed and that the rule of "just and reasonable within the price structure" should have been substituted for the existing regulation. The government should not have waited until the following June to do that.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may correct my hon. friend, the congress of labour wanted the abolition of wage control, the reinstatement of collective bargaining and the maintenance of price control. That is the record.

Mr. MERRITT: I have the record here of Mr. Conroy's evidence, and I refer to page 754 of the proceedings. He states that in January, in response to a request by the minister for his opinion, he recommended:

> 1. There should be a free range for negotiation between employers and unions of at least ten cents an hour, with a further proviso that, where reduction in hours of work is agreed upon, or has been effected, provision should be made for a larger amount than ten cents an hour.

The national and regional war labour boards should have authority to increase wages to such levels as are deemed fair and reasonable, thus eliminating the provision "for the same or comparable work in the same or similar localities." In short, in order to meet the need of constant production and of a high living standard the use of obscure language and equally obscure interpretations should be discontinued.

Those were the two recommendations made by the congress. They were not followed by the government, although the government had asked the congress for its opinion.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I have here the memorandum which was submitted to the government in April—

Mr. MERRITT: I am referring to the January incident, not to April.

There seem to have been three times at which there could have been a settlement of these problems, and the government, by failing to seize the opportunity, failed so to settle. One was in January, one in April, and one was at the time of the appointment of the controller.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us have the April one.

Mr. MERRITT: I am referring at the moment to January. In January, at the time Mr. Conroy made these recommendations to the government, he made this extraordinary prophecy—extraordinary in its accuracy, judged by later events. He wrote a letter from which I quote two paragraphs. He said:

> The foregoing are the minimum that labour can subscribe to in the present transitional period. We believe that, in view of the existing situation in the United States and the expected impact of the results of the same in this country, wisdom should dictate a liberal and orderly process of transition rather than the amendment of the regulations within narrow limits, which would undoubtedly be unsatisfactory and open the gate to a deluge of wage controversies and possible dislocation throughout the country. It may be said that, having started in the United States, the deluge may be beyond us in any event, and therefore why bother about an orderly transition? This would seem to us to be specious reasoning, and its only effect would be a partial halt to reconversion, with continued shortages of goods and the inevitable breaking down of resistance to maintaining an economic price level.

And then these significant words:

> The question to be considered is whether we should move in advance of the heavy impact of these situations or wait until we cannot control them.

So that there it was quite apparent that so far as this congress, which is the congress particularly affected, is concerned, had that ten-cent increase or the power to grant the ten-cent increase been given in January, it would have satisfied Mr. Conroy and his congress.

Then we come to April, when we had it in evidence that ten cents offered then would probably have settled the steel strike.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did they not go to the regional boards, like every other organization did? The building trades got ten cents in Ontario in April.

Mr. MERRITT: Then we come to the last chance of averting the strike, which was when the controller was appointed. Just before the controller was appointed, we had evidence that the Minister of Labour knew that the union was not prepared to accept ten cents, and yet the appointment of the controller was coupled with what I call the ten-cent speech or the ten-cent letter which the minister read in April.

Mr. MITCHELL: What do you mean—the ten-cent letter I read in April?

Mr. MERRITT: The letter to Mr. Conroy: "Those best able to judge." The minister will remember the letter.

Mr. MITCHELL: That was not "the letter." I wired to Mr. Conroy in Hamilton.

Mr. MERRITT: Well, it is the telegram. But it seems to me that at that time, had the controller been put in and no ten-cent limit imposed by indirection, this strike against the controller might never have taken place. It seems to me that when you couple that with the government's lack of resolution in dealing with the strike incident when it did arise, you have a very serious failure in the administration of labour policy. When the strike threatened the government passed this order in council; it contained penalties in the event of breach, and when the strike took place in defiance of the order in council it became apparent that the government of Canada was bluffing; and I say to you in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the government of Canada should ever bluff.

Much has been said about lawlessness on the part of these unions, and I join with the minister in condemning it utterly. I do not believe there is any situation in Canada where any citizen is entitled to break the law; and when I say that, I mean the law as it stands, and not the law as some people want it to be. But I say that there is such a thing as leading a person up to greater and greater breaches of the law, by undue laxity and leniency in the inception of the difficulty. This trouble started in about 1943, when unions of this congress first showed that they did not wish to follow the machinery of the regional war labour board, and they got part of their demands even though they behaved in an illegal fashion. Then we had illegality on the picket lines across this country last winter and more and more so this summer. No action was taken, and finally we come up to the time when the order in council is passed, when bodies in the country feel strong enough, or feel the government is weak enough, to disobey the order of the government appointing the controller and saying that they should stay at work. I do not think we can blame all the lawlessness on labour when we have a situation like that. They were fighting for what they thought was right; they were just edging along and seeing what they could get away with; they got away with too much, and the responsibility for that is on the government.

I believe that this steel strike is not a problem only in labour-management relations. I do not believe, although in the main it is a strike against the steel companies, it is entirely that. I think it is also a strike against the government's wage control policy. For the solution of this strike and for the solution of the labour crisis which we are going through I do not think we need at this moment any new labour law, although I hope improvements will result very shortly. But I believe a solution of our present difficulties requires only the exercise by the government of its two responsibilities; first, its responsibility to maintain price and wage control in order to prevent inflation, and, second, its responsibility to maintain law and order in the country. If it does both those things in the interests, not of labour and management or any particular party, but of the Canadian people as a whole, and applies those principles and follows them to their logical conclusion, the steel strike will be solved, as will all labour unrest in the country.

I just want to refer to that responsibility which the government has for price and wage control in Canada, and particularly to show what is happening out in my part of the country, in British Columbia. It was there that the first fifteen-cent settlement was reached, and that may have precipitated the difficulties which we now face. But the government has never said that there is a ten-cent ceiling in this country. They have rather put up Mr. Gordon, who says that, or something approximating to it; but every time we pressed the ministers to say whether ten cents was government policy they said "No, we will not say what government policy is; the regional war labour boards are entirely autonomous, and we are not going to interfere with what they do." What happened out in British Columbia? First of all, there was a fifteen-cent settlement in lumber, and after that, some forty or more settlements between management and labour, joint settlements and joint applications to the board for approval of wage increases of fifteen to seventeen cents. Although the minister never, as a matter of government policy, supported Donald Gordon in his ten-cent statement, the board out in British Columbia did not feel itself quite as autonomous as the minister seems to think it was. After Mr. Gordon's statement, the board out there imposed an interim ten-cent ceiling pending instructions from Ottawa, and Mr. Pearson, the minister of labour of British Columbia, and the chairman of the board, is reported as follows:

> He disclosed that he had asked Ottawa for specific directions on why the increase above ten cents would be disastrous to the national economy and he said that pending clarification from Ottawa the ten-cent limit "is the only reasonable thing we can do. After all, we are only a junior board and we must take our direction from the federal authorities on a matter of this kind."

While the minister is saying that the board is autonomous, the board is saying that it is not autonomous and wants instructions. After that, the minister, according to press reports, gave an answer to the board in which he said that:

> . . . the department had given no instructions to the B.C. war labour board to limit increases to ten cents an hour. He suggested that the B.C. Board might have decided to withhold final decision on cases until it saw what action would be taken by the commons industrial relations committee which is investigating the whole situation.

Following that denial, as I call it, of Donald Gordon, the British Columbia regional war labour board announced that it was going to deal with each case on its merits and without relationship to Donald Gordon's statement. Unfortunately, I have not yet got the paper of last Friday which contains that statement and I do not know exactly what Mr. Pearson said, but that is the sense of it. So that we now have this situation. In British Columbia fifteen cents has been granted. Forty applications for fifteen cents still exist; forty applications for fifteen cents will probably be passed by the British Columbia board, and a pattern of fifteen cents will be set in British Columbia. But the minister says that his personal view is that Donald Gordon is right and that ten cents will break the price ceiling and that we cannot have more than ten cents in eastern Canada.

Surely the government has to do one of two things. It has to come out and support Mr. Gordon's statement, or else it must repudiate

Mr. Gordon's statement. The government cannot support it in eastern Canada and repudiate it in the west, because British Columbians probably just as much as anyone else, care whether price control is maintained. In my view, therefore, it is absolutely essential, not only for the settlement of the steel strike, but also for the solution of the wider difficulty, that the government give an authoritative statement on what our economy will stand, and so persuade all parties to get in behind them and support them in the position they take in the interests of the whole country.

The last thing I wish to say is that we must have a government which will administer the law fearlessly and without hesitation or equivocation. I do not believe there is any class of persons or any person in this country who can defy our law, and if the law is not suited to what we want, then this is the place in which to change it. But at any moment we have certain laws standing on the statute books. It is the responsibility of the government to enforce that law as it stands I am quite sure that when all the people of Canada know that the government will enforce the law as it is laid down by parliament, we shall quickly get rid of this lawlessness, this by-passing of boards, or violence on the picket line which has contributed so much to bad labour relations in the country.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): I should like to make a few observations, not in a critical sense but rather by way of appreciation of the opportunity that was mine to sit with the labour relations committee and study and seek to give some sense of direction to the government in one of the most critical moments in Canada's history. I shall always remember my experience in that committee. It was an opportunity to gain first-hand knowledge of the tremendous problems faced not only by the government but by the people of Canada. Of course the house is aware that the majority of the members of the committee were Liberals and supporters of the administration, but I hasten to say that I was never at any time conscious of that fact. There existed the best of good feeling and a sincere desire on the part of all to obtain all the evidence we could and to arrive at reasonable conclusions.

I was greatly impressed with the most magnificent presentation this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), and I say with him in effect that it is all very well for those who are outside, not charged with responsibility, to be critical of the report which the committee saw fit to return to the House of Commons. But we had to strike some balance, and we were not going to bring about that sense of confidence, or the possibility of solving our great problems, by indicating to one and all that we were biased in our views. I am sure that, as the various witnesses appeared before the committee, we became more and more convinced of the sincerity of those who came before us, and indeed they had a grasp of their problem and were able to convey a great deal of their knowledge to the committee.

I wish to refer for a moment to a brief sent to me by the Owen Sound board of trade. Unfortunately, it did not arrive in time to be presented to the committee, and I do not propose to read it in its entirety at the moment, but rather to say that the Owen Sound board of trade is comprised of 300 representative business and professional men of the community who sought to make a study in an approach to this great problem. Their representations to me are based in the main on this view, not to forget the great consuming public. I believe it was Mr. Conroy who said, in answer to a question, that his organization would probably represent between 300,000 and 350,000 people in Canada. That leaves a vast army amounting to millions who are not organized and who are now victims of the situation which confronts the country at the moment.

Therefore, in referring to the brief presented by the Owen Sound board of trade, I simply suggest to the government that we must not in any sense lose sight of the vast impact upon a multitude of people who can easily become the innocent victims of a policy which might lead us nowhere. I think it was with that thought in mind that I had some appreciation of the representations made by Mr. Donald Gordon. The committee were sincere in their report. We believed that price control could not be maintained without a measure of wage stabilization. Even though, in all sincerity, we might be inclined to question the judgment of one whose experience and background are sufficient to recommend him to any committee of parliament, nevertheless I do not think there was one member on the committee prepared to assume the awful responsibility of saying that he was wrong. I do say this and my observation was made to the committee, and I repeat it in effect now—that we have arrived at a time where price control cannot be held in rigidity; that there should be a degree of elasticity. In order to gain the co-operation of the Canadian people—and in my opinion if we are to maintain price ceilings or price control it will require the complete co-operation and self-discipline of the Canadian people—it must be brought home to them that in order to maintain price control the wartime prices and trade board may have to retreat to a new line. In other words, these increases in prices, which would accompany an increase in wages, would be made more gradual to lighten the shock upon the economy; because it does seem to me that sooner or later we are going to reach a certain peak before we have accomplished that economy of plenty which we all believe will solve the problem of price control.

So far as the unions are concerned, I share the view that much of the agitation and much of the unrest apparent come from a source which is foreign to our Canadian democracy. I used words in committee to this effect, that the unions should seek to smoke out the communists, and I received the prompt reply that if they were to smoke out the communists there were a lot of others who should be smoked out as well. I can appreciate that it is not an easy problem; in fact it is a difficult one; but I have such a high regard for labour unions, and I feel that they are so necessary in an organized economy or in an organized society, that I hope they will continue to resist with all their efforts the inroads of communism and communistic doctrine. That is one thing which makes it more difficult to enforce the law and order to which the hon. member who has just taken his seat referred.

I am one of those who believe that every citizen in Canada who enjoys the protection which our laws provide should be prepared to accept his responsibility as a citizen and conform with those laws. The time has come when the government will have to give some evidence of their determination to see that law and order are respected in the country. That brings me to section 7 of the report which has not been touched upon particularly, and which reads as follows:

> Your committee recommends that the controllers appointed by order in council P.C. 2901 be instructed to implement the terms of such order with such modifications as the government may determine.

I believe there is a possibility of some misunderstanding of this section. That is apparent particularly in some editorial comments in regard to these words "with such modifications as the government may determine". I think the spirit and the understanding of the committee was that if it were necessary to strengthen the controllers' hands it should be done. There was no intention of giving direction to the government to restrict the controllers. I take clause 7 to mean that, if necessary, the government would be prepared to strengthen the controller's hands to see that his administration was admitted and that every effort would be made to return men to work and production started and maintained.

[Mr. Case.]

I can well remember that evening almost a month ago when we started out with such high hopes for the accomplishments of the committee. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) outlined the nature of our inquiry. He expressed the hope that farmers, consumers and others would be heard, along with those who have been heard by the committee. I believe that it was only the time factor which caused us not to interview farmers and those who might be considered organized consumers. It was for that reason that I recommended or sought to have included in the report a resolution to state that this committee should be reconvened at the earliest possible moment at the next session of parliament. I understand that I would be in order in making a motion of that kind at that time.

If I have any criticism at all to offer with regard to the government's attitude it is to the effect that this committee was not called into being at an earlier date. However, as someone has said, it is always easy to look backwards and criticize the government; but the government did know that the country was seething with industrial unrest. I join with the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) in what he has said. I am sure that every member of the committee agrees with him in saying that the deliberations of the committee justified its existence. Because of that fact, the government may not have realized early enough the contributon which the committee could have made. Had the committee been called together at an earlier date, it might have accomplished a great deal. Much remains to be done. Our Canadian economy will not permit of strikes. We are producers. At this very moment there is a possibility of Canada gaining access to markets which might be denied us in a very short time. That will react very badly on the nation's welfare. If we can play some part now and later in seeing that the proper formula is worked out, either in committee or by the government, which will provide for some stability of employment and remove this irritation and bring about some semblance of confidence in each other, then we can really get somewhere. I think it was Mr. Brockington who left the thought with the committee that long periods of strife and strikes lead to greater difficulties in settling disputes. That was in evidence in the committee. As the hon. member for Calgary West said this afternoon, it is certainly no tribute to the employers of labour when a leading industrialist in Canada has to admit that the first time he met the national directors and the bargaining agency of his factory was here in Ottawa, after the strike had been in progress for many weeks. I am saying that, not entirely in a spirit of criticism, but in the hope that better understanding and greater confidence in each other will bring about better relations between management and workers. As we grow to nationhood, as our great industrial machine expands and industries become so huge that thousands are employed, the old personal touch is gone. Yet by the same token I think we must all recognize that it would be impossible to bargain with each one individually, as might have been the case when the industries were of smaller proportions. So it would seem that for many years to come there will have to be some bargaining agency, and I believe the sooner industry recognizes that fact, the better it will be.

I want now to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and I also made this observation in the committee. He was asked this question, and I did not get his answer: Would he be prepared to subsidize all industry in Canada? That is a fair question which requires some consideration. I have only to remind hon. members that, after all, subsidies come out of taxes, and that taxes come out of the pockets of the people and enter into the cost of production of our manufacturers. Our costs of production can have a great effect on our ability to secure our share of the export markets of the world. The time is not far distance when competition in world trade will be a vital factor, and we should always keep that thought in mind if we are to guarantee employment to Canadian workers. Reference has been made to our tremendous contribution to the war effort, which we may all applaud and greatly admire. But one factor is often overlooked. It will also be found in the record that we borrowed about $13,500 million of the $25,000 or $27,000 million we spent on account of the war, and we still have that money to repay. If we continue to indulge in subsidies, at a time when collectively we probably have more money than we ever had before, then the outlook for the future is bad. I think the time for the government to do its pump-priming, if it has to use subsidies, is when private enterprise fails to take up the slack, not when we are moving into a cycle of expansion and greater prosperity. As a matter of fact I think economists will agree that to-day we have more money collectively than we ever had before. In 1939 I believe we had something like $281 per capita. We now have something over $1,000 per capita; and we have over $6,250 million in liquid resources. If I were to remind hon. members that we financed our 1929 disaster on about $2,300 million of liquid resources they will understand the tremendous task which faces those charged with the responsibility of maintaining the price ceiling, while this huge volume of money is seeking an outlet on a market which is still short of supplies and will remain short for some time to come. The danger will become greater unless we step up production to meet demand, and we shall not step up that production as long as there are strikes and industries are closing down. It can lead to grave disaster; the moment is critical indeed.

That is one thought which encourages me to say I believe there must be greater elasticity in the price ceiling, so that the controller may retreat to a new line and bring home a clear picture to the Canadian public in order that they may realize that if costs of production are to increase, so will the cost of living increase. But I cannot believe that the danger in regard to the price ceiling will be any greater than it will become very shortly if we continue to have lack of production, with our workers idle and our industries closed down. We hear about new money, or social credit, or whatever it may be called. I know our difficulty at the present time is to encourage people to work for the money we are now offering. If we are to hand out money without any work at all I do not know whether I shall be able to get anyone to cook my meals for me. I would be afraid we were living too close to what is very easy to achieve, a currency that is not worth a great deal. In other words, the value of money depends entirely upon its acceptability and upon general confidence in the government of a country.

I want to dwell just for a moment on a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) with respect to recommendation No. 6. The only observation I have to make is that I do not see how we are depriving anyone of anything if we supply them with ballots upon which they can exercise their own good judgment, untrammelled and unafraid, because I feel sure that a vote taken under government supervision would show exactly what the workers most desired.

This afternoon there seemed to be doubt in the minds of some as to what the deputy minister, through the minister, said with respect to the war labour board, and I want to read from page 406 of the proceedings of the committee. I shall read the complete paragraph. This is Mr. MacNamara's sworn testimony:

> On June 27, during the morning, the minister, deputy minister and director of industrial relations met with Mr. Murray Cotterill. The minister reviewed the general situation in Canada and expressed the opinion that the general pattern of wage increase should not exceed 10 cents per hour. In the afternoon the deputy minister made a proposal to Mr. Cotterill that the department, under a plan in mind, could arrange for the appropriate regional war labour boards to issue a directive for a rate increase equal to 10 cents per hour, the increase to be worked out in a manner found desirable and reasonable by the union. One method suggested was that an increase of 8 cents per hour be granted all around, and in addition that overtime rates of time and one-half be paid after 44 hours per week on the understanding that the plants would operate 48 hours per week for the present. The deputy minister gave a firm commitment that he would request the wage boards to issue the directive and also that, if an appeal was taken to the national board, he was quite convinced the latter would not upset the decision.

We had considerable questioning in the committee on that very point, because it left the impression that the boards were not entirely independent bodies. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) has said, they were not autonomous bodies; they were bound to a government policy, which the ministers who were examined refused to admit was government policy; and I believe that has led to much of the difficulty that exists at the present time.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that my experiences while serving on the committee will be lasting. We were given the greatest latitude, and I think the very fact that when Mr. Brockington was recommended as mediator the government immediately acted upon that suggestion. He was appointed and, before we concluded our deliberations, was able to bring us a comprehensive report which indicated his faithfulness. His fine work in endeavouring to bring the parties together, though without success, did impress upon us the feeling that in this instance a parliamentary committee did mean something—we were not hampered in any way in our undertakings; the members of the committee expressed themselves freely, and there were many surprises. If we could just carry forward a few steps the spirit shown there, I believe that, through the education the public received as a result of the sittings of the committee being held in public and the amount of publicity those proceedings were given, we may be able to get somewhere in dealing with our problems; and to that end I promise the ministry my wholehearted support.

Mr. PAUL EMILE COTE (Verdun) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I, at the outset, tender to the chairman of the industrial relations committee (Mr. Lalonde) using his mother tongue which is also mine, my heartiest congratulations for the efficiency and the ability he has displayed in directing the discussions of that committee. We have especially noted the dignity with which he has discharged that important duty, his courtesy toward the numerous witnesses who have appeared before the committee, and toward the members of that body. He has always shown absolute impartiality and the aptness of the rulings he had to give on matters of procedure, in the course of our discussions, has always evidenced an enlightened legal mind.

I was especially honoured in being invited to second the motion he has moved, Mr. Speaker, for concurrence in this report. It is quite a substantial report which will certainly command the attention of all friends of labour and will have much influence on the progressive development of relations between employers and workers.

(Text): Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the motion now before the house, I believe it is fitting that I make a few comments in the debate, even though previous speakers have, in my view, already covered the subject matter of this discussion pretty well. I had the good fortune of being in the chamber to listen to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) and to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I feel that they have given an accurate and complete summary of the proceedings which took place, and that they have interpreted to the house the meaning of the recommendations now placed before hon. members.

I wish at this point to join with previous speakers in congratulating the chairman of the committee. He has been regular in the discharge of his high function, and has done it in a most impartial and able way.

I wish also to take this opportunity to thank those responsible for my appointment to this important committee. In the past I had scarcely had an opportunity to go so deeply into labour relations. This opportunity comes at what I consider a serious hour in our programme of reconversion from war to peace-time production.

When the committee began its sittings a controller had already been appointed for some days, and had taken over the management of the plants involved in the dispute. The country was anxious about the dispute in this, its most important basic industry, and about a strike which was to affect so deeply general production in other fields of our activities.

Under its terms of reference the committee had to investigate generally the causes of industrial unrest in the country, so that it might report its findings and conclusions to the house. It held forty-eight sittings, during which time it did a magnificent job. If I were to compare the work of the industrial relations committee with that of any other committee in this or any other previous session, I would say that in the same period of time there has been no committee in the past which achieved such important results as did the committee on industrial relations.

As I said at the outset, my interest in the work of the committee comes from the fact that in the past I had not had an opportunity to go very deeply into the causes of any industrial unrest. My attendance in the committee gave me a better knowledge of what trade unionism means, its purpose and its necessity. I am convinced more than ever that trade unionism, in a democracy such as the one in which we live, is a true expression of the natural development of labour. It is an expansion of the individual rights which may be developed in smaller circles such as the family, or in other larger social or religious groups, and which find their natural development in trade unionism or professional associations.

The process of forming unions is certainly to be encouraged. It has to be developed, so long as that development follows the lines of true democracy In a democracy the basis of all our activities and the reason for our legislation is that of safeguarding and developing the rights of the individual. Our legislation must also protect the individual in all his fields of activity, and must therefore, in matters relating to labour, give a hand in the development of trade unionism. Otherwise, as obtains in a dictatorship, trade unions do not represent the natural expansion of individual rights, but become the instrument of the state to impose its doctrine and its policies of action upon the worker, whereas the opposite should be done in a democracy.

Therefore I believe strongly in trade unions. When I look at the achievements they have attained in the past, the increased standard of living they have provided the worker, the increase in his security, I consider that so long as democracy is present, and so long as such principles are developed in trade unions, we shall march forward toward real progress.

In some circles there is a wrong impression prevailing with regard to trade unions. In my opinion the cause for this is the fact that too much emphasis, too much publicity has been given to the difficult phases of the relations between labour and management. Not enough effort has been made to keep the country informed as to what trade unions have really done. When we have a strike we must not forget that there are hundreds of incidents between companies and unions which have been satisfactorily settled in a friendly way. In the private life of an individual it is said that happiness does not make history, and I think the same is true of trade unions. We hear too much about their failures to achieve their end and we do not hear enough about what they have really done. During the war which has just concluded, the membership of trade unions in Canada increased from around 200,000 until it is now on its way to attain the million mark. We all know, from our experience in our own parts of the country, of the improvements which have been brought about in the lot of the worker by the activities of trade unions.

The committee made seven specific recommendations to this house, six of which I think have already received the approval of members of the committee and, I am sure, of the members of this chamber. I should like to offer a few comments on two of the recommendations which I consider to be of the utmost importance. The first recommendation in the report to which I should like to refer is recommendation No. 6 which provides for a strike vote to be taken at the request of one of the parties concerned and at the discretion of the minister. I have examined this recommendation and have come to the conclusion that it affords a safeguard to both parties to an industrial dispute. I cannot understand the views of those who oppose this recommendation. I see in it two guarantees. First, one of the parties must take the responsibility before the other party and the country generally of having a strike vote taken. In the second place, the minister must exercise his discretion; he must decide whether the request for a strike vote should be granted.

In my judgment, this recommendation should commend itself to the workers, first, because it provides labour with an opportunity to be sure that its will will be taken into account when industrial relations have reached a certain stage. It has been said, particularly of new organizations—and I think this would apply to most trade union locals in Canada—that the direction is too often in the hands of inexperienced men or of a radical element. That is only natural in the development of trade unionism. This recommendation should do much to give a certain amount of assurance to the worker that when the critical hour comes in his relations with management he will have a say in the final decision to be taken.

The unions should not have any objection to this clause. I feel it will strengthen their position. If they give good leadership to their membership they should not be afraid of an expression of opinion on their part. It is simply an expression of labour's will and there is no reason why unions should object to that.

On motion of Mr. Côté (Verdun) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, August 21, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1946-47

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1947, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Acting Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. ABBOTT moved that the estimates be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have forgotten at the moment whether it is usual to bring down so much so late. This looks almost like our estimates for the next session. I have no objection to having them considered, but I do not wish to allow this stage to go by without at least pointing out to the house exactly what it faces in such a volume as this, called "supplementary estimates." I suggest they should be called regular estimates number two.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might reply to my hon. friend by saying that the major portion of the estimates relate to demobilization and reconversion. As he will see on examining them, a very large portion is taken up by Department of Veterans Affairs, as to which it was impossible to forecast, at the time the regular estimates were prepared, what would be required.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the consent of the house to have questions and orders of the day disposed of first and then revert to the debate which was in progress yesterday.

[Mr. P. E. Coté.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

BREWERIES AND DISTILLERIES—CONSTRUCTION PERMITS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What is the total value of construction permits which have been issued to breweries and distilleries in Canada since V-E day?

Mr. McILRAITH: Stand.

Mr. NICHOLSON: May I ask if this question can be answered before the end of the session?

Mr. MACKENZIE: You mean by Christmas?

Mr. McILRAITH: It will depend on when the session ends; we must have time to get the information and give the answer.

QUERO DEEP-SEA FISHING BANKS

Mr. WINTERS:

1. How many craft does the Department of Fisheries have in service for patrolling deep-sea fishing banks, such as Quero, and what are their names?
2. How many craft are being prepared for the above type of service; when will they be ready for service and what are their names?
3. Will additional craft be procured for this service?
4. Are the Arleaux and Arras which did patrol work prior to world war II to be returned to service for the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. BRIDGES:

1. None at present.
2. One vessel, the C.G.S. Cygnus, a former bangor type minesweeper, is being prepared for commissioning as a fisheries protection vessel. The ship is undergoing final trials this week prior to being placed in commission.
3. Not at present contemplated.
4. No.

TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—CONTRACT WITH OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has a new contract between the Ottawa Journal and the International Typographical Union been entered into this year? If so, when was the contract signed, and what period does it cover?
2. Does this contract provide for wage adjustments? Holidays with pay; pay for any statutory holidays?
3. Does this contract contain any clause with reference to any exemption of laws of the union from arbitration? If so, what is the wording of such clause?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes, between the Journal Publishing Company of Ottawa, Limited and the international typographical union, local 102, on July 12, 1946, covering the period January 1, 1946 for a term of two years and three months ending March 31, 1948.

2. Yes. Contract provides for wage adjustments, holidays with pay, and pay for statutory holidays, subject to the approval of the war labour board.

3. Yes. Clause 6, disputes and arbitration, reads as follows:

A standing committee of two representatives of the publisher and two representatives of the union shall be appointed. To this committee shall be referred all disputes which may arise as to the construction to be placed upon any clause or clauses of this agreement, or alleged violation thereof which cannot be settled otherwise. Such committee shall meet within five days when any question of difference shall have been referred to it for decision by either party to this agreement. Should the standing committee be unable to agree unanimously within ten days, then it shall refer the disputed clause or clauses to a board of arbitration. The representatives of each party to this agreement shall select two arbiters, the four to agree upon a fifth who shall be a disinterested party, a resident of Ottawa. If the two representatives of each of the two parties to this agreement fail to agree upon the fifth member to complete the board of arbitration, the Ontario Minister of Labour shall be asked to name a fifth member who shall act as chairman. The majority decision of this board shall be final and binding upon both parties and the cost of such arbitration to be borne equally by the union and the publisher. Provided that the local and international laws of the union, which are a part of this agreement, shall not be subject to arbitration, except insofar as such arbitration and the results thereof are compulsory under Canadian laws, or except where said laws specifically permit their submission to arbitration.

Either party to this agreement may notify the other party thirty (30) days prior to the termination date that it desires to negotiate a revision of the terms of this agreement. If such notice is given, it shall signify that the terms of such revision shall become effective immediately upon the termination date herein set forth and, if not agreed upon by that time, shall be retroactive to the said termination date. Failure of either party to notify the other party, as above stated, shall signify that the terms of the present agreement are to remain in full force and effect until thirty (30) days after the date of termination. If negotiations fail to result in a mutual satisfactory settlement, the matter shall be referred to arbitration as specified in the foregoing paragraph. (It is agreed that section 5, article 2, I.T.U. general laws shall not apply to a joint standing committee dispute except as the union laws may be involved, but said section shall apply to arbitration of a succeeding agreement.)

JAPANESE NATIONALS—FISHING LICENCES IN B.C. WATERS

Mr. REID:

1. Have any requests or applications been made by Japanese nationals or other persons on their behalf, for fishing licences to operate in British Columbia waters?

2. If so, how many such requests or applications have been made?

3. Is consideration being given by the government to granting of these?

Mr. BRIDGES:

1. Yes.

2. Two to Department of Fisheries at Ottawa.

3. No.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITHIN THE EMPIRE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, agreements, letters, cables and other documents exchanged between the government of Great Britain or any officers thereof, the governments of the other dominions, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa or any officials thereof, the government of the United States of America and the government of Canada, regarding preferential trade within the empire and on the British preference to Canada, and any changes proposed herein during the war and after.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is apparent that the documents called for by this motion could not be produced without the consent of the other governments mentioned, and it would not be possible—at least I hope that the session will not last long enough for it to be possible—to have the proper communications exchanged before prorogation. I would suggest to the hon. member that he drop his motion and I will undertake to have the requests made so that if he chooses to renew the motion at the opening of the next session we shall be in a position to say whether or not the other governments agree to have the correspondence tabled.

Motion dropped.

IMMIGRATION

MEMBERS OF POLISH ARMY—SELECTION PERSONNEL PROCEEDING OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) was good enough to give me notice of the following question with reference to the bringing of Polish soldiers into the country:

Will the minister give the names of the Canadian officials and other persons who are proceeding overseas to screen former members of the Polish army seeking admission to Canada under the terms of the regulations recently announced?

The names of the officials who have proceeded overseas to select the soldiers to be admitted are as follows: H. R. Hare, who is on loan from the Department of Agriculture to national employment service as employment adviser on farm labour; J. A. Meindl and F. A. Dubenski, both from the staff of the national employment service at Winnipeg; Dr. Fred S. Parney, of the Department of National Health and Welfare at Ottawa; Staff-Sergeant Kenneth Shakespeare and Sergeant J. A. Stevenson, of Montreal, both of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In Europe this group will be joined by Doctor George Audet, representative of the Canadian Department of National Health and Welfare in London. The three officials of the Department of Labour will check on the suitability of the soldiers for farm work. The two officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare will conduct the medical examinations. The two officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will assist in making the necessary inquiries.

It is expected that these soldiers will arrive in Canada in October.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I have been looking at some of the reports of special committees set up by the house to deal with special problems during the session. One which I desire to bring to the attention of the leader of the house rather than yourself, Your Honour, although you are the chairman of it, is the special committee dealing with the revision of standing orders of the House of Commons. While it is late in the session, yet I think attention should be directed to the fact that the first report of the committee was made on April 10 of this year. So far as I know, no proceedings have been taken to ask for concurrence in the report, which dealt with two major matters; first, a revision of the rules with respect to protracted debates, which I fancy would at once engage the enthusiastic attention of the country and of parliament, and second, the proposed reference of estimates to standing, select or special committees. I should like to ask the leader of the government, first, if there is any intention to have concurrence moved in the first report; second, what has happened to the committee since its first report,—because I have not heard of it since; and third, if somehow or other before the next session of parliament agreement may be made in the house to the end that what has happened in so many previous sessions will not be repeated. I refer particularly to the fact that although we have a large volume of work, there is a lack of organization in the House of Commons. I do not say that in any critical way, but rather with the idea of trying to see if we cannot organize our business in such a manner as to have it in keeping with conditions in the twentieth century rather than conditions of the nineteenth century.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The hon. member knows how jealous each hon. member is, and properly so, of the traditional privileges he enjoys as a member of parliament. Among those who sit on this side of the house, and I am sure it must be the same with respect to hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side, many discussions have taken place as to what would be a proper method of arranging to expedite, in perhaps what would appear to make a more businesslike way, the affairs of the house without unduly impinging on the traditional rights of individual members. It is a serious problem, because hon. members are not only concerned with their present rights and privileges but feel a responsibility towards future parliaments. In conversation I found a great reluctance to take the responsibility of cutting down any of the traditional privileges of individual members. That is a responsibility which each one of us feels. It is for that reason that there has been no proposal of concurrence in the first report of the committee. It has appeared to me that it would be extremely difficult to get agreement about which everyone would feel comfortable on any general modification of the rules of the house.

I have discussed with others the possibility of having partial measures provided for by a resolution which would be effective only for the duration of a session. I think certain procedures could be arranged by way of resolution adopted at the beginning of a session which would be binding only for the duration of the session and would not make members feel that they were definitely abandoning any of their traditional rights and privileges. The experience which would be gained under that kind of resolution might point the way to something more permanent which could be done later.

One suggestion which has been made is that at the opening of parliament, instead of having a resolution to give precedence to the debate on the address over all other matters until the address is ultimately adopted, it might be decided that following the speeches of the leaders on the address the debate would have precedence only from eight o'clock in the evening, so that from three o'clock until six ordinary business could be proceeded with, the committees could be set up, bills could be introduced and considered and much of the ordinary work done during the afternoon sitting without depriving any hon. member of the opportunity of speaking on the address, but merely asking him to do so between eight o'clock and eleven o'clock until the address should be disposed of. That is one suggestion that has been made, which could be brought about by a resolution effective for only one session. The experiment might indicate whether or not something of the kind would enable a great deal of the work to get under way before the expiry of the three and sometimes four weeks it takes to dispose of the debate on the address. I would hope that at the opening of the next session an attempt might be made by way of resolutions, of which this could be just an illustration or example, to make provision for that session, without any hon. member feeling that he was giving up, not only for himself only but for future parliamentarians, any of the traditional rights we have enjoyed up to the present time.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the acting leader of the government that the suggestion he makes is one that has not been made, as far as I know, in the report of the committee on the revision of standing orders, and it really gives more point to what I was trying to say. The matters mentioned by the Minister of Justice, and other suggestions designed to expedite the work of the house, could have been dealt with in some detail by that committee, but it seemed that after it brought in its first report everything stopped. Why everything stopped I do not know, but certainly I believe we should get a great deal further by having the members of the house discuss the very point raised by the minister rather than by simply having isolated suggestions from various members or cabinet ministers in connection with the work of the house. I should like to ask the minister why the committee has not been sitting, and what the difficulty has been in this connection.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So far as I have been able to ascertain, the real difficulty has been the fact that the reference dealt with a permanent modification of the rules of the house, and that appeared to be something very difficult because of its far-reaching consequences. For that reason the method of doing something which would be effective for only one session, as an experiment, has been mentioned.

STELCO PLANT—REPORTED INSTRUCTIONS BY CONTROLLER CONCERNING ENTRY OF VEHICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Has the Minister of Labour been informed of a statement purported to have been made by the vice president of the Steel Company of Canada yesterday, that on instructions from the government controller, transport vehicles were to go in and out of the plant without regard to injuries that might be caused in the process? Does the minister know whether such instructions were given by the controller, and has the controller the consent of the government in giving such instructions?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge whatsoever of any direction that might have been given by the controller. But I want to say that an Englishman's home is his castle, and I think a person has a perfect right to go in and out of his place of business, or into and out of his own home, without being molested by anybody.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say that without equivocation or mental reservation.

MOTOR VEHICLES

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PRICE OF FORD TRACTOR REPAIR PARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I should like to ask the acting Minister of Finance whether the Ford Motor Company was authorized to increase the price of Ford tractor repair parts by twenty per cent on or about August 3. I sent the minister notice of the question yesterday.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I have not received notice of the question. I shall take this as notice and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED VACANCIES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs based upon a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in several newspapers this morning predicting what might almost be described as a wholesale shuffle in the External Affairs department, concerning some five or six of the most prominent men in that department. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, who is handling this department, if he has any comment to make in this connection, because the dispatch deals with some of the vacant diplomatic posts both in Canada and abroad. May I point out to the minister that five of the major posts in our diplomatic service have been vacant for periods up to six months, and I believe we should have some comment from the government as to what is to be done to fill them.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for raising this question; I had intended to refer to the dispatch in any event. My attention had been called to this Canadian Press dispatch in the morning papers of to-day concerning possible changes in the headship of Canadian missions abroad. This story is a mixture of speculation and inaccuracies. No decisions have been taken by the government on the filling of posts abroad which are now vacant. The final paragraph of the story reads as follows:

> Vacancies include the high commissioner offices in Canberra, Wellington, St. John's, Dublin and New Delhi and missions in several European countries.

I may comment that there are no vacancies in the high commissioner posts in Wellington and St. John's, which are filled by Mr. A. V. Rive and Mr. J. S. Macdonald respectively. There is no high commissioner's office in New Delhi. There are no vacancies in any of the Canadian diplomatic missions on the continent of Europe. I might also take this occasion to deny a report which appeared a few days ago to the effect that the Canadian ambassador to Belgium was about to be appointed to the post of ambassador in Paris. There is no foundation for that report.

With respect to the suggestions that there have been some delays in making appointments, I may say to the hon. member and to the house that this is a matter of definite policy. It is the purpose of the Department of External Affairs to have as many as possible of these posts filled by career men. Of course our expansion has been such that it has not been possible in every instance to promote career men to these posts; but a career man who has a secondary post in a mission is given valuable experience by being called upon to act as chargé d'affaires for a period, and he is deliberately allowed to continue to carry on as such in order to give him an opportunity of demonstrating his fitness for promotion to higher office. As the hon. member knows, our requirements in connection with representation abroad have grown very rapidly, and it has not been always possible to provide enough career men, but the policy being pursued by the department is to train career men as rapidly as that can be done. I am happy to be able to say that a large number of brilliant young men from the armed forces have, since the beginning of demobilization, been absorbed into the Department of External Affairs, and are proving to be very good material for the responsibilities which have to be discharged in representing Canada abroad.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would seem that the present period of training has been delaying the filling of these posts. Can the minister say when the training period will come to an end?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Before the Tory party is elected.

Mr. GRAYDON: It will have to come fast, then.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will never come to an end, as a policy—or at least I hope it will not. I hope the Department of External Affairs will continue its policy of making the diplomatic service an attractive career, where young men will feel that there is room for promotion. I hope that policy will be continued as long—and that looks as if it might be quite long—as this government is in power; and that it will be found such a good policy that it will be followed afterwards by whatever government might succeed this one.

MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Finance, notice of which has been given. In view of the recent increase in the cost of living will the minister give consideration to continuing the subsidy of 55 cents per hundred pounds on the production of milk? I understand the subsidy is to be withdrawn shortly.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I received notice of the question just before coming to the house. I shall have to accept the question as a notice, and give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By consent of the house I would ask that we revert to the order for motions.

WAR ASSETS

MOTORCYCLES DECLARED SURPLUS BY DEPARTMENT OP NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, the war expenditures committee final report was tabled on Saturday. About a month ago, if you will remember—and I believe you do—I tried to put on the order paper eight questions with regard to War Assets Corporation. Those questions were turned over to the war expenditures committee for answers. I have not yet received those answers. I should like to know when I may expect them, or if I may expect them before parliament prorogues.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): I shall look into the matter right away.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, with respect to any of the questions asked in the war expenditures committee concerning War Assets Corporation and still outstanding, if those answers have not been prepared and sent forward they are being prepared. Some of them may take a considerable time, while others are more easily answered.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the parliamentary assistant a question respecting the procedure? The hon. member had his questions before the house, and the rules were interpreted in such a way that he was not permitted to have them answered here. Then they were sent to the war expenditures committee to be answered. The war expenditures committee having risen, in what position are other members of the house who have an interest in the answers to those questions? I realize that as between the parliamentary assistant and the hon. member that may be satisfactory; but so far as other hon. members in the house are concerned, I should like to know where we stand.

Mr. McILRAITH: I might explain to the house that several of the answers have been given already, and that they will be found in the last number of the proceedings of the committee on war expenditures and economies, which has not yet been printed. I cannot say whether the questions asked by the hon. member for Peterborough West are in that category.

As to the other point raised, I should think it is really a matter of law and parliamentary procedure. I should not want to give an opinion, but it would strike me that once the report of a committee has been tabled in the House of Commons there would be no further objection to the raising of questions when the orders of the day are called, in the ordinary way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right. I would ask that the house now revert to motions.

SOLDIER SETTLERS

REGULATIONS EXTENDING PERIOD TO APPLY FOR DEBT REDUCTIONS

The order having been called for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Lalonde:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I table regulations extending to December 31, 1946, the period in which certain settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act may apply for debt reductions. This comes under order in council P.C. 166/3368 of August 8, 1946.

Mr. WRIGHT: A point has been raised by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Are the soldier settlers being notified of the extension of this date?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the item to resume the adjourned debate has been called and read. Then the parliamentary assistant presented his report. I do not think we can go back.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest that the order was called prior to the question raised by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I heard the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) call the order for motions at that time. If latitude was given in one instance, I suggest it should be given in the other.

Mr. TUCKER: The answer is yes—those affected will be.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, August 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. PAUL EMILE COTE (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, both parties to a dispute may make use of the privilege contained in this report, and request the Minister of Labour to proceed to the taking of a vote, either before or after the strike is in progress. I made some brief comments before the adjournment last night with regard to the interest which the worker and his union will find in the implementation of this recommendation. Inasmuch as he is affected by this section of the report, the employer will feel more protected against what he may term, at times, the autocracy of union officers.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is so much noise in the chamber that it is extremely difficult to hear the hon. member.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): A measure such as this will give him the privilege of asking the Minister of Labour to proceed to the taking of a vote. No doubt the expression of opinion thus obtained from the men at a time when the dispute is in progress will go a long way toward bringing the parties together.

I am inclined to the belief that such a procedure would have avoided several strikes in the past, and in all probability had it been adopted in due time we would not have known any dislocation in the steel industry. This recommendation in the report will prove beneficial as to the consumer's rights in matters of industrial relations. The consumer is vitally interested in the production of this country. No one more than a minister of the crown responsible to parliament has the authority to represent him and safeguard his interests.

If a dislocation of production is threatened the Minister of Labour is empowered to proceed to a vote among the men affected, to determine what their views are on any particular phase of the conflict.

Another important feature is this recommendation:

(a) That the proposed dominion-provincial labour conference be called at the earliest possible moment to draft a labour code within the limits of the Canadian constitution and with a view to establishing machinery for the prevention of dislocations in industry.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member who is speaking is making so much noise that we cannot hear those who are holding meetings down here. You might call order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have done so twice since the opening of this sitting. I would ask hon. members who have problems to discuss more important than that which is being discussed in the house to use the lobby.

Mr. COTE (Verdun): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a very reasonable approach to the problem of peacetime industrial relations, if one recalls the experience which we have had during the war years, and on the other hand the exigencies of the days that lie ahead.

Among others we had, during the war, order in council P.C. 1003, better known as the national labour code, which came into effect March 20, 1944. It had arisen from a consultation with the provinces, and with the national presidents of the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the national syndicates and the railway brotherhoods. Its purpose and effect was to clarify the rights of the workers and of the employers, to make collective bargaining obligatory, to impose penalties against interference with employees' union activities, and to eliminate the necessity of striking for union recognition. It may be that this code did not bring all the good results which were expected at first, but it remains that it has contributed to a great extent to improvement of the relations between management and labour, to better substantially the lot of the workers, and to increase our war production to the high level which it has known.

The committee must be supported in its recommendation that a dominion-provincial labour conference be called at the earliest possible moment. It is suggested, and properly so, that the federal government take the initiative of calling this conference together. Who else could do so with as much authority? I do not see any serious reason why any province should not accept such an invitation spontaneously, and should not come here with an open mind to discuss the problem of industrial relations in each province and put together the experiences which they have had in their respective sections of the country within the past few years.

Why put the emphasis on the diversity of the conditions which prevails across the country? I agree that they must be taken into serious account in the study of any problem of national significance. Why not rather put together all that the provinces have in common, either as to doctrine or as to experience, and set up a common basis for the enactment of labour legislation which will take care of the minimum requirements for the promotion of industrial peace in this country?

Similar conferences should thereafter be held regularly with a view to keeping these preliminary agreements on the level of actual exigencies.

When I recall the founding of the international labour organization after the first great war and the priceless services it has rendered since in the promotion of social justice in all the countries of the world, I do not see why a closer association of our provincial governments could not achieve the same end within this country. The international labour organization held until 1939 twenty-five sessions and adopted sixty-seven conventions and sixty-six recommendations. The conventions have secured nearly nine hundred formal ratifications by governments, and dealt with hours of work; holidays with pay; regulation of conditions of work of women; protection of child workers; prevention of and compensation for industrial accidents; insurance against unemployment, sickness, old age and death; apprenticeship and training for employment; colonial labour problems; living and working conditions of seamen at sea and ashore. What the international labour office has done and still can do by mutual agreement between the nations of the world for the promotion of social justice and the establishment of a better understanding, it seems obvious to me, Mr. Speaker, that our country can do, within its boundaries, by closer consultation with the provinces.

The report before the house contains recommendations which, if they are translated into legislation, will constitute an important milestone in the improvement of our labour legislation. Our country has already done much in this field, under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has devoted his whole career to that great cause. We can do more, and I hope that we shall succeed, with the cooperation of all parties concerned.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker. it was my privilege to be a member of the industrial relations committee, and I cherish that privilege, because I have come out much wiser and greatly benefited as a result of what I learned there. I did not go there as a labour expert; I regarded myself as one of the representatives of the general public. I may say that it was very encouraging and it increased my faith in human nature when we came to our conclusions and found men of all parties in this house getting together and working out the final basis for our report without any partisan bias whatever. I say that without equivocation.

Various comments have been made on our findings and conclusions; some of them are flattering, some not. As a matter of fact the greatest value, I believe, which came out of this committee was the general publicity which was given throughout the length and breadth of the land to labour-management affairs.

I have no particular brief for either labour or management. I think that there are good union leaders; as a matter of fact, the majority are; but on the other hand, in all fairness—and we must be fair in these matters—we must admit that there are also good employers. Throughout the industrial history of Canada and the United States, employers have done much, in many cases, to help the conditions of the employees. So that we must not put all the blame on one side. In some of the present disputes, I believe, blame is unquestionably to be put on both sides. This was proven by evidence which we heard in the committee.

We are going through what I would call the struggle for Canada's destiny. It started in 1939, and it is not over yet. I divide it into phases. There was the war; there is the transitional period; and there is the time to come. I will liken it to an attack. We have reached our first objective; we have won the war. There is no question that it is harder to win a permanent and lasting peace than it is to win a war. The fact is that such a thing as a permanent and lasting peace has never yet been won. Our second objective is winning the peace, which will mean prosperity, freedom and happiness throughout Canada. At the moment we have reached an intermediate objective, the transitional period through which we are now passing; and in order to win a final peace—I mean an industrial peace as well as a cessation of gunfire—we must be strong to go ahead.

At the present time we are beset with enemies, the enemy of inflation, the enemy of distrust, the enemy of impatience. What have we done? We cannot allow inflation to develop, and so for this intermediate objective we have formed what we call the Gordon line. The Gordon line may bend here and there; a salient may be driven into it here and there, but we cannot allow that Gordon line to break. If we do, the enemy inflation will break through the gap and swallow up the farmer, the fisherman, the pensioner and all people living on small earned incomes. We cannot allow that to happen, and so we in this House of Commons have to be the cohorts of Mr. Gordon to help him hold the line. As I say, the line may have to bend a little here and there. All right; how are we going to advance from there?

In modern warfare you put down a heavy artillery fire preparatory to your ground forces moving ahead to the next objective. What is our plan to be? Press relations, informing the public as to what is going on, are very important. Our artillery in holding the Gordon line consists of the press. The large city newspapers lay down the heavy artillery, and the small town dailies and the country newspapers, weeklies and magazines are the medium and field artillery. What do you do in an attack? You direct all your artillery to the main target area. That is just what we must do. We must direct our artillery fire in a definite direction; the fire must be properly directed and be accurate. Therefore I say to the press: direct your fire properly to the right target and be sure you direct it accurately.

So far as the committee is concerned the press, generally speaking, particularly those members of it who sat in from day to day at our meetings, was accurate and fair, but there have been many editorials that have been unfair and I have seen unfair criticisms. We must remember that the rounds that fall short are the dangerous ones. One or two rounds did fall short and pretty nearly hit the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) but did him no harm because he looks hale and hearty still. But it was most unfair of the press to let those rounds fall short, and I hope that they will be more accurate in their fire in future. The Minister of Labour has done and is doing a good job, and we want him to stay on and to receive all the encouragement he can get. I feel reasonably optimistic about the future, because Canada is a great country. Canadians are wonderful people individually, and all we have to do is to learn to be that way collectively. The press, properly directed, can help to bring that about. I have great faith in the future of Canada because of the press, but only by the press directing their fire accurately can we come to a happy understanding and have peace and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

I am not going to compliment the members of the committee individually. I think they all worked hard and that they were very sincere in what they did. I could pick out certain stars of the team, but I shall not do that because the sounds they want to hear are not sweet words about themselves but the music of the humming wheels of industry turning again and friendly and civil talk between the leaders in management and labour. I maintain that the press can also help there.

I shall not take up any more time, because a good deal of the ground has already been covered and one or two able speakers are to follow me. But I did want to make that point about the press. The members of the press who were in the committee room with us working long and tedious hours were gallant gunners, and so in conclusion, with respect to labour-management relations and in their relations to the dominion government I would say: Praise the press and pass the information.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to start in by paying any compliments to the chairman or the members of the committee. My impression of the committee was that it did the best it could with the latitude it was allowed and the equipment it had to work with. I am going to try to focus the attention of the house this morning on the fact that all the hard work of that committee means nothing if the present attitude on the part of employers and the controller is to continue.

On July 16 industrial relations in this country had come to such a pass that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the eve of leaving for the peace conference in Paris accepted a suggestion from the opposition that the subject of labour relations and industrial unrest should be placed in the hands of the industrial relations committee to see if that committee could not arrive at some formula whereby industrial disputes in this country might be resolved. When the Prime Minister accepted that invitation from this side of the house my reaction was that the machinery provided in this country by the Department of Labour was in a bad way and was being superseded because it was inadequate to handle the disputes that existed at that time. In passing that task over to the committee the Prime Minister in my opinion passed it over to all parties in this house to accept the joint responsibility of trying to resolve those difficulties and recommend some measure or formula that might prevent such disputes from taking place in the future. The committee did not do that and my opinion is that its work is not completed. It merely skimmed the surface. It made some recommendations to this house which would be helpful if they are implemented.

It was on July 16 that this task was entrusted to the committee with the sanction of the Prime Minister. One month later, after this committee had taken all the evidence and probed behind the scenes for the reasons for the present industrial disputes, industrial unrest and the strike situation in Canada is worse to-day than it was then. To say that the committee performed any miracles when it did not change the situation in industry is not correct. In addition to the strikes that existed at the time, and they still exist, a new strike threat looms on the horizon, a strike by the packing house workers, who if their difficulties are not resolved by a certain date are going to strike on a national scale. So the committee did not accomplish very much. I am not going to read the record but the fact is that every strike that existed on July 16 when the committee was set up is still in existence, including the steelworkers' strike.

The first night that the committee met for organization purposes a motion was made that we would set as our first objective the settling of the steel dispute. That objective was not accomplished. The first day on which the committee actually sat in formal session I moved that the controller appointed by the government under order in council P.C. 2901 be instructed to exercise his duties under that order in council by beginning negotiations with the union, apart from the employers, and endeavouring to resolve their difficulties here in Ottawa while the committee was taking evidence.

That motion was not accepted, but lay on the table three days, and the committee finally decided that the employers should get together despite the fact that they had no longer any authority in the management of the steel industry, since the government had superseded their executive authority by the appointment of a controller; and despite that legal technicality the employers and employees had been together month after month and had not successfully resolved the difficulty. They precipitated the strike, and in my opinion it was bad technique and unsound judgment to expect them, because they were in the atmosphere of Ottawa, to get together and resolve the difficulty. In my opinion valuable time was wasted and the legality or validity of that order in council, or any order in council in the future, can be challenged if the attitude taken by the government with regard to its enforcement in that particular instance was valid.

I say we wasted a lot of time and the committee did not attain the first objective they set themselves in the settlement of the steel dispute. That is very important, because the steel industry in Canada has now a basic strike on hand. Steel ramifies all through our economy, and if a determined and reasonable attempt had been made to resolve the steel difficulty, in my opinion the formula arrived at there would automatically be applied to the other difficulties that exist in industry, and we would have been straightening out the whole picture at one time. But we are back in the house with no recommendation on the basic issue in dispute.

The steelworkers before the committee made a sound and reasonable case. They showed that they were not adamant in their attitude. They modified their position on two occasions. I felt that when the controller finally came into the picture the committee should have recommended to him the last proposal made by the steelworkers' union to the committee and to the employers and to Mr. Brockington, who was acting then as mediator in the dispute. That should have gone forward to the controller as a reasonable basis for negotiations, but that was not done, so that the controller was in the same position that Mr. Brockington was in. He goes back in there with the ten cent formula over his head and with very little latitude and very little possibility of settling the difficulty unless someone is prepared to do some plain talking on the part of the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is bound hand and foot.

Mr. GILLIS: The general impression is that the industrial workers are demanding wage increases. That is not the case. The industrial workers to-day, because of the failure to hold the price line, are asking for increases in their basic rates in order that they may maintain the income they had during the war. That is all they are doing. I am going to put the last proposal of the steelworkers' union on the record. It is very simple. The first is the removal of the five-cent Sydney differential. That is a case that has been before the national war labour board and the regional boards for the last three years. It is still before the national board. It was turned down three times. In my opinion it should not be included in this dispute. I suggest that the Minister of Labour, who has some authority over the national war labour board, in order to get that particular problem out of the way, and separated from the basic problem in the Sydney plant, might suggest that they make a decision in that case and remove one of the sore spots as far as the Sydney plant is concerned.

The second of their proposals was a general wage increase of ten cents an hour retroactive to April 1, 1946, in the primary steel plants and the fabricating plants of all three operating companies. That is a very reasonable proposal. The national director of the steelworkers' union, in presenting his case to the committee, recognized the fact that while the plants and production are tied up, the danger of inflation is increased fifty per cent. He was not asking for his total demands at that time. He was prepared to take it in stages and to accept and recommend at once the ten cents to his membership, so that the plants might get back into production and lessen the dangers of inflation.

The next proposal with regard to wages was adjustments totalling 5½ cents an hour to compensate for increases in the cost of living from April 1 to July 1, such adjustments to be payable this calendar year. I consider that one of the most important recommendations made by the steelworkers' union. I am of that opinion for this reason, that it is a weapon in the hands of the wartime prices and trade board if they want to maintain prices.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not.

Mr. GILLIS: They do not is right, because when the employers, the manufacturers or those who have something to put on the market for sale begin to put pressure on the wartime prices and trade board for increases in basic commodities the board are in a position to say, "Yes, we will give you an increase but you will pay it yourself. You will increase the cost of living and you are going to adjust the wages of your workers in proportion to the increased cost of living." It is the only weapon that has been suggested to date which would assist in maintaining prices in this country, but the committee did not see it that way.

Number four on the agenda was that all the other issues in dispute to be completed by October, 1946, should go to arbitration. The date to which the removal of the Sydney differential should be made retroactive was backed up on, and they proposed that it be put where it was suggested it should be in the first place; and second, the dates upon which the adjustments totalling 5½ cents should be made payable were to remain in abeyance and be made the subject of arbitration. With respect to the further increases on the basis of the cost of living, one cent per point, they were also prepared to send that to arbitration. Hours of work, overtime pay for statutory holidays, vacations with pay, a union security formula applicable to all plants—these were all to go to arbitration, and in effect the immediate proposal made, the one that would start the plants in operation if accepted, was the removal of the Sydney differential, and the general increase of ten cents an hour retroactive to April 1, 1946 in the primary steel plants and the fabricating plants of the three operating companies.

That would settle the steel strike, and the other matters would go to arbitration. I believe Mr. Millard, the national director of the steelworkers' union, was much fairer than many others I know of in a similar position in trying to get that industry into operation. Nevertheless, so far as the committee was concerned I do not think he succeeded. If hon. members will read the evidence presented and the document to which I have referred I do not think that they will say that the case presented by the steelworkers' union with respect to the adjustment of wages is unreasonable. It is not an increase in wages; it is an endeavour to maintain the take-home pay of those in these industries who have lost that percentage of their take-home pay because of the increase in prices.

When I hear hon. members say that the price ceilings must be maintained, I agree. I said that from the start; we have all said it. But the fact of the matter is that they have not been maintained. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) recognizes why the cost of living bonus was established in the first place. It was established to hold the price line; it was one of the most important parts of the whole mechanism. The cost of living bonus was worked into the basic rates. It was taken off, and in my opinion that was the initial mistake. Immediately that took place there was pressure largely from the manufacturers in Canada for increases in the prices of basic commodities, and that started the drive on the price ceiling. The wartime prices and trade board, reacting to that pressure, in my opinion, removed the ceilings literally from hundreds of commodities. Before the last election the start was made when the twenty-five per cent luxury tax was taken off vacuum cleaners, washing machines and all of these things which are essentials to the average householder.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is the hon. member sure about that twenty-five per cent tax being on household articles?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I am positive.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought it was on jewellery.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it was not; it came off vacuum cleaners, washing machines and anything that was designated as luxury goods.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not call a vacuum cleaner a luxury.

Mr. GILLIS: It was a twenty-five per cent tax. When the luxury tax was removed, instead of passing it on to the consumer it was made mandatory that the manufacturer retain the price to the consumer. In effect it was a gift—

Mr. MITCHELL: I can hardly believe that.

Mr. GILLIS: Check it up and find out, because I did. It was a gift to the manufacturers of Canada; it was one of the initial wedges in breaking the ceiling, and it was not passed on to the consumer.

Mr. MITCHELL: The luxury tax is still on jewellery.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not see why it should not; I see no objection to it.

Mr. GILLIS: A vacuum cleaner is used in every household.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would rather see it on jewellery than on food.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was removed, but the manufacturers kept the tax.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is just kidding himself.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: What about the tax on building materials—

Mr. GILLIS: You fellows can make your speeches after I am through. The cost of living in the country was added to and the trend to inflation speeded up by the removal of the subsidies on the essentials of life. For example, subsidies were taken off such items as fruit, milk, butter, and so forth—all things which take up a large percentage of the average workingman's income. Then came the pay-off when the basic steel operators came to the wartime prices and trade board and asked for an increase. I said in committee, and I repeat, that the man largely responsible for the present difficulties in steel is the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. The increase of $5 a ton in basic steel, which meant $9 a ton in fabricated steel, was the increase which upset his ceiling and created difficulties throughout the economic life of the country. Further then that it was borne out by evidence before the committee that according to the balance sheets presented, the $5 a ton increase was not necessary. According to the total operations every one of the operating companies could have absorbed the wage increases asked for. Dosco in its over-all picture could have done it; Stelco could have done it, and the same is true of Algoma, without any increase of $5 a ton. Therefore I say the wartime prices and trade board fell down on the job.

Mr. MITCHELL: That did not come out in the evidence.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, it was clear from the evidence.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not holding any brief for the steel companies, but I would say that—

Mr. GILLIS: I know, but any member of the committee who listened to the evidence will substantiate what I am saying now, that that increase of $5 a ton was not necessary. It was an increase which set off the demands for increased wages. I believe in telling the truth and facing the facts, because we are not going to get out of our difficulties by putting our heads in the sand like ostriches and excusing a man because he has an exalted position. If the line had been held, if price ceilings had not been removed along the line, you would not have the demands for wages that you have to-day. If to-morrow you paid an additional 15½ cents an hour to every industry which is looking for it the men would be in exactly the same position so far as take-home pay is concerned as they were in during the war years. This being so, those who did not hold the line but began to grant increases in farm machinery and basic steel are the people who are responsible for the industrial difficulties which confront us to-day. If we are to cure that situation we have to tackle the problem at its source. The figures presented to the committee by Stelco showed substantial profits and reserves and an excellent balance sheet. When Mr. Robinette was asked if he thought that these companies were in difficulties he said, no; he thought they were in a very good financial position. The Stelco figures are being challenged to-day by an accountant who works in their own cost department.

The wartime prices and trade board did not examine the balance sheets of these companies to determine whether or not an increase of $5 a ton was necessary. While the government policy may be, and the policy of the wartime prices and trade board is, that wages must be controlled to a certain extent, and I agree with that, and that prices must be controlled, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board told the committee that so far as profits are concerned the companies were permitted to determine on that basis what they considered a reasonable and fair profit. Profits will also have to be controlled. If Donald Gordon is to be permitted to tell the workers of Canada what is a fair wage, then he should be instructed to tell the companies what should be a fair profit.

Mr. MITCHELL: Be fair with Donald Gordon. He disclaimed any responsibility for the establishment of wage rates. He said it was the function of the war labour board to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: He may say that; theoretically it is true, but practically it is not, because if Donald Gordon suggests a ceiling on wages beyond which you cannot go without endangering the economy of the country, then Donald Gordon is supreme in the matter of fixing wages, because everyone else has to work under that ceiling. While theoretically he says that another board sets the wages, nevertheless he is placing a ceiling under which this board must work; therefore Gordon is supreme. He may say that he does not sit in and make decisions, but he tells you the point beyond which you are not allowed to go. I want to emphasize that. Wages to-day are not chasing prices and endangering the economy of the country by inflation. The reverse is true. Prices have gone up and wages are trying to chase them in order to maintain the standards established during the war. The responsibility is not on the industrial workers; it is on those who did not maintain the price ceiling. I emphasize that, because according to the evidence given before the committee it is absolutely correct.

On this matter of inflation I would like to say this, while we are at it. Sometimes it amazes me how glibly some people can talk about it when it affects someone else. I wonder how many hon. members ever stop to think of this. The wage increases in steel would create perhaps about $15,000,000 of additional purchasing power in this country, or something like that. Did we cry inflation when the government proposed, and rightly so, to spend $250,000,000 a year for family allowances? They placed $250,000,000 a year of extra purchasing power in the hands of a class of our society who do not produce anything, a class who are going to school. The proposition was absolutely right, but Donald Gordon did not cry inflation at that time; it was quite all right. On the other hand when we lent hundreds of millions of dollars to Britain and other countries, of which a large proportion was to be spent in Canada—and rightly so; I supported those loans—there was no cry of inflation, though these millions of dollars of extra purchasing power were to be spent in this country to take goods out of this country. Now the government propose to increase the salaries of judges to $15,000 or $20,000 a year, which is extra purchasing power to a class of our society who do not produce consumer goods, but that is quite all right; there is no cry of inflation.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not defending the judges, and I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but the increases were not that great.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is the ceiling; the top salary is now $20,000.

Mr. GILLIS: It ranges down from that, of course. I used the top figure, but what is a few million among friends. The point I am making is that there was no cry of inflation there; that was fine. But when the fellows who sweat in the basic industries of this country and who produce all the wealth of the country come in and ask for something which will give them an addition $15,000,000 in purchasing power, that is inflation and it cannot be done.

Mr. GRANT: Absurd.

Mr. GILLIS: It is absolutely correct, and if my hon. friend does not understand it, that is not my responsibility. I want something done about this; I want to try and put the matter in proper focus, because this business of inflation has been used as a slogan to scare people, many of whom do not understand it. Quite a few times I have heard the Minister of Labour refer to inflation in Germany after the last war. I was there, too; but remember this. I did not know at that time, but inflation was "fit to eat". Most of the people of this country are in the same position to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can tell you what they got with their inflation—Hitler.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not the point I am making. The point is that these things can be used as slogans to scare people, to keep them submissive and subservient on low standards, until these theories and ideas are exploded and some common sense applied.

Now, with regard to getting something done about this, very late in the day, as I thought, we decided to pass the matter back to where it should have been dealt with in the first place, to the controller. When I started to talk I said I thought the work of our committee had been completely nullified in the last couple of days. Two other hon. members have read into the record the statement of the controller. He is going to start in to take a secret questionnaire from each individual in the steel plants. That is the end of Kilbourn as far as I am concerned. His work is finished, and you had better get a new controller. Then the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked a question this morning based upon a telegram; this also has to do with the controller. The telegram reads:

Following wire sent Mitchell and Kilbourn this afternoon by Larry Sefton. "At meeting before Hamilton police commissioners this afternoon Elwin, vice-president Steel Company of Canada stated that government controller had instructed management to run transport trucks, trains and other vehicles into plant in spite of any danger that might be created to life and limb of Hamilton citizens. Are these your instructions to the Steel Company of Canada?"

That wire was supposed to have been sent to the minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: By whom is it signed?

Mr. GILLIS: It is signed by Eamon Park, international representative of the United Steel Workers of America, and it emanates from Hamilton.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Did the minister send those instructions?

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not send them.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope the minister will take part in this debate later on. He says he did not send them. Then the vice-president of the steel company in Hamilton—

Mr. MITCHELL: As my hon. friend knows, there are thousands of businesses in this country. There are a few strikes, and we have put in some commissioners. I am accused of instructing war labour boards; I am accused of instructing this person and that person. I think when you appoint a man to do a job, you appoint a grown man who should have enough sense to run his own end of it. If the person you appoint is not satisfactory to some people I am told he should be kicked out. That goes for commissioners, for controllers, for war labour boards and I suppose for the Minister of Labour as well. However, I did not intend to say all that. I only wanted to tell the hon. member he was right about the washing machines and vacuum cleaners.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you very much. I said the work of the committee was nullified. If the statement made in this telegram is true; if the controller took that line of action in Hamilton, that controller should be replaced, because this committee definitely condemned, in no uncertain terms, the use of physical force by either employer or employee in any dispute. If this man issued these orders, that trucks were to be driven through those picket lines, endangering the lives of those men at this particular stage in this dispute, he should be replaced. If he is not replaced you will find no solution to the difficulty in Hamilton or in basic steel. If he made the statement that he was going to take an inventory of everyone in these plants, then the man is not competent to act in the dispute he has authority to handle, and should be replaced. I do not know whether or not these things are true. The vice-president of the Hamilton works may not be telling the truth; it may be just a technique to try and smash the picket line, but the minister should check, and if the controller has taken that line of action he should be removed.

Let us look at the other side of the picture, with regard to violations of law and order. When a strike takes place the press, the heavy artillery which was mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Baker)—he depends upon the press to pull us out of our difficulties—are always on the other side. With all due respect to those who work for the press, I have found that in their opinion the worker is always wrong, that he is always in an illegal position. If you want the workers of this country to obey the law, then employers also must be made to obey the law and set the example. See what you have there in Hamilton in the way of law violations by the employers. In the first place they were permitted—and Donald Gordon should be checked on this—to inveigle men and women into that plant by paying them three times the wages they received previously, under normal operations. In that plant they are paid for twenty-four hours a day. That is an incentive to bring them in. It is a violation of the labour laws of this country, if that company did not get permission from the war labour board. When the minister replies I should like him to say whether the Steel Company of Canada did get permission to increase by three times the wages of those who are now in the plant in Hamilton, whether that was done with the permission of the war labour board.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can give an answer to that now. It is simply this: the steel company is capable of taking care of itself. We have all got to live together.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will watch my time, and check on these interruptions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend, that he should have a couple of minutes more.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you very much.

Mr. MITCHELL: Those people cannot get in and out; I think that is fundamental. I say a person has a perfect right to go in and out of a plant if he so desires. You and I, as old trade unionists, know that; but there are some who do not carry trade union cards. Any man has the right to go in and out of his own house, or in and out of his place of business without being molested. That is elementary and fundamental.

Mr. GILLIS: But the question I asked the minister to check and to let us know about when he speaks is whether the steel company in Hamilton are paying three times the wages to the employees now in the plant as compared with what they were paying under normal operations. I would ask if these wages are being paid with the sanction of the national war labour board, because if they are not, the company should be prosecuted for a serious violation of the laws of this country.

The second point is this: There is an airstrip in that plant where aircraft are landing in violation of an important law in this country. It is not recognized as a legal air field. This was drawn to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) but evidently that violation is still going on, and it is a serious one.

Mr. MacINNIS: The steel company is able to look after itself.

Mr. GILLIS: This should be checked. In the third place—and this is a provincial matter—men and women are sleeping in that plant, and that is contrary to provincial statute. They are breaking every law in the country.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not contrary to provincial statute, is it?

Mr. LALONDE: Will that go into the record?

Mr. GILLIS: It is a contravention of a provincial statute respecting hours of work, labour, and absenteeism. Then, the accusation was made by Mr. Conroy, of the Canadian Congress of Labour, that a priority was issued to build a hotel, and that rations are going in there indiscriminately, contrary to regulations. Mr. Gordon should be asked whether rationing is being enforced in connection with supplying the people in that plant. Do you see?—when you align yourself on the side of those who are engaged in a war, you are on that side. And if Donald Gordon and the war labour board permit flagrant violations of statutes and orders in council of this country, they are providing ammunition.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you will go down the middle of the road with me and tell both sides to comply with the law—

Mr. GILLIS: I have no hesitation in doing that, but I would want to see both sides treated the same. But when a man is picketing a plant, and they place their finger on him for illegal action because he is standing out there and fighting for bread and butter for himself and his family and to maintain a home—because he is doing that he is an outlaw; but more serious violations are taking place on the other side and nobody sees them.

The committee has made recommendations which, if followed, would be helpful. I shall comment briefly on one of those recommendations which was controversial. I realize that if the union security clause, and that kind of stuff, is put through, it will be helpful. But there was one clause which created discussion. I wish to say first that in my opinion the committee was poorly equipped to do the job it had to do. I think the chairman should have had a secretariat. He should have had available to him two or three people with ability in drafting, who could record discussions as they occurred, as the ideas were thrown out. It would be a small but efficient committee who could throw those ideas around and put them into proper language to be presented later on in the report.

Mr. MacINNIS: They had two lawyers.

Mr. GILLIS: But they do not draft.

An hon. MEMBER: They are all draft.

Mr. LALONDE: May I interject that so far as the report is concerned, the suggestions brought up in committee were worked out in the steering committee. If the work has not been done properly, then the whole committee should bear the responsibility.

Mr. GILLIS: Definitely, yes. I said we did the best job we could with the latitude and equipment we had to work with. The steering committee was the drafting committee. But the steering committee which drafted this report did not have time to consider these things properly.

Mr. LALONDE: If it is just a question of time, then I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what I am getting at. If you had had a couple of people who were familiar with the drafting of reports and throwing ideas around, who could have taken these things as they arrived and done some work on them on the side so as to have presented them later to the steering committee, I believe it would have facilitated things and brought about more harmony in respect of some of these clauses than has been indicated in the debate.

Clause 6 makes the proposal that the Minister of Labour should intervene in a strike where any strike vote has not been taken. That came originally from the steering committee in this form:

> Your committee recommends that it shall be illegal to take strike action before the taking of a vote, supervised by the government, in which all the employees of the particular industry shall have the right to participate.

That was not suitable to the main committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why not?

Mr. GILLIS: It just was not suitable There is no use in wasting time asking why it was not. It was deleted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken forty minutes.

Some. hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you, hon. members. This very important recommendation was being debated within only a few minutes before the committee adjourned. The provision I have read was deleted, but part of the clause which appears in the report was written by the Minister of Reconstruction and part was written by myself, during the discussion around that table. I threw one piece of paper up, and the Minister of Reconstruction threw another piece of paper; and the original language of what I considered was a suggestion was embodied in the report. I made it clear when I threw my piece of paper up that this was just an idea, that the steering committee could work on it and put it into better language to be presented to the house in the report.

Mr. LALONDE: And we came back with it the morning after.

Mr. GILLIS: With the original draft; it was poorly drafted.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is talking about clause 6?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. The intention behind clause 6, according to my interpretation and my understanding of it in committee, and also as I remember it—the Minister of Reconstruction placed himself on record last night as to his understanding of it—was that we were trying to adopt a provision under which the working men in this country when they are asked to place their wives and families up against a picket line—because they are the ones who will do the suffering—should have a right to vote on it. If an industry is to go on a strike in this country, the merits or demerits of the dispute or strike action should be balloted on by those affected in the industry —the man who, in the final analysis, pays the bill. Secondly, as to the latter part of it, my conception of it was this, that if a vote is taken, as it has been taken in this steel dispute, that legalizes that strike as far as the vote is concerned. If an industry is tied up without a vote having been taken, it is not only the prerogative of the Minister of Labour but it is his duty as a responsible member of the government to see that a vote is taken to determine the wishes of the people affected in that particular dispute. Many constructions were put upon this in the house, and every hon. member is entitled to exercise his judgment as to what this section means. I know what I meant when I supported it. I had the word of the Minister of Labour that he would make a statement in the house and put that interpretation on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a question for the purpose of clarification. I believe I am thinking along the same line as my hon. friend. Take such a case as I pointed out in the committee; that I receive a report from either side and after investigation I am of the opinion that the vote was not taken properly —my hon. friend knows what I am driving at— we would not put that outside the discretion of the minister?

Mr. GILLIS: Not at all. If I were minister of labour and I was told that an industry with 14,000 workers had taken a vote in a telephone booth by a show of hands, I would certainly see that a proper vote was taken— definitely. But the particular angle of the thing which I am concerned about is this, that the right to say whether you are going to strike should rest with the rank and file affected. That is where it should rest. That is democracy. On the other hand, if men are pulled out on wild-cat strikes the minister of labour in this country cannot be a rubber stamp. Suppose I were the responsible minister; I could not see myself accepting a position whereby someone pulls the pin from under an industry and walks in and says to me, "We are on strike, whether you like it or not, and we are running the show without any consultation with the rank and file of the people of this country." The basis of the movement which I belong to is control on the part of the people. That is why we hold conventions and write policies. The leadership of this C.C.F. movement carries out the instructions given by the rank and file.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: Surely, we do.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Except in West Kootenay.

Mr. GILLIS: I would like to say that the mechanism of the particular matter we are talking about is not for the benefit of us in Nova Scotia. We take that vote; there is no trade union leader in the province who, on any of the basic issues which affect the membership of the union, would dare take any step without a referendum vote—a levy on membership, a strike, agreements when they are finalized. That is democracy, and that is what we fight to retain. I was called from Sydney a few nights ago when this was phoned to them. Some one interpreted this proposal as meaning that the Minister of Labour could order a vote in the Hamilton plant on the wage question. It cannot be done. After a vote is taken it legalizes the strike; if there is not a vote there should not be a strike.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) spoke of the Rand formula. I am all for the Rand formula. I would have written it in the report; and I may add that if I had written that report it would have been different from what it is. There would have been about four clauses in it, strong and specific. But no one member wrote it; it was a compromise, based on different opinions. But when the hon. member for Spadina said the other evening that the Rand formula would apply to this situation and would cure it, I must tell him that it has nothing to do with it. The Rand formula is union security; this is a strike vote. If the Rand formula is applied to industry in this country it eliminates picketing. There is proof of that in the steel strike. In Sydney there is no picketing, because they are organized one hundred per cent and they have union security by agreement.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that not the best kind of security?

Mr. GILLIS: Definitely. And there is no picketing at Algoma. There is no union security in Stelco, but there is a civil war on. I would say that the Minister of Labour should have a national code enacted as soon as possible and write into it the Rand formula or something like it. On the other hand, the hon. member for Spadina based his construction of this particular section on the use of the word "affected". I do not know what he has in mind. I had no intention of including the superintendents, clerical staff, stenographers and so on. They are not affected. In any strike I have ever been in, the office staffs and superintendents and clerical staffs and confidential staffs were paid their salaries, and they are not eligible for membership in the union. But I think that every man who is eligible for membership in the organization should have the right to vote, because he is affected and should be consulted.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would you go this far; would you use the constitution of the organization—?

Mr. GILLIS: Definitely. These things are written into the constitution and the agreements of the old established unions. But in this province you have not old established unions except in the crafts, and in your mass industries, particularly, until such time as they have grown to maturity and write these laws for themselves in their own agreements and constitutions, legislative action is necessary now, in order to guide them and see that the rank and file—and, indeed, the leadership—are protected. Because pressure groups in an organization can throw a strike against the wishes of the executive board; they wake up in the morning and find their industry is tied up and they have had nothing to say about it; then they are "behind the eight ball" in disentangling it.

This is not legislation; this is merely a suggestion by way of a report from this committee. I assume that officers of the crown will sit in and draft legislation on the basis of these recommendations. All legislation which goes through this house is prepared in that manner; regulations are written, interpretation clauses provided, and so on. All this is merely a suggestion. We did not try to write legislation. I had no conception or thought of doing so. Under present circumstances in this country I am merely supporting number 6 on the assumption that the construction placed on it by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply and the Minister of Labour in the committee, and the ideas I have about it, are correct. It is to provide for a strike vote; before an industry goes on strike, balloting the men affected, and then there is the "after" business, after a strike takes place, after an industry has pulled a strike without consultation by ballot of the men affected the minister has a duty to perform to take a ballot there and see that it is taken properly; and that is the end of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: If the minister has any doubt as to how the ballot was taken?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. If you are notified by the membership that no proper ballot was taken, certainly you have a duty to perform. Then, I think, either side should be in a position to demand it. There may be cases in which you will get as many requests from the employees of an industry as you will from the industrialists, that they are on strike without a ballot. I could tell you of many of these things which I have been through, but I do not want to waste time. That is why we have written these provisions into our constitutions and our agreements. When the minister speaks I want him to clarify that particular point. I am supporting the proposal on that basis: it is a strike vote and a strike vote only. I use the word "affected" because I believe it is important. It would place trade union leadership in this position, that before a strike took place in any industry which they were organizing they would be absolutely sure that they had a reasonable number of people in the organization to make that strike successful. Striking a split plant is bad tactics, and I believe that the people should be guided with legislation of this kind to make sure that a proper organizational job is done before a strike. I think some of us who have had experience here should have the courage to put that into legislative form as a guide to those who, if we do so, will not have to learn the hard way, the way that some of us had to learn it.

In conclusion, and I apologize for taking so much time, there are three things that must be done. First, if this man Kilbourn has made the statements attributable to him here with regard to Hamilton and the way he intends to take an inventory of every person in the plant, he should be removed. Otherwise he has scrapped our committee's work. Second, I think that someone who is fair and who has not got something like that on him should be appointed and that the steelworkers' last proposal should be used as a basis of negotiations for settlement. Their three proposals if accepted would settle the strike and the rest could be left to arbitration. But the important thing is to get the industry back into production as quickly as possible. Many of the committee's recommendations could be worked out later, but it is essential that the industry be got back into production as soon as possible. I think the Minister of Labour should give serious consideration to the recommendation of the union that industrial councils be set up to deal directly with management, employees and the government. They should replace the present war labour boards, which were set up as a war measure and were designed for a different period. They are not measuring up to the requirements of this period. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to that.

I wanted to place my opinions on the record. I respect the opinions of others who may have disagreed with me on clause 6; for I know that they all want to do the best they can for those affected. I hope that the interpretations as I understand them and as the Minister of Labour understands them and as the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply understands them will be written into legislation to be presented to the house for the guidance of union people and industrialists in this country.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the question that we were discussing before the house rose is one in which every hon. member is deeply interested, and I do not think it can be said that any one member is more concerned about it than another. It is a question that affects the whole economy of Canada, and certainly I believe that everyone else is just as anxious as I am to have the strike settled. As I was a member of the committee and also of the steering committee, I believe that the members of both sides, the main committee and the subcommittee as well, were sincere in the work they performed. It was a difficult task, and it was made difficult because of the fact that the strike was already in progress. It was made difficult too because of the limitations of the order of reference to the committee. I do not believe, and I am sure many other members of the committee feel as I do, that the order was wide enough to cover the field as efficiently and as thoroughly as it should have been. Moreover the time factor was an important part in our proceedings, because the house was due to close, or at least we hoped it would close, within a very short time, and we were compelled under the order of reference to report back to the house. That was an important factor in accounting for the short report which the committee made to the house.

Some people may think, looking over the committee's report, that there is not much substance in it. On the contrary I believe that if the recommendations are followed by the government a great deal of good can come from the report, and I wish to pay tribute to the members of the main committee and the steering committee—I was one of them—for their sincerity in desiring to bring the committee's deliberations to a satisfactory conclusion.

I have looked at the papers this morning and it seems to be the opinion of some at least that the members who speak from this party are not giving as thorough and complete consideration to the report as might be given, but rather that they are emphasizing their own theories to too great an extent. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that is not my point of view, nor do I think it is the point of view of any other member of this party.

In short, the situation is this. By following the practices that we have followed in the past, that policy which has been directed—I am not saying this is any offensive way—by both the old line parties has resulted in the condition in which we find ourselves in the matter of labour relations to-day. It is not a good picture, nor do I think it is a good attitude of mind for members to confine themselves to an outworn policy and to refuse to listen to some other theories which may, if put into practice, remove the difficulty or go a long way towards its removal.

Let me come now more closely to the topic under discussion. I wish to speak for a moment about what I consider to be labour's attitude towards the whole question, before I come more particularly to the report itself. I think it is fully recognized that history is once more repeating itself. Every time we have had a major war we have experienced a period of prosperity. We have only to go back to the last war to confirm this. After the last war we experienced such a period of prosperity, and and it was followed by a period of dire depression which we all remember. In this instance, during the war we had a great period of prosperity; in fact, our prosperity has been higher than it has been for a number of years, and we are following exactly the same road. I do not think anyone can blame labour for believing that since we are following exactly the same road as in the past, we shall arrive at exactly the same place. That, I believe, is the fear in the minds of most labouring people. They are fighting for economic security, fighting to avoid the depression which they see coming. One cannot blame them too severely, therefore, if they try by every means in their power to ward off the disaster which they believe to be imminent.

It was suggested in the evidence given before the committee by the unions that an income of $1,750 would not be too great to guarantee the working people of Canada a satisfactory standard of living. In my opinion that is a sound basis upon which to go, and we should so adjust our economy, taking that as the starting point, that everyone in Canada would be assured as far as possible a decent standard of living. When we consider that during the war years we increased our productive capacity to such a vast extent, it is conceivable that if we turned that vast productive machine into the production of consumer goods, the standard of living of everyone in Canada could be raised to that which is desired, and at least by that measure they should have in financial returns an income of $1,750.

It was pointed out on many occasions in the committee that the cost of living had not risen as greatly as had the increases in labour wages. I do not think that statement is correct. If I remember rightly, the cost of living index is now around 124·6. That may be so, but in my view it is not a true index of the cost of living; for it takes in very few specific items and does not cover the general increase in the cost of living to the ordinary man. For instance, clothing in itself, which is a material factor in the working man's income, has increased to about 126·1. Food, which is another major factor in the cost of living, has risen to around 130·2, if I remember rightly. When one considers that these two factors alone, food and clothing, constitute an expenditure of about fifty-one per cent of the working man's income, it must be admitted that the standard of living of the working man based on present income is rapidly going down. That is something about which we are all concerned, a question we are all anxious to settle. But we cannot settle that question if we allow prices to go up and working men's wages to stay where they are.

It has been said that labour is guided by communists. I hold no brief for the communist party, and no one can accuse this party of favouring communism. Certainly we do not do that. It would be an injustice to the labour movement to say that by and large it was being led by communist individuals. It is true that some branches of labour are being led by individuals who are communists. If I judge aright the opinion of the members of the committee, which is based on the evidence heard before the committee, they are of the same opinion as I am, that responsible labour leaders are just as much against the intrusion of communism within their ranks as we are. We must not brush aside too lightly the whole question of labour unrest in Canada by merely asserting that labour is being led by communists.

Let me refer for a moment to the committee itself. The committee was not set up until labour conditions in Canada were in a bad state; in fact labour relations had broken down completely. A controller had been put in charge, and his negotiations had failed. Then the strike was upon us. Shortly after that the committee was set up. It may be said that the committee did not have the responsibility of settling the steel strike, but it was my view, and I think it was the view of most members of the house, that the committee had two matters assigned to it in its order of reference. The first and foremost was to settle the steel dispute; the second was generally to investigate labour unrest in the country and to bring in recommendations which would make for a more stable economy. In the committee we went so far as to recommend that a negotiator be appointed to deal with the two parties, and that was done. It is true that he did not have a great deal of success, but I shall speak of that a little later.

I am of the opinion, as were other hon. members who have spoken, that one of the things which the committee did not have power to deal with—and they should have had that power—was the setting of a proper rate of wages which they thought might have been satisfactory to labour and industry. We did not have that power, and therefore we could not deal with it. It was not our responsibility. It still remains the responsibility of the government. Because we did not have that power, it was inopportune,—if I may so express it—for the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Gordon, to tell the committee that he thought an increase of ten cents was about as much as should be given. By doing so he put not only the committee but labour and management in a tremendously awkward position.

At this point I should like to refer to the relationship which we found to exist between the national war labour board, the regional boards and the wartime prices and trade board. In my opinion there is not a proper relationship between them. One acts almost independently of the other so far as their decisions are concerned. I know Mr. Gordon pointed out that there was consultation, but the evidence produced before the committee convinced every member, I believe, that there should be greater contact and greater liaison between the wartime prices and trade board and the labour board.

I wish to refer to the evidence which was given by Mr. Gordon. In the committee Mr. Gordon said that in his opinion the ten-cent limit was about as high as we could go without breaking the price ceiling. It was wrong at that time for the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board to give that opinion. I say it was wrong for this reason. In my opinion, and I think the evidence will bear me out, Mr. Gordon did not know whether or not ten cents was the limit, and certainly he did not know that in the $5 increase in prices given to the steel companies there was a ten-cent increase in wages. I refer to that not to be controversial but to put the record straight so that hon. members and the people at large will not get the idea that the committee held that view.

Speaking on this subject yesterday the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) said, as reported at page 5125 of Hansard:

> Another thing which I think must have impressed itself on the committee was the obstacles put in the path of any possible settlement of the steel strike.

In my view the greatest obstacle put in the way of Mr. L. W. Brockington bringing the steel strike to a successful conclusion was the statement made by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board that ten cents was about the limit. That statement was backed up most strongly by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), the Minister of Reconstruction and the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It absolutely tied the hands of the negotiating parties, and there was no possible chance of any satisfactory conclusion being arrived at other than what in effect it was government policy.

On page 5126 of Hansard the minister said:

> Therefore, in making an adjustment of steel prices they made an allowance for wage increases.

The minister and others having stated that ten cents was about the limit, that in itself would lead anyone to believe that ten cents was the amount which was considered by the committee to be the maximum. That is not true. Certainly I know members of the committee who differed widely from Mr. Gordon in that regard. Further on on the same page the Minister of Reconstruction had this to say:

> However, I think members of the committee came to the opinion that a wage increase of ten cents was about all the increase in steel prices permitted. Was that a reasonable increase?

And then further on the following appears:

> Therefore, management, in presenting its claim to the wartime prices and trade board and the wartime prices and trade board in assessing that claim, could reasonably forecast an increase of ten cents an hour for labour in basic steel.

I say that is the wrong impression to give, because in my view at least as one member of the committee the wartime prices and trade board did not consider that a fair increase when the offer was first made. The minister went on to say:

> Under pressure Mr. Gordon admitted that ten cents an hour was about the figure that the wartime prices and trade board had in mind.

I say that is not according to the facts. We should put the record straight in one instance. I do not wish to tire the house at this late hour by reading long extracts from the evidence. But this is an important matter. Had it been cleared up in the first place I do not think the strike would ever have taken place. Let me read from the evidence exactly what Mr. Gordon had to say in regard to the increase in wages which was supposed to have been allowed in the $5 increase in the price of steel. There is no mistaking this evidence; Mr. Gordon was most clear and explicit. I asked him a question, and I am going to read that question together with the answer so that the committee may be in a position to judge whether or not the statement by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is in accordance with the evidence. At page 329 of the proceedings of that committee I asked:

The point I wanted to make is this, Mr. Gordon, that you were in a better position to decide whether or not this company could make a ten cent offer. The company was in a more favourable position than you were to know they could make the ten cent offer, and what was the position of the union in demanding the increase. Now, it was quite evident——that there was a certain amount in that $5 which had been allocated for wages.

Notice this.

The answer Mr. Gordon gave was this:

No, not necessarily; that is the point I have been labouring to put forward. That was dependent entirely on the decision of the management of the steel company as to what profit level they were willing to operate on; and they could quite easily and quite reasonably have taken the attitude that they could not afford to pay anything for wages because they were not earning a profit amount anywhere near the amount which they ought to be earning by pre-war standards in relation to the volume of production that they are now undertaking. I have already told you that the steel company had reached a production of two and a half times their pre-war volume.

A little further down, in explaining the same question, Mr. Gordon went on to say that if the company had taken the view they could not give anything—

That would have been a reasonable argument. But if they had taken that stand I do not think they could have paid anything.

Then to make doubly sure, at that point the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) interjected:

—you allowed yourself to be in a position where there might have been nothing, and you say it is reasonable for them to take that position.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks of the minister are not in accordance with the evidence given by Mr. Gordon.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. MITCHELL: What minister are you referring to?

Mr. JOHNSTON: The Minister of Reconstruction.

Mr. MITCHELL: For once I am out of it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes. If the wartime prices and trade board had done as I believe they should; if they had thoroughly investigated the financial position of the company before making any suggestion of an increase in the price of steel; if they had waited until they knew exactly what increases were to be made in wages, they would have avoided a great deal of difficulty. But the wartime prices and trade board never knew for sure whether there was anything at all, whether there was one cent or whether there was twenty-five cents for wages in the $5 rise in steel. Had the wartime prices and trade board been in a position to say to the unions, "We are allowing a $5 increase, in which there is a ten cent increase in wages," and had this offer of the ten cent wage increase been made at the time the $5 increase in price was permitted, I believe our difficulties would have been avoided. But there was absolutely no relation between the price increases granted the steel company and the wages offered the steel workers. In my view there should be a more definite and thorough investigation into that problem, and certainly into the relationship between the wartime prices and trade board and the national war labour board.

In my opinion the wartime prices and trade board started from the wrong point in this matter. When they made the offer of $5 they were developing their negotiations with Stelco, which is financially better off than any of the other companies. It seems to me they should have begun their negotiations with the company in the poorest financial position, to ascertain whether or not they needed an increase in price and what increase would be required in order to give the workers in that plant a decent standard of living. I believe they would have saved themselves a great deal of difficulty if they had begun in that way.

If I might refer back to the quotation I read from the evidence of Mr. Gordon, that was given when Mr. Gordon was before the committee in person. Later he submitted a statement which was merely placed on the record, from which I should like to read one or two lines in order to show a contradiction in his statements. At page 4 of the statement which was placed on record he said:

As I said before, that was a departure from our usual practice. In considering every other application for a price increase, we have not taken into account the possibility of future wage increases. This steel case was an exception and the decision was made, as I have stated in previous evidence, in the expectation that settlement of the price application would enable pending wage negotiations to be completed quickly. Furthermore, it certainly increased labour's chances of getting a reasonable and prompt increase in wages.

I say that is in absolute contradiction with the evidence he gave in person. Further down this statement says:

We authorized this increase in good faith and for good reasons and in the belief that an increase in wage rates was a certainty.

I am quite sure that if this question had been properly dealt with in the beginning of negotiations, a great many of our difficulties never would have arisen. Then when the committee in its wisdom—properly or otherwise—decided to appoint Mr. L. W. Brockington as negotiator between the companies and the union, a motion was made that the committee rise while those negotiations were taking place. That motion was supported by two or three or four of us on the committee, but was not carried. I thought it a shame that the committee should continue to take evidence during the very time the negotiating parties were endeavouring to reach a settlement. Our stand was vindicated later. The Minister of Labour, the Minister of Reconstruction and the Acting Minister of Finance gave it as their view, in public statements, that a ten cent increase was about as much as the ceiling would stand.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that. What I said was this, and I want to repeat it; that I felt even that increase would find its way into the price structure. That was the import of what I said. You are not going to get me in the position—not yet, while I can stand on my feet—of admitting that any increase, whether it be to the farmers or to anybody else, does not find its way into the price structure. A child understands that.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Well, the minister is getting unduly riled, because I never even suggested that; I never attempted to put the minister in any compromising position.

Mr. MacINNIS: He did that himself.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Yes, he did it himself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say to the hon. member for Vancouver East, "No prompting".

Mr. JOHNSTON: This is the point I am trying to bring out, that when the committee appointed Mr. Brockington to negotiate, the government, in effect—and the minister may take exception to this—stated government policy when it agreed with Mr. Gordon that ten cents was about the highest that the price structure would stand. I am trying to put it fairly so that the minister will not take objection to it. And that is the very thing that tied the hands of Mr. Brockington. He went into those negotiations bound by a ten-cent ceiling. The result was that when Mr. Brockington brought in his report it was evident throughout that he made a stand at ten cents. Of course the members of the union would not accept that, because they had already made public statements that they would not accept anything less than fifteen cents. The companies on the other hand had said they would not accept anything higher than ten cents. That was bound to destroy the negotiations between the company and the unions under Mr. Brockington's leadership. That procedure, which was directed by the committee itself, was doomed to failure before it ever got a chance.

Now, regardless of the fact that some may say the union is all to blame in this, I do not think that the union is all to blame. They did things which I think most hon. members think would have been better left undone. They have broken the law, as has been pointed out by other hon. members—and I am not going to repeat it. But so has the company broken the law. That will not settle our difficulties. The way to settle them is to get the two together and have a settlement made so that production will again begin to roll off the lines.

It was pointed out in committee that the companies themselves have gone into a production sit-down strike. That is something I think should be looked into, because the unions are not the only ones who are holding up production. I believe that from the point of view of inflation there is a greater danger right now of inflation coming about because of no production than there would have been if we had given the fifteen cents asked by labour. I repeat that there is a greater danger of inflation by no production than there would have been if we had granted the fifteen cents, and set up some other means of meeting the cost.

Of course some hon. members have strong objections to the government paying subsidies. I wish to point out that even in the United States the government saw fit—probably it was compelled to do so—to withdraw some of its subsidies and to withdraw price controls. But in its wisdom it has reverted to its first process. And it might be well for us in this country to revert to the giving of subsidies, now cancelled, in order to keep the wheels of production going. It has been drawn to my attention, too, that tariffs are one of the greatest sources of subsidies enjoyed by industry. We allow them to be paid.

Only this afternoon I saw in to-day's issue of the Ottawa Citizen of August 21 a dispatch from Washington, dated August 20, stating:

> The United States price decontrol board to-night ordered ceilings restored on all meat, and Paul Porter, head of the office of price administration, said they will be "at or close to June 30 levels."
> The board ruled that dairy products and nearly all grains should remain free of ceilings but it restored price controls on soy beans and cottonseed products.
> O.P.A. and the agriculture department will determine the ceilings on the recontrolled items and put them into effect Friday.
> The board also authorized revival of June 29 subsidy payments on meats and live stock.

But when we suggest it might be better for the government to restore some of the subsidies in order to make it possible to meet the wage demands that labour is asking, some hon. members say, "Oh, you are crazy." But is it more dangerous to allow industry to cease producing than it would be for us to spend a few million dollars in subsidies to make up this deficiency, if the companies cannot do it? And, mind you. I do not agree that they all cannot do it, by any manner of means. I think it would be good business for the government and the country at least to study the possibility of giving subsidies in cases where they are needed. I am not going to discuss where the government will get the money to pay subsidies. It will be said that it will be raised by taxation and that it will increase the cost of living for everybody. That may be true, but at least it will be spreading it over the whole of Canada. I should like an answer to that.

I am not going to deal with the report at length, but I would refer to one other recommendation which has been mentioned in this debate, namely section 6. I am not speaking as an experienced union man, because I am not a union man, and I want that clearly understood. But we had men on the committe who were union men. We listened most carefully to union pleas in this connection, and we also listened to the side of industry too. Those of us who were impartial could at least form some logical conclusions respecting this section. So that there may be no misunderstanding for anyone who reads Hansard, I shall put the section on record. It states:

> 6. Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

I was one who supported that; there were others who did not. Some say that you can interpret it in one way, others that you can interpret it in another. I shall tell the house how I interpret it, and I believe if the government follows the recommendation as it is worded there will be no danger in it; in fact I believe it will be beneficial both to labour and to industry. My view is that in respect of what are generally called wild-cat strikes, where there has been no proper strike vote taken, even though a strike may be in progress—and that is where the words "before or after" come in—some authority may come in and take a vote to establish whether or not the negotiating party has the right to call a strike. That is my view of it. I do not think the wording of the recommendation would permit the Minister of Labour or anybody else to go in after an official strike vote has been taken, and then put on a series of votes to see whether or not the men should go back to work, when a company might desire to increase the wages by one cent or two cents or three cents or whatever they might think they could get across. That is not my view.

I am firmly of the opinion that in this instance the Minister of Labour will accept the recommendation as it is worded, and that he will go into a plant where he is satisfied a proper vote has not been taken by those affected. He will take that vote, in the manner in which any other democratic election is carried on—by secret ballot. In this way he will determine whether or not there should be a strike. Once that strike vote has been taken, that is the end of it. The strike is in progress or it is not in progress, as the case may be. I certainly would not agree with the view that the government should go in and interfere with the union once a strike has been properly called, and I do not believe the Minister of Labour would take that view. Certainly it would not be my view. But I do believe if the government sees fit to put the recommendations made into effect—and there are seven of them—they will be of considerable assistance in the state of industrial unrest which prevails in Canada.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up more than a few minutes of the time of the house. There is one and only one section of the work of the committee with which I should like to deal.

Before proceeding to do that, however, may I say that a few weeks ago, speaking on the budget debate, I took the liberty of recommending to the government that Mr. Donald Gordon, the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, should be invited into the federal cabinet. I would again suggest that, because, as we saw in committee, it was the action of the wartime prices and trade board in setting the price on steel and the increment in wages that was at the root of the strike. We also heard yesterday the able hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who showed the lack of liaison between the wartime prices and trade board and the Department of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: The war labour board; it is not the Department of Labour.

Mr. SKEY: The war labour board; I am sorry.

When we were in committee, with a number of others I took the view that the government should make a public declaration of its wage policy. I am still of that opinion. I think that the absence of it is at the root of this strike. Union members lack any knowledge of how far the government will permit increases in wages to go.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend, when he speaks of "wage policy", mean that we should set a sum?

Mr. SKEY: Well, the government has said that there must be a measure of wage stabilization. I think it is only fair that if wages are to be stabilized to a certain degree, the government should tell the people of Canada to what level wages can be permitted to rise in this country. It does not mean necessarily that every plant in Canada will pay 15½ cents per hour more to its workers. The unions know that some plants cannot afford to pay that much. But I think you have to set a ceiling.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows that the ceiling is always the floor.

Mr. SKEY: Yes; well, it is not the minimum wage we are talking about now. We are in favour of a minimum wage as well.

The wartime prices and trade board have placed a ceiling on consumer goods in this country, and every housewife and every citizen knows what that ceiling is. How the government say that we require a measure of wage stabilization in Canada, and they have to put a ceiling on that wage stabilization if they want to get some stability into the situation.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said that he feels that the basic issues are unchanged. His remark when we came out of the committee was that the basic issues were unchanged and the thing was just where it was when we went into it. I agree with him in that. I do not think that a thing has been changed; I think it has been aggravated to a certain extent. But that was not the committee's fault. I believe he will agree with me that we tried in every way we knew how to get the facts and to have the government make a statement on this subject, but every time we were stopped. We were stopped by Mr. Gordon's "ten cent" speech; we were stopped by a statement from the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), we were stopped by a statement from Mr. Murchison, of the Department of Labour, when he brought in a document purporting to prove that a ten cent rise in wages in Canada is equal to a 18½ cent rise of wages in the United States. So in the end we all became, I think, a little bit discouraged.

What is the basic issue at the present time? Isn't it that? These men in Hamilton struck against their company for an increase in wages—something which organized labour all over the world can do if they so wish. They struck against their plant, whether rightly or wrongly I would not wish to argue now. But what did the government do? The government so manoeuvred the situation as to place themselves in the position of the company, so that the men are almost literally striking against the government when they meant to strike against their employers. The government is behind all these negotiations; the government has said that a measure of wage stabilization is necessary; and I have risen this afternoon only to say that it is my firm view that the government must make known the ceiling on wages.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I was appointed to this committee, but I could not attend the sittings very regularly, for obvious reasons. I wish to congratulate the chairman for the able manner in which he presided over the proceedings of the committee. He has done exceptionally well. His task was difficult, because the committee was very large and the matters with which it dealt were most contentious; no one could have done better than he did. My praise goes also to my fellow members of the committee, all of whom were men of good will, who showed that they considered the situation a very serious one, and each of whom, in his own way, did his best to come to some agreement and offer worthwhile proposals to settle our difficulties.

This is the time—at the end of the session—to discuss the reports of all committees, but I regret very much that the estimates have not yet been passed, because there are many things which I would have said on the estimates but which I shall have to say to-day. I have noticed that at the beginning of the session, when members are about to talk on a certain departmental matter they are often told they should wait until the estimates come and then they will be given a full opportunity to discuss the matter in which they are interested. But we have to wait until the end of the session; this is the 21st day of August and the session started in March, yet the estimates of the Department of Labour have not yet been before us.

I do not wish to praise only the work which has been done in the committee. I must eulogize hon. members who have already spoken for the tone of their speeches. Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and some others, and to-day I have listened to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and my two hon. friends who have just spoken. I congratulate them very heartily. It is impossible for all of us to have the same views about everything, and it is from discussion that we get light. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should take advantage of all the suggestions which have been offered to him to try to improve conditions of labour in this country.

In labour matters there are three parties; there is the employer, the employee, and the consumer; and, as a sagacious economist has just pointed out to me, until now the consumer has been quite a forgotten man. But I have been taught from my youth that one must respect the workers, and that they are entitled to all the comforts of life. Therefore since I have been elected a member of parliament I have done my best to try to improve the conditions of labour in this country. My first step in that regard dates back to the sessions of 1928, 1929 and 1930, when I pointed out to the House of Commons and to the government that salaries and wages in the province of Quebec were much lower than in the other provinces. During that period I never ceased to advocate fair wages and make representations to that effect to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the then minister of labour, who was Mr. Peter Heenan. I prepared tabulations showing that wages were lower in the province of Quebec than in any other province; and finally, with the support of the Prime Minister, the minister of labour sponsored a bill which is now chapter 20 of the statutes of 1930, an act respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works. Parliament did not exceed its jurisdiction, as determined by a judgment of the supreme court which was given a short time before. At that time parliament believed in civil rights. Last year I made the suggestion during the Windsor strike that representatives of the union should be invited to attend the committee on industrial relations, and I spoke to deaf ears. The government did not pay any attention to my suggestion; and it was only when a Conservative member repeated the same suggestion a year later, in connection with another strike, that the government jumped at it and at once accepted it. When it is offered by a Liberal it is no good; when it is offered by Conservatives it is good. I do not complain of that, because I offer my suggestions with a big heart. When they are accepted I am delighted. But what surprises me is that what comes from the party opposite is considered better than what comes from within.

In the second place I attended a sitting of the committee, and I had a chair not far from the witnesses. But then I was asked by one of the learned counsel to give him my chair. This is the first time that a member of parliament has had to give his chair up to a learned committee counsel. I am told that he was more important because his salary exceeded that paid to the counsel for the Rowell-Sirois commission by $50 a day. Therefore he was more important than a member of parliament and I had to make way for him. But I did not begrudge that. I had some business to attend to in the house. Not having the gift of ubiquity, the only thing I could do was to glance over the reports of the committee at night, and this I did not fail to do to keep myself informed of what was going on.

I want to put on record what has been done for labour by a member of parliament, and it was not done as a mission because no one had asked for it. It was a self-imposed task, undertaken to improve the conditions of labour in this country. In the first place there was the act referred to, and in the second place there was a report on unemployment. For many years I tried to bring order in the Department of Labour. During the Bennett regime the minister of labour was a big giant, and when I suggested that classifications should be made of the unemployed he referred me to the bureau of statistics. The unemployment was prevalent in 1935, and I was referred back to statistics of the census of 1931, four years before, which was an absurdity. The Department of Labour at that time had no definite information at all about unemployment; all the information they got was scanty. I was told by the government of the day to go to the bureau of statistics to get the information that was not up to date but related to conditions of four years before.

But in spite of everybody and everything I decided to get the information I was seeking. I attended a meeting of the mayors in the Chateau Laurier and asked if the municipalities had that information. I was told by the mayor of one of the cities in western Ontario that they had, which in most cases was not true. The mayor who told me that was all wrong; it was not true. But a census of unemployment had been made by the province of Ontario at the instigation of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), who was the minister of labour and welfare in Ontario. The data I got at that time from the province of Ontario were very useful to me in the preparation of my report. What was considered an impossible thing to do by the Department of Labour at Ottawa and by the government of that day was done by the member for Temiscouata, with the aid of his secretary, in about a month and a half. It took me three weeks to collect the data from the municipalities, and another three weeks to compile it. I have the report here. When I presented it to the house I was turned down by Mr. Speaker, who said that under the rules of procedure of parliament he could not accept the report. The report had been prepared and drafted giving information as to the number of unemployed and their different trades or professions so that order might be reestablished in society and an opportunity given to the government and to municipalities and employers to put to work men who had special training or special experience. That work was done, as I said, by the member for Temiscouata, in a month and a half. It was done before the election of 1935, and I sent a copy of the report to every member of parliament, including the members supporting the government. I received a very fine letter from a Liberal candidate in northern Ontario who is now the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). His letter is dated June 19, 1935, and reads:

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

Please accept my best thanks for copy of your memorandum dated June 8, 1935, on unemployment. I have read this with a great deal of interest, and am going through it again to make notes for use in my election campaign. It is the most complete analysis of the situation that I have seen and will be exceedingly useful to me.

Yours sincerely,

C. D. Howe.

My report was not made for political purposes. That was a secondary consideration. My main purpose was to bring order out of the chaotic conditions of labour in this country at that time. And I had my reward. Very seldom do I have praise in the house except from my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and my hon. friend the member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who are too generous to me.

Mr. MacNICOL: You deserve much more praise than you get.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir. On March 9, 1936, the Hon. Norman McL. Rogers, then minister of labour, an hon. gentleman who was so kind to me, said this, at page 994 of Hansard:

May I say this, too: the hon. member for Temiscouata, by his industry and persistence a year ago, laid the foundation for the work we are seeking to carry on now in that direction.

He was speaking of collecting information on unemployment, and went on:

No one can question the desirability of securing this information at as early a date as possible; certainly no one who has any acquaintance with the problems confronting social service agencies in Canada can doubt the wisdom of obtaining and analysing this data. Already some of the returns have come in from the provinces. As soon as it is possible to summarize that information I propose to lay it before this house.

The Department of Labour had my report mimeographed so that it was available to all members of the house, to whom it was sent so that they would be familiar with that angle of the labour situation. That report was prepared by the member for Temiscouata with the aid of a stenographer, work which it was said it was impossible for the Department of Labour to do. There must have been something wrong with the department. But afterwards an unemployment commission was appointed, of which Mr. A. B. Purvis was chairman. He was a great friend of Mr. Dunning. The commission studied unemployment conditions in this country, but the only man who gained anything from all the work of that commission, which cost half a million dollars, was precisely Mr. Purvis himself. It served no other purpose. When the report was tabled I threw it on the floor to indicate that it was absolutely useless. It was a gesture of indignation at incompetency. Then I wrote a letter to the Minister of Labour. I had been working very hard to improve the conditions of labour and had done a work which had been praised, rightly or wrongly, by the minister of labour of that day. He told me that my work was the cornerstone of the unemployment policy of the government. Then everything was sabotaged by that commission. My letter was as follows:

Rivière du Loup, Que.,
August 13, 1939.

The Honourable Norman McL. Rogers, Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Rogers,—

Because the figures prepared by the Purvis commission both on employment and unemployment were wholly unsatisfactory and useless, I offered you, two months before the prorogation of last session, to make within a month a classification of the unemployed according to their previous occupation.

You answered me that a new classification could be made by your departmental staff from the figures gathered by the Purvis commission and that it could be completed up to date by recent information supplementing that received by the Purvis commission.

On July 22 your private secretary forwarded me two shapeless compilations referring only to part of those who were unemployed eleven months before, in September 1937.

My first objection is that, in spite of what you told me, that compilation is out of date and therefore useless.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would be obliged to the hon. member if he would be kind enough to address himself to the Chair. It is impossible for me to follow him.

Mr. POULIOT: Very well, sir; but my speech is perfectly in line with others made with reference to the report of the committee. It is our wish to improve the conditions of labour, and my contention is that the work of the committee will be useless unless there is a check on the professional ability of all workers and tradesmen. Moreover, what I am coming at is that it was a wrong policy to abolish the registration cards. I would remind you, however, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), when he announced that we would discuss the report of the committee and the labour estimates, stated that all the estimates of labour could be discussed at the same time as the report, and he made that statement in broad terms. If I cannot say now what I have to say about this matter I shall have to say it later, but it would take much less time if I could conclude now the remarks I wish to make.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not suggest that the hon. member should not continue to read the letter which he has been quoting. I merely asked him if he would be kind enough to address himself to the Chair, because, if he did so, it would be easier for the Speaker to follow him.

Mr. POULIOT: I beg Your Honour's pardon. I did not understand what Your Honour was saying, and I regret very much the remarks I have just made. I shall be pleased to face the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to my hon. and good friend that, if he will stay with it, this is the last speech on labour, and when my estimates come up, if he will give me a clear field, I will give three cheers for the red, white and blue.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder if it is the new flag we are to have. If I may go on now with the letter, I shall not have much to say about labour afterwards, because like everyone else I am very anxious to go home. To continue:

Even if those figures were up to date and referring to a month or two previous to the date of the issuance of the classification, they are equally useless for many reasons:

1. Their disposition is absurd;
2. There is no index with indication of pages;
3. The occupations are too much detailed;
4. The positions of similar trades are not put together;
5. They are not summarized in general trades (a) by provinces and (b) by cities of the same province;
6. There is no comparison between the total population and the total number of unemployed in provinces and cities;
7. It is incomplete because it refers only to unemployed on relief in cities of over ten thousand population; etc., etc.

As the work done by your departmental staff is shapeless and useless, there is no room for it in my office and I return it to you by the same mail.

Let me add that it is a matter of regret that very few of your departmental staff know how to work intelligently. I have understood at first that it was your intention to have that work(?) prepared by your departmental staff because they did not like someone outside your department to do that work properly or at least sensibly, in order that any one could understand something in the unemployment problem of to-day in this country.

With half a dozen worthy exceptions which I could name to you, the whole staff of your department, from your deputy minister down, should be fired at once for the public good. It would be the first step for the relief of unemployment in Canada, and it should be so.

I have told you personally what I think of them and it is the truth. So long as you keep them in office instead of getting rid of them, there shall be no improvement in the unemployment relief policy.

I regret also not to have listened to my first thought and not to have done the work this year in spite of you as I did it successfully, some years ago, in spite of your predecessor in office, the Honourable Wesley Gordon.

Sincerely yours,

Jean-François Pouliot.

May I now read the answer I received, and I may say that Mr. Rogers was a most tolerant man. He did not object to that criticism because he understood that it was offered in good will with a view to improving the conditions, which were very bad. I quote:

Ottawa, August 17, 1938.

Dear Mr. Pouliot:

I have received your letter of August 13, 1938, in which you refer particularly to the classification of the unemployed by the Registration Branch of the Department of Labour. Your objections to the present method of classification will be brought to the attention of those charged with the work of registration.

From such information as I have before me, I cannot agree that your criticism is well founded. This however, is a matter of opinion.

I appreciated that at the time, and told him so.

I have never objected to criticism from any source whatever and have always welcomed any suggestions which might improve the efficiency of the Department of Labour. I doubt, however, if any useful purpose is served by the general condemnation of officers of the department. It is your privilege to make this criticism and it is mine to disagree with it when it assumes the form of a general indictment. Nevertheless, I am ready at all times to discuss these matters with you as we have done in the past.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) Norman McL. Rogers.

This letter is to the honour of the late minister, and I have read it because I do not want to be interfered with in what I have to say regarding the Department of Labour. I will tell the minister—and hon. members know my views in this regard—that it is most unfortunate that the Department of Labour is controlled by the intelligentsia we have in the east block. The minister may deny that if he wishes, but the departments at the present time are not all under the supervision of the Prime Minister. They are under the supervision of the intellectuals of the east block, men from Oxford, Cambridge, Harvard and other places. They are intellectuals who are never in contact with the people, who have never been in contact with labour men, and it is they who make and dictate the policy of the Department of Labour and of other departments. These men, a partial list of whose names I had on December 10 last, are a curse to the country, and it is time to dispense with that intelligentsia, the same kind of intelligentsia that has caused the downfall of Russia.

An hon. MEMBER: You need a broom.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, a good strong broom. And now, sir to show you the stupidity of some people, just at the beginning of the war, before the minister got in, an investigation was made by the departments of Agriculture, Fisheries, Mines, Transport and by the timber controller, MacMillan of British Columbia, and they decided what was the period of peak employment. I quote this, sir, to show the stupidity of these so-called experts. I cannot give it for all the provinces because I have not the time. I will give it for Ontario. It is divided into three heads—primary industry, secondary industry, period of peak employment, for Ontario alone, as I say. I have the other provinces, but time will not permit me to read them. Logging, December to March. That is false, because in the summer time pulpwood is cut and the bark is taken from it, but logging is done the year round. Sawmills May to September. That is untrue. Boatbuilding, from May to July. That is untrue. Refrigerators, April to June; mining, nonmetallic, July to November; transportation, shipping, May to November. Saw mills, boatbuilding and refrigerators are classed as secondary industries. Let us look at the secondary industries: building construction from June to November; that is untrue. Shipbuilding and repairs from May to June only; service, hotels and restaurants, July to September—no one eats in a hotel from September to July, apparently. Ice manufacturing, from June to September. Toys, September and October; toys are put in the same class as building construction and classified as a secondary industry. It is typical of the stupidity of these fellows. I shall not read all the material that I have at hand but would the house have any objection to my putting on Hansard an article entitled "Elliott Little was Right" which was written by myself and published in Le Saint Laurent on February 4, 1943?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

The article follows:

On Selective Service

Elliott Little was Right

By Jean-François Pouliot

("Le Saint-Laurent," February 4, 1943)

"In or out of parliament, darkness, neglect, hallucination must contrive to cease in regard to it; true insight into it must be had."—Thomas Carlyle.

Laws reflect people. I realized this fact, finding in history the clearest and most faithful exemplification of law. The contrary is also true, because in order to have a just notion of present-day politics, one must stop to consider the deeds of legislators rather than their speeches, the arid phraseology of orders in council rather than the ambiguous sentences and the bombastic periods of parliamentary debates.

It is enough to glance over the statutes of war sessions to realize that parliament is called above all for the purpose of levying taxes destined to cover huge expenditures over which it has no longer any control. The pretext of war gave the government an opportunity to substitute itself for parliament in settling any question through orders in council passed by virtue of the War Measures Act and by stretching to a great extent the scope of this act. Therefore, it is not so much in parliamentary legislation as in orders in council that we can see the rolling and pitching of the federal ship in the storm through which we are struggling. According to the British parliamentary tradition which is still followed at Westminster, the government is a committee of the House of Commons. Here, the situation is reversed. It seems that parliament, which is called only as a matter of form, is now merely, for the government a cumbersome constitutional institution.

Of the thirty thousand orders in council passed since the outset of the war, published in the Canada Gazette and piling up over six feet high—the height of a tall man—we will mention only a few, just enough to throw light on the capital and so much discussed issue of national selective service, in other words, of the conscription of labour.

When selective service, created by order in council in March, 1942, was announced in parliament, it had already taken effect three days before. Its purpose was to compel each person to contribute to the utmost to the war effort and, with this end in view, to maintain the balance required between the army on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the war industries as well as those which are essential for the upkeep of the army and the civilian population.

After the Mobilization Act of 1940 took effect, the conscripts were called to their military training by the registrar of the National War Service Commission, established under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National War Services, the first incumbent being, to our great surprise, the Minister of Agriculture. One can enlist only as a volunteer in the navy and the air force. That commission, which acted as a manning pool for the militia, was sending most of the conscripts to training camps. This was done with so little discrimination in Quebec that the members of the commission were successively replaced. They are responsible in a great measure for the shortage in man power which our region is now suffering in agriculture and forestry. Even before the adoption of selective service, we had to fight many battles for the recognition of its principle, and also to have agriculture, forestry and railroad industries considered as essential to the war effort.

It was under such circumstances that the Minister of Labour started with the adoption of order No. 5038, in June, 1942, enacting that it was essential to prescribe a greater use, by employers and employees, of public employment offices with a view to using our manpower most efficaciously in the war effort and reducing excessive shifting from one place to another.

Was the government feeling the ground? After a six-week test period, the conclusion was reached that a drastic change was necessary in the method of calling conscripts. It was then decided to withdraw this task from the Department of National War Services and to transfer it to selective service under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. After providing for the establishment of secret priorities and for the stabilization of employment in the agricultural field, order No. 7595, dated August 28, 1942, prescribed a very simple procedure. In the case of employment in other fields, it was necessary to obtain permission from the selective service representative, with right of appeal, to the National War Service Commission. In other words, that commission was being turned into an appeal court, not against its own decisions, as was and still is the case, but against decisions rendered on first hearing by the local representative of selective service, in cases where the latter would have illegally refused, or unjustly revoked, an employment permit. The local representative of selective service would have been kept constantly posted as to requisitions coming, not only from militia headquarters, but also from the essential industries, and he would have been in a position to assign conscripts judiciously to the militia or industry, according to their aptitudes and experience, and taking into account requests on hand deemed reasonable, in order to maintain the necessary balance between militia and industry and preventing any shortage of essential manpower. That order in council, which was so sensible, was to take effect on September 1. It remained a dead letter, for the sole reason—or a sentimental order—that personnels of registrars' offices should not be reduced. This unbelievable explanation was publicly given in Quebec by an authorized person. Newspapers attest it.

So it was only to maintain, in spite of everything, some 300 employees, most of them useless—especially unmarried people without any military record and some very young girls—in the registrars' offices of Quebec and Montreal that the government did not dare apply the very principle of selective service, which is of urgent necessity, and that the calling of conscripts was not decentralized by being entrusted, as it should have been, to the numerous selective service offices. This is even less understandable as we hear nothing else but complaints about shortage of manpower in the large war industries of Quebec and Montreal.

We do not know what happened behind the scenes, but by order in council No. 8343, dated September, 1942—748 others had been adopted in such a short interval—the regulations of 1940 applying to national war services were revised for the third time. Those who are mobilized and who do not answer their call may now be taken by force to camp instead of to prison—not to an essential industry—by order of a magistrate or of a justice of the peace. The National War Service Commission kept its initial functions and its first designation and remained for ten days only under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National War Services.

On September 26, 1942, the administration of regulations covering national war services was transferred by order in council No. 8800 to the Minister of Labour. The Department of National War Services had, therefore, lost all reasons for its existence; it had been laid bare and vacated just a few days before the appointment of a new minister.

The fair distribution of our human capital between the militia and industry can be obtained only through a central organization having perfect freedom of action. Up to then, the national war service commissions had served only to fill the ranks of the militia. According to the provisions of the orders in council creating it, selective service was to insure not only the normal functioning, but also the gradual increase of industrial production. Mr. Little, its director, knew that very well. He keenly wanted the organization of which he was the head to serve industry as well as the militia. Hence the indignation of jingoes and the campaign of the press accusing him of posing as a dictator and of trying to encroach upon the authority of his minister. There is an explanation for everything.

About that time, I heard out of sheer coincidence of the arrival incognito in Canada of a so-called expert, one Alexander Gunn, an official of the British government, whose services were supposedly to have been requested by the Canadian government to carry out the transfer of what he, Gunn, believed to be non-essential industries, to what he, Gunn, believed to be essential industries. No newspaper had mentioned the comings and goings—over the whole country—of this newcomer. I gave the scoop of this news to the Ottawa Journal.

Here is a résumé of this interview: "In Canada, as far as the government is concerned, the first qualification of an expert is not to be a Canadian. It is unbelievable that an outsider who does not know anything about Canada, about Canadians nor about their affairs, should be called to decide who, among our business men, will survive the storm. Is it impossible to find in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, to mention only our greatest centres, Canadians who are, not only as qualified but much more so, to initiate and carry out to a successful completion such a difficult and delicate task? Why such obstination in shrouding in silence his doings and even his name?" Seeing the intention to sabotage his work, Little, the Canadian, left. Gunn, the non-Canadian, remained.

By order No. 10,924, dated December 1, 1942, the regulations of national war services were revised for the fourth time under the designation of "regulations governing mobilization of national selective service." The old national war service commission survived all those amendments. Its duties are exactly the same to-day, with the same personnel intact, but under another minister. It is called now "The commission of mobilization." In order to give a just idea of the part it plays at present, we have learned from the best source that "selectitve service conforms to requests made by the Department of National Defence and that the registrars act accordingly." What is the result of so much zeal?

The newspapers reported, on January 27 last, that at the end of December, 1942, Canada counted 732,000 men under arms, that is, 33 per cent of the male population of Canada between 19 and 45 years old. It was said that 150,000 men would have been needed between March 20, 1941, and December 26, 1942, but that conscription brought up only 107,677. In a period of 21 months, conscription was responsible for only 1/7 of the men under arms. After such a poor result, why let the jingoes and junkers make so much noise with impunity and disorganize our industrial life?

We clearly demonstrated that the task of selective service should not be restricted to satisfying the demands of militia headquarters. We have the soldiers. They must be well armed, well equipped, well clothed, well fed and well cared for. The subsistence of our civilian population must be also assured. Besides, we imposed upon ourselves the obligation to provide our allies with arms, munitions and food supplies. If we want to keep up our speed, it is elementary and essential that our manpower be well distributed.

It is high time for action. All the provincial ministers of agriculture view the future with alarm. Did not the minister for Ontario declare in London, on January 13, that we are not far from food shortage, and did not the minister for British Columbia, on the same day, go as far as proposing to the Minister of Labour, at Victoria, to organize, for the defence of our territory, an army composed of women, in order to leave farmers and their sons on their farms where they accomplish essential work for our war effort?

Since the situation is so serious, we persist in maintaining that the policy set forth by the government in order No. 7595, dated August 28, 1942, was imposed by the needs of the moment, that no reason whatever existed not to apply it, and that this policy is the only rational means to offset the shortage of manpower.

That is why we beg the government to abolish immediately all the commissions called "mobilization commissions" and to assign the calling and distribution of conscripts to selective service offices, not only in Quebec and Montreal, but in all regional centres of the country.

Now that the government has deemed it opportune to publish the total set for, and reached by military conscription, have we not the right to ask for the same information in respect to manpower needed by and available for war industries and other industries essential to the war effort, for example, in the agriculture, forestry and railroad industries, to name only three of that category? We shall see, then whether Mr. Little was right in asking that the calling of conscripts be decentralized and that the care and responsibility of directing them to the kind of activities in which they can be most useful to the country, be left to local representatives of selective service.

Then I received a tip that a man by the name of Gunn had been lent by the British government to come here as an expert to organize the classifications of labour. I gave that tip to the Ottawa Journal. It was a scoop, and I expected other newspapers to publish it. I did not care to have my name attached to the news, but I wanted it spread from ocean to ocean to show the kind of secret work which was being done to sabotage labour. This expert by the name of Gunn came from London. He was the son of a—

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to what my hon. friend says about Mr. Gunn, but I just wish to say that he is not here. Mr. Gunn was an expert on unemployment insurance and selective service in the labour ministry of Great Britain. I asked Mr. Bevin if he would lend the services of Mr. Gunn. I wish to say that in that difficult period Mr. Gunn rendered magnificent service to this government and in my judgment to the people of Canada. I wish to say that before this discussion goes too far.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, but his coming was kept secret. The only papers which mentioned it were the Ottawa Journal and the Globe and Mail. The Globe and Mail said: "Pouliot off on wrong foot in criticism of Gunn's work." I am surprised that the minister speaks in the same vein as the Globe and Mail. What happened to Gunn was that his coming here and his work was secret. I saw him at the Chateau, but no one could find out anything about him. I telephoned here and there but I could not get anything. I gave an interview to the Journal so that the country could be informed, but it stopped there. The blanket was put over the news so that nobody could find out. I hold the interview in my hand. I wonder whether it would interest the house if I put it on Hansard, because I have not time to read it. It is a short interview.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman leave of the house to put the interview on Hansard?

Mr. MITCHELL: If there is no reflection on Mr. Gunn.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has not unanimous consent it cannot go on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: Is there any objection?

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will read it. Is the objection maintained?

Mr. FULTON: No.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: The interview is as follows:

Ottawa Journal, October 21, 1942:

Would limit big jobs here to Canadians
Pouliot objects seeking executives outside

An appeal to the government is being made this week by Jean François Pouliot, M.P., for Temiscouata, to appoint experienced Canadians to important administrative war posts, instead of seeking executives outside the country.

"Here in Canada," Mr. Pouliot told the Journal to-day, "the first qualification for an expert in the eyes of the dominion government is that he shall not be a Canadian. As long as a man is an outsider, whether he has accomplished anything in his own country or not, he is at once rated as an encyclopedia of general knowledge.

"A recent example of imported executives is the appointment of an Alexander Gunn, of London, England, who has been loaned by the British government to ours, to act as a special adviser to the director of national selective service.

"Mr. Gunn, I am informed, is here to supervise the transfer of what he finds non-essential Canadian industry to what he finds essential Canadian industry. I have nothing to say against Mr. Gunn—far from it.

"But it is incredible that an outsider without first-hand knowledge of Canada, Canadians and Canadian business, should be called in and asked to decide who amongst Canadians engaged in trade and commerce shall survive. Is it impossible to find in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, Canadians who are not only as well, but much better qualified to undertake such a complicated and delicate task?"

Mr. Pouliot stated that anyone who has studied the question of essential industry is well aware of differences between Canadian and British industry. In Britain, he said, many industries which Canada might regard as non-essential to the war effort are retained in production to maintain foreign trade and obtain necessary funds through foreign trade. The contrary might very well be true.

He felt strongly that Canadian executives who had built up powerful war industries from the ground and accomplished great things were those best qualified to analyse essential and non-essential industries.

"This question of ruling on essential and non-essential industries is one of vital importance", Mr. Pouliot said. "I cannot see how anyone but a Canadian could possibly be qualified to handle it. The British system could well be used as a guide to refer to, but problems arising are Canadian problems and must be handled by Canadian methods.

"I have made inquiries about the matter, and I am puzzled as to why Mr. Gunn's name has been hidden from the press and the public.

"There is a vast difference between the Canadian and the United States governments in this respect. When the United States required a man to do the same type of selection, it appointed Mr. Justice James Byrnes, a self-made man thoroughly familiar with American business and American economic life, who resigned his seat on the United States Supreme Court to become stabilizer No. 1, and direct the greatest experiment in planned economy ever dreamed of in that country.

"I feel strongly that we in Canada should follow the example set by the United States in choice of an executive to reorient Canadian industry, and I implore our government to give this question their closest attention.

"I wish it to be understood that I am offering no criticism of our selective service officials in Canada. My dealings with Mr. Elliott Little, director, and Paul Goulet, associate-director, have always been most cordial and pleasant."

I shall tell you why I object so strongly to Gunn. It is because in the United States there was a revision of essential jobs by the wartime man-power commission. In Canada it was entirely different. There was no list of essential jobs. There was a numerous list of unessential occupations, and it was only with the approval of the minister that a man could be considered as fulfilling an important job.

When I come to it I must remind the house that General Tremblay, a gallant soldier who was one of the two or three inspectors general of the army in Canada during the war, became a minor clerk in the Department of Labour. He was lent by the Department of National Defence precisely to drag into the army as much as possible men who were engaged in essential occupations outside of the army. He was at selective service. I praised very highly Mr. Paul Goulet, the first time I mentioned him. With regard to selective service he is the right arm of the minister. He has done exceptionally well and deserves special praise. I admire General Tremblay personally, but one cannot approve his appointment as a minor clerk in the Department of Labour, particularly when he was an inspector general in the army for quite a while.

Mr. POULIOT: He was not a brass hat there; he had no hat at all. He had a bare head. Soldiers suffered because of that. There were serious grievances and injustices to the soldiers, and wrongs which could have been redressed by the general if he had occupied his important office in the eastern command. He could not be found; he was under the wing of the Minister of Labour. I have special praise for the Minister of Labour because he was in favour of amnesty for farmers from the end of 1942 until the beginning of 1943. He was ready to grant amnesty to farmers and give them the opportunity to report without having any charge laid against them. The only man who objected to it was General LaFleche, because he thought it would be a handicap to him in being appointed to the cabinet afterwards. I know whereof I speak; I know my onions. I give credit to the Minister of Labour for what he intended to do in that connection. If that had been done there would have been no complaint in the country.

Another thing that I have done for the working classes is to prevent the imposition of conscription on women. I have a letter which I notice comes from the information services. It is dated 4/9/42. In this letter it states that Mrs. Rex Eaton, assistant director of selective service, is announcing a scheme of registration for women. It was for everybody. When we look at it we find that it states the inscription will permit the making of a complete inventory of all women who are ready to second men in the pursuit of war. It says that eventually all women will be inscribed in each category, but that they wish to proceed with care and method. If hon. members look at the Votes and Proceedings of March 18, 1946, they will find information about the inscription of women. There was only one inscription. All women of Canada were not registered. It was stopped because the policy was changed. Then I asked the following question:

On what date was it decided to discontinue such registration and for what reason?

The answer was as follows:

This was designed as a "spot" registration only. It was not planned on a current basis nor was any subsequent one or any in other age groups necessary.

Something occurred after the first registration. It was suspended for a time, and then the election in Charlevoix-Saguenay came along and my hon. friend the sitting member (Mr. Dorion) ran as an independent. There were three other candidates. Had any one of the three other candidates been elected we would have had conscription of women, and I considered it my duty at the time to support the sitting member so that we would not have the conscription of women in this country. It was precisely the election of that hon. gentleman that cut short the idea of the government to establish the conscription of women in this country.

Moreover, sir, I can talk to labour men in any part of this country, because I have always fought for respect for the dignity of men in overalls. Throughout the war I considered that those who were working in all trades and occupations in essential industries were not slackers, that they were deserving of credit and that they ought to be respected. Labour does not forget that. But there is something else also. I was complaining about the intelligentsia that adorns the Department of Labour, and even the outside intelligentsia to which the department often has recourse. At the time of the tramways strike in Montreal I asked the Minister of Labour for some information, on March 31, 1943. I asked what was the news. The men engaged by that company were communicating with members of parliament asking for their assistance in settling the strike; and on March 31, 1943, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was informed by the Minister of Labour that the strike was settled. On April 2, 1943, I read in the house a telegram I had received from Mr. Elphege Beaudoin, president of local 790 and president of the provincial federation of labour, asking us to offer our assistance to the strikers, and here in the house I asked the Minister of Labour if he would permit me to go to Montreal in a conciliatory mood to try and do something for those men. His answer was no, that Mr. Goldenberg was going there; and Mr. Goldenberg, who a few days before had settled the strike which was not settled, was sent there again and made a mess of it. It is always the same story. I see by the report that Mr. Brockington was named as conciliator. Mr. Brockington is a very fine man, but he is no better than any member of the committee who might have gone there to discuss the matter with the men. I have respect for my colleagues, and I prove it now. My contention is that the members of parliament should get rid of all the boards and all the intelligentsia and all the big brains, and should come together to settle the business of parliament and settle the business of this country without regard to party considerations. I appreciate the fact that all members of parliament do not put the political touch in their speeches, that even if they disagree, partisan political considerations are not to be found in what they have said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. POULIOT: May I go on? I have just a little more to say, with the consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue for two minutes?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, for two minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank hon. members very warmly, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker; and I take this opportunity to express the affection I have for my colleagues. I am not perfect; nobody is, but I try to do my best, and they know that in my work here I am sincere. I shall remember their kindness of this moment together with the kind words which have been said to me by my colleagues from Broadview (Mr. Church) and Davenport (Mr. MacNicol).

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, with the background a member of parliament has in his fight to promote the interests of labour, there are things in this report with which I cannot agree, though naturally in the main I am for it because it is full of good will. However, I cannot agree to this reference to Mr. Brockington as mediator. I repeat that once it becomes necessary to designate a mediator, it seems to me there are enough members of the house who are competent and who are familiar with labour problems, who could meet those who have difficulties, so they may understand that parliament is the home of the people and that the spirit of parliament with regard to all individuals in this country is a fatherly spirit, a benevolent spirit; that the idea of parliament is not to exploit the credulity of the electorate at the time of an election. As soon as the election is over it is the duty of parliament to bring help to those throughout this country who are in distress, as far as that can be done.

With regard to the proposed provincial code, I believe the settlement of labour difficulties should not be passed over to the provinces. Even though the provinces have certain rights in regard to labour, the parliament of Canada should be supreme to assist workers in their endeavours to agree with their employers.

Finally there are the wartime prices and trade board and the regional and national war labour boards. We have a board here and a board there; they are the causes of difficulty. Mr. Gordon may be right, Mr. Gordon may be wrong, but he is not a member of parliament. My contention is that the decision should be made by the minister, over his signature. At the present time Mr. Gordon is under the Minister of Finance, and what he has decided affects the Department of Labour. All departments are entangled together; it is impossible to know with whom we have to deal. We go to this one, we go on to that one, we are sent from pillar to post, and all these men are irresponsible in the constitutional sense. We have difficulties with them; and if they are not erratic I cannot understand their ways of expressing their views and making their orders.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member's extended period of time has also expired.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): So far, Mr. Speaker, I think this discussion has been confined almost entirely to members of the house who were members of the committee. Not having been a member of the committee, perhaps I might discuss the matter from the point of view of a member of parliament who tried as best he could to follow the proceedings without actual attendance in the committee.

When this report was brought down I turned to it to see if what the house intended on July 16 had been carried out. Hon. members will remember that on July 16 the steel strike had occurred, and there was general alarm in this house lest production should be interfered with and serious results follow, with the further result that the house decided virtually unanimously, though at the time I said I thought the decision came too late, that the industrial relations committee should meet and go into the matter of industrial unrest throughout the country, particularly the matter of the steel strike. That seems, from the reading of the record, to have been the intention of the committee when it met; for I find that, following the resolution to appoint a temporary chairman in the absence of the chairman, the first motion made was by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and read as follows:

Resolved, that consideration of the steel strike be the first order of business.

Apparently that was carried. Then, looking at the proceedings for the first full day's sitting of the committee, we find at page 45, on July 19, that the hon. member who first made the suggestion in the house that the industrial relations committee should be called together, namely the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), said this:

I am making this motion—

That was to call the various parties to the steel strike in.

—in order that we may get some speed in this task of ours towards the desired end of restoring that industry to production.

In reading this report I can find nowhere in it any direct reference to the dispute which occasioned the calling of the committee together, namely the steel strike.

In my opinion the report presented to the house by the committee represents a complete failure to do what the House of Commons hoped it might do. And because I think the committee failed so conclusively, apart from all other reasons, to do what the house expected it to do, I am going to oppose concurrence in the committee's report, in order to make my protest effective. After all, the only way in which one can make an effective protest in parliament, no matter if he may agree with some portions of a report, is, when the time comes, to register that protest by way of his vote in the house. I intend to register my vote because of the failure of the committee to do the thing the house really intended it to do. I wish to say as well that I am opposing the report because of certain obscurities in it.

In some portions of the report one can find implications of something which can be construed as being against the interests of organized labour. It is true that various interpretations may be placed upon the sections of the report. But during the discussion in the house we have had no real clarification of what those sections mean. Consequently I feel that on every score—the failure of the committee, the obscurity in its report and so on—the house is not justified in giving its approval. Of course I have no doubt that this kind of report—

Mr. MITCHELL: It was a unanimous report, with the exception of one section.

Mr. COLDWELL: It may have been the unanimous report of the committee; but no committee of the house, presenting its report to the house, can expect hon. members to accept it if they feel they are in disagreement with it, or if they feel the committee did not carry out what it was expected to carry out. And on those grounds I say I am going to oppose the report.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a reflection upon the members of your own party who were on the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: That makes no difference, at all. I am simply saying, as I have a right to say, that because this committee did not do what the house expected it to do, I am going to vote against the adoption of the report, in spite of anything the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) may say to the contrary.

Perhaps it is the kind of report some people might have wished for. It is a report which is so indeterminate that it means very little either to the house or to the country. Certainly it is not the kind of report we had expected; nor do I believe it is the kind the country expected, in view of the situation across Canada at the present time. I believe the country expected the committee to produce a responsible formula or a set of proposals which would make possible the resumption of urgently needed production—not two months or three months hence, but immediately.

In this respect the report shows no sense of urgency, nor the slightest willingness to grapple with the real problem at stake. It may be said in retrospect—and I think it is true—that the appointment of the committee may actually have delayed settlement, and may have been detrimental to the resumption of production; for what it actually did was to buoy up hope on both sides that there would be a settlement, and to shelve the actual negotiations for four weeks or so, during the time the committee held its sittings. If that is the result, then I say that at this critical time it is something which at least we should deplore.

I followed the proceedings of the committee as carefully as I could—perhaps not as carefully as I might have done, had the business of the house not been as heavy as it was. It is unfortunate that the business of the house has been so heavy for the past few weeks, and that hon. members have perhaps not been able to read all the transcripts of evidence sent to their desks. But the major point, it seems to me, which emerged from the committee was that the government and its agencies had become responsible for the situation that had occurred. It is their arbitrary and obstinate insistence upon placing a ten-cent maximum on the amount that may be permitted in a wage increase which has brought this about.

To me, this is a most deplorable situation, and for this reason, that the struggle becomes not a struggle between a union and a corporation but one between a union and the government. That, in itself, is a bad thing for any country in which it occurs.

I read the evidence regarding the ten-cent limit, and I could find in the record no scientific justification whatsoever for that limit. The most striking part of Mr. Gordon's evidence, and that of the Minister of Labour himself, was that they could not give a single scientific reason why ten cents had been chosen as a limit, and not fifteen cents.

Mr. MITCHELL: What do you mean by "scientific"? Are you going to call in the scientists?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I am not going to call in the scientists. But the minister has been in public life long enough to know that economics is called the dismal science. And the science of economics, I may tell the minister, is recognized as a science. When I speak of a scientific reason I mean a reason which would be valid in the science of economics.

Mr. MITCHELL: And you would substitute that for the common sense of a reasonable board?

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact I think everyone will agree that it is impossible to accept a limit of ten cents, or any other number of cents, that would apply to all industries fairly and justly. I will tell the minister what I think to be the only scientific way of arriving at a proper wage level. It is to take each industry, and sometimes each corporation separately, and to consider the relationship of wage costs to total costs—and, in addition to that, particularly in these days, the productivity per man. That has gone up considerably during the war, let us remember, on account of the improved machinery we now find in industry and, incidentally, particularly in the steel industry, where the furnaces which have been installed and paid for are more efficient than those used in Canada before the war.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would the hon. member pay a man according to his personal productivity?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say that, taking an industry on the whole, the average productivity of the individual in that industry should bear some relationship to the amount he receives in wages; in addition to the productivity per man, the profits of the industry, the reserves which have been built up by the industry, the working capital and other financial factors, and the relation of the particular industry to the economy as a whole, the standard of living and wages of the workers concerned, and all the factors—not one, but all the factors—which go into the making of price on the market. I readily admit that all these factors will vary from industry to industry and sometimes from plant to plant in the same industry. Therefore the attempt of the government to set an arbitrary over-all figure of ten cents for the entire industry or the entire wage level of all industries is, I think, unscientific, quite wrong, and provocative of unrest in the ranks of labour.

In to-day's newspapers is a Canadian Press dispatch which indicates the position that another labour minister in Canada is taking. I have in my hand a press dispatch appearing in to-day's Montreal Gazette, which states:

> Labour Minister Pearson announced to-day the British Columbia regional war labour board will approve applications now under consideration for wage increases in excess of ten cents hourly and leave it up to the federal government to accept or reject the findings.
> Many such applications on file now have been made jointly by managements and unions and cover about 7,000 men in 75 firms.
> In a prepared statement, Mr. Pearson said his board is considering the wage boosts "despite the warning of federal labour department officials of the embarrassment that our action may cause the national boards."
> "The action we are taking is done believing that many, if not all of the requested increases, are justifiable in all the circumstances and also because we believe that the wage situation must be clarified if we are going to maintain maximum production," he said.

Following what Mr. Pearson has said, a little thought will, I think, prove to this house that the most serious interference with production which we can have is because of labour unrest and strikes, and that the most serious danger of inflation is not a five-cent increase for the workers in one industry, but an interference with production. Indeed, interference with production may inflict upon our country a greater measure of inflation than almost anything else can do. The danger of inflation at the moment is due to a shortage of supplies, not only of steel, building materials and so on, but of many other articles. The great need both to avoid inflation and to serve the people of this country is to produce more and more. People now have money in their hands, the accumulated savings of the war; those savings represent a demand, and the only answer to the demand is to supply goods and services so that we have plenty, and thus to interfere with the rise and avert the danger of inflation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does my hon. friend not think control of prices is more important?

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not say that I did not think control of prices was important. I notice in this report, for example, that the cart is before the horse in one section of this report, and that is one of my objections to it. Recommendation No. 2 reads:

> Your committee is convinced that continued price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control.

I would say this: "Your committee should be convinced that continued wage control is only possible with a reasonable measure of price control."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Both are right.

Mr. COLDWELL: Therefore I would agree with the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Both are correct, though.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are both correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the first puts the cart before the horse.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We want both the horse and the cart.

Mr. MITCHELL: What the hon. member wants is the chicken before the egg.

Mr. COLDWELL: Put the horse first. However, we will leave that for the moment. What I am saying is that an additional increase of five cents an hour in wages would be more than offset within a few months by increased production, and the real danger we face to-day is the interference with increased production.

This, it seems to me, is clear from the evidence before the committee; also it seems to me, from the evidence which I have been able to read, that it is something which escaped to a very large extent the government and its agencies. In fact, I noted that Mr. Millard proposed that the fifteen-cent increase for which his union has been ready to settle—and it has never been disputed that the steel union is ready to settle for a fifteen-cent increase—should be staggered over a period of some months, during which production would begin to rise and the danger of inflation would diminish. I say this to the minister; I believe that suggestion of Mr. Millard was reasonable and that it offered a statesmanlike solution of the problems before the committee and before the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say this to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar: He is very close to Mr. Millard; why did he not suggest to him that he should do what the people have done in British Columbia; I mean, go through the legal or normal machinery?

Mr. COLDWELL: May I take that point up first of all? The minister says I am very close to Mr. Millard.

Mr. MITCHELL: So am I. I did not mean the remark in the sense in which my hon. friend seems to think I meant it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Believe it or not, I did not see Mr. Millard during the whole course of the committee meetings.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You were lucky.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact there is a remark made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs which should be challenged. I spoke to members of the committee of all shades of opinion in this house after Mr. Millard had appeared, and I have never heard more complimentary remarks regarding a witness than I heard regarding Mr. Millard's appearance. I heard them, may I say in fairness to Mr. Millard, from hon. members to my right and hon. members on the opposite side of the house as well as from those who sit behind me.

Mr. MAYBANK: I should like to say "amen" to that. That is just my opinion with regard to Millard, since he has been maligned in some quarters.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you. That is precisely the opinion that was given to me.

With regard to the other matters, let the minister not forget this, that right in the middle of these negotiations one day very bluntly the Minister of Labour rose in this house and said he had been advised—not by his experts but by his advisers—that the amount which could be permitted of increase in wages was a limit of ten cents. I think the minister will remember that. And that, I may say, after having—

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the hon. member permit me to say what I said?

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be glad if the minister will say what he said, because I do not think it will be very much different from what I have said.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said I had been advised, by those best able to know, that anything in addition to ten cents would endanger price control. I think that is the gist of it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is quite right; that is what the hon. gentleman said; and I think my interpretation of it was not very far out. But this statement was made after the minister or the authorities had allowed increases of fifteen cents an hour to other unions. Right in the middle of the negotiations with this most important union, in this most important industry, suddenly the minister came down and said, "We are not going to allow you to get the wage increase that we allowed to other unions under threat of a strike".

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, that was the interpretation which was put upon it, and it is unfortunate, if the minister had something else in mind, that he did not interpret his own remarks so that other people could understand them.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is what I was endeavouring to do. There was a desperate situation, as there is in all strikes. If I remember rightly, the wage committee was meeting in Hamilton and Toronto. It is always touch and go in the case of a strike. It had been in my mind to put in a controller at that time. I was playing for time, I am frank to admit. In every case where I had put a controller in, the result had been to the satisfaction of both sides, and I thought it would be the same in the steel industry. But I missed the boat.

Mr. COLDWELL: It had been granted a few weeks before to powerful unions which were not inclined to be as patient as this union was. Then all at once we had this statement made to the house, and if it was misconstrued by the union I must say it was also misconstrued by the house, including myself.

Apart from the steel strike, we have some 50,000 workers on strike in Canada at the present time. That is a serious situation. But that is not all. According to the press, negotiations between the packing-house workers and their employers have broken down, and I heard on the early morning broadcast over CBO to-day—

Mr. MITCHELL: You never get good news from the C.B.C.

Mr. COLDWELL: It depends on what the minister calls good news. I call accurate news good news. The minister may like the news coloured a little.

Mr. MITCHELL: You always hear of that step in industrial negotiations. Only this morning I signed, at the request of the organization, a commission appointing Mr. Justice Richards to inquire into the packing-house workers' dispute.

Mr. COLDWELL: We hope that there will be no stoppage of work in the meat-packing industry because it is basic to the welfare of this country and, indeed, of the world, at the present time. But there are reports of the likelihood of other labour troubles; the railway unions, for example, and in every case it is the arbitrary limit of ten cents applicable to all industries that is causing a great deal of this unrest in industry at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say this about the railway unions—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no objection to the minister asking a question, but I think I should be allowed to conclude my speech without more interruptions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that the Minister of Labour, who seems so anxious to speak, should make a speech. He has proved his anxiety to say something and he owes it to this house and to the country to make a speech and explain the situation as he sees it.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. COLDWELL: There you are doing it again, but I am going to sit down and let the minister say something.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member threw out a challenge. It was reported in some of the newspapers at the beginning of this trouble that I had tendered my resignation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said that?

Mr. MITCHELL: One of the newspapers.

Mr. COLDWELL: I certainly did not.

Mr. MITCHELL: No. My hon. friend challenged me to make a speech. Let me say to him that he and I come from a race that does not run away from trouble. Make no mistake about that. We are made of the stuff they build empires out of.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am very glad to know that the minister admits he is in trouble and that he is not going to run away from it. Of course I knew he would not run away from it, but I did want him to rise and say what he thought of his troubles.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The best labour minister Canada ever had.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say that we are faced with a serious situation because tens of thousands of workers may soon be on strike in this country, and if that happens it will be outrageous. It will be due, in my opinion, to a lack of statesmanship on the part of this administration. It is contrary to the interests of the workers concerned, contrary to the interests of the people of Canada and certainly contrary to the interests of the people of the whole world if there are interruptions of work in these basic industries.

I want to ask the Minister of Labour a question, and perhaps he will answer it when he makes the speech that he is now going to make. He says we come from the same race, and I know that sometimes there is that little bit of pride which may interfere with one's doing things that ought to be done. Is it pride on the minister's part or on the part of his colleagues that prevents them from abandoning the untenable position which they now occupy, or is it because of another characteristic sometimes attributed to the race from which we come? Is it obstinacy? I think it is one or the other. If it is neither, then, more seriously, I ask, is this a deliberate attempt on the part of the government to weaken or break organized labour in Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL: I say no to that without equivocation.

Mr. COLDWELL: We know there are certain powerful interests in this country which dislike the progress that labour made during the war and were determined, when the war ended, that these new unions and even the older ones had to be broken if possible. If it is none of these things it does appear to the working people of this country that this is an attempt on the part of powerful interests which the government is at least condoning to break the labour unions during this critical period.

Before I close, I am going to make an appeal to the government that they remove Canada from the strait-jacket of ten cents in which she has been placed. There is no scientific justification for it. No one has advanced any scientific reason for it, and certainly there is no sense in it. It would appear that a fifteen-cent formula might bring the parties together and prevent any further strikes. Monopolies in Canada, most of our big corporations and certainly some of these steel corporations can afford to pay a fifteen-cent increase without being entitled to ask for a price increase in their product, and this group has recently received an increase of $5 a ton. They can afford some reduction in the huge profits they have made during the years, but on the other hand the small increase which the unions are asking is not to raise the standard of living of the workers but to maintain it at the level to which they have been able to bring it during the war and previously over a long period of struggle. If this is not admitted by the government we may face a period of increasing industrial strife and economic difficulties throughout the whole country, and if that should happen, I say to the Minister of Labour and his colleagues that, in my opinion, the responsibility will lie squarely on the shoulders of the government, which will stand condemned in the eyes of the people of Canada as being more concerned with safeguarding the interests of powerful monopolies and powerful corporations than they are with safeguarding the interests of the common people of the country. I appeal to the minister, therefore, to review again the last proposal made by the representatives of the steel workers' union, that the increase be permitted and spread over a period of months, that union security be guaranteed, and that, as we have often suggested, industrial councils be set up, in which labour, management and the community would be represented, so that we might avoid these struggles, which are more inflationary than any increases of pay that could possibly be considered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not wish to intervene in the debate, but if I might have the unanimous consent of the house I would move that standing order 6, subsection 2, be suspended this day and the house continue to sit at six o'clock p.m. until seven o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): I had intended to make a few remarks concerning the committee's report and particularly with regard to section 6 thereof. However, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has just made a statement, in which there are certain things I feel I should like to reply to very briefly. He suggests that wage costs should be tied to total costs of productivity, and he makes the suggestion, a very plausible one, that wages and profits should be related to each other.

On the broad humanitarian ground there is much reason to believe that that is a proper suggestion and one on which we can nearly all agree. But I would point out to the hon. gentleman the great difficulty in doing that in a scientific way. Let us assume that these steel corporations, or some of them, have made large profits and could pay fifteen cents. Let us assume that for this year. Remember, however, that during the war these corporations have been operating at 100 per cent capacity and operating for immediate destruction. In many cases extra plant was built which is unlikely to be capable of use in the post-war era because of the simple fact that now we are producing not for destruction but for construction, and the goods that we shall produce, particularly in steel, will not be immediately destroyed, but will last a very considerable time. Therefore the absorptive capacity of the market, while it is great now, may not and probably will not be as great in the years to come. We must remember that this is not a business cycle and it is not the fault of capitalism. It is merely a phenomenon that happens after all wars. You manufacture for destruction and the entire product you manufacture is destroyed within a few hours, so that you have to manufacture again. Tanks and everything else made out of steel, shells, guns, are produced for destruction and naturally you need a tremendous capacity. But once the war is over, you begin to produce such things as motor cars and other manufactures of steel, which we hope will last for years instead of merely for a matter of hours. That is one of the fundamental economic transitions we have to put up with after emerging from a period of war.

It is easy to say, and it is an interesting and sympathetic thing to say, that wages should be tied to profits. I agree with it, but in a period of transition I doubt whether there is any firm that can tell what will be their profits during the next few years.

I wish to say something more in this regard. In the automobile strike in the United States, the fact-finding committees that were set up by President Truman worked very well and assiduously for upwards of a year, and from the last report I have had they were unable to determine upon a formula which would tie wages to profits. This was one of the things the industrial relations committee discussed, and we discussed it quite seriously, both in open and in closed meetings. We found—and the evidence is there—that it was difficult or almost impossible to arrive at any formula which would, in the present transitional period, tie in wages to profits, no matter how desirable that was. I merely want to show the difficulty of arriving at these wage rates and differentials, and I would quote one paragraph from an article by Professor Lloyd G. Reynolds, who is director of the labour-management centre at Yale university. He has this to say on the subject as quoted in the American Economic Review:

> The individual firm is caught between the area and the industry. Conditions within the area, particularly the wage levels of other firms, determine the minimum which it must pay. The wage rates of other firms in the industry, ceteris paribus, will determine the maximum which it can afford to pay. If the latter figure is less than the former, the firm will in time be forced out of operation; but if it is greater the firm can be guided by the wage level either of the industry or the area. Developments in the industry may lead the firm to make wage changes independently of any developments in the local labour market. Indeed, for firms in competitive industries which are geographically dispersed, it appears that the industry is normally the dynamic influence in bringing about wage changes, while the influence of the local labour market is merely passive or permissive.

I put that on record to show how extremely complicated this business of tieing wages to profit really is. While we have every sympathy with doing that, it is something on which one cannot put a yardstick and easily evolve a formula. There is one thing with which I should like to agree and quite forcefully, namely, the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that at the present time inflation is caused more from the almost complete paralysis which is going on in the country, caused more by the lack of productivity than by anything else. To-day we are really in serious danger of inflation, not because of any wage scale or any differential, but for the simple reason that we are not producing. Something has been said about the pressure of money. Despite the fact that money is decreasing in the hands of the workers and that their security is decreasing, which is a tragic thing, the volume of money to-day is creating tremendous pressure on the whole price structure. The lack of production is becoming more serious every day that the strike continues.

I wish to say a few words about the recommendations in the committee's report. I should like to touch briefly on the labour code. It has been obvious for years that a labour code is necessary in Canada for two reasons. The first is the fact that our manufacturers are young and have expanded more quickly than the industries and the manufacturers of any other land in the world. Our tremendous increase in manufacturing potential has been the marvel of the rest of the world; but with this tremendously rapid increase there have been certain growing pains. With old-established industries management was able to grow up with labour. In Canada we have had such a rapid increase that in many cases management has not had time or has not been able to understand the problems of labour. Over and over again that was brought out in the evidence of the committee. Management has been primarily interested in the production, selling and dispersal of the goods it produced. Consequently in many industries labour relations have been almost non-existent. We did not have time; we grew so rapidly. The same can be said of many unions. The industrial union in Canada has been a growth of the last few years. Consequently in many cases it did not have the seasoned counsel of unions elsewhere. With these two problems, one from the management point of view and the other from the union's point of view, it was inevitable that there would be a clash and we are having it now in one of the most critical periods of our history.

During the war I spent some time in the coal mines in Great Britain and I was privileged to sit in at a labour-management committee of one of these mines. I have never seen more genuine interest expressed by anybody than I saw in the problem of production at that mine. I came back and I saw conditions in one of our coal mines. Instead of cooperation, instead of ability to see each other's point of view, I saw nothing but bitterness and the petty meannesses that two sides in any dispute can wreak on each other. Therefore, when we talk of labour-management we have a great distance to go along that line. Unless we can arrive at some way in which labour and management can and will sit down together, we are sure to have continued trouble throughout Canada. Therefore, when the suggestion of a labour code is made by this committee—and it is their first recommendation—I look upon it as probably the most important single piece of projected legislation that this country has to create.

I wish to deal now with the machinery that is already in existence. We have seen a great number of strikes and industrial disputes, many of them caused and brought about unnecessarily, brought about because the two parties to the disputes were unable or unwilling to get together. There were innumerable meetings and conferences; hours and hours were spent by the two sides in endeavouring to come to some sort of compromise; in some cases months were spent. After you spend hours and hours and even months in talking, the human being becomes a little bit desperate. Many times action, and perhaps unwarranted action, has been taken because of the despair or I might even say the frustration felt by the two parties in their endeavour to get together. So that there must be, and the committee recommended, an acceleration and simplification of the processes of settling labour-management disputes. We cannot afford to take months and months for any plant to come to an agreement with its workers.

The next point I want to make is this. We have seen in this committee, and it has been admitted by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, that there has been virtually no liaison between his board and the war labour board. That is an intolerable position. The chairman of the price control board says it is his opinion that an increase in basic wages above a certain limit will put very strong pressure on the whole price structure of this country and that he will not be responsible for continuing price control if greater increases are permitted; yet his representatives have not been sitting in with the people who are trying to evolve a formula for the settlement of these difficulties, either on a single plant basis or on a multiple plant basis. In view of that situation I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that there is a very great lack in our whole wage and price structure, and in my opinion this has done a great deal to cause the tragedy of industrial strikes we see across Canada to-day.

I come now to a problem which is somewhat sinister. It was apparent that in 1944 there was an organized agreement between certain unions to make a concentrated drive. Those plans were furthered at the conference in Quebec, I think, in 1945; and the result is now apparent in the industrial paralysis we see about us. It would be easy, yet it would be wrong, to say this was organized by the communist party. To say that certainly would be untrue. But it would be equally untrue to say that the communist party has not had a hand in causing a great deal of the present unrest. I say that to-day Russia is like an African snake called the Ringhals Cobra. This peculiar snake has the power to spray and spit venom great distances, and wherever this venom lands it produces a festering sore. If it lands in your eye it blinds you. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are certainly places in Canada to-day where there are festering sores, and there are certainly places where parts of the population are blinded. That cannot be overlooked in any discussion of industrial unrest in Canada to-day. I want to quote just one sentence from a speech delivered quite recently by Mr. Churchill. He was speaking of England, but it is equally true of Canada. He said:

Even here in our patient community soviet propaganda has been steadily making headway backwards. I would have not believed it possible that in a single year the soviets would have been able to do themselves so much harm and to chill so many friendships in the English-speaking world.

I say that with a certain amount of sorrow, because I was the first member of this house to advocate the recognition of Soviet Russia by Canada.

I now come to discuss in a little detail section 6 of the report. I have been interested to notice where the objection to this section comes from. If I may say so, it comes from the extreme right and the extreme left. Basically this section was inserted in the report for the simple and democratic purpose of giving those who were going to be affected by a strike an opportunity to say whether or not they wanted to strike. It is as simple as that. We have a number of strikes in Canada, very serious strikes, too, by unions which have not been certified in the industry. We have plants which have been strike-bound literally for months, the strike being called by a union where no certification vote of any kind has been taken. I have evidence that at a number of these plants the strike action was not popular and was not wanted by the employees. Surely the men who are going to be affected by a strike should have an opportunity of saying whether or not they want to strike. Surely that is the basis of our whole democratic system. Surely that is the basis of everything that we have believed in connection with the rights of man. Surely, then, the individual must have the right to say whether or not he wishes to take strike action. And he must have that right safeguarded, not by an organization that is prejudiced one way or another, but by an unprejudiced organization such as the Department of Labour. I say that is one of the fundamental things in labour relations in Canada to-day.

I have information given me concerning the General Electric strike in Toronto. I have not verified this information, but it has been given to me by sources which I consider reliable. There were three strike votes taken at three different plants. One strike vote was taken in the union hall, and the vote was ninety-two per cent in favour of striking. The second strike vote was taken by union management, and the vote was eighty-six per cent to strike. In the third vote I understand the ballots were counted by the parish priest, or somebody else equally trusted by the employees, and the result was sixty per cent against taking strike action.

Those plants were all similarly situated, and were all doing more or less the same type of work. These figures which I have given clearly signify that in one plant, where an independent vote was taken, a considerable majority voted to maintain production, whereas in the other two plants under union auspices the votes were overwhelmingly to take strike action.

That, Mr. Speaker, is more than coincidence. I have letters and affidavits in great numbers from people in my riding who are employees of the Anaconda American Brass Company, stating that the decision to strike was certainly not a majority decision of the employees in that plant. The plant has been out since April and has caused untold harm not only to the men who have been forced to take strike action but to the entire building industry in Canada. It is the only brass plant in Canada producing certain types of tubing. Every house being built needs the product of that one company, and, as I say, it has been out since April. If that strike action was taken without a majority of the employees in the plant wanting to take that action, I say it is undemocratic, wholly wrong, and wholly against those principles which we try to live up to, and which we profess.

I would say one thing more concerning the vexed question of law and order, and in this I speak only for my own riding. That law was flagrantly broken is beyond any peradventure of doubt. Prosecutions have been taken, and convictions have been registered as a result of the breaking of not only the criminal code, the common law, but also the laws controlling picketing and the use of force. That cannot be tolerated by any government in Canada—and when I refer to any government I refer to any municipal, provincial or federal government.

We cannot allow the law to be broken, and say, "Well, it is de facto; why worry about de jure?" Let the thing continue like that, and we shall have business going from bad to worse. And, if I may say so, that is the policy publicly advocated by the communist party in Canada. I do not say the people who took this action were communists, but I do say that is the policy laid down publicly on platforms when members of the Labour Progressive or communist party speak in Canada.

I wish to reiterate once more why I believe that clause 6 may be the turning point against strikes which might be described as wild-cat strikes, even though in many instances the unions have been recognized. I am in entire agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he says that it is fundamental that before one takes action or before action is taken in his name as a member of a union and an employee of a plant, before action is taken which will affect his entire economic life and security, he must have an opportunity to say whether or not he agrees with that action.

But I say I believe that the insertion of clause 6, imperfectly worded as it may be, may offer the individual employee the freedom to express his views and wishes secretly and fearlessly, and on his decision strike action will be taken. If the committee has done that, if we have brought that measure of freedom to the individual worker, it may be that this will have been the corner-stone of a labour charter for Canada, for which we all devoutly hope.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I am one who almost did not sit on the committee. However, I happened to be named as substitute for some one else, and so sat during the last seven committee meetings. Consequently I missed some of the most important witnesses, and had to depend for my information on the record as it appeared, which, of course, it is difficult to keep up with, like all the other business before this house after it is recorded.

Like the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) I am extremely disappointed with the results of the committee's work. At the time it was appointed I had great hopes that here, at least, parliament was going to take an active part in trying to bring about some order, peace and good government in labour relations. It did not happen, and the report is, in my opinion, in most respect a wishy-washy affair and, I am afraid, more wishy than washy.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are partly responsible for it.

Mr. BENTLEY: Right. I was there on the last seven days, as the minister has said, but I did not agree with very much that was going on.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why disown your own child?

Mr. BENTLEY: I did, on several occasions.

Section 1 is a pious hope for a future sinless industry. It will not do any harm. It proposes that we have a dominion-provincial conference. If that conference is like the last one we can hope for no results a year from now, the same as happened with the other one a year from the time it started. It is suggested that the wartime prices and trade board and the regional and national war labour boards start getting together. A splendid idea; it should have been followed when they were both set up. It will probably take a long time to integrate their ideas to the point where they will get together. No harm in it, but no immediate good.

It is also suggested "that matters coming before the regional and national war labour boards be handled expeditiously." Well, who does not want every important matter handled expeditiously? Nobody could vote against a sentiment of that kind, so obviously I supported it. There is no harm in it, but certainly no immediate good is likely to come from it.

In section 3 the committee recommends "that a measure of union security should follow certification." What measure? I was hoping when this debate started that the first thing which would happen would be a statement by the Minister of Labour giving the department's and the government's interpretation of these various things. So far the committee's report has not been interpreted in detail by any responsible member of the government, so I am wondering what, and how big, the measure is. If it is the same kind of measure I have in view I agree with it. It is ambiguous. If, however, it means what I have in view it means quite a lot. I would say that "a measure of union security" should be as large a measure as company security.

We come to section 4: "Law being the basis of our society, your committee condemns" so and so. Mr. Speaker, that is a platitude which has been reiterated, I suppose, as many times as there are people old enough to know what law and order mean.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend say that the observance of law and order is a platitude?

Mr. BENTLEY: I said, constantly reiterating that we believe in the observance of law is a platitude. We all believe in law. Everybody in a civilized country believes in law and order. Everybody who comes to this parliament, I assume, believes in law and order. Burglars and thieves and murderers believe in law and order if they are going to be subject to summary lynching by the gang who catches them and if law and order will give them some protection for the time being. Everybody believes in law and order; so that is not a helpful or concrete or very wise decision for a committee to hold over forty meetings to arrive at. However, I agree with it; there is no quarrel so far as that is concerned.

Section 5 is a recommendation "that the law of picketing be studied with a view to its modernization and clarification" and so on. I think there is no disagreement there at all; I believe that is a very proper recommendation. I suppose that practices grow up around any organization as it is building, which require revision from time to time to bring them into conformity with our conceptions of law and order. Therefore I can support it.

As to section 7, I am not so sure what it means, but it says:

> Your committee recommends that the controllers appointed by order in council P.C. 2901 be instructed to implement the terms of such order with such modifications as the government may determine.

That in itself is one of the reasons I would have liked the minister to make a statement, to interpret some of these things.

Some people in reading P.C. 2901 may concentrate on paragraph 9. That paragraph states:

> It shall be the duty of every person in the employ of any of the said companies at or in any authorized establishments of the companies to perform the duties of his employment until the authority of the controller is revoked; and every person who fails to perform his duties as aforesaid as herein required without lawful excuse, the onus of proof of which is upon him, is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of $20 for each day or part of a day on which he fails so to perform his duties.

I am sure that some people in this country when they read that will wonder whether, without a statement from the minister, without an interpretation of section 7 of the committee's report, every striker in Stelco and in other plants, under controller Kilbourn, who is to-day on strike is to be subject to a fine of $20 a day or whatever other penalty may be involved in the section.

I come now to section 6, about which there has been so much debate and controversy. I do not know that I need deal with it for any length of time. I know that if it means what it says it does not mean what some hon. members here interpret it to mean, and if there is any statement in or section of this report which should have been clarified by a competent official of the government as soon as the report was tabled, this is the one. The minister was there when the controversy took place. Only three of us on the committee voted against that. Their names were mentioned the other day: the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and myself. I voted against it particularly on the grounds that it did not mean what those who were promoting it said it meant, and that it should have been clarified and put into the kind of words which would show exactly what it meant, if it does not mean what it said.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why did you not suggest the kind of words?

Mr. BENTLEY: I did suggest it and spoke about it, and the minister himself spoke to me in committee in camera in reply to my question and stated that he would make a statement on the floor of the house if I wanted him to.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is my hon. friend objecting to? He is just sticking up straw men and knocking them down for political purposes; that is all.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister is perfectly entitled to be funny if he wants to be.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend, out of his vast experience of trade unions, is talking about something he does not know anything about.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why don't you make a speech on your own account?

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister has been invited on several occasions to make his speech.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will make a speech.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am glad. When that time comes I will listen to him if he says anything worth while. So far as his great experience with labour unions is concerned, I have had as much experience with human beings as the minister has, and know as much about their actions; and I say about this recommendation that, if it means what it says, it means that the minister is to have the right to interfere with the organizational work and the policy work of the labour unions. I tell him that if anyone here proposed that kind of performance or tried to exercise the kind of power which is to be given to the minister, to govern the actions and policy of a farm organization, there would be a farmers' rebellion right away.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is the most modest man that ever scuttled a ship.

Mr. BENTLEY: The minister of course thinks he is witty, and I will admit he is half right. I shall not embarrass him by another statement he made in camera, but I suggest that he avoid not only physical encounters with certain household equipment—

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend think this is fair? We had meetings in camera where everybody spoke his mind, and I am frank to admit that there appears to be some difference between what some members say in the house and what was said in the committee. I have no objection to my hon. friend telling what I said in camera, but does he think it is playing the game? Why do we have sittings in camera? I think my hon. friend will realize when he has had more experience that it is not playing the game.

Mr. BENTLEY: A moment ago I was dealing with section 6 of the committee's report and the minister said: Why didn't I say these things in the committee, meaning in the camera sittings where the matter came up? To answer the minister I had to refer to what happened in camera. The minister said on the floor of the committee that he would make a statement in the house and he has not made it. Other members have referred in the house to what was said during the camera sittings of the committee; so why does the minister single me out as one who should not break that apparently very breakable rule when it does not embarrass anybody to have it done? However, I will leave the minister out unless he insists on interfering.

Let me read section 6 of the committee's recommendations:

> Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision, to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

If it is good to have that in there, and assuming that it means what it says or means what some have said it means, why not have another section reading: Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a vote of the shareholders of the company, without proxy, be taken to determine the wishes of the shareholders regarding the requests of the union for increases or improvement of working conditions.

One is just as fair as the other. I do not think one would be any more acceptable to labour than the other one will be. It would not be acceptable to the kind of organizations I know something about. But it would not be an illogical corollary to section 6 as it stands at the present time. I remember that when Mr. Hilton was on the stand he questioned the right of the union leaders to call a strike and demanded that the question be referred back to the workers. When the hon. member for Cape Breton South asked him if he would agree to have the company's position referred back to the shareholders Mr. Hilton was astounded and would not even consider that that was a reasonable proposition. He was engaged by the shareholders to do the job and his word was law. But when a couple of thousand workers engage a man like Charlie Millard to do their job, Mr. Hilton expects him, every time he runs into a place where he must use his own judgment and make his own decisions, to run back to the workers to find out if they support Charlie Millard or Mr. Hilton. Why it should be right in the one case and wrong in the other, I cannot understand. I see no difference between the two positions.

I now come to a section that I am possibly even more concerned about in some respects. I refer to section 2, to which my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred. I am going to refer to it in more detail. Section 2 reads:

> Your committee is convinced that continued price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control.

There again is ambiguity, because "reasonable" can mean so much or so little to anybody. If you are arguing with your wife and appear to be getting the best of the argument, what happens? She says: Now, be reasonable. On the other hand, if she is getting the best of it, you say: Be reasonable. What is "reasonable" except somebody's point of view of what will suit them best? So that when you put into a recommendation a statement like that it does not carry a great deal of weight.

But section 2 as it stands carries more weight I think than the actual wording would suggest to the casual reader. I say that for this reason. To me, section 2 is a clear acceptance by the committee of the government's rigid determination that while wages for workers and prices for farm products must be controlled in the interests of price control, interference with the profit position, now or potentially, of companies is an interference that will not be tolerated. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), in addressing the house last night, spent a good deal of time in telling of the efforts of Mr. Donald Gordon to convince the committee that ten cents was the over-all limit. As has been said before, and I agree, Mr. Gordon offered no concrete factual evidence that ten cents was the correct figure. It may be nine and a half cents; it may be three cents; it may be thirty-three cents. But he simply said ten cents and made a long statement in support of it, supported by no facts whatsoever. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply tried to tell us in his speech last night that Mr. Gordon probably did not prove his point; but nevertheless, because of the position he holds, his advice should be heeded. We have had too many cases in this country, Mr. Speaker, of ordinary everyday people who have been placed by fortuitous circumstances in positions of great responsibility before whom we were supposed to bow the knee with adulation for every single utterance they make. We certainly have had a liberal education in the last four years designed to make us worship Donald Gordon and accept every single statement he makes. But it is a matter of opinion whether he is right. Mr. Donald Gordon's statements may be correct. I do not believe they are correct. I differ with Donald Gordon as to the increase and I will give my reasons. When price fixing first came into effect the idea of price control was to maintain the existing relationship between costs and prices and profits. It was the base from which he worked. This position was maintained pretty generally during the war, even though government subsidies were extensively used to maintain it. The maintenance of margins of profit, together with the vastly increased war business, netted great profit positions for many industries, and now they are loath to relinquish that wonderfully favourable and privileged position they occupy. I absolutely believe, from the statement placed before the committee, which is on record, and from my own experience, that the steel companies are quite able to pay the full amount of the union demands. It is indicated in the statements themselves.

I know there is controversy. I know people will say it cannot be done. They will pick little figures out of big books and prove this and that by them, because there is an old saying with regard to figures and people of certain classes, and we are none of us free from it. We like to prove our point. But I will draw on my experience in considering the reasons why I do not believe that Donald Gordon is right, no matter whether he believes it or not.

First, he based his position on the belief that you can maintain the spread of profit over and above all costs, including wages, that the industries are used to having, and more if they can get it, and they will be the sole judges as to how much profit must be made, having no responsibility whatsoever to the public in the operation of the business of making that profit. I am going to go into something I know as much about as anyone in this house, from which to draw my experience. I have spoken about these matters before for different reasons, and, therefore, when I mention cooperative associations I am not going to go back to a debate that we have closed. I am going to debate this question from the point of view of the experience of cooperative organizations I know about, and compare them with other industries of a similar nature which are not cooperative and which I also know something about, because I worked for them.

[Mr. Bentley.]

I am going to take, first, the matter of cooperative elevators, or pool elevators if you want that name. That is their actual name—Saskatchewan pool elevators. Twenty-four years ago, twenty-three years ago, and up until twenty-one years ago, you could not have a bushel of grain handled on the street in a country elevator for less than seven cents a bushel for commercial grades and six cents a bushel for contract grades. In that year, we, a bunch of farmers, got together and put our own money into the building of an elevator system. Why? Because we knew that seven cents and six cents was too high a handling charge and that the profits to the company were too great.

We had no factual information. No private company would give us their statement, but a few men like myself who had worked for some of these companies were able to give a general idea and to create the belief, which was a conviction, that profits were too great. So we took the only way we could to prove it. We built a system of our own, and to-day we have reduced handling charges in years of big volume to as low as one cent a bushel, and for the last four years, for not more than three cents a bushel on the street, in the car, rolling, or any way you like to have it, right down to spot position at the head of the lakes.

I am not saying that in order to show how brilliant we were, because we knew we were only ordinary mortal human beings, and if we were able to engage management to operate our elevator system and clear us of all costs of operation at those reduced handling charges, then other men in the grain trade could do the same. It has been proven that these other companies, because of the competition we afforded, have had to reduce their handling charges to the same figure as our own; and they are still in business.

Does the house expect me to want any greater proof that companies can do their business at less profit, or, on the other hand, can pay more of their earnings in wages, without affecting the price of the goods or the services created by those industries? As a matter of fact, while reducing those handling charges we improved the actual service given in the country elevator. When we were paying the high handling charges we also lost all dockage that was in our grain, because the company who bought our grain owned it and frequently there is a good market for the dockage in wheat or in any other commercial grains when they go to the terminals and are cleaned, because many times there is good wild oats, buckwheat seed and other foreign matter which is good for feed or feed mixtures, and whoever sells that, when there is a market for it, makes good money.

So that not only did we reduce these handling charges but we paid back to ourselves the value of the dockage in the grain after cleaning it out, with the result that the farmer who happened to have more dockage, in consequence of a bad year for weeds, received some recompense for the dockage in his grain. Other companies have to do the same thing when there is anything in it, and they are still in business.

At one time the spread between what is called straight grade grain and damp grain was as high as thirty cents a bushel, nearly always as high as twenty cents, and in those days if a farmer shipped a carload of No. 1 northern wheat which graded damp and went through the dryer at the head of the lakes, it came out of the dryer automatically numbered 3, two grades down, because the private companies would not spend money on research or put in a proper drying equipment so that the grain could be dried without bringing about that chemical process which caused it to lose its grade. When we went into business we put in proper dryers. To-day the spread between straight and damp is seven cents a bushel, and other companies are in business. You can put No. 1 northern damp grain in a dryer, and it will come out No. 1 northern and cost only seven cents a bushel because of drying it. The companies are in business now, and therefore they could have done this before and made profits.

I have tried to prove in that statement, not what we are doing in the west to reduce the cost of handling grain, but that companies can do with less profit and should do with less profit, and their income should be spread out more in one or both of two directions, or a combination of them; that is to say, higher wages to the people working for them or a lower price to the people who buy their commodity, or a position half way between these two, but not in more profit to the organization that does the job.

I can give another example. It is not so long ago—far less time than the grain business I have been talking about—back in 1933 and 1934 when we were establishing our cooperative refinery in Regina, that we were told by competent and highly placed officials in the major private oil companies that it cost up to 8½ cents a gallon to manufacture a gallon of gasoline out of crude oil. We did not believe it. We could not prove it but we had the conviction that it was not true. So we set up our own refinery and have cut in two the cost of manufacturing gasoline, and other companies have done the same and are still in business.

If they could not afford to do this, how are they still in business when they have to do it? Of course they can; and Stelco, Dosco, Algoma, Westinghouse and the rest of them, I fully and earnestly believe, can do the same. I am inclined to believe, as was suggested this afternoon, that on the part of somebody in the scheme of things there is a stubborn determination that bossdom is going to maintain its role, no matter who gets hurt, the public or the country. I am afraid that Donald Gordon, wittingly or otherwise and possibly this government unwittingly, or both together, are helping to maintain that uneconomic and unfair position. The returns for industrial production are to be set by the owners of industry; the workers will get what the boss wants to pay them; the consumers will pay what the boss wants to charge them, and the remainder will be profit for the companies. Again that is important to our people in the west.

In this debate we have not heard very much from the west, and that is why I had the temerity to take part in it. We are getting squeezed in this process. We have gone through the war years doing our little patriotic best with worn-out machinery to produce whatever was required in the largest volume possible. We have bought victory bonds to the best of our ability. I started with the first victory loan campaign and finished up with the ninth. I have a beautifully engraved and decorated memento from Mr. Magee, chairman of the provincial war finance committee, showing my part in the campaigns. It was not greater than anybody else's. I am giving it only to show that we have done our little bit; it was not great; it was not outstanding; it was just our little best. We were always ready to obey Donald Gordon and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); to obey the request of the government to do everything we could to help our position in war production; to play our part in the hope that, when the war was over, we would get some relief in the form of machinery which we required and the other things that were needed, along with price adjustments for our products. Over a year after the end of the war we are still waiting. I am continually getting letters from men out in my section of the country. This morning I received one from a man with 800 acres of wheat. He lost his crop last year. He has no combine to harvest his crop this year and will lose it if we happen to run into bad weather. That is an indication of the hardships through which these people are going and which they hoped they would not have to experience at this time, particularly when the war is over.

If the government continues to pursue its policy of maintaining the private system, the private position of Stelco at Hamilton and others, regardless of whether the workers are being properly treated or not, and if production is to be curtailed in a basic industry we of the west will face another year and possibly two, when we shall not have the proper machines to prepare our land, put in our crop for the coming year and take off the crop in the fall, if we are fortunate enough to get one, a crop which hon. members and everyone else in the country together with peoples all over the world need so badly. It is important to us; but do not think for one moment, if hon. members should have that idea, that you are ever going to sell the farmers of the west the old idea, which used to prevail that labour is all to blame. Some hon. members said that the press always puts the blame on labour. I agree with that. Since I have been in the House of Commons and the disputes started, I have not yet read a headline in one of the Ottawa papers or in one of those so-called capitalist or private enterprise papers which ever gave a fair break to labour in a dispute. No; we do not find them giving the labour side of the picture. No matter how they try in radio talks or in speeches made in the house, they are not going to make the farmers of the west believe that their enemies are labouring people. The farmer knows who made a profit when he was getting low prices for his products. He knows who makes the profit when he buys his binder, his combine or his plough. Compared with the profit to the one who sells it, it is a good many to one. It is the worker who makes the plough, the reaper and the other farm machinery, and who has the family who is buying the farmer's butter, eggs and oatmeal. We believe that the farmer's market is much more important than profits to a few industrial owners who can only eat so much, wear so much wool and live in so many houses at a time. The farmer wants labour to get a fair share of the national income at the present time.

If the recommendations which came out of this committee, and if what appears to be the government programme, is to be the continuing programme of the government, then I am afraid—no, I am not afraid, I am sure there will be tremendous repercussions not only around the plant where the difficulty is taking place but all across the country, because the farmers believe the workers, the producers and the consumers should have a prior claim over the productive power of industry in Canada before anyone is paid a profit over and above what is commensurate with the responsibilities of the job he has to do.

I would make this suggestion, and I shall be chastized for this, Mr. Speaker, so, as other people sometimes do, I shall admit my error before I say it. I should have thought of this in the committee but I did not think fast enough. On one occasion the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told me that I did not have a legal training. I frankly admit that. I do not know whether I am sorry for it or not. I have had some other kinds of training which have stood me in good stead in times of trouble. I have depended largely on fast footwork and other things to get me out of trouble, and have not had to learn much about legal matters. Had I had a legal training, I might have suggested this, but other members of the committee have legal training and either they did not think along the same lines as I did or they forgot it. Had I thought of it, I would have made this recommendation. Section 2 of the report reads as follows:

> Your committee is convinced that continued price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control.

What is a reasonable measure of wage control? It really does not mean anything to a legal man or anyone else. It means "reasonable" to the people who are using the phrase at the time. I say the section should read in this way, and had I thought of it, I would have so recommended. I am sorry I did not think of it in the committee. The section should be reworded to read this way:

> Your committee is convinced that continued wage control is only possible with positive price control.

We have not had positive price control in Canada. I remember quite well—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has spoken for forty minutes. The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Finish your remarks.

Mr. BENTLEY: Have I the consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house he may not continue. Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not unanimous consent.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate this afternoon. Many things have been said with which I can agree. Some things have been said which I had intended to say, but I shall not take up the time of the house to repeat what has already been mentioned in the debate. I think I can safely say that the country as a whole, and labour, will be disappointed with this report. The country as a whole was expecting that the report would deal with some definite solution, particularly of the steel strike. I am sure that labour in the country will be dissatisfied with the ambiguous language and general terms of the report. In that connection I wish to read a section of the statement of the wage coordinating committee of the Canadian Congress of Labour on this matter. Referring to the report of the committee on industrial relations, the Canadian Congress of Labour wage committee said:

> Not only has the house committee failed to do anything to settle current strikes but it has for a period of four weeks created the illusion and the impression in the minds of the public, management and workers that the members of the house committee were going to settle the strikes.

I think that is a correct statement, Mr. Speaker, and I believe you will find it to be the general attitude of labour throughout the country.

Before proceeding very briefly to deal with some sections of this report, I wish to say that some hon. members have expressed the opinion that strikes in Canada are largely due to communist activity. Several hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party have made that statement. I believe these hon. gentlemen completely misunderstand the fundamental reasons for the discontent which exists among the great masses of the Canadian people. In the first place, I would say the reason for this discontent is that we have fought a bitter and difficult war, during which the people were told they should look forward to a period of peace which would inaugurate a new social order. The people of this country are expecting that new social order. Then I would say the second reason for the mass discontent which exists to-day is the desire for economic security, the desire to maintain and improve the standard of living. When hon. members blame communist activity for the discontent that is in the country I think they entirely misjudge the situation. I am a farmer. It may seem strange that two farmers in succession should speak on a labour question. I have had experience with labour organizations only during the last five or six years, but in my experience I have found that the great mass of the people are reasonable, willing to compromise, ready in many cases to accept less than they should. But I am quite sure that at the present time there are large numbers of Canadian workers who are thoroughly dissatisfied and who have solid reasons for being dissatisfied.

Before dealing with one or two sections of the report, I wish to say that I was disappointed because the report did not contain some concrete recommendation in regard to settling this steel strike. In this respect I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and others who have spoken to the effect that the committee should have recommended the last proposals of the steel workers, which I think were very fair and realistic proposals, which were advanced with full knowledge of the situation, and which were modifications of the original proposals. I believe the committee should have recommended those proposals first to the controller, then to Mr. Brockington as the person who was to negotiate between the employers and the union, and, if that failed, I believe the committee should have recommended those proposals in its report to this house.

I am not going to go through the report, but I do want to deal with one or two sections. First, I should like to refer to section 3, which reads:

> Your committee recommends that a measure of union security should follow certification.

I think that is an unsatisfactory and ambiguous statement. As a matter of fact it means little. I think—and in this respect I agree with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll)—that following the experience of the last few months with the Rand formula as it is operating in the Ford plant, the committee would have been well advised to recommend the Rand formula in this report. If only that concrete proposal had been contained in the report this committee would have recommended to parliament something worth while.

The other section with which I wish to deal briefly is section 6, which reads:

> Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision, to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

I want to express my hearty disapproval of that section. On casual reading it does not sound very serious or dangerous, but it contains great implications, particularly in the way it could be administered. Some years ago, when the nazi party came into power in Germany, I remember reading the nazi labour code. Unfortunately I do not have a copy with me at the present time, or in my office, but that labour code contained a clause almost identical with section 6 of the report of the committee. I believe we must have a national labour code; I think that is one of the things that will come out of this report; at least that is generally expected by members of parliament. In that code, along with many other things, will have to be stated the methods for taking of a strike vote in any plant or any industry outside of that, the taking of a vote and the carrying out of the law as it may be expressed in a future national labour code must be the responsibility of the unions if we believe in democracy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read what the wage committee of the Canadian Congress of Labour has to say with regard to section 6, and I am sure this will be the opinion of organized labour throughout Canada:

> In mention of section 6 of the house committee's report—which proposed a government-supervised strike vote at the request of the employer or union—the wage committee called this "a direct attempt to smash the trade unions by taking away the rights of such unions and placing them in the hands of the employers, while hiding behind the skirts of the government, at the same time being a complete violation of order in council P.C. 1003 (the wartime labour code)."

I heartily agree with that statement, and I think the organized labour movement is very wise in taking immediate and strong objection to section 6 of the report.

We have had this report brought into the house and debated, Mr. Speaker, and later on I presume it will be concurred in. While as I say, I am somewhat disappointed in the report, as I know the country as a whole and the organized labour movement will be disappointed, I trust that when this debate is concluded this discussion will have had such an effect that when the next session of parliament convenes, all members of this house will be willing to work together to give effect to a genuine national labour code in this country.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have been very much impressed by the conflict of opinion as expressed by hon. members in different parts of the house. The functions of the committee on industrial relations have been discussed in many different ways. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has said the committee did not function in any way to good advantage. I have to disagree with the hon. member on that point. His leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) went a step farther and stated that he was opposed to the adoption of the committee's report. Well, I have to take issue with the hon. gentleman in that respect also. Having observed the sincerity of the committee in all its deliberations; knowing the opportunities it had to consider the pros and cons, more particularly of the present dispute in connection with steel, I fail to understand how the hon. member can see no good whatever in the report and can go to the extent of opposing it.

I wish to say a word of commendation to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) for the carefully thought-out speech he made to-day, and the capable manner in which he presented his views. With nearly everything he said I find myself in agreement. The hon. member has won my admiration as a true representative of labour.

Perhaps the most outstanding of all was the review by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I feel sure that the reception his speech received was an indication that he had convinced the house as to the sincerity of the committee, and the honest effort they made to reach an agreement as nearly unanimous as could be reached on such contentious matters. I have heard much comment from those in the ranks of labour which would indicate that the hon. member for Calgary West has his finger on the pulse of things, in the interests of labour, and the process of attempting to coordinate management and labour. I shall attempt to avoid repetition, and shall content myself by saying "hear, hear." to those portions of the remarks already made in which I concur, and more particularly those of the hon. members for Cape Breton South and Calgary West.

In my opinion there were ample witnesses called, appearing willingly before the committee, to present the opposing views of those engaged in the controversy in the steel industry. The witnesses were fair in their evidence, and gave much valuable information. It is not my custom to compliment those who are selected as chairmen of committees, because usually they are chosen because of their outstanding ability. The present instance was no exception. Our chairman was fair to everyone and attempted always and in every instance to give unbiased decisions.

Notwithstanding the fact that a few may disagree with the committee's finding, I am convinced that the public across Canada will have a much clearer understanding of the issues at present before the country than they would have had if the committee on industrial relations had not been appointed.

In the main the press has fully reported the proceedings of the committee, for which the public undoubtedly are grateful. I would not say that some of the editorial comment has been flattering; indeed, some of it has, in my view, had a slightly damaging effect. On the whole, however, I believe that from the press reports the public are better informed, as a result of the hearing which has been held.

As a member of the committee I am definitely of the opinion that the government has exposed itself to severe criticism because of the lack of coordination between labour boards and the wartime prices and trade board. It has failed to bring together those interests mostly concerned with the settlement of disputes, such as that with which we are now confronted. Obviously the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is bound to inherit much of that criticism, and perhaps rightly so, because he was supposed to be coordinating those various groups. I should hope that later on he would tell us the reasons for his actions in many instances.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not understand what my hon. friend means.

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall make myself clearer in a moment, and shall explain more fully what I have in mind. It may be said in fairness that the minister has certainly a tough assignment on his hands. I have known him a long time and I am convinced of his sincerity. But through him the government has reaped and is reaping severe criticism. The statement is often made on the street that the whole situation has got out of hand. Perhaps we may better judge the truth of that statement after the minister has reviewed what he has attempted to do; perhaps he can vindicate his position. I shall be interested to hear what he has to say in that connection.

I do not intend to deal with the several sections of the report, because that would be repetitious. It has been referred to by other hon. members who have spoken. Not only because I sat on the committee, but because of my contacts for a long time, I am convinced that the formation of labour groups, with collective bargaining, is the right of labour, so long as they do not attempt to take the law into their own hands. I believe that is conceded.

It is also apparent to all that price and wage coordination is a necessity. This is recognized by most people who are interested in the present difficulties. I believe, too, it is an established fact that practically all labour groups attempt to be fair in their demands. At least that has been my experience respecting those with which I have come in contact. I think that was borne out largely in the deliberations of the industrial relations committee. Likewise I must say from experience that I believe it is becoming more generally conceded week after week that most employers have the interests of their employees at heart and are learning to get closer to them. That is gratifying to me. I believe many others hold the same opinion. There are those of extreme views on both sides who may not agree with what I have said, but by and large that will be found to be the general opinion.

If the industrial relations committee has done nothing else it has focused attention on the methods which have been employed recently, largely by certain individuals, to stifle production. That may be a strong statement but I fear it is true. An early meeting of federal and provincial labour heads is urgently needed. The minister has indicated to the committee that he proposes at an early day to try to bring that into effect.

I am convinced that a national labour code in Canada is essential. If there be objections to it, I think it is about time that those objections should be aired, and let us find out what they are, and if there is some remedy which can be applied. The public must be informed on this issue also, so that we may try to coordinate the interests of labour and management across this country in an endeavour to find a pattern to avoid disputes of this kind.

I now turn more particularly to the present situation at Hamilton. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that there is a situation obtaining there which must be rectified. Either the controller is being what is commonly called "hamstrung" by somebody to whom he is answerable, or he is certainly not rising to the occasion and meeting his responsibilities. As the hon. member has said, if that is the case, and no satisfactory explanation is forthcoming, it is about time that a change was made there. The minister should make the position in that respect very clear. Perhaps this is one of the reasons why certain labour heads, in appearing before the committee, impressed upon us that they have a lost faith in the present government and the policies it has followed, more particularly in recent months.

Much has been said about the secret ballot. I have taken the trouble to discuss this with, not one or two, but dozens of men whom I consider to be the most sane and capable members of unions, men who have worked for industrial institutions as long as twenty years and more. I have gained much knowledge from those men; they have often discussed this matter with me. Let me say here to some of the labour heads that there is much criticism among their own ranks of the way the so-called secret ballot is conducted. Some of the best union men go so far as to charge that there has been manipulation in many cases when a strike vote is called or about to be called. That is an important point, and it has a considerable bearing on the conclusions which I have reached in the present issue. I suggest that, if labour heads desire to retain public confidence, coercion of their members will never promote their cause.

Much has been said about the influence of communism in certain labour groups. Let me say to all right-thinking members of any labour union or any other group that the type of individual whom they entrust with their leadership will in large measure gain or destroy public confidence. Of that I am convinced. If public confidence is once destroyed the cause of labour can never regain proper recognition. There is an old adage that anyone can lead a horse to water but nobody can make him drink. That adage applies in the present situation to both management and labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend permit me, with great regret, to interrupt him? Is he going to finish before five minutes to seven, or would he like to adjourn the debate, because there is some other business which is important.

Mr. LOCKHART: I can hardly finish in that time.

As I said, the influence of communism is being felt in many places. Where there is attempted coercion there is an apparent danger; to try to force either management or labour to do something which they feel they cannot do is merely provocative. I was deeply impressed by some of the remarks of the labour heads who appeared before the committee. In most of their presentations I found a great deal with which I could agree. I want, however, to refer particularly to a few things that I find I cannot agree with and with respect to which I still await answers to questions which I asked in committee. I am still at a loss to understand why there is so much insistence that the three steel plants now on strike must be considered as one unit. I am unable to find any explanation of that. I think the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) covered the point and I shall not repeat what he said in that connection, but I am largely in agreement with what he said on that subject. I am still convinced that much confusion and, I think, some damage have been caused by the insistence of labour that the three steel companies be considered as one unit because the interests of these companies are so diversified, their sources of raw material are so different and their costs of operation vary widely. I think those charged with the responsibility of calling the strike should reconsider that point.

I am also at a loss to understand why so many labour groups contend that every time there is a rise of one or two points in the cost of living there must be a corresponding increase in wages. It is my opinion—and I think this is borne out by what many others have said—that production will be the controlling factor or at least have very much to do with the cost of living in this country. I am optimistic enough to believe that if our production can be brought to the highest possible peak our worries about the cost of living will not be so apparent. So I ask the labour groups why it is that they are so insistent upon wage increases when, if production is only allowed to reach its peak in Canada, it will have a great deal to do with the cost of living in this country. If labour gets a five-cent increase every time there is a five-point rise in the cost of living, will labour be ready to take a corresponding decrease in wages in a business recession?

Talk to the man on the street, men earning their living in many different vocations, and you will find that they are puzzled over the insistence of labour on this point-for-point increase, an increase in wages always to accompany an increase in the cost of living, because the clerk in a store and the average wage-earner receives no such consideration. I think there should be a little more give and take amongst labour in that respect. I pointed that out in the committee and I still believe I am right.

I am also at a loss to understand why the 40-hour week was ever injected into this dispute at this time. In my opinion that demand was ill conceived. It was only last January that an attempt was made by law in the province of Ontario to regulate the hours of labour and bring about more uniformity by adopting the 48-hour week. But the ink was hardly dry on that law before certain labour groups across this country were demanding a 40-hour week. That is not reasonable. We must try out these changes. I say to labour groups that I think their demand for the 40-hour week was ill conceived. I may be wrong and I am open to be convinced, but that is my opinion.

Let me say to employers that they must observe the 48-hour week which is now the law in Ontario. They must give it a trial so that labour may get the benefit of it.

On motion of Mr. Lockhart, the debate was adjourned.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

CORPORATION TO RECEIVE LICENCE FEES—ADVANCES ON ACCOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (for the Minister of National Revenue) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, to provide (a) that the chairman shall be eligible to become a contributor and entitled to benefits under any established pension fund of the corporation; (b) for the tenure of office and reappointment of the general manager; (c) for deposit to the credit of the corporation all fees received from private receiving licences and private station broadcasting licences, without deduction of costs of collection and administration, and (d) authority to advance to the corporation sums up to two million dollars during the present fiscal year and such sums in subsequent years as may be authorized by parliament from time to time on account of capital expenditures.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 391, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at seven p.m.

Thursday, August 22, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC WORKS STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN—WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. Have salary increases been given to stationary engineers or firemen in the Department of Public Works at Ottawa since 1939?
2. If so, what increases were made and to whom?
3. Were increases recommended?
4. What overtime was worked over 48 hours per week and by whom?
5. Were these men paid for such overtime? If so, at what rate and in what manner?
6. What is the prevailing rate of pay for such engineers and firemen in private industry in the Ottawa area?
7. Were recommendations made since 1939 as to hours of work, overtime pay, or increased salaries or wages?
8. If so, what recommendations, when and by whom?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. By order in council P.C. 121/621, dated February 2, 1944, most stationary engineers in the department were given war duties supplements. Others, not included in the order in council, were granted war duties supplements in 1945, effective in 1944, by order in council P.C. 117/1111, dated February 21, 1945.

The salaries of stationary engineers and steam power plant engineers were revised as follows by order in council P.C. 137/2867, dated July 10, 1946, effective April 1, 1946.

Stationary engineer, heating, grade 1—$1,260-$1,380 to $1,380-$1,500.

Stationary engineer, heating, grade 2—$1,440-$1,560 to $1,500-$1,800.

Stationary engineer, heating, grade 3—$1,680-$1,920 to $1,800-$2,100.

Steam power plant engineer, $1,860-$2,220, to steam power plant engineer, grade 1, $2,100-$2,400.

Steam power plant engineer, $1,980-$2,520, to steam power plant engineer, grade 2, $2,400-$2,700.

(This revision in most cases would wipe out the war duties supplements granted in the previous orders in council.)

By order in council P.C. 17/2990, dated July 18, 1946, the salaries of firemen's helpers, fireman-labourers and firemen were increased as follows:—

Fireman's helper, $1,020-$1,080 to $1,080-$1,200.

Fireman's labourer, $1,140-$1,200 to $1,200-$1,380.

Fireman, $1,140-$1,260 to $1,200-$1,380.

2. Increases due to the revision of salaries indicated in the answer to question No. 1 are applicable to all stationary engineers and firemen in the public service in Canada.

3. Recommendations for the above increases are now being made by the Department of Public Works for each individual case; that is, pay certificates are being forwarded to the chief treasury officer for revision in pay.

4. During the past few years it has become increasingly difficult to obtain the services of sufficient heating staff and therefore practically every member of the staff has worked some overtime during the heating seasons.

5. These men were paid for such overtime by compensatory leave in lieu thereof. Such time was granted whenever possible, mostly during the summer when the heating plants were closed down.

6. The average prevailing rates of pay in private industry in Ottawa area are as follows:

Engineers, $100 to $130 a month.

Firemen, $85 a month.

7. Only as to increased salaries given in answer to question No. 1.

8. The recommendations for stationary engineers were made by the civil service commission on May 16, 1946, and approved by order in council P.C. 137/2867, dated July 10, 1946, and those for firemen on May 2, 1946, and approved by order in council P.C. 17/2990, dated July 18, 1946.

*OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT—MISS AGATHA CHAPMAN

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. When will a decision be reached by the law officers of the crown regarding the action to be taken concerning allegations against Miss Agatha Chapman made by the royal commissioners appointed by order in council P.C. 411 of 1946 in their final report?

2. Why has no action been taken similar to that against other persons accused by the royal commission?

3. If a decision regarding Miss Chapman's case has already been reached (a) what is that decision; (b) what action does the minister propose to take on the basis of that decision; (c) when will that action be taken?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I might be allowed to answer this question orally. With regard to the first part of the question I cannot say just on what date final decision will be taken. I discussed the matter again yesterday with the deputy minister of justice. There has been no difference between the course followed in this case and the course followed in other cases. Before charges are laid the deputy minister of justice wishes to have the opinion of outside counsel who will, if a prosecution is instituted, conduct the proceedings. Three of the senior counsel who had been retained for other prosecutions were sought to take charge of this one, or at least their offices were communicated with. It so happened that all three were away on holidays. Then there was a canvass made and it was found that many more lawyers are away at this time than members of parliament. It was with some difficulty that we were able to select a junior counsel to whom the whole of the papers were referred. The day before yesterday the deputy minister received a report from him which is a complete analysis of the facts and which it is desired to have checked by senior counsel. The deputy minister told me that the senior counsel he had in mind, who had been spoken to some time ago about this case, would be back from his vacation on Labour day. No time will be lost in taking such action as may be appropriate, as soon as the ordinary procedure followed by the department can be carried out.

I think that answers the other two paragraphs as well. The second asks why no action has been taken similar to that taken against other persons accused by the royal commission. I believe the explanation I have given answers that. The third paragraph asks if a decision has been made and, if so, what that decision is. A definite decision has not yet been reached, for the reasons I have given, but I can assure my hon. friend that I am as anxious as anyone can be that all these matters be disposed of promptly and in the regular way.

SALES OF LIQUOR

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What were the per capita sales for liquor by provinces for the last fiscal year?

Mr. MacKINNON:

Note.—The figures below based on sales as reported by the provincial liquor boards or commissions, are not comparable figures of liquor consumption by residents of the various provinces for the reasons stated below:

Per Capita Sales of Alcoholic Beverages in Provincial Fiscal Years ending in 1945

(Computed from sales by provincial liquor control boards and extra liquor board sales (i.e., by Breweries, etc.) where permitted)

	Sales per Head of Population
Nova Scotia	$30 80
New Brunswick	23 34
Quebec	21 27
Ontario	25 70
Manitoba	20 79
Saskatchewan	16 12
Alberta	24 90
British Columbia	30 94

1. The consumption of liquor by tourists is considerable and is heavier in some provinces than others.

2. The figures for certain provinces, e.g., Nova Scotia and British Columbia are inflated because of the accumulation of service personnel in these provinces in 1945.

3. The methods of accounting are not uniform as between the various provincial liquor boards.

4. There is considerable variation in methods of sale in the different provinces. In some provinces the figures represent sales to final consumers only; in others they represent sales to intermediaries as well.

5. The provincial fiscal years vary, hence the figures do not refer to identical periods of time.

JAPANESE—REPATRIATION—MENTAL HOSPITAL PATIENTS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Under what authority was Kosho Matano sent to Japan?

2. Of the fifteen persons of Japanese origin in mental hospital in British Columbia who were sent to Japan at their own request, how many were (a) Japanese nationals; (b) naturalized Canadians; (c) Canadian born?

3. How was the request for repatriation obtained from these fifteen mental hospital patients?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Upon his own request for repatriation under the provisions of P.C. 7355 of December 15, 1945.

2. (a) 12; (b) 3; (c) nil.

3. A request was made to the provincial mental hospital authorities in each case by the repatriate and subsequently affirmed to officers of the Department of Labour and the said hospital authorities.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT-OWNED COMPANIES—ADVERTISING AND PUBLICITY

Mr. DANIEL:

What is the total amount paid by government-owned companies since their inception for (a) advertising; (b) publicity, including publicity personnel?

UNITED NATIONS

INVITATION TO ATTEND GENERAL ASSEMBLY—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if any invitation has yet come to the Canadian government to attend the sessions of the second part of the general assembly at New York, which I understand is called for September 23. At the same time may I ask if any suggestion has come to the government from that organization that the sittings of the general assembly be postponed until such time as the Paris peace conference has reached some degree of finality?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): To the first part of the question I think the answer should be in the affirmative. What has been received by the Canadian government is official notification from the secretary general that the second part of the general assembly will convene in New York on September 23. It is not couched in the terms of an invitation, but it is an official notification to members of the general assembly of the date for the resumption of the meeting. To the second part of the question the answer is no; no suggestion of postponement has been made to the Canadian government.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I express the hope that if the general assembly is to convene on the date indicated, it will not follow the example of the early days of the Paris peace conference, because I do not think a world which is seeking peace could stand two performances of that kind going on at the same time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure publicity will be given to the views expressed by the hon. member, and I hope proper notice will be taken of them.

MOTOR VEHICLES

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PRICE OF FORD TRACTOR REPAIR PARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) asked the following question:

Was the Ford Motor Company authorized to increase the price of Ford tractor repair parts by 20 per cent on or about August 3?

The answer is that as a result of price increases in the United States, the wartime prices and trade board passed order No. 638 allowing importers of farm machinery, after written authorization from the administrator of farm and construction machinery and municipal service equipment, to increase their June 14, 1946, maximum prices by the exact amount of increase in their landed cost. Under the terms of this order, on July 22, 1946, the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited at Windsor was authorized to increase wholesale prices of imported tractor repair parts by 20·55 per cent. Dealers buying such parts for resale are not permitted to add the same percentage increase to retail price, but are restriced to an increase equal to the actual dollar increase in cost.

MILK

QUESTION OF CONTINUANCE OF SUBSIDY OF 55 CENTS PER 100 POUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) asked a question with regard to the subsidy on milk. No change is contemplated in the government policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on May 16 last, namely that the producer milk subsidy will be discontinued on September 30 next.

Control of the prices of milk and cream was transferred from the wartime prices and trade board to the provincial milk boards, effective June 1, 1946.

Mr. SENN: I understood the Minister of Agriculture to tell the house the other day that the matter was under advisement, and that a decision had not been reached. Does the parliamentary assistant mean, then, that a decision has been reached, and that there will be no further subsidy on milk?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I will answer that question. The answer is yes

WAR ASSETS

MOTORCYCLES DECLARED SURPLUS BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) directed an inquiry as to the procedure to be followed with respect to certain questions he had sought to place on the order paper and which had been directed to the committee on war expenditures and economies. I have had an investigation made as to these questions, and find that they have been answered in that committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have the answers been published?

Mr. McILRAITH: Part of them are printed and part are not yet printed. As far as I know, the last issue of the proceedings of that committee is not yet available in printed form.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if that printing is to be done at once?

Mr. McILRAITH: Oh, yes, I understand so. It is likely to be in at any time. It is in the hands of the printers.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. GRAYDON: There is not much use in answering questions unless the answers are published.

Mr. McILRAITH: Unfortunately sometimes there is some delay in the printing.

Mr. FRASER: May I ask if the questions answered are those dealing with the armed services or those dealing with war assets?

Mr. McILRAITH: Both.

Mr. FRASER: That is wonderful.

FEED GRAIN

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO OVERCOME SHORTAGE ON CAPE BRETON ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Some days ago I wrote the Minister of Agriculture concerning the shortage of hay and grain in Cape Breton. As I have not received an answer to my letter, Mr. Speaker, with your permission I shall direct the question to the acting minister.

This year the hay and grain crops on Cape Breton Island are about one-third of the average, owing to a very dry season, and the farmers will be compelled to kill a large number of their cattle unless hay and grain can be obtained elsewhere. My question is, will the government assist the Cape Breton farmers to obtain the necessary feed for their cattle by paying all or part of the freight rates on this feed from Ontario and Quebec, or wherever the hay and grain may be obtained, since the farmers are not able to pay these costs themselves?

Hon. JOSEPH JEAN (Solicitor General): I take notice of the hon. member's question and will have the matter examined at once.

FIELD MARSHAL MONTGOMERY

ARRANGEMENTS FOR VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may I refer to press dispatches to the effect that General Montgomery is coming to Canada in sealed quarters on board ship, that he will be the guest of the Canadian government while he is here, and that he follows a very strict diet. I wonder if the Canadian government has got in touch with the imperial government so that General Montgomery may follow strictly the same diet in Canada that he follows elsewhere, in order to avoid an intra-imperial crisis?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In reply I would say it would be a good thing if some members in the house were in sealed quarters.

SALES OF LIQUOR

OMISSION FROM RETURN OF FIGURES FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a return just brought down, giving on a per capita basis the consumption of liquor by provinces. The file has been denuded of the figures for Prince Edward Island. I wonder if the minister would check that.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sorry if there is no figure for Prince Edward Island. I shall check it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does it mean that they do not consume liquor there?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think that is correct, no.

Mr. POULIOT: That question has no relation to mine.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, August 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde for concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night at seven o'clock, at which time there was some slight interruption to deal with the continuity of business in the house, I was speaking about the forty-hour week, and there is reference in the press to-day to certain labour demands across the country in this respect. I said then that I thought it was ill-conceived, and referred to the fact that the 48-hour week provision had been placed on the statute books of Ontario as recently as January 1 of this year. I expressed the opinion that it should have been tried out for at least a period of time before any attempt was made to drop hours of labour down to forty hours per week.

Much criticism has been launched against the so-called ten-cent pattern credited to the provincial board, and approved at least in theory by the present government. Let me say here that I am just as definitely opposed to rigid patterns such as the 40-hour week as I am to the ten-cent wage pattern which has been criticized, and especially at a time when the country faces a crisis. In my opinion it is ill-conceived to try to force the forty-hour week, in the light of many complications which have arisen. If hon. members will bear with me for only a few minutes I shall endeavour to show how this reduction of hours works out, and will illustrate by citing one case which I know is common to many thousands across Canada, in connection with the working out of the 48-hour week. This is not a hypothetical case, but one within my own personal experience.

I have in my files a considerable number of letters from small employers, which I shall not attempt to read. However, the particular instance I have in mind concerns an employer who has from forty to fifty employees. Long before the war this man assisted financially some seven or eight of his employees to get small houses. He lent them small amounts of money, and allowed them to use their—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out there is so much noise in the chamber that it is disagreeable not only to the hon. member who has the floor, but also to those who want to listen.

Mr. LOCKHART: Mr. Speaker, when the side discussions end, I shall proceed. I was pointing out that I have on my files much evidence to support what I am about to say. Before the war this particular employer, whom I have known for thirty or thirty-five years, had forty or fifty employees on his payroll, and he had assisted at least seven or eight of them in securing small houses. He lent them small amounts of money and did many other things for their assistance. He allowed them to use his trucking equipment in the erection of those houses. Long before this so-called blue-plan for hospital care became known, this man had worked out a scheme under which his employees would contribute a small amount per week, and he matched their contributions dollar for dollar in order to provide social security for them. I could go on at length, setting out the various things he did to help them. The employees were permitted to control the payment of this money. At times when there were hospital emergencies, doctors' bills, the arrival of children in the families, dental care and many other obligations, $25 or $50 was always available through that fund. The fund was set up in trust, and the expenditures were controlled by the employees. The employer did all sorts of things like that. Needless to say the esprit de corps in that plant was good, and, what is more, the employer and his employees were drawn more closely together by these arrangements.

I thought of this when I listened to one hon. member who said, I believe it was in connection with the steel strike at Hamilton, that Mr. Brockington had to introduce the head of the industry to the head of the union. This kind of thing shows the necessity of getting closer together. In the case I have cited the employees were working from 52 to 54 hours per week. The employer called in his men and he said, "From January 1 you will be working only 48 hours a week, but we are going to continue to give you the same take-home pay. This is going to cost us from $8,000 to $10,000, but we will do our best to absorb the added expense." He continued, and I have correspondence to confirm what he said, "Remember we expect your hundred per cent cooperation. We have had to work largely under ceiling prices with the goods we distribute, and the added cost for labour will come out of our profits. Our turnover must be kept up, or our earnings will decrease." That was the conversation about which he has written. He said, "If we work together perhaps it will work out; we are willing to do our part." He added one thing more which is very significant. He said, "If our turnover decreases and our earnings are depleted, it will become necessary because of this reduction to 48 hours to put on five or six more men in order to get out the work." It was pointed out that this would mean increased overhead. I think this goes to show the position in which the small employer is placed. The men rallied around the employer and everything went well for a few months. Then this present unrest—this is the part I want to emphasize—started to creep into the ranks of these forty to fifty men, and trouble started. I have a letter yesterday setting out the details. Four or five of the men said that they were going to work only 40 hours a week from now on. There was a reduction from 52 to 54 hours to 48 hours a week; but what is going to happen when the 40-hour week is put into effect?

Our whole system of employment is being disrupted by these tactics. This employer also writes that his truck drivers have become dissatisfied. An organizer has come in trying to get them into the truck drivers' union or something. These drivers have dropped into their old habits of stopping at the beer parlour and taking on a few glasses of beer. This man's overhead is piling up and he writes me that yesterday he posted a notice that as of September 1 there will be a reduction of five per cent in wages. This is made necessary because earnings have been going down. This is an example of the vicious circle that is created by this sort of thing, and I am convinced that it is illustrative of thousands of similar cases across the country. If these things do not work out it, in the end, will reflect upon the workers themselves. It is high time that an opportunity was given for a general discussion of the whole matter.

I should like to say just a word about law and order. The public are becoming exasperated at the flagrant violations of the laws of our land by all parties concerned. You hear talk of this on the streets and on the trains. Public opinion is demanding some action, and is holding the governing parties responsible for the maintenance of law and order. The most definite criticism falls in the lap of the federal government who are responsible for the setting up of the wartime prices and trade board, the regional war labour boards, the national war labour board and all other government bodies. This is the result of their policy. That is what the people are saying.

I am trying to discuss this thing without rancour or prejudice; I am trying to be fair and present the case as I know it. That is what is being said on the streets. The people say, "If our laws are wrong, let the federal government correct them and then see that they are enforced." Make no mistake about it; the public are not going to be hoodwinked much longer with this kind of thing. Employer and employee are insisting that it stop at once.

As I say, I am trying to express myself without prejudice. My sympathies are with the employers as well as with the employees. They all have their problems. They are being made to suffer because of a lack of cooperation between the controlling bodies. Nothing will be gained by setting up industrial relations committees unless all the conflicting interests are prepared to sit down and inject into their discussions a little bit of the milk of human kindness. I have simply tried to show by giving one example, and I could give many—I could recite some of my own personal experiences—how this thing works out.

I hear someone say, "Oh, you will not get anywhere with that sob stuff, with that sympathetic strain; it is a fight to the finish." That is what many are saying. That fight to the finish will ruin our very economy, and that is what I am alarmed about. I have talked with many union men and with many employers, especially during the last weeks when the committee was sitting, and I know that they are alarmed. With the consent of the house I should like to give a short summary.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to recite a personal experience that occurred last Sunday morning which I think indicates what is in the hearts and minds of the people. A mother of four children ranging from six to fifteen years of age came to me last Sunday morning. She told me that she was desperate because her husband had become a different man during the last few months. She said, "I do not know whether this is the result of the war or not. He was always a faithful husband and took care of his family. We had our home nearly paid for from his earnings in one of the industries, and we were very happy and proud over what we had accomplished." She said, "He seems to have been influenced in some way, something that I cannot lay my finger on. He does not seem to care whether his wife and family are provided for. He has said to me, 'I am not going to work any more than forty hours from now on, and I am going to have certain wages. If I don't get a certain amount of wages I am not going to work.'" This woman said to me, "I don't know what's come over this husband of mine, Mr. Lockhart. We are heading for disaster in my family. I understand there is a committee at Ottawa dealing with this question, and I am just giving you my personal experience. This husband of mine and his employer years ago used to work and live harmoniously together, and in those days he spoke highly of his employer. But someone has changed, Mr. Lockhart, and I am inclined to think that it is my husband who has changed at heart." That is just a humble woman's presentation of what is in the hearts and minds of people as a result of this sinister agitation that is going on all across this country.

The industrial relations committee have made a good report. They have done all they could. They carried on rational discussions under able guidance, and they have brought in their recommendations. If the government will only act upon them, those recommendations can form the basis of something valuable that can be done to improve labour relations. They represent the consensus of thirty-five men who worked conscientiously on that committee studying the situation, and if the government will live up to their responsibility, they will read, mark and inwardly digest the committee's report. I certainly will approve that report. I plead with all the factions who are involved in this terrific struggle for supremacy and who are putting forward formulas, be they ten cents an hour increase or the forty-hour week—I plead with them: Stop, please, in the interests of the great public, in the interests of that poor mother with four children who is worrying her life out over her social insecurity. I say: Stop flying at one another's throats like pet bulldogs. Let us sit down and see if we cannot work out something to preserve our way of life, which at the present moment we are fighting to maintain.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to follow the argument of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) but I hope he will not therefore assume that I agree with what he says. I most heartily disagree with his point of view, but since it is only fractional in relation to the main issue I shall not spend time in replying to his argument now.

The question before this house is concurrence in the report of the industrial relations committee, which was appointed to investigate one of the major problems of modern civilization. There is no greater problem confronting Canada to-day or confronting any other capitalist nation on earth than this question of industrial strife, practically open warfare between the employers and the employees. It is not a new occurrence; it is not born of the war. It has been growing constantly for over two centuries, and as the problem develops and becomes more and more acute, strikes are more frequent and more violent, and so the problem grows.

I am sorry that I cannot support the report of the committee. While the committee may have done some fairly good work, I think on the whole it was a complete failure. It spent most of its time, and properly so, in investigating the steel strike. But it has shown fear or a lack of interest in bringing forward any solution or any suggestion of a solution for the steel strike or any other strike.

Several hon. members have said that the committee's chief value has been in the education which has been imparted to the public on industrial relations. I would just like to know, sir, what education that was. It imparted none to me, and I fail to see what it could have imparted to anyone else.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) gave I think the most lucid and comprehensive review of the entire proceedings of that committee. I was amused by his definition of industrial relations. I think there must have been some confusion in his mind between that natural impulse of human nature to improve the conditions of life and the means by which life is made possible, and the real industrial warfare of modern civilization. At any rate his concept of industrial relations and of industrial unrest was put forward by analogy when he told us that when you saw a savage of the rough stone age fashioning a tool out of rock, that was industrial unrest; and when you saw some who had made a superior mousetrap, that also was industrial unrest. Well, we can stand a good deal of that kind of industrial unrest, I may tell my hon. friend. But the kind of industrial unrest which this committee was to deal with was a very different kind of unrest from the making of stone tools or the making of a mousetrap or anything else that may be implied in that analogy. The problem has been greatly accelerated by the very principle to which the hon. gentleman referred, namely, that every discovery and every new invention in our technological advance has but increased industrial unrest and made it more difficult for a large section of the public to live, whereas it should have made it much easier for them to live, and to live on a very much higher standard.

The hon. member for Calgary West quoted Mr. Conroy to the effect that all the world is going socialist or communist, and the hon. member for Calgary West agreed with that view. It seems that he thought the situation which threatened to terminate in socialism or communism so desperate that the Conservatives called a caucus, and the result of that Conservative caucus was the proposal of the hon. member for Calgary West which resulted in the committee's taking over this inquiry into industrial unrest. The hon. member proceeded to review the evidence; and without following him step by step in that review I immediately rushed to his conclusion, which was that nothing was proven: that was his conclusion. After all the investigation it has resulted in nothing. He said that he was not convinced that a case had been made out by Mr. Donald Gordon for a ten cent maximum increase in wages, but while he was not convinced that a case had been made out, he was so desperately afraid there might be something in it that he was utterly paralyzed and took no action in the committee on the matter. Apparently a majority of the committee did likewise. He was equally convinced that labour had failed to make out a case, and so "not proven" was the verdict of the hon. member for Calgary West in his summing up of the evidence before this committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask, was it not possible to prove, could not the committee have got the evidence to prove, that $33.60 a week, the amount asked by labour now on strike, was the minimum required for the preservation of health and self-respect? Was it not possible to provide the evidence which would prove whether that amount was too great, or too little, or sufficient? Again: was it not possible to prove that the industry could or could not pay the amount of increase asked by the striking steel workers? If it was possible to prove these things in that committee, I say that the committee reported too soon; it reported before the evidence was in, and it reported "nothing proven".

I say also, sir, that if the steel industry cannot pay $33.60 a week to the workers in that industry, Canada cannot afford to have a steel industry. The committee was the only body that ever considered the issue in which there was any semblance of representation of the public, and it was for them to say whether we can afford that industry or not if it cannot pay that amount of wages. It will not do for hon. members to try to cram communism into this issue. It would have been laughable, were it not so tragic, that various hon. members should try to raise the communist bogy and the socialist bogy in connection with this clear-cut industrial dispute. I wish that those hon. members who are afraid of socialism and afraid of communism would realize that the kind of thing they are saying and the kind of thing they are approving will lead to the downfall of their present system; and they might thank socialists in this corner for being ready to take over when they are through, because they are going to be through.

Mr. JAQUES: That will be too bad for the C.C.F.

Mr. IRVINE: They are going to be through. I do not understand the significance of my hon. friend's remark about its being too bad.

Mr. JAQUES: It will be a sorry day for them if that happens.

Mr. IRVINE: Perhaps he is not quite aware of what he said himself, so we will let it pass. But I want to advance some reasons why the committee should have inquired also whether or not the steel companies should have been granted an increase of $5 a ton on pig iron. As I see it now, there are a great many reasons which would go to prove that the company should never have been permitted to get that increase. Surely the matter should have been inquired into and the proofs found. Naturally that increase would mean higher prices on all products in which steel is used. Increased prices would mean more inflation; and if the government and the companies are so much afraid of inflation, why do they take the steps which lead directly to it? An increase in the price of steel would lead to a demand by the workers for a corresponding increase of wages to absorb the increase in price which they would have to pay, and so, on would go the march towards the inflation which the government and the companies appear to be so much afraid of.

I would say next that the progressive improvement in tons per hour and yields of civilian goods by these companies since the war ended would indicate that their income can be sufficiently large without any increase in the prices at all. Stelco, for example, from 1940 to 1944 was in the excess profits brackets, and if it had not been for very extensive use of the legal devices provided for companies to evade extraordinarily heavy taxation it would have paid very heavy income tax indeed.

Mr. McCANN: It did, too.

Mr. IRVINE: I will show what it did. The legal means which it used was, of course, the accelerated depreciation principle, and very substantial transfer of funds to pension funds; but even after it had absorbed in these ways all that legally could be put away, namely about $3,000,000, it had remaining a net profit or a taxable income of $4,159,000. The wartime prices and trade board as well as the committee accepted the company's figures on costs and profits without any investigation. I do not think that that would happen with any other body. When labour wants something it has to prove its case very thoroughly. I imagine that the wartime prices and trade board took their figures from government statistics, and government statistics are the figures of companies which have not been checked by government as to their accuracy. I think that before any company is granted the right to increase its prices it should be required to come before a public hearing and prove by opening its books that it has the right to such a claim. That was not done in the case of this company and others that are applying for an increase in prices.

While I am on that point may I say that it was necessary for this committee's work, if it had undertaken its job properly, to investigate the cost of living in relation to the increase in wages which the workers are seeking. The crucial point is, first, whether their wages are high enough now, or whether they need the increase which they are asking for; second, whether the companies concerned can afford to pay the wage asked.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There are at least one hundred pages of evidence on that.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes; I am going to show my hon. friend that the people who could give the proper evidence were not even called. When you want to find out the costs of a company's operation you call the company directors or its management to tell you. When you want to know the cost of living you should call the wives of the striking steel workers to tell you how much it costs to keep five children in school, to feed them, to clothe them, to educate them and to look after the homes.

Mr. BURTON: They are worried only about the widows and orphans afterwards.

Mr. IRVINE: If that was investigated I find no evidence of it, apart from the interjection of the hon. member for Calgary West. If the question of wages was investigated then I want to know from him whether it was proven or disproven. Was $33.60 a week shown to the committee to be too great an increase in wages? It was not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was not even attempted.

Mr. IRVINE: I noticed that the hon. member for Lethbridge made that point very clear in his speech on this vital question. The issues were never touched at all, yet the company's figures were accepted and the company's increases given without question either by the board in question or by the committee. This committee, which was a complete failure, either should never have been appointed, or should be sent back to do its job properly. The house must endorse its failure or insist on results. I do not know which alternative the house will decide, but I certainly am going to vote against what it has done so far. If it should go back to try it over again, I shall be glad to see it have the opportunity.

The submission of the steel companies for a price increase should be reexamined. If the wartime prices and trade board does not undertake it, then the committee on industrial relations should carry on the investigation.

When men strike for a slight increase in wages one hears a great deal of talk about the public interest, but I wish to point out that the public is quite as much interested when the price of steel is increased, quite as much interested when the price of gasoline is increased, as they are in the case of a wage increase. I suggest to you, sir, that that is a matter for public hearing. That public hearing should be demanded by the house from now on in the case of every company which comes asking for an increase in prices.

As I said a few moments ago, industrial strife, which is now politely called "unrest," is of long standing, and it is growing progressively worse, because a strike anywhere affects people everywhere. We are so completely tied together in a network of industrial relations that when a strike takes place in one part of the country it affects practically all other parts of the economy. Also strikes are brought about more rapidly in these days because the effect of invention and technological progress is to speed up the cycle of production, and without a corresponding speeding up of the cycle of consumption there must be industrial chaos.

Of course the public interest cannot be ignored. A strike in a basic industry such as steel if it continues for any length of time, will most assuredly cause a shut-down in other industries. In addition, the public is interested because it wants goods, it wants to be served, and it does not want to see anything stop that service. But let me say, sir, that as well as having an interest in them the public must accept some responsibility for these things. It is all very well for us to say that in the interests of the public, industry must go on no matter what happens. I would say that the public has a responsibility to see that industries go on, but it also has a responsibility to see that industries must not be allowed to continue to go on at the expense of the sweat and blood of the working people in it.

In reviewing the proceedings of the committee's study of the strike I cannot find that any attempt was made to deal with the causes of strikes generally, other than to say that apparently they are something which comes out of the head of a communist, that there are no real economic causes. Any committee which is going to find a formula for a situation of this kind surely must go a little deeper in its studies than this committee went. If strikes and industrial unrest are to be brought to an end, surely the causes of these things must be determined by any committee which inquiries into them.

I suppose it would not be well received by the house if at this time I were to give my views as to these causes. I shall refrain from doing so at this time in the hope that on some future occasion I shall have a better opportunity; but I cannot refrain from a criticism of the committee for failing to search for and find that cause, since the matter was referred to it. The economic causes of all strikes of the past and all that will happen in the future were not touched at all; therefore we can hardly expect any formula of real value until these causes have been brought to the surface and removed.

I think I may conclude by saying that the large corporations in question in this strike have a very great influence on government. I do not mean only on this government as a Liberal government; I mean on any government. Their economic position in the country is so powerful that they would have a similar influence on any government as long as that power remained in their hands. To make clear what I mean, I would say I have been looking over the great network of leading industrial and financial institutions of whose board the directors of the Steel Company of Canada and the other steel companies are members. After looking over that network I would say that the government of Canada could not successfully float a major loan without its assistance. If the government should find it necessary very shortly to float a major loan to absorb the surplus money which there are no goods to offset, or if the government should find it necessary to launch into great public undertakings for the winning of the peace as we did for the winning of the war, I say that without the assistance of these directors and the companies they direct, that loan could not be successful. Therefore I say that the directors of these companies are part of the invisible government of Canada, and the invisible government is more powerful than the visible government.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I say this session should not close until this steel strike is settled. There is nothing to be gained by merely approving the report of this committee. That will settle nothing. It will not even touch the subject. The situation is serious and is very likely to become more serious. Other great strikes are looming up. The industry of Canada is threatened with paralysis. This house represents the public of Canada, the common people of Canada. This parliament and this government have responsibilities which they must discharge. I say it would be criminal folly to pass this by lightly or to close this house before this matter has been settled, whether that is done by sending the committee back to work or by the government accepting a new policy and announcing it in this house, and going forth to put it into operation. That is largely for the government to decide, but that it should be decided one way or the other, and that this house should remain in session until this matter has been settled, I have not the slightest doubt in the world.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I just say to my hon. friend that if we have many more speeches like that, strikes will never be settled.

Mr. IRVINE: If my hon. friend made that interjection for my benefit, then I have to retort that if we have many more ministers of labour like my hon. friend we shall never have anything but strikes.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate very carefully, because while I was not a member of the industrial relations committee, I represent a riding which surrounds Hamilton and takes in about one-third of that city, territorially. I do not propose to take up the time of the house in abusing other hon. members or answering their arguments, but I do not agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). I want it clearly understood that I hold no brief for capital. I am not a member of the Hamilton Club. I am not being dictated to by anyone, and I never have been; my record shows that. But law and order must be maintained in the city of Hamilton as well as every other part of Canada; and that law and order must be maintained and safeguarded by every sincere and honest trade unionist. The laws of this country must be upheld. On August 14 I was quoted in the press, in connection with the disturbances at Hamilton, as follows:

"This rabble has done more to damage the case of labour in Canada than anything that has happened in several years . . . The disturbances at Hamilton city hall last week were outrageous and I blame it mainly on the mayor, Sam Lawrence. I want it clearly understood that I am in favour of trade unions but I believe that strikes should be conducted in an orderly manner and I do not believe that the intimidation which is going on at Hamilton should be permitted. It savours very much of Moscow and I think it is being directed from there."

Mr. Lennard referred to more than 2,000 men who have shown they are not in sympathy with the strike, by remaining on work at the works of the Steel Company of Canada. Because of the violent tactics of the strikers these men are besieged within the company's property and are unable to pass between their homes and their work. "Under our system of government that condition should never be permitted to occur," Mr. Lennard declared.

That was my honest opinion on August 14, and it is most certainly my opinion this morning. The following morning, August 15, I received a telegram from one Eamon Park, a representative of the United Steelworkers of America, which began as follows:

Your inflammatory speech to-day completely misrepresents Hamilton and its citizens. Police officials here do not agree that state of lawlessness exists.

Now I wish to refer to an item which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator of August 16:

Commenting on last Thursday's disturbance at city hall, Alfred Stratford, president of local 504, united electrical workers, declared: "The people of Hamilton have nothing to be ashamed about. Controller Nora Frances Henderson lost a few locks of her hair. You won a great victory with your demonstration of solidarity. If it had not been for that demonstration, he said, Controller Henderson would have succeeded in having a request made for the entry of provincial police.

Now listen to this:

The public, he declared, "scared certain members of council and they voted against their own convictions in voting against the controller's motion."

If that is not terrorism and intimidation, then I do not understand the laws of this country nor the English language. This general shut-down in Canada, if it is not halted, will create disastrous conditions that will make the general strike of 1919 in Winnipeg seem very insignificant. It took Winnipeg years to recover. The present situation, if it is not settled soon, will affect at least the greater part of Canada, and could put industrial centres back some twenty years. In the present dispute some labour leaders, in my opinion, are not interested in ten cents or twelve cents of any other figure. Their principal interest is in the check-off and in creating a dictatorship in this country. Their interest is in forcing men to join a union against their will, and in my opinion this is so undemocratic it should never be tolerated. The C.I.O. is much more interested in disrupting our economy, in substituting the hammer and sickle for the union jack, and in creating a dictatorship, than in doing anything for the workingmen; and the sooner the people of Canada realize that and get on with the production of the many things that are urgently required, the better.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. LENNARD: I did not interrupt you; so just hold your horses.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. LENNARD: I am not quoting from anything; I am just saying what I think.

Mr. IRVINE: What are you reading?

Mr. LENNARD: I am only reading for a minute or two, and I have seen you read for half an hour.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Who wrote this for you?

Mr. LENNARD: I never interrupt any hon. member in the house, and I do not want to be interrupted by members of that group—not "party."

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Let us not have these interruptions.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there not a rule in the house which says that speeches should not be read?

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, let us be fair about this. Let the hon. member not be too self-righteous, because I have seen him read speeches.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I beg your pardon; you have not.

Mr. GRAYDON: They would have been better if they had been read.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us be fair about it. The hon. member may not agree with what is being said. This is something the hon. member does.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The leader of the C.C.F. party is the best reader in the house.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When did you see me read my speech?

Mr. GRAYDON: Let us have less hypocrisy.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I must ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. LENNARD: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the interruptions. But I was merely following my notes, and I would also assure the hon. member that I have never yet, by those who know me, been accused of having anything written for me by anybody.

In conclusion, sir, I repeat that no one is more favourable to unions than I am. But let men have freedom of choice and freedom of association. Let them run their unions without outside interference, and we shall have far less unrest in this country.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am going to emulate the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Lennard), by being brief. There are only one or two points I wish to bring up, inasmuch as I sat through the sittings of the committee.

When the committee was appointed a crisis existed in the economy of the country. It dealt first with the steel strike in Hamilton. All other negotiations in connection with wages ceased in the major strikes across the country. In other words it was generally recognized that if this committee came out with a recommendation, it would apply all across the board. But during the meetings of the committee, any time we ever got near to coming out with a formula for settlement, it was brought to our attention in a very forceful manner that the committee had not been set up to settle anything. In other words, when negotiations had ceased all across the board, pending the adoption of some formula by that committee, all the committee did in the last five weeks in the light of present-day events was to dangle a carrot in front of the workers' noses. Now they have not even the carrot to sniff.

So far as I am concerned, if at any future time I have anything to do with such a committee I will first go out and tell the workers of this country, "Beware of it; pay no more attention to parliamentary committees". If in a crisis such as this a parliamentary committee representing parliament itself has no power whatsoever when all other machinery has broken down, then I say this country is getting into a pitiful state.

Throughout the meetings of the committee the point which was brought to my attention most forcibly was that labour was dealt with as though it were a cost factor in production—nothing more and nothing less; that the question was considered from the point of view that the laws of this country must be applied when private interests are in danger. It was not a case of the law coming down and dealing equally with one person as against another. The law comes down to protect the formula that labour is a cost factor in production.

Time and again the question was asked, "If markets fall and if profits go down, will you accept a lower wage, in view of the fact that at the present time in the face of rising costs you are demanding a rising wage? In other words when production becomes too great will you accept a smaller wage?" Well, if that line of argument continues under our present basis, the powers that be are going to find, to their sorrow, that labour is not just a cost factor in production, but that it is a social force. After we had sat for five or six weeks in the committee, trying to solve present problems, a minister of the crown says in the house that strikes have got to the point where they will solve themselves. In other words, what you are doing is allowing natural forces in society to drift; nothing "is", it is always "becoming".

When you say that strikes are getting to the point where they will solve themselves, and when a Minister of Labour says that we do not need the type of legislation we are asking for and that we should have the same relationship as they have in Great Britain, where employees and employers recognize each other—if you admit that, you will also have to admit that we shall have to go through the history of British labour-capital relations. For all we know, we may be at that point in Canada which Great Britain had reached in 1926—and you will have a general strike on your hands.

Labour at the present time recognizes that the key point is Stelco. If the boss wins there, it means that they have the entering wedge to wreck the whole labour movement in this dominion. And labour, recognizing that, will be forced to use its economic strength; because labour is better educated in this country than it ever was before. They recognize it, from coast to coast, and they will pull the pin on all industry. And remember this, that when a general strike breaks out it is not only an economic strike; it is a political force. Immediately it transforms itself into that, whether there be agitators then or not. Labour is forced to recognize that it is up against a state force—a state force that is saying, "You are a cost factor in production, and nothing more." When that comes out, what happens is that labour becomes politicized; it becomes a political force. Who gains control of that political force, we do not know. One thing we do know is that they will act in their own best interests, either slowly or with a great deal of speed as the case may be. That is the position labour is facing to-day. If a general strike is to come through the development of an unconscious drift in these affairs, I as a trade unionist and a member of the House of Commons will have to support it, inasmuch as it has been caused by the stupidity of government.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the attention of the house should be called once again to some simple and straightforward truths about the matter we are now discussing. The industrial relations committee was asked by this house to deal with the present industrial unrest in Canada. While the terms of reference of the committee did not refer specifically to steel, it was clearly understood that therein was the most critical issue facing the country, and accordingly the committee devoted practically the whole of its time to the dispute with the steel companies. Surely it was the job of the committe to come to grips with that issue and make a report that would somehow settle the matter, but the simple fact is that the committee did not achieve a settlement of that dispute, nor has it made in its report to the house any recommendation that deals with the basic issue. The report contains in a platitudinous way some recommendations that are all to the good, but those recommendations are offset, at least in the view of some of us, by the recommendation in clause 6 which organized labour regards as a retrograde step.

I listened a moment ago to the hon. member to my right, with whose general position I do not agree, and I heard him speak most strongly in support of labour unions being permitted to run their own affairs without outside interference. I for one am not satisfied that the wording of clause 6 of the report will not violate that very principle. The recommendations of the report are either platitudinous or questionable. Further, the report has the outstanding liability that it does not deal with the basic issue in the steel dispute, the question of wages, whether the ten cent straitjacket is to be applied or whether higher levels are to be agreed to.

For this house merely to indulge in the oratory we have had for the last two or three days and to concur in this report would in my view be a failure on its part to do its duty. If we go home without making some definite decision, then the members of this house will be partly responsible for the situation which now obtains.

There are two things which this House of Commons should do. First, it should register a protest over the failure of the committee to do its job. I listened to the glowing accounts of harmony in the committee, the praise of the chairman and all that, but the simple fact is that there is before us no recommendation from the committee with reference to the matter at issue, namely wage rates in steel. As I say, one of the things that we in this House of Commons must do is to protest in the most effective way we can against the failure of the committee to do its job.

The other thing which I feel this House of Commons should do at this time is to place the responsibility clearly where it lies, namely, on the shoulders of the government. If we merely concur in this report and go home, we shall have provided an out for the whole situation, and it can then go on from bad to worse. It is my intention before resuming my seat to move an amendment to the motion before the house, designed to give this house an opportunity to do two things; to register its protest against the failure of the committe to do its job, and to call upon the government to accept its responsibility and measure up thereto.

When I speak of government responsibility it is pertinent to ask in what way that responsibility lies. As has been pointed out by the leader of this group and by others who have spoken, that responsibility stems from the statement made by the Minister of Labour just before this strike broke out with reference to the ten-cent ceiling. I know we have had lots of argument as to the significance of it, but there it stands. That statement is being looked upon as government policy, a straitjacket or ceiling on wage increases. I shall not repeat the effective argument that was made yesterday by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), with respect to the completely unscientific nature of that ten-cent ceiling. We simply cannot understand the position of the government and its experts and officials who have gone into this matter in making that kind of proposal.

I suggest that government responsibility stems not only from the ten-cent ceiling which the minister gave but—

Mr. MITCHELL: Why can the hon. member not be decent and fair? I have never said anything about a ten-cent ceiling. I know it is all right for political purposes to say these things, but I am not going to take it from my hon. friend or anybody else in this house. I never said any such thing.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister say that he has agreed that wage increases might be made in an amount greater than ten cents?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say this to my hon. friend, if he wants me to make a speech, which I am not going to do at the moment. I will answer him when I make my speech. I know what he wants to do. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) took a statesmanlike view of the matter, but my hon. friend wants to play politics—that is all he wants to do—with industrial disputes. Let me say to my hon. friend that if ever he is unfortunate enough to have responsibility, and if he takes that attitude, well, God help the country.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not impressed by the adjective "statesmanlike" that is applied to hon. members who agree with you, or with the phrase "playing politics" that is always applied to an hon. member who happens to disagree with you; they carry no weight whatsoever as far as I am concerned. In my view the position that we in this group are taking is the responsible position, and that is something the government has failed to do. I want to tell the minister—I am glad to know he is listening—that there is another basis for stating that in my view the responsibility for the troubles we are having, particularly at Hamilton, rests upon the government. I have no doubt that he will get to his feet before I am through with this. Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked the Minister of Labour a question arising out of a telegram that he had received. He asked the minister whether or not he was behind the action of the management of the steel company in driving trucks in and out of the plant despite potential injury to life and limb. The minister's reply was to the effect that every man's home was his castle and that he regarded the right to go in and come out of a place of work in the same light. I do not take issue with that general statement, but the fact is that the kind of statements the minister has been making have had the effect of encouraging strike-breaking. Furthermore, they have had the effect of discolouring the situation as it exists at Hamilton. I was on the long-distance telephone to Hamilton myself about a quarter of an hour before the house met this morning. We have had telegrams continually and have kept in as close communication as we possibly could with Hamilton, and the information that is given to us is that at no time have the picket lines around that plant prevented ingress or egress of individuals in a normal orderly way. The trouble arises when large groups are moved in or out in a provocative manner, and I cannot help but notice the strange coincidence of these incidents taking place just now when this matter is being debated in the House of Commons. Many an individual I am told has gone in or out of the plant, and if individuals were to go in and out in an orderly way the workers who are inside the plant could come and go as much as they wish. The minister and the government generally by their attitude are helping to create the impression, and the press is responsible for it as well, that there is a group of lawless people among the strikers at Hamilton who are acting in such a way as to prevent the movement of people in and out of the plant without danger of bodily harm.

There are two reasons why the workers who are inside the plant at Hamilton do not want to come out. One is, of course, that they would not like their faces to be seen by their fellow workers. Any worker or trade unionist will know what I mean by that. The other reason that keeps these workers inside the plant is the triple pay they are receiving. When questions are asked about that, the minister's reply every time is to the effect that these people cannot get out, that they are kept in the plant by lawless strikers so-called, and that, I take it, is the reason why the government winks at this triple pay because it is thought that these men are compelled to stay inside the plant. If the minister would be what he sometimes says he is, impartial; if he would not forever colour things against the workers, but give an honest statement of the situation as it stands, you would not have the kind of trouble that is there now. I suggest that the government's unwillingness to do anything about this triple pay underlines its responsibility for the present situation. The plant is now under government control. This means that the government, which has its wage ceiling policy, is a party to these greatly enhanced wage rates which the men inside are receiving. If that triple pay were stopped and it were generally known that the picket lines consist of individual persons between whom people can pass in and out, you would have the men coming out of that plant and going home in a normal way. Once they no longer were receiving triple pay, and once they had passed by the gaze of their fellow workers who are out on strike, some of them would not go back. That would make the situation a little more difficult for the company, but at least it would keep the law.

The situation is tense, but the kind of provocation that is going on at the present time involves the government in a responsibility on two counts. One is the general statement of government policy—the ten-cent limit—and the other is that the plant is now under government control, through a controller whose policies are provocative. When this situation obtains one cannot be surprised at questions, inflammatory questions if you wish so to describe them, being raised in the minds of labour. It is said that the purpose of the government is to uphold the price ceiling, but it is awfully hard to convince labour that that is the purpose of the government when in the steel industry itself a price increase of $5 a ton was granted. It is said that the thing the government fears most is inflation, and the Minister of Labour himself is most vigorous in his statements about the fear of inflation. Yet the situation as it is being allowed to develop is a much greater threat of inflation than a wage increase would be, even a greater increase than the steelworkers are asking. These professed motives seem so hollow to the workers, for the reasons I have indicated, that they get the notion that there must be some other purpose—that either the government is deliberately out to weaken the position of the organized workers, or that it is being used by those who have such ideas. In that connection let me say that the Minister of Labour a few days ago tabled the Card report in this house. As he knows, there were objections to the tabling of that report on the dispute between the international typographical union and certain newspapers, but the minister tabled it, despite the objections, at the request of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I have before me a telegram from Miami, Florida, where the international typographical union is holding its eighty-eighth convention, which telegram contains a copy of a protest to the Minister of Labour signed by the Canadian delegates at that convention, protesting against the tabling of that report.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is completely out of order to cast reflections upon the proceedings of this house from an outside source.

Mr. KNOWLES: I had better read the telegram.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I object. The rule is specific. The hon. gentleman cannot quote a dispatch from an outside source reflecting upon the proceedings in this house.

Mr. KNOWLES: It does not reflect on the house. It reflects on the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the same thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know what is in the back of my hon. friend's mind. I received the same telegram.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, this is a copy of the one he received.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Finch, I am informed, is an organizer for the typographical union. He read the Card report himself, and indicated that he had no objection to its being made public. I have the same kind of wire as that to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. KNOWLES: But this wire is signed by Mr. Finch himself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have wired him too.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the house, an hon. member is not allowed to read messages coming from outside the house reflecting on the proceedings of the house. The hon. member knows that it is a privilege to be a member of the House of Commons, and the opinions expressed in the house should come from the members themselves. The idea is not to have expressions used in a debate which come from one who is not a member of the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have that rule quoted because it is the first time in the sixteen years that I have been in the house that I have heard that objection raised. It may be there is such a rule in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, but I have never heard of its being invoked in this house until now.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is the rule, just the same.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall be very glad to give the standing order to the hon. gentleman in a moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, when you rule a member out of order, the rule on which Your Honour bases his decision must be quoted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, but he will understand that it is not always possible for a member to have in his hands the document from which he would like to quote, and the Speaker of the house may be in the same position.

Mr. MacINNIS: But surely, Mr. Speaker, if you have not the order in your hand you cannot ask a member to sit down because of what is just in your mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Speaker can always rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would refer to standing order 306, Beauchesne, second edition:

306. It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

The rule is very clear, and I hope it will give satisfaction to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no "standing order" 306.

An hon. MEMBER: Citation 306.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was told that citations do not mean anything in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is under standing order 41.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Marginal rule 306.

Mr. KNOWLES: Might I, to save time, say that I do not agree with the ruling, but I will accept it because it is really unnecessary to read the telegram. It is pretty evident from this discussion that the minister would not like it on record.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not fair. I want that withdrawn at once. The minister made no objection. I made objection as leader of the house on a question of the rules. The minister did not object and the hon. gentleman should in fairness withdraw the remark, if he is a sport.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member who has the floor to be satisfied with the ruling made by the Speaker, and not to make any reflection on the leader of the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: I insist on my hon. friend withdrawing that remark. I have no objection to anything he might say with respect to my department—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Within the rules of the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: —within the rules of the house. But he knows the rule as well as I do. I know he is trying to prove a bad case.

An hon. MEMBER: So you prejudge it again.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do the rules permit the minister to accuse me of playing politics with industrial disputes? If he will withdraw that, I shall have no objection to withdrawing my suggestion that he did not want this on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: I still insist that my hon. friend withdraw his imputation.

Mr. MARTIN: Withdraw unreservedly.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think what I said is pretty mild. But if the minister will stop accusing me of playing politics when I am taking a responsible position, I am willing to call it square.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The minister was right, and you are wrong.

Mr. KNOWLES: The telegram had to do with the Card report. May I now read from the Card report?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No; withdraw first.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not be a decent sport, and withdraw? I will put it on that level if it will satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said he would put it on the same level as you suggested.

Mr. KNOWLES: All right; that is agreed.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would ask my hon. friend to be decent and withdraw it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The report which was tabled in the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am reading from a report tabled in the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman implied that my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) did not want this telegram produced. That is a reflection upon a minister of the crown, and I want it withdrawn.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, I withdrew it about three times.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, my hon. friend did not. He said he "agreed" but he did not withdraw specifically, without reservations.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to comply with the rules of the house and be kind enough to withdraw that remark.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling and withdraw the statement. The report which was tabled in this house, known as the Card report, includes in it this remark:

> During the sittings of the commission I said to the international representative that perhaps the ITU was getting too strong for its own good, and that in this dispute it appeared to me to be more interested in strengthening its own position than it was in looking after the interests of the members of the local union.

In another place in the Card report tabled by the minister, he said:

> . . . I am afraid Labour may without realizing it become so strong that they overlook entirely the fact that those with whom they deal must be treated fairly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is ideas such as that being put in reports of government commissioners and tabled in this house by a minister which arouse the suspicion of organized labour that the government is of the opinion that labour is getting too strong in certain places and that it is time something should be done about it.

The morning session is just about gone, and I have said that I intend to move an amendment. I wish to do so at this time, before one o'clock. As I indicated earlier, the motion before the house is as follows:

> That the second report of the committee on industrial relations, presented to the house on Saturday, August 17, 1946, be now concurred in.

I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson):

> That the words "be now concurred in" at the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "be not now concurred in, but that this house record its opinion that the responsibility for Canada's present industrial unrest lies with the government. Further, this house calls on the government for a change in its labour policy and for the settlement of existing disputes on a basis of satisfactory wage adjustments and union security, with a view to the resumption of full employment for the welfare of the entire country."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I should like Your Honour during the luncheon recess to consider the question that this is a complete negative and is therefore out of order. I have not got the rules under my hand at the moment, but in my judgment the amendment is not in order, and I would like Your Honour to be good enough during the recess to consider whether it is in order or not.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, will you permit other members to speak to the point of order raised by the leader of the house, before you give your ruling?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it the intention of Your Honour to rule on the point of order raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie)?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am ready to give my ruling. If the hon. member has a few words to say before I give my ruling I have no objection to hearing them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before you make your ruling I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the citation on the basis of which I drafted my amendment. I trust that I may have an opportunity to conclude my remarks after the point of order has been settled.

The citation to which I call Your Honour's attention is citation 340 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition. Citation No. 339 is the one which says that a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order. I believe that was the citation to which the Minister of Veterans Affairs referred. But citation No. 340 reads:

> An amendment to alter the main question, by substituting a proposition with the opposite conclusion, is not an expanded negative and may be moved.

My contention is that my motion offers a substitute or alternative proposition to the one before the house. I admit that it would have the opposite conclusion in that its acceptance would mean the rejection of the report; but on the basis of the citation I submit that it should be regarded as in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion under debate is one to concur in a report of a special committee of the house, and the amendment is as follows:

That the words "be now concurred in" at the end of the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"be not now concurred in, but that this house record its opinion that the responsibility for Canada's present industrial unrest lies with the government. Further, this house calls on the government for a change in its labour policy and for the settlement of existing disputes on a basis of satisfactory wage adjustments and union security, with a view to the resumption of full employment for the welfare of the entire country."

When a motion is made for concurrence in a report from a select committee, it is competent for the house to adopt it, reject it, refer it back to the committee with or without instructions, or decide that consideration of the report will take place "this day six months," as the hon. member can see by referring to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which cites a decision given by Mr. Speaker Rhodes on May 22, 1919, and reported at page 689, and at page 203. It will be noted that the amendment does not come within the limitation of the rule cited. Moreover the amendment raises a question which can be raised only by a distinct motion after notice, as the hon. member may see by referring to the decision rendered by Mr. Speaker Glen on May 21, 1940, as reported at page 647. For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, for the reasons which I indicated previously I am of the opinion that my motion was in order, but I have no alternative but to accept your ruling on the amendment, which I take it is not now before the house.

I have just one or two comments to make, and I shall conclude my remarks. After an interjection that was made this morning by the minister I felt that I should say one more word about this question of responsibility. It is frequently said that in this debate some speeches are statesmanlike but others display irresponsibility. It is precisely because we feel there has been irresponsibility on the part of the government with respect to dealing with this whole question that we are putting up this fight at the present time.

The dispute has gone on now for a good many weeks; it is curtailing the economy of the country; it is resulting in all sorts of shortages, which are serious, with reference both to the building of houses and to other matters, and it is tending to bring about inflation. Therefore we feel very keenly that the house should call upon the government to face more seriously its responsibilities in this matter. Since there is no amendment before the house but only a motion made by the chairman of the committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) an amendment to the motion within the terms of the citation which Your Honour has just read and within similar provisions found in citation 570 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which citation reads as follows:

When the motion to concur is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend it in any respect.

That seems to be quite clear. It is parallel to the citation which Your Honour read a moment ago. Let me repeat it for emphasis:

When the motion to concur is proposed—

That is what we have before us, the motion of the hon. member who is the chairman of the committee, for concurrence in this report. I continue with the citation:

—the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend it in any respect.

Therefore I move:

That the words "be now concurred in" at the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend it so as to recommend specific changes in the wage and labour policy of the government which would enable the settlement of existing disputes on a basis of satisfactory wage adjustments and union security."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is clearly within the terms of the rule which Your Honour has just read with respect to the other amendment which is not now before the house. I submit also that it presents the house with the crux of the issue in the steel strike which is now before us, and I urge the house to support this amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. After consideration Your Honour ruled the former motion of the hon. gentleman out of order. It was on exactly the same principle as the proposed amendment. I suggest that this new amendment is out of order, for the reasons I gave before the luncheon recess.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the point of order, I suggest that the citations you mentioned before do not cover this amendment at all. This resolution is clearly and positively provided for in the very citation Your Honour read; that is, citation 570.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The rule of parliament is obvious; that is, that an expanded negative is not allowable. The motion of the hon. gentleman now is in exactly the same terms as the motion he moved before the luncheon recess—that the report be not concurred in. There is one way for parliament to express its wishes, and that is to vote for or against concurrence in the report of the committee. This motion is that the report be not now concurred in, which is an expanded negative and therefore against the rules of the house.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not have Beauchesne with me, and I cannot quote from Beauchesne—

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I send Beauchesne to you?

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you, but it is a bulky volume. I am not going to quote any citation; I am simply going to appeal to the common sense of members of parliament. Surely it is within the rights of this house to send a report back to the committee for reconsideration and revision, and that is all the amendment says, Beauchesne or no Beauchesne.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I think the rule in citation 570 is perfectly clear on this point, that when a motion to concur is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instructions to amend it in any respect. That is exactly what this amendment does.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But that has been ruled upon already. That is my point.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think there is any doubt about it; we have the right to refer a report back to the committee.

Mr. REID: Does not the amendment contain a specific direction? It does not merely refer back the report; it says what the committee must do.

Mr. COLDWELL: Listen to citation 570 again:

> When the motion to concur is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend it in any respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But the house has ruled on the point to-day.

Mr. GILLIS: If I may say a word on the point of order, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) contends that the house has already ruled on this amendment, and that the principle of this amendment is exactly the same as the principle of the first amendment. That is not correct. The first amendment cut out the report completely and referred the whole matter of labour disputes to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I interrupt? The language of the first amendment, which was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker, was that the report be not concurred in. In the amendment now proposed the language is the same; that the report be not concurred in.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is only the preamble.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, that is an expanded negative, according to the rules of the house.

Mr. GILLIS: The preamble may be in the same language, and it is necessary that it should be; but the principle is not the same. One amendment was to cut out the report and send the matter back to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The words are the same.

Mr. GILLIS: Under this amendment the committee has not completed its work, in the opinion of this group, and we are merely referring the report back to the committee with instructions to complete the work the committee was set up to do, which is a completely different principle.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An expanded negative.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask for the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to this point? Both amendments are the same in this sense, that they both ask for the deletion of the same words, and that seems to be as far as the minister has read. I am sure he can read further than that. It is in what is substituted for the deleted words that there is a radical difference.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member who moved the amendment said, and he was perfectly right, that in my ruling quoting Beauchesne I stated that when a motion is made for concurrence in a report from a select committee it is competent for the house to adopt it, reject it, refer it back to the committee with or without instructions, or decide that consideration of the report will take place "this day six months." However, I would call the attention of the hon. member to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 407:

> An instruction is a motion empowering a committee to do something which it could not otherwise do, or to direct it to do something which it might otherwise not do.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member is to refer the report back to the committee in order that the committee may do something which he suggests should be done. The committee had power to do that before it presented its report to the house, but the committee did not do it. So according to citation 407 of Beauchesne I believe the motion is out of order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, would you permit me to read the rest of citation 570—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the basis of citation 570 I appeal your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to resume his seat. The hon. gentleman will admit that I have had to be pretty severe in the past in requiring hon. members to abide by the rule that decisions of the speaker are not debatable. I have not permitted other hon. members to contravene that rule, and I cannot permit the hon. member to do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling given by the Speaker on the amendment proposed by Mr. Knowles, seconded by Mr. Nicholson:

That the words "be now concurred in" at the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"be referred back to the committee with instructions to amend it so as to recommend specific changes in the wage and labour policy of the government which would enable the settlement of existing disputes on a basis of satisfactory wage adjustments and union security."

The motion was declared out of order because it was in the form of an instruction empowering a committee to do something which it already had the power to do.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. BELZILE: I was paired with the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain Your Honour's decision.

Mr. TREMBLAY: I was paired with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. LEGER: I was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn). Had I voted I would have voted to support Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): I was paired with the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). Had I voted I would have voted to support Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. BRACKEN: I was paired with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Had I voted I would have voted against Mr. Speaker's ruling.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was paired with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). If I had voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I was paired with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was paired with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. CHARLTON: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy). Had I voted I would have voted to sustain Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. GILLIS: I was paired with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. ROWE: I was paired with the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent). Had I voted I would have voted against Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. JAQUES: I was paired with the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote). Had I voted I would have voted against the speaker's ruling.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I was not a member of this committee, but I should like to make a few general remarks on the subject of industrial relations and unrest. First of all, I should like to say that I have no intention of trying to embarrass the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Whether or not we agree with him, I think we all feel, or at least we should feel that he has a most responsible position and is carrying out a very thankless task. I do not profess to be a labour expert, so my remarks are going to be quite general in character. I have always felt that the Minister of Labour has the most difficult job in the government, and I think he comes in for more criticism than almost any other minister. This criticism is mainly by those who not only do not occupy positions of responsibility but have never occupied responsible positions. As I say, whether or not we agree with him he is entitled at this time to the sympathy of the house and the country at large.

It was the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) who opened the debate, and I have heard most of the speakers who followed him. My object in rising now is to speak on behalf of that section of labour which is more or less silent.

I gathered from remarks of previous speakers that labour is socialist or at least in favour of socialism. The C.C.F. group certainly assume that, but I have no real means of finding that out for myself, except that a year ago at the general election, if I remember aright—and correct me if I am wrong—the socialist candidates lost every deposit east of Winnipeg but one. That is to say, industrial Canada, the Canadian workers, when they had an opportunity to vote secretly, registered in no uncertain way the fact that they do not want to be under a socialist economy in Canada.

Mr. PROBE: You would not like to bet that that will last, would you?

Mr. JAQUES: At the present time I am not making any comments on that. I merely state it as a fact. The reason I think that the Canadian workers have not yet fallen for socialism is that they value their individual freedom too much. I would like to make it perfectly clear that I am just as much a friend of labour as anyone in this house, and I certainly would fight for the right of the workers to strike. But it seems to me that if things continue as they are going to-day it is only a question of time when immediately there is a strike the government will be asked or told or commanded to step in and settle the strike. That is not my idea of freedom. Surely if it is the workers' right to strike, it is the workers' right to settle a strike, unless it happens to be that if the strike continued there would be a national emergency such as was created this summer when the railway men in the United States struck. But generally speaking I respect the workers' right to strike as their most valuable freedom. Once they lose that, it seems that their freedom is gone.

The end of socialism is, of course, complete government ownership and government control, and wherever you have that, there can be no strikes and there can be no unions in the sense that we know them. Therefore I defend the right of the workers to contract out. I defend the right of everybody to contract out. If they do not like a job or a situation it is their privilege and their right to contract out of it and not to be compelled to accept conditions which they do not care to accept.

There is no doubt that there is and has been in the Liberal party and in the Conservative party a trend towards socialism. So far as the Liberal party is concerned I put it down to the fact that the economic advisers of the Liberal party are and have been for a considerable time recruited from the London school of economics, which is purely a socialist training school. It was founded by Fabian socialists and it was financed by German international finance. That London school of economics has supplied the economic advisers at the present time and for some time past for the Liberal party. I read an editorial on a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Crerar the other day in the senate. He seemed to regret the passing of the old-time Liberalism. Well, where you have Liberal policies founded on the ideas of such men as Harold Laski, Mr. Rasminsky, Doctor Marsh and the rest of the London school of economics, you certainly do have a departure from the old Liberal school.

I should like to make a few remarks on a free economy. These ideas are not new, but they are worth repeating, and they are certainly pertinent to the subject under discussion.

If free to do so producers always try to sell dear and consumers always try to buy cheap. These instincts are as old as the human race and I suppose they will continue to the end of the chapter. For example, every workingman, who is a producer in the sense that he sells his labour, naturally sells his labour for as much as he can get for it. The wife of every workingman is a consumer and if she is a good housewife she tries to buy as cheaply as possible, or at least she sees to it that she gets either the most or the best for her money. When prices fall, consumption is stimulated but production is discouraged. At what level will most goods be produced and consumed? When you have a rise in prices, production is stimulated but consumption is discouraged. But for every commodity every day of the year there is a point where production and consumption meet one another on an equal basis. That point can only be determined as a result of the day to day transactions of millions of buyers and sellers meeting and doing business freely with one another. This is the point of greatest production and greatest consumption, and this is economic democracy. Whenever governments or monopolies of producers or of labour fix prices, rents, dividends or wages above or below that free meeting point, production and consumption get out of balance and we get what we have to-day, a general economic paralysis. It stands to reason that the millions of individuals who comprise the nation can judge for themselves what prices they will pay for how many and what kind of goods they want, and consequently how many goods should be produced. Everybody knows that, and each individual is the only person who can know it. Every individual knows what he wants, and every individual knows what he wants to pay, and the individual is the only person who can know that; everybody else can only guess. That is the free market; and whenever governments interfere to control a free market, whether it be in the field of production, consumption or labour, the result is always the same, a loss of human liberty and human happiness and satisfaction. The only alternative to the free market is an iron control over every phase of the nation's life by the gestapo and the concentration camp, and that is the history of socialism, applied socialism as it has worked out in Europe, the only place in which it has been worked out. In a free market, if one charges too much and buying falls off, competitors will charge less or offer a better product and so take the market away from him. A free market is a democratic market; it is a continuous meeting where every citizen every day votes with his or her dollars what he wants and what he wants produced. His dollars are always looking for the best bargain, that is the best and the most for the least expense. This forces the producers to offer the best or the most for the money, or go out of business to make room for those who do. The result is an ever-rising scale of living, and that is why the freer the country the higher its standard of living, and that is why the living standards are low in dictator countries; that is the reason to-day for the tie-ups in such industries as building. All the way down the line, industry is held up because producer and consumer cannot meet in mutual agreement as buyer and seller but must wait on the dictates of some bureaucrat who has no real or personal interest in the matter.

So much for a free economy. I believe the sooner we get back to a free economy the sooner we shall bring real prosperity and happiness to the people of Canada.

A few words about the communist influence in industrial unrest. As I say, I was not a member of this committee, so my remarks do not apply specifically to this committee. I am making general remarks which I can back up with statements by people in authority. I should say, of course, that labour is very largely international to-day, and certainly most of the Canadian labour unions are either controlled by or affiliated with the labour unions of the United States. If that is incorrect perhaps the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will correct me.

Let me quote the Attorney General of the United States, speaking this summer to the Canadian Bar Association:

No one but a crackpot can be deluded by what we see going on to-day. One of the greatest dangers in my opinion to the civil liberties of our fellow citizens, and one which should be taken literally by all the members of our profession, is the method of communism and fascism to shackle democracy by indirection. We know there is a national and international conspiracy to divide our people, to discredit our institutions, and to bring about disrespect of our government. We know full well what communism and fascism practise,—sometimes one taking the cloak from the other. We know that in the black bible of their faith they seek to capture the important offices in the labour unions, to create strikes and dissensions, and to raise barriers to the efforts of lawful authorities to maintain civil peace. I am told that in the councils of many labour unions, wherein deliberations are screened from the public, identical tactics, staged with acute skill, are used to disrupt, disconcert proceedings in the hope that the communists or fascists—for I see no difference in them—may achieve final power. Small groups of radicals, well coached in a prearranged plan, are using party line methods in identical activity so that they can speak to the people as a whole, not in open avowal of their aims, but with the voice of the honest working man. No country on earth and no government can long endure this vicious attack. I say to you that they are driving law enforcement in this country to the end of its patience. They are driving good Americans to the end of their patience.

That was the statement of Attorney General Thomas Clark, of the United States of America. Then there is a statement I should like to read which I take from the committee of un-American activities of the Congress of the United States, printed in Washington, 1946, page 48:

A majority of ill-informed members of industry, finance, education and religious institutions sneer at the power and progress of the communist party in the United States. These same individuals often point out that the communist party is a legal party and not a member of a subversive movement and is merely the expression of a small alien minority. To indicate the extent to which these persons have been misled by the propaganda agencies operating under the guidance of communists and fellow travellers in America, we present the statement made by Joseph Stalin, nominal head of the communist party in Russia and the dominant figure of the movement throughout the world.

This is Premier Stalin's statement:

"I consider that the communist party in the United States of America is one of the few communist parties to which history has given decisive tasks from the point of view of the world revolutionary movement. The revolutionary crisis has not yet reached the United States, but we already have knowledge of numerous facts which suggest that it is aproaching. It is necessary that the communist party should be capable of meeting the moment of crisis fully equipped to take the direction of future class wars in the United States of America. You must prepare for that, comrades, with all your strength and by every means you must constantly improve and bolshevize the American communist party. You must forge real revolutionary leaders of the proletariat who will be capable of leading the millions of American workers towards the revolutionary class wars."

This statement has never been repudiated and is officially recorded on page 17 of house report No. 2 of the 76th Congress.

The real communist threat is not from the few members of the communist party who are honest enough to declare their true colours, but from the innumerable what I call "fellow-travellers". They remind me of the unfortunate people who carry typhoid. They do not have the disease themselves, but they spread it. There are a lot of people who may not be communists in the full sense of the word, but they spread a lot of communism.

The hon. member for Calgary West said something about the spread of socialism and communism, but I did not hear him say anything about stopping the spread of it. He did complain of the newspapers. He said they were always ready to strangle the birth of a new idea. I have not heard any new ideas expressed in this debate. There is nothing new in socialism. It is as old as slavery. The hon. member for Calgary West comes from the province which did give birth to a new idea.

An hon. MEMBER: A miscarriage.

Mr. HERRIDGE: A still-birth.

Mr. JAQUES: No, it is still living. The hon. member for Calgary West has gone out of his way to try to strangle that idea. Social Credit is a new idea and I say that it is the only answer to socialism. I should like to quote from an article by John T. Flynn in the Times-Herald of April 23, 1944. This article deals with what has come to be known as the "smear bund". It is the cover behind which the communists do their work. Their method, of course, is to smear anybody who is really active in opposing communism. This is a book which is called "Under Cover" and written by a man by the name of John Roy Carlson.

The article says that this book, due to unprecedented plugging, has sold nearly one million copies.

Mr. PROBE: The hon. member is not the author? This is not a sales talk?

Mr. JAQUES: No, I am not selling it, but I shall open the eyes of the hon. member if he is not entirely blind. Here are some notes I took from this article:

Who is the real author of "Under Cover", the well-known smear book? On the cover of the book is the name—John Roy Carlson, but who is John Roy Carlson? Where did the smear bund dig him up? The author of "Under Cover" admits using Carlson as a pen name. But Carlson is only one of several pen names. His real name is Avedis Boghos Derounian, an Armenian immigrant. The name of the author of "Under Cover" is given as Derounian, alias Carlson, alias Paige, alias Decker, alias Pagnanelli, et cetera. But the real author is the communist smear bund. By means of Carlson and other hired hands, such as Walter Winchell and using "patriot" as an alias, the bund's purpose is to smear, as agents of Hitler, any native Americans of untarnished reputation, loyalty and eminence who actively oppose communism and internationalism. In 1935 Carlson edited a communist sheet mainly to extol the bolshevik conquest of his native Armenian home, smearing all who did not agree with his employers. In 1938 he was hired by the anti-defamation league and later by the "Friends of Democracy" as one of their numerous pimps. He went around people suspected of anti-semitism, encouraged them to make slurring remarks and then reported the remarks to his blackmailing employers as samples of anti-semitism. He issued an anti-semitic sheet of his own containing the vilest attacks on the Jews in order to needle people to say anything he could report to the alien racketeers who paid him.

"Under Cover" pretends to expose a number of subversive groups in America, but it never once mentions the activities of such people as those exposed by our own Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The very purpose of the book is to keep communist spies and agents under cover. The methods are the usual smear employed by communists and fellow travellers, and by the anti-defamation league. The technique is that used by all blackmailers—to compromise decent honourable people by associating them with those guilty of the offence with which they intended to smear their victims. In "Under Cover" the victims were the opponents of internationalism, communism, and the opponents of certain new dealers.

[Mr. Jaques.]

Carlson was hired by the "Friends of Democracy", operated by Rex Stout, former editor of the New Masses and Leon Birkhead, both active communist workers.

So much for John Roy Carlson. Blackmailers are rightly detested as most odious and dangerous criminals. They are character assassins preying on the respectable, but vulnerable, members of society. Private citizens are protected against blackmail by most severe and drastic penalties. Men in public life enjoy no protection against such blackmailers as the Carlsons, Winchells, and their employers, the communists, the anti-defamation league, the political zionist leaders, all working to defeat the ends of justice, freedom and Christianity, silencing or disarming their opponents by smearing them with fascism and anti-semitism. Honest and sincere patriots must face these blackmailers or abandon their principles.

To give you some idea of the extent of the activities of these subversive agents, let me quote the words of the national director of the anti-defamation league, referred to by Mr. Flynn in the article in the Times-Herald:

The programme of education we have developed covers every media for improving the human mind.

Improving the human mind!

In several fields which have engaged the league's attention we have developed the outstanding agencies of America. We have the greatest speakers' bureau ever organized in this country. We have the outstanding radio programmes in all the history of American radio.

Such as Walter Winchell I suppose.

We have the most effective book placement bureau in the entire nation.

Including "Under Cover." Finally, they have succeeded in organizing to convert the world to internationalism and totalitarianism, according to the doctrines of Karl Marx, the psychoanalysts and the political zionists.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I have hesitated to interrupt the hon. member, but in his opening remarks he stated that he was going to show the influence of communism in industrial unrest. I should draw his attention to the fact that the house is considering the report of the industrial relations committee. A general discussion of communism would not be in order at the present time, and I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the motion now before the house.

Mr. JAQUES: My point in bringing up that matter is that all the speakers I have heard during this debate have ignored the activities of the communists, and I hoped to show the extent of the communist movement in the United States and in Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. member to relate his remarks respecting communism to industrial unrest and the motion before the house. A general discussion of communism would not be in order at the present time.

Mr. JAQUES: I thought I had made the point that a great deal—I would not like to say how much—of the industrial unrest in North America, which would include Canada, is due directly to the propaganda and active work of communists. They work under cover, and I was trying to take off the cover in order to expose this thing for what it is. That was my only purpose, but now I am through with the communists.

Before I sit down I should like to be a little constructive. Having been a little critical so far I should like to close my remarks in a constructive way. I should like to reiterate something I said in an address not long ago, dealing with the solution of these problems of industrial unrest. I speak in the most general way, because I am not referring to any particular strike, such as the steel strike, or even to Canada alone. I am speaking of industrial unrest all over the North American continent or, if you like, all over the world. It is not a question of capitalism or socialism; of "cartelism" or communism. Capitalism of itself, is no cure for socialism, any more than socialism is the cure for capitalism; the blind cannot lead the blind. The truth lies between the extremes of right and left. It is not a question of peace based on full employment. We face a new age; not merely a machine age, but a power-machine age. That means an age of increasing leisure, not of increasing employment. We cannot reverse our program; we must not confuse means with ends. The real purpose of industry is to create goods and service, not jobs. As Ruskin said, "consumption is the crown of production."

We face an age of real plenty and, therefore, we cannot remain slaves of a money economy which was developed during the ages of real scarcity. We dare not prolong our orthodox, but obsolete, financial system of sound, scarce, money by creating artificial scarcities of goods. Our money must reflect facts, not fallacies. Dollars are economic ballots, and when we spend dollars we are voting for the reproduction of what we buy. In this way only can the people plan and obtain the goods and services they really want to have. But by their "planned economy' the socialists would dictate to the people what, when and how much they should consume. Socialists condemn profit, but defend interest. The financiers and socialists—Shylock and Marx—are monopolists; they plan to centralize the control of the production of money and of goods. If we are to have world peace, "foreign trade" must be regarded as trade, an exchange of what we cannot consume for what we cannot produce. Favourable trade balances are a fallacy, and the struggle to obtain them has been a main cause of wars in the past. If we are to be really free, all our citizens must be regarded as shareholders of the nation as a going concern and, as such, entitled to share in the national profits, distributed by means of national dividends. Taxation should not be imposed for revenue, but for the purpose of regulating the supply of money. Governments might lend but should never borrow. To say there is only so much money is equivalent to saying there are only so many tons, or miles. The poor are not poor because the rich are rich; that is another socialist fallacy. There is plenty for all. We have solved the problem of production, we must now solve the problem of distribution, or perish in the attempt. We cannot serve two masters; we cannot serve God and usury. If we value anything more than freedom we shall lose our freedom.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Coming from the industrial district in Ontario where the trade union movement in Canada started, I wish to say a few words this afternoon in connection with these proposals. Some have complained that the day is being wasted. That is not so. Peace in industry is the greatest problem facing this parliament. That is what parliament was called together to consider last March. Some of those to my left, the C.C.F., have been pleading the case for the farmer and agriculture, and in some respects it may be fairly said they forgot all about the industrial workers of the cities and towns of this country, who are employed in these heavy industries which have done so much for this country. This committee was appointed to establish peace in industry. That was a large order, because after every great war we have had the same dislocation of labour and of trade and industry and commerce. I would not be altogether prepared to say it was the fault of the government. In fact it would be very unfair to say that, because the textbook writers after all great wars have agreed for the last hundred years that this may or may not be so.

Hon. members on this side of the house have always been a trade union party, so far as I have known them. We are the only real protectionist party in the house—national protection for labour, protection for the farmers, protection for agriculture and for industry, protection for trade and commerce, for retail stores and for manufacturers of all kinds, and national production brought up to date to meet the spirit of the age and time. Our maxim has been: our own work for our own workmen; our own markets for our own products. Those are the two cardinal principles which have built up this country.

As an hon. member who entered this parliament several years ago, it is my belief that the committee deserves the thanks not only of the House of Commons but of the government of the country and of labour and industry for the work it did. I do not agree with everything contained in the report as far as it goes, because it is well known that after every great war there has been industrial unrest in Canada and the world over.

The committee was given power to call witnesses and to examine them on oath. The Addington administration in 1801 faced industrial strife and faced unrest. They faced it in the dark days of the industrial revolution in England. They faced it in that old town hall in Birmingham, which was somewhat destroyed a while ago, where John Bright and Joseph Chamberlain and all those great men and orators who had something to do with the redeeming the lot of the workers of that land, had their say. That was the condition at the time of Shaftesbury, in 1847—in those days the intolerable conditions among the working classes after the industrial revolution in the thirties led to labour and social reforms all along the line. One has only to read Green's "History of England" to understand the terrible state of affairs in those days, a time when women, and children of only eight or nine years of age, were working down in the mines, taking out the coal, in a living tomb with disease rampant. Trades unionism was a blessing to the land.

The city of Toronto has been a pioneer in its relations with labour. We have a splendid body of manufacturers who developed the industrial side of the city, and who comprise some of our leading and most patriotic citizens. We have, on the whole, as heads of our labour movements sane and sensible labour men. I had to aid in settling about twenty or thirty strikes, large and small, following the last war and during it. I remember a strike of the old Toronto Street Railway, and during the strike I appealed to the greatest labour leader this continent ever produced, Mr. Samuel Gompers, who at that time was president of the American Federation of Labour. He came to our city and the strike was settled in about half a day. He advocated that the strikers be law-abiding, that they carry out peaceful picketing, and carry out their other duties peacefully, in a lawful manner. He appealed to other classes in the community to use sanity, a spirit of good will and wisdom, not to make inflammatory speeches, not to attack industry, and not to attack the police force. He said that police officers were only doing their duty as they saw it in the various cities of our country.

I was police commissioner and chairman of the board for many years in Toronto, and I can say that we had very little of that kind of trouble. For many years in the house I have been advocating a national policy for labour in Canada and for peace in industry. The report of the committee deals with many important matters. Indeed I believe it is the most important labour document we have had since the days of the Bennett administration. If there was one administration in this country which stood up for the industrial workers in the cities and towns of Canada and also for the white-collar workers; if there was one administration which was the pioneer of this type of document for the benefit of the working classes, it was the Bennett administration, which set up the committee on price spreads which investigated these matters and brought down an important report and led to splendid reforms to improve the lot of the toilers and of industry and private enterprise, the creator of employment.

We have had collective bargaining in Canada for some time; they had it in England after the last war and before it. I do not believe altogether in section 6. I appreciate fully what was said by my hon. friend and brother party member who has done so much of this work, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). I remember him when he was a student in our city, and I know he was interested in this problem even in those days. He is a most warm-hearted man, and one who takes part in many spheres of activity to aid the common man, for whom he has a profound sympathy. He is a man who deserves to be listened to, and one who has won the esteem not only of the people of western Canada but of people throughout the country. I agree with him when he claims "the right for every man to run his own life in his own way." That is what I have been contending for, and that is what the price spreads inquiry contended for. I would rather under section 6, see the chief electoral officer handle a vote in industry in this matter than the Minister of Labour who has had such a hard task after a gigantic war. We have a chief electoral officer, and all of us have had something to do with him. I believe he should be placed in charge of the balloting in industry. No matter what his politics are, he has always given each of us a fair and decent show. I believe the chief electoral officer would avoid government interference and so aid the Minister of Labour.

As a friend of labour, in some respects I am sorry to see this recommendation in section 6, because to a great extent these industrial disputes are matters for the consideration of the government. I have had experience with many such disputes, probably as many as any other hon. member now in the house—but perhaps not as many as the Minister of Labour, with his vast labour experience, because he was in the labour movement for many years, in two cities—Hamilton, and where he is now. I have followed his career with interest.

I can tell you this, that we shall never have peace in industry in this country until we have a national policy for labour and for industry. I have, since 1922 advocated such a national policy of protection to solve all our economic problems from the Yukon to the maritime provinces. I have recommended a national policy for labour, a national policy which should provide protection bonuses, subventions and subsidies on grain, coal, steel, iron and other important commodities. I was almost alone in my advocacy at that time. Only in this way can labour hope to get a proper share of the returns in our peace-time economy; only in this way can industry and private enterprise get their fair share of aid.

I have always listened with great respect to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) the leader of the C.C.F., who said that the ten-cent limit would place labour in a straitjacket. No hon. member, no decent citizen, wants to see any man who works for his living placed in a straitjacket. I have great respect for the hon. member, but I do not think he or any other hon. member wants to see either labour or private enterprise in a straitjacket.

Some of our friends want a complete system of nationalization, socialization and public ownership. That works all right in connection with light, heat and power, and with some forms of transportation, but when it is expanded it cannot be successful unless it operates as a monopoly. That is the only way that public ownership, both past and present, of which I have long been an advocate, has been successful.

There have been better working conditions since I first entered the city council in Toronto. Our friends sitting to the left are trying to pacify Europe. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) went over to Russia to try to pacify the Russians and Marshal Stalin—and here we are in the 106th day of the session, but the government cannot pacify a few workmen. That is how it is in some of the industries in the country. The hon. member went over to preach the gospel to Stalin and company—limited and unlimited. No doubt while he was over there he learned some of the new modern tricks in the political trade—because there are always some tricks to learn in this trade used by politicians. We are all politicians; some of us saw the sun, and some did not. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is over there trying to pacify Europe. A whole carload of them has gone, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton). He is in Paris, but he may show up in Oslo or in almost any city of the seven seas. I think there is plenty of room for them at home, to maintain peace in industry in this country, the most important problem before parliament.

A discussion of this matter is certainly not a waste of time, because these workers are people who pay taxes—taxes which are intolerable. I can tell you this, that I walked along streets in my constituency, and in the constituencies of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and other Toronto members the other night, and on those streets I saw members of the working classes shopping. It was raining pretty hard that night and the price ceiling had huge holes shot in it. Many of the people who came to this country only a few years ago are making fabulous sums out of the sale of vegetables and fruit, but the farmer is not getting it. The ceiling has been shot full of holes for the consumer, and prices are soaring on consumer goods of all kinds. It is well known that the price ceilings are connected economically with the wage ceilings, and that is one thing the committee had to consider in making its report. Where do we go from here after this report?

We are back to where we are kicking the football around again. We are in the football season now. The government kicked the football over to the committee on July 14 and we have now kicked it back. The onus of settling this strike is on the government as long as they are the government. I think the committee was very fair to the government because it was an exceedingly laborious task it had to do, it was a tiresome, wearisome and thankless task. I went into the committee two or three times and I saw it was a tiresome, wearisome and thankless job they were doing in trying to help the government out of the trouble they were in. All governments have had to face this situation after every war.

Where do we go from here, with this committee report, uniting price ceilings and wage control? The onus is back on the government. We would be wise as the House of Commons to wind up our business by Saturday night and give the government a chance to deal with this problem and settle this strike. We are just wasting our time here, and the minister is not able to deal with this important matter. The onus is on the government, not on the exodus or only those who are travelling the seven seas, but those who are home, the home guard. The home guard is dwindling. Those who have been left at home have to face the toughest job which this government has had for a long time, to wind up this session and to formulate a labour code that will work after such a terrible war and bring about peace in industry.

The onus is on the government so far as it is the government of the day to solve this problem. This problem is not going to be solved by adopting brass-band methods of conducting a strike inquiry or by intimidation of the workers and private enterprise, or by calling in the police. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that trouble occurred in the city of Montreal a few years ago. The enforcement of federal laws should be placed in the hands of the Attorney General of Canada under section 91. It should not be necessary to tax real estate in order to provide a police force in Hamilton.

Another thing I cannot understand is that it was considered necessary by the steel industry and the labour union to treat this matter as a unit of industrial strife in the three plants. The conditions prevailing in Nova Scotia are different from those prevailing in Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie. They are separate propositions all together. I think a great mistake was made in the unions handling it in this way. In Sault Ste. Marie and Hamilton they have cheap light, power and urban transportation and the cost of their carfares, water and civic services, and food is much less. In the maritimes they are faced with heavy freight charges, and then the system of taxation there is different. In Ontario there is cheap light and power available for almost every barn in the province, and we have cheap fares on our street cars. Domestic lighting is available for the home of the working man, and the cost of this service has been cut in three and four. For about 94 cents a unit a working man is able to light his house. Then they have extended the facilities for cooking into the kitchens of the working classes of this province. In these disputes law and order should be maintained at any cost.

We had some trouble during the street railway strike and we had some trouble during the last war. But law and order must be maintained, as President Gompers said when we settled the street car strike. So far as this particular proposition goes, I sympathize with labour and I also sympathize with the employers as they are to-day. You must consider the cause and effect of these strikes. As I said before, business men are conscious of the heavy task that awaits them in reconversion so that Canada may recover quickly. Industry and labour in Canada have worked wonders in war, and can in peace also. Canada needs stability to speed the delivery of all classes of goods and meet market demands so as to aid peace-time economy in employment, supply civilian needs and restore as soon as possible living standards and defeat inflation and black markets. With the lessons industry learned in Canada in war, it should be much easier to work out reconversion. All irksome controls must go, and we must remove the shackles from industry, large and small. Business men must have complete freedom if they are to succeed under private enterprise. We should see an end to government controls and in that way give them more of a chance to provide full employment, and labour and capital a fairer share of our peace-time economy.

I am sorry to say that that has not happened, and one of the results is this strike. There is no doubt that the committee never should have summoned Donald Gordon or Mr. Brockington to handle matters such as this. I believe that the more the government kept away from it, the more chance there would be for the employers and employees to settle this question. On April 1, when I saw the unrest and that May day was coming, I asked this question:

> What action has been taken by the government to set aside, by proclamation, some Sunday for a day of prayer for the promotion of peace in industry, in view of the need of reconversion in industry from war to peace economy.

The government replied that the suggestion was being noted, but that at present this did not appear to be a matter requiring action by the government. I notice they are adopting this programme in the mother country, and I am reminded of the town hall in Birmingham where John Bright and Joseph Chamberlain and others spoke shortly after the industrial revolution. I think this suggestion should be carried out on Labour day, a week from Sunday. The government should consider setting aside, Sunday, September 1, as a day of national prayer for the promotion of peace and industry and to urge the necessity of such industrial peace to aid reconversion in industry from war to peace-time economy and aid the production of all kinds of consumer goods. I hope such a proclamation will be issued. When a well-known Canadian divine was referring to the town hall in Birmingham he mentioned that a celebrated labour leader had once said that he never entered an industrial conference without engaging in a season of prayer. God's spirit was always invoked in order that satisfactory results might be obtained. I think there is a lot in that, especially in times like these.

There are many important matters that need consideration by parliament. These strikes are caused largely by the working classes not being able to get into decent houses. That is the result of this silly rental control policy. We see letter after letter in the newspapers—there were three or four in the Toronto papers last night—complaining about the condition of those who buy and cannot get into what they buy. That is one of the causes of this strike. Then these working people are faced with high food prices. The danger of inflation at the moment is due to a shortage of supplies. That shortage has been largely brought about by the war. The government has, in my opinion, had a different policy in different provinces in regard to a price ceiling on wages. In British Columbia, in the dispute which Mr. Justice Sloan settled, an increase of fifteen cents was granted. That was in April or May. Now in August in Ontario an increase of ten cents is offered. Mistakes have been made, undoubtedly, but the government is not the only one to make mistakes. Mistakes are bound to be made after every war. The government's determination to hold price ceilings at all costs, when holes were shot in the ceilings has been responsible for strikes and the demand for higher wages. The line was held for a time, but it was only held in the days of stress and strain by granting the wartime cost of living bonus, subventions and subsidies, and other temporary benefits at great cost to the country and industry and the consumer.

We should enforce what labour laws we have, and if they are not right we should amend them to meet modern conditions. A few months ago the subsidy of two cents a quart was taken off milk, and the prices of the produce which the market gardeners bring into the cities are going sky-high, without any price regulation at all. No wonder there is a demand for higher wages.

So far as the report of the committee is concerned there are four cardinal things the committee forgot to remember: Never legislate against human nature; trust the people and they will trust you; always tell the people the truth; do not be afraid to tell the people you have made a mistake. The people do not expect their leaders to be infallible or to be gods and I am glad that my hon. friend the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) admitted the other night that he had had a change of mind. How can we develop the natural resources of this country when we have strikes continually occurring in basic industries like steel, coal, iron, base metals and everything else?

We have representatives over in Paris at the present time attending a conference about peace and disarmament. That is desirable, no doubt, but peace in industry at home is also sorely needed. After every war there is a lot of dislocation and all kinds of social problems to solve, which, if not solved properly, will cause strikes. Suspicion should be removed, suspicion not only abroad but also at home, because it tends to poison the thoughts in man. The removal of suspicion would aid industry and bring about stability, so that our people can go on confidently to better things. While not forgetting conferences abroad, let us have conferences at home for the very worthy object of peace in industry. Home should be the true place of peace and shelter from all injury, terror, want, doubt and unemployment. It is not home if it does not provide that.

Why should we reserve all our discussions on peace and security for Paris and the continent of Europe and forget about peace at home? Some of those who preached pacifism abroad failed to heed the cries for peace at home. Some of the best leaders of labour have uttered the same sentiments—not to forget peace at home—and I admire their courage, because these labour leaders are trying at the same time to carry out their duties to those they represent and that greater community their country.

I am urging all our citizens to plead for a truce in industrial strife. In the middle ages, when the whole of Europe was on fire, one part against another, men of good will strove in vain to get what the historians of the middle ages called a truce of God which would enable the people to settle their differences and live like brothers. I should like to see such a truce in this country to bring about peace in industry, so that we may remove all differences and join in unison with all our strength to lead the people of this country to a happier and better collective security at home.

Governments sometimes can do little. These reforms must come from the people themselves and from free enterprise. Labour and private enterprise should take off their coats and work out a solution of their troubles, because they can do it better than the state can. Let them put the state out of their minds and get down to it to-day, so that we may have peace in industry in every corner of this country. A breach of peace in industry means suffering from employment. All that could be avoided if capital and labour tried to understand each other.

I have felt that it would be a real help to employers and employees to have a neutral person preside at industrial conferences, some man well qualified by character and ability and with an independent outlook who would inspire confidence. A person of such standing I have found in practice has always enabled the two parties to get together with ease and freedom and with a hope of ultimate success. Not only have wages to be studied, but the relationship between price ceilings and wage controls must not be lost sight of. Industrial disputes should be the concern of statesmen, because such disputes follow after every great war. Trade in our country has always depended on initiative and free enterprise and the willingness of our people, men and women, to embark their savings in industry. The element of uncertainty after every great war in industry is a great problem.

I do not believe there is any royal road to the solution of industrial strife any more than there is any royal road to learning. The government have no doubt made mistakes, and they have come in for some criticism. So has the opposition, the C.C.F. and all other parties. This steel strike is already having a serious effect upon business, and I hope that we shall conclude our business here very rapidly so as to give the government a chance to bring this strike to an end as soon as possible.

Mr. J. G. L. LANGLOIS (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the numerous speeches made on this subject, and I wish to offer my own views. They are, I must admit, far from being those of an expert in the matter.

In this debate so far, various opinions or suggestions have been made, some very constructive, others less so, but I do not think this problem can be solved by making speeches. What is needed is action without further delay.

[Mr. Church.]

The committee on industrial relations has made recommendations to this house, and in my opinion the most important of these recommendations is the one relating to a labour code. In this connection opinions seemed unanimous, and I hope that hon. members have given careful consideration to these suggestions. However, we must not forget the numerous angles of this problem.

The main obstacle to having a labour code is the result of our own constitution and is the conflict of jurisdiction between the various provinces and the Canadian parliament. The committee recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be called in order to draft legislation in this respect. I agree with this recommendation, provided that the provinces come here with a real desire for understanding, and I say this because our previous dominion-provincial conferences did not meet with great success.

The labour problem of this country is a national problem and, therefore, concerns as much the provincial legislatures of each province as it concerns the federal parliament. Each premier of each province should be ready to shoulder his responsibility in this respect. The strikes which affect our national economy to-day affect also all the provinces from British Columbia to the maritime provinces. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in the past there has been too much politics brought into the settlement of our national problems and in the discussions of our dominion-provincial relations. When the federal government wanted to make suggestions for the settlement of these problems, the provinces accused the federal government of attacking provincial autonomy.

A few days ago, the premier of Ontario, the Hon. George Drew, said in a public address that his government was seeking to have the federal government hold another dominion-provincial conference and he—Mr. Drew—was suggesting that this conference should deal also with our labour problems. The same suggestion has been made in the newspapers and by public men of this country, but I suggest that if the provinces want so much understanding between the federal government and the provincial governments they should, for once, themselves take the initiative. It is all very nice and good to say that it is up to the federal government to assemble the provincial ministers in a conference, but I do not think this initiative should come only and solely from this government. Why do the provincial ministers not get together on their own initiative and first agree among themselves before coming to Ottawa? Then, if the dominion-provincial conference later fails, this failure would not rest with the central government only, since the provinces, would have taken their share of responsibilities in calling the meeting.

I am sure that, if the provinces come here after having discussed matters among themselves, an understanding with the federal government will be much easier to reach, since the provinces will be unanimous and will have reached an agreement among themselves before conferring with the central authorities. Then politicians will not be able to go around and say that Mr. King's conference has failed, if a failure should occur; but the people of Canada will know that, if agreement is not reached, the fault rests with no particular political party or no particular government, unless one of these governments fails to envisage the problem in the light of the national interest. Up to now it seems to me that the provinces have prevented the central government from taking action to solve our national problems, on the grounds of provincial autonomy; but when the consequences of these unsolved problems appear they throw it into the lap of the federal government as they are doing to-day, and say, "settle them." I do not think this is the way to arrive at the solution of our national problems. Let the provinces take the initiative now and see if they can do better than the federal government has done up to now.

If I may offer suggestions regarding this labour code, I would suggest that uniform legislation be drafted by the provinces according to their own views and ambitions first and submitted afterwards for discussion in a dominion-provincial conference and that, after an agreement is reached on the proposed legislation, various provincial governments make it law in their respective province. This will be one way to eliminate the conflict of jurisdiction, since this national labour code would be enacted by the various legislatures independently. We federal members were told during the debate on redistribution that we did not represent our respective provinces. We should, therefore, to-day leave the floor to our provincial representatives in this respect.

There has been much talk recently about the danger of spreading communism in this country, and it has been asserted that communistic activities are taking place in our labour unions. I think this assertion is true, and I would suggest that, in order to curb these activities, which, to my mind are most detrimental to Canada, labour unions of this country should be exclusively Canadian in character. In order to achieve this end, I respectfully submit that our proposed labour code should recognize only exclusively Canadian unions and make it compulsory for any labour union to incorporate itself under our laws with definite powers and definite obligations also. I know that many are opposed to the incorporation of labour unions, but I think we should have had it a long time ago. We are criticizing the government for delegating its powers to boards or commissions, but we do not seem to realize that labour unions to-day have more authority in the labour field than the government ever had. We have recently seen examples of labour unions who defied the government, took the law into their own hands and dictated their wishes to the whole of the country. These same unions have no responsibility whatsoever, having no legal existence. I believe that bodies which control most of our national economy should be responsible bodies and should come within the provisions of our laws. If ever a delegation of powers was made it was when we permitted such unions to act in this country. Public bodies like individuals should abide by the laws of the country according to the great principle of our democratic world that everybody is equal before the law. Why make an exception in the case of labour unions?

I know some hon. gentlemen will object by saying that this will prevent our local organization from taking part in the international organization, for the welfare of workers all over the world. I do not think this will be the case, since our national unions or local unions could do just as they did before and contribute to the international labour organization, and I see no objection there.

Before closing these few remarks, I wish again to emphasize the importance of the national character of this problem and of the necessity for immediate action. Strikes are to-day paralyzing the whole economy of this country. It is not only one class of our society that is affected, but the whole of our national economy and the whole of our Canadian society. Let us, therefore, put aside, for the sake of our country, our individual views and opinions, and let us look at the problem as a national one. It is the privilege of every citizen of this country to be either a regionalist or a provincialist or a federalist; but, above all, he has the duty of being a Canadian, and a Canadian before anything else. If individuals are not allowed to act, if their actions are prejudicial to and against the interest of the community, no prime minister, no government, no political party leader has the right to seek his own advantage or even the advantage of his province if his actions are detrimental to the country as a whole. I sincerely hope that if a dominion-provincial conference is called our governments will approach the problem with this principle in mind. Should some provincial premier or other government leader act otherwise, he may gain a temporary political success, but sooner or later his own people will reproach him for having lost sight of the general welfare and interest of his country.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall keep the length of my remarks within the strictest bounds, because this session has lasted but too long.

Speeches can never bring strikes to an end. Only an energetic government, able to do justice to employees and employers, can stop disputes. Let the government, after such lengthy discussion, at last find the means of settling the strikes which paralyse the economy of this nation. The workers are justified in demanding a salary commensurate with the increase in the cost of living. Employers cannot be unaware of what it costs to-day to live. I should rather say to subsist, because I leave out of consideration any luxury, and even reasonable comfort.

If employers are aware of that situation, the government are still better acquainted with it. They should decide on a course of action with the determination that the present circumstances require.

There have been enough words; the need is for action. No one can be made to believe that there are no grounds for understanding, no middle course that would put an end to these disastrous strikes which deeply affect the whole population. There should be no attempt to shirk responsibilities and shift them upon others. The established authority has the duty to safeguard the well-being of the people. Its duty is to do justice to all and with the least possible delay. The more we have discussions, conferences and speeches, the more difficult the situation will become.

In concluding my brief remarks, I shall remind the government that the Canadian people expect them to find a prompt, energetic, fair and efficient solution of the labour and industrial problem. Idle discussions will settle nothing.

We have no need of a national labour code. Each province has its own legislation on labour and industrial matters and they have jurisdiction to legislate thereon. Owing to the war and to this transition period, the dominion government has exercised, and still exercises, prerogatives reserved to the provinces. It would be useless to call a dominion-provincial conference for the purpose of discussing the advisability of enacting a national labour code. As I have said not long ago, Canada and the world are being killed with conferences and speeches. The truth of this statement is evidenced by this unrestrained verbiage which should be replaced by action. And what can be said about the series of amendments moved a few minutes ago in connection with concurrence in the report of the committee, if not that it is systematic opposition and pure obstruction.

A committee of the house was appointed with instruction to inquire into the grievances of the employees and the claims of the employers. After weeks of discussion and investigation that committee can still, like ourselves, notice the same conflicts between capital and labour. Strikes are becoming more and more numerous, while members of Parliament are holding forth at a daily cost of $35,000 to the public treasury. Economists, or at least those who pretend to be economists, talk and talk without the slightest regard for economy. Their greatest concern is publicity and political propaganda. But neither the workers nor the people of this country can afford to wait. The government can and must end strikes through fair, energetic and immediate action. They are able to do justice to all the parties to the dispute and free this country from those woeful conflicts between capital and labour.

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North) (Text): When the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) was speaking the other day he read to the house a dispatch credited to the Canadian Press which told us that the picket lines at Hamilton had been opened, and that at least ten cars laden with men had gone into the plant. That statement was greeted with some jubilation in certain parts of this chamber. Perhaps those who applauded thought the picket lines had been definitely broken. Perhaps they believed the strike was over. But I say to this house if the strike is finished by smashing the union at Hamilton, then we are only on the verge of labour troubles unprecedented in Canada, and that is not a prophecy which will be very far wrong. Last April, when the increase of $5 a ton was granted to the manufacturers, labour was led to believe that in the $5 there was a certain amount for an increase in wages. The government would not tell the union how much was appropriated for wages; yet, as I say, the workers were led to believe that an amount was there. Because the government refused to tell the workers, we said then the government was sowing the seeds of a labour war in Canada, and in effect that is what is happening. The government cannot shuffle away from the responsibility it has in this matter.

In committee on industrial relations I imagine many hon. members learned much. They learned, for instance, that organized labour in Canada, as in most other countries, has had to fight for its very existence. Unions have had to fight to be born, and once they were created, frequently they were smashed and destroyed either by recalcitrant employers, or by the actions of agents provocateurs, or perhaps by the very apathy of the workers themselves. But it would be a great mistake to believe that trade unions are not here to stay. Unfortunately some employers seem to be of that opinion. They remind me of King Canute trying to hold back the waves of the sea. Organized labour has grown tremendously in strength in the last ten years. It will continue to grow; but, as things are now, it can only grow because it fights. We are told that organized labour is militant. Of course it is. It has had to be militant because it is faced with an equal militancy on the part of employers, who in all too many cases are determined to smash the unions. That, I think, is borne out by the evidence which was submitted to the committee on industrial relations. I refer to page 3 of the brief of Mr. Hilton, who, as the house knows, is president of Steel Company of Canada. Before that committee this man said:

> It is emphasized that the Steel Company of Canada has not been and is not opposed to collective bargaining nor is it opposed to the principle of trade unionism.

That was Mr. Hilton speaking out of one corner of his mouth. He was questioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who asked:

> I am a member of a trade union and have been since 1910, and it was never necessary in the company with which I worked, and it is not necessary in normal labour relations with organized trade unions, to get a court order to recognize the union. In a great many of the trade unions and companies that I know where there are labour relations it has not been necessary to get a court order, but in the company of which you are president the trade union was never recognized except by a court order or an order of the labour relations board? Is that correct?

And Hilton said:

> I think that is correct, yes.

That is the man who at one moment professes to believe in the principle of trade unions and the next minute admits he will not recognize them unless compelled to do so by a court order. Then the hon. member for Vancouver East went on:

> At your Canada works at Hamilton you had a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in 1945?
> A. You are asking me that question?
> Q. Yes?
> A. Yes, I believe that is right.
> Q. Did that board of conciliation make a unanimous recommendation for a form of union security?
> A. It made that recommendation. I cannot tell you from memory whether or not it was unanimous.
> Q. Did you accept the findings of the board? We will deal later with the question whether or not it was unanimous. Did the company, or did you accept for the company, the findings of the board of conciliation?
> A. If you mean did we grant so-called union security at the Canada works we did not.

This, despite the unanimous recommendation of the board of conciliation. Then the hon. member for Calgary West asked a question:

> You do not object to a voluntary check-off, do you?
> A. I do.

Pursuing the matter further, Mr. Hilton said:

> We sign a contract for one year at a certain wage rate, the next year it is going to be more. If you concede a revocable check-off this year, next year it will be something more; and it all leads up to a closed shop, which I do not approve of either.

Well, Mr. Hilton has the right to decide what he approves, but I do not think he has any right in the face of that evidence, to try to tell the workers in his plant that he believes in collective bargaining and is not opposed to the principles of trade unionism. It is true that to-day the dispute is over the question of an increase of fifteen cents, but fundamentally that fifteen cents is superficial to labour unrest in Canada. What we are in effect seeing, indeed what we are seeing, is the constant conflict we have had for so long between labour and capital as to who shall get what share of that which is produced. That is the fundamental aspect of the conflict before us to-day, and it is not one that will be resolved easily. Mr. Gordon, who appeared before the committee, had some ideas on the matter. At page 329 of the proceedings he was asked:

> Now, it was quite evident that there was a certain amount in that $5 which had been allocated for wages.

His reply was:

> No, not necessarily; that is the point I have been labouring to put forward. That was dependent entirely on the decision of the management of the steel company as to what profit level they were willing to operate on; and they could quite easily and quite reasonably have taken the attitude that they could not afford to pay anything for wages because they were not earning a profit amount anywhere near the amount which they ought to be earning by pre-war standards in relation to the volume of production that they are now undertaking.

There we see the orthodox, conventional defence of the capitalist system. Mr. Gordon says management will decide what profit level they are willing to operate on. We admit that steel is a basic industry, that it is a vital industry. We admit that our economy will collapse unless we get steel; yet steel will be produced only when the operators themselves decide that they are going to produce it. That is a position of utter social irresponsibility, the sort of position we in this party have constantly condemned both in this house and outside it. To-day private enterprise has no sense of responsibility at all to the community as a whole. It is concerned only with the making and the maintenance of its own profit position.

Mr. HOMUTH: I suppose there are no decent people at all running industry in this country?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): There are quite a number of decent people running industry. Because a man believes in the capitalist form of economy is no reason for believing he is not decent. At times I believe the hon. gentleman himself is quite decent. May I repeat part of the same statement by Mr. Gordon:

> . . . they were not earning a profit amount anywhere near the amount which they ought to be earning by pre-war standards in relation to the volume of production that they are now undertaking.

Here, surely, is a new gauge by which profits should be measured. During the war, in many cases, under the excess profits tax, the government decided that the capital invested was to be the gauge by which we would decide what profit should be paid. Now Mr. Gordon tells us it is his view—I do not say it is the government's view—that profits must have some relation to the entire productivity of the plant. In Stelco there has been no increase in subscribed capital during the last few years; yet we are told that production is two and one-half times pre-war value. Surely, then, if production has been increased so much, and capital has remained as it was, the workers in the plant, those who are the producers, deserve a greater share of what has been produced.

Mr. Gordon apparently disagrees with that, but we in the C.C.F. would say that ours is the correct position to take. For too long those who have been producing the essential needs in Canada have been exploited in precisely the same way, and capital has always been given the preferred position over human beings. In effect, it boils down to this, that so far as those who are defenders of free enterprise are concerned—so far as anybody is concerned; so far as economy is concerned, in industry—the owner lends his capital, but the industrial worker gives his life. There is that great difference, and the worker is not unduly reimbursed for what he gives. He starts in industry at an early age and, normally, if his health permits, he will carry through until he reaches the age of seventy, when he gets an old age pension. At times he may be laid off owing to unemployment. He may get two weeks holiday with pay, and very often without pay.

But the average worker in Canada cannot afford to stop work because, on account of the low wages he has been paid, he has no security. I mentioned in the house a few weeks ago that ninety-two per cent of workers in Canada who reached the age of sixty-five are penniless. And when we remember what their average wage is, we need not be surprised at that. After a man has brought up a family, clothed them, fed them, educated them, paid all the thousand and one expenses connected with raising a family, he will have very little left of his meagre earnings. Even if he got $33.60 a week he would have very little to put by for old age.

I would also say that it would be a mistake to assume that industry is the only sinner. Here is a case in point I should like to bring to the attention of the house, and particularly to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). It casts a light over what I am saying. Here was a man employed by the government from 1896 to 1946, a man with excellent references. His employment as a labourer started at $1.50 a day, and gradually increased to $4. His wife is dead; he is a widower, and maintains in his home an invalid daughter. This year, when he had reached the age of seventy-nine, the government dispensed with his services, and in recognition of his fifty years in the department reimbursed him with a pension of $19.91 a month.

How can we expect industry to be any better than the government which sets an example like that for the people of Canada? Organized workers in Canada do not want too much. All they want is some security, which is surely the right of every citizen. They want a 40-hour week, with no reduction in "take-home pay."

May I say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that the price ceiling is being shot rapidly. I have just had word from British Columbia that to-day the regional war labour board out there approved a 15-cent increase in wages and a 40-hour week for the American Can Company. Things must be very dangerous for the price ceiling on the west coast, especially in view of the fact that perhaps the Dominion Bridge Company and Heaps Engineering will also get the same award.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member said that the price control was being broken. I think he meant wage control.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): No; I said "price", because if fifteen cents here will pierce the price ceiling, I am sure fifteen cents in British Columbia would. If we are to have that pattern there I think we should have it here.

The unions favour the 40-hour week with no reduction in "take-home pay", but they do not make that request from every industry. Organized labour is willing to modify its demands according to the ability of an industry to pay. But it is not going to take the unvouched word of the companies as to how much they are earning, and in that respect I do not blame them. The workers are asking, so far as union security is concerned, for the union shop and the check-off. The workers also ask —and I am sure the acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) knows this—for the maintenance of price control in Canada.

I should like to quote at this point something Mr. Gordon said. Although he corrected the interpretation later, nevertheless the idea has gone out that this only is what he said.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend has said that price control was blown to bits, and now he says he is asking for the maintenance of it.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I said the workers are asking for price control, and I said the government is blowing it to bits, despite the fact that the workers are asking for it. Just ask the worker who will shortly be required to pay three cents a quart more for milk, and see what he thinks about the price ceiling.

Mr. Gordon said, at page 295:

> Any increase in cost is inflationary, as I said; inflationary in the sense that in increasing the cost you must increase the price.

That does not necessarily follow, and Mr. Gordon pointed it out later. Increases in cost can be absorbed in two ways, either by taking them out of profits or by increasing production. And that increased production in Canada is not going to take place unless we get the workers back to work again; yet the policy of the government to-day is designed to bring about that very inflation which it seems to fear.

Mr. Gordon made a further significant statement—and I am sorry to be picking on him all the time, but he is responsible for these statements and also for the apparent attitude which the government is taking. He was asked these questions and gave these answers:

> Q. Let us be clear about this; you indicated a little while ago that if certain things happened, if certain increases are allowed, there would be no use trying to continue the system of control of prices, that at a certain point you might just as well close up was about the way you expressed it. Was that right?
> A. That is correct.
> Q. All right, Mr. Gordon; where is that point? Do you know?
> A. I do not know where that point is.

This merely substantiates the point made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group, when he said there was nothing scientific in the principle of ten cents being the point above which we would get a complete smash in the economy. As Pat Conroy said, Donald Gordon was working on a hunch. I think anybody else's hunch is just as good as that of Donald Gordon, the man who is in charge of the wartime prices board in Canada.

There are certain other factors which the government must face. One of the most important is the suspicion, inbred and ingrained, on the part of the worker, as to the good faith of the government and of employers. In other words, the worker feels he will not get justice. Last night the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred to certain alleged violations of the law which had taken place in Hamilton. He pointed out that those now working are being paid for twenty-four hours a day, that there is a landing strip for aircraft in the plant, that employees are staying and living in the plant. And again—and this was not refuted—he said that rationed goods are going into that plant in great quantities. I am not saying that in every case the law is being broken by Stelco, but I say in certain cases it is being broken by the company, and the government is taking no action against it.

The workers see other things. They see a union member punch a scab—and the minister, as an old union man, knows what a scab is—on the nose. The worker was sent down for sixty days. Then some other person comes along and fires a gun at members of the picket line and he is fined $10. There is no justice in that.

By and large, I think the minister has made good selections in his appointment of conciliation officers, but he did not make a good choice in the case of Mr. Justice Roach. To my mind, he was not impartial, and he said that the union was run by a dictatorship because the union would not accept some of his ideas. I should like to quote from the record where Mr. Justice Roach is being questioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East as follows:

Q. On whose authority then did you, as commissioner, make this offer of ten cents across the board and the other matters associated with it?
A. I made it on my own responsibility.
Q. And if then you had no authority for this proposal, and if the men had accepted your suggestion, your proposal that this ten cents per hour wage increase should be put before the employees to be voted on by secret ballot and that secret ballot carried, what assurance did you have that the company would come through with the ten cents?
A. Oh, I had no assurance.

He expected the union to accept this hypothetical offer and then have another vote, and he was surprised because the union did not do so. Then he incorporated in his report the absolutely stupid statement that the union was working under a dictatorship.

There are one or two other points I should like to comment upon. Two or three days ago everybody was full of praise for the work of this committee, but now we are not so sure about it. I have no doubt that the members of the committee worked earnestly, assiduously and honestly, but to the great disappointment of the people of this country; they started out like a 16-inch howitzer and finished up like a pea-shooter.

There are two parts of the report with which I disagree. I do not like recommendation No. 5, which concerns itself solely with the law of picketing. If we are to concern ourselves with the law of picketing, there should also be a law on the statute books of this country about strike-breaking. Then in connection with recommendation No. 6 I find myself in substantial agreement with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). As I interpret that recommendation, it means that after a strike vote has been properly taken at Stelco the minister is given permission to go and take another vote. If that is correct, then it is a violation of the rights of trade unions in this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows that is not correct.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I do not know it is not correct, because I have been waiting three days for the minister to make a statement.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will sit down and let me speak—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am not going to sit down until I have had my say, because I do not want to listen to you just now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have been waiting for three days.

[Mr. A. M. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I assure the minister that there is no member in this house who would not have sat down to give him a chance to speak, but he has made no attempt to rise in his place. He has interrupted other speakers frequently enough, but I am speaking now and I am going to finish. I shall be very happy to hear the Minister of Labour afterwards, but I am giving my interpretation at the moment and it stands until he refutes it.

So far as I am concerned, if No. 6 is accepted as the policy of this country it will mean the end of trade unionism. It is just as dangerous and just as fatal as that. I should like to say something to the Minister of Labour and I am going to speak in a kindly way. I am going to be frank and I am going to speak with a conception of British fair play. I am not going to get down to the gutter. I am going to tell the minister one or two facts which I think he ought to know. The first is that he no longer has the confidence of organized labour in this country. For one reason or another he has completely forfeited their confidence. I appreciate that the Minister of Labour wishes to serve this parliament and Canada, but the best way he could serve this country would be to tender his resignation as Minister of Labour without any mental reservation whatsoever.

An hon. MEMBER: Says who?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): However, from the group which I see around him I doubt if we would get a better one.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I shall be glad to address myself to you, sir. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I say that the Minister of Labour would be performing a signal service were he to resign. Unfortunately, when we consider the ranks over there we find there are not many trade unionists from which we could choose some one to put in his place.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you one?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am a trade unionist and I have my card here. The Minister of Labour has a card also, I am told.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought you were a chartered accountant?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): If one of you will speak without all trying to speak together I could listen and answer. I cannot understand a rabble. The only thing I can say is that we know the devil we have and we would be uncertain of the devil we do not have. But this is certain. Until the Minister of Labour acquires the confidence of the workers of this country he is going to be faced with even greater labour troubles than those that confront him to-day.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in this debate, but everybody else seems to be taking a little crack at something or other. Ever since this industrial relations committee was first set up, a number of thoughts have been going through my mind. I must confess that I was a little disappointed this afternoon that neither of the amendments proposed earlier in the day were permitted to go through. The committee started out with a fairly big job to do and I wanted to see it done right. I am not saying that no ground was covered by the committee, but I do say that during the past weeks they do not appear to have solved the problem. It seems to me that the mountain has laboured and brought forth a mouse.

I must confess that I never did hold out very much hope that a parliamentary committee would solve the problem. I am quite certain that no information was brought out during the sittings of that committee that the government did not have already, or that they could not easily have obtained if they wanted it. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) seems to be the gentleman who conceived the idea that a parliamentary committee would be able to solve the problem and he rose in his place and made the suggestion to the government. Immediately the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) rose and said, "I am quite happy to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend." The hon. member for Calgary West has not been sitting in this house quite as long as some of us, and I want to say to him that I always am a little suspicious when the Prime Minister accepts a suggestion made by the opposition. Let me tell the hon. member for Calgary West this one thing, that the Prime Minister has all the answers. Don't ever underrate his political acumen.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Clever, isn't he?

Mr. HANSELL: He is certainly clever along that line. What actually happened was this. The hon. member for Calgary West wanted the parliamentary committee on industrial relations set up. The Prime Minister immediately rose in his place and took him at his word. The result was that the responsibility of the government was then placed in the lap of the entire parliament of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Where it should be.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not agree with that, and I will answer that remark in a moment.

The position now is this. The parliament of Canada has not solved the problem, and if the government cannot solve it they will always have the answer: Now do not talk to us because we gave you an opportunity to solve the problem and you could not do so. Under our parliamentary system of government, until it is changed, the matter rests just here, that when a political party bids for power to run the country and the people vest in it the right and the power to run the country, the government must accept the responsibility of running it, and must not pass the buck. That is the reason I desired the amendment to go through, because part of the amendment was to recognize that this was a government responsibility, and it is a government responsibility.

Are we to assume that the government did not know the labour situation before the parliamentary committee was set up? They certainly did. If they did not they were not measuring up to their responsibilities. I would ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) a question and he can answer it now or later when he replies. Does he know a single thing more now about the labour situation in Canada than he did before the parliamentary committee was set up?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will answer my hon. friend right away. None of us is too old to learn. My answer is yes.

Mr. HANSELL: I am very glad to hear that terse answer from the minister, and if that is his general attitude, perhaps the Social Credit party can even teach him something. I do not agree with the hon. member who preceded me, rushing in where angels fear to tread, even though devils do not, and demanding the resignation of the minister, because, if the minister resigns, who is to take his place? Somebody else in the government will have to take his place.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He would be a Liberal, just as bad.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes; he would be a member of the same administration, and you cannot divorce the minister's policy from government policy. So who is to take his place? Tim Buck? I have received telegrams demanding the minister's resignation and I pay not the slightest attention to them.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Why don't you fire him?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want to fire him; I am not in the firing business. I would just as soon see him there as anyone else from the same administration. It is the government who are running the country; they have this problem on their hands, and they have not measured up to the responsibility of meeting it. That is all. You have said it all when you have said that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They do not know what to do about it.

Mr. HANSELL: No, they do not. Even in this debate, what are we talking about?

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh!

Mr. HANSELL: I can enjoy the implications of that joke as well as my hon. friends can. We have been diagnosing the trouble. We have been attacking the government. We have been snipping all around the problem, but we have not yet made any concrete suggestions as to how the strike can be settled, and labour problems solved.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You mean the Conservatives and the Liberals have not?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know that any of us have. Is the thing beyond solution? Surely it cannot be beyond settlement. No problem is beyond settlement. The fact of the matter is that it is the duty of responsible government not merely to solve a problem when it arises, but so to legislate for the entire economy of Canada that problems will not arise. That is an extremely hard thing to do; I recognize that.

What is this particular problem? The labour men want more wages. Their employers, on the other hand, the steel industry, say: We are sorry but we cannot give it to you. Perhaps both of them are right; I do not know. We do know that labour wants more. Whether the steel industry can pay it or not, I am personally still undecided. But I would say this, that if both are right, are we just going to let the thing rest there, or is there an alternative? Has the committee suggested any other possible solution to the problem?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It never even thought of it.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) interjected that remark.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): He was a member of the committee.

Mr. HANSELL: I know that.

[Mr. J. L. Gibson.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: We tried to get them to think of something else and they would not listen.

Mr. HANSELL: Exactly. We in this group believe that we have a solution for these problems, a solution that would not merely heal the present sore spot on the body politic but make the body healthy so that no more sores would break out. That is the point.

I have heard a good deal against private enterprise and that the government should do this and do that and the other thing. It appears to me that my C.C.F. friends to my right—and I like these hon. gentlemen, I talk to them, you know; they call me Ernie and I call them Bill and so forth and so on—rise in their places as though they were the only champions of labour.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They think so.

Mr. HANSELL: In spite of the criticisms which have been levelled at the Minister of Labour, I do not believe that they are any more the champions of the rights of labour than is the Minister of Labour himself. That is my personal opinion.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They just talk labour; that is all.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not speaking for my group here; I make my own conclusions. The minister has a problem on his hands. I do not think he knows how to solve it. He will not come to us to ask us how. But that does not make any difference. I say here and now that our socialist friends are no more the champions of the rights of working men than is anybody else in this house or any other party in Canada. That is my honest opinion. They have a great deal to say in blaming private enterprise for our troubles, as though, in championing the cause of labour, it is to be assumed that labour itself does not believe in private enterprise. I wonder whether that is so. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) a little while ago brought out the point—I do not know how accurate he was—that in the last election—and the vote is what tells the story—in all the industrial centres in Canada east of Winnipeg the C.C.F. candidates not only did not win a seat, but lost their deposits.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That is completely wrong.

Mr. HANSELL: You tell us how many C.C.F. candidates ran and how many lost their deposits, and that will straighten it out. Anyway, we do know that they did not get the labour vote in those industrial constituencies. All I am saying is that these people who claim the right to be the champions of labour, and who are or claim they are socialists, did not receive the full support of labour, and the only conclusion I can reach is that in the main the labouring people of Canada do not want socialism.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They want results. That is the important thing.

An hon. MEMBER: And do they get them?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The government does not seem to know what to give them.

Mr. HANSELL: I want to read from an article which appeared in 1943 in the Wholesale Grocers' News. It contains a statement made by Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. This is what he said:

> As the spokesman for a labour organization with six and a half million members, I want to make it emphatically clear here and now that the American Federation of Labor stands four-square in support of free and private enterprise. We recognize the right to own and manage property for public and private profit . . . We . . . will oppose any attempt to abridge, restrict or interfere with the functions of free enterprise . . .
> Individual liberty and security are inseparably associated with the vital principle of free enterprise and the private ownership of property. These priceless blessings will remain with us only so long as we maintain the source from which they flow. They will go with the wind, pass beyond our reach and it will be difficult, if not impossible, to regain them if ever there is substituted for them any form of communism or governmental regimentation.
> Because labour understands fully that it will suffer most if ever the foundation and superstructure of free government is destroyed or impaired, it stands firm in its determination to protect and preserve free enterprise and the private ownership of property at any cost.
> Regardless of how capital and labour, employer and employee, management and workers, may disagree upon other economic, social and political questions, they stand united in defense of the maintenance of free enterprise and the preservation of the joint benefits which flow therefrom.

These are the words of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. I see that it is nearly six o'clock. I have something else to put on the record, but I realize that time is going, and I will conclude my remarks by repeating once again that in the final analysis it must be the government's responsibility to solve the problems of the country. They should so legislate that those problems will not arise; but if they arise, they will be easy of solution. Any party which bids for power must be willing to accept that responsibility.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In rising to continue the debate on the report of the industrial relations committee, I wish first to pay a tribute to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who spoke just before the recess. He always brings freshness, humour and a lot of common sense to our deliberations and we appreciate hearing him at any time.

I wish to endorse the statements which have been made by my colleagues who are members of the committee and other hon. members of the committee with regard to the way the committee worked. I should also like to pay tribute to the splendid work of the chairman and the general feeling of trying to do something to cure the industrial unrest in the country. We went to the committee meetings with a certain amount of suspicion, thinking that, possibly, the members of the various political parties would try to jockey for position. In the first few days that was perhaps a little apparent, but it soon died out because we got to know each other much better.

There were members on the committee who were new members of the house; and when the committee finally reached the in-camera stage to bring in its report there was a feeling amongst all the members—even though three of them did oppose one section of the report—that they had tried to do a good job and had worked long and arduous hours in doing so.

Now that the report has come into the house for endorsation, we find that many members who were not on the committee are condemning it because it did not settle the strikes which are prevalent throughout Canada. Throughout the proceedings of the committee I contended—and I was supported generally by most members of the committee—that our job was not to settle the prevailing strikes but to try to evolve some machinery as an improvement on the present machinery so that we could avoid strikes in the future.

I do not think any member of the committee went to its meetings, and I do not think the members of the house thought that they would go there with the idea that they were going to set the standard of wages, the hours of labour or other conditions for which unions and industry are struggling. I do not think it was our job to do that, but out of the committee has come a report which, if implemented by the government, will, in my opinion, do a great deal to cure the ills from which industry is suffering.

In fighting political battles I have never been one who has pulled my punches. When I go out to fight a political battle I put everything I have into it, but I have never yet used personalities in any election campaign in which I have participated. I resent hon. members rising in their places and asking for the head of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). When election time comes round I shall go out and try to defeat the Minister of Labour, not because he is Minister of Labour, but because he is following the philosophy of a party with which I disagree. I suppose I have known the Minister of Labour longer than any other member of the House of Commons. In fact, back in the old days he and I belonged to the same party. In those days we were fairly successful in that party. I have known him for many years and I have had a high regard for him as a man who knew labour, but he was a conservative, careful labour leader.

I remember one Saturday morning going home from Ottawa. I usually drop into a little hotel in Toronto for my breakfast because I have to stay over there. I met my friend Humphrey. Humphrey was on his way to fight a by-election in Welland after having been named Minister of Labour. I shook hands with him and congratulated him on having been named Minister of Labour. I said to him then: "Humphrey, if you are permitted to handle the Department of Labour without any political interference"—and I do not mean narrow political interference; I mean the general policy of the government—"if you are allowed to do that, I have no fear whatever but that you are going to make a real success of a very difficult job." But he is in this position. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) says, "I want more money." He provides for it in his budget and we pay or else. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) says, "These are the regulations under which you will take this or that medicine; these are the regulations under which you must work." The Minister of Labour is dealing with human beings. He is dealing with men who are not always easy to deal with. I say this quite frankly and sincerely, that many of the things which he could do and would do, many of the things which he has tried to do—and I am not giving any special praise to him—have been nullified because of the very thing which my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) referred to, namely, the lack of liaison, the lack of cooperation between the various departments of government. What better example have we than what is happening to-day?

A few weeks ago the government announced that they were going to remove the subsidy on milk. What did that mean? It meant a two-cent increase in the price of a quart of milk to the consumers of the country. The government said that this will save $20 or $22 million a year. If it were a saving and it were shown in the budget, or in the expenditures for the coming year as a saving, then we could readily say that we were going back to the normal peace-time type of business. They removed the subsidy, and the burden which used to be put on the treasury of Canada is now placed on the shoulders of the people, particularly the fathers of large families who have to buy the milk. At the same time we pick up the supplementary estimates and find millions of dollars for public buildings. Surely, when we need houses for our people, when we are trying to hold the line on inflation, when we wish to see to it that we shall not have the conditions which followed after the last war—and I went through them—at least we ought to see to it that we protect the line in every department of government. What has happened? We hear now that the producer subsidy on milk is to be taken off. In Ottawa this will mean that milk which, under the previous subsidies, cost the consumer ten cents a quart will now cost fifteen cents a quart, or an increase of fifty per cent. Then the industrial worker will come to the Minister of Labour and say, "I must have more wages. I cannot feed my family, because with the increased cost of all these things my children must have I am not getting enough money." Those are the problems with which the minister is faced. So that I say I am not one of those who will go out and demand the head of the Minister of Labour. I am quite prepared, when an election comes around, to go out and ask for the heads of everybody sitting over there, but I do say that we should at least be fair about these things.

To-night I wish to deal with this problem in perhaps a little different way from that in which other speakers have dealt with it. As I say, I do not think our committee was set up for the purpose of establishing wages, hours and so on. We were set up to try to evolve some better machinery, and if this report is implemented by the government it will at least be something. But let us go back over the years since the beginning of the war. When war broke out, a great many industrialists in this country realized that the cost of living had increased, and they raised wages. Others did not. Then came the law providing for the cost of living bonus. This was all based on 1939 figures. Were they the right ones? I do not know; I would say not. I would say that the wage rate of 1939 was not a fair rate, because of conditions that existed at that time; and certainly the cost of living, taken in those terms, was not comparable. However, that was what the government did. Then, after a time during which industry was supposed to pay this cost of living bonus, wages were frozen. What had happened? A great many industries in this country had not been paying the cost of living bonus, with the result that, when wages were frozen, under the law they could not pay the bonus which previously they had denied to their employees. So that we had in the cities and towns across Canada a checker-board system of wages which certainly was unfair to the industrial workers. Later, we had tremendous taxation imposed upon the wages of those workers, taxation which year after year caused loss of production and absenteeism. Why? Our people have become educated in the last few years. They have had to make out income tax returns, and now they know how to use figures. If you asked a man to work on Saturday afternoon he would figure that if he worked four hours his earnings for that week would be so increased that he would have to work those four hours for seventeen or eighteen or nineteen cents; and the higher his rate of pay, the less he actually received for working overtime.

The whole scheme was such that the financial policy of the government was nullifying the very thing the price control board and the Minister of Labour were trying to do. Time after time in budget debates we asked this government to grant greater exemptions to industrial workers. They refused. They were taxing the people of this country, so they said, not only to get revenue but to stop inflation. One budget came down and provided for compulsory savings. This was to give the workers of this country a backlog of savings with the government for the time when the war would be over and we would be going through the reconstruction period. The following year, after protests from all across the country because of the money that was being taken from the pay envelopes of the workers, in his budget the Minister of Finance said they were going to relieve the people of these compulsory savings. They were not giving the industrial workers of the country anything. They were just letting them keep the money which was rightfully theirs. At that time we urged, "If you want to stop inflation, increase the exemptions of the industrial workers. Put them under a compulsory savings plan if you wish, but at least they will know that when the war is over and they go through a period which may mean unemployment for a time they will have this money as a backlog to look after themselves and their families." Another budget came down. Again we urged increased exemptions in the lower income brackets. Again it was refused. I say this, and it is not being said in a critical sense but because I want to point out to the members of this house that much of our labour discord, many of the problems with which the Minister of Labour is faced to-day, are not due to the way in which the Department of Labour has tried to administer the law but to the general policy of the government, which I think was unfair to the industrial workers of Canada. If this government had brought down a 1946 budget in 1946, instead of bringing down a 1947 budget in 1946, at least the industrial workers would have been given some slight relief.

There is the whole question with which we are faced. Coming as I do from an industrial riding, I have some knowledge of industrial workers. Some of my hon. friends to my left, as I said this afternoon, would condemn every manufacturer in Canada by saying they are not honest; they cannot be trusted; they have not the interests of their employees at heart. That is the sort of stuff that starts communism in any country. Those are the kind of speeches that stir up unrest. I went to work; I punched the clock at twenty minutes after six o'clock in the morning when I first started, and I was given pretty small pay; even the employer thought he was paying me too little. But these hon. gentlemen, as the hon. member for Macleod said this afternoon, think they are the only ones who represent labour. All I could see in their whole scheme was the politics behind it all. How well do I remember that in various elections certain union leaders went out and told their followers, "This is how you vote. You vote for the C.C.F." These people talk about their love of labour and what they will do for labour, but they are ready and willing to have union leaders regiment the most sacred thing a man has; that is, his ballot. They are prepared to let those leaders turn those ballots their way, in order to "put a socialist flag on capital hill", as they decided at their annual meeting in Saskatchewan the other day they would like to do.

Mr. PROBE: Tell some of that to Mr. Hilton.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Hilton handled himself very well before the committee. And I did not see any of your men doing anything to subscribe to what your leader, and other members who were not on the committee, suggested should be done.

Let me say this, that I am surprised at what the leader of the C.C.F. said yesterday, that he is willing to tie wages to profits. Let him ask any union leader in this country if he is prepared to have the wages of his union members tied to the profits of a company. Furthermore, he said he was also prepared to advocate that personal productivity should be the extent of wages a man should earn—personal productivity. If you do not believe it, look up the records of Hansard, because I asked him the question.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It should be a factor.

Mr. HOMUTH: I asked him the question. I say these are the men who presume to represent labour; and yet, as the hon. member for Macleod said, how many of them represent industrial ridings in the Dominion of Canada to-day? The point I was coming to was this, that one thing I could see in that committee, as a result of the briefs placed there by the union, a thing which I know is bothering a lot of people back home, a thing which I know is bothering industrial workers in this country, is the fear of the future. It is a real, live fear, because the last depression is so close to us. I do not blame them for that fear. Therefore I say that if we had the type of liaison and the type of cooperation between various departments of government that I think there ought to be, many of these difficulties would be solved, and much of the legislation which passes one department and is negatived by another would disappear.

What do we find? Hon. members in this house, and particularly those in the C.C.F., find fault that we have not come in with certain specific recommendations. Let me say that two members of the C.C.F. party who sat on that committee endorsed its policy, all the way through the picture. They endorsed the report; they endorsed clause 6. And what was clause 6? Clause 6 gives the right to the working man to declare what he wants, by secret ballot. I am not going to deny him that right. If we are going to deny the working man that right, then we might as well have regimentation immediately. It is a right they have. If what many of the men who are out on strike to-day say is true, if many men, with whom I have been associated for years and who are active in labour circles had had the secret ballot; if there had been no intimidation, and if they had all had an opportunity to vote, those plants would be producing to-day, as they ought to be.

This afternoon the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) took my colleague the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) to task because he referred to communism, and because he referred to communists who were heading some of the unions in this country. Let there be no mistake; there never was a more perfect plan to communize Canada than there is at work to-day. We have seen it in the last few years. Strangers come into town and stir up industrial friction, organize a few men into a union and call the factory on strike, without any hope of winning the strike. But they do it for one purpose: They do it because they want to cause unrest. They want to thwart authority. They do not want these strikes to be settled; they do not want peace in industry. They want to create unrest, and to sabotage the whole economy of Canada. Just as soon as these men see that there is no chance of winning the strike—and I have seen it time and again; I know the Minister of Labour has seen it—they get out from under, sneak away and leave these strikers, whom they have urged to go out, holding the bag.

What is behind this plan, this well-conceived plan, a plan which they must have never expected to bring into actuality? They do this because they can sneak away and leave 100, 150, 200 or 250 strikers that they have taken out of industry, and most of whom want to work—they leave those workers holding the bag, in the belief that they have left behind at least twenty-five or thirty, or perhaps a few more, communists.

They are men with hatred in their hearts, men who hate their employers, men who hate constituted authority, men who hate everything. And why? Because they are led by these men, led to go out on strike. If they can carry out that pattern in every industrial centre in Canada, as they are trying to do, Tim Buck will have his 40,000 communists in this country.

Mr. Speaker, this is a serious situation. I find fault with the government for having passed an order in council and then not enforcing it. Our committee report says that law is the basis of society. Undoubtedly, after the most careful consideration the government passed an order in council. That order in council provided that a controller would be put into the steel company plants. The order in council provided that those who violated it would be punished; there was a punishment clause inserted. It provided that, the steel controller having taken over the plants, having taken the plants from these companies, they were no longer the property of those companies, but rather the property of the government of Canada. The steel controller had power to make agreements as to wages or anything else.

Why did he not exercise those powers? Why is the government going to allow lawlessness in this country? If we allow that, then goodness knows what will happen in the very near future. If we are to overlook the breaking of law, as it has been done in Hamilton—and I do not care whether it is industry or the employee who breaks it—and as it was done in Windsor, then surely we cannot blink at things like that. But we have done it.

Some members will say to me that under an order in council you could take these men into court and fine them for a breach of the order in council. They would say, "If you were Minister of Labour or Minister of Justice would you be prepared to drag 2,400 or 2,500 people into court and fine them for breach of the law?" My answer would be this, that if I were not prepared to carry out the order in council I would not have passed it.

I have said that when the committee met we got to know each other better. I feel that the members of the committee sat down with the honest intention of accomplishing something. We now come into the house and we find that there is certain opposition to the report.

I am not surprised at the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) toward matters pertaining to labour, toward matters pertaining to the general economy of the country, and toward industry in this country. I have never heard him say anything good about industry in this country and I do not expect he ever will. There are certain people who can continue with that attitude and that type of feeling in their ridings and perhaps the people will continue to return them to the House of Commons. As I say, I was not surprised at the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver East, because to him anyone who employs anyone is just taboo. He wants to have no association with such a man. When the hon. member was speaking in the house on November 6, 1945, the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross) asked a couple of questions. I quote from page 1894 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Manross: How many men did you ever hire?
> Mr. MacInnis: I never hired anybody.
> Mr. Manross: And never will.
> Mr. MacInnis: Quite right, and I do not want to because I do not want to make a living by exploiting somebody else.

That is the policy of one of the chief lieutenants of the leader of the C.C.F. Supposing every one who started any type of industry in this country had had the same idea? There would not have been any industry in Canada; there would not have been anything in this country. Some of those hon. members condemned communism in the committee, and I believe they were sincere; but speeches such as we have heard during this debate will certainly do nothing to bring industrial peace to this country. Rather they will do everything to stir up industrial unrest.

I do not happen to be one of those who can look back to centuries of British blood behind him; I happen to be a descendant of people who came from Europe, a long time ago it is true. They came here, and all they asked was the right to set their feet on the shores of Canada and be permitted to work out their destiny. They could not speak English when they came here, but that is 140 years ago. They saw what was happening in their own fatherland and they left, not because they hated their fatherland but because they loved freedom more. They came to Canada, and over the years like hundreds of thousands of others they struggled to make this country what it is to-day. They asked for no favours; all they asked was the right to work, to live their own lives and to raise their children with a certain amount of freedom to them.

They never thought the day would come when this land of their adoption would be faced with the very thing that they had hated over there, with the very thing that was the curse of Europe, the thing that will be the curse of Canada unless we take steps now to see that it is wiped and blotted out. I blame the government for not enforcing the law as they ought to. I blame the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) for having written to the city council of Hamilton saying, "While this committee is sitting, I am not prepared to say what I would do with regard to enforcing the law." I do not know that you should have the right to suspend a law simply because the House of Commons is sitting. Supposing we had been discussing capital punishment or thievery or something else, would you have suspended the laws because some committee was discussing those matters?

This thing is so serious that it will take a strong hand to handle it. We have a wonderful future, a future for which thousands and thousands of men died in this war and thousands and thousands died in the first great war. It is up to us to see to it that the future they fought to preserve for us is preserved. The only way we can do this is by seeing to it that the law in Canada is lived up to and that communism, with all the viciousness that it represents, is wiped out.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to compliment the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) upon his remarks, because they take me back to the old days. His views on government and the rights of labour, notwithstanding the fact that he sits there and I stand here, have not differed since those days. I agree with him on the broad question of freedom; I believe in what is sometimes called free enterprise.

I often wonder what would have happened to the freedom of some of my hon. friends during the recent war had it not been for this vicious system of free enterprise they speak of. Over fifty per cent of the industrial production of the world is to be found in North America. Had it not been for that tremendous industrial machine and the will to die if necessary to save a way of life on the part of the young men in our fighting forces, freedom as we understand it would have perished from the earth.

Let me say to my hon. friends who believe in the philosophy of communism, if you can call it a philosophy, that had it not been for the driving forces of our free institutions, communism as they understand it might have perished from the face of the earth and fascism might have reigned supreme upon the continent of Europe. Let us be frank and honest about this and give credit where credit is due.

The driving force of free enterprise, of the people who at one time stood alone to save free institutions as we understand them, was what saved our civilization. In my judgment, some of the so-called leaders in this country have deliberately set in motion policies designed to destroy the reconversion efforts of the Canadian people. Where were those so-called leaders prior to the entry of Russia into the war? Let us look at the record.

Mr. IRVINE: What has this to do with strikes?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member need not worry, I will come to the strikes. I tell my socialist friend not to worry about that. Where were they?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where were they in the Grey North by-election?

Mr. MITCHELL: Where were they—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the minister who has the floor, without his permission.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to interruptions because I have lived in that atmosphere all my life. I come from a town where we glory in it. What I wanted to bring to the attention of the house is this: You cannot play politics at this particular time with the destiny of a nation. I am sure that my hon. friend the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) after being here for a couple of sessions must sometimes like myself wish he had stayed at home to enjoy the balmy breezes of the foothills of the Rockies. I know I sometimes regret being in my present position, but like my hon. friend I felt it my duty, during the difficult period we have been passing through in the last six years, to stay on. Let me compliment him upon making the motion he did and upon the statesmanlike attitude he took on the broad question of industrial relations when he made his speech in the House of Commons. I do not say this to flatter him but he showed deep insight into the processes that have made our democratic institutions what they are, and a deep insight also into the aims and aspirations of the working people of this country. I want to point out that the motion to establish the committee was supported by every member of this House of Commons without exception. The report of the committee was a unanimous one, with the exception that two members of the committee disagreed with one section of the report.

Mr. BENTLEY: Three.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who was the third one?

Mr. BENTLEY: I was.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, then, history has been made. I did not see much of my hon. friend in the committee but he must have come along later. I believe that the committee rendered a distinct service. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), in the course of his address, asked me if I had learned anything from the committee. I am certain that the people of Canada learned something from the discussions in the committee for, after all, the processes of democratic government breathe and live on difficulties such as were presented to us. We had officers of labour organizations and of industry appear before the committee and give their opinions on labour conditions as they are at this moment. I do not think any member of the committee felt that a conciliation board of thirty-five members could settle any industrial dispute. The committee was not set up for that purpose, and the record will bear me out in that statement. I think it was the hon. member for Calgary West who suggested that we endeavour to settle the dispute in the steel industry, and Mr. L. W. Brockington, K.C., was asked to assume that onerous duty. I want to pay this tribute to Mr. Brockington: I think he served the committee well.

May I add that Mr. Justice W. D. Roach also served the committee well. At the very basis of our institutions is the right to differ in opinion, and it may be that some differed with the opinions of Mr. Justice Roach, but undoubtedly he has rendered a distinct service both to labour and to employers by acting as chairman of fourteen or fifteen conciliation boards, and he assumed the difficult position of commissioner in this dispute in the light of his previous experience.

The speeches that have been made in this house since the committee's report has been before us have given some indication of the difficulties in industrial disputes. I have had some experience in these matters, and I do not believe that you can settle an industrial dispute by making statements to the newspapers. Industrial disputes are not settled in that way. Nor can you, in my judgment, settle them by taking sides in this house. At this very moment conferences are going on in the largest industry in this country in connection with a dispute over wages. You see nothing about it in the newspapers; yet these conferences are going on in a constructive effort to effect a settlement.

I do not think you can be a trade union leader and a politician at the same time. I say that from practical experience. My Conservative friends, particularly my hon. friend the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), will remember that it was a regular thing some years ago for the Conservatives to win Hamilton East. In fact we had to pick out the sacrificial goat to take a beating by our Conservative friends. But, thank heaven, those days are past.

Mr. SENN: There is another day coming.

Mr. MITCHELL: We shall see. I remember that in 1931 I was secretary of the Hamilton district trades and labour council, and the boys said to me, "Humphrey, it is your turn next." At that convention there were thirty official delegates and I was nominated as the candidate. After the election, I woke up the next morning and found I was member of parliament for that constituency. I have found this out from experience, that I could not combine the two offices—

Mr. ROWE: You did well for a while.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is true, and I have done well since. But I found that in practice I could not be a good secretary of the trades and labour council and at the same time make the contribution I should make in this House of Commons. The two things do not work together. I am not going into the history of it. We used to run a non-political council in those days.

Mr. ROWE: "Some" non-political council. I remember it quite well.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says he remembers it?

Mr. ROWE: The biggest political council in Hamilton.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to tell him that the Hamilton trades and labour council in my day made the greatest contribution to the life of the community of any organization in the city of Hamilton.

Mr. ROWE: They must have, when they elected you.

Mr. MITCHELL: I intend to deal briefly, and I hope in a non-political way with what I think of the fundamental principles of this report and what I believe are the fundamental issues which confront the people of this dominion. Rightly or wrongly—and I believe, rightly—this nation and this committee have endorsed the principle of price control.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Massey-Harris.

Mr. MITCHELL: My prairie chicken says "Massey-Harris".

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us not get into the zoo again.

Mr. MITCHELL: I repeat, rightly or wrongly the great majority of the people of this country have endorsed the principle of price control. I am frank to admit that this is a matter of judgment, of opinion. My hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke a couple of days ago of bringing in the scientists. He also reminded us that economics is a dismal science, and we all know that no two economists in one room can agree with each other. You have to get plain, every-day people like the hon. member and myself to make the decisions. However, I admit there are two points of view. There are those who, like my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), hold that the proper thing to do is—in the language of the street—to lift the lid, get the production, and let it shake itself down. That is the course they have plotted in the United States. We think that, at least in this period of transition, the soundest thing to do is to move gradually and in an evolutionary way out of the controls which were necessary during the war. I think my hon. friend will give us credit for as much sincerity as he himself holds, and he will concede that all of us, in the final analysis, are advocating our respective policies with the simple and fundamental object of protecting the living standards of the great mass of the people of this country. Only time will tell whether he is right and we are wrong, or whether we are right and he is wrong. Naturally, I believe that we are right, because—

Mr. McIVOR: Because you know.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; I am not one of those clever fellows who bet on the horse after the race is run, like my hon. friend the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). But the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. Look around the world and you will see that in every country there is a fight to maintain the living standards of their people. And which nation has been most successful? The record and the figures show that Canada has been more successful than any other nation in the world.

Mr. PROBE: Ten families to a house.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no patience with those people who always decry their own country and their own people. When all is said and done, these policies would not be possible but for the cooperation of the great mass of the Canadian people. Like the hon. member for Waterloo South I was not born in this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was born here.

Mr. HOMUTH: Sometimes I wonder why I was born.

Mr. MITCHELL: When I listened to some of the hon. members who spoke this afternoon I wondered that about myself. I have been in most of the countries of the world, and I know of no country where I would rather live and raise my family than Canada.

I have suggested that we should look around. Let us look across the street. I sit for the constituency of Welland. I fought the last election on wage stabilization and price control, and all I had to say to my good friends there was this, "Do not ask me; just go across the border." My hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) could ask his voters the same thing, just to go across the bridge from Windsor into the city of Detroit. There is no need to go to New York or Philadelphia or Chicago to see the effects of an unrestricted price structure.

I think it was the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis)—and I am not saying this "in a kindly way"—

Mr. GILLIS: You can be as rough as you like.

Mr. MITCHELL: —who took our good friend Donald Gordon and took him to bits and put him together.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am convinced of this, that my hon. friend would admit in his quieter moments that he does not covet the job which Donald Gordon is trying to carry out.

Mr. GILLIS: I was very kind to him.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us look at the record. In the United States the whole road is strewn with men who tried to do what Donald Gordon and his organization have done so successfully in the Dominion of Canada. I know it is easy to rise in one's place in this house, with all the freedom we have, and criticize some individual who is not here and cannot speak for himself. That is the easiest thing to do. But if I have to choose between Gordon and some third-rate economist that I see walking around in the railway committee room, slipping notes to certain people, I will choose Donald Gordon.

Here is an extract from the Winnipeg Free Press, which I think is one of the best papers in Canada, although it criticizes me sometimes.

Mr. ROWE: Not very often.

Mr. MITCHELL: Probably more often than I deserve. This is dated August 20, 1946:

> The first comes from the August issue of Labor's Monthly, published by the American Federation of Labor:
> "To-day all Americans are being penalized because a small portion of American workers used the strike for political purposes last winter . . . unaffiliated unions used the strike to force the government-dictated wage price formula of February 14 which broke price ceilings. "From then to June 30, OPA granted 504 industry-wide price increases, and individual increases to some 11,500. Wholesale prices rose four per cent from February through June. These price increases of course forced retail prices upward at a slightly later date so that cost of living had already risen three per cent when OPA expired on June 30, and the rise was gaining speed . . . Practically the entire living-cost rise has occurred since the steel workers forced the price-ceiling break in February and as a direct result of this break."

Let us get the other side of the picture. The Economic Outlook, a publication of the C.I.O., rival of the A.F. of L., says:

> At the present stage of events we can accomplish more by price action than by wage action to maintain the purchasing power of labour. Wage increases, if won, are likely to be promptly reflected in further price increases. This is one of the facts of inflation that labour should reckon with in its fight to protect its standard of living.

I was reading the New York Times at lunch to-day, and in its issue of August 21 I found the following:

> UAW begins a new drive for pay rises; Files demands for 70,000 at Chrysler
> Norman R. Matthews, Chrysler director of the union, described the move as the beginning of a drive for higher wages throughout the automobile industry.
> In a letter to Robert W. Conder, Chrysler director of labour relations, Mr. Matthews asked that wage talks be reopened in sixty days. He said:
> "Drastic wage cuts which rising prices have imposed on the hourly-rated and salaried Chrysler employees leave them with no other alternative than to hereby serve notice on the corporation of their desire to reopen the matter of a general wage increase."

The last general wage increase at Chrysler came last January, when the union was granted an 18½-cent-an-hour increase for production workers and equivalent salary increases for other Chrysler employees covered by union contracts.

There is the story in six months. Some people have called me ten-cent Mitchell, but I have been called worse names than that; but let me say that I am not going to take the position that some hon. members take in the house, that you can have price control without a measure of wage stabilization. I think it is dishonest, but I will give them the credit of not knowing any better. I will go that far.

When I lived in Hamilton I did not have the reputation of kidding the working people and the farmers of Canada. I fought for higher wages. I have been in the van of every social advance in the country. I fought for higher wages and better working conditions and trade union organizations when some of the overnight revolutionaries of the country did not know what a trade union was.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Before the C.C.F. was born.

Mr. MITCHELL: In those days in Hamilton we used to call them the "latter day saints." As I say, I have always been a believer in higher wages and progressive legislation irrespective of whom it was introduced by. I still maintain that position to-day.

As I have said before in the house, we have an obligation to the millions of defenceless people in the country who cannot protect themselves. We have an obligation to see to it that, as far as humanly possible, with all the trials, tribulations, difficulties and pressures, we protect the living standards of that, as I call them, great defenceless mass of people in Canada. So far as I am concerned, while I have breath in my body I am going to continue to do just that very thing, notwithstanding what may be said by those people who, if they had their way would destroy to-morrow morning freedom as we understand it.

That brings me to another point, but I might stay with price stabilization a little longer. With regard to the present disputes, I think it can be freely admitted by all of us that in 1944 we established a labour code in this country under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour. I give credit to every party in the house for not criticizing that code at that time, which is an indication that they approved it. It was endorsed by every labour organization in the country. For the first time in the history of Canada labour organizations were protected by law and given the right to bargain collectively. I am frank to admit that the organizations played some part in it, but, since the establishment of that code, labour organizations in Canada have grown faster than at any time in their history. Let us give credit where credit is due.

Then in the Department of Labour we built up the largest conciliation service in the history of the department, a conciliation service which, in my judgment, given a degree of common sense by both sides and the will to conciliate, can solve any industrial dispute. But I do not think there is any substitution for common sense and conciliation in the adjudication of labour disputes, and that goes for both sides.

It was said by an hon. member here this afternoon, who claimed that he was a trade unionist, that we were out to destroy trade unions. Any man who would say that in this day and age—well, it is amazing to me that he should be a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Study your own legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take the director of industrial relations in the Department of Labour. He is a trade unionist of forty years standing. The director of industrial relations came from the Canadian Congress of Labour. The deputy minister of labour was an old trade unionist before he went into the labour department of the Manitoba government.

The hon. member for Calgary West will remember that one of the witnesses accused Gordon, myself and, I think, the employers, of a conspiracy to bring on a depression. Just imagine that!

Mr. REID: That is old stuff.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the stuff which makes revolutions out of this pie-in-the-sky philosophy expounded by these fellows which the people sometimes do not understand. Let me say to the employers of this nation that there are no grounds for the so-called fears expressed by some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in the last three days. As I have said before, any employer who thinks he can destroy labour unions is just wasting his time. He might just as well try to push back the St. Lawrence river. As a son of a trade unionist and a trade unionist by conviction, I believe that there is no substitution for a well-organized, well-disciplined and well-run trade union as an instrument for the advancement of the working people of Canada.

May I stay with price controls for a moment longer. You cannot have it both ways. I shudder to think what would happen in this nation to-morrow if we wiped out price control. Supposing we wiped out rent control. Let us go into the matter with our eyes wide open. What would happen if we wiped out rent control; who would be the greatest sufferers? I think everyone will agree that the working people of this country would be the sufferers. There are many other aspects of price control I could enumerate along those lines.

I now come to section 6, which everybody is bothered about. We are going into uncharted seas here, I am frank to admit, but I have always argued that if you have a good case you need never be afraid to go before any tribunal you think is reasonably honest and decent. Neither should anyone who has a good case be afraid to put it into a secret ballot box. That is so crystal clear to me. The hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) have had a great deal of experience in these matters, I am sure, as I have; and they must have known cases where people were brought in from the street to vote in what did not in the least resemble a ballot as we understand it. The united mine workers of America, from their own practical experience, saw to it that such a condition should be part of the machinery of their organization. I have a vivid recollection—one of many—of a meeting of about sixty people who, by a show of hands, called a strike of 1,400 people. I do not think that is the proper way to run any kind of organization.

I could give the house many examples. I was chairman of a commission having to do with a dispute being run by one of the witnesses who appeared before the industrial relations committee, where they brought people in from the street to cast a strike ballot. And mind you, I think that cuts both ways. I have knowledge of employers doing the same thing, so that all the disciples are not on one side. I think, with a staff skilled in the application of this recommendation of the committee, any minister of labour can use the judgment which is necessary to see to it that it is carried out fairly. If he does not he should not be minister of labour, and possibly would not be after the next election. That is the great curative force in all these matters. I believe it is well worth giving a try. I am not going to suggest that it is a cure, you understand, Mr. Speaker, but let me remind hon. members that, with the exception of three members of the committee, this was a unanimous report, which is an indication of the drift of public opinion in regard to the irresponsible leadership of organizations. That is inevitable. The pendulum swings both ways. This is an indication of the feeling in the minds of the members of the committee, who represent a broad cross-section of the people of this dominion.

The question of picketing has been touched upon. I have not a great deal more to say about that than I said when I answered the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) the other day. I am going to repeat my statement at that time. I think an Englishman's home is his castle. I believe he has a right to move from his home to his place of work or business and back again without being molested by anybody, whether they are in the employ of an employer or of a trade union. Let us walk down the middle of the road. I have known the day of the picket line. I have known the day of the goon squad, a day which in this dominion I am happy to say is fast passing. The suggestion has been made that we study the law of picketing. The law of Canada in regard to picketing is akin to the law of Great Britain. I was a party to making submissions to Hon. Mr. Guthrie, who was then minister of justice, which brought about the amendment in 1934 of the law concerning picketing. If hon. members are keen on studying that I can tell them it was the submission of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada of April, 1934. I could read it, but it is quite a lengthy submission. I remember talking to Mr. Guthrie, who in those days sat where the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) now sits.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is an encouragement. I think in five or ten minutes I can finish. Let me repeat; I do not think you can have price control without a measure of wage stabilization. We built up across this country a system of boards composed of representatives of labour and of industry, with an impartial chairman, and in some cases the Minister of Labour. Labour representation was put on those boards at the request of labour organizations. Here again, Mr. Speaker, even with the building up of that machinery and all the conciliation services, I do not know how one can settle any labour dispute unless both parties are prepared to use the machinery placed at their disposal. Let us go one step farther. The will of the majority should prevail. The vast majority of the trade unions of this country have availed themselves of the instrumentality of these respective boards. Here, however, you have men representing forty thousand people who deliberately set out to circumvent the boards established for that purpose.

We talk of industrial councils. I am all for them, but I do not believe in compulsory cooperation. I do not believe it is practical, logical or sensible. My advice to the steel workers, to the electrical workers, to the rubber workers and to all other trade unions, in their own selfish interest if you want to put it on that level, and my advice to the employers—and you can put that on the same level—in the interests of our way of life, is that they avail themselves of the machinery set up by the government for the adjudication of labour disputes in this country. Anyone who advises to the contrary is in my opinion, not rendering a service to the employers, the employees or the nation itself. That is why Mr. Brockington's task was so difficult. That is why Mr. Justice Roach's task was so difficult. That is why the task of anybody, in any dispute, is so difficult, when the two parties will not avail themselves of the machinery established by law in this country. My mind goes back to the last British general strike. I have a definite recollection of what led up to it, and what happened after it was finished. It was germinating for many months, and those of us who were there will remember it well. Mr. John Clynes, who was a minister in the war cabinet in the first great war, and secretary of one of the largest organizations in Great Britain had this to say:

> I have no doubt that we shall be told that this new-found and ill-digested policy is worth a trial. Those who have thought this matter out know that in giving it a trial they would begin by paralysing our industries and our whole social system. That paralysis would affect first, and worst, the masses of the poorer population. You cannot do it without anticipating a condition of civil war.

I believe this sincerely, that our thoughts should not be influenced by sentiment. If these present disputes are to be considered as substitutes for legal processes, then it is a challenge to our form of government and to our way of life.

I shall not detain the house longer, except to say, as my hon. friends in the committee said, that there are people in this country who do not want us to succeed in our reconversion programme. They do not fit into the pattern of things. They are the people who call for the abolition of wage controls. They are the people who call for the resignation of myself and Donald Gordon, and everybody who attempts to express an opinion in this country. I was rather glad this afternoon to see my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) in association with one of the leading communists in this country, in connection with a resolution which I received only within the last couple of days. It says:

> War labour boards and a return to free collective bargaining and the immediate resignation of labour representatives of these boards as a first step towards their dissolution and the immediate resignation of Donald Gordon, chairman of wartime prices and trade board and the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, Federal Minister of Labour.

I am sure my hon. friend is complimented. He knows the game. He comes from Winnipeg. He is an old trade unionist. He says he is an old trade unionist, and he knows the way it goes. He knows the battle that his own party has had with those people. And let me say this—

Mr. MacINNIS: We never cooperated with them, as you did.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, now; that is all right. Let me say—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nonsense.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You do not like what the minister is saying.

Mr. MITCHELL: Now, just a minute, do not be too hasty. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had a communist party candidate against him in the last election. Of course he did—and so did I.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And so did I.

Mr. MITCHELL: And he lost his deposit.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my case not only the communist lost it, but so did the Liberal and the Conservative.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then why trot out this old talk that we cooperated with the communists? That is all right for the soap-box, but it does not go here.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do not be so contemptuous of the soap box.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have spoken from one many times.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are a good man on the soap-box.

Mr. MITCHELL: And that may be true, too. I want to say this in conclusion—and perhaps I have overstayed my welcome—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are making a good speech.

Mr. MITCHELL: I say this, that what is needed at the present time is for all of us to endeavour to maintain the condition of stability we enjoyed during the war.

When we look around the world; when we look to Calcutta, to Palestine, to Yugoslavia, to Italy, and to those other countries—and among our own family group—we see the emotional let down which is inevitable after six years of terrible war. I predicted that, given a stable economy, we would enjoy a boom for many years in the Dominion of Canada. If we have that individual self-discipline, without which no government can fashion a policy, I have no fear of the future well-being of the people of the Dominion of Canada, irrespective of what political party they belong to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I think the people of Canada and the labour movement generally will be disappointed in the performance of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. COLDWELL: A free parliament; free speech!

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to maintain order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Delaying parliament.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Dauphin has the right to speak, and he has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am sure the stalwart supporters of Liberalism and free speech on the other side of the house—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, never mind that; get on with your speech.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members across the way are eager to get on with the work of the house they will help both themselves and the house by keeping quiet, because I do not intend to be shouted down. I will stay here as long as necessary.

I was about to say that the country generally and the labour movement in particular will be disappointed in the speech just made by the Minister of Labour. I am not saying that particularly to criticize the minister; I say it advisedly, because I feel the people of Canada at a critical time like this, when production is being held up by industrial unrest, and when the labour movement which to-day, I believe, is trying to cooperate with the government, is being pushed in the face, in return, would have expected that the Minister of Labour, after a long debate of this kind, would rise in his place and place before the country some plan, and some solution for the present situation.

In spite of that, we heard nothing to-night that we have not heard in the last three days. And the Minister of Labour, instead of telling the house and country what he and his government intend to do to rectify the situation which exists in Hamilton—and it is a serious situation—spent his time in lecturing the house about communism, and things of that kind. Let me say at the outset that I hold no brief for communism, neither does the party with which I am associated. However, it is strange that in June of last year before the election we did not hear these inflammatory speeches against communism by our friends the Liberals because at that time it was more convenient to keep off the subject.

What are the workers asking for to-day? They are not asking for much, only a living wage as was referred to by the speaker to my left. They are simply asking for something that will put them where they can keep their families and themselves in these post-war years. They are not even asking for more money than they were receiving; they are just asking for wages high enough to compensate for the higher cost of living. When they find it necessary to go out on strike to get this, what does the Minister of Labour do? He calls them communists.

I will admit that not all members of the Progressive Conservative party think in this way, but one member spent most of his time while he was speaking to-night, in tell us about the horrors of communism. I maintain that the time may come when it may be necessary to debate the virtues or otherwise of communism or any other ism, but this debate is not the time at which to do so. I believe that in this debate hon. members should have stuck to the question, and the question is: What are we going to do about the industrial unrest in Canada?

I think it is wrong to suggest to the people of this country that all our labour troubles are caused either by communists or by politicians. There must be a basic reason why people go out on strike. People do not go out on strike simply because they are well off; there must be a basic reason for this unrest and that reason has not been brought out. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) made a statement which I believe should be corrected. He referred to the speech of my leader who spoke earlier in this debate and he accused him of being in favour of tying wages to profits and a few other things. He was asked this question by the hon. member for Waterloo South, and he made this reply as reported on page 5172 of Hansard of August 21:

Mr. Homuth: Would the hon. member pay a man according to his personal productivity?

Mr. Coldwell: I would say that, taking an industry on the whole, the average productivity of the individual in that industry should bear some relationship to the amount he receives in wages; in addition to the productivity per man, the profits of the industry, the reserves which have been built up by the industry, the working capital and other financial factors, and the relation of the particular industry to the economy as a whole, the standard of living and wages of the workers concerned, and all the factors . . .

That makes it quite clear that he was looking at the picture in its broad form. The reason why this group has been carrying on this debate is not the reason we have been accused of. It is not to make political capital; it is simply because we feel—I have good reason for feeling this myself—that the work of the committee has not been completed. I do not intend to say anything disparagingly about the work of the committee because I have great respect and admiration for the members of it. I attended a few meetings because I was interested in the proceedings, although I was not a member. I always found the committee members to be hard working, industrious men who were putting in a great deal of their time. But the work of the committee is not completed.

To support my contention, I should like to bring to the attention of the house what the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture, Mr. H. H. Hannam, had to say in a letter dated August 14, which he addressed to the chairman of the committee. The letter reads:

Dear Sir,—

The report of hearings which your committee has conducted into industrial relations prompts us to suggest that there has been no assembling nor appraisal of facts and information on which the decisions of such a committee ought to rest. No doubt you and members of your committee feel this very keenly.

That is the opinion of the man who represents the organized farmers of this country. In his opinion the committee had not yet acquired the data and information on which it could form a conclusion. Further on, he makes a recommendation or suggestion, as follows:

We believe that the first step in facing up to this situation would be the appointment of a royal commission which would survey the division of the national income as indicated by the levels of farm prices, industrial wages and corporation profits, and make recommendations for adjustment of balance where necessary, and submit a charter of economic rights which would commend itself to the people generally, and thereafter serve as the basis for necessary action in the preservation of industrial peace and the maintenance of an equitable economic balance among all groups.

When a man such as the president of the Canadian federation of agriculture expresses the opinion that the work of the committee was not finished; when we have members on practically all sides of the house admitting that, although the committee tried to get all the information they could, there was a great deal they could not get, then there is good reason for this group moving the amendment which was moved this afternoon to the effect that the whole question should be sent back to the committee to give them an opportunity to finish the job they started.

The work of the committee was not finished because, regardless of the technical terms of its reference, I believe it was understood by the people of this country that it was appointed in a time of crisis to try to bring to parliament a formula for the solution of industrial disputes, and that formula has not been presented. The recommendations in the report are not particularly harmful because they do not mean a great deal. They are recommendations which probably could have been put in any report. But they do not do the job which the committee set out to do. The situation in Hamilton has not improved and the number of strikes have not decreased. The intensity of the antagonisms that existed has not been lessened, and we find that to-day the country is faced with the same situation that existed on July 16.

I should like to refer to something which was given as the chief reason for the difficulty the committee had. The committee was told that the chief difficulty was that the wartime prices and trade board had informed the committee and the government that ten cents was the ceiling, so to speak, over which wage increases could not go. I am not going to say anything of a critical nature about Donald Gordon, because I do not believe that a man should be attacked because he is trying to administer a policy laid down by the government. If any criticism is due, it should be levelled at those who lay down the policy.

However, I should like to point out that, as far as the wartime prices and trade board and price control generally are concerned, the same attitude has not been taken toward the workers as has been taken toward certain other interests. For example, I hold in my hand administrator's order A-1959 permitting an increase of 12½ per cent in the prices of farm implements. If you go through the list contained in this order you will find that it covers not only what we regard as farm implements but practically everything the farmer needs. This includes planting, seeding and fertilizing machinery; ploughs; tillage implements and cultivators; haying machinery; harvesting machinery; sundry machines for preparing crops for market or use; farm power; farm wagons, trucks and sleighs; dairy machines and equipment; spraying equipment and dusters; domestic water systems and pumps; barn and barnyard equipment and miscellaneous equipment. That is an instance where the prices board felt they could be pretty generous by giving an increase of 12½ per cent.

I have another order in my hand, A-1907 dated April 1, 1946, permitting increases in certain types of bedding and upholstered bedding. Pocket spring filled mattresses were increased by 20 per cent. Blown cotton and plater mattresses, including crib, cot and couch mattresses, were increased by 25 per cent. These increases were over the prices that existed on March 30, 1946. The same order granted price increases in studio lounges, studio sets, bed davenports, bed dapenport sets, lounge sets, and so on, of 20 per cent. There again it appears that the prices board was not too afraid of inflation, for it permitted generous increases on these goods.

I have a third order here, A-1973, dated April 30; 1946, which permitted an increase of 35 per cent in cotton flock or mixed cotton and wool flock and an increase of 30 per cent in white cotton felt, and an increase of 30 per cent in colored cotton flock.

I want to refer to order 620, which summarizes the ceiling prices on a number of articles up to April 8, 1946. If you go through this list you will find 150 classes of articles on which the price ceilings have been suspended completely, on which there is no price ceiling at all, and in each classification you will find from six to eight different articles. This means that the price ceilings have been suspended entirely on over 1,000 articles, and a great many of these articles are essentials in every household. In addition the price ceilings have been altogether suspended on a certain number of services such as the repair of furs; publishing and printing, repair and maintenance; repair and maintenance of boats and floating equipment. I could go on for the better part of an hour pointing out thousands of articles on which the price ceilings have been suspended or a price increase granted, some running from 20 to 35 per cent, which is a substantial price increase. But when it comes to an increase in wages for the workers of this country, the very men who made the production of these articles possible, we are told that any increase over ten cents an hour would be inflationary. I do not think that attitude can be defended.

The hon. member for Waterloo South seemed to take a great deal of pleasure in attacking the members of this group and trying his best to identify us with communism—which, of course, he knew was not true. The record of his own party on price control needed a little defending and I was surprised that he did not do something about that. It was not so long ago that some of the very members in his group who have spoken in this debate rose in this house and used every word they could think of to denounce Donald Gordon. In those days it was: Down with Gordon—Away with price control—Take off the lid. To-day, when it comes down to giving the workers of this country a wage increase of more than ten cents an hour, these same members are getting up in their places and saying: Hold the Gordon line. There is certainly something funny about that.

The hon. member for Waterloo South made quite a play about this order in council, P.C. 2901, appointing the steel controller. He rose in his place and said in a determined way that if he had been responsible for an order in council of that kind he would see to it that it was enforced. Let us see what this order in council contains and what the hon. member was so anxious to enforce. I turn to section 9 of the order in council, which reads:

> . . . and every person who fails to perform his duties as aforesaid as herein required without lawful excuse, the onus of proof of which is upon him—

I was surprised that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) did not jump on that because it is a specialty of his.

> —is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of twenty dollars for each day or part of a day on which he fails so to perform his duties.

We have come to the pass where the workers of this country are told by order in council that they must perform their duties or else they will be fined $20 a day. The government hesitated to enforce that provision and I congratulate them upon their restraint. But the hon. member for Waterloo South said that if he had been in that position he would see to it that it was enforced.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say that at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: The record will show. I believe that that is what he said, and when I recall what happened in the 1930's and the Regina riot I am inclined to believe him. What does section 12 of the order in council say?

> Any person who (a) interferes with the exercise by the controller or any deputy controller of any of the powers, authorities and rights conferred upon him or (b) interferes with any employee or other person seeking to comply with the terms of this order or (c) counsels or procures any person to violate this order, shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of (a) five thousand dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to both.

Pretty strong language; wide powers to hand over to a controller—and these are apparently the very things which the hon. member for Waterloo South would see to it were enforced.

One of the reasons why the members of this group are so anxious that some statement should have come from the Minister of Labour is this. In a few days this house, the greatest tribunal for the protection of the workers that we have in this country, will no longer be sitting, and then the government may decide to take the advice of the hon. member for Waterloo South and enforce the terms of this order in council. If they do so in the present crisis at Hamilton, something may happen there.

Mr. MERRITT: You know that he gave no such advice.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He said that had be been in the position of passing the order in council, he would have seen to it that it was enforced.

Mr. MERRITT: If he had passed it at all.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If he had passed it at all, and apparently he was in favour of it because he did not criticize the order in council; he had no opposition to it.

Mr. MERRITT: Now we have the record straight.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: An hon. member to my left asked me whether the controller had the right to settle a strike. Apparently that is one of the things the government overlooked in the order in council, giving the controller the authority to settle the strike, because section 10 says:

> The commissioner, the Hon. Mr. Justice W. D. Roach will continue with his duties as an industrial disputes inquiry commission as aforesaid, and the bargaining representatives of the aforesaid employees and the companies—

Note, it says, "employees and the companies".

> —shall continue their negotiations with a view to the settlement of the matters presently in dispute between them and shall negotiate in good faith with one another and make every reasonable effort to conclude a settlement.

After giving the controller such wide powers over practically the opinions of the workers, I do not see why the government should not have given him power to negotiate with the workers. Then he might have been able to do what is provided in section 11 of the order in council, which says:

> The controller is hereby authorized to apply on behalf of each of the said companies to the appropriate war labour boards for an immediate increase in the wage rates of employees employed at the aforesaid establishments of the said companies, and to give effect to any authorization or direction which may be made or issued by any such war labour board.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) stated this evening that, in spite of this long debate, no member of the house had presented a solution for the industrial unrest we now have in this country. I am not going to say that is altogether true, because there may have been suggestions here and there which the hon. member may have overlooked; but, generally speaking, his statement may be true. If the government wanted to solve the impasse which things seemed to have reached at Hamilton they might consider the taking over of the steel industry of Canada as a public-owned utility. Why do I say that? I know hon. members will say that it is because I am a socialist, but that is not altogether so. I am not one of those who would socialize for the sake of socialization. I am one of those who believe that where it is necessary to take over an industry or utility or service and run it under public ownership in order to make it serve the people, that should be done.

I think it is not accidental that the Polymer plant, which is a publicly-owned industry, has been singularly free from strikes. Research Enterprises, T.C.A., and a great many other publicly-owned organizations have been free from strikes for a number of years. There is something which we must face in the future; it is this. People talk about private enterprise for the sake of opposing it; but do not hon. members agree with me that in a highly industrialized and highly civilized country the point will come at which you cannot have national development and at the same time have economic empires within the nation, each trying to run their own show? There must come a point at which basic industries that have a great influence over the lives of the people will have to become public utilities. By that I do not mean that every industry has to become publicly-owned; but you cannot have economic empires, with men at the head of them who are not concerned about public welfare but are concerned only with their profits—and I am not saying that that is immoral, either; it seems to be a natural outcome of our economic system—concerned only with the expansion and accumulation of wealth in their own hands, coming into contact, sometimes suddenly, with public opinion, coming into conflict with other economic empires, and creating chaos in this country. That cannot be. Why do I say that?

I have here somewhere a quotation which I should like to read to the house. I happen to to be an adherent of the Catholic religion, but that is not the main reason why I read this. This is a quotation from His Holiness the late Pope Pius XI, in his Quadragesimo Anno, in which he points this out:

> It is rightfully contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state since they carry with them the opportunity for domination too great to be left in the hands of private individuals without injury to the community at large.

I would commend those words to all hon. members, whether they regard themselves as private enterprisers, socialists, Social Crediters or anything else, because I believe that it is sound advice. There is a point in the economic development of any country in this day and age at which certain forms of industry reach a size and an influence where they begin to affect the daily life of every person in the country; and surely the steel industry, being a basic industry, is becoming one of those industries in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: What about farming?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Somebody asks, "What about farming?" He ought to know better than that. He knows that no farmer has anything like a monopoly so far as his source of income is concerned. If the hon. member thinks otherwise he can go west and farm to his heart's content.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member quoted someone a moment ago as saying that up to the present time no solution had been offered in the house. I should like to point out that in my speech as recorded in Hansard, at pages 5120 and 5121, the solution is offered, and I commend it to the consideration of all members of the house and to labour throughout the country.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If I am guilty of having said what I did—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not "guilty."

Mr. ZAPLITNY: —it is only because the hon. member for Macleod was the one who said it. I am sorry if he did not listen to the speech of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore).

Mr. BLACKMORE: I just wanted to get it straight. Perhaps the hon. member for Macleod was not in the house at the time.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am sure that that is said with good intentions.

But to come back to what I was discussing, I was pointing out to the government—unfortunately the Minister of Labour is not in the house at the moment—that one of the solutions is for the steel industry to become a public utility for the use of the Canadian people. As I said before, I am not saying that merely because I want to go on a socializing spree, but for this reason. There seems to be a great deal of conflict in the minds of the hon. members who were on the committee itself, and a great deal more conflict in the minds of other hon. members, as to whether or not the steel companies could actually have paid the increase in wages demanded by the union and still go on making a profit and carrying on with their industry. I have not been able to find figures which could prove that either one way or the other. Neither, apparently, has anyone else, because if we turn to page 131 of the minutes of the committee we find that one hon. member attempted to find out something about the cost of producing steel from Mr. Hilton, and was not given the information. I refer to some questions by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) on page 131. Mr. Hilton had been talking about the rise in the cost of producing steel and the falling off of profits, and so on, and the hon. member said:

> Have you a copy of this submission to the wartime prices and trade board?

That was a submission of the steel company to the wartime prices and trade board to show that they required this $5 a ton increase in price. Mr. Hilton replied:

> I haven't one here.

The hon. member asked:

> Q. Is it available?
> A. It is confidential information.

That is the kind of reply that the members of the committee got. It was confidential information, so that they were left in the dark as to whether the company could or could not pay increased wages. The union contends that the company can, and the company contends that it cannot. I am inclined to believe that the union know what they are talking about, because, after all, they are the men who are engaged in the industry; they are the ones who make the production of steel possible. I have as much confidence in the knowledge of the steel industry by the leaders of the union as I have in the president of the company.

But let me refer to another attempt which was made, in this house, to get that information. On July 11, 1946, a return was brought down in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), in which one of the questions in reference to the costs in the production of steel was this:

3. What is the actual cost of production of a ton of ingot steel in each of the three basic producers' plants?

We turn to the reply, which is this:

It is contrary to the board's policy that financial information of individual concerns, which is obtained in confidence, be released.

How is it going to be possible for the members of the committee or the members of this house to decide whether these companies can pay the increased wages, whether the profits which they say they are making are the correct figures—and Stelco admits making over $4,000,000 of profit last year? We do not know whether these figures are exact. We have no access to their books. We have no way of proving to our own mind and conscience what action we should take in this matter. Therefore I say, if this basic industry were made a public utility the government would be in full possession of all the facts and figures. They could, if they wanted to—and I have no reason to believe that they would not want to—call in the union leadership, show them the books, give the facts, and say, "Here is what we are producing; here is what this industry is earning; here are the wages which we feel we can pay without depriving it of the capital required for expansion; that is the most we can offer you." Then, if the amount the government can offer is still less than is required for a minimum standard of living, I believe the union should apply to the government of this country for a subsidy for that industry in order that it may be able to pay a wage which will give the workers a decent standard of living. The decision which will have to be made in the last analysis is this: do we want production of steel in this country? Is it an industry, a form of production which is basic and necessary to our economy? If it is, we shall have to see to it that steel is produced. If the private concerns who are in charge of it to-day cannot see eye-to-eye with the working man who makes the production possible, and will not under any circumstances let anybody know what the actual cost of production is, because it is confidential information, the only course left is for the government to see to it that that industry is operated in the interests of the people.

I wish to refer to one of the recommendations contained in the report, and one only, namely, the one which starts out by saying:

Law being the basis of our society—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit me one question?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member suggests that the steel industry should be operated by the government and then we would be out of trouble. The government have a controller operating the industry now. Why are we still in trouble?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not wish to argue with the hon. member about that, but apparently the controller is not operating the industries. As I pointed out, the controller was not given the power to negotiate with the unions, which is one of the first things needed in order to settle the dispute.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Apparently the hon. member has not read the order.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I read it right here. If the hon. member were here he would have heard it. Perhaps he was not here.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member is quite right; I did hear it, but he and I do not understand it the same way.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As I say, I wish to refer to one of the recommendations of the report which starts out by saying:

Law being the basis of our society, your committee condemns: (a) the policy adopted by some unions. . .

And so on. It refers to certain unions and employers and to lawbreaking. I refer to this section, because I believe we must come to a time when we shall have to start out with this kind of recommendation and say that, justice being the basis of our society, therefore we shall have law in order to make it possible that justice shall prevail. If we start from the cold and technical angle that law is the basis of society, regardless of where justice lies, then we shall be in for trouble.

That brings me to the last thing I should like to say, namely, that a great deal has been said in this and other debates about the division of the income of industry, or the productivity of industry, between capital and labour. So far as I am concerned, I say emphatically that I am not satisfied to put labour in the same category as capital. I do not look upon these two things in the same light, because in my mind—and I can go back again to Adam Smith to prove my point if necessary—capital is only an incidental of labour. Labour is the original state of things. There is only one form of wealth in this or in any country, and that is the wealth produced by applying labour to natural resources. Capital and all the rest of the things incidental to it were created by labour in the first place. But to-day capital has got itself into the position where it has become the golden calf of our economic system. To-day capital puts itself on the pedestal, on the same level as labour and sometimes a little higher, and it says to labour, We shall decide how much of the product of your labour you shall have. I object to that.

We must get back to fundamentals and realize that there is only one source of wealth, namely human labour applied to natural wealth. The sooner we realize that, the sooner we shall realize that when men go out on strike and ask for the product of their own labour, they are doing it, not because they are communists, but because they are human beings with a sense of righteousness and justice in their hearts for which they are willing to fight.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): On July 10, 1946, P.C. 2901 was passed, which reads in part as follows:

> And whereas the Minister of Labour reports that he is advised that there is grave danger of a strike in the immediate future by employees of the companies named in the next preceding paragraph arising out of the failure of the said companies and the said union representing the employees of the said companies to settle matters presently in dispute between them;
> That a stoppage of work in the said companies would seriously curtail the essential supply of steel and would dislocate production in other industries and would be contrary to the national interest thereby jeopardizing the orderly transition to a peace-time economy in Canada . . .

And so on; which indicates that nearly six weeks ago the government recognized that there was a serious national problem on our hands. A few days later, on July 16, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) introduced his motion, which called attention to the fact that we had one of the most serious peace-time problems that we had encountered. He said, as reported at page 3488 of Hansard:

> The steel strike in Canada must focus the attention of thinking men and women on the broad question of industrial relations. We have had many troubles recently. Some have been settled and some have not.

Then he goes on to make a suggestion. He said:

> My suggestion is this, that this house should immediately set up its industrial relations committee. To that committee should be invited—yea, brought, if necessary—those persons who might not like to come.

All who listened to the hon. member for Calgary West felt that he was speaking sincerely in trying to focus the attention of parliament and of the country on this problem.

On August 22, we are dealing with the report of the committee. We have listened to two cabinet ministers who are vitally concerned, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I submit that the statements made by these two ministers are unsatisfactory to parliament and to the country. I consider that we would be failing to discharge our duties if we accepted the report of the committee and the statement of these two ministers and hurried away to our homes without facing up to this problem. If the problem were as serious as it was said to be on July 16—and it was—then parliament must face up to it and demand that the cabinet should give a statement other than the one we have listened to to-night from the Minister of Labour and the one given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, some days ago.

Speaking in this debate on August 20, as reported at page 5128 of Hansard, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said:

> Meantime, while the committee was sitting, strikes in a number of basic industries were in progress. Not only have they paralysed industries directly affected, but they are extending to industries not directly associated with any labour dispute. That situation is most acute at this moment. There is scarcely a section of the country which is not beginning to be affected by these strikes.

Then on the next page the minister concluded:

> It gets so bad that it is impossible to perpetuate itself. I believe that these strikes are nearing the point when they will either solve themselves or be capable of solution. I believe the work of the committee has contributed toward bringing about that situation, and I can assure the Minister of Labour that anything I can do as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to assist in bringing these strikes to an early conclusion, will be done.

That is not a useful contribution to make to a debate of this kind, to suggest that possibly the strikers will be starved into surrender and somehow, sometime, the matter will solve itself. If we leave without some indication of what government policy is to be, there will certainly be other strikes. It has been announced that a strike in the meat-packing industry is pending. I think it is fairly obvious that, even although management and labour might be able to get together in the meat-packing industries, even though Canada Packers might agree that they could grant an increase of twelve cents an hour, it would be impossible for such a decision to be reached while government policy is as it is. Certainly no union would be able to convince its membership that if a company can afford only six cents or seven cents, it should accept that sort of compromise. If we leave here and we have strikes in the transportation field, the meat-packing industry and a number of other most essential industries, this country will be faced with one of the most serious peace-time conditions that we have ever known.

I am very sorry the members of the house did not have an opportunity to refer this report back to the committee. I see no good reason why the house could not be adjourned instead of proroguing, as we did during the war on several occasions when it was felt that it might be necessary to call us together to deal with urgent national matters. I see no reason why the committee might not have continued its deliberations. Several of the members of the committee who have spoken have indicated that they worked under tremendous pressure, and that they were not satisfied with the amount of time at their disposal. Others who have taken part in the debate have drawn attention to serious items which were overlooked. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), a supporter of the government, made a telling criticism of paragraph 6, which reads:

> Your committee recommends that the Minister of Labour may, at the request of either party to an industrial dispute, and if he deems fit, either before or after a strike is in progress, direct that a strike vote be taken under government supervision, to determine the wishes of the men affected as to whether a strike will take place or otherwise.

Several hon. members who have participated in the debate suggested that, after parliament adjourns, action might be taken by the government at Stelco in Hamilton, that the decision might be taken by those within the plant that the previous vote had not been taken in a legal way, and the Minister of Labour indicated that he would make the position very clear. I understand that in the committee the minister made statements to the effect that he had no intention of introducing that sort of procedure, but hon. members observed that the minister spoke for an hour to-night and refused to give any commitment as to what would be the government's policy in this connection.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may just say so, I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why did you not say so when you were on your feet?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have said so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: No one heard it.

Mr. LENNARD: Yes, they did.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sorry; I did not hear it, and the record will indicate whether I am right or the minister is right. But let me call his attention to the fact that in the Ottawa Citizen of this evening there is an editorial in connection with the Card report, the last paragraph of which editorial reads:

> A strike vote, as now suggested by the industrial relations committee of the Commons, would surely have prevented these printers' strikes. Notwithstanding Mr. Millard's objections, the Citizen believes that such a vote, with a secret ballot under government supervision, would end the steel strike with benefit to all Canada.

Apparently not only members of parliament but editorial writers are under the impression that this clause gives the minister power to deal with the Hamilton steel strike, as was suggested by the hon. member for Spadina and others who have taken part in the discussion.

I do not think anyone will question the good intentions of the hon. member for Calgary West, and I accept my responsibility as a member of parliament for supporting the proposal to set up this committee. I should however, like to draw the attention of the house, to the statement made by the leader of our group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), at that time as reported at page 3491 of Hansard:

> May I also comment on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary West and concurred in by the Prime Minister. I too accept that suggestion, but in the present circumstances it comes too late to deal with the situation that has developed.

I think the editorial writers who have been criticizing the hon. member for Calgary West had some justification for their argument. On balance, I believe it was a mistake to have had this committee relieve the government of the responsibility of dealing with this situation.

Mr. MERRITT: They did not relieve the government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The matter has dragged on for nearly six weeks, and the situation is practically unchanged. Apart from clause 6, I have no great criticism of the report brought in by the committee, but it is fairly obvious that it just does not deal with the problem of the steel industry or the problem of industrial unrest in Canada.

Mr. MERRITT: Does the hon. member think the setting up of that committee relieved the government of any responsibility?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I do not think it relieved the government, but it had the effect of placing responsibility on the committee. To the public the government will be able to say, "Well, we had a parliamentary committee that dealt with this matter and here is their report; this is all they had to say." If the committee had not been set up I believe the government would have been forced before now to produce some formula in addition to what is already before the people of Canada in connection with this situation.

The contribution made this evening by the Minister of Labour was not helpful. I can understand why some members of parliament want to raise this communist bogey and accuse those who do not agree with them of being communists, though they never make very clear just what they mean; but I did not expect the Minister of Labour to take time, in such an important public statement, to raise this question, certainly not in view of the associations his party has had with the communist party.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Do you know the situation in British Columbia?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Oh, yes, I know that in all parts of Canada—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The C.C.F. is supposed to be arm-in-arm with the C.I.O., which is solidly communist out there.

Mr. COLDWELL: You know we have expelled the communists in British Columbia, and you people criticized us for being undemocratic when we did so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. members that when an hon. gentleman has the floor he must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have a copy of the Owen Sound Daily Sun-Times for Saturday, February 3, 1945, in which I see a full-page advertisement which is inserted "by the authority of the North Grey Liberal Association." It goes on to say:

Union leaders coast to coast support McNaughton. The labour leaders pictured on this page represent tens of thousands of Canadian trade unionists. These men say: "Put patriotism before partyism—and back McNaughton!" As trade union leaders, men who have worked in the best interests of the membership of their union, and in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole, they feel that the people of this country need General McNaughton in the House of Commons.

Then it has the pictures of these "union leaders from coast to coast"; everyone a known communist. They are Fred Collins, Malcolm MacLeod, Charles Murray, Alex Welsh, Pat Sullivan, and so on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read them all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Jack Turner, Charles Murray, Jack Shaw, Nigel Morgan, George Gare, William Edmiston, George Harris, Bruce Magnuson, Peter Dunlop, C. S. Jackson, Jack Taylor, Dewar Ferguson, Harry Hunter, Cyril Lenton, Harold Pritchett, James Davis, Malcolm Murdock, Michael Kennedy, C. R. Sullivan. They are all either known communists or fellow travellers.

Mr. COLDWELL: And many of them were interned.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes; many of them were interned for part of the war. When it suited the Minister of Labour and his colleagues they paid for a full-page advertisement showing pictures of well-known communists who say, "Back McNaughton. Back the Liberal party. Put patriotism before partyism."

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say to my hon. friend that I do not mind what he says about other people, but I have fought the communists all my life. You are talking about me now; you are not talking about somebody else.

Mr. COLDWELL: But not during the Grey North by-election nor during the last federal election.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have fought them all my life. I do not believe in their philosophy or in their principles, if they have any.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It might interest the committee to learn that the Liberals were very generous. They not only paid for a full-page ad for the communists, but they had a full-page ad for the Progressive Conservatives. On page 9 of the same paper is this ad:

Send a North Grey man to Ottawa—not an Ottawa man to North Grey. Be sure to vote Case on Monday. Issued by authority of the North Grey Liberal Association.

Mr. CASE: Almost unanimous.

Mr. KNOWLES: The C.C.F. paid for their own.

Mr. COLDWELL: We paid for our own.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure hon. members appreciate the fine spirit which prevailed in Grey North when the Liberals paid for a full-page ad to bring the present hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case) to the House of Commons. I also have two pages—

Mr. CASE: You took up a collection to pay for yours.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We do not apologize for that. I also have a copy of the New World for August, 1944, which states:

Why I support Mackenzie King.

And it is by Tim Buck. Here we have the pictures of these two well-known Canadians, side by side. One is the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, P.C., C.M.G., M.P.— and with all the rest of his titles. And then, right across the page is Tim Buck—

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Period.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —of the Labour Progressive party. So that I do not think it becomes the Minister of Labour—

Mr. COLDWELL: Or any other Liberal.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —or anyone else on the other side of the house to raise this communist bogey during this or any other debate.

Mr. Speaker, the material has been covered very fully, and I do not plan on repeating anything that has been said. The Minister of Labour mentioned that in some parts of Canada he is called ten-cent Mitchell. I think five-cent Mitchell would be more appropriate for him, because there is just five cents—

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is thinking of the collection plate.

Mr. McCANN: He is used to the five cents.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And that is about all it is worth for the sermon—five cents.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We make no apology for the fact that we do get money for our political party from people who do give nickels and dimes; and we do not despise them. I notice it came out in the evidence that the steel workers make some contributions to a political party, as per capita dues. They pay two cents per member per month in some cases, for political action.

Mr. MITCHELL: Which they have a perfect right to do.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes. I think it also came out that the Steel Company of Canada contributed to campaign funds. I want to make it very clear that the Steel Company of Canada never gave a five-cent piece to the C.C.F. But the members apparently were a bit embarrassed to press Mr. Hilton too far—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): What about the brewers in Saskatchewan?

Mr. NICHOLSON: —to find out how much they had given to each party.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You organized the breweries.

Mr. COLDWELL: We never have had a cent from the liquor industry in the whole of our existence.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Why did you stop organizing the breweries in Saskatchewan? Because there is more money leading them.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is untrue.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now, to get back to the point I was making—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why do that? This is fun.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I want to point out that the minister and Donald Gordon have taken the stand that a ten-cent increase is all that the price ceiling will allow. It has not been made clear in this debate, nor was it made clear to the committee, why the ten cents was pulled out of the air. Why was it not nine; why was it not two? Why did you reach ten cents?

The five-cent increase means an additional forty cents a day. I noticed in the evidence the management of Stelco would not come clean and put their cards on the table to demonstrate that they could not pay this increase, or that they could not have carried on if they had not had the $5 a ton increase.

I was in the United States last winter when their steel strike was in progress. The dispute there was not as to whether the steel companies could afford to pay more. They took the position that it was not the business of the unions to know whether or not the extra could be paid. My information was that the steel companies there could close for six months during the present year and be in a better financial position at the end of the year than they were in any ten years prior to the outbreak of the war. Their plan was to close down and break the unions.

Fortunately the administration in the United States recognized that this course of action could not be followed. They gave the companies an increase of $5 a ton, but it was mandatory that those companies in the United States should pay an additional 18½ cents an hour.

I am not surprised that hon. members in the committee were favourably impressed by the labour representatives who gave evidence before the committe. Those men made it quite clear that they were not asking for anything that would put the steel companies out of business. I am sure all members of parliament were interested in the little booklet that was presented to them, to give us information regarding the situation. This was given weeks before the strike broke out, and it pointed out that unless something was done, a strike would take place.

A number of questions were asked and discussed frankly. Is $33.60 a week too much? The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) posed that question this morning. No member of parliament has risen in his place and said that $33.60 a week, or $1,750 a year, is too much in this day and age.

We have come to the end of the war which has enabled us to do many spectacular things in the field of production. We contributed generously to mutual aid. We managed to maintain a measure of price control, which, I agree, was more satisfactory than they had in the United States. It was very satisfactory, considering all the factors concerned.

But I admit that Donald Gordon is unreasonable when he takes the position that the Canadian economy will not permit $33.60 a week for these steel workers. Just this week we passed a bill giving increased salaries to judges. According to the public accounts, I find that 271 judges are to have an increase of $637,000 in the next year. I admit that brings a lot of pressure on the price ceiling. Yet Donald Gordon did not raise his voice in protest.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, it is all right to give $20,000 to a judge who is already getting $15,000, or to give $16,000 to one who is now getting $12,000, but it is not all right to give this increase to the steel workers! I understand that the increase the steel workers are seeking would cost Stelco an additional $2,500,000. "$2,500,000 more for the steel workers?—we cannot do it." But, "$670,000 for the judges? —why, that is no problem at all."

Hon. members last year participated in legislation to increase our "take-home pay." I supported it, and I take my share of responsibility for it. But I must not lose sight of the fact that what I have done for myself I should do for the other fellow. Two hundred and forty-five members and ninety-six senators voted themselves an additional $2,000 a year, or a total of $682,000 for 341 parliamentarians, and yet Donald Gordon said that we could not give the steel workers in the steel companies an additional $2,500,000 in order to bring their minimum wage up to $33 a week, or $1,750 a year.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Where did Donald Gordon say that?

Mr. COLDWELL: In the committee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You are putting words into his mouth.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That nothing over ten cents—

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Where did Donald Gordon say that? You are a clergyman and you should stick to the truth.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My understanding is that Donald Gordon threatened to resign if anything over ten cents an hour was granted.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is not what you said that Donald Gordon said. You should know about sticking to the text. You should not put words into Donald Gordon's mouth. You have enough words in your own mouth.

Mr. NICHOLSON: During the war there was a normal work week of forty hours and the workers were quite prepared to work overtime, but the argument is that it is better to have everyone working a 40-hour week than to have one group working fifty, sixty or seventy hours a week and then have a large number of unemployed.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Who are working fifty, sixty or seventy hours?

Mr. NICHOLSON: There are a lot of people in Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Tell us where.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The men on the great lakes were working a 12-hour day.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Not in the steel companies.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Members of parliament—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Get back to the steel companies.

Mr. MacINNIS: If an hon. member wants to interrupt another hon. member he should rise in his place and ask permission; he should not sit in his seat and carry on continual interruptions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Should not an hon. member sit in his own seat.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member, like all hon. members, should stick to his text.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Another section reads:

Can the companies afford to pay?

At this point the "practical man" enters. He says: "All this is very fine. No one wants to see steel workers getting less than $33.60 a week. Forty hours is long enough for work in such a heavy industry. No one can deny men wanting two weeks vacation with pay. But can the industry afford these objectives? Are you trying to drive your employer into bankruptcy?"

The steel workers can be quite frank and reply: "We don't know. We don't think so, but we don't know."

You see, despite all the talk you hear about workers and employers being "partners" or members of "one big, happy family," the working partners in the steel industry don't know for certain what the owning partners really earn. The owners don't give their employees that confidential information. It seems as if the best the steel workers can ever get is the flat assurance that, whatever their request might be, the company can't afford it. Peculiarly enough, after an increase is granted, the company does manage to keep on going.

However, on the basis of what can be found out from study of public financial reports, here is what seems to be the case.

Take the three big steel companies, for example.

They all functioned during the war and didn't lose any money. They show increases in profits and peculiar increases in reserves, capital value, depreciation reserves, etc. All of them received support, in cash, buildings and equipment from the government.

I was interested in noting that when Donald Gordon was before the committee he said as reported on page 285 of the proceedings—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will my hon. friend permit an interruption? I am sure he wants the record correct. He said a moment ago that the evidence disclosed that they all received cash, buildings and equipment from the government. I do not think he is correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am just reading from the booklet prepared by the steel workers, and I think the hon. member will agree that their information is quite trustworthy. If the hon. member will indicate that particular companies did not receive it, I shall be glad to take his word.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am speaking only from memory, but my memory is that the only assistance received by any company was in the form of expedited depreciation. I think that is what was said. May I correct my hon. friend in another matter because, knowing him as I do, I am sure he will want the record to be accurate? Speaking of Donald Gordon's ten cents, he will remember that I said that I felt he had not proved his position. What he said was that he could not support a ceiling on the basis of anything substantially over ten cents, but in using the figures you did as to one company in your comparison with members of parliament and so on I think the hon. member should be fair to Mr. Gordon. Mr. Gordon said that the ten cents would be a pattern and that it would apply not only to the steel companies but to our whole economy. He said that if it were spread over our whole economy, knowing the spread it would take, he would not undertake to carry on. I think that is pretty accurate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I find I am in essential agreement with the hon. member for Calgary West. In connection with the ten-cent ceiling I want to say that I think it has been pretty well established by now that if the fifteen-cent increase had been granted the pressure on the price ceiling would not have been nearly as great as has been created by the prolonged strikes. I cannot prove this, but I have been advised that nails are selling in several parts of Canada at $25 per 100 pounds. I am sure that if this strike continues, the serious shortage of supplies will create a much greater pressure on the price ceiling and make it more difficult to maintain controls than if a reasonable increase had been granted.

To come back to these companies, when Donald Gordon was before the committee he pointed out the difficulty they had had in getting financial statements from the steel companies when pressure was being brought to bear to grant a $5 per ton increase. He said:

We laid down the position that we would have to be shown that their over-all position was such that they would be in a poor financial condition. Mr. McMaster took violent objection to that.

And again:

I should say to the committee that we leaned heavily upon the company for the factual information we required, and while we tested that information to the best of our ability, it is true that we depended largely upon the accuracy of the steel company's figures.

The hon. member for Cariboo made it quite clear that that sort of evidence was not satisfactory. Last night, when the leader of this party was speaking, the Minister of Labour interjected to say that their traditions were such that they did not run away from problems. While it is getting late in the season and many members have made commitments that are pressing, I feel we would be failing in our responsibility to the Canadian people if we left for home without having some formula from the administration that would indicate what will happen in the industries now on strike and in the other industries that are going on strike.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will give you the formula right away for both sides—obey the law.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That brings me to an editorial which appeared in a paper which has been very kind to the Minister of Labour and the administration. On Tuesday, August 20, 1946, the Toronto Daily Star contained an editorial entitled, "An impracticable order in council."

Mr. McCANN: That is on the record three times already.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This part is not on yet. After referring to the fact that the government has passed an order in council taking over the operation of the three steel companies, the editorial continued:

> At Montreal yesterday, Mr. Kilbourn said that use of his powers as controller to arrest striking employees "is not practical." Of course it is not. And it is not practical to fine every striking employee $20 per day for each day or part of day that he is on strike. Such a provision is impossible of enforcement; and even if it were, it is a negation of the principle of collective bargaining. It should never have been included in the order in council.

Does the minister suggest that he is going to enforce the law, that he is going to put these men in gaol or fine them $20 a day.

Mr. MITCHELL: That section has been in the industrial disputes act since 1906. Every time we have put in a controller we have got an agreement to the satisfaction of the employees and the employer, and I am convinced that if both sides had gone along with the controller in the steel industry there would have been no strike.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am sure that if the minister had not made his ten-cent speech, indicating an increase of ten cents as the ceiling, the problem would have been solved.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know my hon. friend does not want to be untruthful. Let me again say that the Minister of Labour never said that at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is on the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not going to fool the workers or anybody. I said this, that if you have even a one-cent increase in wages it goes into the price structure. It cannot help but do that. I know what you are trying to do for political reasons.

Mr. COLDWELL: Say what you did say, for the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said this, that whatever increase there might be, I questioned very much whether we could hold the price ceiling with even a ten-cent increase. I think it is far more honest to do that than to give the working people of this country pie-in-the-sky as they were given in the United States.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That makes it clear that the minister considers that ten cents an hour increase is the ceiling.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister interrupted me and still has not made his position clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: To explain it in simple language, a suit of clothes will not fit every member of the house. I am sure that my hon. friend the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) could not wear my suit of clothes.

An hon. MEMBER: Nor you his.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would burst his.

Mr. MITCHELL: I could not wear his either. I think an increase of ten cents in some instances would destroy an industry. That can be very easily understood. Take some small town in Saskatchewan, from which province the hon. member for Mackenzie comes. What would apply there would not apply in the city of Toronto.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about steel?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend and his associates were critical of the increase in the price of farm implements. Yet steel is the basic thing that goes into farm implements.

Mr. COLDWELL: And you allowed a $5 increase to the steel industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know that story. The workers in the agricultural implement industry accepted a ten-cent increase.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is obvious that the minister did not say enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am concluding my remarks with an appeal to the government to make a statement. I understand that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is returning to Canada shortly. This matter is so important that the people involved in the strike should have a statement from the government that would indicate that these problems are going to be solved before the members leave for their homes.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend wants a pattern. I think the best pattern is to go before a jury of your peers, and in this case that is the regional war labour boards in Ontario and Nova Scotia. Why should you be afraid of them?

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the subject of industrial relations has been pretty well covered. I do not intend to bring up any new points this evening, but I want to go on record with respect to one thing. I agree with the members who have urged that this house should remain in session until this strike has been settled. I am not going to say any more on that.

I was a member of the industrial relations committee, but unfortunately I was called back home and had to resign from the committee. Every member of the committee did his best to find a solution of this problem. The evidence given by one man stands out in the industrial relations committee. That was the evidence given by Mr. Donald Gordon of the wartime prices and trade board. Apparently the members of the committee were unable to break down the statement made by Mr. Gordon that a ten-cent increase in wages to the steel workers would break the price ceiling structure in this country. When that point was made I think the committee and the government should have got together to get all the facts with respect to the situation and either break down that argument or admit that it was sound. Personally I do not think it is sound.

Mr. CLEAVER: I prefer to take Donald Gordon's opinion.

Mr. MOORE: That may be your opinion, but there is something else you ought to consider.

Mr. CLEAVER: Do you want to lose price control in this country?

Mr. MOORE: No; I am in favour of price control.

Mr. CLEAVER: You make me sick.

Mr. MOORE: But who broke the price ceiling first? It was the government's policy to grant an increase in the price of steel and an increase in the price of farm machinery and increases in the prices of three hundred different commodities last January. That was the beginning of the break in the price ceiling structure.

Mr. CLEAVER: No matter who is to blame, do you want it broken?

Mr. MOORE: No, I do not. If we had had a proper investigation we could have arrived at the facts, and an increase in wages above ten cents could have been granted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Moore) is entitled to be heard, and I think we should keep quiet and let him have his say.

Mr. MOORE: I am just going to make one other point in connection with what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had to say a little while ago. He stated that during the war free enterprise on the American continent was responsible for some fifty per cent of the production of goods which took place throughout the entire world.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. MOORE: I copied it down—fifty per cent of the production of goods throughout the world took place on the North American continent. We will look it up in Hansard to-morrow. The point is this, that that production took place largely in war plants, and, according to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) in the year 1943, almost eighty per cent of the goods produced in Canada were made in new plants built by the government or in plants assisted out of public funds.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Lalonde) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, who won the election?

Mr. SPEAKER: I said I declared the motion carried.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I was paired with the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 11.13 p.m.

Friday, August 23, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO ISSUE OF PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES FOR 1943 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of certain communications I have received from the farmers in my constituency asking when the wheat participation certificates covering the 1943 crop will be made available. The money is needed at the present time in connection with harvesting. Some time ago the minister said these payments would be made by this time, and I would appreciate a statement for the benefit of these farmers.

[Mr. Moore.]

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have been getting letters too, and I have been getting letters from other members of the house about the same matter. The difficulty is a physical one. I received assurances earlier that distribution of these cheques would begin within a very few days, and I gave that information to the house. Very recently I had occasion to give definite notification to the wheat board that, if necessary, increased staff must be obtained and, if necessary, increased quarters must be acquired in order to have these cheques issued. Cheques may be on the way now. I have done everything in my power to urge the wheat board to get these cheques out just as soon as possible, and I believe they will be out very shortly.

MILITIA PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENSIONS, ALLOWANCES AND GRATUITIES

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Militia Pension Act to bring up to date the existing provisions of the act and to provide that time served on active service be included in the pensionable term of service of persons appointed to the permanent force prior to the first of April, 1946; and also to add a new part to the act, respecting pensions, allowances and gratuities, applicable to all persons joining the permanent force after the 31st March, 1946, and to those persons coming under the present act, who may, instead of remaining thereunder, elect to come under the new part.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. BRACKEN: Should we not have a brief statement from the minister?

Mr. ABBOTT: Briefly, the purpose of the bill which will follow is to amend the provisions of the Militia Pension Act, to bring them substantially into agreement with the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I thought that if the resolution were adopted this morning and first reading given to the bill, so that the bill might go before hon. members, they would appreciate the nature of the proposed amendments.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 392, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

569. Army and related services (commitments $25,843,524), $283,170,171.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, a number of questions were asked during the course of the debate the other day which I promised to answer later. Perhaps it might be well if I were to do it now, before further questions are asked.

The hon. member for Skeena asked what disposition was being made of naval buildings in Prince Rupert. The Prince Rupert base, with the exception of the wireless station, drill hall and two other buildings, and the fuel oil installation, has been transferred to War Assets Corporation for disposal. The wireless station and fuel oil installation are on a care and maintenance basis, while the drill hall and the two other buildings are being held temporarily for use by sea cadets and possibly a naval reserve division, when formed. Ordinary temporary construction would, in the course of closing the base, be dismantled.

The hon. member for Lake Centre asked if I would advise him as to what action was taken with respect to Major James Alexander Elliott. I stated that I would examine the file and see what I could get. I have done so, and I find that the then minister approved the removal of this former officer from the Canadian army on October 21, 1944 on the ground of misconduct. The misconduct referred to had nothing whatever to do with the signing of documents which permitted certain personnel to evade the provisions of the national selective service regulations. I find that our first information—the first information that the Department of National Defence has with reference to his alleged activities in this regard—was on receipt of a letter from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on November 1, 1944, after his removal from the Canadian army. I may say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been furnished with all the information in the possession of the army with respect to this particular officer.

Mr. COCKERAM: Was this officer court-martialled?

Mr. ABBOTT: He was not court-martialled. He was removed from the army for misconduct, and was out of the army when this particular matter came to light.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the nature of the misconduct? Was it the fact that he said he was a graduate of a university—which he was not—at the time he joined up?

Mr. ABBOTT: Although there is considerable noise in the chamber I have gathered that the hon. member has asked about the nature of the misconduct for which Major Elliott was removed. It was for by-passing proper channels of communication, and countermanding orders, without authority.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the purport of the communication from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police regarding this man? Did it not have to do with the fact that he had signed certain medical discharge certificates in blank and turned them over to individuals?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would have to check the files again. I am advised that they communicated with us and asked for certain information. It is probably indicated that he was accused of action such as my hon. friend has suggested. But if the matter is of importance I can look at the files again. I do not suppose I could produce the communication, but I could probably advise the committee as to the nature of the offence. It came up after the man was removed from the army—I wish to make that perfectly clear.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested that the reserve army should be issued with boots. I have made inquiries and I am pleased to advise that boots will be issued to all reserve army personnel.

The hon. member for Calgary East asked for a breakdown of the 10,990 other ranks as among the different branches of the service. The total strength as of August 10, 1946 was 10,990 other ranks, divided among the various branches of the service as follows: R.C.A.C., 608; R.C.A., 960; R.C.E., 808; R.C Sigs, 596; Canadian Infantry Corps (C.I.C.), 2,245; R.C.A.S.C., 1,415; R.C.A.M.C. 522; R.C.O.C., 1,166; R.C.E.M.E., 1,077; R.C.A.P.C., 300; C.D.C., 155; C.P.C., 29; C. Pro. C., 312; C. Int. C., 47; C.M.S.C., 562; general list, 26; unspecified, 162.

I know it is considered to be an unforgivable sin for a minister to hold up his own estimates; but since it may not be possible for me to be here this afternoon I thought I might add something to the question of the alleged destruction of useful boots and other types of army equipment, arising out of the dumping on the Point St. Charles dump in Montreal of certain quantities of that material.

First I want to outline the wartime policy with respect to the disposal of equipment. As to new clothing, that which had not been used and was in its original package is returned to ordnance stock for re-issue. Reconditioned clothing is given the necessary treatment to bring it up to a minimum of fifty per cent to sixty per cent of expectancy of further wear. Clothing of that kind is returned to ordnance stock for reissue. Clothing which is non-repairable or condemned, that is, clothing which would have less than fifty to sixty per cent of wear after repair, is dealt with in the following way: It is transferred to the Indian affairs branch with no mutilation. Second, boots are issued to prisoners of war with no mutilation. In that respect, and as I think I pointed out before, the mutilating of condemned footwear was discontinued by instructions issued under date of July 29, 1941. Third, suitable cotton garments are cut up as a source of wiping rags for use in the army. Fourth, suitable woollen garments are disposed of to processing mills to rework into war clothing. This is the wartime policy that I am speaking of. Fifth, textile materials which are not usable, either for transfer to Indian affairs or, in the case of boots, to be issued to prisoners of war, were sold as scrap after mutilation. Footwear that was not usable as material to be transferred to prisoners of war was sold in the whole state after marking to indicate lawful purchase.

The reasons that necessitated that wartime policy was, first, that it was considered of the utmost importance that the largest possible percentage of clothing withdrawn from troops be reclaimed for further use in the army. Second, military clothing available to unauthorized persons during war time was a threat to the security of the country. Third, it was necessary to take measures to prevent trading in army clothing by military personnel. Fourth, wool from non-serviceable military clothing was an essential source of supply in the manufacture of cloth for uniforms, and its flow to processing mills was controlled by the wool controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply. In addition, certain types of cotton were a vital source of wiping rags for army use which otherwise would have had to be purchased in a time of general scarcity. Finally, the Indian affairs branch of government, by its programme of alteration and reworking of condemned army clothing—under strict control for security reasons—made use of important quantities of clothing and footwear which were released at fair prices to assist in Indian relief work and craft training. That was the policy during the war.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Then as to post-war policy, the factors governing the wartime policy, some of which I have indicated, have of course now diminished in importance and the present policy for the respective categories is as follows: First, the policy with respect to new clothing is the same as it was in war time, that is, it is put back into ordnance to be reissued. Second, reconditioned clothing is handled the same as in war time, except that the standard has been raised to 70 to 80 per cent expectancy. In the case of non-repairable or condemned material, that is, that which contains less than seventy to eighty per cent of expectancy of further wear, first, the clothing and footwear is classified into generic groupings by type of garment, declared surplus and shipped to the War Assets Corporation reclamation depot for relief clothing at Valleyfield, Quebec. No mutilation is authorized. The removal of military insignia is of course necessary. Second, a certain amount of clothing, such as coveralls and other protective garments—this is the type of garment worn in garages—may be excessively damaged or soiled, and in order to prevent the soiling of clean garments or to avoid a fire hazard it is not included in shipments to Valleyfield. Such clothing is reported as pounds of scrap in its proper category without mutilation and is disposed of by War Assets Corporation to local scrap contractors. Finally, wiping rags can be obtained by the army from War Assets Corporation, Valleyfield depot. That is an outline of the wartime and peace time policies with respect to the disposal of service clothing.

With respect to the material which was condemned in Montreal, as I said in the statement I made the other day a court of inquiry made a full and intensive investigation. There is no doubt that some of these canvas shoes had been mutilated before being sold as scrap, but it was not possible as a result of the court of inquiry to ascertain who had done the mutilating. The committee will recall that Mr. Berry in his statement to the press said that up to the time this matter was discussed it had been the policy of War Assets Corporation to mutilate canvas shoes which were considered not suitable or of no commercial value, in order that no shoes should be sold which had not been disinfected or which were in a condition which made them improper to be sold in the regular channels of sale. Since this matter was brought forward they have discontinued that mutilation. It may well be that some of these shoes were mutilated by War Assets under those conditions, and I would think quite properly.

From hearsay evidence which I have received it would appear that a certain number of shoes which appeared to be serviceable had been sold mutilated. I refer particularly to one pair of gutta percha shoes bearing the date 1942 which had been mutilated, but it is impossible to say who had done it or when it was done. However, on inquiry it was ascertained that there could have been no substantial mutilation of serviceable shoes, if in fact any serviceable shoes had been so mutilated. Of course there is always the possibility that in a large organization like the army a man may deliberately mutilate a pair of shoes in order to get a new pair. In any event, I repeat what I said when I made my statement in the house. I am glad that this matter has been brought forward because it is most important that the public should not get the impression that there is a wilful waste of public property. However, it struck me as an absurdity and I could see no rhyme or reason for a man mutilating a good pair of shoes, and that is why, to use a slang phrase, it just did not seem to tie up. I want to assure the committee that so far as the army is concerned, and I feel sure the same thing applies to War Assets Corporation, every precaution is being taken to see that no serviceable article is mutilated or sold as scrap.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Reverting again to Major Elliott's case and the explanation given by the minister, I should like the minister to place before the committee—there can be no question of this being privileged—the letter written by the commissioner of the mounted police to the army in November, 1944, and also any subsequent correspondence between the commissioner and the army. Furthermore, I am interested in knowing the procedure taken to remove Major Elliott, particularly in view of the fact that there was no court martial. I was always under the impression that an officer could not be dismissed from the service by any other means than through the instrumentality of a court martial.

Before dealing with that, would the minister be kind enough to read the letter or letters received from Commissioner Wood?—because according to my information it was Commissioner Wood who, subsequently to receiving instructions from the deputy Minister of Labour, notified his headquarters in Toronto not to proceed further with action against Elliott, Begley and Arnold. If the minister will do that, then I have some further questions to ask.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the letters here, and I shall give consideration to whether or not they are properly producible. As to the other point raised by my hon. friend, I am advised by the experts on military law, of which I am not one because I did not attain a sufficiently high rank, that a man can be removed under paragraph 267 for military inefficiency.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the latter I am not in disagreement, but now that the minister has had some days to consider the case of Major Elliott—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have had other matters to consider.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A question has been raised with regard to a matter which affected the war effort of this nation, and on a number of occasions I have met an impenetrable wall in trying to get information. Surely the minister has had opportunity to consider—

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not like that "impenetrable wall". My hon. friend asked me for a statement as to the action which had been taken with respect to Major Elliott, and I have given him a full and complete statement. I have told him that Major Elliott was removed for misconduct and inefficiency on duty. I do not think there is any impenetrable wall about that. It is just a clear concise statement of the facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely if it is all so simple and so clear, there should not be any delay in production of the letter or letters. The minister is not going to assume, is he, that a letter received from the commissioner of the mounted police regarding an officer in the army, no matter when it was received, whether before or after he left the army—in this case it was after—should not be producible to the House of Commons? Apparently two counsel had arrived at the conclusion that a proper case had been made out. The mounted police had fully investigated the matter and had determined to go ahead; they were simply awaiting formal instructions. These instructions were not forthcoming, not because of any desire or action of the mounted police, but in consequence of a direction of the deputy minister of labour. After the letter was received from the commissioner of the mounted police, was or was not Major Elliott interviewed by the representatives of the army? How many of the medical discharge certificates or medical discharge documents disappeared from Camp Borden or were lost while Major Elliott was in charge at Camp Borden? My information is that in the case against one Lawrence Schrupsole, of Toronto, who was prosecuted in April or May, 1945, it was revealed that Major Elliott did give a statement to the mounted police to the effect that he had signed a considerable number of documents in blank and had turned them over to Mr. Arnold. All I am trying to find out is the basis upon which, after investigation and recommendation by the mounted police, the deputy minister of labour decided that, regardless of whether or not there was a conspiracy to interfere with the war effort of this nation by assuring to certain individuals medical discharge certificates to which they were not entitled, there should be no prosecution and the mounted police should be hobbled, first on the ground that there was no evidence that money had passed when there was clear evidence of a conspiracy as revealed by Lennox in his evidence, and secondly on the ground that the war was over and therefore prosecution should not be considered.

I know that the minister himself had nothing whatever to do with any impropriety in this matter. But I want to know what the commissioner of the mounted police alleged against Major Elliott. Surely there can be no question of privilege here. This is a request for information. I have not been able to get these documents by a motion in this house. In a matter affecting a goodly number of persons, in connection with which there was an investigation which lasted from December, 1944, to March or April, 1945, the government would lead the house and the country to believe that the complete file has been brought down. Actually only eight letters are on the file in regard to what the commissioner of the mounted police communicated to the Department of National Defence, yet that was one of the matters covered in the order which was made by the house for the production of the papers. The order read:

> Order of the house—
> For a copy of all correspondence passing between the Department of National Defence and/or the Department of Labour, and/or the Department of Justice—

There were no qualifications to that order. My hon. friend mentions this letter. Does he not consider that it passed between departments? Is not the mounted police under the Department of Justice? As a matter of fact no question was raised by the Department of National Defence as to their not having certain documents when they made their answer to this return. They did say:

> It is understood that copies of the correspondence in question will be furnished by the Department of Labour.

The minister of Justice would have this country believe that a return consisting of eight letters, without the enclosures—therefore the letters required are not there—constitutes the full file on an investigation into a conspiracy widespread in its ramifications. Surely any reasonable person will realize that an order made by parliament without qualification has not been complied with. All I am asking at the moment, however, is for production of the correspondence between the commissioner of the mounted police and the Department of National Defence. Only by that means can parliament achieve through the medium of questioning what it has not been able to achieve as a result of an order passed by the house.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Chairman, while we are on the subject of courts martial it might be well to review the whole system of courts martial in the army. Some time ago I asked for the production of General Price Montague's report on conditions in Holland, but my motion for the papers was voted down. The minister will remember that there were prosecutions in Holland of certain junior officers and of a senior officer. The junior officers were found guilty and punishment was meted out by the court. The senior officer, more or less on the instructions of the prosecuting officer, was acquitted. At the trial the prosecuting officer had this to say:

> It would pain the entire army to see one of its most distinguished members come to grief on such charges as these. We would all rejoice at an acquittal.
> However, if the court feels later conduct did not measure up to his own earlier standards then a verdict of guilty must be registered.

I state now that that was interference with the course of justice by the prosecuting officer. Unfortunately this is not the only case. I am not saying that the present minister had anything to do with it, but it was a well-known fact in the army that many courts martial were ordered by the then minister of militia in spite of the fact that the cases had previously been disposed of. It seems to me that if there is going to be interference by the minister, if he can order courts martial to take place where and whenever he so desires, there is something wrong with justice in the army. I believe that any system whereby ministers of the crown can require the judge advocate general or a district officer commanding to court martial an officer or a man, with or without justification, needs to be completely changed. It amazes me that within the last few weeks this officer, who as I say was acquitted on the orders of the highest officers, has since been placed in one of the senior positions of the Canadian militia. If the militia is to be efficient, if it is to be a force which can be looked up to not only by the men serving in the army but by the people of Canada as a whole, great care must be taken in the selection of the senior officers; because if the men in the ranks have not the respect for their officers which they should have, and if the people do not respect the force, you will never get a permanent force in this army.

I should like the minister to enlarge on this matter. There is no question in my mind that Major Elliott should have been court-martialled. The department knew about what he had been doing. Had I been someone else, no doubt the then minister would have ordered a court martial of that officer and he would have been punished if found guilty. The whole system of courts martial in the army must be revised.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I think I had better anwer this question.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not a military man, but I take an interest in this question, partly because I come from a city whose people suffered more casualties in two wars than any other city in Canada. The minister may think that this is all a joke, but it is not.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no.

Mr. CHURCH: The joke is on the party on the other side of the house, which presents us with all these estimates and no plan for defence for the future. The opposition has been very courteous and helpful to the government, and it is not my wish to delay the proceedings; they should have been through two weeks ago.

During the first great war and ever since that time I have taken much interest in the work of the department. We have had very fine ministers at the head of it. As to the non-permanent militia, which used to be called the militia, but is now known as the reserve army, there is no "reserve" about it; in twenty-four hours it was ready for active service in both these wars.

I say to the government that this should not be a political question. We should have a committee on national defence. That would have been much better than having a committee on external affairs, which in its discussions travels all over the seven seas and does nothing except to bring a lot of irrelevant questions before the house. It is important to have a proper defence committee of the House of Commons. They have one at Washington, they have one in the old country.

The men who put their time, their money and their lives into the reserve army, the old militia, deserve well of Canada. If continued along the right lines in the future it will be the backbone of the country's defence. Incidentally I would call attention to the fact that, visiting Canada next Wednesday or Thursday is the great field marshal and commander in chief of the forces who marched across the North African desert, Viscount Montgomery.

In my opinion, without proper plans the money which this department proposes to spend between the end of the second great war and the beginning of the third war—because there is a third war coming and it will be right on our shores—will be wasted. The peace pacts and peace policies the united nations and of Paris and Potsdam and other places have collapsed, and Europe is to be divided as decided on by the original big three at Yalta, Teheran, Potsdam and Malta; and the middle and small powers cannot change it at all. In the face of those facts we should have in my opinion a joint defence policy for the whole commonwealth of nations, on land, on sea and in the air. That is most important. You have lost the Pacific, you have given up the bases on the Atlantic for ninety-nine years. You have thrown away the control of the Atlantic from Newfoundland to British Guiana. Nothing is so valuable as the study of history in connection with military matters, and a recent textbook of great military importance has been written by Lord Wavell, who is now in India. I hope the minister will read it He shows that in the two great wars Hitler and the Kaiser made the same mistakes as Napoleon did. It consists of a series of addresses in which he points out mistakes made in the last two wars and the need of empire defence. I advise the minister to ponder these lessons for Canada, because we are going to make about the same mistakes again if we are not active to prevent it. In my opinion we should never have given up the Atlantic naval and air bases in exchange for a lot of old ships, only one-third of which were used. That lease transaction should be cancelled and charged up to lend-lease, which it was in the dark days of the battle of the Atlantic to save America from invasion. In that way we would be enabled to play some part in the defence of our own country and of the other British dominions in a future war or a future battle of the Atlantic.

As to the Pacific ocean, we have been practically cleared out of the Pacific, although before the war started Britain had the whole Pacific situation in her own hands on land, on sea, and in the air. I urge upon the government that there is no point in wasting any more money as it has been wasted on our old militia methods. There must be co-ordination between the army, the navy and the air force, and there must be a proper defence policy for the whole empire. If war comes, whom will we have to depend on? We shall as always have to depend for our defence on Great Britain and the dominions; for notwithstanding all our great ally the United States has done, we have seen the trend of some of the recent discussions at Washington, and they are going to be isolationists again. So in the event of the third war we shall have to depend on the mother country and the dominions; and what are we doing? What are we doing here? Is there any evidence of a defence policy which will prepare this country for the future? We have suffered enough as a result of unpreparedness, and we might as well realize that the next war will take place on our own soil unless our defence is properly prepared and coordinated, because we shall be jammed in between the pincers of the Atlantic and the Pacific, and our great land, for fifty years so much coveted by Hitler and other dictators before the last war, will be again endangered, because we shall have repeated the mistakes we made before. Have we done anything to get a common empire defence policy? No. Little has been heard about cooperation with Britain and the other dominions or to hold the allies we had. There should be a common defence policy for the whole commonwealth, on land, sea and in the air, as regards recruiting and every other phase of military action; and to keep India and the Suez and give up no bases to anyone. The last war showed the folly of relying on voluntary recruiting. During the war which has just closed I did not say much on the question of conscription, but let me tell the government that, in view of the order in council action they took the other day, they are going to have a great deal of difficulty in getting the men on whom they rely, the veterans of two long wars, and the younger brothers and sons of the present veterans, to enlist in the reserve or permanent army. They will be inclined to allow somebody else to do it. Remember that but for the men who went overseas we would have experienced all the horrors of war on our own soil.

I am very glad to see the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) back here to-day. He and other hon. and gallant members are in a better position to speak on these matters, which, as I have intimated, very closely concern the soldier city of Toronto. I believe that the action taken the other day will make it almost impossible even to recruit for the reserve army or the future militia of this country. Nothing has appeared in the press about it because everyone is afraid to say anything, but fortunately this is a free parliament and the few who are not afraid to speak up have an opportunity to do so.

While I have great respect for those on the other side of the house and all hon. members here, I think we should have a common defence policy for the British commonwealth of nations as a whole. This is not a vaudeville show, it is not a burlesque performance, but it is in danger of turning into one, because that is largely what we have had here so far as the main issues are concerned. They have not been discussed in any sensible fashion, with wisdom, learning and knowledge of our previous national mistakes. I impress upon the minister the importance of having one policy for the whole commonwealth to which Canada should contribute, with equality of service and sacrifice for all our population in every province. If the empire should decide, as I hope it will, to rally to the defence of the mother country and therefore the defence of the empire itself, then I suggest that the policy should be based on one of contribution pro rata by the white populations of the different dominions.

In Canada there are 11,500,000 people, in Australia 7,500,000, in South Africa 3,000,000 white, and in New Zealand 1,500,000 white. I would like to see all these white populations contribute pro rata to the population of 46,000,000 in the old country. The contribution could be made chiefly in the form of food, and Britain could then be able to maintain her excessive population without having to export exchange in return. That, I submit, is a very sensible suggestion because, apart from other very important considerations, the British have been our best customers in food, grain and other products of that kind.

The empire should also have bigger ships and aeroplanes, some of which could be built in Australia and some in Canada. The important thing is that we should have unity in the empire. What I have been stating here forms the substance of a motion and the remarks based upon it in the British House of Commons on the question of a common defence policy. Under such a scheme servicemen from Great Britain and other dominions could be brought here for training. I think there is a good deal of common sense in that suggestion also. The two wars that we have had have shown this. I suggest that when Field Marshal Montgomery, commander in chief of our forces, comes here next week, the government should have a plan with regard to operations on land, sea and air to submit to him, just as Australia and New Zealand will have when he visits those countries. There is no use in our wasting a lot of money when it is obvious that what is needed is a defence committee. This is the 111th day of the session and no one so far has mentioned certain questions that are interlocked with this question of a common defence policy. I refer to trade, immigration and external affairs. There has been no debate on any of these topics. We have not for one moment considered, in connection with this problem, what the loss of India will mean. We have not stopped to think what the loss of the Suez canal will involve. We have never discussed these questions; not a word has been said about them. The Suez canal has very aptly been described as the jugular vein of the British empire, and all the questions involved in the loss of India and the Suez canal are interwoven with the defence policy of this country.

I would ask the minister to be kind enough to look into a recent article in the National Review by a great British soldier and a member of the House of Commons. I refer to the National Review of May, 1946: "Is our occupation really necessary?" and also another number of reasons are set out why Britain should withdraw the troops she is at present maintaining in Germany. This well known authority gives fourteen reasons why those occupation troops should be recalled to England—five military reasons, five political reasons, three moral reasons, and one hush reason—that if we walked out Russia would walk in. Russia is already in. After all, Germany has been beaten to a frazzle, her industries cannot recover, and she cannot do anything in the way of recruiting men. In the debate in the British House of Commons on the subject of empire defence, and in these articles to which I have referred, it is pointed out that the men now in Germany are needed in England and Canada in reconversion, and the time has come for the withdrawal of the force from that country. I called the attention of my good friend the member for Nanaimo to this question the other day and asked him to study it. As regards recruiting I have always been an admirer of Poland and of her people, but I would draw the minister's attention to an item that appeared recently in the Evening Standard of London discussing the status of 160,000 Poles in England and 6,000 Poles in the old country to be sent to Canada. The interesting question is, how many of those 6,000 Poles were collaborating with the Germans during the war, fighting not on the side of Britain and her allies but against us? The evidence, the paper says, seems to be that these 6,000 Poles are some of those who were bribed by the Germans with good food and pay to join the German army, and thus get out of Poland as civilians. Many of them fought in that army. The Standard says they were part of those who fought in the German Wehrmacht during the late war and were captured in the Italian and western campaigns. Is it fair to this country to bring such people into Canada without knowing anything about them? In the British House of Commons there has been a very searching debate on this whole question, but we have no time for such things. I ask for a check on it, when no British soldiers are brought to Canada by immigration. We have not one hour to devote to the most important problem of all confronting us, namely, a proper modern defence policy for Canada to be coordinated with the defence policy of the rest of the empire.

What is the government's policy with regard to external affairs? We have a committee on external affairs, but what has it done? Nothing. I suggest that they have been too prone to follow the American military and political pan-American initiative and in the future we may find the policy evolved in Washington one of isolationism.

There is one other matter I would like the minister to look into and that is the position of the permanent militia. In the past these men have had to put their hands in their own pockets, and pay for typewriters, offices, supplies, et cetera, and to contribute their pay to the company funds, or they would have got nothing. Is that the way to encourage recruiting? We cannot do without the support of labour and free enterprise and employers when we are discussing any question of empire defence and the reserve army. No element enlisted more readily than labour in this war. The working men and their employers have an important part to play in recruiting for the reserve army. In the early days of recruiting in this war I saw young men on January 7, 1940, standing in front of the armouries, wearing neither sweaters nor coats on a cold morning, waiting for the armouries to open. That shows how anxious they were to enlist. They could not get in before ten o'clock and in the meantime charitable organizations had to supply them with meals. Abuses of this sort should be removed.

The minister was himself a very good soldier; he is an able and likeable minister, and I must say that I was surprised at what he did the other day by order in council. I may as well bring the matter up now. I refer to the question I raised on a motion for the adjournment of the house when I was told that I might bring it up in connection with the estimates. I shall not go into that this morning, at this stage of the session, but I can tell you that it is going to have a very serious effect on recruiting for the reserve army. People are not going to waste their time in serving their country if that is the policy of this country; if we are going to throw overboard Britain and all the dominions who saved our shores here, and give that sort of treatment to the fine men of the reserve army who were the backbone of the militia in two great wars as well as the South African war, the northwest rebellion, the Fenian raid and so on; and the 1885 veterans never got a nickel out of those earlier services. They were the men who made the militia; they did their duty, and their sons and grandsons are in the forces to-day. If we are going to pass orders in council like this and still keep in custody as deserters some 864 volunteers, all of whom served at the front for three or four years, while we take no action against those who stayed home and ran away from service in this country, then I tell you that you can say good-day and good-bye to any defence system in the future in Canada on land, sea and in the air.

The first duty of a citizen, as I see it, is to defend his country. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend"—meaning his country. That is why you enlisted in the first war, Mr. Chairman, and the men who went with you; that is why so many enlisted during the last war, to save civilization. Speak for no party but only as a private member. I need not detain the house long over this matter except to say that a mistake has been made. The government have a majority. They have acted by order in council over the head of parliament, with an utter contempt for the House of Commons while in session here. We might as well all go home, because we have nothing to say about this thing. "Parliament will decide" is a myth. Do you think I am going to go out and encourage people to enlist now? Unfortunately I was not able or qualified to enlist myself or I would not have been here at all. How are we going to be able to support the militia when matters are dealt with in this haphazard fashion? I say this in all kindness to our friends in one province. Canada will never forget the old land of France in the last war, a country to which in the first great war the eyes of the whole civilized world were turned. Britain should make a new alliance with France. As Sir Eugene Tache said, should our flag in Canada ever be hauled down, "the last shot in defence of our country will be fired by a French Canadian" We should have union, that union which is set out in the inscription to Montcalm and Wolfe on the plains of Abraham, with equal rights for all, and equality of service and sacrifice. During the last war this house met in camera—I did not attend the session—to deal with matters concerning the near approach of the enemy to the shores of the St. Lawrence. But for the forces of the mother country, her fleet and the cooperation of the dominions, we would have had the awful horror of war in our own land; the gestapo, the police, the loud speaker, the concentration camp, the whip; and hundreds of thousands of our population in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes would have been carted off to work in the German mines. So I think we should pay tribute where tribute is due.

In conclusion, I can tell you that we are going to have a rude awakening unless we profit by mistakes and institute a forward defence policy. I appreciate what has been done by the minister and by all those who has occupied that office, including my hon. friend who is wearing the Mackenzie school tie to-day and who we hope will have a very pleasant holiday, because he has earned one; he has worked hard as leader of the house. The present minister of army and navy is a student and a gentleman of very considerable ability. I saw him at Niagara camp as a young volunteer; and I appeal to him to try and stimulate recruiting. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said the other day, and as I suggested, I hope he will travel across the country for that purpose, if his health is still good enough when this session is over. We are apt to be talked to death here, and somebody may be charged with murder. In my opinion this place is becoming more and more like 999 Queen West in Toronto, and the sooner we conclude our business and close the better for all concerned and the better for the health of the country generally.

Mr. KNIGHT: There are two subjects I should like to draw to the attention of the minister. The first might very easily have followed the minister's talk about how these uniforms were converted to rags. There is a good deal of speculation around my home city of Saskatoon as to the amount and disposal of army material stored there. According to sessional paper 248 of July 16 some 87 carloads of material were stored in the T. Eaton building in Saskatoon, including 6 carloads of wearing apparel, 46 carloads of bedding, 35 carloads of camp equipment. I believe this material has to be moved in the immediate future. I do not know whether the T. Eaton Company requires its property, but I understand this material is to be disposed of, and there is some speculation as to its ultimate disposition. I presume the army has seen to it that the material has been kept in good shape, that it has not suffered damage from moths or vermin, though I was not able to elicit that information by my question. It is interesting to note that the premises were leased from the T. Eaton Company on January 15, 1941, and that since that time the dominion government has been paying this company $1,000 per month for the use of that property. For some reason the rent now has been reduced to $980. It would be interesting to know what fraction of the building was given back to the T. Eaton Company for that $20 a month.

Mr. ABBOTT: Some space was given up.

Mr. KNIGHT: I see. That is the situation. One question I asked was in regard to the ultimate disposal of this material, and I was informed that some would be kept for the use of the army, and that any not required for the use of the army would be declared surplus to War Assets Corporation for disposal. That last sentence interested me, because on several previous occasions I had pleaded with War Assets in an endeavour to get two tents for the boy scouts in my home city. I have been trying to get those tents ever since I was elected, and I shall consider myself a successful member of parliament only when I succeed in getting those tents for the boy scouts.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend had approached me, that might have been arranged. In the case of equipment of that kind, while it may not be a general rule, where need is shown for boy scouts and so on we arrange to declare tents surplus. They go through War Assets and are sold to the boy scouts. Under certain circumstances, where things were available from surplus stocks, we have lent them in cases of emergency. I should hope there would not be any feeling that these tents could not be obtained.

Mr. KNIGHT: Through you, Mr. Chairman, I might say to the minister that my correspondence in my office upstairs will show that I have made application for these tents and have been refused. I will not say that refusal came from the minister's department.

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be from War Assets, and they probably did not have any tents at the time.

Mr. KNIGHT: I do not know how long these materials have been stored, but 35 carloads of camp equipment would mean a lot of tents.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, that would not be all tents; that would be all kinds of barracks stores.

Mr. KNIGHT: I understand that, but I assume some fraction would consist of tents, but in any case war assets have refused to supply those tents to these boy scouts. Perhaps the minister will make some comment on the whole situation, but I should like to ask if any of that material is material left over from the first war. I do not mean the war of 1939-45, but whether any of that material has been lying about since the first great war. I should also like the minister to comment on whether any of this bedding, for example, would be suitable for civilian as well as for army purposes. I think there is no harm in airing these matters; it is in the interest of the public that they should be aired.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Blankets should be aired anyway.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, to protect them from moths and vermin, so that they will not be put on that rag pile the minister was telling us about.

Mr. BOUCHER: Political vermin.

Mr. KNIGHT: I shall not say anything about political vermin. Perhaps the minister would comment on that before I would refer to another matter which is less contentious.

Mr. ABBOTT: Commenting generally, none of this equipment stored there has been there since the last war. I do not know what type of bedding this is, but I should imagine it would be the type suitable for civilian use. If it is not required for army purposes it will, in the usual way, be declared surplus and disposed of by War Assets Corporation.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to discuss one other point having to do with the disposal of wartime property, and this time dealing with buildings. As the minister knows, or as he can easily guess, there is an extreme shortage of housing in Saskatoon. Many of the people affected are veterans of the last war, and particularly veterans who are attending or who wish to attend university. With a view to correcting that situation R.C.A.F. buildings have been brought into use. The provincial government in Saskatchewan have fitted up what they call community apartments, which consist of 88 suites for young married men, one of the stipulations incidentally being that they must have families before they can qualify for one of these suites—an unusual stipulation. Now they are making provision for 44 additional suites from R.C.A.F. huts or buildings being brought in from the town of Davidson, at which point an air field was located during the war.

There is another scheme afoot, although it is not yet developed. I am sure prorogation of this parliament will take place before a settlement of this matter can be made; I therefore wish, now that I have the opportunity, to bring it to the attention of the minister.

The university of Saskatchewan will be overcrowded with students next year. A great many of these will have no place to live. The mayor and city council are acting in collaboration with the provincial government and have set out a scheme under which they would like to use some of the surplus buildings at Dundurn. There are many empty buildings at Dundurn Camp, as I have no doubt the minister knows. They are located about thirty miles from the university. The suggestion is that through the cooperation of the dominion and provincial governments, and the city, there might be such a thing as establishing a colony of these young veterans, so that they could have their wives and families with them while they are attending university and could live in some of these empty buildings at Dundurn. Transportation of course would be a big problem; but with the cooperation of the provincial government, which controls a government-owned system of buses, I believe the transportation difficulty might be overcome.

I take this opportunity to bring the matter to what I hope will be the favourable consideration of the minister, so that when he is approached upon the subject—if indeed that has not already taken place—he may be in a position to give a decision.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be glad to look into the matter. I had an opportunity earlier this year to see the magnificent university at Saskatoon. I chatted with some of the people there at the time and I know that in common with other Canadian universities in this coming year we are faced with a serious housing problem. My own university of McGill is up against the same thing. If and when a request is made—it has not yet been made—I can assure the hon. member it will receive sympathetic consideration.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I intend to take only a minute of the time of the committee to mention two matters of concern about which I know something. I have no military achievements whatsoever, with the exception that once I was a lance-corporal in the boys' brigade of the Methodist church in Regina. That is as far as I got. Therefore I do not discuss matters of a military nature. However I should make a suggestion to the minister, one which I have no doubt has been made before. It has reference to courts martial. During the war I appeared in quite a number of them, one of which I remember lasted eight days—and perhaps may I say, in my own defence, appearing at all times without fee, as perhaps a little contribution I might make in my own way to the war effort. But in my view the whole system of courts martial is wrong. I am not referring to what an officer in the field may do in respect of those minor things over which he has charge. My suggestion is that in each military district there should be an appointee who would be in the position of judge, and that such appointee would not be in uniform, but would be in civvies. He would have nothing to hope for by way of promotion, because there would be no further opportunity for promotion.

Why do I make this suggestion? I have in mind a court martial of an officer holding the rank of lieutenant-colonel. On the court were five officers, two of whom were brigadiers. We had a judge advocate from Victoria—and a very fine one at that. We had a prosecutor from London, Ontario. That court martial lasted eight days, and ended with a reprimand, or exactly the same decision which had been rendered by the district officer commanding in district 13, Brigadier Harvey. I am sure that court martial must have cost the country between $4,000 and $5,000; and I refer to it only by way of example. That court martial had been ordered by the then minister of national defence, Colonel Ralston. The men who comprised the court were fine men, honest men—I have no criticism in that respect at all. But they all had certain ambitions in the army. And no one can tell me that after going through the history of a case, where there has been a court of inquiry and where a district officer has made a decision, following which the court martial has been ordered, the persons sitting in judgment are not going to be affected by those conditions. Unconsciously they will.

Let us take another case, coming down to lower ranks. We find that a court martial has been held and perhaps an acquittal ordered or a light sentence imposed. I state no secret when I say that it is a custom in the army for the divisional commander, or whatever his rank may be—the person higher up, anyway—to telephone or to send notes saying, for example, "if this thing goes on, discipline will be weakened"—or will disappear. In other words my thought is that justice cannot be administered properly when, all the time, there is a senior officer back somewhere who is in a position to criticize, and who is always in a position to assist by way of making promotions. On the financial side—and I advance this idea for the minister's consideration—on the financial side I am quite sure that it would not be an added expense. As you know, when senior officers are charged you endeavour to bring in persons not in that area and so the expense adds up. I make the suggestion knowing perfectly well that you cannot do anything about it now. I had about ten experiences with courts martial during this last war; I am not complaining about what they did—that is not the point—but it does seem to me that there is something well worthy of thought and I am inclined to think that the suggestion I have made may be of value. I turn now to something which may not be regarded as being so constructive, the letter from the commissioner of the mounted police.

Mr. ABBOTT: If there is a letter. I do not know whether there is, and I want to make that clear. I have not found a letter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister said there was.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said that we were requested by the mounted police to give information. There may well be one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Irrespective of what the means of communication may have been, knowing about the mounted police I am perfectly certain that it would be in writing.

Mr. ABBOTT: I expect you are right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There will be five or six copies on seventeen or eighteen files. I know that it is the way they operate. I missed a bit of what the minister said this morning, because I was late, but I have been sitting here trying to put myself in his position and to think of a cogent reason why it should not be produced. I have been utterly unable to do so. If we care to go back, we find there is an order of the house. Maybe that order was passed hurriedly and without enough consideration, but there it is, an order of this house. But leave that out of the question for the moment, and remember in suggesting that I do not mean that one should lightly disregard an order of the house. What is the position? Here we have a report from the mounted police reading, if I read anything correctly, that there has been a prima facie case made out and naturally that is something for prosecution. After that we have the institution of the prosecution delayed, and we finally have it proscribed altogether on instructions from the deputy minister of labour.

I realize the minister has an equal regard to that which I hold—I say this with respect for all the other people whom we hear are working miracles—for the finest police force this world has ever known, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am sure that we are all of that opinion. While I realize the inference is that it did not come to the minister because this is not his department, I think he should give consideration to this matter. Someone in the government is leaving that splendid body of men under a shadow. They have reported that there is this situation, that there is this case, and prosecution is stopped. Believe me, that shadow will be a lengthening shadow, and in my judgment it is utterly unfair to leave that splendid body of men in that position. If for no other reason than in defence of the mounted police I say, with great respect to the minister and to the Minister of Justice, that that report ought to be produced.

Mr. ABBOTT: With regard to the second point my hon. friend has raised, I do not know that there is such a report. The information upon which I based my answer this morning to the hon. member for Lake Centre was that the Department of National Defence were requested to provide information as to Major Elliott. If there is correspondence between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of National Defence, and there may well be, I have not been able to find it. I have not the files here. If I understood my hon. friend correctly, the report made by the deputy minister of national defence was that it is understood that this correspondence is being produced by the Department of Justice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Department of Labour.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought it was the Department of Justice. As I understood him, the file was between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of National Defence. That would be the ordinary course.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is the Department of Labour. It states that it is understood that copies of the correspondence in question will be furnished by the Department of Labour.

Mr. ABBOTT: I understood my hon. friend to say the Department of Justice. I will look into the matter. I have not the order before me, but my recollection is that it called for correspondence between Justice and National Defence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, between the Department of National Defence and/or the Department of Labour and/or the Department of Justice.

Mr. ABBOTT: The three departments. If there is correspondence between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, which I take it is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the Department of National Defence which is properly producible under the order, it will be produced. If there is such correspondence, I do not know why it was not produced. I will look over the files, and if there is correspondence that is producible under that order, I will see that it is produced.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Without any qualification?

Mr. ABBOTT: Without qualification. That is all there is to that. It was indicated by the hon. member for Calgary West that this order was passed too hastily. I do not think that interdepartmental correspondence should be produced, but the order was passed and if there are letters which should be produced under that, I will see that they are produced. I shall have to check to see what lettters there are.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Can you say when?

Mr. ABBOTT: In order to cover the thing completely we shall have to check with the district, which would mean that they possibly could not be got before Monday. I should not think it will take more than two days. As far as headquarters are concerned, we shall know this afternoon.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In glancing through the items I cannot find one under which the Alaska highway could appropriately be discussed. I understand that this is under the control of the Department of National Defence, and I should like to ask the minister if he has any objection to our discussing that matter under this item.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the committee has no objection.

Mr. COCKERAM: There is an item on page 275.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it would be quite in order if we dealt with these collectively, if the committee so wishes.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister cannot be here this afternoon. Some of us have specific questions to ask, and if another hon. member is to be permitted to make a speech on something not relevant to the item, it will interfere with the continuity of the estimates.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: On second thought I think it would be better to defer discussion until that item is reached.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to be sure that there is an item under which it can be discussed.

Mr. COCKERAM: On page 275, the northwest highway system.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand the minister has suggested that the Alaska highway can be discussed under the item for northwest highway system on page 275.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That will be agreeable to me.

Mr. SKEY: This morning the hon. member for Broadview referred to some pertinent matters that we should be discussing under this item, one being Canada's defence policy. I believe he asked the minister what the imperial policy was, and also asked him to outline what policy the department is following at the present time. I should like to ask whether the newspaper reports of United States efforts in regard to joint defence are correct, and whether we are proposing any cooperation with the United States in North American defence projects.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend's question is pretty general. I do not know the press reports to which he refers, but as I have said on several occasions in the house, several years ago a permanent joint defence board was established of which General McNaugton is now chairman, and it is continually considering questions of joint interest to our two countries in the defence of the North American continent. As its name implies, it is a permanent board. It is not a policy-making board, but examines defence questions generally and makes recommendations to the government. That is continuing. Obviously matters of policy when decided are announced by me in due course in detail. A good many newspaper articles of course contain a very considerable element of speculation.

Mr. SKEY: I realize that it might be difficult for the minister to answer such a question, but I thought he might wish to make a statement on the subject, because a lot of people in this country want to hear from him on that subject and they will not be satisfied unless the joint defence board is giving consideration to matters of joint defence.

I understand that we require weather stations in our northern regions; in fact I know we do, because the whole of our civil aviation is dependent to a certain extent upon accurate weather reports. I understand that the United States are very keen to help in what might be called this international project. Has the Canadian government given consideration to cooperation with the United States government in a project for weather stations in our northern territory?

Mr. ABBOTT: Our meteorological stations are under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources, but I believe that consideration is being given to expanding the number of these stations to provide for the greater needs which have arisen as a result of increased air activity in those regions. While I am not in a position to make any statement as to joint operation of weather stations with the United States, that might be considered at some time, but it is not being considered at the moment.

Mr. GILLIS: I would ask the minister a few questions with regard to the matter of misconduct discharges, which was discussed extensively in the veterans affairs committee, and it was suggested there that a board be set up to examine into the reasons for the misconduct discharges with a view to modifying or changing them. A board of review was set up under the Department of Veterans Affairs to determine the eligibility to gratuities, and the board has worked very efficiently. I wish to compliment Brigadier Ferguson on the excellent job which that board has done in dealing with the gratuity end of misconduct discharges. But the most serious angle was the discharge of personnel, men and women, with a misconduct discharge which tagged him or her for the rest of his or her life. When the gratuity is granted in these cases, that does not automatically dispose of the misconduct discharge. So far as I can find out, nothing has been done in the matter of determining government policy in respect to misconduct discharges, whether personnel coming out of the service shall be tagged in this way for life or otherwise. Is there any intention to carry out what I consider to have been the instruction, or at all events the suggestion of the veterans affairs committee that these misconduct discharges should be reviewed with a view to changing or modifying them?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As the hon. member pointed out, representations were made by various members of the veterans affairs committee in respect to misconduct discharges, and it was decided to set up a board to examine each case individually of service personnel whose certificate mentioned that they were discharged for misconduct. Preliminary examination revealed that in a great number of cases the discharge certificate should have contained less severe words. For the purpose of giving the fairest possible consideration to individual cases a board has been set up at N.D.H.Q., composed of officers who have had combatant experience and experience in the handling of men in the field. I do not know that as yet any of these discharge certificates have been changed but I can assure my hon. friend that the board is at work.

Mr. MERRITT: In answer to the member for Trinity the minister said that statements of policy about the services had been made in press releases. At page 5018 of Hansard, when the naval estimates were under consideration, in answer to the hon. member for Yale, who had asked for a general statement on service estimates, the minister said:

> I made a fairly complete statement last session as to the naval position, and subsequently in a number of public addresses, press releases and the like I have indicated the general character and size of the post-war navy, and my plan had been to proceed with these estimates in the ordinary way.

In my view statements of policy as it develops, if it is not secret, should be made to this house by the minister.

Mr. ABBOTT: When the house is sitting.

Mr. MERRITT: We try to follow these things as best we can, but it is very difficult to sort out the actual policy from what may be newspaper speculation or incomplete reports of the minister's statements, and hon. members, who are more interested in details of policy than the general public may be, are not completely satisfied by these press reports. I know that was my own reaction to these reports. I would urge the minister to use the house as the place in which to announce statements of policy, and not to tell us in the house that his policy has been revealed in press releases, as he did several times the other day.

The report of May 17 in the Montreal Gazette, to which the hon. member for Trinity referred, with regard to progress in coordination and standardization of equipment and staff with the United States and the erection of defence and weather stations in the continental Arctic zone, was a pretty categorical statement. That was about the 17th of May, and at that time discussions were going on in Ottawa on these points between service representatives of the two countries. Although I quite understand that some of the decisions arrived at may be secret, and that there are things which it would be improper to announce, I believe that a categorical report such as that which I hold in my hand, and which I shall be glad to hand to the minister if he has not seen it—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have seen it.

Mr. MERRITT: —should be amplified now.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to statements of policy being made in the house, I quite agree that such statements should be made in the house while it is in session, and I do so sometimes; on other occasions I do not. As to the point that I should make a long and comprehensive statement as to military policy, perhaps it would have been desirable for me to do so; that is a matter of opinion. But the same thing applies to every other department of government that comes before this house to have its appropriation voted. I am here as minister of National Defence ready to answer any question which is put to me; and the usual procedure on supply is, not for the minister to make speeches, but for the members to question him on the various items. During the war —my hon. friend was not here, of course; he was in the army—a practice grew up under the War Appropriation Act of the minister making—because his estimates were voted en bloc—a broad comprehensive statement in which he reviewed the operations of military forces during the past year and made some forecast for the future. Now there has been a good deal of talk in the house to the effect that the war is over and we are back on a peacetime basis. If the house wishes the minister to make these statements when the estimates are opened I shall have no objection to doing so, but I honestly feel that the better way would be to follow the procedure which was followed before the war, of allowing hon. members, when the estimates are introduced, to make speeches if they wish, to ask the minister questions, and so on. It is for that reason I proceeded as I did, and it has been done with the other war departments—the Department of Munitions and Supply and the rest.

On this question of making policy statements every time the joint defence board meets in Ottawa and discusses matters, I do not think it is feasible. I believe the government must assume its responsibility of announcing from time to time, when matters of policy are decided upon, what those matters are, and I do not think it can be expected, because there is natural and understandable speculation as to whether the Americans would like to establish weather stations in northern Canada with us, or other matters of that kind, that the minister should rush into the house and either affirm or deny these reports. I am sure that my hon. friend does not suggest that.

Mr. MERRITT: If I may interrupt the minister, we are asking now on the estimates.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. Well, I have given the committee all I can give up to the present as to our policy with respect to the matters referred to. So far as weather stations are concerned I answered a moment ago that the weather stations are operated by the Department of Mines and Resources, and there is no present intention that that shall be changed. If there are any other matters, or similar questions, I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. STIRLING: May I remind the minister that at the beginning of the discussion of the naval estimates I asked him a specific question on this matter and, whereas he referred to other points which I had raised, he did not refer to this matter of policy. I made it two-furrowed: I referred to the fact that I understood that in London shortly the spokesmen for the defence of the commonwealth were going to meet, and I asked the minister whether he would make any comments on Canada's representations at that meeting.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did that in answer to another question. I apologize to my hon. friend if I overlooked it in answer to his. I did so a little later in answer to the hon. member for Cariboo. It is difficult, when one hon. member asks a question and another gets up in the meantime and asks another question, to keep track of everything that is asked. I do it as well as I can, and if there are some questions which I overlook, it is not intentional.

Perhaps I had better correct what I said about these weather stations. I am not sure whether they are under Mines and Resources or Transport; it is one or the other that handles the meteorological stations.

Mr. STIRLING: Transport, I think.

Mr. JAQUES: The other day I asked the minister a question about a pension, and he said I might bring it up under this item.

Mr. ABBOTT: We introduced this morning and gave first reading to the bill to amend the Militia Pension Act, and I think it would be appropriate under that bill, which may come on to-morrow. It is not under this item.

Mr. HANSELL: The question will only be asked once, anyway.

Mr. ABBOTT: But I have not here, perhaps, the experts on pensions whom I may have here on that bill.

Mr. JAQUES: Would the minister say that it would be better for me to ask it to-morrow?

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend expects to be here for the next day or two, it would be more appropriate to ask it when we are in committee on that bill.

Mr. JAQUES: Thank you. I will be here.

Mr. FULTON: It seems to me that what has just been said by the minister indicates again the advantages that would be served by appointing a standing committee of this house on defence matters. This was referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo in his remarks when these estimates were first opened. It was referred to last session on September 28 by the hon. member for Vancouver South, when he went at some length into the constructive suggestions put forward by the official opposition for defence policy. At that time, Mr. Chairman, as you will recall, the minister said he felt there was a good deal of merit in the suggestion; and on a later occasion the Prime Minister, when the suggestion was brought to his attention, made the same statement and said that the government would give it careful consideration and possibly set up the committee at some time in the near future. Since that time no further statement has been made by the government in that connection, and we are wondering just what is their decision, or whether any decision has been taken. I should like the minister, if he will, to give us the benefit of some comments on that point. But before he does so there are some further points which could be urged in support of the suggestion that there be a standing committee of the house on defence matters.

In the first place, it would give the members a chance to discuss and support the estimates intelligently in the house. At the present time there are, naturally, many aspects of defence policy which we cannot know, and it is well known that the officials of the department are hesitant when telephoned up by an opposition member to give information which is related to policy. Members of course will be careful not to ask them questions of policy, because it is putting them in an unfair position; and one is hampered in that way, the information is not as readily available to members as it is to the government. The result is that frequently we come in here and all we see is an item in the estimates of so many millions of dollars; it seems a large item, and one's first inclination is to say "You are spending too much money", because we have not the information as to what it was that went into the decision to appropriate that money. I believe the estimates would be discussed a great deal more intelligently if we could get that information, and probably in many cases they would be supported instead of being crticized.

Another consideration which makes it desirable to have a standing committee on defence is that the armed forces are always a vulnerable target for attacks of many kinds. While everyone would like to see economy practised, I think one should be careful not simply to say, "You are spending a lot of money on the armed forces and therefore we will attack them and oppose all the money which is being spent there." But it seems to me, on reviewing speeches and statements in past years, that in many cases the armed forces have been an obvious and vulnerable target for attack. Somebody says, "Well, we have to slash the estimates; let's get busy and do it." One knows too that the services themselves find it difficult to ask for large appropriations because they are met with the answer, "Treasury board would never authorize that; or if they do, the members of the house when the estimates come up will criticize us for extravagance." And so in many cases the services are actually starved for want of money. If members could have information as to the necessity for that money I think it would facilitate the passage of estimates and the work of the house generally. It would also put us in a much better position to discharge our duty of suggesting a sensible defence policy. It would enable members, knowing the full inside story, to go out into the country and defend the armed forces and advocate recruiting. The suggestion was made the other day that the minister should embark on a recruiting tour of the country. I hope he will, but I think it would help if all members of the house, when they go back to their constituencies, would advocate recruiting for both the permanent force and the reserve army. We would be in a much better position then to talk intelligently about it, and more inclined to do it if we knew what the policy was as well as the background of that policy.

In this connection I would make a general observation. I feel that recruiting for either the permanent force or the reserve army will not be successful until the country comes to realize and is made to realize that the armed forces should play and will play in the future a prominent part in the national life of the dominion. In the past many people have been inclined to regard the permanent force as a joke and permanent force officers as stuffy individuals. So long as that attitude prevails, naturally the force will not attract the class of recruits that we consider desirable, and every effort should be made to impress upon the permanent force and on the reserve army, as well as on the people generally that the armed forces—I am speaking particularly of the army, but I have in mind the armed forces generally—will from now on be an integral part of our national life and that a career in the services will not be an isolated career but a calling which is an essential part of the national life. In that event, especially as I understand that the policy is developing whereby men will leave the force at a younger age, one will be able to step into the force and after a time step out of it with hardly any sense of transition. It will not be a long step, merely a passage. The whole thing, I say, would be an integral part of the national life, related to our scientific and technical development, so that desirable persons will be encouraged to enter the services and will not feel isolated from the rest of their fellow citizens but will be conscious instead of performing an equally important task, as important as if they were in some other walk of life.

I suggest therefore that the greatest care should be exercised in the selection particularly of district officers commanding. They should be persons who are able to take their place in any of the functions of their community. They should not regard it as just a bore to have to go to convocation ceremonies at the universities. Instead, they should want to go and should feel that it is their rightful place, and the attitude of mind should be encouraged in which, if a district officer commanding is not at a public function, people will ask questions. If the army and the other services are to be an integral part of our national life their representatives should take their place on public platforms together with other dignatories and public officials. If that is to be the aim, then you must select persons capable of discharging those functions, and whose attitude of mind is that they have their rightful place to fill at every public function. The appointment of a defence committee of the house would go a long way towards bringing these things about and it would give us a better picture of the policy generally and enable us to go back to our constituencies and support the armed forces.

Mr. COCKERAM: I wish to say a few words before the minister goes away. I should ask him to look at the statement he made the other day at page 5073 of Hansard, that there were still 830 men serving detention for desertion and absenteeism. The minister announced that an amnesty had been granted men who had never joined the army. In my opinion those men who enlisted and tried to do the job but who through the exigencies of the service possibly lost their courage are the ones who should have been given the first amnesty, if any was to be given. After all, peace has not yet been signed. Will the minister make a statement as to why he did not grant amnesty to the 830 who are serving detention at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether it will satisfy the hon. gentleman, but the answer is this. Amnesty was not granted the others; they were disclaimed and written off the books. It was felt that so far as the men who were in detention were concerned, they will receive certain definite financial benefits as a result of service, and it was better that these should be reviewed, sympathetically if you like, by the district officers commanding. Of recent months we found that a very large number of men have been coming in and voluntarily surrendering themselves, largely for the purpose of getting the sort of thing I have mentioned. If they took ill they realized that if they came in and served the time of detention their wives would get the dependent's allowance while they were there; if they were in receipt of assigned pay prior to going absent it was reestablished, and they got free medical attention, rehabilitation grant and clothing allowance. Many have been coming in on that basis, and instructions have been issued to the district officers commanding in the eleven military districts who ordinarily review these cases to make a special review, looking at the circumstance of each particular case in the light of the benefits, if I may so describe them, which these various men will receive.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many are in Camp Borden?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer offhand. The totals I gave the other day were approximately right. They are changing every day, and I have not the figures for Borden, though I could get them.

Mr. FULTON: What is the intention with regard to the defence committee?

Mr. ABBOTT: I was sympathetic to it, as I indicated before. This session, as it has developed, many other committees got ahead of it. It seemed for one reason or another that a tremendous number of important special committees were set up this session, including the veterans' affairs committee. I would hope that at another session it will not be necessary for the veterans' affairs committee to undertake the stupendous amount of work it did this session, so that at the beginning of another session, which we could perhaps regard as our first normal session of the new parliament, it should be possible to give early consideration to that question. The real reason why it was not actively considered this time was that there were so many other matters which had to be dealt with that it would not have been possible for members to serve on another committee.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering the estimates of the Department of National Defence, item 569.

Mr. STIRLING: This morning the minister said he had replied to a question I asked, and that he had given the answer to the hon. member for Cariboo. I have looked up that answer, and I find it was not an answer to the question I had asked. My question was in connection with the holding of a meeting of defence chiefs of the commonwealth in London next month, which had been mentioned in the press. Could the parliamentary assistant say whether it is correct that there is to be such a meeting in London in the fall?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was a meeting, which took place a few days ago, from which the chief of staff has just returned. That is the only information I have with respect to any such meeting on commonwealth defence, as my hon. friend called it.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister gave that information. That was a meeting of chiefs of staff, but evidently the item in the press about a meeting in the fall is not correct, and there is not to be a meeting of commonwealth defence chiefs later on?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no knowledge of such a meeting.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it makes for good government that in the dying days of the session we should be called upon to discuss estimates amounting to approximately $497,000,000, or twenty to twenty-five per cent of the total expenditures of this country. Now what is happening? The minister finds it necessary to be elsewhere this afternoon, and he is not in the house to discuss his estimates. Right now I am going to suggest that at least one of these items remain open until the minister is here to answer the questions which have been put to him. The minister has come to parliament and to the people with a plan to organize an army of 25,000 men. The other night, in reply to a question, he made the statement that of this number some 3,049 would be officers. According to this morning's newspapers the effective fighting force included in the total of 25,000 officers and other ranks is to be a brigade group of approximately 7,250 men, and I think this country is entitled to know how the difference between 25,000 and 7,250 is made up. If there are to be 3,049 officers, that will leave 21,951 other ranks, out of which we are going to have a fighting force of only 7,250. As I make it out, this means there will be one officer in the army for every seven men. I have had some military experience, and I consider this figure excessive. What is going to happen if the minister does not get his 21,951 other ranks? Is he going to maintain all these officers in the force? Our permanent force to-day numbers something like 11,000 all ranks, and in view of the fact that men are not enlisting is the minister still going to retain 3,049 officers in the armed forces of Canada? I think that is one question which should be answered, because if the minister intends to retain all these officers, the services are bound to be top heavy in regard to officer personnel. Everyone agrees that we must have an efficient army, but I do not think you can have efficiency if you are over-staffed.

I understand it is intended to take up the radio legislation this afternoon; therefore I renew my suggestion that one of the items be allowed to stand so that the matters some of us wish to bring up may be dealt with at a later date. Referring to the 3,049 officer personnel to be retained in the new army, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant how many lieutenant generals are in that number, how many major generals, how many brigadiers, how many colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, second lieutenants and W.O.1's. I ask that question because I want to see how many junior officers are to be retained. Is this number of officers to be made up mainly of officers above the rank of lieutenant colonel? We should be given those figures, because I believe I know something about the officers they have at the present time.

Another question I should like to put to the parliamentary assistant is this. Parliament is being asked to authorize an expenditure to maintain an army of 25,000 men. At the present time in the employ of the Department of National Defence there are approximately eleven to twelve thousand civil servants. If we vote money to maintain an army of 25,000 men, does that mean we vote money for 25,000 men plus 12,000 civil servants, or do the 12,000 civil servants have to come off the army establishment? If they do, the figures with which we have been presented will be all out of proportion.

Further, I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question in regard to the item of something over $300,000 for the war graves commission. How many officers and men are employed on that commission? Then I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what the joint defence committee is costing this country; how many officers are on it and what is the total personnel. I ask these questions because the more men who are on detached jobs or with detached units, the fewer men there will be to train.

I think we are kidding the people of this country when we have the implication that we are voting money to train 25,000 men for the armed services. I feel sure that when the story is all told the percentage of men doing actual training will not be very great. We know we are to have a brigade group of 7,250. How many men in addition to that will be in the active force? According to the estimates which have been presented to us civil servants in the Department of National Defence (Army) are costing this country $11,875,089. Unfortunately the minister has left these estimates to the last minute. I suggest to the minister that many men in the House of Commons are business men. What do they do at the end of the year? If they want to know how much money they will spend in the coming year they write to their departmental heads and say to them, "Please prepare estimates for the following year." Before the fiscal year is up those estimates have been presented, and those business men know what their expenditures are to be in the year to come. What happens here? Already six months of the fiscal year have passed by. Now, in the last few days of the session, we are passing estimates in huge volume, without any chance of examining them down to the last dollar. If a business man did that in his business he would be bankrupt to-morrow—and there is no business man in the chamber who will deny that.

There is not a member in this party who does not believe in supporting the armed forces, but we want to support them in a reasonable way, in a manner in which we will get the greatest efficiency and the greatest good for the armed services. I do not believe it does any good, a day or so before the session is over, to discuss expenditures of around $497 million in the manner in which we are doing it to-day.

I have asked the minister to answer certain questions. In item 569 there is an item of $25,843,524 for commitments. What are those commitments? We are entitled to know that, and I should like to have a detailed statement.

We are trying to build up a force which would be of use to Canada in possible days of trial which may lie ahead. I have said before, and I repeat, that until such time as a reserve army is built up the system of commands is superfluous. Hon. members may have seen in this morning's press a statement to the effect that central command has taken over an estate outside Oakville. Much money is to be spent to make that estate a command headquarters. I suggest the spending of that money at this time is absolute foolishness, because we have one of the finest camps in Canada at Camp Borden, and it is located in the command. Why not utilize the camps we have? Why have vast expenditures in connection with an estate outside Oakville to set up command headquarters?

One reason I am positive that these command headquarters are not justified is that, as happened after the last war, the militia or, as the minister chooses to call it, the reserve army, is in the doldrums. I say you have to build from the bottom, not from the top. You are building a bureaucracy of senior officers in the army before you get men to serve in the force. I cannot conceive what the departmental officials are thinking about. Do they want to give higher pensions? Do they want to give higher rank to a greater number of officers? I am sure it does not lead to efficiency in the services.

I have asked many questions. I should like to expedite the business of the committee, because I understand we want to get on with another debate. I am prepared now to leave this matter in abeyance. There are many more things I should like to ask, but it would seem cockeyed to bring up further questions at this late date in the session. If the minister wants to be fair with hon. members, then the time to bring these estimates before the committee would be before March 31. Then we shall know what is to be spent in the year to come.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member has raised many points and asked many questions. While I may not have taken all of them down, I shall try to answer some of them. I do not believe he can fairly blame the minister for the fact that the estimates are brought down at the end of the session.

Mr. COCKERAM: I am not blaming the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He must admit that the business of the house in the last few months has been tremendous.

Mr. COCKERAM: I say the policy is wrong; the whole system is wrong. We should have these estimates before the beginning of the new financial year—all the estimates, not just those in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The session did not open until the middle of March.

Mr. GRAYDON: Whose fault was that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friends were just as much pleased as we were to have the recess between Christmas and March.

Mr. GRAYDON: We do not want it next year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member has asked for a breakdown of the number of officers who are to compose the interim force. I do not quite understand whether he wanted a breakdown of those who had been accepted in the interim force, or whether he wanted the proposed establishment.

Mr. COCKERAM: I want both.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You will get both. As regards the acceptance for the interim force, by rank, as of July 31, they are: major-generals, 9—

Mr. COCKERAM: What about lieutenant-generals?

Mr. LAPOINTE: One.

Mr. COCKERAM: No, there is more than one.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am talking about those accepted as of July 31 in the interim force. There may have been more since then; I have not the figures right up to date. My figures are to July 31. Afterwards I shall give my hon. friend the proposed establishment, and I am sure that will satisfy him.

Mr. COCKERAM: It might not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are: brigadiers, 12; colonels, 41; lieutenant-colonels, 181; majors, 575; captains, 1,106; lieutenants, 700; W. O. I's, 505.

Mr. COCKERAM: How many lieutenant colonels?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I gave the figure of 181, and 41 colonels.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The establishment is: lieutenant general, 1; major generals, 13; brigadiers, 26; colonels, 60; lieutenant colonels, 235; majors, 664; captains, 1,285; lieutenants, 532.

The hon. member brought up the question of the imperial war graves commission. As my hon. friend knows, that is a commonwealth organization to which Canada has contributed since the last war. This organization maintains our military cemeteries overseas and is continuing the work it started after the last war. The item is to provide for a contribution to the imperial war graves commission. If my hon. friend is interested in knowing the cemeteries that are taken care of, I shall be glad to give him the list.

Mr. COCKERAM: I am interested only in the military personnel.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So far as we are concerned, the personnel consists of a secretary here in Canada. The rest of the personnel is employed overseas by the commission.

Mr. COCKERAM: We have a Canadian on that commission, because General Roberts is the chairman.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is employed by the imperial war graves commission, which is an autonomous body to which we make yearly contributions. He is not in the employ of the Department of National Defence as such.

Mr. McKAY: Mr. Chairman, I have several observations to make on this item. I have become somewhat concerned about the trend of the discussion. There have been repeated references to world war three, and it seems to me that the kind of talk which provokes wars is to be greatly deplored. Every effort should be made, even in the discussion of defence estimates, to indicate Canada's position as a peace loving nation, with the desire of maintaining peace with our neighbours as our paramount objective.

Plans have been suggested at various times in the course of the discussion as to how an aggressor should be met, as if such aggression were inevitable. While it may be highly dangerous to bury one's head in the sand like an ostrich and disregard the activities in one's immediate proximity, it is just as dangerous to be talking abo it the probabilities of war. I have listened in dismay to reference to brigades, to boots and shoes, to kilts, to brass hats, to uniforms, and all the other details which, while important in themselves in past wars, appear now to be relegated to an age which saw the movements of masses of men and warfare of a kind we shall never witness again. We are in the atomic age, but some of our military leaders, and I am afraid probably some hon. members of this house, are still fighting the battle of Waterloo. Should it be our unhappy lot to witness a modern war in our time, it will be decided in the first twenty-four hours. It will be decided by the atomic bomb directed to targets by the robot plane, and in addition we may witness bacteriological warfare directed against our civilian populations. That is conceded by scientists in every country of the world. There may not be a declaration of war at all; we may see a repetition of Pearl Harbor in scores of places simultaneously. Our industrial capacity and fighting forces will be decimated in one fell swoop of an aggressor. We may not know who the aggressor is at the time. I say these things because I believe we should give them serious thought and ponder upon them.

It is not a pleasant picture, but we should be realists. Having said that may I say that it behooves all of us to examine the world organization which has been set up in the form of the united nations. I believe the future of Canada lies in supporting a powerful international government. It can be made effective by the cooperation of all world nations; it cannot be made effective without that. The only hope of world peace lies in such an association of peoples. If that fails, we can expect war.

Agreements do not prevent war. World history has shown again and again that an armament race ultimately ends in armed conflict. I believe we can expect that world cooperation which Tennyson envisaged. Fear of the destruction of our civilization should force intelligent people to work together in the common weal. In any event, Canada with only twelve million people must pin its hope on a powerful international instrument to preserve peace. We must be prepared to subscribe personnel, materials and wealth to make the work of such a force effective.

We as a people cannot afford to disregard the great scientific advances that have been made in the realm of warfare. If Canada fails to consider the technique of modern war she may be in the unhappy position of a Belgium or a Poland which in world war I and world war II respectively were unable to cope with mechanized equipment even though well supplied with man-power. Canada, with ten times the frontier to defend, would be in an even more hopeless position. So we must hope and pray that the united nations will be an effective instrument for peace. But until the united nations is made that effective instrument for world peace, Canada should direct her attention to technical and scientific research in connection with the armed forces and set up establishments accordingly. I notice there is an appropriation of some $14,000,000 for this work, while approximately $300,000,000 is being appropriated for the army, an army to be used largely as an organized training force. I insist that there will be no opportunity to prepare an armed force to meet an invader in a future war as we were able to do in the last war. I consider public money wasted unless it is directed to the training of technical and mechanical staffs and in the development of ultra-modern war equipment.

It has been suggested on several occasions in this house that Canada will be the battleground in any future war. God forbid that that ever should be so. Our duty as legislators is to guard against that eventuality. Young men and women, who are the most heavily penalized in the devastation of war, will hold us responsible if we fail to take every precaution against that possibility. No one gains from war. Victor and vanquished suffer equally in modern combat. Modern war is a most terrifying spectacle. Civilians young and old are also involved. Innocent and guilty alike face the consequences of armed warfare in modern times. Its effect is demoralizing to the whole populace.

No nation on earth enjoys more complete self-interest in the future of peace than does Canada. If two or more great powers should come to blows and launch their rockets and atomic missiles against each other, Canada in short will be the innocent bystander, whether we like it or not. The struggle quite conceivably could be carried on either over or through our territory.

So far we have been satisfied to follow the leader and play the role of a small power directed by either the United States or Britain. Whether we realize it or not, our role in modern war is that of a first-class power because of our great industrial capacity and our location. It is common knowledge now that during the last war Canada produced more per capita and put more men into the army, navy and air force per capita than did our neighbour to the south. We have proved that in the past. But our interest is not in fighting. Our interest must be in peace. We should therefore be a leader in the councils for world peace. Our voices should be heard on behalf of all the small nations who desire and strive for peace. It is in the small nations that the desire for honest peace dwells. And, Mr. Chairman, our voice must be heard. It should begin here in this house and be heard wherever our representatives speak on international councils. Our destiny is wrapped in peace. We must have enduring peace if we are to survive as a people. All the ordinary people of the world abhor war. I am opposed therefore to any bilateral agreements with any nations. Alliances always breed suspicion. Canada has been discussing with the United States joint defence arrangements. If it is only a defensive arrangement, few Canadians will seriously object to such discussions. But too often defence agreements develop into aggressive alliances. Any alliance leading to aggressiveness will be opposed by the large mass of the Canadian public. They are just as distrustful of military diplomacy from Washington as they are from any other source. Canada wishes to preserve her sovereignty. Canada will offer vigorous opposition to any encroachment upon her sovereign rights by any one power or any alliance of powers.

Military manoeuvres in Canada directed against any nation may well damage our relations with other nations. I am not sure that ill feeling has not already been engendered by the manoeuvres of the Muskox expedition.

We hope that the pleasant relations that we have maintained in the past with the United States will continue. They have been good neighbours. But we also desire good relations with every other nation. If our defence talks with the United States are for hemisphere defence under the direction of the united nations organization, they are commendable. The minister or the parliamentary assistant to the minister should assure the house that that is the policy of the government. On the other hand if these defence talks are only preliminary to a bilateral agreement, they will not be approved by the general public throughout this country.

Our only hope for a world free from war is in collective agreement, a collective agreement directed by the united nations organization security council. If the united nations organization fails to preserve peace, our position is indeed a hopeless one. We have neither the wealth nor adequate population to defend the vast area of this country. To say that this area can be successfully defended by ourselves alone is failing to be realistic. We must support the world organization and raise our voices for collective agreement, so that the peoples who are desirous of peace may have their desires fulfilled and a peaceful heritage be handed down to their children and their children's children.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps I may be permitted now to answer a question that was asked as to the $25,843,524 of commitments mentioned in the item. The details are as follows: Travel, transportation and freight, $500,000; construction, purchase, repairs, operating expenses of properties, $5,000,000—

Mr. COCKERAM: Has the hon. gentleman the details of that $5,000,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is contingent on the amount of building we shall be able to do. There are certain proposed constructions which we have been unable to proceed with because of the shortage of building materials. If the supply situation permits in the current year, we propose to go ahead with them.

Mr. COCKERAM: May I suggest that in view of the hundreds of millions of dollars spent on military establishments during the course of the war, $5,000,000 seems a lot of money to spend on capital construction at this time. It does seem to me that this sum for capital expenditure is hardly justified, unless there is some good reason for it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a considerable need for the construction of armouries throughout the country.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is all right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A plan for the long-term construction of armouries has been carefully prepared and it was proposed to go ahead earlier with that construction, but that has been impossible. This item covers mostly such construction.

Mr. COCKERAM: Can the minister indicate where they will be built?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The department has made a survey of the needs of the reserve army throughout the country, and a certain priority has been established so that the armouries most needed will be constructed first. The next item is personnel supplies and services, dental and medical stores, clothing, $4,565,524.

Mr. COCKERAM: This is another item to which exception can be taken. When the war was over we must have had on hand innumerable medical supplies, clothing and equipment which had been paid for, and now you come along and ask us to vote more money for supplies which the department must have on hand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Most of these expenditures are commitments made this year for the maintenance of existing facilities. Furthermore, although we did have—I agree with my hon. friend—a considerable amount of medical and dental stores and clothing, there is a certain usage of that which has to be replaced.

Mr. COCKERAM: But you had so much on hand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There were great quantities of certain stores, but others were in smaller quantities and short issue.

Mr. COCKERAM: I do not want to get too tough on this, but after all this is money which we are being asked to vote. Being a business man and knowing something about inventories, I say there should have been sufficient inventories on hand at the end of the fiscal year after the war was over to last not only this year but for many years to come. I do not think the explanation of the parliamentary assistant is good enough. I do not know whether they have declared stuff surplus to war assets which should not have been so declared. But these are big items in the expenditures, and the explanations are not easy to follow.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. COCKERAM: No, it is not carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I explained, these are commitments for the coming year. Only a portion of this amount may be expended. The estimates are always made that way. My hon. friend knows that we have to provide for these further facilities during the year. If the money is not expended—

Mr. COCKERAM: A commitment is an expenditure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is not an expenditure.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the parliamentary assistant give us the rest of it? He has given us $9½ million.

Mr. HARKNESS: Just before that goes on, and more or less on a point of order, these items the parliamentary assistant is giving us are really items which appear under "army services" on page 273, except that he is giving just a certain proportion of each of these items under "commitments".

Mr. COCKERAM: No, they are not the same at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not included in item 569, and the amount of commitments is put in brackets. As I said before, these moneys are not expended, and they may not be expended. It is the estimated expenditure of these items. This is the way the accounting has always been done, and the way we have always proceeded.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. HAZEN: Well, may we have the rest of the breakdown?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will continue with it. Signal and wireless equipment, line construction, $1,910,700; ammunition and bombs, $10,500,000; armaments, including rifles, machine guns, mortars and guns of all descriptions, $2,598,300; motor transport, trucks, tractors, trailers, tanks, A.F.V.'s and repair parts, $378,000; sundries, including printing, stationery, telephones, telegrams and other costs not included in above items, $500,000; experimental station at Suffield, $100,000.

Mr. HAZEN: The total amount we are asked to vote is $283,170,171, and the commitments are stated to be $25,843,524. What does "commitments" mean? Are we committed to spend that $25 million?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, we are not.

Mr. HAZEN: Then how do you explain it? Because if you turn to page 273 you will find a breakdown showing construction, purchase, repairs, operating expenses of properties, $25,498,136; you will find ammunition and bombs, $21,262,210, and so on. You have given us only part of these items. Just what does "commitments" mean?

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I might point it this way as regards commitments: there are contracts made one year and payable in the next year, and we carry the item over. The other items which the hon. member mentioned are the actual expenditures under the headings mentioned.

Mr. COCKERAM: They are commitments.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And are being adjusted this year, yes.

Mr. FULTON: I want to deal with one general item just before coming back to the specific point in connection with estimates, and it has to do with this question of amnesty. This morning the minister stated that it is not regarded as an amnesty, that these personnel affected by the recent order in council are simply regarded as not having been in any of the services, so that technically, I suppose, it cannot be called an amnesty. But I want to point out two things. First, I do not think it is good policy, because as long as the Militia Act and the National Resources Mobilization Act are part of the law of the land you cannot exempt a whole class of persons from that law. However, it is done now, and I just want to make the observation, before I go on, that I think it was a mistake. Also I want to point out that there is a certain amount of unfairness unless the further step is taken to provide for personnel of all three services who at the moment are undergoing sentence for purely military crimes. There is no guarantee that this personnel will get their gratuities or their clothing allowance or the other benefits when they are released. All we have is the undertaking to look carefully into their cases, and if it is found that they merit consideration they may be given some of the benefits, but there is no guarantee that they will get them. So those personnel, many of whom were overseas, who may have seen service in one action and gone A.W.L. before the next, and are undergoing detention sentences for what I may call military crimes, may not get any benefits when they come out; whereas the other class who were affected by the order in council admittedly do not get any benefits, but neither do they undergo any prison sentence. I think that is unfair. I suggest that either one of two things should be done. Either these personnel who served overseas and are still undergoing prison sentences for military crimes should be given a guarantee that when they come out they will get their gratuities and other benefits for their full period of service less the time spent in detention, or else they should be immediately given an amnesty and released from gaol, so that they will be put on the same basis as those who are affected by the order in council. Unless that is done there is definitely an element of unfairness to those who served and who committed military crimes for which they are still serving sentences. I would like the parliamentary assistant to give us an assurance that further consideration will be given this matter and possibly one of these suggested alternatives adopted.

When he answers that question he might care to make a statement with regard to the item that appears on page 273 for signal and wireless equipment, et cetera, $10,000,000. Last session I suggested that the minister might consider amalgamating the signals schools for all the services, because each service showed a very large item of expenditure for signals and wireless equipment. I suggested that in the initial stages at any rate signal training was undoubtedly standard, or could be made standard as between the three services, thereby effecting a saving in the maintenance of separate schools, and a saving, if further signals schools were to be built, could be brought about by having one school built for all three services. The minister indicated that he thought the idea worthy of consideration, but I regret to say that, as is usually the case when such statements are made, nothing was done about it, because there is still a large item in each service for signal expenditures. I would appreciate it if the parliamentary assistant would make a statement on both these matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can assure my hon. friend that I will bring his representations to the attention of the minister as to the treatment to be extended to personnel who have served overseas and are at present serving sentences in Canada. To the best of my knowledge, there is only a very small number of personnel with the overseas service who, having been sentenced on the other side and brought back to Canada, are still serving. The court-martial board of review, to which reference has been made in the debate, sat last fall and released quite a number of personnel, and also recommended that sentences be remitted at a future date, which in some cases was two, three or four months. So I doubt whether there would be a great number of personnel having the status to which the hon. member referred. However, I shall have the matter looked into.

As regards the item for signal and wireless line construction, my hon. friend will notice that there is a considerable decrease this year as compared with last year's estimates.

Mr. FULTON: There is a difference of $3,000,000; that is all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will notice at page 273, at the bottom, army and related services, there is an item "less adjustments $38,250,000." The difference to which I was referring is included in that $38,250,000, so that the decrease this year is really $5,551,296 on that particular item. The hon. member suggested that there should be a greater unification between the services with a view to bringing about economy in these particular expenditures.

Mr. FULTON: And efficiency, besides being desirable on its own account.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I may tell him that a step has already been taken in that direction in relation to research. Under the new defence research development, a start has been made in the direction he desires.

Mr. HARKNESS: There are two items in particular regarding which I was surprised and on which I should like some explanation. I refer to the item for armament, including rifles, machine guns and so forth, of $30,000,000 odd, and mechanical transport vehicles, trucks, et cetera, $27,690,000. We have just finished a war in which we had a large army in the field completely equipped with rifles, machine guns and all kinds of mechanical transport, and it seems odd to me that we should be spending upwards of $60,000,000 more at the present time for such equipment, especially when we know that there is a tremendous surplus, since a good deal of material has been sold by War Assets. It may be that these projected expenditures are for new items of equipment which have been developed since the war. If so, I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give us what information he can in that regard. If the expenditures are there for items which are essentially of the same kind as we had in the war and with which the army was equipped at the end of the war, then I completely fail to understand the item.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Again, in the two items my hon. friend mentions, there are some adjustments. On the first item of armament, including rifles, machine guns and so on, there is a reduction of $15,000,000 which must be taken off and which is included in the $38,250,000 to which I referred. In the second item there is a reduction of $12,000,000. The balance of the expenditure, I am told, is to procure up-to-date equipment and to replace equipment here in Canada which was used during the war and which it would be more costly to put back into first-class shape than to get new equipment. It covers also items which we never had during the war.

Mr. HARKNESS: I wonder if we could get a better explanation as to what "adjustment" means. Does that mean that the estimate shows in one case some $15,000,000 more than it is thought will now be needed, or what is the explanation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: These adjustments are items which are covered by other departments and which are to be settled by book transfers. The full amount less the adjustment is considered the true departmental expenditure; but some of it is covered by amounts owing to other departments, and a transfer is made in the books. For instance, particularly in the case of munitions and supply, it would be advances made to firms which will be brought back to cover these items.

Mr. HARKNESS: I still do not understand. I do not see where the matter of an advance made by munitions and supply has anything to do with this. I take it that the Department of National Defence, army, estimated they would need $30,000,000 odd for armaments, and it so appears in the estimates. The parliamentary assistant says there is this adjustment of $15,000,000. It would make it quite simple, I think, if the hon. gentleman could answer yes or no to this question. Does that mean you have now reduced your estimate by $15,000,000?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I understand it, munitions and supply, through which all contracts went during the war, made advances to firms to the amount of the adjustment, which is about $38,250,000. We have to make a book adjustment now between munitions and supply and our department in order to clear those advances, as those expenditures were made for us.

Mr. HARKNESS: Does that come to the point, then, that in effect your estimate as it appears here, in regard to armaments, is some $15,000,000 higher than it is in fact? In other words, instead of $30,199,000, your estimate should appear as $15,199,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the clearest way I can put it to the hon. member (Mr. Harkness) is that out of that item some $15,000,000 is being actually spent by us this year. The balance is for an adjustment in connection with material already received by the department, which was ordered by munitions and supply and paid for by that department. Now an adjustment is to take place as between the books of the two departments; but the actual expenditure is not made by our department, as munitions and supply has already made payment. I do not know whether I am explaining the matter very clearly.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am fairly happy about that explanation. Essentially, as I said a moment ago, you are only spending $15,199,000 this year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, for this year.

Mr. HARKNESS: The other $15,000,000 was spent previously and there is to be an adjustment?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

Mr. HARKNESS: The $15,000,000 you are spending this year for armaments covers rifles, machine guns, mortars and guns of all description. I wonder if you could tell me how many rifles, if any, how many machine guns if any, and how many guns of other kinds, if any, were purchased. As I said before, it does not seem to me that any should be purchased; in fact we should have been selling some.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid at the moment I cannot give my hon. friend the details of these separate purchases, but the amount expended up to June 30, 1946, was $1,517,818.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is that for rifles?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; as I said, I have not the details here. I can obtain them and let my hon. friend have them. I would have to look up that information.

Mr. BROOKS: Like the hon. member for Calgary East I am amazed that so much money is being spent for equipment and supplies for next year. According to a return brought down on March 27 of this year the department had on hand battle dress blouses totalling 456,347; that is, they had these blouses in ordnance stores, and they also had 593,024 trousers. Now I understand something like $5,000,000 is to be spent this year for clothing, supplies and equipment. That is perhaps understandable in connection with guns and other equipment, because they are changing all the time, but why should we be buying battle dress blouses or trousers when we have these large quantities on hand? I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether they are making battle dress blouses at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am informed we are not making any battle dress blouses now.

Mr. BROOKS: Then why is this large item in the estimates for clothing?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A large portion of that item is a carryover, for purchases made and received already during 1945-46, as I understand it.

Mr. BROOKS: Then it is expected that there will be any change in the design of dress for the army in the near future, or will they use the battle dress as before?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no anticipated change. It is proposed to use battle dress.

Mr. BROOKS: My chief object in rising was to ask about the training facilities at Sussex, New Brunswick. I have no doubt the parliamentary assistant knows that it has been a military camp for the past fifteen years or more. I understand now that it is being abandoned as a military training centre, and that the training will be at another camp in the maritime provinces. I should like him to tell me, too, whether military district No. 7, with headquarters at Saint John, New Brunswick, is being closed; or what is to happen to it. We have heard certain rumours.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can well appreciate my hon. friend's interest in the camp at Sussex. It is a fine camp. I had the personal experience of spending what I thought was a long time at that point. I am told the future use of the Sussex camp is at present under consideration by the general staff. I am afraid I did not quite understand the hon. member's question concerning military district No. 7.

Mr. BROOKS: I understood there was a possibility of the maritime provinces being made one military district; and instead of there being a headquarters at Saint John, there would be one at Halifax only.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No such proposal has been under study.

Mr. BROOKS: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would explain what he meant by the expression "what I thought was a long time", when he was referring to the camp at Sussex. I am sure it was because he was anxious to get overseas.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly.

Mr. ISNOR: I am glad the hon. member for Royal referred to stores. The minister stated this morning he was going to readopt as quickly as possible the pre-war policy of procedure, and I was wondering if that applied to the purchasing of stores. I ask this because of the very large amount of stores now on hand. The policy of the three branches of the service at this time to purchase supplies and to hold them in store for a period of from three to five years, is in my opinion a wrong one. I do not think this is an opportune time for any of the defence services to hold reserve stocks for that length of time, particularly in view of the shortage of certain supplies, including textiles and woollens. These commodities are in short supply in the civilian market. I bring this matter to the attention of the parliamentary assistant so that he may convey my views in this connection to the minister. I suggest the period should be shortened, even though at a later day it might be considered wise to extend it to from three to five years.

I have one further suggestion with reference to purchasing. During the period of the war it was customary for the three defence services to purchase large quantities through the department of munitions and supply, as it was then called. I feel the time has now arrived when each of these defence branches should stand on its own feet and make its purchases direct to fulfil its requirements. This principle is followed in most civilian merchandising establishments throughout the country, and in the United States. Each branch of the service would specialize in respect of certain purchases. I believe the naval service would have a better idea of its own requirements than a central purchasing organization would have. What I say respecting the navy would apply equally to the army and the air force. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give further details respecting purchasing, as it applies to each branch of the service.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I do not agree with the hon. member's suggestion that each department should revert to the old system of having separate purchasing departments. Throughout the war the three services did their purchasing through the department of munitions and supply, and we found that that was by far the most economical way of doing it. The departments were not competing with each other in bidding for goods required. They were able to purchase in larger volume than would have been possible if each individual service had been making the purchases. It is the intention of the three service departments to continue to have their purchasing done by one central agency, as it was done during the war.

Mr. ISNOR: I have every respect for the ability of the Minister of National Defence for Air, but I question his judgment in this instance. He said they could buy in larger quantities. I doubt very much if that would prove to be so. More than that, I suggest that a purchasing agent from his own department could go out and purchase at just as low a price as could an agent from the combined services. There is the further fact that by having the purchasing under the direct control of each branch there would be greater supervision in respect of requirements, and thus one would not find on hand, as at present, the exceptionally large quantities which would appear to be unnecessary.

Mr. COCKERAM: The parliamentary assistant was good enough to place on record the proposed establishment of officers. On checking his figures I find he gave a total of 2,816. The figure given by the minister in the house the other evening was 3,049, or a difference of 233.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I realize that in giving those figures I did not give second-lieutenants. The second-lieutenants number 150. Then, in the nursing establishment there is one matron-in-chief, and there are seven nursing sisters (captains), and 75 nursing sisters (lieutenants), all of whom would be included in the total establishment. I thought the hon. member wanted the figures for the army, strictly speaking.

Mr. COCKERAM: Having been a junior officer, I am wondering who will perform the duties of orderly officers. Of the 3,000 officers the minister mentioned only 532 lieutenants and second-lieutenants. The balance is not there.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is only one orderly officer for each establishment, and we have not that many establishments.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

Mr. COCKERAM: I was referring to orderly officers for units. How many lieutenants are we to have? Then, I asked a question which I believe was overlooked, with respect to civil servants in the army. We are to have an army with a personnel of 25,000. If there are 11,000 to 12,000 civil servants, does that mean that we are to have 25,000 plus the civil servants or 25,000 inclusive of the civil servants?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be 25,000 plus the civil servants. I can assure my hon. friend that the number of civil servants in the Department of National Defence will be considerably decreased. The number has been decreased since last year, and as demobilization is completed it will be decreased still further. My hon. friend must understand that in the period between demobilizing the old force and setting up the new interim force it is necessary to employ civil servants. A number of temporary employees have been taken on to handle war service gratuities, dependents allowances and other services. It is expected that these services will be closed out in a short time, which will permit of an extensive decrease in the civil staff of the department. The number of civil servants employed includes considerable casual labour which it is necessary to employ during the period of demobilization.

Mr. COCKERAM: We are to have a uniformed force of 25,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

Mr. COCKERAM: Of that number, 7,052 are to be in the brigade group, which leaves about 18,000 odd for other regimental duties such as national defence headquarters, the commands, the districts, the training staff, and what have you. How many officers will there be at national defence headquarters? What is to be the establishment of the commands? What is to be the establishment of the districts? How many personnel will be distributed among militia or reserve units for training purposes? It looks as though out of a total force of 25,000 we shall have only 7,500 men actually available in case of emergency. For instance, there are 3,049 officers; are there to be, 3,049 batmen? Will those men be taken out of the training establishment? Batmen do not do general duties, as the parliamentary assistant knows.

An hon. MEMBER: They should.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is right, they should, but they do not. I can take you around Ottawa here and show you some of those men cutting lawns. How many staff cars are to be run? The other day I saw six staff cars and a station wagon lined up on Bay street in Toronto. How are you going to have any men in the army if you permit this sort of thing to go on?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know my hon. friend has considerable knowledge of military establishments. If he wants me to give him the details of every unit of our peacetime establishment, including the duties of every one, and what there will be in the way of transport, in the way of armament and so on, I shall be glad to do it. I have not that information at hand, but I can give it to my hon. friend in detail, and I think it will keep him busy during the recess.

Mr. COCKERAM: I want to make sure we are getting value for the money we are putting up. Everyone knows that we must have an efficient service. I bring up these matters to point out the stupid expenditures that are being made at this time.

Mr. FERGUSON: People are beginning to wonder at the ramifications of the Department of National Defence. I have a letter from the Minister of National Defence stating that his department intends to publish more copies of the famous French-English military dictionary. It may be possible that some of these staff cars and station wagons are being used by the publishing and printing staffs of the Department of National Defence. I am sure that members of this house and of the senate were pleased to receive copies of that seven pound book, which can be utilized for practically no purpose whatsoever. According to the Minister of National Defence, $25,000 has been spent by the department to publish 1,100 copies, or approximately $25 per book. As I say, the minister has stated that the department intends to put out additional copies to be sold by the department. Twenty-five thousand dollars may seem a small amount compared with other government expenditures, but we are told that additional money is to be spent in publishing this book and in making salesmen out of members of the staff of the Department of National Defence. I do not think the government needs to rely upon the sale of French-English dictionaries in order to provide revenue with which to run the Department of National Defence. I should like the parliamentary assistant to state whether it is intended to print additional copies for the purpose of sale, not only in Canada but abroad.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to assure my hon. friend that none of the staff cars he may see circulating around Ottawa are used by the publishers of the department. The book to which he refers was printed by the king's printer, and I have no knowledge of additional copies having been ordered.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has not the demand been brisk?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know, because that is also handled by the king's printer. I have not kept a chart of the sales of that particular item, and I do not know whether the demand is brisk. I can assure my hon. friend that at times I have found that book very useful, and I am sure other people have found it useful.

Mr. FERGUSON: I should be very glad if the department would get out a dictionary which would help members of this house to learn French, perhaps at a cost of $3 or $4, but I do not think it is humanly possible to learn to speak the French language or the English language from this book which has been published at a cost of $25. In my opinion that is simply squandering the taxpayers' money. I hope the parliamentary assistant speaks with authority when he says that no more of these books will be published, or that no more time of people on the payroll of the Department of National Defence will be taken up in connection with the publishing and sale of this book. However, the fact remains that the Minister of National Defence did state to me that he intended to print more of these books for sale.

Mr. LENNARD: The other night several questions were asked with respect to the personnel of the signal corps at Yellowknife, Dawson and Whitehorse, and these have not been answered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend asked how many signal corps personnel were stationed at Whitehorse, Yellowknife and Dawson City. The figures are as follows: Whitehorse, 1 officer, 7 other ranks; Yellowknife, 12 other ranks; Dawson City, 4 other ranks. My hon. friend asked whether they get annual leave. It has not been the policy to grant leave to personnel on these stations, because in the summer they cannot be spared and in the winter transportation is difficult. This is made plain to them when they volunteer for this service, and they receive extra pay on that account. Their leave is cumulative and they can take it after they have served two years. Compassionate leave is also granted, and transportation paid in such cases. To summarize, the condition is that they serve two years, they receive extra pay for this type of service and their leave is cumulative.

Mr. COCKERAM: The air force for many months have had a plane running between Edmonton and Whitehorse. Perhaps some arrangements could be made with the air force to bring these men out on leave.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be glad to investigate the possibilities.

Mr. GRAYDON: I desire to raise a question which has been brought to my attention by a number of ex-servicemen of this war, many of whom have served in both great wars. It is the vexed question of the clothing allowance granted on discharge. As the minister knows, from September 1, 1939, until October 31, 1943, the clothing allowance for those who were discharged from His Majesty's Canadian armed forces was $35. According to a return which the government brought down in a response to a question I asked in the house on June 10 no less than 96,561 members of the Canadian armed forces received on discharge a clothing allowance of only $35. That is pretty nearly 100,000 of our Canadian soldiers, which is no small number. Then the government, yielding to public and parliamentary and largely, shall I say, opposition pressure, increased the clothing allowance to $65 per person. That remained in effect, according to the return, from November 1, 1943, to July 31, 1944, and there were discharges during that period to the number of 42,559. At the expiry of that period on July 31, 1944, the government, again yelding to persistent pressure, brought the clothing allowance up to $100 per person. In the meantime a total of 140,000 of our men who had enlisted and been discharged, and many of whom had seen service in both wars, found that while everybody discharged after July 31, 1944, got $100 clothing allowance, they had received many of them, only $35 and the others $65 clothing allowance. That seems to be rank discrimination no matter which way you look at it, because there was no substantial difference between the cost of outfitting a man discharged from the armed forces in any of those periods, and if it was right to give a man a clothing allowance of $100 after August 1, 1944, it was obviously right that every man discharged from the beginning of the war until August 1, 1944, should have received the same amount.

I am going to appeal to the parliamentary assistant to-day to be a little more considerate than the minister himself appeared to be when I brought this matter up before, because many members of our armed forces, to the numbers I have mentioned are rankling under what they feel is an injustice done to them in the clothing allowance granted. I ask the parliamentary assistant to review this whole matter again and to see to it that these men are given their just deserts with respect to the clothing allowance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be pleased to have the matter looked into again.

Mr. HARKNESS: The breakdown of officers of the permanent force which the parliamentary assistant gave a little while ago shows 100 officers of the rank of full colonel or above. That number in my opinion is extravagantly large. I can think of only from thirty to thirty-five jobs in the army in Canada which require an officer of the rank of full colonel or above. There are some eleven military districts and five commands, making a total of sixteen. There is one brigade group, bringing the total to seventeen. If you allow fifteen at N.D.H.Q., which is a very liberal allowance of officers to serve as heads of services, chiefs of staffs and their chief assistants, you have thirty-two altogether. Add another one for the Yukon, now that we are looking after the Alaska highway, and that brings the total to thirty-three. In any event thirty-five is the absolute maximum of jobs that I can think of requiring an officer of the rank of full colonel or above. I should like very much to know what the government are going to do with the other sixty-five. It looks to me as though they had been pushed into very soft jobs, carrying a rank which the job itself does not justify and did not justify even under active service conditions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have given my hon. friend the proposed establishment. As to whether we have too many high-ranking officers or whether they are occupying posts where they are just filling soft jobs, as my hon. friend stated, in the army, as in any department of government or in any private concern, you must have men at the top to run the job efficiently, and you pay them according to what they are worth and according to the work they do. That is what we intend to do in the army. My hon. friend will recall that under the new set-up of pay there is no longer in the army what we used to call the classified staff pay, under which system officers serving at headquarters receive in addition to the pay of their rank special pay for staff work. That has been done away with, and I think rightly, if I may express my humble opinion. But it makes for this situation, that an officer in order to get the pay which is adequate for the service he renders must be given the rank which calls for that pay. I hope my hon. friend will believe that this policy is justifiable.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am afraid I am not satisfied with that answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not expect it.

Mr. HARKNESS: As I say, under the army system we have in this country, which is modeled on the British system and corresponds fairly well with the United States system, certain jobs carry certain ranks; and as far as our army here in Canada is concerned, I have yet to be shown why we should have more than thirty-four jobs which would carry the rank of full colonel. In my opinion we just have not the jobs. The army is not big enough in peacetime to have that number. I think we are just top-heavy with ranking officers. If I said that it was a matter of creating "soft jobs" for them, I am sorry. I did not mean that they were soft jobs; I meant that these officers were given jobs with inflated rank and, therefore, an inflated rate of pay. The jobs may be much bigger than some which officers with a rank or two higher are performing.

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask for some breakdown of this item of the estimates, "construction, purchase, repairs, operating expenses of properties, $25,498,136?"

Mr. BLACKMORE: While the parliamentary assistant is looking up the information, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you would tell us whether, when you ask us if the item will carry, that means that the whole of the item is to carry? I had the impression that you were going from division to division. I asked this morning when we would have an opportunity of discussing the Alaska highway; I should like that information.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I was calling an item which included all these things, and I understood the minister had given the hon. member the undertaking that he could discuss the matter he has in mind before this item is carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The understanding was that, on page 275, under the division having to do with the northwest highway system, it would be appropriate to discuss this item.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is appropriate under this item. The hon. member is in order to discuss the item now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps we had better let the minister answer the question of the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I may be permitted to answer that question as to the details of this item of "construction, purchase, repairs and operating expenses", under non-recurring costs there is a commitment carryover of $3 million; new construction, $1,940,860; reconditioning of properties to be returned to lessors, $5,687,585. Hon. members know that in a great number of cases we leased properties during the period of the war, and under the terms of the lease the crown was responsible for returning to the lessor the property in a good state of repair. This is the item under which the necessary expenditure is provided.

Mr. COCKERAM: Could the parliamentary assistant give us the detail of these properties and the amount to be expended? It need not be given now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, I can easily procure that. I have the information here: operating expenses of properties, $162,372. Under recurring costs, we have maintenance and repairs, $4,761,000; rental of property and land, $1,396,317; miscellaneous expenses, $691,642; operating expenses of properties, $4,966,663.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not get the amount for purchases.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Purchases of new properties, including land, $2,418,240.

Mr. HAZEN: Could the minister give us a breakdown of that item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I have not here the breakdown by properties, but I could give that to my hon. friend at a later date, too.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I direct the attention of the committee for a short time to the Alaska highway, which, all hon. members will recall was constructed by the United States through northwestern Canada while the war was on. It will be remembered that there was particularly constructed a stretch of highway about fifteen hundred miles in length extending from Fort St. John to Fairbanks, Alaska, at an expense which has been estimated at between $98 million and $133 million. An all weather road and an all year route, it is graded twenty-four feet wide and capable of carrying a tremendous volume of traffic. The estimated cost of maintenance of this road is between $3 million and $5 million, according to the Great Falls Tribune, in an article published on October 7, 1945. This road, as hon. members know, has been turned over to the Dominion of Canada. It is of exceedingly great importance to us, we will say, in connection with business and tourist traffic, and we will discuss it from that point of view. I should like to know what the government is doing concerning this road. I understand that it is under the care of the Department of National Defence.

There are several aspects of this matter which, I believe, should be looked into by the committee at this time. The first has to do with the maintenance of the road. We can either let the road stand idle and deteriorate, as it would naturally do, or keep it in a state of good repair. It is extremely important for the committee to know what the government is doing in this regard; how much has been spent since V-J day; in what respect it has been spent; with what results, and who is doing the work. I think we as a committee should look into that. Perhaps someone who is doing the work is getting more pay than he ought to get, or maybe is getting too little.

Another matter: is the road open for tourist traffic? Hon. members know how important the tourist trade is to Canada. They have been informed, as a result of the activities of the hon. member for Davenport, of the almost fairyland attractions of that northern area. They will, therefore, realize that there are great tourist possibilities in that country if this great highway is opened for tourist traffic. I should like the minister to tell us something about that.

Then I think it would be a good thing for us to know to what extent the highway is available for commercial traffic. If heavy trucks are being allowed to carry oil and other heavy loads over the highway, it may be that the highway has deteriorated. We ought to know something about the government's policy in that respect.

Obviously, if this road is to be of the greatest value to the Dominion of Canada tributary roads should be built into it from the various provinces. It is quite conceivable that there should be one, say, from Winnipeg, one from Saskatoon, and one coming in from British Columbia. The obvious thing, I would think, for the federal government to do would be to invite the cooperation of the four western provinces that are contiguous to the road in building suitable highways which could be used in cases of emergency for almost any kind of traffic which it may be found necessary to carry over them. I should like to know to what extent the government has considered that matter and how great its progress has been in this regard.

Another matter which should be looked into is the development of the resources along the Alaska highway. There is a wide variety of resources. We have timber, minerals, areas of good land which could be used for agricultural purposes, and so on, and a good deal of fishing is possible there. It seems to me that a wise policy organized in conjunction with the provinces could bring about a condition under which it would be much less expensive for the dominion to maintain this highway at that standard of quality at which I think the United States would be justified in expecting us to maintain it, and at which our own national safety would dictate that we should maintain it.

Obviously, if there is to be any considerable use of the road, either for commercial purposes or for tourist purposes, there should be such facilities as service stations along the way and even restaurants and other necessary conveniences. I think it would be interesting for the minister to tell us something about what is being done in that regard, whether the government has a policy of encouraging those who might wish to establish such facilities along the road and what succes it is having in that regard.

There is a section of the road which has not yet been completed. It is the section between Edmonton and Dawson Creek. There is about a 200-mile stretch of road there which has not yet been completed so that it could be used in an effective way in case of emergency or for ordinary commercial purposes. For obvious reasons, this section should be built at as early a day as possible. Would the minister tell the committee what the plan of the government is with regard to this matter and what has already been done? I wish to ask a number of questions, and so that the minister may have an opportunity to reply to them in an orderly way I will read them and then send the list over to him.

1. Is the Alaska highway being maintained? How much money has been expended since V-J day? In what sorts of maintenance was the money expended, and who did the work—government companies or agencies or private companies and agencies?

2. Is tourist traffic being permitted by the government? If not, why not?

3. Is the highway available for ordinary commercial traffic?

4. Have any steps been taken to obtain cooperation of the four western provinces in constructing high-class highways connecting with the highway to enhance its value?

5. Has anything been done to stimulate the development of resources contiguous to the highway?

6. What has been or is being done to encourage the establishment and development of facilities for services for traffic along the Alaska highway?

7. What measures has the government adopted or planned to complete the stretch from Edmonton to Dawson Creek, about 200 miles?

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps the minister will allow me to say a few words first, and he can reply to me at the same time. I may be able to help him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You probably can.

Mr. MacNICOL: Having been over much of the Alaska highway, I know something about it. The hon. member for Lethbridge has said something about it, and I will begin with the last question he asked in regard to the roadway from Edmonton to Dawson Creek. I would advise that this road be projected straight north west in as direct a route as possible to Grande Prairie.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Through Whitecourt.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, through Whitecourt to Grande Prairie, then following the present roadway to Dawson Creek, where you connect up with the Alaska highway which now starts at Dawson Creek. The original programme was to start it at Fort St. John. From Dawson Creek north it is a good roadway but it will require considerable attention. In reply to a question asked earlier in the session, a minister —I forget who it was—said that the government contemplated that it would cost about $5,000,000 a year to keep the roadway in proper operation, and I for one would be well pleased if they could keep it in adequate condition for operation at a cost of four or five million dollars a year. It is found in the spring that in a number of cases the bridges are taken out, because of the mountainous rivers rising as high as forty feet in a night as a result of the rapid melting of snows in the mountains which the road runs through for a considerable distance, or from heavy rains. That, however, is not an insurmountable obstacle. Besides, the maintenance of the roadway and repairs to bridges would give the department a splendid opportunity to train their engineers. I suggest that the government has a highly desirable school there for its engineering department in the maintenance of the Alaska highway, and the money will not be misspent, because, after all, the engineers must be trained and this work affords a practical opportunity for training them. Moreover, the government will have to maintain quite a staff of all sorts of men to assist the engineers, and they will have to give them practical training for the purpose. The Alaska highway would offer a golden opportunity for the practical training of all such men as are associated with the engineers in the construction of military works of any description.

The hon. member spoke of other roadways. I suggest that the defence department be employed to connect up the roadway that now runs west from Peace River through Grimshaw, but which does not, though it should, connect with Fort St. John. There again the department would have an excellent opportunity for training its men. Of course, it would have to cooperate with the British Columbia and Alberta governments but I understand that those governments are willing to cooperate and are themselves interested in promoting the construction of the roadway. Cooperation would also be necessary with the Saskatchewan government, which desires very greatly that the latter roadway should be completed. I agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge that the Alaska highway would be a remarkable tourist route, particularly the north end of it, because I doubt whether there is any place in America where one can enjoy such grandeur. There is no more magnificent scenery, no more striking landscape than is to be seen from Fort Nelson north, particularly as you get up to and beyond Watson lake. In that area Canada has a perfect paradise of tourist attraction.

As far as minerals are concerned, near Watson lake they are projecting a number of gold mines which will be profitable. I do not wish to take up any more time, but I strongly endorse the suggestion that the department use such men as are required to keep that road in first-class shape, thereby providing a roadway to a tourist paradise and at the same time furnishing actual practical work for the training of engineers and all others associated with them. I suggest that it would return a rich harvest.

Mr. DECHENE: I am greatly interested in this question, and I regret very much to take up a few minutes of your time, Mr. Chairman, of which I have been very sparing; but if this government is to spend more money on the Alaska highway, I suggest to you, sir, that it should be done in the way it has been done throughout the war, from Edmonton to the town of Athabaska northwesterly, crossing Slave river, south of Slave lake and along the shores of that beautiful lake to Peace river. That road carried immense traffic throughout the war when the highway was constructed from Dawson Creek to Whitehorse and beyond and hundreds and thousands of trucks traveled from Edmonton, damaging the road to a considerable extent in consequence. That was the result of extensive and heavy traffic. If the dominion government is to enter into an expenditure this side of Dawson Creek, undoubtedly it should be from Edmonton to Athabaska and from Athabaska to Smith, and on to the Peace river south of Lesser Slave lake. A bridge was constructed over the river west of Slave lake, costing a large sum of money, in order to serve the Alaska highway. It is the proper place to spend more money; and I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that if the Department of National Defence decides to enter upon this undertaking and take over the road from Dawson Creek to Edmonton, if they undertake further expenditure within the province of Alberta it should be on the road to the town of Athabaska and northwesterly from there to the Peace river country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am grateful to the hon. member for Davenport and the last speaker for giving me all this information on the local situation in connection with the Alaska highway. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge. I know the importance of the highway in that section of the country, not only in regard to tourist trade but also in regard to future development of the natural resources of that great region; and, as he mentioned, from the point of view of defence. The hon. member asked a series of questions, which I shall answer as far as may be possible.

His first question was, is the Alaska highway being maintained and how much money has been expended since V-J day; and on what maintenance work has the money been expended? The northwest highway system, as my hon. friend knows, was taken over by the Canadian government, by the Department of National Defence, on April 1 last. Prior to that, the work had been done and the expenditure made by the United States. In connection with taking over the road a unit of Canadian engineers was sent there in January, 1946. The actual expenditure by the Canadian government up to the time the highway was taken over was $188,344. Since we have taken over the highway, to July 31 we have spent $625,000 in operation and maintenance, and the personnel we have there number 245 service personnel and 416 civilians. Of the civilians, the great majority were already engaged in the maintenance of the highway, and were taken over by us. I want to assure the hon. member for Lethbridge and also the hon. member for Davenport that, in taking over this highway, the department has contemplated its use as a future training ground for our engineers in the post-war army, and undoubtedly it will be used for that purpose. All the work on the highway is being done by the personnel I have just mentioned, under the direction of the commander of the northwest highway system.

With regard to tourist traffic, I am told that at present tourists may go on the highway but must first obtain a permit from the acting special commissioner for the Canadian government in Edmonton. They must show that they are in good health and that their vehicles are in serviceable condition for the trip up the highway and back. My hon. friend will understand that this is necessary at the present time in view of the lack of facilities along the highway, and it was only prudent on the part of the authorities to follow this course. The highway is also available for commercial traffic, again subject to the approval of the special commissioner. I am informed—and this information is not official but comes to me like the information I have received from the hon. member for Davenport—that in July some 897 vehicles, both passenger cars and trucks, made the trip over the highway.

As to the possible extension of the highway to join with other highways in the various provinces, I am informed that at present this question is under consideration with the governments of Alberta and British Columbia.

I believe my hon. friend also asked what was being done in connection with the development of the natural resources of that region. As he knows, that matter comes under the Department of Mines and Resources, and I am afraid I would not be in a position to give him that information.

The question of the completion of the stretch between Edmonton and Dawson Creek is, I realize, an important matter. I did not realize it before, but I understand now that it is a controversial question. I am afraid I am not in a position to give the hon. member any information. It would appear that this might be a matter under the control of the government of Alberta, since it is a question of highway construction. However, I am sure the matter will be given study in connection with the future use of the highway and the development of the region.

Mr. LOW: I appreciate the information the parliamentary assistant has given in his answers to the questions asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge. I should like to make one or two further observations and ask one or two questions. Has anything been done as yet by the department to connect the Great Slave lake area by a cross-road to the Alaska highway, and also the Great Bear lake basin, where they have discovered many important minerals? I ask these questions because it seems to me if the Alaska highway is properly to serve Canada in times of stress as well as in times of peace, feeder roads will have to be built linking these great mineral areas with the strategic highways along which the traffic of the northwest runs. As the hon. gentleman knows, the provincial government of Alberta, in collaboration and cooperation with the dominion government, at the present time is building the Grimshaw-Slave Lake highway. That is a thrust of about 200 miles straight north of Grimshaw, which is just west of Peace River town. That is to get into the Mackenzie basin. Down the Mackenzie basin is an easy grade, which has been surveyed several times. I believe the province of Alberta originally recommended that this be the route of the Alaska highway, but that recommendation was not followed. I further believe that since then it has been decided it was a mistake not to follow that recommendation. However, the road is there and I believe it can serve a very useful purpose. In the Slave lake area, as well as in the Great Bear lake area and the Norman Wells area, we have already developed huge mineral resources. We also have the Canol pipeline, which runs across from the Norman Wells area into Alaska. Some kind of tractor road, or perhaps just a primitive trail, was built across there, and I was wondering if the department intends to develop that into a permanent road, so that in due course the pipeline may be able to serve the needs of the great northwest, whenever the oil from Norman Wells is needed. If the parliamentary assistant would answer those questions, then I should like to say one word with respect to a matter which has caused a little difference of opinion here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I am not in a position to give any specific answer about the particular routes, roads or highways the hon. member mentioned. All I can tell him is that the whole development of that region and the further roads to extend from the Alaska highway is at present under study. I am afraid I cannot give anything further.

Mr. LOW: As the department develops its plans, there is one thing which could be kept in mind, with profit, and I offer it only as a suggestion. It might be considered when the plans are being laid for the development of the northern country, and the highway itself. It is quite conceivable that that great northwestern highway might become of tremendous value to Canada in a time of stress. Its value would depend upon whether it is linked with the great industrial parts of America, along which route from such industrial areas materials might be moved quickly for defence purposes.

For a number of years the province of Alberta, the state of Montana, and other areas in northwestern United States and in Canada have organized bodies to study this highway, and the need for it. They have advocated the most direct possible route from Great Falls in Montana to Lethbridge, Calgary and Edmonton, and up to Dawson Creek and Fort St. John.

As to the route, the province of Alberta, in constructing the link between the international boundary line and Lethbridge just last year, kept in mind the possible need of a military highway. They have built in that link of about seventy-five miles the finest example of what could be a military highway, that I have seen in Canada. I understand that it is ready for hard-surfacing this year. They have also been improving the route between Lethbridge and Edmonton. Two or three years ago the province of Alberta completed a survey between Edmonton and Grande Prairie by way of Whitecourt, a northwest route which obviates the necessity of going clear around through Athabaska and along the shores of Slave lake. It cuts off approximately 100 miles in the distance between Dawson Creek and Edmonton, runs through a country where the grades would probably be easy, and where the country could easily be developed.

That survey is complete, and the information is available. Some day we shall see the necessity of having the most direct route for military purposes. The parliamentary assistant has stated that the development of other highways through centres now served will have to be left to the province. I say the province is fully aware of its responsibility in that respect and is to-day improving the road by way of Athabaska and up through the southern Peace river.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be pleased to draw the minister's attention to what the hon. member has said.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can add a word for the minister's benefit with respect to the first route mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River, namely the route from Norman Wells extending 650 miles across two ranges of mountains to Whitehorse. That is another area where departmental engineers and those associated with them will have plenty of opportunity to develop themselves. I have been over the east end of that route from Norman Wells to stop 41, a distance of something less than 100 miles, and I was over the west end of the route for about 100 miles. At the time I was there the roadway was open all the way through, but when one comes to the two ranges of mountains through which the roadway runs a tractor would be required to pull a car up the grade. I do not believe it was ever completed to the extent that anyone leaving Whitehorse could ride through in his motor car to Norman Wells without the assistance of a tractor to get up the grades. Further than that, one could go through only in a motor car with high wheels, one of the old fashioned type, because of the mountain creeks.

This is an area in which the department will have one of the best opportunities possible to train engineers and all personnel who will assist the army engineers. Since the government must maintain an engineering staff and train it, I would say this is a fine place to do it. If they ever do, through their engineering service, make the Whitehorse-Norman Wells route passable for cars, it will make available a tourist route the like of which few human eyes have seen. It almost beggars description, so far as I have seen it. It is a marvellous area, and I have no doubt that if it is once completed it will be so great an attraction for tourist traffic it will pay for itself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The parliamentary assistant will have noticed that a large percentage of the Alaska highway, as it will be in its completed form, will be built through Alberta. This necessitates tremendous expenditures.

Mr. MacNICOL: Up to parallel 60.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This runs through a relatively sparsely settled area in Alberta. While we are discussing this matter, I would suggest that the parliamentary assistant should urge upon the minister to take under serious consideration the advisability of setting aside a government appropriation for Alberta, to assist the province in the building of this highway. There is no suggestion that the province would not ultimately build it, but perhaps, owing to scarcity of money, it might not be able to build it soon enough. Would the parliamentary assistant bring this matter to the attention of the minister?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. HAZEN: I asked the minister for particulars about the purchase of property. He said he would get them. If the item is passed now, when shall I get those particulars.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When the estimates for the air services are before the committee.

Mr. HAZEN: This morning the hon. member for Lake Centre asked the minister to produce a letter from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police dealing with certain alleged wrongdoing in connection with the use of army rejection certificates. The minister said he would give the request consideration. He is not here this afternoon, and I should like to know when we shall get this information, if the item passes.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister did say he was asking that the matter be looked into, in the files. He also said it might be necessary to refer to the district, if correspondence had taken place between the district and the mounted police. If there is any correspondence to table I shall gladly table it at the same time as I table any other information, when the air services are before the committee.

Mr. BROOKS: I have a question in connection with properties taken over by the department from private owners, which have now been turned back to War Assets Corporation, and which are now being resold by War Assets Corporation to the former owners. Many of these properties were used for training purposes in connection with bombing, and so on. I believe there were two or three around Sussex with which the parliamentary assistant will be familiar. They have been turned over to War Assets Corporation, and private citizens have made arrangements to buy them. But these arrangements have been held up for months, the difficulty being that the properties have to be decontaminated—I believe that is the term used. Are steps being taken to decontaminate the properties which have been turned over to War Assets? If not, can this work be speeded up, because I know a lot of men who want to get back on these properties are being held up?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minute a property is declared surplus and it goes into the hands of War Assets our responsibility ceases, so to speak. The process followed by War Assets has absolutely nothing to do with us. In cases where a property was taken over, say, from a municipality, for use as a training ground without any buildings being erected, the property is remitted to the municipality without having to go through War Assets. But if there has been any construction it must go through War Assets.

Mr. BROOKS: The properties I have referred to are near Essex and they are made up of a number of farms which were taken over. These properties should be decontaminated before being handed over to War Assets, and I understand the difficulty is to get the Department of National Defence to do this work. The arrangements made by War Assets to sell these properties are held up because they are not decontaminated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will look into the matter right away.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to say a word about the supplying of equipment to the reserve army, particularly to those units using technical equipment. The minister made a statement in connection with the supply of equipment to the reserve army of Canada, but, so far as I know, armoured regiments and SP artillery regiments in particular have received only small amounts of equipment in the way of tanks and SP guns. I am particularly familiar with an anti-tank regiment composed of four batteries. Each battery is supposed to have twelve guns, but so far they have been supplied only with two SP guns which, in my opinion, is not sufficient for training purposes.

I would request the department to be as generous as possible in the matter of supplying equipment to reserve units. They have a difficult time in attracting recruits and carrying on training under the best of circumstances. With the large amount of equipment left on our hands at the end of the war, I should think it would be readily possible to supply these reserve units with what they need in the way of tanks, SP guns, transport vehicles, signal equipment, signal vehicles and so on. I cannot emphasize too strongly the necessity of the department being generous to the reserve units in the matter of supplying equipment.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to express my personal appreciation of the ability with which the young parliamentary assistant has carried out his duties. I was particularly pleased with the way in which he answered the capable inquiries from this side of the house. I was reminded of his brilliant father, and I said to myself that some day this young man would take his father's place in the seats of the mighty of this country.

Mr. LOW: We agree entirely with those remarks.

Progress reported.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF WAGE AGREEMENTS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): A report has just been received by telephone from Mr. F. W. Edge, director of labour relations, Canadian National Railways, that his negotiations with the presidents, vice presidents and general chairmen of the various labour organizations representing all the employees of the Canadian National Railways, the Ontario Northern Railway and all the subsidiaries of the Canadian National Railways, representing in all approximately 115,000 men, have been successful. At one o'clock to-day the president and executive vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. R. C. Vaughan and Mr. N. B. Walton, approved an agreement which had been entered into by Mr. Edge with the heads of the various organizations, calling for an increase in the case of maintenance of way men of eight cents per hour, and of all other organizations of ten cents per hour, effective June 1, 1946, and deferring consideration with respect to conditions until February 1, 1947. The only organization in connection with which the negotiations have not been concluded is the brotherhood of railway trainmen. These negotiations are being conducted separately, and it is expected that an agreement will be consummated in the near future.

The reason the maintenance of way men were offered and have agreed to a rate lower than other occupations is that they had a two cent adjustment in their wage rates in April, 1946. It is of interest to note that a number of the men are affiliated with the Canadian congress of labour, and the negotiations have been conducted on their behalf by Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian brotherhood of railway employees and other transport workers. An application is being made by Mr. Edge on behalf of both the employees and the company to the national war labour board for approval.

Mr. COLDWELL: As I understand it, the eight cents is in addition to the two cents, bringing the total to ten cents?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. This is an indication of what I said last night, that common sense and conciliation are the real answer to the problem, not negotiations in this house or through the newspapers.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

CORPORATION TO RECEIVE LICENCE FEES—ADVANCES ON ACCOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of bill No. 391, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, while this bill is short and may appear to some to be innocuous, I hope that in the discussion we shall realize the great importance of this measure. This bill contemplates the extension of the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and it should be considered carefully before being adopted, especially since that expansion, in part at least, is to be at the expense of certain private stations. The bill raises the whole question of the relationship between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations. It places at the disposal of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a blank cheque with which to carry on this great programme of expansion.

The bill embodies some of the recommendations contained in the report of the special committee on radio broadcasting which was tabled a few days ago. Three of the four sections of the bill deal with recommendations from that report. At the outset I should like to emphasize that the report was not unanimous. It represents the recommendations of the Liberal-C.C.F. majority on the committee, but it was opposed by the Progressive Conservative and Social Credit members.

The report recommends lavish commitments and carries a complete approval of everything the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has ever done or proposes to do. In the second place, it proposes to be more than lavish in meeting all the requests of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In the third place, it proposes, as the bill itself indicates, to be lavish with the money of the people of Canada in giving support to its programme.

Good work was done in the committee. A number of facts of the highest importance were brought before the public. The work of the committee was not done exhaustively, because there are certain things that should have been done and should have been treated in the report which were to some extent side-stepped both in the report and in the bill. Matters are also dealt with in the report which were not before the committee when it was taking evidence.

I have this criticism to make of the manner in which the committee proceeded. It put the cart before the horse. It heard a review from C.B.C. at the outset of its past administration. Then, without calling upon C.B.C. to outline its policy for the future, involving, as we eventually learned, the absorption of two major wave leangths now held by private companies in this country, it called upon the private companies to come forward and meet a case that had not yet been put before the two major wave lengths now held by private companies had been called upon to make their defence that C.B.C. was called upon to present its case. I say that was putting the cart before the horse. It put the private stations at a great disadvantage in not knowing adequately the case that they would be called upon later to meet. It also meant that we had some major recommendations from C.B.C., which have found their way into the report and into the bill, but which did not come before the committee until the very last minute. For that I do not put any blame whatever on the corporation, because I am satisfied that its officials would have liked to make their complete presentation at the beginning and proceed in an orderly fashion. I place the blame entirely on the majority of the committee.

There is in the report one recommendation which is unanimous, and that is that a radio committee should be appointed every year and meet early in the session. Since parliamentary committees began to study radio in 1932, radio committees have met in nine out of the fifteen years. When years passed without a committee, when the committee eventually did sit it found it had a great deal of work to cover.

The second part of that recommendation will, I hope, be given due weight. The committee which sat this year did not meet until the seventy-fifth day of the session. This has meant that much of the work of the committee was done in these recent days under pressure and that a bill which raises issues of vast importance to the people of Canada now comes before the house at the very end of the session when there is a disposition to hurry through to prorogation.

It has been the practice in recent years for reports from the radio committee not to be the subject of discussion in the house. The first two committees of 1932 and 1934 submitted their reports to the house and a motion for concurrence in them was made in each case, and adopted. That, I submit, is the proper practice. In 1936 the committee's report was not concurred in by motion, but was followed by the enactment of the present Canadian Broadcasting Act of that year. The committee reports of 1938, 1939, 1942 and 1943 were not followed by any discussion in the house. I think that was a mistake. The report of 1944 was followed by one slight amendment to the act. I wish to express my conviction that the whole question of radio broadcasting is of such importance that it ought to receive adequate debate in this house. It would be good for the public and parliament to have more light and more information by way of an accounting on the part of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and of the private stations of their operations. I think it can be said for C.B.C. that it would be glad to have more assistance from parliament. It has not had that assistance from parliament. There have been certain recommendations from parliamentary committees, but the committees' reports have not for the last ten years been given the concurrence of the house. The committees' recommendations have not been endorsed by the house, let alone by parliament. I think that C.B.C. is entitled to have from parliament some clear direction as to policy.

This point I make in favour of the bill. It affords us at long last an opportunity to review C.B.C. policy, particularly in relation to the major expansion that is now proposed.

In saying what I have to say, I wish to make it clear that when I speak critically I am not speaking critically of any individuals. I am speaking of the system which is implicit in the statute and of the policy which has been followed in the light of reports of committees. So far as I personally am concerned, in the course of the meetings of the committee I formed a liking and no little esteem for the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who appeared before us, and I want to make it clear that any criticism I have to make is a criticism of a system and not of individuals.

There have been reports—and perhaps when the minister speaks he will say a word about this—about lobbying which sought to exert pressure on the committee. I found such a suggestion contained, for instance, in a letter dated August 2, 1946, written by the secretary of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture to certain groups. It contains this paragraph, and there were many other letters of the same kind sent throughout the country, some of which came to the attention of the committee. The paragraph reads:

> Never before has there been so strong a lobby on behalf of the private radio interests. A great deal of money has been made by these interests, despite anything that may be said to the contrary, and they are not hesitant about laying out money. The lobbying that has been going on is terrific, with suites at the chateau and a good deal of entertainment. We have been told that those private interests concerned, who are supporters of the government, are making it uncomfortable for the government and leaders of the parties. This is the old game of pressure politics with selfish interests attempting to again wield their influence.

I do not know where the writer of that letter got his information, but I want to say for myself as a member of the committee that I attended twenty-six out of the twenty-eight meetings and I saw not one trace at any time of any lobbying in any way, shape or form. I hope that the minister when he speaks will be able to say the same thing on behalf of those who sit on that side of the house. I think that when the radio committee is set up next year an effort should be made to find the source of such utterly unfounded statements, because they are an unwarranted reflection on members of parliament who are seeking to do their best without paying any attention to any pressure. At no time did I see any sign of any pressure or any lobbying.

I have said that this bill calls upon us to see in perspective the policy that C.B.C. is following at the present time. I will review the history of recent years as rapidly as I can.

Parliament's concern with radio broadcasting really begins with the year 1929, when the Aird commission made its report to the then minister of marine, Hon. P. J. A. Cardin. That commission was composed of Sir John Aird, Mr. Charles A. Bowman, and Doctor Augustin Frigon, who is now general manager of the corporation. They recommended that a national company be formed, to be called the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Company, to own and operate all radio broadcasting stations in Canada. In other words, they recommended the complete nationalization of all means of broadcasting in Canada; they condemned direct advertising on the air, and recommended provincial control over programmes of stations within the provincial areas. No action was taken on that report until the year 1932, when a parliamentary committee was set up to review the whole situation. That committee made extensive recommendations which found their way into the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act of that year. There are in that report two leading recommendations which I think are deserving of mention at this time:

> (b) That a nationally-owned system of radio broadcasting be instituted,—

I emphasize that.

> —and that all stations required for its proper organization be eventually acquired, same to be financed from the revenue accruing to the business of broadcasting, without expense to the taxpayers through the public treasury.
> (c) That all stations, 100 watt and under, not required for the national system, remain under private ownership, but be regulated as to programmes and advertising by the rules of the commission.

Whereas the Aird commission had recommended seven powerful stations of 50,000 watts each, one to be located in the maritimes, one in each of the other provinces, the 1932 committee recommended five 50,000 watt stations and a number of privately owned 100 watt stations.

When the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act was enacted in 1932 certain safeguards were reserved to parliament which I think are of high importance. Section 9 of that act states that the commission shall have power to carry on the business of broadcasting in Canada, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may:

(b) acquire existing private stations either by lease, or, subject to the approval of parliament, by purchase;

(c) subject to the approval of parliament, construct such new stations as may be required;

(g) subject to the approval of parliament, take over all broadcasting in Canada.

I emphasize those words, "subject to the approval of parliament," in reference to each of these powers.

Then we come to the 1934 committee, which included as recommendation No. 5 of its report:

That, pending the nationalization of all stations, greater cooperation should be established between privately owned stations and the commission.

Hon. members will see that still the underlying conception there is complete nationalization of all means of radio broadcasting in Canada.

The 1936 committee in its report included as its recommendation No. 7:

We reaffirm the principle of complete nationalization of radio broadcasting in Canada.

I point out that the report of 1936 was followed by the enactment of the present act, the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936, under which the Canadian Broadcasting corporation derives all its powers and functions to-day and that act was based on the recommendation of a committee which still contemplated the complete nationalization of all means of radio broadcasting in Canada.

Then we come to the 1938 report, and we find on page 194 this statement:

Your committee is of the opinion that while private stations will continue to serve a useful local purpose, the corporation urgently requires its own comprehensive facilities for distribution.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give attention to the fact that here, in the 1938 report, some status is now accorded to the private stations, and here we have what I submit is the first departure in committee reports from the idea of complete nationalization; here we have the first recognition in a parliamentary report of a permanent role for private stations.

When we come to the next report, in the year 1939, we see emphasis is laid in the recommendations on the duty of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to coordinate both types of broadcasting; that is to say, national broadcasting over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and broadcasting over the private stations. It assumes that there is to be broadcasting from private stations to be coordinated with the national system. The only inference is that a permanent role is now contemplated for the private stations.

Then we come to the 1942 report, which is a major report, which reaffirmed many of the recommendations of earlier committees as follows:

(a) The paramount importance of a single national authority to control all broadcasting in the public interest; (1932)

(b) The public ownership of all high power stations under a national system of broadcasting, with low power stations individually operated or coordinated in relation to the dominant system; (1932)

(c) The coordination of all broadcasting in Canada through exclusive control being vested in the nationally-owned system of:—

(i) The character of all programmes, political or otherwise, broadcast by all stations and of the advertising content thereof; and

(ii) All wire-line networks used for carrying broadcast programmes. (1936)

The report of the committee in 1943 reaffirmed those recommendations. The reports of the committees in both those years, 1942 and 1943, had this to say, that they recognized that private stations were serving a useful function. No longer do we find any suggestion of complete nationalization of all stations and all means of broadcasting in Canada.

In the report of the committee for 1943 we have for the first time set out a submission of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. It is done, it is true, without comment; but again there is the recognition that the private stations serve a useful function.

In the 1944 report the submission of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, representing the great majority of the private stations, asking for "an impartial" body to regulate broadcasting, was set forth, and this time it was rejected.

In the 1946 committee's report we have this statement:

Your committee feels that it would be less than fair if it did not record its view that private stations are giving good community service.

Also:

We are of the opinion that private stations should be at all times encouraged and aided to improve their service to their respective communities.

Having reviewed that history from 1929 to 1946, important years and years of great development in broadcasting in Canada, I say that we have six principles on which, I think, all parties in this house will agree.

The first is that radio broadcasting, being carried over the public domain, must be publicly controlled. The second is that in the adminstration of public control the public interest is to be the supreme consideration. In the third place, broadcasting is to be Canadian. The public system was designed, among other reasons, for the purpose of ensuring that there would be carried over a national network in Canada programmes which would be Canadian in their content, and that any national system would not be dominated by broadcasting from the United States. In the fourth place, broadcasting was to be designed to assist the development of Canadian talent. In the fifth place, the radio was to be recognized as an agency of education, not merely one of entertainment. In the sixth place, advertising was not to be permitted to mar programmes.

I say that these are principles on which, I think, all parties in this house will agree. I say also that there has been over these years an evolution and development in radio which has been characterized by these features. In the first place, there have been great technical advances, and advances also in the business of radio broadcasting. In the second place, it is recognized that we are now on the threshold of further great technical advances in radio. Frequency modulation and other discoveries open great vistas for the development of radio in Canada. In the third place, it is abundantly clear, and it is recognized, I submit, in these parliamentary reports to which I have referred, that the private stations have made a great contribution to radio broadcasting in Canada. They have established their right to a permanent role in our scheme of broadcasting in Canada; they have established their right to participate in the technical advances which lie before us; and they have established their value as competition for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and as they develop they are entitled to fair play in that competitive role.

There were, according to the evidence submitted to the committee, to be found at page 165 of the proceedings, on June 6 of this year 103 private stations in Canada, having a strength ranging from 50 to 15,000 watts. Now, Mr. Speaker, obviously credit in measure is due to the enterprise of these stations themselves, which must have given public service to expand that way, and credit is also due for the opportunity given to them to develop under the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and also, I think, to the Department of Transport. I think it is clear that there has been an evolution in policy in the direction of permitting freer opportunity for the development of private stations. That has been all to the good, because I emphasize again that the 1936 act was written on the basis of the recommendations of a committee of parliament which affirmed the principle of complete nationalization, and to that extent we have moved some distance away from the principle of the 1936 act.

I come now to a different subject, one that has to do with the position of private companies in relation to their wave lengths or frequencies. Both the 1943 and the 1946 reports urged that private stations be encouraged to improve their service to the public. How will they do this? Under present legislation what tenure is offered to them of their frequencies? They enjoy an annual licence. Under the Radio Act of 1938 power is given the minister to determine the duration and character of the licence. Regulation 5 issued under that act provides that the licence shall in each case terminate on March 31 of each year; if you will read section 11, subsection 5 of the Broadcasting Act, you will see that there is no vested interest on the part of the licensee in his frequency, and in the event of the frequency being taken over by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, either by expropriation or otherwise, he has no right to compensation.

Two views can be taken of the tenure of wave length or frequency by private stations. The first is that if the licensee has given good public service he is entitled to a renewal of his licence; the other view is that he has no right whatever, and his licence, and the development of his service to the public under the licence, must be circumscribed by that doomsday which he faces all the time, the 31st day of March of the following year. When we are calling upon private stations to improve their service, I ask, what encouragement is given them if they are to have nothing but insecurity of tenure? If their claim to frequency hangs by such a thread that it may be taken away from them on the next March 31; if there is no assurance that in the event of their giving good service and behaving themselves and adhering to the regulations their licence will be extended, what hope is there for the development of good broadcasting over private stations? There is this sword of Damocles hanging over the head of everyone of these stations, under such circumstances, and if the 1946 committee means what it says in asking that encouragement be given by parliament, or by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to the development of broadcasting over private stations, then a study must be made, without delay, of the question of tenure of wave length, subject to proper safeguards in the public interest, with respect to private stations. It is useless to expect them to develop their stations and expend large amounts of money on improvements and giving better public service, as we wish them to do, if their tenure is to be so insecure.

My next point is that whatever confidence the private stations might have had in their tenure of frequency, subject to good behaviour, that confidence must have been greatly shaken by the series of actions of the corporation with reference to three wave lengths, 860, held by CFRB, (Toronto); 1010, CFCN, (Calgary) and 990, CKY, (Winnipeg).

I wish to refer to the North-American Regional broadcasting agreement signed at Havana in 1937, commonly known as the Havana agreement. It came into effect on January 30, 1941 and assigned to Canada six wave lengths known as Class 1-A channels. They are 690, which under the agreement is to be located in the province of Quebec, 740 in Ontario, 860 in Ontario, 990 in Manitoba, 1010 in Alberta and 1580 in Quebec. These frequencies, under the agreement, are to be developed to a strength of 50,000 watts. At the present time, and in fact during all these years, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has occupied three of these channels, being the three not held by the three private stations I have mentioned. It has developed its three 1-A frequencies to a strength of 50,000 watts, while the one held by CKY was 15,000 watts, and CFCN and CFRB, 10,000 watts each. The Havana agreement has been extended by an agreement entered into in Washington on February 25 of this year, so that Canada has until the meeting of the international conference in this country in September, 1947, to develop all these six channels to a strength of 50,000 watts.

One point that should be understood by every member is that there is no requirement under the Havana treaty that these lengths should be held by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The corporation now proposes to take over these three wave lengths held by the three stations I have mentioned, and in so doing it is carrying out a matter of its own policy because it is not required to do so by the treaty. When the treaty came into effect in 1941 the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was not in a position to take over these three wave lengths.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was dealing with the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to take over the wave lengths now possessed by stations CFRB in Toronto, CFCN in Calgary and CKY in Winnipeg, the first two of which have a power of 10,000 watts and the third of which has a power of 15,000 watts. CKY is actually owned by the government of Manitoba, which has not entered any objection to the assumption of its wave length by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so that the matter at issue narrows down to whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation shall take over the wave lengths now possessed by stations CFRB and CFCN.

Before the six o'clock recess, I had mentioned that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation now takes the position that in 1941, when the Havana treaty came into effect, it was not in a position to occupy these three channels and, therefore, assigned them to these stations. This was done, first by a wire dated February 4, 1941, and then by a confirming letter, dated February 10, 1941, which will be found at pages 648 and 649 of the evidence before the 1946 committee. There is not one word in either the wire or the confirming letter, or in any subsequent correspondence with these stations to the end of 1945, suggesting that these channels were being assigned only for a temporary purpose, or for the duration of the war, or until the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation could obtain equipment and proceed with its expansion. There is no suggestion of that; the communications simply announce the assignment of these wave lengths to these companies. In the autumn of 1945 the licensees in question were told that the matter was under review, and were invited to attend a meeting of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at which this matter was discussed. The first official notification to them was by letter dated April 18, 1946, that next spring their channels are to be taken over by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

There is a conflict of evidence as between the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the one hand and the officials of these stations on the other, as to certain facts in regard to the notice, if any, implied or otherwise, which these companies are said to have had as to the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in reference to the assumption of these class 1-A channels. On the one hand, these licensees say they had no knowledge of any policy under which it was the intention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to take their channels. They say they thought they were secure in those channels, subject to giving good public service; that they developed their wave lengths on that basis, expended money to develop them, and that if they were to be dispossessed it would have been far better for them if they had not been assigned these channels in 1941, because the spectrum is so full now—more than it was in 1941—that they would have had a better choice of alternative channels in 1941 than it is possible for them to have today. Moreover, the alternative wave lengths now offered to them by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are admittedly not as good as those they now enjoy. In the case of CFRB it is proposed that they go to the end of the dial, at 1550, which is described among technical radio people as "the graveyard" of the dial. Then, in the case of CFRB it means an expenditure of some $300,000 for simply moving their broadcasting facilities to the point where they must move now, near Niagara, away from Aurora, outside Toronto, where they are now, according to the statement made to the committee by the general manager of CFRB. It means, also, that CBC, which has been a competitor of CFRB in the great metropolitan area of central Ontario, will move into the space where its competitor formerly did business. It means it will have open to it all the listener contacts and a first-class opportunity to obtain the commercial contacts and Columbia network heretofore enjoyed by CFRB. It means also for both CFRB and CFCN a smaller listener-coverage under the proposed new wave lengths.

It is admitted on all sides that these stations have a good record of public service in all respects. I am not going to take time to enumerate their record; it was demonstrated that these stations had an enviable record of public service. As to ownership, in the case of CFCN there is a proposal for a wide diffusion of ownership among farm organizations in the province of Alberta. CFRB is owned by the Rogers Radio Broadcasting Company, and not more than ten per cent of the stock of that company is in the hands of any one person; it is widely diffused. Both these licensees were pioneers in radio; both took very hard knocks in the days when it was difficult for radio broadcasting companies to survive; and having survived and built up their stations, they are to have their wave lengths taken away from them.

I want to be fair to all parties. On the other hand, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation say it was always their policy to take over all these class 1-A channels under the Havana treaty. They say the policy was always known and the execution or fufilment of the policy was simply delayed because, owing to war conditions, they could not obtain equipment to proceed with their plans. They refer to an endorsement put on the licences of these three licensees, beginning in 1941. I pause there to say that the endorsement did nothing more than call attention to one of the regulations under the act, which simply provides, as I intimated earlier, that the assignment of a channel is effective only until March 31 of the following year. That endorsement did not tell these licensees that it was the policy of C.B.C. to assume their channels. The reference to the regulation was a reference to a regulation which is the law for every station in the Dominion of Canada. It was not peculiar in any respect to these three stations. I was surprised to hear an official of the Department of Transport rely on that, as an alleged notice to these licensees, that it was the policy of the C.B.C. to take their frequencies when it suited the C.B.C. to do so. The endorsement was suggested by the Controller of Radio in the Department of Transport in a letter dated April 30, 1941. It was approved on behalf of the C.B.C. in a letter which we were told in evidence was not approved by the board of the C.B.C., but was simply written by the executive assistant to the then general manager. There was very clear understanding between the Department of Transport on the one hand and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the other. The correspondence shows clearly that they understood at the time that it was settled policy to take those channels when it suited the C.B.C. to do so. They took the utmost care to make it a matter of record in the correspondence exchanged beween the Department of Transport and the C.B.C. That is as plain as the nose on one's face; but for some reason or another, it did not occur to anybody to put so much as a phrase in a letter addressed to these three licensees to indicate that this was the policy of the department.

Mr. REID: Are you in favour of newspapers controlling radio?

Mr. FLEMING: The matter of newspapers controlling radio does not enter into the present debate. It does not appear in the report, and was not discussed before the committee. When the committee came to write its report, and in the steering committee, there was a discussion of it, and it was agreed by all that, since we had not made a study of it we should not make a recommendation in the report concerning it, but that it should be studied by a radio committee next year.

Mr. REID: It should be sent back, and there should be a report on it, because I am against newspapers owning radios.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. member may express his views if he wishes. However, I am pointing out that the subject was not discussed in the radio committee, and that it was the view of the members of the committee that it ought to be discussed next year.

The majority in the committee—the Liberal-C.C.F. majority in the committee—have undertaken to say that they think the licensees in stations CFRB and CFCN knew that was the policy. I have indicated that there is direct conflict in the testimony in that respect, and that there is not a word on record in the matter until the end of 1945 to tell these licensees that that was the policy.

In the meantime they have served the interests of the C.B.C., because they have held those channels for Canada, under the Havana treaty; and now that they have occupied those channels and served their purpose, they are being told to vacate; they have served the purpose of C.B.C.

I draw certain deductions from this course of events. In the first place, I say that, while the legal right on the part of the C.B.C. and the government may be clear, nevertheless they have exercised their right in this situation most unfairly. The treatment they have dealt out to these licencees is, in my opinion, most unjust, and there is no excuse whatsoever for the failure of the government and the C.B.C. to put these licensees clearly in a position where they knew what the policy was, that they were only the temporary caretakers of those channels.

But more important the private licensee is the public interest, and I say the public interest will suffer. It suffers because, in the first place, there has been no consideration given in this situation to the listener. This station CFRB is the most popular station—the tests which have been taken show it—in the metropolitan area of central Ontario. Listener interest has not been consulted in the present instance. All that has mattered is the policy of the C.B.C. I make this point distinctly, because I think there was confusion in the minds of the committee on the point: the public interest and the interest of C.B.C. expansion are not the same thing, and they ought not to be confused. In this case I think public interest is not being served by the policy which the C.B.C. proposes to put into effect.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that in the 1939 committee report recommendation No. 11 states:

> Certain of the corporation's policies affecting the public generally have not been sufficiently made known, resulting in misunderstanding and inconvenience. Your committee approves of the corporation's intention to make such policies known more fully and widely in the future. While recognizing the rapidly changing and developing character of the enterprise the committee wishes to stress the need of duly publicizing policy decisions of this kind.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Why was that not done? Here is a policy which has not been properly made known, and which not only is causing misunderstanding and inconvenience, but actually is going to cause substantial damage to licensees, and going to cause a great loss on the part of the public, in radio service of the kind they want.

In the next place, I say this proposal on the part of the C.B.C. is a long step toward monopoly, because it has the effect of eliminating the biggest competitors C.B.C. faces in point of radio listener interest and wide diffusion of good programmes among audiences.

The next point is this: it means another major step toward the centralization of radio broadcasting. It means the loss of local interest to Albertans in the case of CFCN. In Toronto there already is a 50,000-watt C.B.C. station, namely CBL, which is one of the stations on the trans-Canada network. Another C.B.C. station, namely CJCB, is to take over the wave length of CFRB, and build it up to a strength of 50,000 watts, so that it will be the foundation for the second national network which is called the dominion network. There you have two powerful C.B.C. stations, each of 50,000 watts, in the one city.

That leads me to my next point, the fact that the C.B.C. is proceeding with the building up of a second national network. I submit that when the 1936 broadcasting act was written, giving to C.B.C. the power to build up a national system of broadcasting in Canada, it was the intention that there should be one good dominion-wide network, one coast-to-coast network which would reach even to the most remote areas. That is recognized in the report of the 1946 committee, that it is the duty of the C.B.C. to reach the remotest areas, so that all the people of Canada may have the benefit of a national network. To-day ninety-four per cent of the people of Canada are within reach of the Trans-Canada network, with the assistance of private stations, on a national hook-up.

The building of a second national network simply means that an alternative network is offering an alternative programme to the same people as the Trans-Canada. It is being done in this instance at the expense of these two stations. The CFRB wave length is to go on the Dominion network and CFCN on the Trans-Canada.

I submit that that is what is involved in this bill before us. The principle of the bill is that it enables the C.B.C. to carry out its expansion, to set up a second national network to parallel the existing network and to do so at the expense of two most important private stations, leading competitors of the C.B.C., and by taking away from listeners in Alberta and in central Ontario the programmes to which they have been accustomed.

That leads me to the next point. I wish to draw the attention of the house to the wide powers possessed by the C.B.C., and to the tendency inherent in expansion. The second hook-up means expansion in the national system, and it could mean something more, if this continued expansion is pursued. I say that inherent in that degree of expansion there are grave dangers. There is the danger of centralization, too much centralization, and there is the danger of monopoly in broadcasting. And inherent in this bill are more monopoly and more centralization.

The report of the 1946 committee emphasizes the powerful influence of radio in moulding thought. At page 7 of the report we have this:

> It must be recognized that the national network now under control of the C.B.C. is a powerful medium for the dissemination of information and the moulding of public opinion.

The 1943 report, at page 259, said this in a time of war:

> In addition, radio has become one of the most subtle intelligence instruments of modern warfare. In short, radio has become one of the major instruments of the state.

That was written in a time of war, with reference to wartime conditions, but it points to what in a time of peace can become a serious danger, when radio is used as an instrument of the state.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to an editorial which appeared in The Economist, of London, England, published on June 20, 1946. May I preface what I shall read from the editorial by saying this, that there are some in this country—the C.C.F. party, for instance, with its emphasis on state monopoly—who would not be at all averse to seeing the British system introduced in this country, with complete state monopoly. I have already pointed out that that was the idea behind the committee reports of earlier years. Here is what The Economist says about the British system:

> Though dullness is the BBC's most obtrusive fault, it is of quite minor importance compared with the long-term political dangers of a broadcasting monopoly. It is almost incredible that any democratic country should have allowed itself, through a series of accidents, to create a monopoly of the greatest means of influencing public opinion since the invention of printing. Quite possibly, with the growth of television, broadcasting will in future be even more important than the printed word.

Let us heed a warning of that kind while there is yet time.

Let no one think the private broadcasting companies and the national system are not in competition to some extent with each other. There will be found in the report of the 1946 committee a suggestion that the two fields are distinct, that is, the field of national broadcasting on the one hand, and the field of community broadcasting by local stations on the other. But that is not what the evidence before the committee disclosed. The evidence before the committee was to the effect that C.B.C. on the one hand and the private stations on the other are in direct competition with each other for audiences, for commercial revenue and for programme talent. That evidence was given in strong terms before the committee by the representatives of the private stations, and it was admitted by both Doctor Frigon and Mr. Dunton, who said that to some extent there was competition.

The chairman of the C.B.C. agreed with me that it had been helpful to C.B.C. to have that competition. He agreed it had helped to keep C.B.C. on its toes, that it had a healthy effect on C.B.C. I predict that if C.B.C. is allowed to remove from the field two of its largest competitors—for this kind of competition to C.B.C. is naturally the most acute in the large metropolitan areas where the more powerful stations are located—it is not going to be good for C.B.C. That additional monopolistic power will in the long run prove to be unhealthy for C.B.C.

Under the present statute the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has two chief functions. On the one hand, it is the operator of a national system of broadcasting and, on the other, it is the regulator of all broadcasting in Canada. If you will examine sections 8, 22 and 24 of the Broadcasting Act you will see where the widest possible powers have been given to the C.B.C. to regulate other stations. I shall not take up the time of the house to go over those now, but I emphasize that they give almost unlimited powers to the C.B.C. to control broadcasting by others in Canada.

The private stations came before the committee through their association, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. One sentence in their submission summed up their point of view in this regard. This sentence was:

> We submit that no government with any claim to being democratic combines in one body the legislative, executive, judicial and police powers.

That is just the situation which exists here. This exclusive power is given to the C.B.C. to regulate all other stations. It makes all the determinations and there is no right of appeal from any decision. A private station operator goes before the C.B.C. when a question of discipline or a matter in dispute arises —of course the meetings are not open to the public—he makes his submission; he comes away, and the C.B.C. gives its decision. That is final and there is no appeal.

Please understand me. I am not for one minute suggesting that any member of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would be a party to any deliberately unfair decision. I would not suggest such a thing, but I do suggest that any such set-up has an inherent weakness. It cannot help but create a sense of rankling injustice when persons have no appeal from C.B.C.'s decisions. In innumerable instances men are bound to go away feeling that they have not been justly dealt with when they have not been permitted to carry an appeal to some further body.

I ask the house to consider the analogy of our transportation systems. We have two national railway systems in Canada, the Canadian Pacific, a privately owned company, and the Canadian National which is publicly owned. Then we have an independent semi-judicial body in the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada in which is vested the power to regulate both systems, the privately owned and the publicly owned. That board has established its worth and no one challenges its position in the field of railway transport.

Consider air transport. We have in the Dominion of Canada one national transcontinental system, the publicly owned Trans-Canada Air Lines. Then we have another privately owned line, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, with a number of routes in different parts of the country. We do not think of putting Canadian Pacific Air Lines under the regulatory powers of Trans-Canada Air Lines any more than we would think of vesting the regulatory powers of the board of transport commissioners in the Canadian National to regulate and control its competitor. In the case of our air transportation systems we have set up an independent body, the air transport board, to carry on this work of regulation. The time has come—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to inform the hon. member, but he has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. FLEMING: May I have just five minutes?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. COLDWELL: May I be permitted to say a word?

Mr. FLEMING: May I have five minutes?

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member has spoken now for nearly an hour. I do not think Mr. Speaker has been watching the clock. I have no objection to the hon. member having five minutes, provided that it is five minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have five minutes?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the house. I have not spoken for an hour and I shall finish in less than five minutes. I feel that the time has come, with this healthy growth in private broadcasting in Canada—there are 103 stations —on the one hand, and with the national system on the other, when a separate public board should be set up possessing regulatory powers now enjoyed by C.B.C. Then C.B.C. would continue to operate the national system of broadcasting, but this separate body would have full powers of regulation of all broadcasting in Canada. It would all be in the public interest because there would be no question of favouring one as against another. It would ensure that the reins would be evenly held as between the private companies and the national system.

This is my concluding remark. This is going to cost money; this programme of expansion is going to cost money. This bill is asking that power be granted to the governor in council without further reference to parliament to advance to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation up to $10,000,000 for capital works.

Mr. McCANN: You evidently have not read it.

Mr. FLEMING: There is this one limitation, that for the next fiscal year there shall not be more than $2,000,000 expended. That is a blank cheque, and I say that is unsound legislation. But the more serious feature is that if the house passes this bill its action will undoubtedly be construed as giving full approval to the programme of expansion which was described to the committee by the C.B.C. I say that in that course there is the inherent danger of monopoly and the danger of increased centralization. I do not think anyone can contemplate those dangers with equanimity. The danger establishes the necessity of setting up an independent regulatory board before this programme of expansion is proceeded with.

Under the bill the licence fees are to be supplemented at the expense of the taxpayers to the extent of over $500,000 a year, because now the taxpayer is to be asked to bear the cost of collecting and administering the fee. Even though this bill passes; even though this programme of expansion be thus approved and the moneys made available by the governor in council without further reference to parliament, I predict that in the long run it will be found that no favour has been done to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and in the long run it will suffer from withdrawal of competition which has been healthy for it. The public interest, I submit, will be in grave danger of abuse of the monopoly of a powerful instrument for influencing the public mind, capable of sowing the seeds of totalitarianism.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of the various radio committees of this house which have sat since 1940, and I have enjoyed working on them both because of the attitude of the chairman of those committees and the general free and open discussion which took place in the committee meetings. This year has been no exception, and I want to record my appreciation both of the manner in which the members of the committee conducted the inquiry and of the chairman under whom we sat, both the chairman himself, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) and the vice-chairman who sometimes substituted for him, the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Beaudoin).

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fleming) outlined in the early part of his address some of the early history of the C.B.C. and what the house had in mind at the time the first broadcasting commission was set up after the Aird report. The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, as hon. gentlemen will remember, was then prime minister, and in foreshadowing the act of 1932 he moved a resolution which will be found at page 2980 of Hansard of May 16, 1932. It was moved by Mr. Bennett that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, and I would urge hon. members to look at the wording of it:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a commission to be known as the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, for the purpose of acquiring, operating, regulating and controlling radio broadcasting in Canada.

That, in effect, was the genesis of our present radio system. The house approved that resolution and a bill based upon it was subsequently passed. Mr. Bennett at the time reminded the house of this:

> The use of the air, or the air itself, whatever you may please to call it, that lies over the soil or land of Canada is a natural resource over which we have complete jurisdiction under the recent decision of the privy council. I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret to-day that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people.

Because of the regret that governments in the past had alienated property which was the common property of the people of Canada, the government of that day, not only the prime minister but the opposition, now the government of Canada, approved the legislation setting up the commission. I was here in 1936 when the broadcasting act as we have it to-day was introduced and passed in this house, and I remember the discussion very well. I looked up the record not long ago, and I find that from all sides of the house there was approval of the establishment of a corporation which would exercise the powers that were outlined in the original resolution to which I referred a few moments ago. Again at that time the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), then minister of transport, and in charge of the bill, had this to say as reported at page 3712 of Hansard:

> The aim of broadcasting should be a complete coverage by government facilities and the present situation demands complete control over all forms of broadcasting whether public or private. These conditions are being maintained in the present bill.

There we have a statement confirming the original intention in setting up a publicly owned system. In view of all that is happening to-day, in view of I will not say lobbying because that might not be true, but in view of the tremendous press campaign that has gone on across Canada in the last year to limit the power of the present broadcasting corporation, it is interesting to note that the leader of the Conservative party warned the house that that might happen. At page 3710 of Hansard of June 15, 1936, he said:

> At the moment we have secured the ownershp of this facility, or utility, or whatever you may call it, in the people of Canada, and we have ensured it against destruction by private interests, but the private interests have been very vigilant. They have been watchful of their own interests and have determined that if it is within their power, this facility is not to function as a public enterprise. They have determined fairly and legitimately, so far as that is concerned, to destroy this publicly owned facility. Their idea is that it should be in the hands of private enterprise.

That is the summation of the argument that we have heard in the press in recent months.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Eglinton read a paragraph from the London Economist, criticizing the British broadcasting system. I have not brought with me and have not under my hand at the moment the report of the federal communications commission regarding broadcasting in the United States.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I can give it to you.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman has read it. I think every member should read it in order to realize the extent to which, in the United States, private interests have monopolized the air to the detriment of the public. Our system is a compromise between the British and the United States systems. We are not in favour, as the hon. member for Eglinton said we were, of a state monopoly owning and operating all radio stations in Canada. I believe that as long as the community stations are really community stations, serving the communities in which they operate, they perform a useful function and should not be interfered with. But I say this, that in the interests of freedom of thought and freedom of discussion we should own and operate the great national system which we have built up in this country and see to it that every part of this country is covered by it. That is the reason why we give our support to the recommendation in the report that the broadcasting corporation should complete its coverage and occupy the high-powered channels which were allotted to this country under the Havana agreement.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to the alleged injustice of taking over the wave lengths occupied by CFRB and CFCN. Let me point out that we are not taking over the stations. These radio stations can still operate, and they can operate on wave lengths which, to a large measure, they may choose themselves as far as wave lengths are available. But it was always understood—the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply at Moncton in 1937 made it perfectly clear—that it was the policy of the government of Canada and of the broadcasting corporation to occupy the high-powered channels if and when they became available, and they became available when the Havana treaty was signed in 1941. A great deal has been made of the fact that these gentlemen claim—the fact is that they claim, the house will note—that they did not know when they took over these wave lengths and occupied them that their occupancy might be temporary. I do not want to doubt their word too strongly, but to me it is inconceivable that gentlemen who were following the broadcasting situation in this country, and whose counsel in one instance, the brother of the manager of CFRB, was in fairly constant attendance at the committee meetings, did not understand clearly what the tenure of these stations really was. I am not going to put the whole extract on the record: but in 1942, a few months after these wave lengths had been allotted to these two stations, I was disturbed because that allotment had been made, and when the committee of 1942 was set up one of the things I was most anxious to find out was what the understanding was regarding these wave lengths. If you will turn to page 732 of the transcript of evidence of the present committee you will find that on that and the following page is quoted the examination I made of Doctor Frigon, recorded at page 333 of the proceedings of the committee of 1942, and that clearly indicated that Doctor Frigon at that time stated to the committee in the clearest possible terms that it was the intention of the corporation to occupy these wave lengths. I asked this question at the conclusion of the examination: "There is no possibility of any misunderstanding that these stations have a vested interest in those channels?" The answer was "No". I repeated it because I wanted to be abundantly sure; I said "None whatever?" And the answer was "No". "So that they can be reviewed—"

Mr. FLEMING: "Renewed".

Mr. COLDWELL: "So that they can be reviewed at any time that the corporation needs those channels?" And the answer was. "They can be turned over to the C.B.C." "For its own purposes?" "Yes." I notice somebody said "renewed". The word I used was not "renewed"; it was "reviewed". It is a misprint in this report, and it may have been in the original—I do not know, but obviously the word I used was "reviewed." "Renewed" would not make sense.

Mr. REID: What page is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am reading from page 733 of the transcript of evidence.

May I just say that I am convinced that right from the very beginning the occupants of wave lengths in this country knew that the occupancy was not permanent, and that whenever the national system required those wave lengths for the completion of the national system of broadcasting they would be taken over and, if they behaved themselves, another frequency would be provided for them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Have they behaved themselves?

Mr. COLDWELL: They have behaved themselves. I am not complaining of the service these two stations, CFCN and CFRB, have given, although I would point out that I do not think CFRB, particularly, has given the community service which was expected of it. I want to add this, that I hope the broadcasting corporation will make arrangements to complete the coverage by the national system thoroughly in this country. This year—and I agree in this respect with the hon. member for Eglinton—we did not have time to go into all the matters that we should have gone into as a committee. We began a bit too late—

Mr. FLEMING: Much too late.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and another year, I hope, we shall begin early in the session. But one of the matters which I think the next committee should go into is the completion of coverage in this country by the national system. We have quite an important area in this province of Ontario which is inadequately covered by the national system. I refer to the Windsor area. There is CKLW in Windsor; but it is not a Canadian station, it is on Canadian soil, but it is advertised in all the publications in the United States as "CKLW, Detroit", and caters mainly to the United States advertising trade. I think one of the things the people of Windsor expect, and should expect, is that if they pay a licence fee for the purpose of getting broadcasting service they are entitled to that service, and the corporation should consider ways and means of giving that area Canadian coverage and Canadian service through a Canadian station.

Another matter into which we could not go this year and which should be gone into another year is this question of multiple ownership, ownership or operation of a number of stations by one group. I agree completely with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), and I raised the question at the end of the inquiry, that it is a danger to the state and to the people of the country when newspapers own radio stations. We have some good publishers in Canada; I am not criticizing them; some publishers who are fine Canadians and honourable people. But it is an unhealthy situation when, as in my own province and the neighbouring province of Manitoba, you have this situation, and I placed it on the record. You have the Messrs. Sifton owning the Winnipeg Free Press, the Free Press Prairie Farmer, which has a very large circulation all over western Canada, and two radio stations, one standard band and the other short wave in the city of Winnipeg. You move into Saskatchewan, and the two dominant papers in that province, the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, together with a widely circulated farm paper, the Saskatchewan Farmer, are also owned by Messrs. Sifton, and two radio stations in that province, CKCK and CKRM, both owned by the same people. It may be said that these stations are giving good services to their communities. I will not dispute that. But the present owners of these newspapers and of these stations may pass away. Into whose hands may they go? We do not know. I believe it is an unhealthy situation to have radio and press owned by the same group of people, and in my opinion that is one of the factors which should be considered by the committee when it sits next year.

Mr. FULTON: Why is it unhealthy?

Mr. COLDWELL: Another matter into which we could not go this year because of lack of time was the ownership of stations by provincial governments. The Manitoba government at the present moment owns two radio stations, CKY and, I believe, CKX at Brandon. I understand that these two stations are as one in the arrangement that the Manitoba government is making for the taking over of CKY and CKX.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is arranged now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know whether it is arranged. I have no proof and all I want to talk about is that of which I know. These two stations, I believe, are to be taken over. In Saskatchewan, where there is a monopoly of newspaper and radio service, which I regard as dangerous, the government has applied for permission to operate a station. That has been refused. I am not going to discuss to-night the question whether the grounds on which the refusal is based are good or bad. I know there is an argument that it is difficult for a crown corporation like C.B.C. to regulate a crown corporation set up by a junior government. I can see there are difficulties.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Alberta was refused too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish my hon. friend would let me make my speech.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry. I thought I was being helpful.

Mr. COLDWELL: You are not a bit of help to me.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am awfully sorry.

Mr. ROWE: You do not like interruptions, do you?

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. gentleman says I do not like interruptions.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I beg your pardon and add that I will not interrupt again.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me tell the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that those who know me in the house know that I do not mind interruptions, but the hon. gentleman is so seldom in his seat that he does not know what happens in the house.

Mr. ROWE: Tell us how you would like it if the government owned them all.

Mr. COLDWELL: You tell them that; you go ahead.

Mr. ROWE: I know your policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: What I was saying was this, that if a newspaper or a group of newspapers is entitled to own radio stations, then a provincial government has a right to own and operate such stations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: If we admit the one we should admit the other.

Mr. FULTON: I thought you said that in one case it was a bad principle. Which is which? You said it was a bad thing for newspapers to own radio stations. Is it not then a bad thing for provincial governments to own radio stations? You said it was unhealthy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said I would not discuss the question whether it was good or bad—

Mr. FULTON: You said it was a bad thing for newspapers to own them.

Mr. COLDWELL: What I said was that I would not discuss to-night the question whether it was good or bad, but I expressed the opinion that newspaper ownership of radio stations was unhealthy. I said, however, that if newspapers are to be permitted to own radio stations, then there is no reason why provincial governments should not also own them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I impress upon the house the importance of observing the rule that an hon. member who has the floor must not be interrupted without his permission, and those who wish to interrupt him should rise and ask that permission.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have no objection to having an intelligent question asked me and, if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe can ask an intelligent question, I shall be pleased to answer it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why strain the situation?

Mr. COLDWELL: But I object to the continuous growl from this hon. gentleman to my right.

Mr. ROWE: You love me just about as much as I love you. That is obvious.

Mr. COLDWELL: What I was going to say was that my hon. friends, who seem today so much interested in supporting private interests in regard to radio stations, were the very ones who, when they were in power, laid the foundations of the present broadcasting system.

Mr. ROWE: And you followed diligently.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend apparently cannot keep his tongue still to-night. I do not know what the reason is. If we are to have a national system of broadcasting operated in the interests of the people, to which all points of view shall have access, then I suggest that the only type of radio coverage which will be satisfactory to all the people will be a radio system which is in the hands of the representatives of the people. That is the point of view I hold.

Mr. ROWE: Government-owned and government-dominated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want now to say something about some of the good things that the radio corporation has done in this respect. I think the chairman of the committee has received some of the letters that have come to me—I have sent them to him—and he probably received a good many letters from farm and other groups across the country supporting the farm forum, which has been a feature of the radio corporation's activities for a number of years. That has been greatly appreciated. A few years ago we had a similar forum in connection with labour, but that was discontinued a year or so ago. I regret that it was discontinued because it was doing a very fine work and giving an opportunity for the expression of diverse views in the field of labour. I should like to see that farm forum continued. I should like to see continued the citizens' forum and the labour forum, and another form of forum added in which the employers, the manufacturers if you like, could discuss the problems of the country from their point of view so that we might have all points of view placed before the Canadian people. I know it is very difficult to get such a forum organized. Better still, we might extend the forum idea so as to have a discussion of the various points of view held in the country, such a discussion to be carried on by those who represent the people. We all appreciate the report to the nation when we get the political parties giving their points of view as parties, but I believe it would be very much better if the representatives of the political parties were brought into one forum to discuss a common problem on the forum principle before the people of Canada. That would be a useful thing.

Mr. LOW: They would have to tell the truth then.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. They could not vilify any particular race or creed, or set up a lot of straw men in order to knock them over, or do the various types of things they can do when they are on the air alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Does my hon. friend mean during elections?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I would do it during elections; I would do it at any time. I think it is a good plan to have matters discussed in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We would sweep the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not know that there is a great deal more I want to say, except that we are supporting the report of the committee. As I indicated, there are some matters I should like to see covered in that report which are not covered. I think the officials of the corporation are protecting the interests of the Canadian people and are doing a good job. When I look back over the number of years I have been interested in broadcasting I realize that in many people whom I know, in my own circle of friends and my own family, the appreciation of good music has increased because of the good music we get over the radio. Many of the musical programmes of the C.B.C. are of a very high order, particularly when we consider that the amount of money at the disposal of the C.B.C. is very small indeed when compared with other radio organizations. As a matter of fact, the bulk of the radio revenue in this country does not go to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; to a very large extent it goes to the private interests of this country.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Why not; they are in competition.

Mr. COLDWELL: All I want to say is that, as far as we are concerned, we hope the house will approve the bill now before us and give the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, set up originally by one government and modified but carried on by another government of a different sort, an opportunity to perform the functions for Canada that forward-looking and progressive people believe it can perform.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the different branches of the Christian church all over Canada, to thank the radio management or the minister, or whoever is responsible for the free service we get over the air every day of the week—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is the private broadcasting stations which do that.

Mr. McIVOR: —and double service on Sunday. It is a very fine thing that when a man sits down to breakfast in the morning he can listen to a voice coming over the radio from one who knows what he is talking about, telling him of a way of life that is second to none; telling him that he will have problems that day and that if he wants a partner to help him he may have that partner who knows no weakness and no foolishness. At the head of the lakes we have a service every morning, six days a week, free; then on Sunday afternoon we have double service all over Canada. We hear many things coming over the radio that are mere twaddle as far as building up citizenship in this country. It may be good music; it may be pleasing, but man needs something to pull him up when he is being dragged down by the devil himself. If the radio did nothing but give that free service over the air it would be justifying its existence in a splendid way. I have spoken over the radio, and I have received letters from people who were shut in, people in hospitals, people who did not have a dollar to put on the collection plate and who did not have to use that dollar to pay for the radio service. I take this opportunity of thanking radio; I hope they will keep it up, and I should just like to say, God bless them.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I must compliment the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who has just preceded me, on those very fine remarks. I would suggest to him, however, that he could not have paid any greater compliment to private radio in Canada, for the private radio stations have not been behind in offering service to religious organizations day and night, seven days a week. If on occasion, and perhaps on most occasions, they have charged for that service, it has been given at very reasonable cost.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, involving the expansion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, is based—I think I had better say, is supposed to be based—upon the report of the parliamentary committee on radio broadcasting. Here and now I want to raise an objection to this bill being brought in before the report of the committee was concurred in. I believe that reports coming from such committees as that on radio broadcasting should be presented to the house, concurrence moved and full opportunity given for discussion, and a recorded vote taken by the house on the report.

I have been interested in radio for a number of years, and as a member of parliament, I have been on previous committees. I, too, wish to compliment the chairman of the committee and his associate, the deputy chairman, on what I believe to be the very fair way in which they handled the proceedings of the committee. I believe, however—and in saying this I am casting no reflection upon anyone because it can be applied to all members of the house—that this field of radio is so complicated and so tremendously involved that it takes years to understand it. I feel that with what little knowledge I may have I am only beginning to touch the fringe of this involved subject. So I would say that it behooves each and every member of parliament, including each and every member of a committee of this kind, to become fully acquainted with all that is involved before he decides to vote one way or the other on this measure.

This is not intended to be critical; but when the report was drafted I could not help feeling that at the last meeting, while the report was being drafted, the evidence was not reviewed perhaps as diligently, as carefully and as exhaustively as it should have been. When the report was finally drafted and accepted by the committee, and when I read it over next day, I had to say to myself that, so far as the report was concerned, the C.B.C. officials might just as well have written it several months ago and saved the committee all their trouble.

I would say, further, that the leader of the C.C.F. may just as well have written the report himself, and saved us the trouble of doing all that work. I listened to him with a good deal of interest to-night, and I felt that he was just not up to his old form. He seemed to be somewhat agitated throughout his speech. I could not help thinking that perhaps it might be because he recognized he was doing a good job for the Liberal government; for I am going to say this, that I will challenge anybody on the government side of the house to give a better speech in favour of government ownership, in favour of the report as it is, in favour of the government policy on radio, than was given by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). It is obvious that the government and the leader of the C.C.F.—and I suppose he spoke for his party—are the Siamese twins of radio policy in Canada.

A few days ago I listened to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who is now the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan.

Mr. KNOWLES: The leader of what is left of it.

Mr. HANSELL: I heard him deliver quite a tirade against our socialist friends. I heard him attempt to prove that there was no difference between the C.C.F. socialist party in this house, and the communist party and that their ideologies were the same. Well, now, here is at least one measure in which our C.C.F. socialist friends and the Liberal administration agree, heart and soul.

It is as well for the country and for parliament and those who are interested to know that the report as submitted was not unanimous by a long way.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And how!

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, "and how".

Mr. KNOWLES: How do you spell "how"?

Mr. HANSELL: As regards the way the report reads—and they all read the same—"the committee recognizes this"; "the committee recommends that"; "the committee reviewed this"; "the committee concluded that"—as a matter of fact it was only a fraction of the committee that concluded "this and that."

An hon. MEMBER: Only a majority.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): A supine majority.

Mr. HANSELL: "Supine" is the word—and how! The report submitted by the radio committee, almost every section of it, was vigorously opposed. I will say this, that some of us were prepared to leave the committee before it started, after we read the draft report. We knew there was not very much use in staying there and fighting. But we stayed and we talked the thing through until almost two o'clock in the morning.

I am alarmed by the growing authority being placed in the hands of the government-owned Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

It has already been pointed out that the corporation is the one authority which has authority over its competitors. I am not going to labour that point particularly, because it has been covered before. But I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is no other government enterprise I know of in Canada or in any other country, except in the totalitarian countries, where a government enterprise has vested within it regulatory and authorative powers to regulate and boss and police its competitors. Yet that is exactly what we find in the present set-up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. And the act over the years has been written up to solidify and entrench that authority in the hands of the corporation.

Just for the sake of illustration let us suppose that the government should decide to bring into existence another corporation known as the Canadian Daily Newspapers Corporation. It would not be known as the C.B.C., but rather as the C.D.C.—not C. D. Howe. It will be known as the Canadian Daily Newspapers' Corporation. I wonder what the people would say if that happens? I think they would lift their eyebrows in some alarm, and say, "What is the idea? I thought we believed in the freedom of the press?" And the government would say, "Oh, yes, we are not going to interfere with the press. The newspapers will operate just the same. The only difference is that we are going to have a government-owned daily newspaper corporation. We are going to have a board of governors to govern it. We are going to have our sub-boards, our committees, our departments, our specialists. And we are going to have vested in that daily newspapers' corporation regulatory authority which will regulate all other daily newspapers in Canada." What would you say to that? That is exactly what happens in the field of radio in Canada to-day.

Let us suppose, further, that the government said, "We will also vest in the Canadian Daily Newspapers' Corporation the right to control all national advertising. We will be the agents for all the national advertising, and the other dailies must carry only such advertising as we see fit. They can refuse it if they want to, but they cannot get any other if they do not take ours." What would you say to that? What would the minister who is piloting this bill say to that? What would the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), who is the licensing authority, say to that? That is exactly what is happening to-day in radio.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is within the realm of conception.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Bow River says that is within the realm of conception. That sort of thing could happen and it does happen in totalitarian countries. Supposing that this daily newspapers' corporation should have an editorial board and editorial writers. They might have a dozen writers, or even forty; it would not make any difference. They might say to that editorial board, "We want you to write daily or weekly editorials, and we are going to insist that all the daily newspapers affiliated with us accept those editorials." What would you say to that? That is exactly what is happening to-day in the field of radio.

Somebody in the past has said that in connection with its regulatory authority the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation acts only as an umpire in the field of radio. If I am not mistaken it was a previous chairman of the board of governors who said that, although I stand to be corrected there. That sounds all very nice, but did you ever hear of an umpire who was also one of the players in the game? Did you ever hear of an umpire who was also the pitcher in the game and who was able to call his own balls? That is exactly what is happening to-day in radio.

That is why we are advocating a separate body with semi-judicial powers. That may not be the right legal term to use, but—

An hon. MEMBER: It is good enough.

Mr. HANSELL: —it is good enough. We should have a separate regulatory body which would be absolutely neutral in the field of radio. There is one sentence in the submission by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters where reference is made to police powers. This reads:

> We submit that no government with any claim to being democratic combines in one body the legislative, executive, judicial and police powers.

No one has disagreed with the truth of that statement. "Police powers" is the phrase that is used there. Did you ever hear of a policeman who, on occasion, was on trial and also the judge and jury at the same time? That is exactly what is happening to-day in the field of radio. One may say, "If that is so, how did this all come about? Surely somebody sanctioned it?" I know the old arguments, but the way it all came about can be told only be referring to the history of radio. Why is it that the C.B.C. has been given so much power and authority? Surely there must have been some reason, or it would not have happened?

The history is simply this. Originally there was established a radio commission, the purpose of which was to protect the public from the possibility of irregularities in the field of radio. This commission was brought into existence years ago, I believe under a Conservative administration.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

Mr. HANSELL: Someone says, "Hear, hear." That was years ago, and radio has expanded; times and circumstances have changed. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar by this time knows Mr. Bennett's statements by heart. I do not know why he brought down his manuscript to read, because he has quoted Mr. Bennett so often in the committee as an authority on this thing. Perhaps I could ask him, "If Mr. Bennett is such an authority on this matter, why do you not take him as an authority on a few other matters?" Oh, no; he could not do that. Why? Because this particular statement of Mr. Bennett's just happens to suit his purpose.

Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Bennett might have made that statement in those days if he had thought that over the years, with the changing scene in radio, there would be so much authority vested in the corporation? I do not believe he would have. If Mr. Bennett were sitting here to-day he might be speaking along similar lines to me. I am quite certain that he would not be in favour of all that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are asking for and getting. Believe me, there is not a thing they have asked for that they do not get in this report, unless it is a little more money and they will be back later asking for more.

Governments come and governments go, and it does not always follow that what a government will do at one time, it should or would repeat at another time, say a number of years afterwards. Many developments have taken place since the establishment of the old radio commission. Radio is a comparatively new science which is expanding rapidly. We do not know what lies ahead from one year to another, but these changes have been slow. The old radio commission grew into what is now known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The growth of radio has caused the corporation to adjust its policies and regulations over the years. The changes have been gradual; but they have been changes which have had the effect of giving to the corporation a little more power here, a little more power there, a little more now and a little more then, perhaps all unnoticed by an unsuspecting public. Perhaps they were not regarded as being serious by the governments in office. However, I feel sure that if what has happened in this respect over a number of years had been done all at once the country would have been seriously alarmed and public opinion would never have permitted it to happen.

What is happening now? With the adoption of this report and this bill, I believe this year is a more or less crucial year. I have no hesitancy in saying that we are just about to decide whether private radio is to exist any longer in Canada. That is about the picture. You are going to drive them out of business completely. It is all very well for the officials of the corporation to say, "Oh, we do not want that". But it is another thing to do it.

Mr. McCANN: That was never suggested.

Mr. HANSELL: That is going to happen.

Mr. McCANN: No, it is not.

Mr. HANSELL: The minister says it is not going to hoppen. I say that if we continue in this way, that is exactly what is going to happen. The minister might say: We are going to let the private stations continue. It is true that you are going to give them a licence. But suppose there are two powerful networks set up in Canada using these high-powered stations; would it not be possible—and I asked this question in the radio committee—for the corporation to run those two networks and not have any need of private stations? The answer was no, but a kind of reluctant no.

Mr. McCANN: An emphatic no.

Mr. HANSELL: They were not sure. I asked the chairman of the C.B.C. and he said: "No, I do not think so." He went on to say: "I cannot tell you what future boards might do." And so forth and so on. It is al very well to say that a private station can have a licence; but remember this, a private station has to have an audience too.

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HANSELL: Oh, I suppose I can.

Mr. MAYBANK: Thank you, even though you seem to be reluctant. Would the hon. member be able to quote the page where these reluctant answers which he has been describing were given?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are so obvious.

Mr. MAYBANK: You were there?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was there.

Mr. HANSELL: We are going into committee on the bill, and I will give my hon. friend the page and the line that I referred to and read the question and answer exactly as it was asked and given. I say that a private radio station must have an audience. Suppose there were two great networks on the air, one broadcasting Fibber McGee and Molly, and the other Lux Theatre. Perhaps they are both on the same network to-day. But suppose two great networks were broadcasting two popular programmes like that. How many people do you think would tune in to the local station to hear perhaps the local piano teacher putting on a recital, with her little junior pupils playing the piano? How many people would listen to that programme?

It is true that the radio corporation can say to the private stations: We are giving you a licence; you are still in business. But that is not the thing. I know what will be said. It will be said that radio broadcasting has always been under parliamentary scrutiny, that the C.B.C. acts upon the recommendation of parliamentary committees, and that parliamentary committees have confirmed this and that policy over the years. When it is suggested that the policies of the C.B.C. are likely to become hard-and-fast, as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, the cry always goes up from the radio officials: Succeeding radio committees have the right and the power to recommend changes. That is so in theory, but it is not so in practice.

Suppose, for instance, there should be a change of government, and there will be some day. I do not know when, but it is a foregone conclusion that the government that is in is on its way out. It must be. I do not know how long it will take, but that must be so. Then suppose another government takes office and changes the policy with respect to radio broadcasting. They may say: "We believe that there should be two networks on the air and that one of these networks should be absolutely controlled by the private stations. We believe in a separate regulatory body." A committee is set up and, the majority on the committee being members from the government side of the house, the committee brings in a report that changes the whole radio picture. Would you say, Mr. Speaker, that that government would not be accused of political interference? Certainly they would. It is all very well to say that the C.B.C. is run on the recommendation of parliamentary committees, and that the operations of the corporation and its regulations are under parliamentary scrutiny and can be changed any time parliament sees fit. I say again that may be so in theory but not in practice.

I have not much time left. I have a few more things to say when the bill is in committee. In conclusion, let me say there is not the slightest doubt in the world that there is a radio monopoly in Canada under government ownership. My hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar, who is championing this bill, I should not say more ably but as vigorously as the minister himself could, is against monopoly, so I understand. I believe I have heard something to that effect from my hon. friends who sit immediately to my right. I have a press report here of the recent C.C.F. convention in the province of Saskatchewan, and I find that Professor Scott made a speech to the convention in which he said:

> This Canada we live in, despite all that was promised during the war, is still dominated, except in Saskatchewan, by monopoly and private profit.

Mr. David Lewis, the national secretary of the C.C.F. also spoke, acording to the report in the press:

> The same note ran through the national executive's report read by David Lewis, national secretary. The report stated that monopoly was "king in Canada," that it was dictating national policy.

Further on in the report I find this:

> National Leader M. J. Coldwell told the convention that the return of the country to private enterprise "is subjecting Canada to economic and social problems which could have been avoided if a proper system of democratic planning for reconstruction had been introduced."

Here are three men, one talking against private enterprise and the others deploring monopoly in Canada. Let me ask the leader of the C.C.F. or his deputy leader or the deputy to the deputy leader, or whoever of them wants to answer it, this question: Is there a monopoly in radio networks in Canada to-day?

Mr. CASSELMAN: No answer.

Mr. HANSELL: I still pause for a reply.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there not all the difference in the world between a private and a public monopoly?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there a monopoly in the postal service in Canada?

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend asks me if I know the difference between a private monopoly and a public monopoly. My reply to that is that in principle there is absolutely no difference. His colleague asks, "How about the post office?" Well, we are always hearing about the post office when they want to talk government ownership.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do you object to that monopoly?

Mr. HANSELL: The post office is the king's royal mail—

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is a monopoly.

Mr. HANSELL: —and has always been that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Oh, not always.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, it has been since the pony express, anyway. And another thing: nobody has ever proved that the post office is doing any better than private enterprise could do.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It goes in the hole every year.

Mr. HANSELL: How does anyone know that private enterprise could not do the same job for two cents instead of four?

I wanted to say something on commentators, but I do not know whether I should go into that at the moment, because it is quite a long subject. But the matter of taking over the class 1-A channels has given us some considerable concern. I am not going to repeat what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said. He gave an excellent speech and reviewed what had happened with respect to notification being given or not given—not adequately given—to the stations that were about to lose their channels. But I will deal with the alternative suggestion that was made by those who now operate Canadian station CFCN on wave length 1010. They proposed to the C.B.C. some months ago—I believe it was last fall—that they might be able to retain their wave length and that the same purpose would be gained if the corporation should take another wave length, namely 1060, step up its power, and operate from another location, and the argument was, of course, that that wave length was the wave length on which a station in Mexico was operating. The officials of CFCN said, "Well, now, we believe that you could do the same job and cover the same people in that area of the country in Alberta if you would negotiate with Mexico for the use of that channel and set up directional antennae that would not interfere with the Mexican station covering all that they require." That was a reasonable suggestion. However, the point I want to put over is this, that when the officials were asked if they had investigated that suggestion the answer was, no. The only conclusion I can gather from that was that it was already predetermined, that they were going to take this wave length anyway, and regardless of any suggestion or negotiation with other countries—that could go by the boards—"we are going to have this thing anyway." I think that at least they could have investigated the situation and sought out the possibilities which may lie in that direction.

In that connection I have a suggestion to make which may be a new one; I am quite certain it will not be acceptable to the C.B.C. It is this, that we permit CFRB and CFCN to stay on their present wave lengths and let them go up to the 50-kilowatt power, thereby reserving for Canada those channels, and let the C.B.C. wait before investing any money in new radio equipment. My contention is that, with the present rapid development in frequency modulation and in other branches of radio science, perhaps even in television, although that may be further away, it may not be many years until the new equipment which they contemplate using will be absolutely obsolete and that the money we are now voting for them will be a mere flash in the pan which will be spent, and nothing realized thereby. It may be of interest to some to know that the national broadcasting system in the United States has already spent in the neighbourhood of $15 million on frequency modulation and television research alone, without getting a nickel out of it. That is what the C.B.C. is faced with in the next few years. And goodness knows what would happen if television ever came into its own.

Mr. KNOWLES: They will be broadcasting the House of Commons.

Mr. HANSELL: I am told that it would cost three-quarters of a million dollars to put on one show for one hour only on a national network, under television. That is a lot of money. I believe the corporation would be on safer ground to say to the present operators of these wave lengths, "We will let you boost your power to 50 kilowatts. It may cost you a little money." They will be further ahead if, when they eventually had to make a change, they compensated these stations for any money which they might have spent in boosting their power.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it was promised by the government in this house, when the hon. member agreed not to discuss the resolution, that he should have as much time as he wanted when the bill came before this house. I remember that distinctly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member may continue for five minutes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On another point of order, sir, we adopted a different method. We brought a report in from the committee, and it was arranged with the leader of the house at that time: he told the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who raised the point, that when the bill came in he should have as much time as he required at this stage of the discussion of the bill. I am anxious to see that undertaking carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is quite correct, but the only guarantee that a member of the government can give is subject to the unanimous concurrence and consent of this house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I gather that the government concurred.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I repeat that with the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member for Macleod may continue for a period of five minutes.

Mr. HANSELL: The time did seem to go very fast.

Mr. McCANN: You have been broadcasting.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am glad the minister has heard a good broadcast at last. It did not come from his side of the house.

Mr. HANSELL: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary West in coming to my rescue, but I have arranged my material in such a way that I think I can facilitate the business of the house. I just want to say a few more things; it will take only five minutes. The rest of my forty-minute speeches I shall be willing to give in committee. That is the way I have arranged it. However, five minutes will do now. I have another suggestion to make and this one will not be acceptable. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar read a statement made by Mr. Bennett that the air waves could be likened to the natural resources of the people, and that these air waves belong to the people. All right. The natural resources belong to the people and they belong to the people of the provinces. Here is a suggestion I am going to make. It is true that the air waves belong to the people and it is true that under the present broadcasting act the federal government seems to have jurisdiction over those air waves; but there is no reason in the world why provincial governments should not also have some jurisdiction over wave lengths, particularly when those wave lengths are confined within the provinces themselves. If we want to have real competition in Canada, which I believe would be a good thing for radio—and I am not saying there should be no supervision at all; that is why we recommend a neutral body—then I suggest that each provincial government be given a wave length which will be their own to do with what they please. If they wish to have a station of their own, all right; if they wish to allow a private radio company to have that wave length, O.K. It is their business; it is their wave length. Furthermore, I am going to suggest that the provinces could very well unite in a second network to be run by private radio stations. In that way each province would have a wave length which would be the people's, and you would have two national networks—no monopoly, and one running in competition with the other. That is my suggestion and I feel positive about it.

Even with my Liberal friends going socialist as they have gone during the war, I cannot understand this plunging the whole radio business into such a monopoly as they are doing. I cannot believe that the ministers who are piloting this bill through, and who seem to look so wise and intelligent about it, can at heart be really in sympathy with that policy, and I have concluded, perhaps wrongly—I do not believe wrongly—that the officials of the corporation have unduly influenced the government in respect of radio policy, and that what we are dealing with in the bill is not essentially government policy but is essentially C.B.C. policy, because they want their position solidified and entrenched. With these words, I shall now conclude my remarks and what I have to say otherwise I shall say when we are in committee.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the things that add zest to being a member of parliament in this house is that there are at least four parties in it. Some of my hon. friends have blamed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for agreeing in this particular instance with the principles of the Liberal party on the other side. Surely, after all, once in a while one has to agree with someone, and may I say to my Conservative friends to my right that when they bring forward such a good idea as that advanced by the Liberal party in this particular instance they may be sure of our support in that regard. There is nothing sinister in the kind of alliance that I have named, because we in this particular group agree with the particular party in this house that we think for the time being is right.

May I say that I am very much interested in this matter of radio in general, and in particular I am very much interested in the work of this committee of which I was a member. I am seized with the importance of radio as one of the greatest media we have for the spreading of news, of information and of education and for the promotion of good taste in music, in literature and in the arts. I am somewhat disappointed in my hon. friends, both to my left and to my right, that they have not any one of them to-night mentioned that particular phase of the matter. It would appear to be a struggle between two interests, or two ideologies or two ideas, and one in which, I submit, there is a substantial amount of cash involved.

Radio is a great blessing and a great gift, and it involves great responsibility. I said there was cash involved. I remember, when we thought that everything was very dear, we used to joke and say, "Well, at least the air is free." In this particular respect, even the air is no longer free. The air has become big business, and if you wanted any evidence of that, all you had to do was to attend some of the sessions of the radio committee, of which I did not miss any meetings. If you looked at the faces of the people around you, those occupying chairs and those who wished to occupy chairs but for whom there was no room, you would understand that there must be some money somewhere in this business of radio.

There are those who would like to sift the air through their fingers and retain something in the process. There is a question, to whom does the air belong? The matter was expounded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and again in this connection my leader the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stated that the air over Canada belonged to the people of Canada. The question fortunately was settled in the main for this country in 1932 and again definitely in 1936 when the broadcasting act was passed. The resolution that preceded the bill was introduced by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I shall mention his name again, although for some reason my Conservative friends do not seem to relish quotations from that right hon. gentleman. Perhaps this is one of those mild reforms which the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett advocated and then, or shortly afterwards, he ceased to be the leader of the party of my hon. friends. However, I shall quote from that resolution of 1932:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a commission to be known as the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, for the purpose of acquiring, operating, regulating and controlling radio broadcasting in Canada.

To whom does the air belong? As I said before, I suggest that it belongs to the people of Canada; and it is for us to decide—and when I say "us" I mean the people of Canada —not certain radio institutions that have managed to get their fingers upon some of what I at least consider to be the public domain; it is for us to decide what should be done with it. The hon. member for Macleod has challenged us to say this is not a monopoly, in which he says we believe. All right, I shall accept the challenge. If it is a monopoly of the people, let it be a monopoly, provided that the people have it in their hands and have power to control it through this parliament. As I said a moment ago, this ownership, whether it be the ownership of the people or the ownership of private interests, involves responsibility for what goes on the air, the type of programme, the kind of music; and I maintain that this responsibility can be better fulfilled by a body which is under public control than it would be fulfilled by any commercial enterprise which has as its main object the profits it can command from the handling of the air waves. I believe we can have more freedom of speech under a system that is publicly owned than under a system under which any man with sufficient money can buy his way on to the air, while the man who has no money cannot have the same privilege because he cannot afford it. Where profit is the motive, I am afraid some of us sometimes lose our moral sense. Where profit is the motive, I am afraid there is a temptation, shall we say, to take too much time for advertising, too much time on profitable announcements.

I could go into the record of the private radio stations in this country. I shall not take time to do so, but I have here a publication which shows the comparative amount of time spent on sustaining programmes and on commercial or paid programmes in this country over a period of two weeks. I can show the house where at least four of the private stations whose names have been bandied about here to-night during those two weeks devoted about twenty per cent of their time to what might be called public service and eighty per cent of their time to a straight money-making commercial proposition.

Another point I wish to make is that there is a temptation to accept the sponsored propaganda of those having one set of ideas when there is insufficient time to give those with opposite ideas an equal opportunity on the air, or when the people who hold those other ideas, as I have said, do not have sufficient money to pay for their expression over the radio. There is also, I think, quite a temptation to accept anything that is paid for, irrespective of its merit or its effect upon the culture of the country in general.

That, of course, brings up the question of whether commercialism has a conscience. I would submit, sir, that commercialism finds itself in a constant struggle with its conscience, a struggle between the desire for profit and its conscience. Little has been said to-night of this matter of culture. You may say that many good men are in private business, and I would agree. But I would also point out that regulations are necessary in this country to curb that very thing of which I am speaking; that greedy, avaricious commercialism which cares about nothing except the profit it makes. If you do not believe that, let me mention the fact that regulations are necessary in this country to keep commercial interests from selling cigarettes or liquor to children; that there are commercial interests who would cheerfully sell drugs to drug addicts if they could get the money for them and if the regulations and the policemen did not prevent them from doing so. If you think commercialism has any particular conscience, look at our news stands and see the type of literature, so-called, offered to our young people there. Those who put out these publications for profit are apparently not concerned with the effect of that type of reading upon the people. You may say, "Well, after all, these people are in a commercial business." That is exactly the answer I got when I put that question to the editor of a great newspaper. I found some fault with the sort of thing they were publishing, and saying it would have a harmful effect upon the mind of the body politic. His reply was, "Sir, we are not running a Sunday school here. We are going to give the people what they want and what they are prepared to pay for. We are running a commercial institution." That very thing has always been a problem in my mind. To what extent is it the responsibility of an editor, or of a radio broadcaster, or of the C.B.C., if you like, to try to elevate the public taste? I say we have more chance of having the public taste elevated by an organization controlled by the people of this country, through this parliament, than by a mere commercial institution which is primarily in the business for the money it makes. I hold that men not motivated by the desire to make money out of programmes will make better decisions, more nearly in conformity with the public good.

I now come to the matter of this radio committee. One could see that what was chiefly stirring there was this matter of money interest. Evidently something was going to be done that would cost somebody some money, and there was a good deal of protest against that. I come to one of the main recommendations of the report. I agree with the report when it says it is best for the C.B.C. to retain its dominant position in Canadian broadcasting. I believe—and this is where the money lies—the national system is fully justified in taking over the three wave lengths which have been mentioned, whose power is to be increased under the Havana agreement. Earlier the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar read from page 732 of the proceedings of the committee the questions he asked Doctor Frigon away back in 1942, so I need not repeat that. One of the claims of these private companies was that they did not understand they would have to surrender these wave lengths, and, second, that they did not get sufficient notice from the C.B.C. that those wave lengths would have to be surrendered. I cannot accept the word of these private companies on either count. That whole matter was discussed in the committee of 1942, while counsel for these private interests sat by in a chair and, as the evidence showed, himself took part in the discussion. Can anyone tell me that the head of any great corporation where millions of dollars are involved or the counsel for any such corporation, would not understand the conversation which was going on in that committee, particularly when he was taking part in it, and that then these same interests should come back—if not the actual men—four or five years later, and say that they did not understand that they were to lose those wave lengths?

Then there is the matter of insufficient notice being given. They said that on their licence in 1941 there appeared some new, mysterious words which had never been on there before: "This licence is granted subject to regulation, number so-and-so". But they said, "We did not pay any attention to it". Counsel who are employed by corporations of that kind are not men of that type. There is no doubt in my mind that those men knew, just as well as if the regulations had been translated for them, and I have no doubt that they were looked up, and thoroughly understood and discussed.

I would say, "The nerve of them!" I should say they should have been thankful for the use of those wave lengths for three or four years in this country, which has been able to establish them and get them on their feet, instead of at this date protesting that they should be able to retain something which they never owned and to which they had no right, except as a loan from the people of Canada.

There was talk in the committee of setting up an independent commission to judge as to the efficiency of private stations. It is an idea against which I shall not set my face, because I believe that that is an idea which might be worked out. But I want to make it clear that under the present organization there is no such body; and that the only body we have at the present time is the C.B.C., to which control was given by statute. I believe that, if anything, the C.B.C. has been too lenient. It might almost be reprimanded for not carrying out its work more efficiently in the supervision of these private stations.

To my mind, the only justification for a private radio station's existence in this or in any other country is the service it renders to the public. If the C.B.C. is the controlling body, by law, and if part of its business is to see that these private stations are carrying out the public function which they owe to the country, then in my opinion the C.B.C. should be doing so. If an independent body is created later on, all right. But in the meantime I think it is a disgrace that any private station in this country should be giving only fifteen per cent or twenty per cent of its time to the public service of the community it is supposed to serve.

There are, of course, some excellent private stations in the country; some of them are giving splendid community service. I noticed that those which appeared before the committee were those stations. There was one from Vancouver, if I remember correctly, which had a particularly fine record. But some stations are not giving such service, and should be reprimanded. I would go farther than that and say that the condition in connection with the renewal of a licence should be that of public service, as judged by some public body, whether it be the C.B.C. or some other. I think supervision is necessary.

To-night someone referred to the federal communciations commission. Here is a digest of its report in the United States:

> The practice with regard to applications for licences in the United States is that the applicant in making his application includes specific pledges that time will be made available for public service programmes. The new FCC policy means that promises will be compared with performance before licences are renewed.

So far as I am concerned, I think that should be written into this particular matter with which we are dealing to-night. The report goes on to discuss the various stations, and their efficiency or otherwise.

There have been some arguments raised to-night against the proposition in which I believe. Perhaps I might deal with one or two of them, although I think most of them were answered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I would refer particularly to some of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). He said that the C.B.C. was most lavish with public money. In my opinion the C.B.C. would be a more valuable institution to this country if we were prepared to spend a little more money on it, so that we could make it more successful and more efficient than it now is.

He said, too, that we were lavish with our praise of the C.B.C. So far as I am concerned, it is my belief that where praise is due, it should be given.

Then he referred to the procedure in the committee, and said that we put the cart before the horse. It was his view that we should have brought the C.B.C. in, made it go ahead and give its history, and then proceed with its plan for the future. He then said that, when that was all done and the C.B.C. cards were on the table, he would then bring in the private stations. I say if it is unfair for one, it would be unfair for the other. If we had brought them in in the other order, and if we had submitted the C.B.C. to that process, instead of the private stations, it would have been unfair to the C.B.C.

The hon. member for Eglinton said there was a disposition to hurry through the business, and, therefore, not to do it efficiently. May I say that I was a member of that committee, and I saw no such hurry. For instance, I listened to the hon. member for Eglinton one afternoon for what I thought was from two and one-half to three hours—two and one-half hours of the three-hour sitting. If that is hustling the matter through, then I do not know what the word means. I do not think anyone can say this matter was hustled through to-night and not given proper discussion before the House of Commons and the country.

The hon. member for Eglinton said the private stations were entitled to fair play, and from that I assume he makes the accusation that they have not been receiving fair play and have been treated unjustly in the past. I believe that in my previous observations I have effectively answered that point.

Then he asked, "What encouragement have these private stations?"—these poor private stations, the word "poor" is my own. "What encouragement have these private stations under this basis of incomplete security of tenure?" Well, I believe that the private stations have done rather well. If one were to examine the way in which they have increased in number and in strength I think he would agree that they are doing quite nicely. And if he were to examine the amount of revenue they take in annually from this country for the services they perform—and many of them efficiently—I think he will see that they have had a good run of business.

The hon. member for Eglinton, and I believe also the hon. member for Macleod, suggested that we should allow these two private stations—I noticed there was very little said about the third one—to increase their strength to 50 kilowatts, and in this way Canada through private channels would be able to conform with the Havana agreement. I would ask him why these two stations should be singled out for the particular honour of having their strength increased to 50 kilowatts. What about the other private stations? Why should these two be thus signally favoured? The hon. member said, "Canada is now to increase this station to 50000 watts, but there is nothing to say that the C.B.C. should hold it." I have previously answered that question.

The hon. member for Eglinton says no notice of changed plans was given to these stations until 1946. I think I have dealt with that. There was a special endorsement on their licences in 1941 and, since 1942, the matter has been under public and open discussion every year when the radio committee sat. The hon. member for Eglinton says there was confusion in the minds of the committee. I did not see any evidence of confusion. If there was any, it must have been in the mind of the hon. gentleman.

In summing up, may I say that there is a place for the private stations in this country to serve the communities in which they are located. However, I am a firm believer that every nook and cranny and corner of this country should be covered by radio broadcasting, by means of a public monopoly if you like, so that the people may be assured of sustaining programmes behind which there is no commercial backing, but which are designed in the interest of culture and development.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, it is customary to say that one did not intend to take part in the debate. I did intend to take part in the debate, but many of the things that I wished to say have been said, probably better than I could have said them. There remain one or two items which I shall discuss for a few minutes. I hope the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) will not think I am unnecessarily critical of his scorn for the dollar, if first I speak of dollars. Section 3 of the resolution referred to the cost of collecting the licence fees from owners of radios. If my memory serves me correctly that cost is about $527,000. It seemed to some that the charge was exhorbitant inasmuch as the total amount collected is a little less than $4,000,000. Those of us who have some knowledge of rural life know that driving along the back concessions to collect licence fees is a task that cannot be undertaken for five or ten per cent of the amount collected. However, that is a matter which can and, I am certain, will be investigated at a later time.

I object to the suggestion that the cost of these collections should not continue to be an operating cost of the corporation. It has been suggested that the total amount should be vested in the corporation and that some other agency should bear the cost of the collection. I do not think that is a sound method of bookkeeping; I do not think it is an honest method of bookkeeping. However appreciative we may be of the broadcasting corporation, I suggest to members of the house that it should keep accurate and complete records of its costs as well as of its income.

If the amount collected be not sufficient to defray the cost of administration there are sources of revenue always available to the government. It can increase the tax upon the user. But I do not think it is wise or well that the suggestion contained in paragraph 3 of the resolution should be approved and the cost of collecting radio licence fees possibly buried or lost in some other department. I recall that a few years ago it was deemed expedient to write off several hundreds of millions of dollars owing by the government-owned railroads in order that their burden might not appear as great and in order that the management or mismanagement which had characterized them for a time might not be subjected to criticism. The pen, by the aid of a statute, was drawn through several hundreds of millions of dollars that the corporation owed. I suggest that the blight of government ownership should not cast its shadow in this particular form over this government-owned enterprise so early in its career.

The next point I wish to discuss briefly is the degraded position of the privately owned station. My criticism is directed at the statute. Section 21 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act reads:

> No private station shall operate in Canada as a part of a chain or network of stations except with the permission of, and in accordance with the regulations made by, the corporation.

The result is that the private station has no network affiliation. It can be said that this is more or less a reproduction of a section in the act of 1932. As was suggested by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) seems to have carried in his pocket some lines of some of the speeches of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett. It is true that in those days Mr. Bennett did favour government-owned radio, but it is well to remember the reason for his attitude at that time was that radio, which had been hardly more than a toy or plaything a few years earlier, had become a great agency for formulating opinion. It was learned one day in Canada that the air channels had been largely taken over by our neighbours to the south and nothing less than the government of Canada could redeem Canada's position in the air over this continent. It was, I think, by the use of that argument, the truth and sound basis of which no one at that time doubted or possibly still doubts, that there was recruited to the doctrine of government ownership people who generally are not so profoundly impressed by the wisdom of that doctrine. The leader of the government at that time used strong language, language which is now being interpreted as favourable to a government-owned monopoly of broadcasting to-day. I think it well that the house should know that the reason for that attitude was that anything less than the voice of Canada, speaking the language of diplomacy and speaking for the Canadian people could have redeemed for Canada her place in the air.

But this is a new science, something that has become one of the greatest influences upon human life that has been devised probably in the last two thousand years. Through it news is transmitted instantaneously from the remotest corners of the earth; through it information is spread; through it opinions are formed; and through its use or abuse minds are moulded and men galvanized into action in ways entirely unprecedented. I doubt if a Mussolini or a Hitler could have found his way to power as rapidly or as absolutely as they did had it not been for the device that is now under discussion. So that I do not think there is any reason to apologize if a person were to modify his position.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) seemed to think that everybody who had ever been associated with the Conservative party was absolutely bound by the statements that had been made some years ago in other circumstances by a capable and a distinguished Canadian. I for one do not feel that I am bound or that any member of this party is bound by anything that may have been said by a distinguished leader of the Conservative party fifteen years ago when he was struggling strenuously and successfully, to regain for Canada her place in the air over this continent.

But there have been changes, changes particularly in the use of radio. I am going to be very candid, possibly curt, in stating that my fear is that the government, not only this government but any government, will use this power, this great and unrivaled power, improperly to maintain itself in office or to defeat its opponents. I do not think it is wise that we on the northern half of this continent should unnecessarily expose ourselves to such a danger.

I have been looking through some of the reports of former years. I have before me some of the reports that were made in 1943 and 1944. I am not going to weary the house by reading from them; but it was stated, not once, but stated a dozen times, that the broadcasting corporation would be non-partisan, that it would be free from political domination. I have cut most of my eye teeth. I do not pretend to be wiser or to have more experience than other hon. gentlemen who have lived in Canada and have had some association with public affairs, but I think we have to admit, in all honesty, if not in pride, that bodies like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, closely associated with government, whose administrators are government appointees, in moments of stress yield to the temptation of government dictation. I believe that to be a fact; I know it to be a fact. I will go farther and say that if the party to which I belong were in power and were subjected to the same temptations, to the same possibility of wielding that irresistible power of formulating public opinion by the statement of fiction as facts or by the colouring of facts or by the repression of facts or by keeping opponents from saying what they wished to say over the air, I am not certain it would have the grace to resist. I do not think it is well that we in this country, cherishing and believing in freedom of speech as we do should subject ourselves further to that kind of danger.

I am not disposed at this moment to put on the record all the information I have here; but there are letters, some of which are already incorporated in the debates of this house, which show that the broadcasting corporation, under direction of the government, kept certain political opponents of the government from the air. That is not a healthy situation. It is not a type of thing which should be tolerated. When a political party is in stress, whether it be in one province or whether it be in another, the agencies which are under its control, be it radio commission, be it liquor commission, be it unemployment insurance commission, be it old age pensions, all these bodies are more or less wracked, if not wrecked by the stresses and strains of the moment. I ask the government to amend this act in such a way as to relieve those strains and perils.

One point which I wish to develop further is the very minor position in which the private station finds itself. The private station is restricted to the humblest kind of local work. Radio in its essence is the defeat of distance. If you restrict radio in its flight, if you pinion it to a village or a locality, or one low-powered station, you defeat and deny it its own essence. It is the hook-up that is the essential characteristic of broadcasting, and when the private station is denied the privilege of becoming associated with other stations throughout the land it is put on a lesser and lower plane than the stations owned and operated by the government. The government-owned corporation enjoys the only privilege of communication throughout the whole area of this dominion.

It is stated that the private stations are mere money-making enterprises, and some rather harsh things have been said about them. If it be desired that a portion or a greater portion of the time of the private station be devoted to cultural work, to educational work, to music or to literature, all well and good. It is within the competency of the regulating body so to determine. And here I wish to associate myself with what the hon. member for Eglinton has said about the function of the C.B.C. which is both a competitor and a judge in the same race. The activities of the privately-owned station can be properly regulated. But to put the privately owned stations in such a position that they cannot compete with the government-owned station is to create and develop a monopoly of broadcasting in Canada.

There is something more. We have heard about the taking over by C.B.C. of one or two stations: I am not going into that. But if these privately owned stations are to be displaced and forced to seek other and less favourable channels for their broadcasting, private enterprise is going to say, "Well, there is no future here; we are only tenants, not even during good behaviour, but only tenants so long as it pleases the particular party in power to let us breathe." That is not a healthy situation.

We have developed in Canada something which is peculiar to ourselves. I am not certain that it is a wise policy but here we have government-owned facilities in competition with privately owned ones. We have the railways, the ships, the telegraph, the aeroplane. I sincerely hope that the semi-promise given by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) the other day may be realized and that aerial navigation will not be a total monopoly of government as it was indicated it was going to be. But we have in transportation and in communications the publicly owned services in competition with the privately owned services, and they all serve to keep the privately owned and the publicly owned services alert, active, and not quite as arrogant as they might otherwise be. I believe that the minister who is guiding through the house the bill which is before us to-night should remember that competition has not been entirely banished from the realms in which government owned service operates, and that he would do well to suggest amendments to the act which would permit some rivalry between the publicly owned and monopolistic corporation and privately owned stations, degraded and humble though they be.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): There are a few remarks I should like to make this evening. I was a member of the radio committee, and I have been a member for quite a few years. One thing I find difficult to understand: I should have thought that, before this bill was introduced, the particulars of it might have been discussed in the committee. As far as I can find out, that has not happened.

I am not in favour of the bill as it stands. The taxpayers of Canada believe—and I agree with them—that this is a time for economy, not for spending their money. Taxes are already too high in this country.

One other criticism I would make is that the committee was set up very late. The first meeting was not held until, I believe, May 28, long after the session started, and the heavy programme which the committee had to consider made it inevitable that the report would be brought down very late in the session. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there were a great many aspects of broadcasting in Canada which, owing to the lateness of the sittings of the committee and in spite of the fact that in the last few weeks we sat two and three times a day, we did not have time to consider. Among other things, we did not get the financial statement of the corporation until almost the last day or so of the sittings of the committee and there was no opportunity to discuss it thoroughly. I think the house now fully understands that the report of the committee and other reports of previous committees have been far from unanimous. As the hon. member for Eglinton aptly stated, it was a majority union report of the C.C.F. and the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: Good combination.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You said it, brother.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And how! In anything I say I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am in favour of a nationally owned system of radio in this country, but I am in favour of radio broadcasting being properly controlled and not controlled in the manner in which it is.

A good deal has been said about the original setting up of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but times have changed and the act which gave sanction in 1936 to the principles we have to-day are out of date in these modern times in view of the changes that have taken place from year to year. A great many members of the committee feel, therefore, that there is need for a change in the act. But there is only one way in which we shall ever get that change, and that is to have it go before an independent tribunal in open session and have witnesses called representing all points of view, including listeners. Then we may come to some conclusions which will be more suited to modern times.

I hold no brief for any private stations. I am not speaking to-night for anyone in particular, but I have great fear of the dangers that exist in Canada along the road we are travelling in the matter of radio and in view of the growing monopoly on the part of the C.B.C., and the grave danger that the people of Canada will eventually be listening to one or two voices but only one point of view, and freedom of speech will be lost.

I think it has been proved to-night that there is a monopoly of radio in Canada, and it has also been shown how the radio broadcasting corporation is constituted. It maintains a monopoly of all telegraph wires and will not allow private stations to have full use of the facilities at their disposal. It has been shown how the whole thing works.

On motion of Mr. Ross (St. Paul's) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

Saturday, August 24, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BREAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I tried to communicate with several departments this morning, but was unable to reach the right officials, although I did eventually reach the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson). My question is this: Is the government aware that in some areas in Canada the price of bread is being increased, and bread is being sold above the ceiling price? If so, has the government or the wartime prices and trade board taken any steps in the matter, or do either intend to do so?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in this instance followed his usual courtesy of sending notice of his question, although I am sorry we did not receive it earlier. When it is brought to the attention of the board that price ceilings have been broken, prosecutions frequently follow. If the hon. member will furnish either the board or myself with the names of the parties to whom he has referred, they will be dealt with immediately.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL STRIKE—FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I had intended asking a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) but perhaps in his absence the Minister of Reconstruction would answer. Has the controller appointed in the steel dispute been able to do anything in regard to a settlement since the committee on industrial relations finished its work?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, I have had no direct contact with the controller recently, and therefore I am unable to answer the question. However I would point out that one party to the dispute refuses to obey any directions of the controller, and therefore he is somewhat handicapped in trying to work out arrangements between the workers and the managements.

PAYMENT OF INCREASED WAGES BY STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he can tell the house whether an opinion has been sought or given as to the legality or illegality of the action of the Steel Company of Canada in paying triple wages to those now working in its plant at Hamilton.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): No opinion has been sought and no opinion has been given.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the government regard it as legal or illegal?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government does not regard it at all. It has not been brought to the notice of the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are doing it now, and the plant is under the control of the government.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will be more specific, perhaps some opinion could be expressed, but I should be very much surprised if there was a lawyer anywhere who would attempt to give an opinion based on nothing more than the statements made in the house this morning.

Mr. KNOWLES: A question has been directed to the Minister of Labour time and time again, and he will not answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member put his question and then asked another and was answered by the right hon. minister. I cannot permit a debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: But I did not get an answer.

FISH

BRITISH COLUMBIA—EXTENSION OF SALMON SEINING IN AREA 17

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that British Columbia members have received telegrams with regard to salmon seining in area 17 in British Columbia can the minister advise the house as to what decision he has made in that regard?

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): The whole matter in connection with extending the boundaries of area 17 is receiving active consideration by myself and departmental officials. I would also add that the director of western fisheries left for British Columbia last night to make a further investigation.

SUGAR

IMPORTS FROM WEST INDIES—CONCESSIONS TO CANADIAN GROWERS AND PROCESSORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, which possibly may be treated as a notice. In view of the increased price of sugar which is imported from the West Indies, will the government, with a view to encouraging production in 1947, consider granting similar concessions to growers and processors in Canada as have been ordered in the United States of America?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I shall take that as notice and give the hon. gentleman an answer later.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—RENTS IN EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I have not been able to send him notice of it, because it is based on a telegram. Has the minister any information concerning an increase in rents being charged by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to its tenants in what was formerly known as the Jesuit military hospital in Edmonton?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I have no knowledge of any increase in rents, but I shall be glad to make inquiry and answer later.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

888. Departmental administration — further amount required, $484,923.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister make a brief statement on this item? I think it would help us to expedite its passage.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The need for these supplementary estimates is brought about by accelerated demobilization. We had an estimate of a monthly demobilization rate of 38,500 per month, and the actual rate was 66,500 per month for a six months period. This has entailed additional expenditure. First, there is the provision for one year's free treatment. As I say, the men are coming home much sooner than we thought we could get them home. There is $6,000,000 needed as a result of the action taken this year by parliament in reestablishing the insurance principle. An amount of $1,000,000 is needed for war veterans' allowances, but the main item is in regard to the year's free treatment. Some additional amounts are required under the Veterans Land Act, but most of these items have been sanctioned by the parliament this session as a result of deliberations by all parties. Departmental administration has naturally been increased because of the men coming home earlier than was expected, but this cost should go down substantially next year. Broadly and briefly speaking, those are the main reasons for the increases.

Mr. PROBE: I think the Minister of Veterans Affairs should be complimented upon the manner in which he treats the committee, especially when we consider the action taken by other ministers when their estimates are before us. I have sat here many times when a minister has brought in an enormous estimate which he expected us to digest and pass without making a statement of any kind. I resent being thus treated as a cipher, and for that reason I want to say thank you to the Minister of Veterans Affairs for making the statement he has. Is it not true that we have passed the peak in the demobilization activities and that from now on there should be a considerable decrease in the Department of Veterans Affairs personnel?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have passed the peak in regard to demobilization and reconversion, but we will not reach the peak in regard to expenditures until about March of next year.

Mr. PROBE: Is it not true that the staff in the department is being reduced? Has the minister any figures which will indicate when the peak was reached?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Most of the staff is occupied in connection with hospital administration and treatment. We expect that they will be required until next spring, because of the provision for free treatment for all demobilized and discharged ex-service men.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many veterans and dependents have still to be brought back to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not sure, but I think about 12,000. I shall find out definitely.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many houses are still required for veterans? There is a terrific shortage of houses for veterans in Ottawa and right across the country. What is the present deficiency, and what are the prospects of meeting it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That matter is definitely under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Reconstruction. This year we have built over 2,700 houses, and then we have been assigned to construct 4,000 units for next year, which is part of the 8,000 units in Canada. We do not intend to intrude into the field of urban housing. Under the Veterans Land Act we want to make our housing a matter of settlement in addition to providing occupational opportunities by locating close to industrial areas.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That does not answer my question. According to the minister's figures he will have 2,726 houses with an additional 4,000. That is out of a total programme of 8,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That takes care of about 7,000 veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is no urban housing at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the lag in urban requirements?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have none, except in the one case at Calgary. The Calgary area is extensive; the city offered us tax free land and we did engage in certain housing there, but apart from that there will be no urban housing under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last year I brought up a question with regard to hospitalization, and the utilization of the natural facilities available at Watrous lake, the chemical waters of which have been found to be beneficial for the treatment of neurological diseases. Ever since the Indian tribes used to gather there more than two hundred years ago, use has been made of the waters of this lake in the treatment of certain types of disease, particularly unsettled mental conditions and the like. Within the last six months the government of Saskatchewan made an investigation to ascertain the properties of the waters of this lake, and I understand they have been found to be particularly beneficial for neurological complaints. I do not think there should be any difficulty in arranging with the government of Saskatchewan to make available to soldiers requiring neurological treatment certain facilities that were built there some fifteen years ago. I should like to have a statement from the minister with regard to the matter. Last year he gave me a most considerate answer and said that the matter would be looked into.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I appreciate my hon. friend's bringing this matter to my attention. The real question is this: are there enough ex-service patients whose treatment would warrant the development of Watrous lake? I am told by my parliamentary assistant that it is an ideal site for a health and occupational centre for the treatment of veterans. I can assure my hon. friend that if it is deemed necessary to expand in that direction, his recommendations will be most carefully reviewed.

Mr. QUELCH: How long will it be before veterans can take advantage of the amendment to the Veterans Land Act permitting loans of $3,000? I have received several letters but I understand that no application has yet been granted.

Mr. TUCKER: One has already been settled under the provisions of the amended section, and there is no reason why the policy should not be applied right along.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister make a brief statement on Sunnybrook hospital? When will it be completed and staffed and in operation?

Mr. MACKENZIE: We are beginning now to send the first patients into Sunnybrook. As my hon. friend is well aware, all the units have not yet been completed, but we shall have a gradual infiltration of patients into Sunnybrook from now on until the unit is completed with the conjoined units of the health and occupational centre and the Davisville estate. The three units will form the finest hospital centre in the dominion.

Mr. ADAMSON: The first to be completed was the out-patients building?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is right.

Mr. ADAMSON: Have complete surgical facilities been installed? When will the surgical part of D.V.A. be removed from Christie Street to Sunnybrook?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There will be certain surgical facilities available in the unit now, but the hospital will not be completed for some months yet because of difficulties in regard to labour, bricklayers particularly, and the shortage of supplies and material, all of which were beyond my control. But I can assure my hon. friend that it is the earnest and urgent desire of this department to have Sunnybrook finished as soon as possible, and I hope that every single member of parliament will attend the opening ceremonies.

Mr. SKEY: Does the minister expect that he will be able to staff Sunnybrook adequately when it is completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: Last December on the minister's estimates I brought his attention to the extremely low pay which the D.V.A. nurses are receiving as compared with the pay of nurses in the armed services and in hospitals throughout the country. The minister said he would give the matter consideration and see whether anything could be done to increase the compensation for nurses.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have substantially increased the salaries of doctors working for D.V.A., and we have received complaints from civilian hospitals that we are paying our nurses more than they can afford to pay. We make certain allowances for board and lodging which increase the comfort of their existence.

Mr. SKEY: If the civilian hospitals are forced to pay their nurses more, it will be a good thing.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): In regard to the Veterans Land Act houses in Westminster township, I understand that the water mains are being laid from the city of London and that the public utilities commission has a flat rate for each hydrant placed in any area. What arrangements have been made in that regard? The drainage system that is being installed there comes to a dead end, with no outlet. What arrangements are being made to take care of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I regret to say for once that I am waterlogged. I have not the information, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: The civil reinstatement act was amended in 1942 to bring it into line with the Unemployment Insurance Act with respect to those who might be affected by an industrial dispute. Consideration should be given to amending the act, because hundreds of ex-service personnel are involved in industrial disputes which were none of their making; the conditions which brought them about arose during the war when the men were in the service. They came back and took employment in an industry and soon found themselves out of work. Under the civil reinstatement act they are entitled when out of work to certain benefits. There is a great deal of criticism throughout the country, particularly in areas in which industrial disputes are in progress because of difficulties between management and labour largely brought about while these boys were overseas because they do not receive out-of-work benefits. Has the department given consideration to applying the statutory provision for out-of-work benefits to certain periods when these men are out of work?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member, having been concerned with labour matters much longer than I, knows how difficult the situation is. He knows that under the Unemployment Insurance Act a man who is out of work through a labour dispute cannot get unemployment insurance.

Mr. GILLIS: That is quite all right.

Mr. TUCKER: There are many veterans who are not entitled to the out-of-work allowance, and if they are out of work because of a labour dispute they cannot get unemployment insurance. If we stepped in and said to the veteran: You are entitled to the out-of-work allowance and we shall pay it, it would lead to a charge of discrimination. So it was felt that to avoid that charge the same policy should be followed in this matter as is followed under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which apparently met with general approval. The hon. member knows that there are many difficult cases; they have been brought to our attention, and certainly we are most sympathetic. Some of the boys who came back and had been at work a week or so found themselves in the centre of a labour dispute. That was so in the Ford strike, for which they were in no way responsible. The thing was looked into very carefully to see if there was not some way of dealing with such cases. The only way in which we have been able to deal with it was to say to the ex-service man unemployed on account of a strike, if it was likely to be long drawn-out, that he should take training under our act, make use of his time and get the allowance while he was taking training. There has been that attempt to deal with it without introducing discrepancies or giving rise to the feeling that there is discrimination in the administration of the two acts.

[Mr. H. O. White.]

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate the government's desire to bring about uniformity as between the two acts, but I do not agree with my hon. friend that the charge of discrimination would be justified. I agree that the Unemployment Insurance Act is fair, and those who went on strike knew that the act would not apply to them. They knew very well what they were up against. But the boy who was overseas and who did not know the Unemployment Insurance Act came back here feeling that if he was out of work he was entitled to certain out-of-work benefits. We arranged that for him. Then he happened to drop into a first class row between the employer and the ordinary civilian employee. He is a victim of circumstances, and the out-of-work provisions of this act should be applicable to him. I do not think any member of the union who was not getting unemployment insurance would raise a cry because the government gave the soldier that benefit. There is a very clear line of demarcation between the two cases. I suggest it be given consideration.

Mr. TUCKER: We do endeavour to find work for those unemployed veterans. The only place we stopped short was at the very thing which has been described by the hon. member. It was stated in our literature which was distributed overseas that if they were then not entitled under the Unemployment Insurance Act they would not get any allowance. It was looked at sympathetically, but it was thought that if anything were paid to the veteran under this provision, veterans whose rights had expired would have an unanswerable case for similar treatment. It was held that you simply could not do this without upsetting your whole Unemployment Insurance Act, and that it was better to try to deal with the situation in other ways.

Mr. McKAY: Have many veterans taken advantage of this training programme while they are out of work in lieu of the out-of-work benefits they would otherwise have received?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes; many have applied. We have not here the actual number, but it was the definite policy to assist these veterans. They were made aware of it, and I understand that a substantial number did take advantage of the chance to get training when otherwise they would have been unemployed.

Mr. McKAY: The hon. gentleman is certain that a number have actually received that particular training?

Mr. TUCKER: Yes.

Mr. CASE: Which classes of veterans are not entitled to out-of-work pay?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Those who have been discharged over twelve months.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister or the parliamentary assistant explain the situation regarding the veteran with a dishonourable discharge? It will be remembered that when the Minister of National Defence stated that an amnesty had been granted to those who had deserted in Canada, he said they would not be in a similar position to those overseas, because they would not get the rehabilitation benefits. I was under the impression from what he said that those who had deserted overseas would not be denied rehabilitation benefits; those who deserted in Canada would.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As my hon. friend knows very well, for he was on the committee, we set up a board of review last year. Over a thousand veterans who were given dishonourable discharge have been granted gratuities, but not all the benefits under the legislation provided by parliament.

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the statement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, is it intended that now those men will be granted full benefits and not merely a gratuity?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure my hon. friend that the matter will be completely reviewed in the light of all the evidence that a sympathetic and humanitarian department can discover.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask the minister a number of questions about an unfortunate veteran of the second war, but perhaps it would take a good deal of time to deal with them. Will he not be just as well pleased if I ask the questions under item 961, and will he give me all the latitude I would have on this item? Then we can allow these items to pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

898. Hospital and other allowances—world war I—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. COCKERAM: I think I brought this question up before: Will the minister consider the payment of gallantry awards to the men of the first war who won the military medal? There is an allowance for personnel who won the military medal in the last war.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Was that for Canadians or for imperials?

Mr. COCKERAM: For Canadians, who are getting it now.

Mr. TUCKER: As the hon. member knows, the imperial government paid these awards in regard to the first great war, and when we assumed the obligation to pay it to Canadians who participated in this war, of course immediately the question arose, should we not pay holders of the military medal in respect of the first war the same as we are paying those who won it in the last war. Of course we never assumed any obligation to pay any of the gallantry awards of the first great war; so the question arises whether we should make this principle retroactive to the first great war. That is of course a new principle. We have done some other things: for example, clothing allowance has been increased very considerably; the claim is that it should be made retroactive, and that arises in all these things. Representations have come in, but our committee did not make any recommendation on the matter. Of course if very strong representations are made the matter will, I suppose, receive consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do I understand that the United Kingdom pays a gallantry award to winners of the military medal whereas the Canadian government did not in the last war?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, no.

Mr. TUCKER: As a matter of fact the situation is that there was no gallantry award paid in respect of military medal awards in the first great war. Now a policy has been adopted in England and here to pay it in regard to this war. But as soon as we said we would pay it in regard to this war and assumed it as a Canadian obligation, some people suggested that if we recognized that there should be some monetary award in respect of the military medal in this war we should pay it in regard to the last war. That obligation has not been recognized in other parts of the empire, and if we paid it here there would probably be certain pressure in other parts of the empire to do the same thing. I think it would be a matter for some kind of common agreement.

Mr. ADAMSON: On what basis are these paid?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were all placed on the record about ten days ago, when the main estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs were under consideration by the house. I have not before me the page number of Hansard.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veteran's Land Act—

901. To provide for payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands, in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources, under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as amended (P.C. 1550 of 18th April, 1946) and item 466 of the main estimates—further amount required, $1.

Mr. HERRIDGE: This item provides for payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands, $1. That would indicate a somewhat limited programme. I should like an explanation.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is a Scotch dollar, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can assure my hon. friend that it is only a change in the wording of the vote to make it possible for us to go ahead with a development with which he himself is very familiar.

Mr. McKAY: With what provinces have agreements been arranged?

Mr. MACKENZIE: With Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

902. To provide for purchase of land and improvements; cost of permanent improvements to be effected; removal of encumbrances; stock and equipment; refunds of surplus to veterans (section 19); and for protection of security under the Veterans Land Act—further amount required, $10,000,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There seems to be a change here. The total amount in the main estimates was $13,000,000, and now we have supplementaries for $10,000,000. For 1945-46 it was $5,000,000; in the main estimates it is increased to $13,000,000—one would imagine the department would have a fairly good idea of its requirements—and then there is a request for $10,000,000 in the supplementaries. What is the reason for this eighty per cent increase?

Mr. TUCKER: There is $72,000,000 in the main estimates, and this work is proceeding more expeditiously, a greater number of applications being put through

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the total amount?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is $82,000,000, including the main and the supplementaries.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This is not itemized. The supplementaries give veterans affairs, loans and investments, soldier settlement and Veterans Land Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is the same type as in the main estimates. It is 72 increased to 82 millions.

Item agreed to.

Veterans Affairs—

961. Treatment and pension examination—world war II—further amount required, $7,471,250.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hesitate to delay the committee in connection with a matter which I feel it my duty to consider, and I am not sure I would have done so if I had not received a letter by air mail yesterday from Vancouver. The member from Temiscouata the other day told us about his receiving fan mail sometimes, and I too have received fan mail, as no doubt other members have done. This letter is in some respects an example of fan mail. I had better read it in order to open the discussion. It has reference to the case of an aircraftman named Lowell T. Campbell, R-160565. The letter is as follows:

John H. Blackmore,

Dear Mr. Blackmore: I would appreciate your taking action before leaving Ottawa regarding the above named. He was discharged from the Shaughnessy Military Hospital August 6, 1946, with a check for approximately $20. This is to cover the needs of himself and dependents until such time as the Canadian pension commission settle his pension status. Of this amount ($20) the proportion accruing to Lowell is $3.30 and the remainder for his dependents.

As you will note by his file, he has been receiving the sum of $117 covering himself and his five dependents. This is now arbitrarily cut off at a time when he has to make what preparations he can under the circumstances to get his children in readiness for school. His children, as you know, are scattered around among several families who have their own obligations to meet. This is a very urgent matter.

Please note Lowell Campbell was discharged from the Shaughnessy Military Hospital with his back in an iron brace to support the injured spine. In this condition he has been forced by the department to take a job as a watchman in order to maintain his family in lieu of pay and allowances until his pension is adjusted by the commission.

I think this crude action by the department should be publicly exposed. Here is a disabled man forced to take a job when every movement of his body is difficult and when he is in need of constant rest instead of performing duties as a watchman. The Minister of Veterans Affairs needs assistance in the running of his business when such things as this can take place.

Will you please take action in this matter before leaving Ottawa and kindly notify me accordingly.

Thanking you for what you have done this session in cooperating with the writer in these matters I am,

Yours sincerely,

Walter H. Kirchner,
Secretary.

The letterhead is that of the Canadian Combat Veterans Association in British Columbia Incorporated.

I am not in a position to judge of the accuracy of any of the statements either in this letter or in the extensive file which has been forwarded to me in connection with the case of Mr. Lowell T. Campbell. I have desired throughout this whole affair to be perfectly fair with everybody concerned. I believe all hon. members will realize that if a member receives a letter like this he is under considerable pressure to take action. I have not been called upon to take action in connection with veterans' affairs this year. My party assigned me to three other important tasks at the beginning of the year and I have been attending to them; consequently I have not been able to give to veterans' problems the attention I have given them in the past.

Mr. HANSELL: You have been doing a good job.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am therefore not in a position to discuss veterans' affairs at all, but this matter must be looked into. I will ask the minister a number of questions shortly, and they will enable him to give all the facts and answer all the statements that are made in the brief which I have received and put the whole matter clearly on the record for the defence of his own department.

My own impression has been, in watching the minister, that he has been very conscientious and sympathetic, and I think he is deserving of high praise and commendation because of his work. I do not believe for a moment that any of the irregularities complained about are in any way attributable to the minister's oversight. If anything, they are due to the tremendous responsibilities that rest upon him.

In order to be fair, this morning I called the minister's office at 9.50 and told his secretary that on this case a number of questions would be asked during the consideration of the minister's estimates. I did that in order to give the minister an opportunity to read carefully the file on Mr. Campbell. At 9.45 I called the office of the parliamentary assistant and left the same message. Hon. members will understand that I am not in any way treating this as a political issue. I believe there is an unfortunate situation here which ought to be examined into with the greatest of care, and the minister should be given the fullest opportunity to explain the facts so that we may be able to assess properly the condition set forth in this letter, regrettable as it is.

May I say one other thing before I proceed with my question? I believe this unfortunate soldier is at present in Vancouver. He is of a family personally known to me. His family lives in the constituency of the hon. member for Macleod. Had Mr. Kirchner known of the hon. member for Macleod, and the action which he takes on problems such as this, he would have brought the matter to his attention, and I am sure the hon. member would have been doing the same thing that I am doing at this time. Having made this explanation may I now ask the minister a number of questions? Then I shall send the questions over to him so that he will have the opportunity to answer them one after the other, if he chooses. If he feels that he should like to look through his files in order to obtain accurate answers for the record at a future time, then he should have that opportunity. These are the questions which I have drafted. They are not complete as yet, but I think they will elicit practically all the information essential in the matter almost up to the time that the letter takes on.

The questions are as follows:

1. Was Lowell T. Campbell, R160165, discharged from Shaughnessy hospital on August 6, 1946?

2. Was veteran Campbell's back in an iron brace to support an injured spine when he was discharged?

3. Had veteran Campbell been receiving $117 a month to support himself and five dependent children?

4. Had Lowell T. Campbell's wife been lost to him in February, 1945, leaving him under the necessity of placing his children in the homes of various relatives?

5. Would Lowell T. Campbell have been required to pay for each of these children, and was he required to pay $25 a month for board and lodgings and pay additional costs to cover clothing?

Hon. members will of course see the significance of question 5. We are trying to assess the adequacy of $117 which had been allowed Mr. Campbell.

6. Is each of these five children now between six and twelve years of age, therefore, requiring school supplies in addition to the $25 per month for board and room, the cost of clothing, the cost of medical and dental care, et cetera?

7. Would the British Columbia welfare organization demand at least $30 a month per child, plus family allowances, if that organization were to assume charge of the children?

I might explain to the members of the committee that I am informed that Mr. Campbell has placed his children out with various relatives of his. He did that some time ago when he came into great difficulties domestically through his illness and weakness, and these relatives have kept the children for a considerable length of time; but finally because of their own family responsibilities they find themselves unable to do so without money which would help them to defray expenses. What they request is $25 a month for board and room, plus the cost of clothing and of course plus the cost of equipping the children for school, and dental and medical services. All hon. members will understand that.

8. Would the cost of supporting his five children therefore constitute for veteran Campbell a monthly expense of at least $125 besides the family allowances?

9. Did the minister's department give effective thought to the question, how was veteran Campbell to get $125 a month out of $117 a month which the minister's department allowed him?

10. When veteran Campbell was discharged from Shaughnessy military hospital on August 6, was even the $117 a month cut off arbitrarily?

11. Was veteran Campbell discharged from Shaughnessy military hospital on August 6, with a cheque for approximately $20?

12. Would $16.70 of his cheque be apportioned to veteran Campbell's five children to support them and fit them up for school, leaving, of course, $3.30 to support veteran Campbell until, with an iron brace on him to support an injured spine, he could take a job and receive his first pay cheque?

It would be a good thing if I asked no more questions at this time but gave the minister an opportunity to answer, if he sees fit, some of those I have already asked. I shall then come back to others, because the questions I have asked so far complete one aspect of the veteran's case.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wish to thank the hon. member for Lethbridge for the courteous and considerate way in which he has presented the case. Unfortunately, although he and I have had extensive correspondence about this case for many months, I did not until about ten o'clock this morning get notice of his intention to raise these questions on the estimates this morning.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the minister will permit me, the letter came to me by air mail only last night; I took the first opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not criticizing my hon. friend in the slightest degree. It so happens that the chairman of the pension commission is absent on other duties this morning, and I was not able to get in touch with him in regard to the details of this case. Every question asked by my hon. friend is now on the records of this parliament, and I can assure him that a reply will be given to every one of them so far as we are able to do so. I think I know the details of this case fairly well, but I would not be prepared to answer the questions specifically at this moment. I can assure my hon. friend, however, of my sympathy and of my readiness to review every single question he has asked and supply him with an answer. If I am absent, my colleague, the hon. member for Rosthern, will supply the answer before parliament prorogues.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be to the great credit of the minister if the veterans all over the country could have been looking in on him and could have seen his face and his eyes as he gave that little speech, because the minister is full of sympathy and consideration. I wish to put that on record because the expression of his countenance cannot go on Hansard, but it is a part of the whole proceedings.

If the minister will agree I shall give him some more questions so that he may have them all before him at the same time. We now enter another aspect of this case which, if reports reaching me are correct, is literally fraught with regrettable difficulties.

13. Did veteran Campbell on March 19, 1942, enlist as a member of the ground crew of the R.C.A.F.?

14. Was veteran Campbell at the time of his enlistment sound in physical health?

15. Was veteran Campbell sound economically on enlistment? That is, was he able to work at various jobs and support his family, and was he doing so—raising a family of young Canadians for future time?

16. Was veteran Campbell upon enlistment sound mentally and emotionally? I may say to the minister and to the committee that veteran Campbell has been lacerated because of certain remarks put on his file which would seem to reflect upon his intelligence and emotional stability. This has greatly aggravated the mental anguish under which this veteran now suffers, and that is the reason for the question.

17. Was veteran Campbell injured while on military duty?

18. Of the successive incidents which resulted in further development toward veteran Campbell's present state of partial physical incapacity, were several the result of official decisions and actions taken by various men for whose official decisions and actions the government of Canada is directly responsible?

19. For example, was it a Canadian officer before whom veteran Campbell came on sick parade on the April morning following his injury?

20. Was it a Canadian officer who on May 5, 1942, told veteran Campbell that his back was normal, and that the injury was just a sprain, and that aircraftman Campbell could carry on with full duty?

21. Was it a Canadian officer who assigned aircraftman Campbell to work in hospital at No. 2 S.F.T.S., Uplands, Ottawa, where one of this aircraftman's duties was to wax floors?

22. Were they Canadian officers who, when aircraftman Campbell reported his condition to them, treated his reports lightly, asked him such questions as: "Where is the pain this morning?" in a partly flippant and ridiculing manner, and who treated him with physiotherapy by means of heat pads, while the aircraftman assured them that the pain was only intensified by the treatment?

23. Was it a Canadian officer who, after June 24, 1942, ordered that aircraftman Campbell be sent to Ottawa civic hospital where under the care of Doctor Young a body cast was applied to the aircraftman for four weeks, and later a body cast extending down the left leg to the ankle for eight weeks, and later more heat treatments were given?

24. Was it a Canadian officer upon whose orders aircraftman Campbell was then taken to the Daly building to Doctor J. P. S. Cathcart, psychiatrist, where he was questioned about his past life, his family and his father's family?

25. Was it through the remarks or hints of a Canadian officer that it was intimated to aircraftman Campbell by October 1, 1942 that the aircraftman would do well to seek his discharge?

26. Was it through orders of a Canadian officer that discharge papers were brought to aircraftman Campbell to sign, which papers the aircraftman refused to sign?

27. Was it through a Canadian officer's orders or hints that the padre, approximately the last of October, 1942, told aircraftman Campbell that he had been struck off strength, thereby causing aircraftman Campbell to ask for immediate discharge and to receive it on October 31, 1942?

28. Was it on order of a Canadian officer that aircraftman Campbell was transferred to Christie street hospital, from which aircraftman Campbell was discharged on December 21, 1942, and sent home to Alberta?

29. Was it on orders of a Canadian officer that Campbell was discharged from Belcher hospital, Calgary, on May 5, 1943? May I at this point observe, for the sake of hon. members who, I notice, are following my remarks closely, that it was clearly to be seen that the aircraftman was unable to do heavy physical work. And yet when he was discharged from Christie street hospital and sent home to Alberta he had no alternative but that of engaging in hard physical work such as ranching and other kinds of work he has been doing. The result was that, naturally, on account of his weakness, he became afflicted again and had to seek admission to Belcher Hospital. He was discharged from Belcher Hospital after a very few days. Of course by that hon. members can clearly see that someone representing the government needed to have his actions reviewed.

30. Was it on orders of a Canadian officer that Campbell, in his weakened condition, was denied allowances adequate to support himself and his family without going to work at heavy labour?

31. Was it through Canadian officers that Campbell was refused attention by Shaughnessy hospital when he applied for attention, (1) alone; (2) in company with the provincial president of the army and navy veterans in British Columbia, although later, after Campbell had consulted Doctor Frank Emmons, he was finally admitted to Shaughnessy hospital on January 16, 1945?

The minister has suggested that the parliamentary assistant will deal with these matters at a later time, when he has had time to examine them. Therefore I believe I have given sufficient for the present. I shall have more questions after the parliamentary assistant has had a chance to review the case.

These questions, I may tell the parliamentary assistant have to do with the responsibility of men in Shaughnessy hospital who operated on Campbell, even although there was present Doctor Frank Emmons, a specialist, whose skill at diagnosis revealed for the first time the ailment from which Lowell T. Campbell suffered. According to the information I have —and I shall put the questions to the minister so that he can answer them categorically—this soldier had tried in various ways to get officials in Shaughnessy hospital to permit Doctor Frank Emmons to consult with them and to be present when the operations were performed. Doctor Frank Emmons had conducted careful diagnoses with X-ray plates which, to a skilful man like Doctor Emmons, indicated exactly what was the matter with this man. He had been injured in exercise and a dislocation of certain vertebrae in his back had taken place. The only possible cure would be an operation which could remove that deficiency. But men who apparently did not possess the skill to diagnose the case nevertheless ventured to operate on the man, and to treat the case without knowing even how to diagnose it. Notwithstanding the fact that Doctor Frank Emmons, who was the private doctor of this soldier, was willing to come and either operate or consult while the operation was being performed, his offer was not accepted. I have asked a number of questions which will probe into all that. Hon. members will realize that all this has an important bearing upon the responsibility which the dominion government must assume with respect to the weakened condition of this airman.

May I thank the minister and his parliamentary assistant for the most attentive and sympathetic hearing they have given, and I should like also to thank the members of the committee for their earnest attention. In order to bring out the seriousness of this matter I should like to suggest something which perhaps need not be suggested. I was thinking how easily this might have been the case of the splendid young member for Vancouver-Burrard whom the minister honoured the other day in appropriate terms by commending him upon winning the Victoria Cross. How easily it could have been any one of the excellent young soldiers who have been sent into this house, every one of whom constitutes an asset to the house. How easily it could have been one of my sons; how easily it could have been my brother or the son or brother of any hon. member. When we realize that I think we will appreciate more readily how serious this matter is and agree that even at this late date in the session, we can afford time to probe into it. After all, this is the high court of parliament, and if there is any court that needs to have a reputation for justice, it is this one.

I believe we should delay long enough to see that justice is given. May I ask the minister when this matter can come up again? I suggest that the item be held over until some time this afternoon, when the parliamentary assistant can answer. If it is not held over, what can be done about giving me an opportunity to ask these questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend has asked something like thirty-one questions, and it will be necessary to consult with the defence services, because they are involved in regard to Campbell's service. It will be impossible to make a reply this afternoon. The reply may have to be in the form of a return, because it involves two or three of the services and it may not be possible to get this information before prorogation. However, I give the assurance to my hon. friend that it will be obtained, and I suggest that the item be allowed to pass with that assurance.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I be permitted to ask the remaining questions this afternoon, and in the meantime perhaps the item could stand? I should be happy to allow the matter to be then put forward as the minister has suggested, but I am entirely in his hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think I have been as reasonable in this case as anybody could be, and I think we should pass this item. I have given a specific ministerial assurance as to the attention that will be given to this matter. I cannot possibly be in position to give more information this afternoon than I can give now. I think my hon. friend has done his duty in presenting this case to parliament, and I think I have done my duty in giving him the assurance I have, that the case will be completely reviewed in conjunction and in consultation with the other services involved.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I accept the minister's word on this matter, because I know he will keep it, but I should like to have the opportunity this afternoon of putting the other questions on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Put them on now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have more time in order to have them more specific.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Surely my hon. friend knows in a general way what he wants to ask without having to be specific. Let us pass this item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to be very careful about the wording of my questions, because we are dealing with men and I do not want to hurt anybody's reputation. This question is likely to cast a cloud over some of these men who were charged with the responsibility of dealing with Lowell T. Campbell's case after he was admitted to Shaughnessy hospital. Apparently some of these men have been guilty either of culpable ignorance or of culpable dereliction of duty. We cannot blame a man for being without the knowledge which would enable him to diagnose, but we can blame him for neglecting to use the services of a man who had established himself as being able to diagnose.

Certain men dealt with Lowell T. Campbell on his admission to Shaughnessy hospital in 1945. An explanation should be given why these men took the measures they did, most of which resulted in a serious aggravation of Lowell T. Campbell's condition. They operated on him several times, making serious blunders. My information is that they treated him by injecting substances into his hip and buttocks, whereas the private doctor of aircraftman Campbell stated that before the man had gone into the hospital there had to be an operation.

I should like the minister to go into detail with regard to the decisions that were made regarding Lowell T. Campbell's treatment after he went into Shaughnessy hospital. It will be necessary for the minister to establish that those men were not derelict in their duty. The result of their work has been that Lowell T. Campbell apparently is unable to do the work which it is necessary for him to do in order to raise his splendid young family of five children, give them an education, and discharge his other responsibilities as a citizen.

Mr. MACKENZIE: With regard to my hon. friend's last question, I want to say that I think I know Shaughnessy hospital as well as anybody in Canada. If I can say it without being boastful, it is largely my own creation and is supposed to be the most efficient military hospital in the Dominion of Canada. Until recently the administrator there was George Derby, our western regional representative, one of the ablest men in the Department of Veterans Affairs. He had been twenty-seven years with the department. The present administrator is Mr. William Roaf, who distinguished himself overseas in the present war.

I do not know who the doctors were on this particular case, but the doctors at Shaughnessy are as efficient as any in the Dominion of Canada. I know that to be true. But I must tell my hon. friend that if he is making allegations of improper attention in this case I shall have a court of inquiry established at once. Of course that will take some time, and its findings will not be available for this session. But they will be available for the next session of parliament. I am absolutely satisfied in my own mind that we have as able a staff in Shaughnessy hospital as there is in any hospital in the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I agree completely with the minister. I am not making any allegations; I am just a poor, ordinary member of parliament—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not complaining.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —trying to help.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Let us get on with the work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This case has been brought before me; I should like to read to the minister the findings of Doctor Frank Emmons, this man's specialist, as made on December 4, 1944. As a result of this doctor's examination he found, and I quote the doctor's words:

> A rupture of two of the cartillagenous discs, cushioning the vertebral bones of the spine, with pressure on the spinal cord.

In the light of that diagnosis the minister will see the absurdity of such treatment as putting this man in a plaster cast, applying heat, and injecting substances into the buttocks and other parts of his body.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sure my hon. friend does not want me, a layman, to adjudge questions of medical treatment. We shall be glad to look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING ACT

CORPORATION TO RECEIVE LICENCE FEES—ADVANCES ON ACCOUNT OF CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The house resumed from Friday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. McCann for the second reading of bill No. 391, to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I had made a few remarks on the monopolistic position of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. With more and more power being placed in the hands of the corporation, the situation is getting worse. The corporation writes its own regulations, both for itself and for its competitors. It dictates to the private stations what they shall carry, and it controls completely the dissemination of all radio news when broadcast over its own network and indirectly, through restrictive orders, when carried over private stations. The corporation has power over all broadcasting, and there is no appeal from its decisions except through the channel of parliament. Yet it can be dominated by any political party which might favour the continuation of this semi-public system as the most important and powerful factor in political control. I think the country should be freed from this unhealthy state of affairs.

I think also that the private broadcasting stations should be afforded some relief. That is why they came before the parliamentary committee. From the evidence given before the committee there is no doubt that the corporation does not intend to give up the power it has unless it is forced to do so. As has been stated, it is in the peculiar position of holding in its own hands legislative, executive, judicial and police powers, and that pertains not only to its competitors but in some degree to the listeners as well, because C.B.C. can and does decide what the listener shall hear and when he shall hear it. With the development of television and facsimile the situation will get worse. The range of facsimile being so small, and the facsimile stations having to be fed from one source—a complete monopoly. I submit that no government which pretends to be democratic would allow such powers to be placed in the hands of the corporation. The Canadian Association of Broadcasters indicated how they had to go about making any representations to the corporation. The situation as stated by them, and this is on evidence in the record, was that they were required to state their case to the board of governors in the presence of senior officials of the C.B.C.—

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will broadcast a little louder, because his transmitter is somewhat weak.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think I need a new transmitter this morning. As I was saying, they are required to state their case in the presence of senior officials of the C.B.C. Then they retire, and in camera the board of governors hears and decides on their representations. No opportunity is given to the private broadcasters to make any rebuttal or to correct any misapprehensions there may be on the part of the board. It is said in the report that the private broadcasters have no grievance, but that method of hearing their representations is a serious grievance in itself. To me it seems intolerable. The one recommendation which the Canadian Association of Broadcasters made to the committee was one which they had reiterated for many years before former committees. It was this:

> We believe and recommend that the public interest would be served by creating a radio board of appeal—an independent tribunal holding open meetings to which both branches of the radio industry possess free access in the customary judicial manner.

This has been an urgent and burning question for some years, and although the report says "Your committee in making these suggestions desires very emphatically to declare that it is not even tentatively giving its blessing to the proposals," the committee was by no means unanimous on that point.

The position of CFRB has been dealt with ably by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). It is not for CFRB that I am speaking particularly, but for the metropolitan area of the city of Toronto, and farther afield than that, in connection with CFRB. Its coverage extends as far as London on one side on Kingston on the other and far to the north. There is no doubt that CFRB has given this area a splendid service. It was established before the committee that CFRB has the largest listening audience notwithstanding the two public stations of the C.B.C. serving this area. I am certainly not convinced by the evidence given before the committee that any better service can be given than is given by CFRB; nor am I convinced that we shall get as good a service by C.B.C. taking over that wave length. If CFRB is deprived of its present wave length, it will be required to spend at least $300,000 on new equipment, without compensation of any kind when it is assigned a new wave length. This is a very serious matter. I do not agree that no compensation should be paid. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot express any opinion on the legal position as to compensation. Certainly that is not a question for the committee to decide, but one for the courts. But not only that; at a time like this, when taxes are so high, the least we can expect is that a government or a government corporation should try to reduce its expenditures as much as possible. The taking over of these three wave lengths, in Calgary and Winnipeg and CFRB, Toronto, is going to cost the corporation anywhere from one to two million dollars; as a matter of fact nearer two million dollars.

The corporation in its operations over the last couple of years, instead of making money, has gone behind in the neighbourhood of $300,000. Also it has not set up a reserve. It is said that this is only a matter of bookkeeping, but the facts are clear: if you make a deficit and do not put up a reserve you have lost that much money.

Station CFRB have given a good service to the city and region. Thinking that they would be able to retain their wave length, at considerable expense over the years they have developed their facilities and have encouraged professional talent, in this respect doing something which a great many stations have not done. I have spoken to a good many professional people in the city, both on CFRB and CBL, and I know what they have been doing. I believe they deserve some consideration, as do the listeners of Toronto. Further than that, this private station CFRB has not cost the taxpayers of Canada one cent, and over the years has paid into the treasury taxes in the amount of $575,000. If C.B.C. takes over this wave length the corporation will be required to spend on the station they take over, for equipment for broadcasting alone, at least $300,000.

Private stations are being relegated to the position of subservient vassals of the C.B.C. by the policy of the broadcasting corporation. The very fact that it is said they like a broadcasting chain goes to show that they want to get on the chain, but instead of being developed they are being dominated more and more all the time. Mr. Dunton stated in the committee that in the scheme of radio there is a "big place" for local commercial stations. The national radio authority, he declaimed, sought to encourage their operation on a local basis, "under impartial and benign supervision." But it is abundantly clear that what he called "a big place" is destined to diminish to the point of being negligible, if not invisible, under the actual and ruthless application of C.B.C. policies.

I want to say a word about radio frequencies. We can go back to the time when Mr. Bennett had the investigation made and the commission set up. One reason for this was the increasing chaos in the field of broadcasting; things were getting in very bad shape. The second reason was that Canada was losing channels to the United States, and while the voice of the broadcasters singly could not be heard, the voice of the government of Canada diplomatically could be heard. Order was brought about through the North American conference, frequencies were allotted to Canada, and a Canadian programme was outlined. But times have changed very rapidly. Is Canada again going to lose and suffer more radio interference through the policy which the C.B.C. have followed of keeping down the power of stations which should go up? It seems to me it is a stupid policy. Not only that, but when the conference took place the officials and engineers of C.B.C. were the ones who were there making the arrangements. At that time the private broadcasters asked that they also be represented—they had a big stake—but that was not permitted. It is all very well to say that we have the best engineers in the country, and so on, but you know that in a big law case one does not depend on one person; he calls in counsel and gets their opinions. Canada is a country of approximately twelve million people scattered over a vast area. As time goes on, there is no doubt about it, we shall fill up and we shall need all the channels we can get for our broadcasting.

In regard to radio frequencies we had the evidence of Colonel Bailey, professor of electrical engineering at the university of Toronto, a man of very high standing, who did a great deal of secret work during the war for the government of Canada. He must be a good engineer; he received the O.B.E. for his services in a technical field. Profesor Bailey has been before the radio committee in times gone by, and has pointed out at various times that through the policy of the C.B.C. of keeping the power of stations down to one kilowatt and less, we were losing channels and that we will be losing more all the time. As a matter of fact I believe it was through his evidence that the new policy of allowing five kilowatts as the maximum for private stations was decided upon. I take a little credit to myself for that. But if this policy is still followed and we do not have our stations go up to full power, Canadian stations will be in a much inferior position and will be subject to more interference all the time from the United States. Professor Bailey stated at a meeting of the committee in 1943:

> I think that after the war is finished and we get the completion of the occupation of frequencies on the Havana agreement, we will be perturbed as to how small our coverage is, especially at night.

In his evidence on page 433 before the committee this year, in answer to a question which I asked him if, by keeping power down, we were in danger of more and more interference from the United States, he said:

> While admittedly the Toronto area is probably the worst area in Canada because it projects down so close to the American border, the tendency is more and more that people to the south of us are filling up the air with five to fifty times the speed which we are.

He gave some very interesting information as to the difficulties. As soon as possible we should give our stations the opportunity to go to their full power. If Canada has lost the full use of the channels which were allotted to her, and if she loses more in the future, the C.B.C. and government policy will be directly responsible for this arbitrary action.

It is wrong to say that we have two types of broadcasting in Canada. There are or should be three. We have a national system, a high-power network, but there are also the regional stations, of which no mention was made. A regional station such as CFRB could be more useful if it were high powered and it covers a larger area than a single community; but there are also the small community stations. Some of these stations are not really doing the job because they have been hampered by arbitrary limitations of their power. There should not be such limitations. In Canada to-day we have three networks; the trans-Canada, consisting of seven C.B.C. stations and seventeen basic stations affiliated with them, operating sixteen hours; the French network, three C.B.C. and eight basic stations affiliated with the C.B.C.; and then there is the dominion network which has one C.B.C. station and twenty-eight private stations.

The policy is to operate the dominion network longer, that is, to increase the number of hours on the air; and the reason given is that the listener should have a choice of two programmes. I agree that in certain parts of Canada there should be a choice of two programmes, but the private stations have not found it possible to bring this about. In my section there are a number of choices of programmes. There is a choice among many private stations; there is a choice among United States stations, so that Ontario listeners in that section have more than two selections.

Why spend the taxpayers money to give them more than they have now? It is better to use the private stations already established and let them go up to their full power in the meantime. Changes in radio to-day are so rapid that we do not know what will happen in the near future. Why not wait, therefore, for a year or two, and allow the private stations to go up to their full power? In fact, make them go up, instead of biting off more than you can chew and losing more money on the corporation in the next year or so.

The question of networks comes up. Without networks, stations cannot perform their proper function. There is no doubt about that. It was stated in the committee that the private stations could not be allowed to buy wire from the wire companies because C.B.C. had to have the use of the wire. But the C.B.C. does not use all the wires in Canada; there are many more. There is no reason why from time to time private stations should not be allowed to perform the function of network broadcasting, thus giving the people another choice. Not only should they be allowed to do it; I say they should be made to do it in the interests of the country.

A word now about radio fees. Last year we collected $4,260,379 and the cost of collection was $527,435, or about twelve per cent of the amount collected. These were licence fees for private receiving sets only. There were 1,745,916 licensees from whom we collected money last year. There is also the cost of policing, seeing to it that people pay their fees. There were 8,749 convictions last year. The sum of $2.50 is collected from a man who has one radio set and from the man who may have fifteen sets. That is what is paid, and the old pensioner has to pay the same sum, $2.50, for his receiving set. There is no justice in that. But why should a person, because he has a radio, have to pay a licence? Why should not the person who listens pay, whether he has a set or not?

An hon. MEMBER: You might as well pay a licence fee for a washing machine.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes. There is no rhyme or reason in it and it ought to be cut out. Apart from these 1,745,916 licences that were issued, I wonder how many more ought to have been sold. I do not think it is possible to see that everyone pays the licence fee.

So far as the minister's own department is concerned, I have made a rough calculation and I believe it costs eight tenths of one per cent to collect his whole revenue, and here is twelve per cent being paid to collect these licence fees, or a loss to the people of Canada of $527,500. The minister asked me in the committee whether I had a suggestion to make. I have. The corporation must have a limitation upon the amount they should have. Taking the collections amounting to $4,260,000, and the population of 12,000,000 so that is roughly 33 cents per capita. Suppose we gave the corporation forty cents per capita; that would be a basis on which to suggest how much money they could spend. Many people do not like to be bothered with this licence fee, especially nowadays when nobody may be in when the collector of the fees calls; or the householder may have forgotten to buy the licence and someone comes to the door and tries to collect. It is a nuisance, and it is ridiculous to have these people prosecuted as criminals for not paying their licence fee.

As I said at the beginning, it is about time we had an independent tribunal set up—not a political parliamentary committee, because that is what committees always are—to review the whole question of radio broadcasting in Canada. The report which is now before us might just as well have been written by the C.B.C. In fact I almost thought it was when I went to the meeting. There is no criticism in it. It is the greatest piece of whitewashing that I have ever seen.

Although the C.B.C. have done a good job —I am not uncritical of them—what is needed is a revision of the act, and it should be done as soon as possible.

I shall not discuss the bill now. I shall wait until we get into committee.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I rise at this time to make a few remarks about this bill, and to criticize some of its provisions and also some of the omissions from the report and from the bill.

First of all may I say that as one who listened to the speech of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett when the bill setting up the C.B.C. was introduced, I should like to correct one general misinterpretation. Those of us who sat in the house at that time did not visualize or realize the C.B.C. set-up which we have to-day. I say that unqualifiedly. Those of us who listened to the speeches on that bill visualized something like the Canadian National Railways. We visualized a set-up like the present air service, so that if anybody wanted to enter into competition with the Trans-Canada Air Lines they would go before a different board entirely and ask for a licence. If you want to run a railway you do not go before the Canadian National Railways, and ask for permission. The same principle applies to air services. I think we should definitely keep that in mind, when discussing the C.B.C.

I have heard the leader of the C.C.F. and some hon. members on this side say that there is something wrong now when we criticize the C.B.C. When I have taken exception to some of the things that have happened they say to me: "You voted for it, didn't you?" Of course I voted for it, but I doubt whether I would vote for it to-day if it came before the house, particularly in the light of what has taken place since the commission was set up.

Nothing much was done on the committee, and I am not making any carping criticism of the members of that committee with regard to the appeal board, but anyone who has had any experience at all in going before the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I have, cannot help but feel if there is one thing needed more than another it is a board to whom the public and the people of Canada can appeal when unjust decisions are made.

I want the Minister of National War Services (Mr. McCann) and the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) to consider the case I have in mind. In the city of New Westminster we were good enough to have a licence for a radio station granted. It was meant to serve the district and the city of New Westminster. The owner of that station was given a frequency of 1230 on the dial and 250 watt power. After they had been in operation they experienced a great deal of criticism from the stations in Vancouver because of the aggressiveness and the splendid programmes put out by the owner of the station. Protests were made to the C.B.C. that the station in New Westminster was crippling them. It was not long before we found out that 250 and 1230 on the dial covered only a certain portion of the district. During the day you could hear the station fairly well for a distance of about twenty miles out; but those living close to the boundary found that at night time there was so much interference from radio stations across the line that it practically blacked out radio station CKNW. Therefore an appeal was made by the owner of CKNW to have a change made. I do not like to say this, but I think he made the unfortunate error of asking a member of parliament to assist him. I know there are a lot of carping statements made about the interference, so-called of a member of parliament. I am making no apology, for when one of my constituents appeals to me and tells me that he believes an injustice has been done I shall make some representations on his behalf. I maintain that it is the duty of a member of parliament, if he is truly representing his people, when an appeal is made to him with regard to an injustice, to see what he can do about it. An appeal was made after being refused by the C.B.C. Since we were sitting in Ottawa I was asked to go before the board, and I did so. I think perhaps it was a mistake, because it was intimated quietly to me that it was just too bad for a member of parliament to appear on behalf of anyone.

Taking the view of the leader of the C.C.F. that politics should be kept out of it, I wish to say to him that if he wants to represent his people fully and truthfully and faithfully he will fight for them when he believes they have a grievance. Apparently it is now felt by some that it is wrong for a member of parliament to listen to an appeal. If a man has a case before the Canadian pension board and fails, are we to tell him when he comes to us that it is political interference? Will any member of parliament care to do that? It is up to us to fight on behalf of our constituents when we feel they have a case. Parliament is the court of last appeal. If any member of parliament cannot be appealed to on any matter, then democracy is gone. I view with alarm what has taken place in the past.

Let me return to the case to which I was referring. Station CKNW was allotted, as I said before, 1230 on the dial. The only other station on the same wave band is in the district represented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). That station is located at Prince George and appears at 1250 on the dial. Prince George is in the interior.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. REID: When the house rose at one o'clock I had been dealing with the high-handed methods, or what I termed the high-handed methods, of the C.B.C. in dealing with appeals which came before them from private stations. I am going to repeat what I said, because I think it is worth repeating. I was pointing out that when the C.B.C. was set up, not a man in this House of Commons ever visualized that it would ever have or obtain the control and authority it has to-day.

I have maintained that we are acting dangerously for our democracy in that we are taking a heritage of the people, and not making the board responsible to the people. We have in fact set up a board which is above the people themselves. I had mentioned that perhaps it was unfortunate that I appeared before the board on behalf of the local station in the city of New Westminster—at least that is my view, until I get a better answer as to why they refused the application. Until I get that answer I will stay by the statement I am now making. Be that as it may, the residents in the Fraser valley, twenty miles or more out from the city of New Westminster, found that this radio station was practically blacked out at night time. They have a frequency of 1230 on the dial, and because these people live close to the boundary line the frequencies allowed United States stations come in, with the result that radio programmes presented over CKNW after six o'clock at night are not heard twenty miles away—in fact sometimes only sixteen miles—from the radio station.

The owner applied for a change in that frequency. To prove what I am saying regarding the high-handedness of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, may I point out that there are only two stations in British Columbia which have a frequency of 1230 on the dial, and 250 watt power. The other station is some 600 miles away, and conditions are such at that point that, even if the station in Prince George had 5,000 or 10,000 watts, we in the valley and in Vancouver and New Westminster would not hear the Prince George station. That is well known, because I believe even the Vancouver station, with over 5,000 watt power, is not heard beyond the mountains. Prince George is just through the mountains so that their radio station with a low power of 250 watts, and 1230 on the dial covers only a small district around Prince George. As I say there could be no reason at all for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to reject the application made by the local station in New Westminster to change the frequency because it was not interfering with, nor would it interfere with, any other station in British Columbia. Oh, yes; it did interfere with some of the larger stations who, shall I say, became a little bit jealous because the station for which the licence was granted in New Westminster soon became one of the most popular stations in the Vancouver-New Westminster area. I do not know whether the committee studied what I am going to mention, but I have looked through the report and I cannot find mention of it anywhere. I am subject to correction, of course. I cannot find where they discussed whether the C.B.C. was as popular, or discussed its popularity as compared with that of private stations.

Let me tell you why I am asking that question. I have here—and private individuals are not supposed to have them because they are given only to radio stations—a publication put out by a firm in Toronto called Eric Hayes Limited. This company goes out and take surveys, similar to gallup polls, among radio listeners. For instance, they telephone to housewives and say, "Are you listening to the radio?" Mostly the reply will be "Yes". The next question asked is, "What station are you listening to, and what programme?" With this information they turn out a report each week to every private radio station. This report, which I hold in my hand, shows the following, that the programmes of the C.B.C. have the least number of listeners in the New Westminster-Vancouver area, or a lesser number than those of the private stations. I do not know whether the committee discussed that matter or that phase of it. But if they did not, I suggest that when the committee meets next year they certainly should take it up, and try to get an opinion on the question whether C.B.C. programmes hold a place in the public life and confidence of our people as favourably as that held by private stations.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I tell the hon. member that that was discussed, and evidence was given with respect to the Toronto area. It disclosed the same condition in that area that the hon. member has mentioned with respect to British Columbia, namely that CFRB in Toronto, according to the Hayes rating, was above the C.B.C. 50,000-watt station in Toronto.

Mr. REID: I thank the hon. member for that information. So that we in the cities of New Westminster and Vancouver are not alone in the matter to which I have just referred.

I am going to continue with one further point. In the report of the committee and in the bill before us there is a proposal to increase fees. Yes—not exactly to increase fees; they are not honest about it, because they are actually increasing licence fees in a subtle way. Why do they not come out boldly before the public and say, "We need an extra fifty cents"? They will get pretty close to forty cents from the people of Canada, because the cost of collecting those fees is not going to be deducted, if this bill passes, from the $2.50 radio fee. In other words, Mr. Speaker, about fifty per cent of our people who have no radios, and no licences for radios, are going to be taxed for the collecting of fees. If you take the number of licensed owners as 1,745,916, and multiply it by four, which would be the average number listening in on each radio in any home, you will find it comes to about seven million people. So that there must be about five million people who do not listen to radios, or who have no radios at all. But these people are going to contribute to the public treasury of Canada a sum running up to $500,000 to pay for the collection of radio fees for which they receive no benefit. As I say, it is one of those subtle ways of raising the licence fee. Why do they not come to the people of Canada and say, "Look here, we are giving you first-class programmes"—which is a debatable point—"we want more money, and we recommend that the licence fee be raised by twenty-five to fifty cents." But no, they know that would not be popular. That however is the test. If the C.B.C. stands high in the estimation of the people of Canada they would gladly agree to an increase in the licence fee. Just note that they are not proposing to the people of Canada in this report that they raise the licence fee, they are doing so however, and that is one of the reasons why I am going to oppose the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: No, you won't oppose it.

Mr. REID: Did I hear someone say no? I sat over there once, and watched the scene over here. The hon. member who has just interjected knows that what I am doing is for the people of this country—and that is the only reason that is prompting me. I am trying to safeguard the interests of the general public when I speak to-day. Oh, I know that if you want the emoluments of office, or if you want to be put into the senate, or want recognition as a cabinet minister, you had better slap backs, not slam them. I know that. I have seen men do it. I have been here sixteen years. I was elected by the people of New Westminster constituency, and I have always considered I have a duty to all those people. I have never been afraid to get up here and champion their cause, without looking for personal reward. If I had been looking for personal reward from the government I might have been a back-slapper and everyone knows what that means. I am also going to try to keep this government Liberal, if I can.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have undertaken a life time job.

Mr. REID: The trouble is that I might have to live too long to do that. I am sincere however, in my opposition to this. It may not be popular in my riding or in the government. I feel keenly about this usurpation of power which belongs to the Canadian people, this placing of power in the hands of boards which are becoming our masters rather than our servants. Every time I know that a man is up against any body or official I am going to do my utmost to see that justice is rendered; for where else can the appeal be taken?

While one of the hon. members from Toronto was speaking the other night I asked him a question. I was wondering whether he was in favour of giving newspapers the right to operate radio stations. This is something we should be very careful about. The newspaper is one of our media of free expression, and it is able to control news and other items which it publishes. If a man however is denied his rights, if he is not permitted the use of a newspaper, he should be able, if he wishes, to use the radio to tell the people about it. If the same people are to also have control of the radio station that in my opinion would be placing too much power in the hands of one person or business concern. I am going to suggest that when the committee meets next year it deal with this very matter and bring in a recommendation that newspapers be not also granted the right to operate radio stations.

I know everyone wants to get home, and I may be accused of delaying the house, but I felt that I must get up in my place and say what I have. I contend that there should be an appeal board. I have referred to the case of CKNW in New Westminster, which found itself thwarted because the corporation would not grant it its just request. I went before the corporation with this case on the suggestion of a minister. I asked if it would be all right, and he suggested that I go before the C.B.C. This was a worthy case and there was no reason why this station should not have been permitted a change in frequency or granted more power. It would not have interfered with any other station. Their present frequency of 250 covers the Vancouver area. The nearest station having a greater frequency was 600 miles away at Prince George. For this and other reasons I am protesting against the present bill.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has made a most gracious speech, and one with which I can agree very largely. I take it that we are discussing two things to-day, the report of the radio committee and the bill which is before us for second reading. Inasmuch as I was not a member of the committee I must confine myself to the discussion of the bill.

Before saying what I have to say I should like to pay a tribute to the men who pioneered radio and brought it to the state of efficiency that existed a considerable time before there was any Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Those men performed a signal service for the people of Canada. I should also like to pay a tribute to the group of private stations which are performing a great service for this country and which are assisting the achievement of a standard of democracy evidenced by the reports that have been made to the people through the broadcasts known as "Reports from parliament hill." Their representatives have been very helpful, especially their genial manager, Mr. James Allard. This does not say that I am not also appreciative of the services rendered by the C.B.C.

I do not intend this afternoon to debate the question of government ownership of radio. Last night I thought that we were getting into that sort of debate. About all I heard from my friends to my immediate right was the need for more and more overriding ownership of radio by the C.B.C. As a matter of fact radio in Canada to-day is under the control of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is a fait accompli, so there is no sense in our discussing the merits or demerits of government ownership at this stage. However, I think the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) was presumptuous when he attempted to compare the merits of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its administration of affairs in Canada with what is being done in the United States by private corporations. It seems to me that the people in the United States are pretty happy with their arrangements. Who is the leader of the C.C.F. to say they are not satisfied? If they were not satisfied they would change and get something like the C.B.C. or worse.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been given wide powers, and it is my observation that they have assumed some powers that were not intended to be given. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has said, they have been entrusted with great responsibilities—we might even say, with sacred responsibilities. I should like to mention some of these. One of their sacred and grave responsibilities is to give the people of Canada clean and wholesome entertainment, to provide cultural education. They have the obligation to bring to the people factual information in the form of news. We all listen to the newscasts which are an important part of the work of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is also their obligation to present over the waves points of view on events, both current and historical, by means of what we call commentaries. That also is an important responsibility. Then they have the obligation of presenting political and economic programmes to stimulate the thinking of the people. Finally, they are to control the airwaves of Canada in the national interest.

How well the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has measured up to these responsibilities can be judged only in the light of its record. I believe the corporation has done some good work and a number of commendable things. I believe it has filled a need in Canadian life. I am not in position to criticize the idea of having a corporation like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but I certainly have criticism to make of the powers that have been assumed and the way in which they have been exercised by the C.B.C.

It is not always realized, nor is it always remembered, that sacred responsibilities are usually accompanied by great danger. In the case of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that danger is definitely to the Canadian people as a whole, and not merely to the members of the corporation. Dangers are inherent in the type of set-up represented by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and it seems to me it is of urgent necessity that this parliament build up adequate safeguards against them. I do not mean against the corporation, but against dangers inherent in that particular set-up, so that the responsibilities of the corporation may be discharged as fully as possible without in any way endangering the things that Canadians hold most dear.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the very freedom of the Canadian people is at stake. It does not require very much vision to see that personal freedom is rapidly being put in jeopardy in Canada. I am not pretending for one moment that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is alone responsible for this condition. I would say it is a result of a combination of circumstances and of forces that are at work in our society. But while the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is an institution potentially capable of bringing the understanding of the Canadian people up to that point where freedom is made secure in Canada and where democracy is real and virile, that same institution is perfectly capable of contributing in very large measure to the enslavement of the people under a totalitarian state. Adequate safeguards against such a dreadful contingency have not in my judgment been provided by the government and this parliament. There is still plenty of room for either malevolence or stupidity to get in their deadly work within the organization of the corporation. I am not so sure that some of it has not been in evidence over the years.

One great danger of government by commission, especially monopoly commission, is that the commissions are apt to become very powerful and a law unto themselves. They become sacrosanct, so that very few people in the land have the courage to criticize them or to demand a thorough investigation of their affairs. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is fast becoming a law unto itself, and I suggest too that there has been developed a sacrosanctity about the corporation which in time could remove it entirely from the realm of democratic and parliamentary control. It would be a very sorry day for Canada if that should happen.

One of the main reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been able to exercise authoritarian power and has been able to assume wider and wider powers as the days have gone by, is that there never has been a well-defined government policy laid down to guide them. That has been perfectly evident. This afternoon I am going to give to the members of this house an example of the abuse of power by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to illustrate the effects of a lack of a well-defined government policy to guide it. I am also going to say that this material which I shall present indicates the existence of a condition which is a complete prostitution of the responsibility of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In 1927 the university of Alberta purchased a broadcasting station from a private corporation which was operating in the city of Edmonton. In 1939 certain capital funds were required by the station if it were to perform the functions for which it was purchased from the private corporation. Accordingly an application was made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in that year for an increase in the power of the station from 500 to 1,000 watts, and also for permission to enter into the commercial advertising field as a means of assisting the university to pay the expenses of the larger and more powerful station. The university in that year was granted permission to increase the power of the station up to 1,000 watts, but it was refused the commercial privileges. The university therefore was compelled to seek assistance from the provincial government in the form of a grant. They did obtain that assistance to the extent of $25,000, and immediately set about to increase the power of the station. Between 1939 and June, 1944, the university, in connection with the educational pursuits of that institution and in collaboration with the Department of Education, developed one of the finest and most outstanding examples of education by radio that has ever been developed in America. This experiment, which proved finally to be a very wise and important one, resulted in the establishment of the School of the Air through which more than a thousand boys and girls in the far reaches of the northern part of Alberta were enabled to complete their high school courses by correspondence and by radio instruction. Anyone desiring to investigate the effects and the results of that experiment can apply to the university of Alberta for a brochure that has been issued called the Chalmers' report on the School of the Air.

The station was found not to be adequate to the needs in the frontier places, and as a result, the university decided that they should step up the power further, beyond 1,000 watts, and rebuild the station, relocate the transmitter and build a new studio that would take care of the demands for space and of the equipment which they required. After discussing the matter with me while I was in the department of education it was decided in June, 1944, that the university should make an agreement with the Alberta Government Telephones for a transfer of the licence held by the university of Alberta for CKUA on the channel 580 kilocycles, and for power of 1,000 watts. Accordingly an agreement was reached between the Department of Telephones and the university for that transfer. The reasons that were given to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the time for desiring that transfer were these. A very large additional grant would become necessary if the university were to carry on the station themselves. This large additional grant would throw out of balance the per capita tuition costs of the university of Alberta as compared with the costs of other universities, and it was felt that that would put the university at a disadvantage in attracting students from other quarters of the globe.

The second reason was that in view of the existing procedure with respect to government accounting at that time, the disposition of funds by the university was not subject to scrutiny in the legislature as it would be if the operation of the station were in the hands of Department of Telephones.

The third reason was that the Department of Telephones of the government had the engineers and technicians and the transmission lines over which the network arrangements had to be made. They had the money, and they had the management to make a real success of the operation of the station CKUA. This was no means a unique arrangement. Already in the province of Manitoba the Manitoba Telephone Department had been operating for some years two radio stations, CKX and CKY.

The fourth reason why the government and the university desired that this transfer be made was this. The people through their representatives in the legislature twice passed, by overwhelming majorities, resolutions to the effect that the transfer should be made. There is no better reason in the world than the expressed wishes of the people.

Another application accompanied the application for transfer of licence. This was an application for a private commercial broadcasting station licence. I contend that this was a reasonable request, for the following reasons. In the first place, the frequency of 580 kilocycles with a 1000 watt power gave station CKUA a very large listening audience. In the next place, from surveys made it was evident that Edmonton could readily support three commercial stations, having at that time only CFRN and CJCA. Calgary, with a similar situation and a smaller listening audience, has supported three commercial stations for some years. Particulars of the surveys and supporting statistics were filed, along with the application for the private commercial licence. It was pointed out at the time the application was made that radio station CKUA could not possibly compete with existing commercial stations in Edmonton on a fully competitive basis, by reason of the fact that the university would be given first call upon such time as they required to continue the regular university programmes and also to enlarge the educational programmes generally, both for themselves and for the department of education. The policy of the government of Canada expressed through the policies of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was that radio stations should be operated on a commercial basis. I make that contention, supported by the following evidence.

Various unsuccessful attempts over the years have been made by the university of Alberta to obtain from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation financial assistance in providing educational programmes. I say, unsuccessfully; that was in itself a tacit admission that the stations were expected to be operating on a commercial or semi-commercial basis. Further than that, in April 1943, in response to the university's application for a commercial broadcasting licence, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation indicated its approval—I want you to note that, Mr. Speaker—of a commercial licence, subject to these two conditions: first, that the gross advertising revenue for CKUA should not exceed $25,000 per annum; and second, if CKUA took in any existing business from CFRN, then in Edmonton, the commercial licence of CKUA might be cancelled. I maintain that never has such an authoritarian thing as that been done by any government commission in Canada before this, in my time and within my knowledge. I do say, however, that this approval, although qualified, establishes the principle of the right of CKUA to a commercial licence; and further, it indicates that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation policy was dictated, not by the needs of the people, but by the financial appeals of the Edmonton station CFRN.

I suggest, sir, that any objection to permitting a university-owned and operated station to enter into commercial broadcasting had certainly disappeared by virtue of the fact that station CKUA by this time was the property of the Alberta Government Telephones, and that the relationship between Alberta Government Telephones and CKUA was almost identical, if not identical, with the relationship that existed between the Manitoba telephone system and radio station CKY in Winnipeg and CKX in Brandon.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, at the time the application was made, were assured that they could expect the same cooperation from the radio department of the Alberta Government Telephones as they were then receiving from the radio department of the Manitoba telephone system. The province of Alberta felt, with perfect reason, that it was entitled to exercise its right of ownership of radio station CKUA by engaging in the business of commercial broadcasting. The C.B.C. contended that if CKUA were granted a commercial licence it would detrimentally affect radio station CFRN. There is no force at all in that contention, for the reason that CKUA had no affiliation with a broadcasting corporation, either the trans-Canada network or the dominion network, as did the other stations in Edmonton. CFRN had affiliations with and was sustained by fees—large fees every year, from the dominion network of the C.B.C. CJCA, the other station in Edmonton, which, by the way, was the top money maker for 1,000 watt stations in the whole of the Dominion of Canada—and that is an important point and has a bearing on this whole case—was affiliated with the trans-Canada network, and received from C.B.C. large fees to sustain it in the field, in addition to its commercial gatherings. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the statistics which were submitted by the department of telephones to the government of Alberta at the time indicated very clearly that the Edmonton area afforded ample business for three radio stations.

An objection was raised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that radio station CKUA, being government owned, would pay no income tax, while the other competing stations would be subject to payment of income tax. The answer to that proposition is that this identical situation existed in the province of Manitoba with respect to CKX and CKY.

To cut a long story short, eventually, after several months of deliberation and handing it back from one board or bureau to another, Mr. Walter A. Rush, the controller of radio, notified the department of telephones in Edmonton that C.B.C. had recommended a denial of the application, and he did so in the following terms:

In reply to your inquiry, I may say that the board of governors—

I want hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to note this particularly.

—have not recommended favourably on your application for a transfer of the licence of radio station CKUA from the university of Alberta to the department of telephones of the government of Alberta for commercial operation, for the following reasons:

Having noted that the present licence to CKUA—

Note the barefaced audacity of that.

—was issued for educational broadcasting purposes, and having reviewed all circumstances surrounding the radio station in Edmonton with respect to the commercial field, the board feels obliged to recommend denial of this application for transfer of the licence.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What date is that?

Mr. LOW: That is dated August 25, 1944. Now, I was interested in finding out whether or not the licence had actually been granted to radio station CKUA for educational purposes only, and this is what I found. Mr. Clem L. King, executive assistant to the president of the university, examined personally the licences, and this is the statement which he provided:

So far as I have been able to determine, the licence was secured by purchase from an Edmonton company which had a commercial licence. The licence then issued——to the university of Alberta was a private commercial licence.

In 1927.

He further says:

The licences were issued as private commercial licences prior to April 1, 1941, and the first licence upon which any restrictions as to the basis of operation appeared was that for the year April 1, 1941 to March 31, 1942. This restriction read as follows:

"This licence is issued subject to the condition that the station be operated on a non-commercial basis."

I have already pointed out that following that, in 1943, when the university of Alberta made application to the C.B.C. for a commercial licence, they were granted permission to have such licence on a restricted basis. I have already pointed out that the station was to be restricted to an income of $25,000 per annum gross, and secondly they were told they could not take any business from CFRN. Now, who were CFRN that they had to be protected by the C.B.C.? As a result of the refusal of the board to grant a licence in 1944 the government of Alberta, after making further applications and being turned down, then made application for a powerful station of 50,000 watts to be set up at Red Deer with power enough to serve the great northland. The application was refused.

I suspect that right here was born in the minds of C.B.C. the idea that they had better get in to Alberta and put up a 50,000 watt station somewhere before the province of Alberta made itself too vocal. I am satisfied that had pressure not been put on by the department of telephones and the university of Alberta we would never have this present move by the C.B.C. to take over the channel now held by CFCN in Calgary.

Mr. HACKETT: Who is the owner of the station whose income of $25,000 a year had to be protected?

Mr. LOW: The Sunwapta Broadcasting Company, which is affiliated with the Edmonton Bulletin.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the Edmonton Bulletin?

Mr. LOW: That is a Liberal paper. I do not know whether that has anything to do with it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a coincidence.

Mr. LOW: I have given the facts with respect to this whole business, and I give them simply to show to the members of this house, and to get it on the record for the people of the country, what we are up against in relation to this fast growing and ever expanding octopus or Frankenstein monster the C.B.C. I believe it would be well for parliament to reject the bill now before the house at least for this session. I do not favour in any way the expansion of the C.B.C. until such time as we have assured ourselves that we have built up adequate safeguards against a system of creeping paralysis that is being cooked up for Canadians by forces behind the scenes for the definite purpose of curtailing individual right of free speech and free thinking in Canada.

I am not accusing the C.B.C. of being the force in society that is cooking it up. There are plenty of others that are doing that—cooking up, I say, a definite curtailment of the right of free speech and free thinking in Canada. I do not want in any way to lend my hand or to contribute to the creation of a bigger Frankenstein monster until we have learned how to control the one that we have.

There are four short suggestions which I should like to make, and which I think would be adequate to keep the government busy until next session at least. I like to be constructive, and I do not want the minister to feel that I am criticizing him. I know he is new in the business and has his hands full. However, I should like to be helpful, and in everything I do I hope I shall always strive to be constructive.

I think the government should busy itself in the drafting of a well defined policy subject to complete review by this parliament every year; that it should be satisfactory to the people of Canada; that it should be laid down in no indefinite terms—a policy which will at least make certain that the oyster does not control the man rather than the man the oyster. When I was on the west coast some years ago a native showed me with pride the great oysters produced out there, almost as big as my hand. Those were the oysters they could produce in the warm waters off the coast, and they told me there was a tradition there that men did not know whether the oyster controlled the man or the man the oyster. I believe, when I see what the C.B.C. has been doing, that it is high time we decided whether parliament shall control the C.B.C. or whether the C.B.C. shall control the people. Instead of section 2, subsection 4, of the bill as it is now before us, I suggest that the general manager and board of governors of the C.B.C. should all be removable at any time for cause—observe, I say for cause—without our having to submit to the condition that the recommendation shall come from the board itself. That condition I suggest, is a monstrous thing, and I shall fight it every step of the way. Imagine expecting us to put in a general manager who may be removable for cause at any time—how? On the recommendation of the corporation! Bless my soul! Talk about making a closed corporation to get them away from the control of parliament and to enhance their sacrosanctity! No. I cannot believe that is the thing to do. It certainly is not a safeguard against the potential power and danger in such a set-up as the C.B.C.

My next suggestion is this. I believe that the policy laid down by the government should allow competitive networks of private stations in the provinces. The proposal made by my colleague the hon. member for Macleod last night is an excellent one. I do not know just what way could be found to do it, whether it would be wise to grant a certain channel to each province to be used as they see fit, either for a government-owned station or for a privately-owned concern, but I do say that there should be left sufficient private stations in the province to take care of local needs, and also to be able to form networks whenever they think it wise and desirable in order to get to the people the things the people want.

There is no argument under the sun that can convince the members of this house and the people at large that the C.B.C., from its regional stations, can meet the needs of all the various localities in the dominion. They cannot do it. We have built up in Alberta a fine listening audience around CFCN in Calgary, with a certain desirable wave channel. I understand the C.B.C. proposes to take over that channel and set up a great 50,000 watt regional station.

Mr. McCANN: That is from the Liberal newspaper you were criticizing.

Mr. LOW: I do not think it was from the Liberal newspaper.

Mr. McCANN: You say it is CFCN.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): CFCN has nothing to do with any newspaper in the world.

Mr. LOW: I said CFRN. At least I intended to say CFRN.

Mr. McCANN: I beg your pardon.

Mr. LOW: I hold in my hand a map showing the area in which the facilities of this proposed new C.B.C. station should give service. I notice that the station is to be located somewhere about Red Deer. Is that not a coincidence? I wonder what put that idea into the minds of the C.B.C. Furthermore there is a large circle around the area in which the station would serve the people. I notice that the area of coverage is entirely in the southern half of the province, in the populated areas which are now adequately served by the private stations, and it does not extend into the far north at all. The station which the university of Alberta, in conjunction with the department of telephones, had proposed to put up at Red Deer was designed to cover that whole north, and would have covered it. We had in mind, sir, that the American broadcasting services were to be withdrawn. I understand that they have since been withdrawn and that their directional transmissions into that great north land have been discontinued. These people in the north need facilities; they need broadcasting programmes of every description in that north country. As time goes on the need will become greater. I cannot see anything in the present proposals of the C.B.C. in setting up the regional station which can possibly serve the needs of these people in the north country.

There is one other thing. The C.B.C. already have a regional station at Watrous, Saskatchewan. I live away down in the very southwestern part of Alberta, and at almost any hour of the day or night when Watrous is on the air we get the signal clear and strong enough to suit our needs. Who will answer this question: why in the name of common sense does C.B.C. have to come into Alberta and take away the channel which has been used so successfully in building up the finest listening audience in the populated sections of western Canada when they could not possibly present a programme which could in any way take its place?

It is argued of course that the air waves are the property of the people of Canada. I agree, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Macleod in his splendid address last night, but that does not mean that the air waves are the sole property of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I say to you, sir, that the people themselves have some rights, and they should have the right to speak their mind. I submit to you, that they are already doing that. The statistics covering the listening audiences will amply demonstrate exactly what they are thinking.

The fourth suggestion that I should like to make is that there should be a board of appeal, as was suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I thought that was a splendid idea. I do not know why it was that I thought of it; perhaps it was a case of two minds thinking alike; but certainly there must be a board of appeal. I noted in the correspondence between the university of Alberta, the government telephone department of Alberta and the various departments down here in Ottawa including the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's offices, the Prime Minister's office, the Minister of Transport's office, and the Minister of Reconstruction's office, all of which correspondence I have before me, that nobody seemed to know exactly who had the responsibility to do what. Everybody seemed to rely entirely upon the advice of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's board, as has already been pointed out two or three times. I do not need to labour the point. Certainly the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation cannot give just administration when it sits in the chair of both the judge and jury; nor can it, as the hon. member for Macleod said, give justice if it is the pitcher and at the same time is allowed to call the strikes. I say, too, that we should exercise care in selecting the board of appeal. If there had been a board of appeal to whom the university of Alberta could have gone in 1944 we would not have had nearly the difficulty we did have, and there would not have been the miscarriage of justice that there was in connection with that station.

I wish to say a word about commentators. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should exercise great care, much greater care than they have ever exercised before, in the selection of commentators. There, sir, is one of the gravest responsibilities resting upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the present time. People should be told who their commentators are; they should be told what philosophy they follow. Too often men posing as commentators find their way into a position without the people knowing who they are, what they are, and what philosophy they follow. As a result of day after day broadcasting they are able to mould the thinking of the people, and direct it into channels which may be questionable and injurious. They are able to pour out uncalculated quantities of that type of poison which brings results such as we have suffered from in this country, namely, discordant loyalties. It is high time that we began to use much more care in their selection. I have no objection to any person getting on the radio, to any particular philosophy having its spokesman over the radio, but I do say that the people ought to know who they are and what they represent. If they know that they can make up their minds whether to listen and whether to believe. The position of commentator is a most important one, and the commentator should be chosen with care.

I am certain that no one in this house, if he stops to think at all, wants to see the people of Canada forced into a straitjacket where free speech and free thinking are the privilege only of those who control the daily lives of the people. I do not, and I shall fight against any such possibility with all my strength. I will not support the bill now. When I am certain that our freedom is assured and that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in reality subject to the democratic control of the Canadian people, then I shall be pleased to vote for the appropriation of as much money as they may require to take care of their expansion, their research and their activities.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I do not intend to traverse the ground covered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) and other hon. members on this side who have discussed various phases of the report and the bill now before the house. I think it is generally agreed that no report could have been written by the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation more highly impregnated with the wishes, the desires, the aims and the purposes of the governing body, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, than is contained within the report of the committee.

As I view the situation, in recent years a very great change has taken place in the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. First its primary purpose was public service. In recent years there has been a constant trend toward making this corporation a great and overwhelming advertising medium. In that connection I just have to go back and read a few remarks which I made in February, 1944, when discussing this matter in the house, to indicate that that trend toward stifling competition in the matter of advertising is more and more becoming the concern of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Originally it was intended that in no case should advertising exceed $500,000 a year. By 1940 the commercial revenue of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was $700,000. In 1941 it was $895,000; in 1942 it was $1,019,000; in 1943 it was $1,204,000; in 1944-45 it had jumped to $1,639,000, and the estimate for 1945-46 is $1,683,000.

When I point out these facts and these criticisms I intend particularly to make it abundantly clear that regardless of the views of others, it is my personal view that in this country there is the necessity for a government-owned national corporation for broadcasting. But in saying that I wish to make it clear that I am opposed to monopolies. I believe there is being created in this country a monopoly which, unless it is restricted, will ultimately control the thought of this country.

So far as the present bill is concerned, it might be summed up in a few words. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, under this bill, asks from parliament more cash. It asks from parliament a ratification of its policy of less and less competition. It asks from parliament a declaration of its supremacy of control over radio in this country—itself uncontrolled.

Section 22 of the broadcasting act sets out the powers in these words:

> 22. (1) The corporation may make regulations . . .
> (b) to prescribe the periods to be reserved periodically by any private station for the broadcasting of programmes of the corporation;
> (c) to control the character of any and all programmes broadcast by corporation or private stations;
> (d) to determine the proportion of time which may be devoted to advertising in any programmes broadcast by the stations of the corporation or by private stations, and to control the character of such advertising.

Those are a few of the powers. The penalty for infraction of any of the decisions made by the corporation is as follows:

> In case of any violation or non-observance by a private station of the regulations made by the corporation under this section, the corporation may order that the licence of such private station be suspended for a period not exceeding three months and any such order shall be forwarded to the minister who shall forthwith communicate the same to the licensee of the station, and shall take such steps as may be necessary to carry out the terms of such order.

What does this mean? It means that we have set up a corporation that is above any authority, that can make regulations to govern private stations, and, having made the regulations, has the power to interpret them. It may issue directives not included in the regulations, and those directives are binding upon the private stations. Having issued the directives, regardless of whether they are fair or not, or justified under the law, they have the power to interpret the application of those directives. Furthermore they can withhold power increases and change frequencies. In other words, we have in the hands of this corporation an absolute power, uncontrolled in any way by an organization such as is found in the board of transport commissioners.

When I spoke in the house in 1944—and for a period of years others have taken the same view—I pointed out that there should be set up a body such as was recommended in the opening address of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), some judicial body similar to the board of transport commissioners which would determine whether or not the C.B.C. is carrying out the will of parliament in the decisions its makes respecting private stations. I said this:

> The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is more and more becoming a commercial corporation, its board of governors enjoying almost monopolistic control over its competitors. Private stations in competition with the broadcasting corporation are subject to the provisions I have already mentioned.

Many of those provisions I have referred to-day.

> Where the private stations bring their objections to the corporation to be adjudicated they find that they are bringing them to a competitor. In other words the radio corporation exercises of itself a semi-judicial function. In determining the rights as between private and public corporation, the broadcasting corporation is in the position of being both litigant and judge, both investigator and jury. It is in the position of being, as someone has said, a copy and a competitor. Therefore I suggest that in order to restore confidence it is absolutely necessary that a body such as I have advocated be established.

We are to-day in the position in which we were in 1944, with no such body being set up. As a matter of fact the corporation is opposed to it. And when Mr. Dunton was asked by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) why he opposed it, this was his answer:

> It would be extremely detrimental to the interests of listeners and to the public in general in Canada.

I suggest a statement such as that, unsupported by any evidence, is entirely useless.

Mr. HACKETT: Highly improbable.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, and as the hon. member for Stanstead suggests, highly improbable. And let it be emphasized that I believe in the C.B.C. as a national institution. There are some who are endeavouring to place certain hon. members in the position of opposing government ownership; but there is no reason for that viewpoint. What we are asking is that there should be fairness under the law established by parliament in the relationships between the C.B.C. and the private stations. They are entitled to justice, under the law—no more, no less.

An independent body set up for the purpose will interpret the law as passed by parliament. It will determine whether or not the C.B.C. is properly carrying out the wishes of parliament. To argue that a body composed of one of the litigants can determine impartially and without bias the rights of one of the opposing litigants is certainly contrary to experience and reason. I submit that unless such a body is set up, a paralyzing blow will be struck by parliament at "freedom of the air," or at least at what is known as "fairness of the air." If the C.B.C. continues uncontrolled, private stations in this country will become vassals, permitted to survive only at the sufferance of the overlord. The great danger of that is the danger of developing totalitarianism in this country.

The other day the Minister of Reconstruction rose in his place and reversed a stand he had taken two years ago, which in turn was a reversal of a stand he had taken in 1937. All honour to him. This is one of the few times a minister in this House of Commons has ever admitted that experience had proven that an opinion he expressed two years ago had not been borne out by subsequent events.

Experience in continental Europe has been that placing control of radio in the power of any government has given government control of the thinking of the country. In asking for the setting up of an independent board such as this, the great and abiding principle at stake is freedom of the air. Can there be freedom when all power rests in one institution? Freedom of the air is often believed to be the same thing as freedom of speech. But there is this difference between the two: a newspaper circulates among those who accept its general viewpoint. Broadcasts go into the homes of people of different opinions. The limitation on broadcasting is the limitation that it shall not contravene the law of libel and slander; and there is another social limitation, namely that the listener has the right to use his thumb and forefinger when things are being said with which he disagrees. What is happening here to-day is that the thumb and forefinger controlling what is to be broadcast is a body under the control of the government of the day. Human nature being what it is, can you expect that broadcasts dealing with current events will be not tinged or tainted by the individuality or views of the person using that instrument?

The hon. member for Peace River mentioned commentators. While I may not be in general agreement with his viewpoint, I will say that whoever has charge of commenting on the news controls the future thinking of the nation. When day after day certain points of view are pounded into the subconscious minds of the listeners, the ultimate effect is that those subconscious minds are changed by the continued operation of the propaganda, whether designedly done or not. That is why every effort should be made to ensure that the private stations shall have an opportunity to broadcast points of view different from the points of view currently represented by the government of the day.

However free the C.B.C. programmes may be from direct influence, there will be a bias in the government sponsored announcements that are made from time to time. The government has a preferred place in the mobilization of public opinion. It does not need to be intentional, but the bias is there. Whatever announcement is made, always behind it is projected the personality and point of view of the person broadcasting. It is because of that fact that I believe public policy decrees that there should not be unified control of radio in a national body independent of control. Government monopoly of the broadcasting facilities of this country will in the end lead to all thinking alike, and as some one has said, when all think alike, no one thinks much.

In Rose's book on radio broadcasting he uses these words, which I should like to appropriate as my own:

> Democracy's only protection is an awakened and informed public opinion. This public opinion can be obtained only when no one is allowed to dictate what the radio shall or shall not carry, or is permitted to present its point of view without adequate rebuttal by the opposition.

I am not in opposition to national control of broadcasting, but I contend there is a field for the private broadcaster who should be assured that he will be permitted freedom to the end that what he is broadcasting shall not be subject to the direction of the C.B.C., a government owned institution.

Mention was made of commentators, and I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River that he was referring to what I have heard criticized on a number of occasions, the communistic turn to some of the comments that are made. There is no medium more effective for mobilizing public opinion than the radio. Canada cannot compromise with communism. While I have been a critic of the operations in certain particulars of the Taschereau-Kellock royal commission, I have always agreed that it did a fine work when it brought to light of day the insidious activities of communism in our midst. If democracy is to live, we in Canada, in the empire and in the United States must show that democracy is the superior form of government in a world divided between two contending beliefs. In the place of programmes tinged with a communistic viewpoint, let there be a continuation of certain programmes now being broadcast over the C.B.C. wherein will be brought home to the people of Canada the benefits of democracy, its meaning, and what its antithesis will mean if ever control is secured by communism in our country.

There are those who will not agree with me, but I think good work has been done by the present government in Saskatchewan in bringing parliament to the people by means of broadcasting the proceedings of the legislature. I have found all over the province that while the session is on the people are interested and are ready to take advantage of this opportunity offered. How many people in our country would like to have the opportunity of being present to hear parliament in session, of seeing democracy in action. I believe consideration should be given at an early day to broadcasting the proceedings of parliament. A great work has been done by private broadcasters in that connection. I think James Allard and those associated with him should be congratulated upon having given the opportunity to members in all parts of this country to broadcast the doings of parliament. These broadcasts have done much to increase the knowledge of the Canadian people as to what is taking place in parliament.

Then there is another type of programme which I think the C.B.C. should put out. We in Canada are alongside the United States, and many programmes originating from stations in that country glorify crime and lawlessness. Our people are bound to be affected. Programmes advocating obedience of law would be of benefit to all; for without law enforcement the whole process of democracy is destroyed. We are living in a period of increased lawlessness, and I refer particularly to offences against the criminal code, which have multiplied over the last few years—why,

I do not know. But we have a medium at hand to bring into the homes the necessity of obedience to the law, which if properly utilized would have the immediate and effective result of imbuing the people of our country with a greater appreciation for law and order.

What is the situation in our country? There is a growing contempt for law. Lawlessness does not become lawful because of the numbers engaged in breaking the law. Anarchy is the absence of law or, where there is law, the lack of enforcement. Destroy the law and we destroy the principle of equality, and ultimately democracy within our nation cannot survive. I make this appeal to the minister, that in order to offset the effect of the glorification of lawlessness so often heard on the air waves, the C.B.C. has an opportunity to render a service which will pay great dividends in citizenship; for if lawlessness ever achieves primacy over parliament, or if lawlessness is condoned, then there will be anarchy. If the law can be circumvented or scoffed at or unenforced, the moral fabric of the nation will be destroyed: Is that the work of the radio? The great uplifting bodies are the pulpit, the press and the radio. There is an opportunity for service in citizenship in this direction which can mean much to the people of this country.

Radio has no boundaries. Some countries may have set up an iron curtain against the invasion of new thought, but those curtains are no defence against democratic broadcasts. All of us are influenced by broadcasts, and being so influenced the work of the C.B.C. could be greatly enlarged by making citizenship and the creation of better citizens its prime purpose and its main aim.

I am going to deal for a moment with the financial situation. Looking over the accounts of C.B.C., I have been struck by the fact that in recent years, while its advertising is increasing, deficits are approaching. In its report dated March 31, 1945, the net operating deficit is shown at $72,000. According to the statement of C.B.C., that loss included an allowance for depreciation and obsolescence amounting to $227,000. For the year ended March 31, 1946, the tentative financial statement shows a loss of $78,400, but without taking into consideration any allowance for depreciation and obsolescence. In other words, if depreciation and obsolescence were no greater in 1945-46 than in 1944-45, the loss this year to March 31 would be $305,000. Therefore I ask the minister this: is there any reason why one newspaper in this country, the Toronto Star, should be bonused to the amount of $135 per day, 313 days in the year, amounting to a total of $42,000? How loose the business administration was is indicated by the fact that I came upon this transaction by chance in the course of an examination. There was no resolution on the books of the C.B.C. dealing with it, nothing in the books to support it. No action had ever been taken by the board at any time with regard to it. It indicates a looseness which ought not to characterize a government body. I asked the chairman of the board, Mr. Dunton, when he first found out about it, and he replied that it was several months ago, but he had not done anything about it or brought it to the attention of the board of governors because he was so busy getting ready to meet the parliamentary committee which he thought would be set up earlier in the session than it actually was.

In August, 1937, the matter was brought to the attention of the general manager and apparently there was disagreement among the directors as to the propriety of this transaction. In August, 1937, the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) wrote a letter to the general manager of the broadcasting corporation suggesting to him that he continue the Toronto Star in its position because there was some moral justification for that being done. Whatever the rights were in the past, those rights have long since ceased demanding that the people of Canada continue to bonus the Star, and I think the time has come to put an end to the preference. To me it seems passing strange that a matter as serious as this, involving $42,000 a year—because that is the amount it is worth to the Star; it is worth less to the C.B.C. as that amount is subject to advertisers' commissions —should not have been brought officially to the notice of the board. I think, too, that the relevation of this bonus indicates the degree to which the C.B.C. was under the control of the government.

I am going to refer to two or three letters in this connection, quoting only the pertinent portions because my time is almost up. Here is a letter to the Toronto Star signed by the general manager of C.B.C., dated May 17, 1938. In part it says:

> I have felt that your zealous support and your pioneering have deserved special treatment; nevertheless, it has to be kept in mind that sooner or later the situation will have to be regularized in terms of the press as a whole.

That was in 1938. Even up to this date nothing has been done to regularize this matter. I have before me a copy of another letter dated September 30, 1938, directed to the Toronto Star and signed by the general manager of C.B.C., in which he says:

As you know, I have always done what was in my power to keep the Star in the picture at CBL; but, as I think I mentioned to you once or twice, the arrangement has not got the normal elements of permanence.

That was in 1938, and though the arrangement had none of the normal elements of permanence then, it apparently had the elements of perpetuity; for it has continued up to date. The reason why it should be continued is given in these words by the manager of C.B.C. in this letter:

I feel that it would be unfair to the Star, especially in view of its support of public service broadcasting, to deprive it of any place on the air as long as its competitors enjoy such a place.

I do not know who the competitors were, but whatever others have enjoyed they enjoyed as a result of payment for their privilege of broadcasting. In a letter from the commercial manager, Mr. E. A. Weir, dated April 19, 1938, to the Toronto Daily Star, the following appears:

We are not unmindful of the many courtesies and the broad general support which the Star has given to the corporation and the principle for which it stands. That has meant much to us and the whole plan of nationalization.

I think the time has come for reconsideration to be given to this matter. My hon. friend the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) points out that the majority of the committee refused to put a recommendation in the report that this privilege should be withdrawn. Whether or not the committee of parliament would make such a recommendation, my suggestion is that the time has come to bring an end to that, especially in view of the fact that the broadcasting corporation is now budgeting for deficits, and two periods paying $135 a day would go a long way towards reducing those deficits.

Now, sir, I conclude. I reiterate in my conclusion the suggestions I have made. One, which I have made over the years, is the setting up of an independent body or the board of transport commissioners in order to adjudicate as between the claims of the C.B.C. and the private broadcasting corporations in accordance with the law passed by parliament. There can be no criticism of setting up an independent body for appeal, unless it be that an independent body administering the law would come to a different decision than a body, itself the litigant, appearing before itself.

Second, the necessity of attention being given by the C.B.C. in an ever-increasing degree to showing the ramifications of communism, the dangers of communism securing a grip on our country, and pointing out the benefits of democracy and what democracy means to every man, regardless of his position, in the land.

These are matters which I think will receive the support of the corporation. There must be equality as between all citizens in this land, between all private groups claiming rights of broadcasting in this country, subject to the predominant right of national broadcasting continuing to remain a national institution.

Mr. W. A. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) even when I disagree with him in some respects. I would, however, like to associate myself with some remarks which he made, and those were the remarks in appreciation of Mr. Allard and his work in connection with our reports from parliament hill. I think that has been appreciated by all hon. members, and I am very glad to mention it at this time.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the previous speakers on this measure, mostly, I am afraid, in criticism, and I feel impelled to rise at this time to say a few words in support of the measure.

The expansion plans of the C.B.C. are not by any means an innovation. They are merely part of a well settled principle which has had the approval of successive governments and successive parliamentary committees. I think most Canadians, including most members of this house, approve the idea of a nationally owned broadcasting system, and I think it has always been contemplated that this system should be expanded and enlarged to serve the needs of the listening public.

Perhaps it will not be out of place at this time if I review briefly some of the major steps in the development of our thinking on this subject of radio broadcasting. I do so, not with the idea of suggesting that we should be bound by the past, but rather to show a certain continuity of development.

Following the haphazard development of radio in the early twenties, the Aird commission was appointed in 1928. This valuable body established, amongst other things, three facts of major importance. They were: that broadcasting was tending to concentrate in more densely populated areas, leaving more lightly populated areas ineffectively served; also, that the majority of programmes heard was from sources outside Canada; again, that there was a great demand and need for the development of Canadian broadcasting in the interests of Canadian listeners and in the national interests of Canada. The commission came to the conclusion that the interests of the listening public and of the nation could be served adequately only—

> . . . by some form of public ownership, operation and control behind which is the national power and prestige of the whole public of Canada.

This conclusion of the Aird commission became the keynote of the subsequent development of radio in this country.

In later years, committees of this house reaffirmed and enlarged this basic principle. The first parliamentary committee met, I think, in 1932 and recommended in part as follows:

> . . . that a nationally owned system of radio broadcasting be instituted and that all stations required for its proper organization be eventually acquired.

Following some years of operation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was brought into being in 1936 by act of this parliament. Subsequent committees reaffirmed that basic principle, and I should like particularly to refer to the report of the committee of 1942-43:

> Your committee now desires to reaffirm these principles as stated in the reports of the committees for the years mentioned in brackets:
> (a) The paramount importance of a single national authority to control all broadcasting in the public interest; (1932)
> (b) The public ownership of all high power stations under a national system of broadcasting, with low power stations individually operated or coordinated in relation to the dominant system; (1932)
> (c) The coordination of all broadcasting in Canada through exclusive control being vested in the nationally owned system of:
> (i) The character of all programmes, political or otherwise, broadcast by all stations and of the advertising content thereof; and
> (ii) All wire-line networks used for carrying broadcast programmes; (1936)

I think it is clear that the broad principles behind the development of the C.B.C. have been plainly enunciated. We must realize, however, that the corporation is only in its infancy. It was created in 1936, and is now only at its tenth or tin anniversary. If we have any pride in our national system, surely we can cooperate now to put it on a gold, or, at least, on a silver basis. Its development, its approach to maturity has been retarded for two very good reasons. First, it has been feeling its way in a rapidly developing art where the premature expenditure of money might prove unwise. Secondly, of course, the war has naturally restricted its orderly expansion. Surely, now that the war is over and the corporation has an experience of ten years behind it, we can allow it to develop in the manner which has always been contemplated.

It is inevitable but at the same time, in some respects, I think, regrettable that the expansion of the national system foreshadows the allocation of new wave lengths to certain private stations which had previously used clear channels allotted to Canada under the Havana agreement. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that all members who sat on the recent committee were very much impressed by the able representations, made on behalf of two of the stations affected, and I refer to CFCN, Calgary and CFRB, Toronto.

We could not fail to recognize, and have recognized in the report, the good community service which has been rendered by these and other private stations. Nevertheless I cannot agree, as has been suggested by one hon. member opposite, that the private stations are not receiving "fair play" or that insecurity of their tenure of a particular wave length constitutes a "sword of Damocles" hanging over their heads. As a matter of fact, the two private stations I have mentioned, in their representations to the committee, attempted to show that they were taken by surprise to some extent by the present proposals, and I think it can be fairly said that they failed in this, and for three reasons. First, the statute law is perfectly clear that a proprietary interest in a wave length cannot be obtained. Secondly, since 1941, endorsements have been placed on the licences issued to these stations by the Department of Transport, which endorsements the department intended to operate as notice of a possible change in the future. I quite agree that the endorsements were not phrased as clearly as they might have been to indicate such an intention. That was made quite clear in the committee. But at the very least, these endorsements should have had the effect of giving to the affected stations good cause to weigh carefully the insecurity of their occupancy of these channels. Third, and I think possibly most importantly, the principle of public ownership of high-power stations was enunciated in parliamentary committees as far back as 1932. The committee of 1942 was particularly clear on this point, and I should like to refer to some of the proceedings of that committee.

In the committee of 1942, Doctor Frigon of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was examined at some length by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I will read a portion of that examination as reported in the proceedings of the committee.

First, I might explain that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was referring to the three stations CFCN, Calgary; CFRB, Toronto, and CKY, Winnipeg, which were not owned by the corporation. I quote:

Q. These are not all corporation stations?
A. No. There are two that are not corporation stations.
Q. What two are they?
A. CFRB, Toronto and CFCN, Calgary.
Q. I understood there was another.
A. CKY, Winnipeg; that is owned by the Manitoba government.
Q. That is three stations that have been allotted clear channels.
A. Yes.
Q. That can be occupied up to fifty kilowatts?
A. Right.
Q. Have they an understanding with you that they will be required to vacate these channels?
A. First of all, the frequencies are allocated annually and the Minister of Transport has always the right to make a transfer in each year.
Q. And there is no possibility of any misunderstanding that these stations have a vested interest in those channels?
A. No.
Q. None whatever?
A. No.
Q. So that they can be renewed at any time that the corporation needs those channels?
A. They can be turned over to the C.B.C.
Q. For its own purposes?
A. Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Does the hon. member say that this statement made by Doctor Frigon to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was notice to these stations themselves that the C.B.C., as a matter of policy, would take over their wave lengths definitely?

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): I am not suggesting that this is a direct notice to the people involved; but I will say that representatives of at least CFRB appeared later on in that committee, as will be seen by the proceedings; and, as the hon. member knows, the private stations took an active part and a great interest in the sittings of the radio committee. This is a matter of public record, and I think it is at least constructive notice. Following that—

Mr. FLEMING: There is no vested interest. That is the law.

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): I refer the hon. member to the last question which I read:

Q. So that they can be renewed at any time that the corporation needs those channels?
A. They can be turned over to the C.B.C.

Mr. FLEMING: It does not say that is their policy.

[Mr. W. A. Robinson.]

Mr. ROBINSON (Simcoe East): Coming now to the report of the committee of 1942, it reaffirms the principle of—. . . the public ownership of all high power stations under a national system of broadcasting, with low power stations individually operated or coordinated in relation to the dominant system.

The report goes on to say, at page 1095:

The private broadcasting stations have no vested interest in the sound-waves they are allowed to use. The government and the corporation should not hesitate to terminate any licence when it is in the public interest to do so. Any increase in power considered necessary and desirable to occupy the channels allowed under the Havana agreement should be made in stations owned or taken over by the corporation.

I do not think anything could be much clearer than the proceedings from which I have quoted, and these phrases from the final report of that committee, and I think it will be seen that the C.B.C. is only proposing to do now that which it had in contemplation some years ago and which has been delayed by reason of the war. At the same time I urge the C.B.C. and the government to give every assistance to the affected stations in allocating the best possible alternative wave lengths to them and to allow them to develop sufficient power on their new wave lengths to maintain and continue their present fine position as community stations.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words as to the committee itself. I personally found the work extremely interesting. It was the first time that I had had the privilege of sitting on the radio committee. As the various statements were made, the witnesses were examined and the representations were given to us, I am sure that every new member of the committee, including myself, obtained an entirely new, and in most respects satisfying, picture of the present position of radio in Canada and of its future development.

I heartily concur in the recommendation that a similar committee be appointed each year. I should like to emphasize that it should commence its work early in the session. I would go farther and say a few words about the personnel of the committee. Radio is a fascinating, but an extremely technical, subject. In the committee we were tremendously assisted by hon. members who had had the opportunity of sitting on previous committees and who had a good grounding in the subject. Perhaps I should not mention names particularly, but I should like to make some mention of the good work done by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross). I should also like to pay a tribute to the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). Therefore I think any committee which is appointed in future should have a good proportion of old hands and a fairly generous sprinkling of new blood, so that a good many members of the house may be given an opportunity to study our radio problems.

I believe that a yearly committee is essential if parliament is to exercise the close scrutiny which should be exercised over such a powerful instrument, if we are to be assured that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is carrying out its declared functions, for instance, that it is giving coverage to remote and sparsely populated areas and equality of opportunity of discussion of public questions.

One of the questions which should certainly have the attention of any future radio committee was that raised by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters and touched on by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), namely, the matter of appeal from Canadian Broadcasting Corporation decisions. It seems to me that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, as a regulatory as well as an operative body, must at times be placed in a somewhat anomalous position. The present committee did not have the time to study this question carefully, but it has left the door wide open to future study. I agree that such study should be made.

I do not think I can be accused of taking up too much of the time of the house, but I feel that I have spoken sufficiently long at this late hour of the session on the general aspects of the measure before us. There are a few particular points which I should like to refer to later but I can do that when the bill is in committee.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I just wish to make two or three remarks. Although not a member of the radio committee I have listened to the debate with great interest. With the exception of probably two members from the C.C.F. party, all members have spoken against the danger of the growing monopoly of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over radio. The leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) quoted the words of the then Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who said:

> The aim of broadcasting should be a complete coverage by government facilities, and the present situation demands complete control over all forms of broadcasting, whether public or private.

From the record I am not sure when that statement was made, but in the light of what has happened elsewhere in the world as a result of government monopoly it now seems to me to be a terrible statement. The leader of the C.C.F. apparently endorses it, because he goes on to say, as reported at page 5297 of Hansard of yesterday:

> In view of all that is happening to-day, in view of I will not say lobbying because that would not be true, but in view of the tremendous press campaign that has gone on across Canada in the last year, to limit the powers of the present broadcasting corporation . . .

I take it from that that the leader of the C.C.F. is against limiting of the powers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I wonder what would be said if the government were to apply the same ideas to the press. I do not see much difference between the press and the radio. If the government has absolute control over the one, why should it not have absolute control over the other? It seems to me that it is a most dangerous situation.

I should like to acknowledge my thanks to the private stations for the privileges which they have accorded hon. members in their broadcasts over local stations. There, again, that was a privilege granted by private stations, not by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As a member of the house I have never received any facilities whatsoever from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. On the contrary, when time on the air was allotted to the various parties in the house this group of thirteen members was given the same time as a group which no longer exists in the house; the only member they had is now serving a sentence as an enemy of his country. The Labour Progressive party, the communist party, is given the same facilities over the nationally controlled Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as the Social Credit party with thirteen members in the house, and the movement which has formed the government of the province of Alberta since 1935. It is my personal view that members of parliament should be given a great deal more time and greater facilities in the use of radio, over local stations. As it is to-day, listeners hear comments and interpretations of news from people who, so far as we know, are not responsible to anybody. We do not know their politics; we do not know what they stand for; we do not know for whom they are speaking.

My impression is that commentators should be limited to the giving of actual factual news. If commentators are to be permitted to interpret that news and thereby to influence the thinking of the people of Canada, then the people should know exactly who is speaking and for whom he is speaking. Put a label on all commentators.

I could name one or two of them; in fact I do not mind naming two. I would refer first to Dyson Carter, a man who frequently speaks for the C.B.C.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Will the hon. member tell me when he spoke for the C.B.C.?

Mr. JAQUES: I understand he does.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Your understanding is wrong.

Mr. JOHNSTON: How do you know?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): He did not speak for the C.B.C.

Mr. JOHNSTON: How do you know; where is your proof?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): He is not an official of the C.B.C.

Mr. JAQUES: I never said he was an official of the C.B.C. I said he had facilities of the C.B.C., and I say he is a communist—even if he is not so labeled. He is a communist and when he was taxed with it he laughed and said, "Why, I was given the job by the government all during the war of saying these very things."

I might say that Matthew Halton is another. There is no label on him. But one has only to listen to him. One need not be very acute to realize where his sympathies are, and for whom he is speaking. I have heard him on more than one occasion, and there is not much doubt about it. But the general public does not realize that. They hear a commentator over the radio and they take it for granted that he is absolutely unprejudiced. They say, "Here is the actual truth, not prejudiced or coloured in any way at all." Naturally they take it as authentic. A great deal of propaganda has been put over in that way.

My view is that, so far as broadcasting is concerned, the C.B.C. should confine its work on the radio to the news itself, and to entertainment. We cannot have too much good entertainment, including good music. But even there propaganda is used. I happen to be very fond of classical music. During the winter I listen to the philharmonic concerts from New York—never miss them if I can help it. I noticed that until Finland was taken over by Russia we heard quite a good deal of music by Sibelius. I have not heard any since Finland was conquered. Instead of Sibelius, we hear now Shostakovich. I do not pretend to be an authority on music, but I believe there are few people who, if given the choice, would prefer Shostakovich to Sibelius. Certainly I for one would not.

I would conclude by repeating the danger to which people are exposed by means of propaganda from men who are responsible to no one and who apparently speak for nobody. They make their comments as though they were absolutely unprejudiced when, all the time, they are making them purely for purposes of propaganda.

If the C.B.C. thinks my remarks are unfair, then they have an easy method of proving me wrong. I challenge them to do so. Grant any recognized Social Crediter the same facilities which have been granted to these—well, I call them reds, but you can call them fellow-travellers, if you like—and I will take my words back. But until that happens, I say that the C.B.C. has been used by communists as a means of spreading communist propaganda.

I object to this bill, which will increase the power of the C.B.C. I object to voting any more money for radio monopoly.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss this bill, I wish to say this, that on the occasions I have been privileged to speak in the house I have each time found it possible and convenient gladly to commend some parts of the legislation then offered by the government. I am not in that position to-day.

I disagree with this report, in toto. I disagree with every page, every paragraph, every line, every word of it; I disagree even with the title. The title says that it is a report from the radio committee. It is nothing of the kind; it is a report from a few people, advocating everything suggested by the C.B.C.—and that under the leadership of the new leader of the Liberal party, who is not in the house at the present time, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Before approaching the various suggestions made in the report, I want to say that I have now been in Ottawa for two sessions and I have become acquainted with the man by the name of Bennett. It does not matter that I lived in the same town with him for thirty years, practised the same profession he practised, and that I have partaken of his bread and wine, and he has partaken of my bread—but not my wine. I have lived in hotels with him; I have travelled with him, and I thought I knew something about him.

But I find I was all wrong. I come here to Ottawa, and I find that in almost every debate, be the subject agriculture, the C.B.C., mining, or some other subject, our hon. friends opposite have always found something to quote from Mr. Bennett. The socialists to my left have always had something to say and I have learned that he is not the man that I thought I knew, that he is a sort of ogre who has a baby as an appetizer before his dinner, who washes his hands in the red, warm blood of innocent children, and all that kind of thing. But when it comes to something like this they go back fourteen years and they quote Mr. Bennett. He is then Viscount Bennett, the great statesman. Frankly I am just a little bit fed up with it. If it had not been for the fact that Mr. Bennett was there from 1930 to 1935 many of them would have been mentally deficient in the contributions they have sought to make on many occasions to the debates.

Coming to this business of broadcasting, I want to begin by saying that during the sittings of this committee I had the pleasure of meeting a number of men connected with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Personally, of them and to them I say that I have never met finer people; I have never met men who were more seeking to do a good job of work in Canadian broadcasting. But it is the system under which they are acting that I express definite opposition to at the present time. Before the last sitting of the committee we were asked by the chairman to make suggestions, and I replied almost immediately with the following: First, that the committee should report against taking over the larger wave lengths in Manitoba, Ontario and Alberta and, second, that I was in favour of the committee recommending that an independent tribunal should be set up to determine matters between the C.B.C. and the private broadcasters, the present regulations to govern such body with the right in that body to revoke or alter them.

I realize that this has been discussed already by a number of members. I am glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in the house, and I see a couple more lawyers over there at the present time. I want to ask him this question: It is admitted, even in the report, that the C.B.C. is in competition with private broadcasting; that is true and no one seeks to deny it; no one can deny it. What do we find? We find that that same body, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with respect to its opponent is at once the policeman, the judge and the gaoler. That is a simple statement of fact which no one can and which no one dare refute.

To the hon. gentlemen opposite who practise the same profession as I do, or to the lay brethren over there like the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) who is one of the best barbershop lawyers I know of, I put this simple question: Will some one over there rise in his place and justify that sort of thing? Will they, before this debate is over, please stand up and, on their honour as members of this profession, make some attempt to justify that terrible state of affairs, because I can use no other word?

I realize that, in an endeavour to make a distinction between broadcasting and railroading, Mr. Dunton said that broadcasting was cultural; that is the only distinction he made. However, it is also commercial. The C.B.C. now seeks to take advertising revenue from the private stations, because that is the purpose of this new business. There is no other purpose; that is what it is seeking to do. Will someone justify to me that sort of thing? Will he merely say that it is just? It is so contrary to natural justice and every other kind of justice that I am anxious to see someone justify it.

I know it will be said that this report has not found against the contention that I make. What the report says is that it should be given further study by the C.B.C., further study by the Department of Transport, and that some other committee should deal with it. Never in any report of any committee of this house will you find such a straight dodging of duty. That is all it is. What further investigation can there be of the necessity for the removal of a great and complete injustice in this country. I want someone over there or over here to answer that.

I turn now to something else. The basis upon which these wave lengths are to be taken from these people is that somebody said so some years ago that and subsequent committees have confirmed that position. I asked Mr. Dunton if he thought the creation of this new network and the taking over of these stations would create one extra advertising dollar and his answer was "no". The net result and the sole purpose must be to take from the private stations advertising dollars already in existence. Then we have the hypocrisy of its being said that the C.B.C. intends to encourage private broadcasting. Not only is that nonsensical; it is an utterly dishonest statement to make in the report.

For a short time I intend to deal with my part of the country. This was done quite well by the hon. member for Macleod, (Mr. Hansell), and I am going to be quite brief. Hon. members will be glad to know I am going to be brief in anything else I may say. Out there we have station CFCN which puts out the best news broadcast I have listened to and which is sponsored by the Alberta wheat pool. That station is to lose its wave length. I would remind hon. members who were not members of the radio committee that to that committee came a friend of mine,

Mr. Marshall Porter. With him came three men, the heads of the largest agricultural organization there. They had held meetings with the heads of practically every agricultural or stock organization in Alberta, seeking to obtain a membership of 15,000 or 20,000 farmers to take over this station. They said they had their own problems to discuss and they wanted to speak in their own language and be spoken to by persons who understood them. Talk about remote control! It is suggested that this control lie 2,000 miles away in Toronto or Montreal. That is what is to be done about the problems of people in Alberta who want to talk their own language and discuss their own problems. That is just silly beyond words.

Will someone over there tell me why the government want another 50,000 watt station in the city of Toronto when they already have one? What possible excuse—there is no reason, of course—can be given for the erection of a second 50,000 watt station in Toronto? What other coverage is there that they are seeking? They have another 5,000 watt station now, and they have the 50,000 watt station. The Elliott-Haynes report was referred to a while ago by the hon. member for New Westminster, and that shows clearly that CFRB is easily the most popular station there. Its record of public service is unsurpassed by any other station in the Dominion of Canada. That was proven beyond question. The record of our own station CFCN is a model of public service, and no one has been able to deny that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And public popularity.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Clearly so. We have heard a good deal of criticism of private radio broadcasting. I know the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has this book which I hold in my hand. It is called "Radio's Second Chance", and is written by Mr. Charles A. Siepmann who was a former employee of the British Broadcasting Corporation, who came to the United States and is now a citizen of that country. He is a consultant with the federal communications commission which has to do with radio in the United States of America. We have had this book thrown at us a good deal, and it has a lot of virtuous things in it, but I am going to read one paragraph from it which has not been read by those people who oppose the private stations. It is on page 9 of the preface; it is written by the author, and this is what he says:

> Nor does criticism of the abuses of the commercial system imply, by any analogy whatever, that government monopoly broadcasting is a desired alternative. Ours is a system of free enterprise within a framework of government controls, which is infinitely preferable. Radio organized by government has proved itself the most disastrous of all systems. No one who has lived in Europe could advocate that we should try that here.

So that when this man is being quoted let us remember that he also said what I have just read. That brings me to this.

I want to go right along with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in saying and repeating—and I said it publicly before the committee—that I am all in favour of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It has done a splendid work; there is no doubt about that. It is a national instrument, and there is a great place for it. But if you go over its history you will find this. The Aird report upon which our radio law is based is an interesting document. I am not being critical of something that happened in 1929, because no one then could possibly have foreseen the advances that would be made by radio in this country. But I would point this out, that in the appendix to that report one can see the way in which people's minds were working. The appendix deals with Australia in eleven lines, and incidentally in Australia they have a national system and also a private system, but the national system in Australia does not carry advertising. They have made the clean break there which was suggested so clearly in the Aird report itself as the system which should be adopted in Canada. Australia gets eleven lines; Great Britain gets six; the United States, with 603 stations, gets 2½ lines; the German system, which is a state-ownership system, gets twenty-four lines, and we know what state-owned radio did in Germany. It was the greatest instrument that Hitler had at hand, and he used it to debauch the German people and bring on this last war. Without radio, he could not have done it for one moment.

The Aird report goes on to say that perhaps to help out the situation until the thing gets on its feet the national radio system should have some indirect advertising, limited in amount, and that amount was fixed later by Mr. Brockington at $500,000 as the maximum to which they would ever go. We have heard the figures on that given by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and we know we have gone away beyond that. But I am not opposed to that. They needed the money. That is the simple answer. They had to have the money. They already have $4,000,000 odd from the people of this country, and the private radio stations do not get any of that. The national radio system have had that money and they need more. I am not blaming them for wanting more or for getting more if they do that in open ordinary competition with people who have sunk their money and a good deal of their lives in building up audiences, for an audience is radio's stock-in-trade, just as a subscription list is the most valuable thing a newspaper has, because upon it depends the amount it will get from its advertising.

Let me repeat. Radio, from this Aird report and from subsequent reports of committees, was aimed and destined to be a service vehicle for the people of Canada. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advertises that it now covers 94 point something per cent of the Canadian people—94 per cent. Then how in the world is the setting up of another network going to give them one more listener? It has reached the saturation point now—94 per cent. Yet they come along and ask this parliament for $2,000,000. What for? To build these expensive stations—not to get another listener, not one—but in order to carry the $2,000,000, which at three per cent comes to $60,000 a year. They say they are going to pay it back, and the only way they can carry the loan and pay it back is by taking advertising now gathered up by the private radio stations. There is no other source of revenue.

So that when we consider whether or not we intend to approve this report I am anxious that all members of this house who, in times gone by, have suggested that they believe in individual enterprise should give some thought to that simple statement of fact which, once more, I defy anyone to contradict.

I am now going back to Alberta again, and perhaps some hon. members think I should go there and stay there. But I want to discuss our local situation.

Mr. BENTLEY: You are not going there this week, are you?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is entirely in your hands. In Alberta we think we should be allowed to hook up the three private radio stations we have at Edmonton, Calgary and Lethbridge. They are almost in a line from north to south, though not quite. Why should we not be permitted to do that? We are not permitted to do that because C.B.C. just say no. It is utterly impossible for me to think of any reason why we should not have a little regional network if we want it. We are not interfering with anybody, not in the slightest. Yet you cannot get a wire in this country unless C.B.C. puts its imprimatur on your request.

I made the suggestion in the committee that rather than cost the taxpayers any more money, the present transport commission should be the body which would deal with appeals of this kind, and it was suggested to me by the minister: Where would it get its law? Of course the railway commission gets its law from the Railway Act, and perhaps the Transport Act; I am not clear about that. I said: Let us appoint that board. They are not overworked; we all know that, and then put on the private broadcaster who is appealing, the onus of proving his position before the board. I even went that far in an endeavour to get something in the nature of an independent body. But the minister, as I say, suggested: Where would they get their law and jurisprudence? I said, "Let us take all the rules and regulations the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have now, holus-bolus; take the whole thing; put the onus on the private broadcaster to have them altered and abrogated"; but there was no support for the suggestion going even to the extent which I have just indicated.

I wish to close with rather a simple statement, or perhaps I should put it by way of request. I realize that these wave lengths have to be filled by a given time—the spring of 1947, I think it is. My suggestion is this. Parliament is going to meet again in the third week of January; and may I impress upon the house that, once these wave lengths are gone, they have gone forever. It is not something we can patch up again at a later time; we are through. We must occupy these places, there is no doubt about that, and once we have done this we are completely filled. My suggestion to the minister is this. There are no great things to be done between now and the last week of January. You have already your material on order for the stations you intend to build. You know you cannot get it yet, but the time will come when this material can be obtained. So why not let this matter rest? Remember that all the Alberta members—I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is not here at the moment because he might not concur—at all events all of us who are here will agree that we do not want this thing; we are very happy the way we are and we want to be left that way. What is going to happen? They are going to build this station at Red Deer. What does that mean? It means that the Edmonton and Calgary stations come off the network—that was admitted in the committee—and therefore the advertising revenue which they now have through a connection with C.B.C. is gone, just taken away from them like that! Someone may say that the private stations complained about the amount of the cheque they got for national advertising, most of it from the United States. Let me frankly admit that the private stations would carry on for nothing if they had to, because we know that these United States shows are the things which build audiences. There is no use in fooling ourselves about anything of that kind; we all know that. We know we cannot have talent in this country. We know perfectly well that, once our talent is some good, it is gone. Look at the Canadians who are in New York, in Chicago, in Los Angeles now. Why should they not go there? Here they work for dollars a week; there they get hundreds of dollars a week. Clearly we are in this position, that these great nation-wide shows are what build audiences. So that these stations in our province not only will be deprived of the revenue they get from the C.B.C., which revenue at times, as we learned, does not pay operating expenses, but will have taken away from them the audiences which, through the years, they have built up.

I want someone in this House of Commons to try to justify treatment like that of people who have been encouraged to spend their money, people who have been seeking power increases many of which have been granted. I should like somebody to show the fairness of actions of that kind.

I have here one thing which I want to bring to the attention of members of the House of Commons, because there may be a little political turn to it after they have heard what I have to say. I have an analysis of editorials, from clippings of newspapers, on this subject up to July 23, 1946. I am not introducing something new; this is a record in the proceedings before the committee. The groups are divided in this way. In the western provinces the number of newspapers was fifteen; the number of editorials was eighteen; the number favourable to the private broadcasters' position was eighteen; the number unfavourable was none. In Ontario fifty-three papers commented; there were seventy-eight editorials; seventy-four were favourable and four were unfavourable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Toronto Star.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will come to that. You let me run this show for a minute. In the province of Quebec there were forty-three papers; the number of editorials was eighty, the number favourable was eighty, and there were none against. The maritime provinces have nine newspapers; there were nine editorials, eight of which were favourable and one opposed. The grand total is 120 newspapers; the number of editorials is 194; those favourable were 189, and those opposed were five.

There is the newspaper survey. I have the list of papers, and I should be glad to supply any hon. member with information as to his own home town paper. Of the five editorials supporting this legalized theft from these people, the Marmora (Ontario) Herald was one, the Owen Sound Sun-Times was another, the Toronto (Ontario) Saturday Night was another, and that is edited by one of the governors of the C.B.C. Another was the Toronto Star, which has a hand-out of $42,000 a year in time from this corporation. There was also the Glace Bay (Nova Scotia) Gazette.

I have here a number of things that I am not going to bother the house with. May I once more appeal to the minister in charge of this bill to give it some further thought. Take this $528,000; of all the camouflage one ever saw, that really is the prize. What does it mean? It means that we turn over to the C.B.C. $528,000. Why not let us do it honestly? Why not just let us vote the taxpayer's money, instead of saying, we are giving you the gross licence fees instead of the net? The country pays the $528,000 anyway. If they need that sum or a greater sum I am in favour of giving it to them, but I am not in favour of giving it to them by the porch-climbing back-door method which has been adopted in this proposal.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is perhaps rather bold for someone who is not on the committee to try to speak after so many of those who have had the advantage of sitting on the committee have spoken, but perhaps there is room for the voice of ignorance as well as for the voice of experience and knowledge. At any rate the voice of ignorance will be very brief, I think not more than ten minutes at the outside.

I rise because it seems to me that this is one of the most important matters which have been before this house, and far more important than the matter of a few million dollars. I think it goes very deep into the fibre of our constitution, and of our democratic way of life which we are so fond of talking about. I really want to do what my hon. friend the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has done, to ask one or two questions of the minister.

Two things have emerged from this interesting debate and they are perfectly clear and unchallenged. The first is that what is proposed will make it so difficult for private enterprise that it is highly questionable whether it can go on in any effective manner. The second is—and no one will dispute it—that this proposal will greatly aggrandize and strengthen the position of the C.B.C. I am one of those who wish to have national broadcasting; I believe in national broadcasting. But I do not believe in the various powers—going, coming and staying—which this commission is given in addition to its power to broadcast. I wish to ask why this is necessary.

First of all, why is it necessary to take away the powers and privileges which have been exercised by private interests? There is usually one of two reasons given when private interests are sought to be penalized and weakened. The first is that they have been trying to act in a monopolistic manner. That cannot be said here; the shoe is entirely on the other foot. Not only have they not been so acting, but they have had no chance of becoming monopolistic. The second is that private enterprise has neglected the public interest, or has been inefficient, or what you will. There is no suggestion whatsoever of that here.

The second point I wish to raise is this. Why is it necessary to aggrandize the C.B.C.? Can they not carry on as they are? Is it usual to treat public enterprise in this way? Let us examine both these.

Is it usual for public enterprise to be, as has been pointed out, the plaintiff in the case, the judge and jury, policeman and everything else? It is not. It is not true in the railway world where we have the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. I need not press the point, for it is clear that what is proposed is not usual.

Then what is the reason? Now this is why I am on my feet. I want to know the reason, and I have not yet heard any reason given except one, which I believe is unfounded and is unsound, and which was given last night by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). And the only reason I could understand from him, apart from a lot of chat about Messrs. Sifton and their enterprises in the newspaper and radio fields, the only reason he gave, or the only thing approaching a reason, was that it was necessary, as I understood him, that in this way the C.B.C. should get sufficient coverage. He said that they had not sufficient coverage, and he mentioned particularly the Windsor area.

I have listened with interest to statements made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and others refuting that position taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and if his view is mistaken, then no reason of any kind has been given for this proposal. Well, I come to what I consider the real reason, evidence of which we see around this place.

What is that reason? It is power. There is nothing that has interested me more in my brief life as a member of parliament than the study of power, the things it does to people, and the desire they have to get more and more of it. We have seen it in a matter now before the other place, in the case of the foreign exchange control board. I was interested to hear some of the things said there about power, and it is power here again. The point has been made—and I do not dwell upon it—that ministers sometimes hardly realize that they are being made advocates for civil servants who want power.

Like my hon. friend, I have great respect for the chairman of the C.B.C., and I have no doubt that if I knew the other members of the corporation I would have the same respect for them. But I do not like to see power growing in this way, because there are real dangers —and they have been pointed out—inherent in it.

There is one more thing I have to say, and it is in fact the only real excuse I have for standing on my feet now. We know what the English situation is. There they have the B.B.C., and there they have a socialist government. I have here an English periodical, The New Statesman and Nation, which is strongly pro-socialist, and I should like to read two sentences from what they call the "London Diary." It is signed anonymously, but I have reason to believe it is signed by a man wholly in sympathy with the policies and principles of the New Statesman, and therefore I believe I am justified in saying that what I am about to read represents the views of one who is a convinced socialist. That gives additional point to the quotation. He refers to an incident which occurred recently in England, where a distinguished United States commentator who had been about to broadcast was, for some reason which I need not go into, refused that permission. Authority was taken away at the last moment.

I wish to ask the minister and hon. gentlemen opposite, who are Liberals with a big "L"—some of them would like to think they are liberals with a small "l" too—to listen to this quotation:

> The effect of incidents of this kind is to make me think that we ought to have more than one broadcasting network in this country.

Here is the sentence to which I direct attention particularly:

> I believe in competition in all things of the mind.

It has been pointed out here that the great danger of this proposal, as was demonstrated last night, is that, if it goes through, we shall come out with but one means of influencing public opinion, and the effect of that we have seen clearly in other parts of the world. In other words, some other hon. gentlemen in this house who are as opposed as I am to other kinds of monopolies, as opposed as I am to monopolies in material things, are apparently prepared to have a monopoly of a far worse kind, an infinitely worse description of monopoly, namely, a monopoly in things of the mind. For this reason, and for other reasons given by more practical men, who have a greater knowledge of the subject, I urge the government to consider the question very carefully. I urge them to consider whether they are not setting up a monopoly in things of the mind.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): I rise as a farmer to say a word or two on the bill, and first I want to compliment the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) on the stand they have taken on this question. Some time ago I received a letter regarding radio broadcasting. I know very well that the letter was inspired by others than the people from whom it purported to come. I am beginning to wonder who the society for adult education is and who the people are that are behind it. I have heard the C.B.C. referred to as a red network, and from what I have heard to-day I am convinced that possibly that is the case. This information was forwarded through a federation of agriculture office and it makes me begin to wonder. The Canadian federation of agriculture has been very careful not to get mixed up with any political party; in fact, I believe it has leaned backwards to stay out of politics. It is the voice of agriculture for the Dominion of Canada, but I am wondering if it is being enticed backwards into a socialist rat-trap.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): A little less than a year ago I made my maiden speech in this house, and at that time I said I hoped my term of service here would be a useful one. That is what causes me to rise to-day, because I feel I would not be serving as useful a purpose as I could if I did not rise to speak against this bill. I shall be brief and I guarantee you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be through before six o'clock.

We have seen in the course of this year a discussion of control of prices. The party to which I belong has advocated a policy of decontrol which would set our economy free to produce. We have seen the licensing under the prices board which gives the same power to the government in many ways that this bill gives to the C.B.C. We have seen controls over wages and labour troubles and strikes and stabilization, and so on. We have seen agricultural and wheat agreements, agreements which give the government control over agriculture. We have seen the foreign exchange control board bill, a bill which gives the government control over money. We have seen the government endeavour to control housing and fail miserably. We have to-day a demonstration on parliament hill of veterans calling for houses for their wives and children. We have had evidence in the industrial relations committee that the government has the industry of the country in a strait-jacket. That is all control; that is all power; that is the thing about which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) spoke. I shall tell the house where it leads. It leads to some of the things which are happening to-day in the United Kingdom, where they have to fill out a form to get a form to fill out. That is what power and control will lead to in this country. The only measure that we have is the evidence before the committee which endeavoured to establish that the necessity for these controls was culture. For a moment I should like to bring the minds of hon. members back to the rise of the nazi party in Germany and the kultur which they tried to inflict upon the whole of Europe.

May I close with these words. It is a reminder to the people of Canada that this bill seeks to put power into the hands of a government commission. The old saying is still true, that all power corrupts, and that absolute power corrupts absolutely.

On motion of Mr. Cleaver the debate was adjourned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Before Your Honour calls it six o'clock, I wonder whether I might have the unanimous consent of the house to refer to motions, so that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) may table an order in council which was passed to-day?

And unanimous consent having been given.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLERS FOR STEEL INDUSTRY—AMENDING ORDER IN COUNCIL REPEALING SECTION 9 OF ORIGINAL ORDER TABLED

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to lay on the table copy of P.C. 3594 passed to-day amending P.C. 2901 of July 10, 1946, by which the government appointed a controller of the three basic steel companies of Canada, namely, the Steel Company of Canada at Hamilton; the Algoma Steel Corporation at Sault Ste Marie; and the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation at Sydney.

The amending order in council repeals section 9 of the original order which provided as follows:

It shall be the duty of every person in the employ of any of the said companies at or in any of the aforesaid establishments of the companies to perform the duties of his employment until the authority of the controller is revoked; and every person who fails to perform his duties as aforesaid as herein required without lawful excuse, the onus of proof of which is upon him is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of twenty dollars for each day or part of a day on which he fails so to perform his duties.

Hon. members will appreciate that the effect of the amendment is to remove the requirement that men remain at work and also the penalties which might be imposed upon men who remain away.

It is the government's belief that this action will meet the views of the majority of the members of the house. However, I wish to reiterate the belief that it was an error in judgment on the part of the steel workers in joining in a strike which is contrary to the requirements of the law. It is the opinion of the government that there is a moral duty resting upon these workers in their own interests and the interests of all Canada to cooperate with the controller and arrange to return to work at all three plants and take advantage of the machinery provided for the final settlement of the dispute as has been done by thousands of other workers in Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of the order? Does this order change the person of the controller? Has the controller yet approached the steel workers to return to work?

Mr. MITCHELL: This order does not change the name of the controller. To my knowledge, the controller has not approached the steel workers. I say to my hon. friend that all the facilities of the Department of Labour are at the disposal of either the steel workers or the steel companies themselves to bring to a conclusion this regrettable dispute. My department is open at any time, on the application of either party to the dispute, to render any possible assistance we can in a settlement of the difficulties.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to ask one question before this matter is disposed of. Will the minister give us copies of the order in council which he has just tabled?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can read it, if the hon. member wishes it in Hansard.

Mr. BRACKEN: I wish to have it to study it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall send a copy to the leaders of the three parties.

STEEL STRIKE—INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO MAINTENANCE OF LAW AND ORDER IN HAMILTON

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am not rising at this time to say anything about the order in council which the minister advises has just been passed. I think all hon. members will agree that an order in council of that nature should have some consideration before any hasty comment is made on it.

I should like the consent of the house to permit me to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with respect to this very matter. I understand the wire services have carried dispatches this afternoon with respect to the situation in Hamilton. These dispatches are to the effect that since noon the cabinet has had under consideration the question of the dominion government sharing with the provincial government in the maintenance of law and order in Hamilton, and in providing security for non-striking workers going into and out of the steel plant. Has the Acting Prime Minister any statement on that particular aspect of the strike situation which he could make for the information of the house and the country?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know that there is much I can say at the present time beyond this: I think it is well known that the authorities of Hamilton have applied to the government of Ontario for assistance for the purpose of maintaining law and order in the city of Hamilton. All I would care to say is that the government of Ontario and the federal government have been in consultation and that both governments recognize that such assistance as each can supply for the purpose of aiding the local authorities in the maintenance of law and order should be supplied.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that the house do now adjourn to Monday morning. We have worked strenuously all week. A number of hon. members have said to me that they did not feel quite equal to having to come back from eight to eleven o'clock tonight, and that they did not think we would really make progress which would be commensurate with the inconvenience to hon. members if they were required to come back this evening.

On Monday morning we shall take up item No. 4 on to-day's order paper. With respect to item Nos. 5 and 7, National Defence Act amendment, these are measures which it would be very convenient to have passed at this time for the purpose of enabling the recruiting of the army to be uninterrupted. The Militia Act fixes a limit of 10,000 upon those who can be recruited, for the permanent force, and that is a limit which it was felt the government should not modify by order in council under the Emergency Transitional Powers Act. But I understand that several members have gone away feeling that these two items were not to be considered at this session. Under these circumstances, the government would be disposed to defer the consideration of these items, but making the statement at this time that it is only because of the desirability of deferring them that it will resort to the Emergency Transitional Powers Act to remove the limitation of 10,000 that might be an impediment to the recruiting for the army now going on. Then at the very opening of the next session it will reintroduce legislation for the purpose of having this limit removed by parliament, because we feel that it is something which should be done by parliament.

I am just making these remarks because I should not like to have the reproach made, when we have come to parliament at the next session, that we had in the meantime presumed to deal with it by order in council. Then, after disposing of No. 4, we should take up No. 6, to amend the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, to extend to sixty days after the opening of the next session, instead of fifteen days, the duration of the measures adopted under that act. Then we shall take up the Militia Pension Act, item No. 10 on the order paper. Then supply in transport (air service), reconstruction, national defence (air), external affairs—and other departments, if there is time for it.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister two questions. First of all, has the government yet decided whether it still proposes to proceed with the Canadian information service measure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Canadian information service measure is a measure with which the government would like to proceed. But the government would not feel, if it appeared that it was going to take considerable time, that it would be proper to ask the house to continue in session for that bill alone, after other matters had been disposed of.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the government consider dropping it for good?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, the government would not consider dropping it for good. That is something upon which the opinion of the house will have to be taken.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister did not indicate when the present debate would be proceeded with. Is it not intended to go on with it on Monday? I am referring to the radio debate.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it appeared on Monday that it would be the desire of the house to go back to that debate the government would be prepared to facilitate whatever appeared to be desired.

Mr. BRACKEN: But that is not the government's plan?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was not. But we would not like to take any attitude which would not meet with the approval of hon. members generally.

Mr. BRACKEN: When I can I like to support the government. On this occasion I support the motion made by the Acting Prime Minister. He is rapidly learning how to make progress in the house. I think by the action he has taken we shall secure prorogation earlier than if we had sat to-night. I shall not make any comment now on the measures which he has said he would leave over, and his reasons for so doing. I think the decision was a wise one. In postponing consideration of those measures, the government proposes taking action by order in council in the meantime. I am sure that the government will expect to defend itself for so doing. At the present time we are not agreeing to what the government may do between sessions. We understand that it will be doing by order in council what it would be seeking to do, or what it would have sought to do by the measures it is withdrawing. The minister has been explaining that the government will have to do something in the meantime. I am saying that we are not now agreeing with what it may do.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government will be prepared to defend, as having been the proper thing to do, an increase in the number of men to be recruited for the peacetime army.

Mr. KNOWLES: If this goes much farther it will really get confused.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

Monday, August 26, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

MOUNTED POLICE—INSPECTOR JOHN LEOPOLD

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. How long has Inspector John Leopold been a member of the R.C.M.P.?

2. Was he at one time known as Jack Esselwein, and (a) was he instructed, as part of his duties, to join an organization or party; (b) if so, what party or organization; (c) during what period or periods of time was he so occupied; (d) was he on the payroll of the R.C.M.P. during such periods?

3. Did his duties during that period include the investigation of organizations other than the communist party of Canada and, if so, what organizations, and on whose instructions were such investigations carried on?

4. Did his duties involve travel and investigations outside Canada?

5. Do his present duties include any portion of those assigned to him during the period he was a member of the communist party of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Since September 26, 1918.

2. Yes; (a) Yes; (b) Communist party and subsidiary organizations; (c) 1921 to 1928; (d) Yes.

5. Yes.

MOUNTED POLICE—INVESTIGATIONS IN TRADE UNIONS AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. How many members of the R.C.M.P. are currently employed on investigation in trade unions and other organizations, and what percentage is this of the total active force?

2. How does the number now employed on this type of work compare with the number employed on comparable work in 1939?

3. Are special payments in addition to their regular salaries made to those engaged in this type of work?

4. What is the total appropriation devoted to this work?

5. Who is the responsible officer in charge, and to whom does he report?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. None in trade unions and similar organizations.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

EVAPORATED MILK

Mr. DANIEL:

1. What is the percentage of the average 1941-42 purchases of evaporated milk distributed in each of the following areas of Canada: (a) northern Ontario and northern Quebec; (b) southern Ontario and southern Quebec; (c) maritime provinces; (d) Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia?

2. In what areas of above is evaporated milk sold without ration coupons?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. (a) Minimum quota 100 per cent plus special quotas authorized for lumbering and mining operations equal to approximately an additional 30 per cent. (b) No quota set. Distributed on ration coupons for infant feeding and medical cases only. (c) 125 per cent. (d) 125 per cent.

2. In all areas except southern Ontario and southern Quebec.

WAR ASSETS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. FRASER:

How many motorcycles declared surplus by the Department of National Defence, army, navy and air, respectively, are still in the hands of War Assets Corporation?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many motorcycles have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence (army)?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motorcycles made?

4. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance with the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these motorcycles now located?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many motorcycles have been declared surplus of the Department of National Defence for Air?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motorcycles made?

4. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance with the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these motorcycles now located?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many motorcycles have been declared surplus by the Department of Naval Affairs?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motorcycles made?

4. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these motorcycles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance with the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these motorcycles now located?

Mr. FRASER:

How many motor vehicles declared surplus by the Department of National Defence, navy, army, and air respectively, are still in the hands of War Assets Corporation?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many passenger motor vehicles have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence for Air?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motor passenger vehicles made?

4. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance of the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these surplus vehicles located?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many passenger motor vehicles have been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence (army)?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motor passenger vehicles made?

4. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance of the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these surplus vehicles located?

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many passenger motor vehicles have been declared surplus by the Department of Naval Affairs?

2. What are the departmental numbers of the surplus declaration forms in each case?

3. On what dates were declarations of surplus motor passenger vehicles made?

4. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of through War Assets Corporation?

5. How many of these vehicles have been disposed of by sale to ex-service men, in pursuance of the policy which grants them priority of purchase?

6. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these surplus vehicles located?

Mr. McILRAITH: These questions, eight in number, in the name of the hon. member for Peterborough West, were asked previously in the House of Commons and I believe referred to the war expenditures and economies committee. They were answered fully in that committee, and the answers will be found in the minutes of the proceedings and evidence Nos. 34 and 35 of the committee.

[Mr. Fraser.]

JAPANESE—REPATRIATION—MENTAL HOSPITAL PATIENTS

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many persons of Japanese origin were patients in the mental hospital in British Columbia as at January 31, 1946?

2. How many of those have asked for repatriation to Japan?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. 58.

2. 26.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN NAVY—ELECTRICAL ENGINEERS FROM UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. DANIEL:

1. Have arrangements been made by the government to bring electrical engineers from the United Kingdom to Canada to serve with the Royal Canadian Navy, or in any capacity with the Department of National Defence for Naval Affairs?

2. If so, how many engineers are being brought to Canada?

3. What are their names, and what are the special qualifications of each such person?

4. What salary is each such person to be paid?

5. Have any other commitments been made to them or any other inducements held out to them to get them to come to Canada?

6. If so, what commitments or inducements?

7. What, in detail, are the duties which each such person is to perform?

8. Prior to such arrangements being made, was any attempt made to recruit qualified Canadian engineers for such positions?

9. If so, what method of recruitment was adopted and what inducements by way of salary, or otherwise were held out?

10. Why were Canadian engineers not secured for such positions?

11. Was consideration given to sending Canadian engineers to the United Kingdom to secure any additional training required?

12. If not, why not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Return tabled.

DESERTERS WITH OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many deserters among those who served for some time at the front are now incarcerated (a) in prisons or detention camps overseas; (b) in federal prisons in Canada?

2. Will executive clemency be extended to them immediately and a pardon given, and will they be brought home by the government?

3. Will the same clemency be extended at once to those overseas who risked their lives as volunteers, as has been given to deserters and draft evaders within Canada?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYMENTS, ETC.

Mr. FAIR:

1. During each of the years 1930 to 1944, both years inclusive, what was the amount of (a) principal (annual payments); (b) interest due the Soldier Settlement Board by settlers holding contracts?

2. During the same period, what amount was paid each year by such settlers?

3. What was the cost of administration of the Soldier Settlement Board for each of the above years?

4. During each of the above years how many settlers (a) signed quit claim deeds; (b) were served with thirty day notices to vacate their farms?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL DEFENCE—COURT OF INQUIRY—NICK CHARENA

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of the record of proceedings of the court of inquiry convened on or about April 22, 1943, to investigate the claim of Mr. Nick Charena, against the Department of National Defence, with respect to an injury received while working at a Royal Canadian Army Service Corps Depot.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member has agreed to drop this motion.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the basis of the department looking into the case.

Motion dropped.

BELLEVILLE HARBOUR ADMINISTRATION—FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of the financial statements of the Belleville (Ontario) harbour commission for the years of 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL STRIKE—FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS—REQUEST THAT DEPUTY MINISTER ACT AS COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I asked the Minister of Labour on Saturday if the controller had made any effort to get in touch with the parties to the steel dispute, and I should like to repeat that question now. I should also like to ask the minister if he will give consideration to having the deputy minister of his department act as special commissioner, since there is no other commissioner conciliating in the dispute at the moment.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On Saturday I gave an open invitation to both sides, combined with the amendment to the order, at least to get in touch with my department or myself in an effort to bring about some degree of conciliation in this dispute. I have read some of the speeches that have been made over the week-end and I am frank to admit, Mr. Speaker, I did not get much encouragement from them. I am prepared to lend every effort in settling this dispute if there is any degree of sympathetic consideration by either side.

As to my hon. friend's other point about the deputy minister of labour, we have had two or three commissioners in this dispute already. I think it can fairly be said that I run a reasonably large organization which faces difficulties and complications, and the steel dispute is not the only dispute that is in progress at the moment. I want to tell my hon. friend frankly that I cannot have my senior officials running all over Canada trying to settle industrial disputes, because I have an organization stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific that has been set up to deal with just such matters. If my hon. friend has any contact with either side to the dispute I should be very glad if he would call them up and tell them, "For goodness' sake quit making silly speeches," such as I read in the press over the week-end. This dispute, like the rain, must come to an end some time. It always stops raining. But you cannot settle any dispute unless there is a willingness to sit down and settle it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I thank the minister. I appreciate that I was asking a great deal of him to ask that his deputy go in there. But I was paying a compliment to his deputy in making that request because I believe he would be acceptable, perhaps more acceptable than anyone else, to the employees there.

Mr. MITCHELL: Much as I should like to do it, I must say that sometimes I wonder how physically I have stood up for the last five years, and I say that without trying to be facetious at all. I say it seriously, and I say the same thing of my senior officials too. I have not had a holiday since the war broke out; my deputy has not had a holiday since he has been with me, and that goes for many of the senior officials in my department. To ask us to run all over the country after grown-up men who cannot conduct themselves like grown-up men is asking too much. After all is said and done, the trains are still running, and the aeroplanes, and if these people were anxious to settle disputes instead of trying to make martyrs of themselves or names for themselves, a great deal more could be accomplished. I passed through a similar difficult period after the last war. These men who think they are men of destiny are just ships that pass in the night. I have seen them pass in the night.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was just thinking of the minister's mixed metaphors.

Mr. MITCHELL: Some fellows think they are men of destiny, but they take themselves too seriously. If any one of us here died to-day the flag would fly at half-mast until the funeral was over and we would soon be forgotten. So do not let us take ourselves too seriously.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of the seriousness of the situation will the minister ask the controller at Hamilton to see to it that the presence of the police is not used by the company as a basis for further provocative action?

Mr. MITCHELL: That has nothing whatever to do with the company. Responsibility for the administration of law and order does not rest on any organization, whether it be the employers or the employees. The maintenance of law and order is the responsibility, first of all, of the chief magistrate of the city—and let me say this, that I have never known the chief magistrate to be defeated on the basis of maintaining law and order. If you have not the courage to carry out the obligations of an office, you should not run for that office. The responsibility, after the chief magistrate, is the responsibility of the attorney general of the province, and next, the attorney general of Canada. The chain of responsibility is complete. For my hon. friend to say that the company should not use the police is to overlook that the maintenance of law and order is the responsibility of those charged with it.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the violation of the wage control order by the company in giving triple pay?

PRIORITIES ON DISTRIBUTION OF STEEL PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply or the Acting Minister of Finance whether there is any arrangement by which the steel that is available in unprocessed form, such as sheets and plates, is being rationed equitably across this country by any organization of the government? I have received a number of telegrams on that and I should like to know whether equitable rationing is taking place.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): What little steel there is available for distribution is subject to priority allocation by the steel controller, and anything that is left after all priorities are satisfied I suppose is being marketed through the usual channels. But there is very little primary steel going on the market to-day.

Mr. PROBE: There is a definite allotment as between various regions?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has put his question and received his answer.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, may I not ask a supplementary question? It was a fair question. I do not want to be shut off every time I get up. You take an obvious delight in doing it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that the hon. member or any hon. member has been shut off by the Speaker. The rule is very clear. The question should be brief and to the point. Moreover I should say to the hon. member that I will not permit the question period to start a debate on steel or labour conditions. The hon. member will have an opportunity to ask any question of the minister when his estimates are being considered in committee of supply.

Mr. PROBE: I hasten to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I did not wish to have a debate or altercation at all. I was simply asking for information.

SALES OF LIQUOR

OMISSION FROM RETURN OF FIGURES FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, recently I tabled an answer to a question by the hon. member for Mackenzie, (Mr. Nicholson) with reference to the per capita sales of liquor by provinces for the last fiscal year. The hon. member asked why Prince Edward Island had not been included. I was fairly sure of the answer, but I wanted to be certain. There is no public sale of liquor in Prince Edward Island. Liquor is sold there, I think I should say allegedly, for medicinal purposes only upon presentation of a doctor's certificate. There being no liquor control board in the island as there is in the other provinces, we do not have comparable statistics. The public accounts for Prince Edward Island do not show any figures for retail sales; therefore, we are unable to compare them with the figures of other provinces.

WHEAT

PAYMENT OF PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES FOR 1943

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I also take this opportunity of giving information to some hon. members who are particularly interested in the matter of wheat participation certificates for 1943. These payments are actually going out, and the operation will be hurried through to completion. The price of No. 1 Northern is 12·146 cents per bushel. This price covers about eighty per cent of all the other grades.

SUGAR

IMPORTS FROM WEST INDIES—CONCESSIONS TO CANADIAN GROWERS AND PROCESSORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): On Saturday last the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the following question:

In view of the increased price of sugar, which is imported from the West Indies, will the government, with a view to increasing production in 1947, consider granting similar concessions to growers and processors in Canada as has been ordered in the United States?

The answer is: The average laid down cost of West Indies sugar in Canada in Canadian funds is not higher than the sugar administrator's selling price to Canadian refineries. The government announced last spring a special payment of 60¾ cents per hundred pounds of refined beet sugar produced from the 1946 crop. Policy with respect to the 1947 crop of beet sugar will be announced in due course in the light of the then existing circumstances.

HOUSING

CENTRAL HOUSING AND MORTGAGE CORPORATION—RENTS IN EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On Saturday last the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked a question with reference to rentals in the Jesuit college apartments at Edmonton. I am informed that the apartments in question are being operated under the home conversion plan and that the present rentals were fixed before extensive alterations had been effected. Now that the work has been completed, the home conversion administration has applied to the wartime prices and trade board to have rentals fixed. A hearing will be held, and tenants whose rents were fixed before the conversion took place will have the opportunity of making representations before new rentals are fixed.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 370, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I just received a copy of the senate amendments. I wish the minister would explain the effect of these amendments, because I have not been able to get a copy of the original bill. I am not sure what the amendments amount to.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I must admit that I am not in a position to give the necessary information. The minister is not here to-day, and I do not think the parliamentary assistant should be required to make the explanation. I wonder whether this motion could be allowed to stand until the minister returns.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If I could get the original bill I might be able to find out what it is all about. I do not think we should be asked to pass these amendments without knowing what they mean.

Mr. BRADETTE: Votes and Proceedings gives the explanations.

Motion stands.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF ACT UNTIL DECEMBER 31, 1946, OR SIXTIETH DAY AFTER OPENING OF 1947 SESSION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 253, to amend the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945.

He said: On July 5 of this year the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in a statement to the house indicated that a committee of officers of the Department of Justice and other departments had under close and continuous scrutiny the orders in council which derive their authority from the War Measures Act and of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. The purpose of this scrutiny is to reduce to a minimum the number of such orders in actual operation. Each of these orders has been carefully considered with the departments more directly concerned. Appropriate action has been recommended to secure the elimination of all orders which are no longer essential to ensure an orderly transition from war to peace.

In his statement the Prime Minister divided existing orders into several categories, and gave the number of each. These figures represent the situation which obtained at the time they were compiled, as the committee continued its analysis and action was taken on its recommendation. The volume of orders in council appearing in each classification naturally varies. On July 5 the Prime Minister referred to a total of 7,103 orders under emergency powers. Since that time the committee has reviewed twelve more orders in council, while a further seventy-two orders in council have been passed under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and tabled in the house, of which twenty-six merely revoke other orders in council, but those have not yet been reviewed and included in the tabulation. Accordingly the total number of orders in council passed pursuant to the emergency powers to August 15 was 7,187. There was one passed on Saturday which was tabled here. It is of course difficult to have these tabulations right up to the minute. Of this number 4,207 have been revoked, have expired or are spent. This means that 102 have ceased to have effect since July 5. Some twenty-six orders are in process of being revoked immediately. Some 616 are to be allowed to expire with the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. It is considered that one hundred orders can be reenacted under the authority of existing statutes not of an emergency character. To this end departmental officials are at present taking the necessary action.

The outstanding treasury board minutes under the emergency powers authorizing war duty supplements for government employees now number 1,531. These have been considered and placed in three categories: those granted for special duties which have now come to an end, and the war duties supplements will also come to an end. Then there are those in respect to which special duties for which the supplement was originally granted will continue indefinitely. In this case the civil service commission is being asked to examine each individual case and make appropriate recommendations as to what change in classification the civil servant concerned should receive.

Then there are supplements about which some doubt existed as to whether the special duties involved can be definitely or finally classified as apt to continue indefinitely. Each one of these is receiving separate consideration. All these will be dealt with, and I may say at once with respect to this whole matter that some five or six weeks ago instructions were sent to each department to examine every one of the orders and to have ready for consideration not later than the end of this year bills for legislation wherever the government might feel it would be proper to recommend legislation to parliament to take the place of the emergency power.

The remaining orders in council are those which the Prime Minister indicated as constituting the real body of the government's existing emergency power. They number 709. Of this number approximately 225 have been in substance placed before the house during the present session in the form of draft legislation relating to such subjects as war crimes, unemployment insurance, reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of the forces, control of atomic energy, control of explosives, air and navy cadets, control of narcotics, compensation to veteran airmen, and then the large body of orders in council which were dealt with by the veterans affairs committee and which provided for the demobilization and rehabilitation of members of the armed forces. The remaining 484 orders in council are the measures which may continue to be classed as emergency powers at the close of this session. This total includes orders in council which merely amend other orders appearing in the group. The subject matter was outlined in general terms to the house by the Prime Minister in his statement of July 5. As he then indicated, while world conditions remain critical it is not possible to state for what periods of time each of the powers conferred by this group of orders in council may be required. In some cases statutory authority may have to be sought at the next session.

As I have indicated to the house, these orders in council are under constant review and will be dispensed with at the earliest opportunity compatible with the national welfare. I do not know whether the house would wish to have tabled the classifications that have been made. There are quite lengthy lists of the numbers of the orders, their date, and a sort of summary statement of what they deal with. First, there is the list of the twenty-six of which the repeal is being arranged immediately or is in process of taking place. Then there is a list of 225 which it is felt can be disposed of en bloc as having been provided for by legislation enacted by parliament at this session. Then there is a list of 100 which the interdepartmental committee, presided over by the Solicitor General, are recommending to be reenacted under other powers existing in general statute to the end sought. They are regulations which can be continued under powers that existed prior to the coming into operation of the War Measures Act, and the recommendation there is that they be taken out of that category and each placed under the general statute to which it properly appertains. Then there are 268 of another category. That appears to be a large number, but there are very many of them—which are just amendments of other orders and with respect to which there will have to be a recommendation by the government to parliament at the next session to enact legislation. They are the orders relating to the labour code; the wartime prices and trade board; rent control; the control exercised over cereals or other food products with respect to which the government of Canada has entered into contracts with other governments. They exist by virtue of the powers resulting either from the War Measures Act or from the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, but they will be required beyond the period when the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act will normally expire; and it is with respect to those that the Prime Minister made the statement, which I understood at the time met with the pretty general approval of the house, that the government would ask to have the term of fifteen days after the opening of the next session extended to sixty days so that they could be dealt with by parliament at the opening of the next session instead of having to be dealt with at this session.

If I have the permission of the house I will table, without asking to have it included in Hansard, two copies of these lists, so that any hon. member who may wish to consult them will have an opportunity of doing so. Without going into the merits of emergency powers or anything of a controversial nature, I will submit without further argument that it would be in the interests of dispatch to have the amendment provided for by this bill, extending from fifteen to sixty days the duration of emergency powers after parliament meets at its next session, passed at this time so that it will not be necessary to have additional legislation to deal with these matters at this session.

There is this other consideration. At this time, if we were not to have this extension, we would have to provide for all possible contingencies and would have to ask parliament to adopt more legislation than is apt to be required at the time parliament meets again I wish to remind hon. members that the Prime Minister stated positively that it was the intention of the government at that time, and it still is, to have parliament meet towards the end of January, 1947, for the next session. We are conscious of the fact that hon. members made that quasi-undertaking a condition of the position they took when the Prime Minister announced in July that there would be this request to extend the duration of emergency powers until sixty days after the next session opens. I would therefore hope that at this time it will be the pleasure of the house to adopt this amendment and leave us under the existing impression that we have to do our best to get rid of this wartime legislation just as quickly as it is compatible with orderly reconversion to do so.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I rise on this occasion not to comment on the administration of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, but rather to state our position with respect to the bill now before us. As hon. members know, a year ago when this measure was brought in here we objected to it very strongly. We are still as much opposed to it as we were then; and if this measure were a measure to extend the duration of this act we would oppose it as strongly now as we did then. As the minister has indicated, if the house should meet in the middle of March next year this measure under the existing statute would terminate at the end of March. Under the new bill it would terminate at the end of March if the house met in January. The measure gives the governor in council power to do by order in council what ordinarily would be done by this parliament. That is the reason we objected to it. There was some intimation when the question was raised in June or July of this year that if there was an undertaking that the house would meet in January rather than in March there would not be strong objection taken to the measure. The reason for that was this. If we meet in January and the act continues in force until sixty days after the house meets, the act will be no longer in force than if the house met in the middle of March with the act continued in force for fifteen days as now provided Under these circumstances we did not object and are not now objecting to the bill.

But when we reach committee stage I am going to offer an amendment, which I think the government can accept, because it does not alter the spirit of the amendment moved by the minister. I see no reason why a measure of this kind should be tied to a movable date. Why should we say that this measure remain in existence for fifteen days after the house meets when we do not know when the house will meet? The amendment I shall propose at that time will be this:

To add after the word "forty-seven" in line 14 the following words:

"or on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, whichever date is the earlier."

The clause would then read as follows:

(1) Subject as hereinafter provided, this act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the sixtieth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, or on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, whichever date is the earlier.

That amendment does not alter the stated intention of the government, but it does fix a definite date of termination of this measure if the house should not meet in January.

In passing let me say I sincerely trust that, on other grounds as well as on this, the government will plan to see that the house meets next year not later than January.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think we are all agreed as to the necessity of some such amendment to this act as that proposed by this bill, but there are two comments which I want to make.

First of all, I am very sorry that this legislation is the occasion, as indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on July 12, for the postponement of any dealing with old age pension legislation in this session. We had been given to understand that there would be such legislation, but later on, on the date indicated, the Prime Minister made it clear to us that by virtue of this act the decision had been made not to introduce such legislation this year but rather to bring it down next year. I am sorry that that is the case. I earnestly plead with the government that there be no further delay than the earlier part of the next session in the bringing down of old age pension legislation, and I hope that when it is brought down it will be adequate.

The other matter about which I should like to say a word is this. I feel the government has been exercising authority by order in council for so long and in so many cases that at times it gets a bit slipshod in its use of that power. I must register my protest against an action which was taken a short while ago, which we managed to get hold of by questions in the house. On Saturday, August 17, we were discussing with the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) certain matters relating to the Aeronautics Act. I asked about the implementation of a certain section of that act, and I was told by the minister in definite language, as recorded on page 5002 of Hansard, that the section of the act had been changed by order in council. I indicated that I had not heard of that particular order in council, but I was assured that it had been tabled. Well, even at that procedure I was annoyed, because it seemed to me that the provision in the act as passed by this parliament in 1944 was very definite, and that the government was exercising pretty wide use of its powers under order in council to change a significant and important section in an act of parliament. But my concern for that procedure led me to try to get hold of a copy of the order in council. That effort was in vain. I was informed in due course in the privy council office that there was no such order in council. Accordingly, I raised the matter in the house on the orders of the day on Tuesday, August 20, as recorded in Hansard at page 5077. I asked on that day for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to indicate the number and date of the order in council. He replied to me:

My legal department calls my attention to the fact that there was no order in council.

I asked under what authority this matter had been dealt with, and was told by the minister that it was done by a cabinet decision arrived at on February 16 last. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Justice to follow this pretty closely. I grant that maybe it was a slip and perhaps the government should be pardoned a little bit for an error now and then, in face of the tremendous amount of business it has to do. But when a cabinet, merely by a decision it makes within the four walls of a cabinet meeting, changes an act of parliament without even going to the bother of getting an order in council, it does become serious.

I have done a little studying of this matter in "The Law and Custom of the Constitution", by A. V. Dicey. But for the fact that I do not want to take much time I could read from that book, with which I am sure the Minister of Justice is familiar, the comments on this whole practice of royal proclamations and legislative action by the executive. The thing which interests me is the opposition there has been to orders in council down through the years of British parliamentary history; and when you get to the end, this at least is clear, that there are recognized only two methods of legislation: one, which is frowned upon, orders in council; the other, acts of parliament. There is no provision for legislation by cabinet decision. Yet the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply told me that this change in an act of parliament was made by a cabinet decision arrived at on February 16 last. If I understand correctly, the minutes of the cabinet meetings are not kept, at least are not made available to the public. My information is that decisions of the cabinet, of the government, have effect and force only when they become orders in council made by the governor general in council on the recommendation of the cabinet or a minister thereof. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply read from a decision arrived at by the cabinet. This was the decision, according to the minister:

The cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the time limit for separation of control of air services from that of railways be extended for another year, i.e., until two years after the end of the European war.

I am not discussing the issue itself, the actual decision changing one year to two years, but the whole principle of this kind of change being made in this instance not by order in council but by a cabinet decision. I quote further from Hansard at page 5077:

Mr. Knowles: I rise to a question of privilege. The section of the act says that it must be done by the governor in council. There was no order in council, and therefore I suggest that the act has been violated.

Mr. Mackenzie: It does not have to be under an order in council; the government decides in council.

In other words this was not just a slip on the part of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), the leader of the house at the present time, concurred in the practice. I continue quoting from Hansard:

Mr. Coldwell: Without the authority of parliament? May I ask the Minister of Reconstrucion, or the leader of the house, if either of these gentlemen means to imply that the government has authority to do what is not authorized by this house or by statute?

Mr. Mackenzie: The government of the Dominion of Canada is a responsible body, responsible to parliament and responsible by answering questions on the floor of the house, and whether there is an order in council or not the government can take action and answer to parliament accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: That is not the way the act reads.

I should have said, "that ain't the way I hear'd it." It does seem to me that even if this is only a slip, and even if it has been taken care of in some other way since it was brought to the attention of the government as was done on that occasion, I should be remiss in my duty if I did not make this further comment, that the government should be very careful under their powers to legislate by order in council, and certainly that this kind of thing should not happen again. It leaves me with the question of whether or not it has happened in other instances. It was by pure accident that I found this out, by pressing the minister for the information about that order in council which he told me had been passed; and my interest in it, as I have already said, led me to try to get a copy of the order in council. This was the result. I suggest to the government that they should be very careful in the exercise of powers through the medium of order in council. This kind of thing certainly must not take place; there is no provision for it whatever; and even when they do things by order in council I suggest they should be very careful not to go beyond the intent of parliament in the legislation that is passed by this house.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I want to add my protest to that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I believe every citizen of Canada should be fully informed of what is happening here to-day, when this type of thing can take place. Surely it is the duty of every member of parliament to act as custodian of the freedom of the people, and to see that the democratic procedures of government are followed. Members of parliament are sent here as representatives of the people. We pass the laws. The act to which the hon. member refers does not contain any provision under which it may be altered by order in council. There is a right to enact regulations by order in council, but there is no right to change acts. Here we have an act actually changed, not even by an order in council but, as the minister has said, by the cabinet discussing the matter and agreeing that the time limit for separation of control of air services from that of railways be extended for another year, that is, until two years after the war.

I want to know whether the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) condones that sort of thing, and what the other members of the cabinet think about what was done in this case. The minister himself will be expected, when he comes before this house, to explain why he informed hon. members that an order in council had been passed, as he did on August 17, at page 5002 of Hansard:

The effective date of this legislation has been advanced by order in council passed under the emergency powers act.

Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said:

I suppose that order in council was tabled?

Mr. Howe: Yes; all orders in council passed under the emergency powers act are tabled.

But there was no such order in council, so naturally it was never tabled. I can remember that in 1935 and during previous election campaigns the Prime Minister went from coast to coast telling the people about order in council government. We learned something about democracy in those days; still we have this sort of thing happening in Canada. Every member of parliament should be alert and on guard, watching what is going on. Is this type of thing to be condoned in Canada? I shall have something more to say when we get into committee.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one brief comment. I believe the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is of far-reaching importance, and I for one hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), whose opinion would carry great weight both in this house and throughout the country, will not let this debate conclude without saying something on the point, particularly in reference to the statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) which to me, though I am not a constitutional expert, certainly did seem an interesting and extraordinary proposition.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the incident which has been brought before the house by hon. gentlemen to my right emphasizes one of the grave dangers inherent in government by order in council, and indicates that the sooner we can get rid of the emergency powers act the better it will be for government in Canada. Before the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) left for Europe he had a chat with some of us, and on behalf of this group I agreed that if he would call the 1947 session as early as possible in January we would support the amendment to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which is now before us. I am going to stand by the agreement I made at that time; as I say, I gave the undertaking that we would support it, on that one condition. However, I did like the amendment suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken); I do believe it is a safeguard, and when the minister speaks I should like him to indicate whether the government will be prepared to accept such an amendment, because my own feeling is that I should support it.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I want to say just one word. I think the matter which has been brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is something regrettable, if the facts are exactly as he stated them to be. I hope the minister will be able to give a satisfactory explanation to the house. Personally I am not prepared at the present time to give up all controls which the government now holds. I supported the extension of these controlling powers some time ago, and I will still support them until such time at it may be proper to remove them. I am not sure that we shall ever remove all of them. I hope not, because I think somebody has to control something some time in order that we may go somewhere instead of nowhere.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: With respect to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition as to an amendment, may I refer hon. members to page 3157 of Hansard of July 5, 1946, where the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made this statement:

> I believe it would be meeting the wishes of hon. members generally if I were to give an immediate undertaking that, unless something unforeseen may occasion us to call parliament sooner than the time I am going to mention, or something occur which might render it desirable to take an extra week or two before calling parliament, parliament will be called before the end of January, probably the last week in January.

The implementing of that undertaking would have the same effect as the amendment suggested by the leader of the opposition. I will not oppose the addition of that amendment to the bill, although it does seem to me that it is perhaps unnecessary in view of the categorical statement made on July 5 by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BRACKEN: In the statement the minister has read there is mention of "something unforeseen" happening. It is just to cover those unforeseen things that I advanced my amendment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If something unforeseen did happen and it became impossible to have parliament meet and deal with the existing situation, a pretty chaotic condition might arise. I am not going to take the responsibility of dividing the house upon it, but I do wish hon. members to realize that there has been as positive an undertaking as any responsible Prime Minister could give, subject of course to unforeseen conditions. We know in recent years that unforeseen happenings do occur. If the house feels that it should take the responsibility of making this terminate on March 31, even though there should be unforeseen conditions that might make it impracticable to have the house meet as stated by the Prime Minister, I shall not ask the house to divide on such an amendment. But I do suggest that the possible disadvantages appear to outweigh the possible advantages of having that addition made.

I wish to tender my sincere thanks to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for the reasonable and understanding way in which he has made his suggestion. I have not had an opportunity of going into this matter in detail, but there is no doubt that there cannot be any amendment of legislation by a decision of the cabinet. My understanding was that the decision of the cabinet was to refrain from taking any action, but there will have to be by regular constitutional methods an amendment made to the legislation. I have not had an opportunity of examining the statute in question in order to express an opinion as to how that legislative change could be made. Section 14 of the act reads:

> Every licence issued under part III of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the air regulations, 1938, prior to and in force at the time of the coming into force of this part shall be deemed to be a licence issued under section twelve of this act, but every such licence if not cancelled or suspended by the board under section thirteen of this act, shall cease to be valid one year after the termination, as fixed by order in council, of the war in Europe which commenced on the tenth day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine.

There has not yet been any date fixed by order in council as the date of termination of the war which commenced on September 10, 1939. There has been for the purposes of the War Measures Act an enactment by parliament that the War Measures Act would come to an end when the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act came into force. My understanding was that the decision of cabinet was merely a decision that it would not take steps to force the railway companies to divest themselves of licences for air transport. There was no attempt made to modify the legislation; it was merely a decision as to what conduct would be adopted by the department. All hon. members who have spoken about this are quite right in saying that there cannot be amendments of legislation except by parliament or when parliament has so authorized by order in council.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister told the house that as he understood it the effective date of section 14, which you have just read, was May, 1946. The minister stated that an order in council had been passed, and it was when that order in council was not available that he told us this decision had been taken by cabinet. I do not wish to press the matter a great deal further, because I am glad to have on the record the opinion of the Minister of Justice that such action certainly was not in order if it was taken in that way.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As I said before, I am glad that the hon. member has used the language he has in commenting upon it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Don't do it again, or the language will be tougher.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Hon. members know that we have all been under tremendous pressure; when a question is raised in the house without notice one replies according to what his impression of the facts may be at that time and it can happen that that impression may not be strictly accurate. With respect to the question of law, there is no doubt that no amendment can be made by a decision of the cabinet unless parliament states that it shall be made in that way. I do not know of any legislation under which parliament has so stated. The conduct of the administration in carrying out the legislation of parliament is conduct about which decisions of cabinet are frequently made and with respect to which the administration is responsible to this house. I am sure that is what was meant by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), because I do not think anyone would attempt to say that amendments can be made to statutes, or even to orders in council adopted under statutes, by any other method than an act of parliament or an order in council made under powers granted by an act of parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: So the section the minister read still stands as law?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Here again, unless there has been legislation, and I do not know of any, or unless there has been an order in council, and I do not know of any, it still stands as existing law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Continuation.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think it is to this section that the amendment I proposed should be moved. As I said, it would not change the intention of the government as expressed by its own amendment. My amendment simply asks that if for any reason parliament should meet later than January, by that action this statute will not be extended. That is all. So that hon. members may understand it, I will read the section as proposed to be amended by the government, together with the addition I propose:

Subject as hereinafter provided, this Act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the sixtieth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven.

The words I propose to add are:

or on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, whichever date is the earlier.

That does not tie the termination of the act to a movable date, and it does not shorten the period within which the government has indicated its willingness to amend the act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to repeat at length what I have said. I will not ask to divide the committee upon it. I think it is possibly dangerous to have my hon. friend's amendment made. I will give just one illustration, not that I have any reason whatsoever to feel that there is any probability or even reasonable possibility of its happening. But should there come about something which required a dissolution of parliament—

An hon. MEMBER: Like an election?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Like an election, parliament might not after the present prorogation have another opportunity before March 31, 1947, to do anything that would retain for any further period the wartime prices and trade control, rent control, the control of marketing required to carry out the international agreements that have been signed. That would bring about a chaotic situation. I do not think there is any chance of its coming about. Nevertheless, in French we have a proverb "gouverner, c'est prévoir," and if that should come about I would not like it to be felt that it was the responsibility of the government. If it should come about, it would have to be regarded as the chance that was taken by parliament itself and I should like to have it remembered that I advised against it. I think that everything that would be achieved by the amendment will be achieved under the undertaking given by the Prime Minister, and it would be only if the very unexpected thing should happen, of which there does not seem to be the remotest possibility at the present time, that the earlier date would be the one expressed in the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition. I respectfully submit that the possible disadvantages do outweigh the possible advantages of having that fixed date written into the law.

Mr. BRACKEN: Whatever action is taken by the house on this amendment, the government must accept responsibility for it, because it has a majority in the house. I say that only because of the argument just made by the minister.

I have only one other thing to say. This question was raised by the Prime Minister in June or early July last with I think all the leaders of parties on this side of the house. Certainly it was taken up with me, and I agreed to it, on the condition that this house would meet in January. At that time there was no condition laid down such as "something unforeseen" happening.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh yes, there was. If the hon. member will just look at Hansard—

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not talking about what appears in Hansard, but of what the Prime Minister said when he called us in and asked if we would agree. I said we would if the house met in January. The Prime Minister said he would give that undertaking. But when he came into the house he qualified that undertaking by saying, unless "something unforeseen" happened parliament would be called in January. Mr. Speaker, this is not something for prolonged debate, and I have nothing more to say except this: If the government intends that this statute shall not be continued beyond March 31 next, we will accept the government's amendment, subject to the one I have just moved; but if it wants to extend the act for some reason or other beyond that date, we could not agree to it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I consider the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition to be a reasonable one in the circumstances. I do not think anyone in this house can accuse me of not being reasonable, particularly in this matter. I felt last session when we were discussing the emergency powers bill that the official opposition were being unreasonable in their criticism of the extension of special powers which the government was asking for. I felt that the government because of circumstances should have a considerable amount of —if I may use the word—elasticity in dealing with affairs in transition. But I received a distinct shock when, the day before parliament adjourned, I think it was, after the act was amended, the government brought in orders in council putting measures into effect with which parliament had definitely declared it would not have anything to do. So that on this occasion I feel that there should be a distinct limit to the powers which are exercised now under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. If they need to be extended later, after parliament meets, I believe this group will be prepared to deal with the matter then on its merits, but at the moment I think we should support the amendment made by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. LOW: I would urge the government to accept the amendment; I believe it is a good one, and this group feels strongly that it should be adopted. If after the house meets again it is necessary to give the government support in any suggested changes which might be necessary to meet difficulties that will or may arise, we certainly will support them in the passing of an order in council or of any legislation they desire. But I would urge strongly that the government accept this.

Amendment (Mr. Bracken) agreed to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is interesting that the minister said to-day that the only order in council passed in regard to the termination of the war is in regard to the termination of the war for purposes of the War Measures Act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. What I said was that no order in council had been passed, but that this house had, by a statute which was enacted last year, declared that for the purposes of the War Measures Act the war against Germany and Japan shall be deemed no longer to exist. That is section 5 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1945. It reads as follows:

> 5. This act shall come into force on the first day of January, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, and on and after that day the war against Germany and Japan shall, for the purpose of the War Measures Act, be deemed no longer to exist.

That is what I was referring to.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is the only action we have so far as the official termination of the war is concerned. There has been no termination of the war other than for the purposes of the War Measures Act, and the other order in council, P.C. 7514, dated January 4, 1946, for the purpose of the Excess Profits Tax Act. Otherwise we are officially at war with Germany and Japan?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under international law we remain at war until the treaties of peace shall have been signed.

Mr. ADAMSON: Just one question on that. Surely the government of Germany no longer exists. There is no recognized government of Germany at all to be at war or peace with.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But the German state does exist; the existence of war is existence of war between the allies and the German state, and German nationals are still technically to be regarded as enemies.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Officially as far as Canada is concerned the war will not be deemed to be terminated until there is some proclamation after the signing of peace; is that it? It complicates legislation in different parts of Canada with regard to agreements, collective bargaining agreements and leases and the rest, and arrangements between governments and various bodies to the effect that such and such a regulation shall continue so long as the war shall be deemed to exist, and they are waiting for the federal government to declare the war at an end to end that legislation. However, that is not the important point. So far as the government's action is concerned in advancing the date as it applies under section 14 of the Aeronautics Act, in doing that by a cabinet decision, do I understand the minister to say that that was just an oversight, that they had no intention of changing legislation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it the intention of the government at this time to pass an order in council in respect of that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to say what are the intentions of the government. Frankly I do not remember whether I was present on this occasion when the cabinet decision referred to by the minister was made. The minister has said here that in his opinion this change should be made and that he would in due course recommend it, and I think he was asked if he did not think that his opinion would have considerable weight with his colleagues. Nevertheless I am not in a position at this time to state what will be the government's policy in that regard.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MILITIA PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTION PENSIONS, ALLOWANCES AND GRATUITIES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 392, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): As the minister pointed out on Friday last when he introduced the resolution to the house, briefly this act tries to bring into conformity with the Civil Service Superannuation Act the present Militia Pension Act. In view of the fact that the provisions of the Militia Pension Act, and also those of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, appertaining to service pensions of members and benefits for their dependents, were not uniform with the provisions of other long-service pension plans of the federal government, there was established by treasury board minute a committee to review these acts, having in mind the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and to recommend legislation aiming at the attainment of a degree of uniformity with the latter statute. The treasury board minute stated that the committee was to make its examination on the understanding that the changes which might be made would not apply to any member of the forces now under the respective acts unless such member so elected. The house might be interested to know that this committee was presided over by Mr. G. D. Finlayson, superintendent of insurance and comprised representatives from the three services, the financial superintendent of the Department of National Defence, and the director of the superannuation division of the Department of Finance, together with members of the staff of the treasury board to help them in their work.

The present bill is the one which was drafted by this committee, and it has the recommendation of the committee. The bill, as the explanatory notes indicate, is twofold in its scope. Sections 1 to 5 are for the purpose of amending and bringing up to date the existing provisions of the Militia Pensions Act so as to permit time served on active service during the last war to be included in the pensionable term of service of persons appointed to the permanent forces prior to April 1, 1946 and also to provide for minor amendments in part II of the act, which relates to the naval service, consequent upon certain administrative changes therein. The remaining section of the act adds a new part, part V, which is to be applicable to all persons joining the permanent force after March 31, 1946, in other words, all new members coming into the post-war army and also those persons to whom the present act applies and who may elect to come under the new part.

The new part V provides that all persons to whom it applies shall contribute a percentage of their pay and allowances towards making good the pensions, gratuities and allowances specified in the part. It also makes provisions, to the extent therein provided, for the payment of allowances and gratuities to the dependents of all persons to whom this part applies. In these respects, this new part added to the act differs from existing provisions in that under the latter only officers and warrant officers were required to contribute to the pension fund, whereas on the other hand only the widows and children of those officers and warrant officers were eligible for any allowances and pensions. Part V conforms in principle and in substance to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, with such modifications and adaptations as were necessary to adapt the principles of that act to the particular circumstances of the armed services.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to indicate the position we take with regard to this measure. It received its first reading only on the 23rd, that is three days ago, one of the intervening days being a Sunday, and I understand it has not been considered by the veterans affairs committee. The members of our party who have served in the forces have not had any opportunity of considering it, and we regard it as a very heavy piece of legislation to bring forward at this stage of the session. We are of the opinion that every clause of it should have been considered by a committee, preferably the veterans affairs committee. That was not done, and we must therefore take the view that since it is putting this bill through at this late date the government must take the onus of responsibility for it.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I feel, as does the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Stirling) that this whole subject of permanent force pensions might well be referred to the study of a special committee. However, I wish to make a few observations on the bill which is now before us. The position at the present time is that when men have served for a period of years in the permanent military establishments of the country, and while they are still comparatively young, they are put on a lifetime pension paid by the people of Canada for the good service which they rendered while members of the permanent force.

With the general thesis that a pension should be paid by the state to its servants there can be no disagreement. But when we consider the comparative inequity as between the permanent force, in regard to service pensions, and civilians in other walks of life, both members of the civil service and the people who have to buy annuities and pay for them, which annuities become pensions on their retirement from active work, then I think it is time some of us uttered a very strong protest.

I direct the attention of the house to the comments made by the auditor general with respect to the Militia Pension Act on page 47 of the 1945 accounts. Certain statistics which he gives are of interest and, I think, might well be put on the record:

In 1938-39 there were approximately 1,400 contributors under the act. The number is now in excess of 4,800. The increases are mainly in army (from 1,000 to over 2,300) and in air (from 305 to 2,066). Contributions in 1938-39 were $179,027.16 and in 1944-45 the sum was $715,594.37.

That is the contribution by the individual in the service toward the pension fund.

On the other hand, disbursements by reason of awards increased from $1,548,537.55 to $2,227,534.95 in the same period.

That simply means that the government of Canada has increased the payment to pensioners by roughly fifty per cent in the period from 1939 to 1944. Putting it in still another way, in 1938-39 the awards under the pension act were roughly ten times the contributions made by the individuals who expected to benefit from the pension funds.

In 1944-45 the amount paid out in pensions was roughly three times the amount put in by the prospective claimants to pension. In other words the expenditure by the government itself, without any quid pro quo by the service persons was at the rate of $1,500,000 a year in 1944-45. To my mind there is no objection to the fact that the federal government is contributing to this pension. Do not overlook that. I shall come to that point in a moment. May I again quote from the auditor general's report:

It will thus be observed that current contributions represent about one-third of the outgo. In the 1944-45 fiscal year, 275 awards were made under the Militia Pension Act. In the case of those who were contributors prior to May 1, 1929, pension awards are computed on pay and allowances as of the date of retirement; in all other cases a three year average is applicable. A survey of awards made in 1944-45 shows that, when promotions have been frequent, the pension award generally approximates or exceeds the pay and allowances of 1939.

A table is given to illustrate the size of the pension in certain specific cases. I shall refer to a number of these examples to give the members of the house and the country generally an indication of what our permanent force people get by way of gratuity for the remainder of their lives from a generous government. Here is an example of a person who retired from the services at the age of forty-three,—a younger man than I am, and considerably younger than most hon. members in the house. He had had twenty-one years of service. In August 1939 he was a sergeant. He retired as a squadron leader. The pay and allowances which were considered for the purpose of computing pension under the act were at the rate of $4,210.51 a year. This gentleman, who is now forty-three years of age, receives a pension for life of $1,760.35. That, of course, is a fairly generous pension for a man who still has, I hope, many years of life ahead of him.

Let me give another example. It is that of an officer in the army who is now forty-seven years of age and who had twenty-eight years of service. Before the war he was a major. He retired as a major-general. At the time of his retirement he was receiving pay and allowances of $8,533.94 a year. By way of pension award we are giving him $4,947 a year. If he lives the normal life span I have no doubt that the country will be saddled with this very generous pension for anywhere from twenty to thirty or forty years. That is not the most extreme pension case.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Would the hon. member permit an interruption? The hon. member said that at the date of retirement this officer was receiving pay at the rate of $8,533.94 a year. That is the amount of pay and allowances for computing pension, and it would be an average of his three years' pay and allowances, not the amount he was actually receiving at the time of retirement.

Mr. PROBE: I stand corrected. I said earlier, in quoting from the Militia Pension Act report of the auditor general, that the basis of computation for those who have joined the service after 1929 was the last three year average rather than the last year of pay. Since this gentleman had twenty-eight years of service, I would judge that he was in the service before 1929. However, I am happy to accept the correction. I am not so much concerned about the fact that his average pay over the last three years was some $8,500; what I am concerned with is that a comparatively young man, forty-seven years of age, should be receiving a pension of $4,947 a year. After all is said and done, that is not a bad rate of pay when we remember what is happening in connection with the fifteen cents an hour for which the steelworkers are asking.

Let me give one more example, and I shall conclude my references to the examples which are set out in the auditor general's report. A gentleman with the fleet recently retired at the age of fifty-three after thirty-five years of what undoubtedly was good service. He retired with the rank of vice-admiral. For the purpose of computing his pension, his pay and allowances, which may have been over a three year average—that I am not prepared to say—was $12,629.94 a year. Grateful Canada digs into the national coffers to the extent of $8,840.96 a year to pay a pension.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the privates?

Mr. PROBE: There is nothing here about privates, consequently there is no use in talking about pensions for privates. I venture to say that the auditor general could not have a great deal to complain about with respect to pensions for privates. I recall bringing a complaint before the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) with respect to the pension of a permanent force private. He is receiving a pension of $79 a month and has tried to supplement his pension by taking employment. When he took employment—not with the feedral government—he was entitled to both his pension and his pay as an employee; but by the terms of our various federal regulations that man has to give up his pension while working for the federal government if he receives a salary in excess of $79 a month. I understand that there are certain distinguished members in the house, certainly one a member of the Conservative party, who is receiving a pension which is in the neighbourhood of the amount that we receive as members of the House of Commons with the $2,000 expense allowance we were given last December. The point I want to make is that these pensions which run into several thousand dollars annually are likely to be paid for a considerable number of years, because the pensioners themselves are still comparatively young. They are entirely out of line with pensions payable to our aged, with pensions which people themselves are able to buy, with pensions which are paid to the buck private, the aircraftman or the naval rating.

There is a way around this matter of paying pensions based on the last year's pay and allowances or the last three years' pay and allowances before the officer or the rating was put on pension. If the government insists on keeping a form of differentiation between the brass hat and the private, why could it not consider paying a basic pension to all ranks, say the present rate of pension now paid to the private, the aircraftman or the naval rating? Then officers in the permanent force who have been receiving $3,000, $8,000, $10,000 or $12,000 and who may wish to supplement their pension could contribute five or ten per cent of their salaries to the government, which could arrange to give them the actuarial value of the payments they had made during their years of service in order to supplement what would be paid to the average rank and file of the permanent force at the end of their service. I think that would be perfectly fair, and the government would not then be saddled with an expense over twenty or twenty-five years which is out of all proportion to what the government is willing to pay to others who have been equally worthy in the service of their country.

I am not taking a thing away from the service rendered during the period of enrolment in the permanent force; I am not taking away any of their lustre. If we must have a permanent force, they must be paid, but they should be paid on an equitable basis. There are other people who have filled more humble roles but who have been equally valuable in the development of the country and who receive a miserable pittance of $20 or $25 or $28 monthly which we are prepared to pay by way of pension.

When people are old, regardless of whether they have been generals or privates, they have the same needs. It is not necessary to build up an estate for these people. If they have been generals or squadron leaders they have been in receipt of amounts far in excess of those received by the average citizens of this country. If they wish to go for a trip around the world in their old age, they have had the means to provide while they are earning. I take very violent exception to concurring—

An hon. MEMBER: Vigorous.

Mr. PROBE: I do not care about the terminology, but I mean violent. I take the strongest possible exception as a taxpayer to having to pay pensions to people who are still comparatively young, and on the other hand having to concur in the miserable pittances we pay to other citizens who have contributed just as greatly to the well-being of this country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Subsection repealed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any machinery by which contributions can be made by officers in the armed forces so that they may have their ordinary pensions supplemented?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount of contribution to be made is set out in section 44, which reads:

> Every person to whom this part applies shall, by reservation from his pay and allowances, contribute to the consolidated revenue fund the following amounts:
> (a) while in receipt of pay and allowances of twelve hundred dollars per annum or less, five per centum thereof;
> (b) while in receipt of pay and allowances over twelve hundred dollars and not over fifteen hundred dollars per annum, five and one-half per centum thereof but not in excess of an amount which would reduce the remainder of his pay and allowances to a rate per annum of eleven hundred and forty dollars; or
> (c) while in receipt of pay and allowances over fifteen hundred dollars per annum, six per centum thereof but not in excess of an amount which would reduce the remainder of his pay and allowances to a rate per annum of fourteen hundred and seventeen dollars and fifty cents;

Those are exactly the same percentages provided for in the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What happens to a man's contribution when he retires before pensionable age?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It depends upon what the basis of retirement is. If an officer retires voluntarily, his contribution is paid back. If he has not had at least ten years' service, is most cases of retirement he would receive a gratuity equal to one month's pay for each year of service.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. PROBE: The expenditures under the Militia Pension Act undoubtedly will increase considerably with the proposed expansion of of the permanent force. In order to make the different clauses of this bill more intelligible I think the parliamentary assistant should indicate the probable cost to the treasury when members of the enlarged permanent force begin to take advantage of the retirement benefits. If he cannot give this information now, perhaps he will have it prepared and tabled as soon as convenient.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I have not the figures for which the hon. member is asking—that is, the cost projected fifteen or twenty years ahead. I shall be glad to have these statistics prepared. I have only the figures, which my hon. friend has himself, of the amounts expended during the years previous to the war. I do not think these could be used as a basis of comparison, because the provisions of the new legislation are different. Under the new legislation the pension is based on the average pay and allowances for the last six years, whereas most of the pensions paid prior to the war were based on one year's pay and allowances.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—"Force."

Mr. HARKNESS: Paragraph (f) of this section states that "service," in the case of a man, shall not include time served without pay in the force. The only time a man serves without pay, so far as I know, is when he is absent without leave or is under detention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This applies particularly to the naval services. My hon. friend is quite right; that would be the time when a contributor is not receiving pay—when he is absent without leave, and so forth.

Mr. PROBE: I think paragraphs (e) and (f) should be considered together. I should like to have the assurance of the parliamentary assistant that clause (f) would not mean time spent by a man in the non-permanent forces.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. PROBE: As I read paragraph (e) it means that an officer shall receive credit for time served in the non-permanent active militia or on equivalent duties at the rate of half time, whereas (f), if it follows directly from that, means that a man who was not a commissioned officer would not be given credit for the time served in the non-permanent force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Paragraph (e) applies particularly to the navy, and is intended to put the naval services on the same footing as the militia. As my hon. friend knows, half the time served in the militia up to ten years can be counted for the purposes of pension under the present act, and this is to put the naval services on the same footing. Paragraph (f) does not mean what my hon. friend is saying. As he knows, a man serving in the non-permanent militia is on duty and is paid.

Section agreed to.

Section 6—Part V.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is this section to be carried as one, or will each of the different clauses making up part V be considered separately? I think it would be preferable to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it the hon. member would like to ask questions on any section in part V that would be in order.

Mr. HARKNESS: The new section 46 provides that the governor in council may grant pensions, allowances and gratuities to certain groups of people which are specified. Does that mean that in some cases they will be granted and in other cases they will not be granted, or does it mean that they will be granted in all cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I understand it, a pension is always at the discretion of the governor in council. This is similar to the Civil Service Superannuation Act and the Judges Act, and I believe it was also in the old act.

Mr. HARKNESS: Certain of the subsections of section 46 deal with the granting of pensions to men who have had ten years' service but less than twenty years' service, and in some cases it covers men who have had less than ten years' service. It seems to me that the granting of a pension on the scale provided for members of the permanent force to a man who has had no more than ten years' service is unduly generous treatment. These subsections should be explained more fully. I can foresee the situation where many men taken into the army will in say ten, twelve or thirteen years be retired on substantial pensions after a comparatively short period of service. We have not had much time to study the bill and I should like a little information on what I would call the ten-year pension clauses. I would much prefer that these clauses stand for further consideration next year. I would refer to section 46(d)(ii) on page 7 of the bill, especially lines 25, 26 and 27, and in particular to the phrase "and who was not in the forces on the first day of June, 1944." I do not know what that means.

Mr. LAPOINTE: First may I say that no pensions are paid to anyone who has had less than ten years' service. A gratuity may be paid in some cases on the basis of one month's pay for each year of service, but no annual pension is paid unless ten years of service have been completed. What my hon. friend refers to as the ten-year pension clauses cover officers and other ranks who have served for ten years, which qualifies them for pension, and the amount of the pension depends upon the total years served. There is also a clause covering a man who is disabled, and provision for a man who has served over ten years and also served during the late war. A similar clause is in the present act. Then there is also a pension for the man who has served for at least ten years and who, to promote efficiency or economy in the service, is retired. He receives two-thirds of the pension which he would have received if disabled. The clause to which my hon. friend referred, (d)(ii), is to cover an officer who was not in the permanent force before the war but served during the war and whom we wish to keep in the service because of his experience or usefulness. He may be permitted to retire on the grounds set out in (d)(iii).

Mr. HARKNESS: What is the meaning of the phrase "and who was not in the forces on the first day of June, 1944"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is to cover those officers who were not in the permanent force on that date and whom we wish to retain in the service.

Mr. HARKNESS: It is not by any means intended to take care of the man who did not join the forces until after June 1, 1944?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is not the purpose at all.

Mr. HARKNESS: Paragraph (g) is to take care of the contributor who retires voluntarily or is compulsorily retired for any reason. He receives an allowance equal to his total contributions, without interest. The other provisions providing pensions are pretty generous, and it seems to me it would only be fair to pay to the class of contributor mentioned in paragraph (g) his total contributions plus interest.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This same provision exists in the Civil Service Superannuation Act and other government pension acts. The contributions are returned without interest.

Mr. HARKNESS: Even when the man is retired compulsorily?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Whether compulsorily or voluntarily, the same provision applies.

Mr. PROBE: Throughout this whole section runs the phrase "otherwise than by reason of misconduct" and occasionally "misconduct or inefficiency." The governor in council is not obligated to pay an annual pension in such cases. If a man is retired after twenty years' service and is refused a pension, how can he make certain that his case has been justly treated? What recourse has he?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The cases for which, as pertaining to pensions, an officer or other rank may be considered to have been discharged for misconduct are specified in subsection 3, paragraph (a) in case of an officer, and paragraph (b) in case of other ranks. For instance:

(b) in the case of a member of the forces other than an officer,

(i) he is discharged or dismissed from His Majesty's service by sentence of a court-martial; or

(ii) he is discharged by reason of conviction by a civil court of a court-martial, or in the naval forces, is dismissed.

These are cases in which the man would lose his right to pension. In other cases he would have a pension. Now, as to his case being reviewed or given sufficient consideration. I venture to say it would not come under the administration of this act, but rather, where a man is court martialed, he has the usual appeals which are given to other men and he can make a petition, as my hon. friend knows, to have his court martial reviewed and the sentence quashed. But that does not come under this. If the sentence is changed or quashed he will qualify, because this proviso would disappear.

Mr. PROBE: There is one safeguard: section 50 actually covers the procedure, where the treasury board makes its report, and retirement for misconduct is referred to a board of officers to be appointed by the minister, to be known as the pension and claims board, for the purpose of investigation on review. As the parliamentary assistant knows, and as many of us in the house know, what constitutes misconduct in a military sense may not be misconduct in a civilian sense, and it seems to me that where the military authorities have ruled misconduct the right of appeal of the individual service man should be to some board other than a military one. Would the parliamentary assistant express an opinion or offer a suggestion with reference to that phrase "board of officers" on page 11, line 22 of the bill? If instead of a board of officers reviewing these appeals we had someone not connected with the military service at all, there could be no element of injustice and I would say that once they disposed of a claim their judgment could be accepted all round. A military tribunal has rigid standards of military misconduct which might not be tenable in an army that is functioning in peacetime.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can only repeat that the man cannot be discharged for misconduct, according to the terms of this bill, except as a result of a decision of a court, be it a court martial or a civilian court. He can go through the usual procedure and the usual channels which are available to anyone in the army to appeal from that decision. Again, the board referred to in section 50 can recommend that in spite of this discharge for misconduct he be granted a pension.

Mr. PROBE: But my objection is that the appeal is to a board of "officers".

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree with the hon. member that there are cases in which a man can be court martialed for some military offence, some breach of discipline which in the light of civilian living would not constitute an offence. But I suggest that that is something which the man who enlisted in the army has to put up with. When he joins the army he renders himself liable to the Army Act and the various regulations which are enacted for the army, and similarly with any of the other services. He is informed of that, he knows what the law is as far as he as a soldier is concerned, and he must abide by it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to refer to section 6.

Mr. BRADETTE: It was carried.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to point out to hon. members that section 6 of this act begins on page 3, ends on page 14, and includes all the sections from 42 to 56.

An hon. MEMBER: You had plenty of notice before it was carried.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We have had the bill several weeks, I suppose?

Mr. STIRLING: Three days.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We have not carried clauses 42 to 58 under section 6.

Mr. BRADETTE: It has been carried.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, perhaps you would like a little fight about it. I want to refer to section 42. I notice that—

(i) "service" means time served in the forces and includes, for the purpose of making contributions and of computing pensions, allowances or gratuities under this part;

(ii) time served in the civil service or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police;

Can any person coming out of the civil service or the mounted police and joining the army include any time that he has had either in the service or the police?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, the time counts which they have served in the civil service and during which they have contributed to the civil service superannuation fund. The reason for this is that they continue to contribute in the army on the same basis and the same percentage of their pay. In other words a civil servant who has after six or eight years in the civil service contributed yearly five or five and a half per cent, according to his salary, may join the permanent force and continue to contribute.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Assuming that a person were to move out of the Department of Agriculture and join the army, the time served in the department could be reckoned as pensionable time and considered as service as far as he is concerned?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That applies to any branch of the civil service?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was wondering about the meaning of section 42, subsection 1, paragraph (iv):

(i) in the case of any person appointed to or enlisted in the forces on or after the first day of April, 1946, one-fourth of the period of service counted as service in the non-permanent active militia in respect of army personnel; as service in the auxiliary active air force or the Royal Canadian Air Force (auxiliary) in respect of air force personnel; and as service in the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve or the Royal Canadian Navy (reserve) in respect of naval personnel;

Is that class the same as it was under the old pension act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; in the old act it was half the time served in the militia; under this act it is one-fourth of the time served in the militia.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the assistant give us a typical case? Take an officer whose pension is contributed on the basis of say $2,200, and who would be contributing six per cent deductible for his pension; that gives him about $132 a year. Suppose he serves for a twenty-year period; what would his pension then be? Compare that with, we will say, a ranking soldier whose pay and allowances amount to $1,000 a year, and who is contributing only five per cent, which would be $50, and he has served twenty years. What would the pensions be in the two cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The pension would be twenty-fiftieths of the average of his last six years' pay and allowances. That would be the pension to which he would be entitled upon being retired. Should he die instead of being retired at that particular time the pension which his widow would receive would be one half of what he would have received, and if there were any children each child would be entitled to one-fifth of the widow's pension up to $300, and if the child were an orphan, up to $600.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is, to each child.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To each child, but in the case of a widow and children the total amount cannot be more than three-quarters of the full pension which the contributor would have received had he been retired instead of dying; and should there be no widow, the total amount received by the children cannot be in excess of what the widow herself could have received.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A man in receipt of $2,200, who contributes for nine years and then voluntarily retires can receive no more than this gratuity, which is the equivalent of one month's pay for each year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, if disabled or compulsorily retired.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What happens to the contributions of about $1,100 in this case, he has made during the nine years he has been in?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have not figured it out, but I am sure his gratuity would be more than the amount he had contributed to the fund. In the case mentioned by the hon. member he would receive a gratuity which would represent about 8·5 per cent, whereas he has contributed either 5, 5½ or 6 per cent.

Mr. JAQUES: I will not mention any names, but the case I am about to discuss is familiar to the minister. I wish to use it to illustrate what I think will be a great hardship upon a number of officers and men. An officer in the permanent force with fifteen years' service, including certain years at R.M.C., has a disease of the nerves, Parkinson's disease, which in a few years will cause total disability. He was discharged last month on account of this disease. He tried to have the discharge postponed for another month because he understood that this act was coming up for revision and that if he were still in the army when the bill now before us was passed he would then benefit, being entitled to a service pension under the act. Having been discharged the month previous, however, he finds himself and, as he says, a number of others are no doubt in the same position, excluded from the provisions of the act. This man has now fifteen years' service less one month, including four years at R.M.C., three years in the R.C.N.V.R., and seven years in the R.C.A.S.C., but he will not be eligible for disability pension because the trouble first appeared while he was at R.M.C. and according to the experts in the D.V.A., including Brigadier Melville, under the present regulations he is not eligible for service pension, having less than twenty years. He says he understands that the new part V of the Militia Pension Act "is soon to be discussed" and that if he were on the strength at the time of its passing he would receive the benefits of this legislation, disability pension and service pension. He goes on to say that his situation is desperate.

This man is in no way fitted for civilian life. He has no income; he has a disease which will get progressively worse; he has a family to support, and he says it was imperative that before July 20 he should take some steps to make himself eligible for benefits under the proposed legislation. After July 20 he would be discharged, and, inevitably under the circumstances, would be ineligible for the pension. For that reason he tried to get his discharge postponed.

I took this up with the department and with the chief pensions advocate but apparently I was not successful. This is the position of this officer, a major, after fifteen years' service in His Majesty's forces. Through no fault of his own, in consequence of a disease by which he will become totally disabled, he now finds that beyond some gratuity he will not receive any benefits under this revision of the pension act, which, had his discharge been deferred until the passing of the act, he would have been entitled to receive. He says there are a number of others in the same case. It does work a great hardship on these men. Could not something be done to include those who were discharged just prior to the passing of the act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I fully appreciate the situation which the hon. member has mentioned. It is quite true that under the proposed legislation, the new part of the act, this officer would probably be pensioned off. At present the statute does not permit of a pension in his case. All I can say is that when he joined the service he knew the conditions as regards both pay and pension, and he joined at a time when the regulations were such that no one could be pensioned before twenty years. Under special circumstances which are indicated in the act and of which he was aware, the officer is entitled to a gratuity of one month's pay per year of service, which would be eleven years, because I do not believe that the four years of Royal Military College service is pensionable service; but he cannot qualify for a pension under the act which legislated in these matters when he enlisted in the service. I shall be glad to have the case looked into, although my hon. friend says that has already been done. I do not know whether I shall be able to help, but if he will give me the particulars I will see if there is anything that can be done toward helping this particular case. I am afraid that is all I can say.

Mr. JAQUES: It is probably true that this man enlisted with his eyes open, but a pension is a long time to look forward to. The point I wish to make is that had he retired on his volition this summer it might be different; but he did everything he could to postpone his retirement, because he knew that the act would be amended. It would have meant only another month had he been allowed to remain in the active force for eleven years, and then he would have received the benefits of this act for the rest of his life. As it is now he will receive no benefit, other than a gratuity, which will not help him very much. There may be many others like him. A few years from now this man because of his physical condition, will be unable to do anything for himself. He will have no pension, and will have no way of making a living or supporting his family. I should like to appeal to hon. members of the committee in order that something should be done. I am not saying that this is exactly within the scope of the bill—I do not think it is—but there should be some way of dealing with cases of this kind.

Mr. BENTLEY: We are dealing with section 6, or are we dealing with the bill paragraph by paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 6 has been carried, but further consideration is being given to the bill. We are not dealing with the paragraphs as such.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have a number of questions on new section 51. Before I deal with this section I should like to say that I heartily concur in what the hon. member has just said, that there should be some practical arrangement made to take care of cases of the kind he mentions.

New section 51 says:

> No allowance shall be granted to the widow or any child of a contributor under this part
> (a) if the person to whom it is proposed to grant the allowance is in the opinion of the treasury board unworthy of it.

The explanatory note reads as follows:

> This is similar in principle to subsections (2), (3) and (4) of section 9 of the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

What is the standard of measurement the treasury board uses to decide whether a person is worthy or unworthy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid that I have been given no information as to what the exact standard is to judge whether someone is worthy or unworthy to receive an allowance.

Mr. PROBE: Does it depend on how she dresses?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so. I believe the treasury board acts only as a result of investigations made into the circumstances of the particular person, similar to what is done with regard to veterans' allowances, where at times the allowance is taken away from the veteran and given to his wife because it is considered that he is using the money for purposes other than that for which they were given. I understand the same procedure is used here. I doubt very much whether it often happens.

Mr. BENTLEY: There would not be a regulation covering it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, there would be regulations of the board covering this matter.

Mr. PROBE: As I see it, the actuarial value of a military pension after thirty-five years of service is considerably greater than the pension payable to a civil servant after thirty-five years of service, because a military pensioner may retire at age fifty-five and the civil servant retires at age sixty-five. I believe I am correct in that. Combined with that is the fact that for the purpose of the Militia Pension Act "service" includes service in the civil service. Suppose a man has been in the civil service up to about the age of fifty-two. He then decides that he would like to retire at the age of fifty-five. He says: I will have thirty-five years' service and I shall get a pension ten years longer than otherwise. I presume the parliamentary assistant can explain to the satisfaction of the committee that there is a safeguard which prevents a man from transferring at age fifty or fifty-two from the Department of National Health and Welfare to the Department of National Defence, the permanent force, staying there for a year or two and then getting a full pension because his employment in the civil service is counted in full, as I understand it. That is why I want this cleared up. Can a man transfer from the civil service to the permanent force a year or two before the age of fifty-five, assuming that in the normal course of events he will have thirty-five years' service in the civil service or the permanent forces by virtue of these regulations? What is to safeguard the government from having to pay an extra ten years' pension to a man who can get into the permanent force at that late date?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would say the safeguard would be the age set by the army for acceptance of personnel. As my hon. friend knows, the age limit for each rank is much lower than it was. I would say that in the case to which my hon. friend refers the individual could not be accepted in any rank in the permanent force because he would be of an age limit higher than the age which is being accepted at the present time. The age limit of the interim army is fifty, and that is for ranks of brigadiers and above.

Mr. PROBE: The point is that there is no opportunity to make a transfer from the civil service. The regulations of the armed forces will be sufficiently rigid to prevent such a juggling of positions for the purpose of securing an earlier pension.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air service—civil aviation division—

433. Airways and airports—construction and improvements including radio facilities—(revote $562,200)—captial, $3,837,425.

Mr. HAZEN: I believe I asked the minister for a breakdown of this item. He said he would get it for me.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yes. The field services, including a revote of $277,800, amount to $1,664,135; radio-aviation, with a revote of $284,400, amounts to $2,173,290.

Mr. FRASER: How does Canadair fit into this picture?

Mr. HOWE: It is not in this picture. Canadair is owned by the government, through the agency of the Department of Reconstruction. It is operated as a crown plant, under a management contract. There is no vote for Canadair in these estimates.

Mr. FRASER: But Canadair builds for Trans-Canada Air Lines, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it is building planes for Trans-Canada Air Lines, and also for the R.C.A.F. I believe it is also building for other air lines. It is doing a business of building and converting aircraft.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the relationship between the figures for civil aviation on page 58 of the estimates, and those given on page 283 under demobilization and reconversion? Are there two departments? There is one under the heading of administration at page 283, and on page 58, while there is a small item for administration, there is a larger one for salaries and office expenses. Is there just the one organization with these two different amounts of expenses?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The first list of items represents the normal aviation estimates. In other words, it is a continuation of the work carried on by the department prior to and during the war. The reconversion estimates apply to expenses incurred in taking over airports which were formerly military establishments. They have been taken over, and a great number of them are being operated. They are in process of being incorporated into the airways system.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice an item of $17,500,000 for purchase of aircraft, under the heading "liquidation of contracts" at page 279 of the estimates. Is that quite apart from or is it related to the civil aviation division?

Mr. HOWE: That is a reconstruction item. It has nothing to do with this vote.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many airports are affected under this item?

Mr. HOWE: There are some 183 airports of which some forty are affected by this item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do these airports make service charges for aircraft of the R.C.A.F., Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines which come in? How are these rates arrived at, and what are they?

Mr. HOWE: Civil aircraft are charged. There are no charges against government-owned aircraft. Or, let us say, there is no charge against the R.C.A.F.; we will put it that way.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How about T.C.A. and C.P.A.?

Mr. HOWE: T.C.A. pay for the privilege of using the airport, usually on a monthly basis. It is $150 a month for the first trip, and $100 for each successive flight in the same day. In other words, if there are six landings of a T.C.A. plane, one would be charged at $150 a month and the succeeding landings at $100 a month.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And how about Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: The same rates.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What are private rates?

Mr. HOWE: They vary according to the size of the aircraft. Those rates are subject to revision. They are around $1 to $2 per landing, for private aircraft.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the revenue last year in this operation?

Mr. HOWE: The total revenue was $193,348.64, for the year 1945-46.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say a word on this item? Does it mean that to a very large extent we are subsidizing transportation by air? In other words, we are paying an enormous amount of the cost of everyone who flies. First of all, is that correct, and if so, why?

Mr. HOWE: It is true that the costs of operating aviation facilities in the country are greatly in excess of the revenue derived therefrom. A study is being made of ways and means to close the gap, and it is the intention that ultimately it will be closed entirely. My hon. friend will appreciate that because of the upset of war, and the transitional period through which we are now passing, there is bound to be a great gap there. Of course, the costs of building airports are capital charges. But it is my hope that the operating expenses can, in time, be covered by revenue from aviation operation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What has been the experience or what is the history in countries where air transport has reached a much higher level, or is more greatly advanced? Does it pay its way? I understand that the minister is considering wholly operational charges; he regards invested capital as a contribution.

Mr. HOWE: I suppose the United States comes closest to covering its operating charges —closer than any other country—but the gap has not been closed there yet. I think most airports in the United States are self-sustaining. The money is chiefly collected at the airports. However, the weather service is for all the citizens. Only part of the expenditure is devoted to aviation. Radio beams are paid for apart from the revenue service.

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the main line from Winnipeg to Edmonton be ready to put into operation as soon as the airport at Saskatoon is finished?

Mr. HOWE: The progress on the airport at Saskatoon has been disappointing. We had hoped to have the service in operation early this summer. All the other facilities are ready, and the service will be put in operation as soon as that airport is finished.

Mr. KNIGHT: When is it expected that the contract will be completed?

Mr. HOWE: It is expected that the airport will be completed sufficiently for use this autumn. I cannot give the exact date, say around November 1.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The other day the minister said that consideration was being given to a future policy in connection with municipal airports. In my constituency there are several municipal airports, but I would refer particularly to the Tadanac municipal airport at Columbia Gardens. This airport is not within a municipality but serves a surrounding district. I should like to know if airports like this will receive any consideration.

Mr. HOWE: I stated that because of the large expenditures during the war it was the intention to keep expenditures on municipal airports to the minimum this year, but consideration would be given to working out a future policy for municipal airports.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many airports are in the Churchill area and in the Yukon and northwest territories?

Mr. HOWE: In the Churchill area we have an airport at Churchill and one at The Pas. I have not the number for the northwest territories, but there is a chain of airports known as the northwest staging route. There is also a series of airports down the Mackenzie river. For example, there are airports at Fort St. John, Fort Smith, Smith river, Grande Prairie, Watson lake, Whitehorse and Edmonton.

Mr. MacNICOL: And Dawson?

Mr. HOWE: That is operated by the Department of Mines and Resources; it is not part of this system.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are those airports all completed?

Mr. HOWE: They are all completed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are they used principally by Canadian planes, or by others as well? I understand Standard Oil is carrying on work in that area. What would be the rate charged to planes of the Standard Oil that might use these airports?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no Standard Oil operations in that area, and I know of no Standard Oil planes operating there. If they did come in they would be charged the rate for itinerant planes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it intended to enlarge the Malton airport to handle larger ships, or is it large enough for all practical purposes?

Mr. HOWE: The area of the Malton airport is quite sufficient for all types of traffic, but a project is under way to lengthen the runways to take four-engine traffic, and we hope to have that completed this autumn.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What length of runway will be required?

Mr. HOWE: Between five and six thousand feet.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that all they are at Malton?

Mr. HOWE: They are about 4,000 feet to-day, and we intend ot lengthen them to at least 5,000 feet.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are not the runways in the northwest staging route at Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson lake and Whitehorse 10,000 feet in length?

Mr. HOWE: Those were built for the heavy traffic of the American B-29's, and the longest runway is 6,000 feet.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is anything contemplated in connection with the de Havilland airport?

Mr. HOWE: No. That airport is being passed to the R.C.A.F. as a base for a squadron.

Item agreed to.

Air service—civil aviation division—

437. Grants for advanced aeronautical instruction and to aeroplane clubs, including grant of $5,000 to the Canadian Flying Clubs Association, $33,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the distribution of this vote last year?

Mr. HOWE: There was a grant to the light aeroplane clubs as a means of promoting an encouraging interest in aviation, $2,500; grant to the Canadian Flying Clubs Association, $5,000; grant to the university of Manitoba to assist in maintaining courses of advanced aeronautical instruction for students of aviation, $500; and a grant to the national research council to provide for aeronautical research conducted on behalf of the Department of Transport for civil aviation purposes, $25,000.

Item agreed to.

Air service—meteorological division—

438. Meteorological service, $581,300.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Can the minister give an estimate of the total cost of the meteorological service of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The present cost of the service is about $3,500,000 per year. What it will be, I do not know.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Surely there is some plan in contemplation. People are a little critical about the amount of money being spent on these meteorological services as compared with the amount spent previously.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend says he is a little critical, but I am more critical. Facilities were greatly enlarged during the war. Stations were built in the north and in Newfoundland, and the services throughout Canada were enlarged to take care of the military airdromes. The greater frequency of service on the airways made it necessary to enlarge the staffs there. Radio-sonde is a new and expensive development which involves the sending up of balloons equipped with radio in order to obtain details of weather conditions at the higher strata of the atmosphere. All in all we are giving a vastly better weather service than before the war, and a vastly more expensive service. I am endeavouring to find out to what extent the cost can be reduced. This estimate is about the war time level, but I hope to be able to present estimates in the future that will show a reduction.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there any way other than by going through all the estimates and picking out items here and there by which we can get the full cost of the meteorological service, so that we can form a judgment upon it? Is there available anywhere a full statement and breakdown of the cost?

Mr. HOWE: There is no single vote covering everything, but the cost can be found by adding three figures together—the normal aviation figure, the reconversion figure, and the figure in the supplementary estimates. Another reason for the cost being greatly in excess of pre-war is aviation across the ocean. The expenditure on transatlantic aviation is very heavy indeed. It is not stabilized as yet, but is is hoped that the cost of operating can be stabilized within the next year, so that a better picture of the cost can be shown than is the case to-day. Canada is responsible for the transatlantic service, as regards both Canada and Newfoundland, and the cost is a heavy item.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there an arrangement by which the United States and other countries share the cost of the meteorological service?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. In the war Canada assumed responsibility for weather services across the north Atlantic to the extent of facilities in Canada and Newfoundland. PICAO is studying a fair allocation of the cost of all weather services between all users, and if Canada is paying more than her share we shall be compensated for any surplus, and if we are paying less than our share we shall be charged accordingly.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would ask the minister if he does not think it would be reasonable in future to have a statement compiled showing the full cost of the meteorological service so that we could judge it intelligently. I am not going to waste more time on that now.

Mr. HOWE: Next year there will be only two sets of items, in the main estimates and in the supplementaries. This year there are three, because the treasury board believed that a year of transition was necessary for it to be able to measure the expenditure properly. That is, the direct peace time expenditures can be shown against earlier peace time expenditures, and the transition expenditures can be shown against the war expenditures. The supplementary items are over and above anything contemplated when the main estimates were prepared. This is the last year for transition estimates.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister not think that the part of the cost of the meteorological service which is attributable to the air service should be shown as part of the cost of the air service, so that we might know what all the costs were for the air service?

Mr. HOWE: The cost of the aviation meteorological service is included in the aviation estimates, but the Department of Transport pays the whole cost of meteorological services for all purposes, including the weather service to farmers, to fishermen and to all parts of Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the information which is collected from the government meteorological stations sent to one particular place, such as the observatory, for compilation and transmission?

Mr. HOWE: All the weather services are put on the teletype, which goes to every station in Canada. We have local forecasting centres which take such teletype information as is of value to them. The information that is collected from the weather observation stations is sent to all parts of Canada and the United States; similarly we get on our teletypes in Canada all the information that is collected in the United States.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

440. Administration of the Radiotelegraph Act and regulations, $169,200.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is a slight increase in this item. Does that mean that another station is being added? I do not suppose it does. This is one item that the department could safely increase, because it gives the far north a marvellous service.

Mr. HOWE: The Radiotelegraph Act is the act for policing all the airways. It allocates all frequencies, and establishes the rules of the air as they affect radio and radio broadcasting. The increase is caused by statutory increases.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

441. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radiotelegraph stations, operation and maintenance, $860,800.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the reason for this substantial increase? Being a non-technical man I should have thought that with the ending of the war the stations would have had less work to do.

Mr. HOWE: These stations are an aid to navigation. Additional stations are being installed. These stations are operated on a twenty-four hour basis, so that the cost of operating them is fairly well fixed. The increase is caused by taking over more stations.

Mr. FRASER: You have new stations on the great lakes?

Mr. HOWE: No new stations have been established there recently, but new stations are added from time to time on the great lakes.

Mr. HAZEN: At page 245 of the estimates the last item but one is "contracts." Above that is "freight express and cartage," and "repairs to buildings and equipment." What kinds of contracts are these?

Mr. HOWE: The department has had a contract for years with Canadian Marconi, which operates certain stations on the east coast and the great lakes. Instead of manning these stations with civil servants they are manned through a contract with the Marconi Company.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does this item include the beam service for transcontinental airways?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under what item does that come? Is there a beam service on the far northern routes?

Mr. HOWE: That is under item 435, for $1,100,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: How far does the beam extend? Does it go up to Yellowknife?

Mr. HOWE: There is a beam from Edmonton to Whitehorse, and a beam being installed at Yellowknife. Yellowknife is the end of the beam.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not go to Norman Wells, though.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I have had representations, and I believe the minister has, from civic bodies at Smithers asking for repeater stations there to cut out a lot of interference with their reception of radio. It is a widely scattered area, and they have very poor reception. They have been constantly asking for repeater stations. Is there any hope of these people in central British Columbia getting that service?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend refers to a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. He is referring to a repeater station for broadcasting. It is a matter of policy for the broadcasting station as to whether a repeater station will be installed there or not; and I assume that the matter of funds is also for the C.B.C.

Item agreed to.

Air service—radio division—

442. Suppression of local electrical interferences, $265,850.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does this mean that the government, not content with controlling human beings, is now controlling the forces of nature? If so, how far does it go?

Mr. HOWE: This item provides services for suppressing interference with radio. As my hon. friend is aware, there are a good many appliances which can make radio reception in a community very bad indeed. If complaints are received, the officers operating under this vote have a car which is equipped to track down radio interference; an examination is made and the interference detected and orders issued that the interference shall be removed. However, it is under this vote that these radio licences are collected for the C.B.C.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How do we keep the two departments separate? There is first of all the administration of the Radiotelegraph Act, then there is radio direction finding stations; then, suppression of local interferences; and also the issue of radio licences. Are these items kept separate, or do they go together?

Mr. HOWE: The two services are operated by the same staff. That is why I thought the one vote covered both. But there was a separation of the services—the cost of collecting radio licences being separated from the cost of removing interference with radio reception. This is owing to the fact that it has been the practice to bill the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with the cost of doing away with interference to radio reception.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The two things really go together?

Mr. HOWE: It is the same organization.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As I have pointed out before, the cost of collection of radio licences of $4,200,000 amounts to $527,000. It is a nuisance to the people concerned.

Mr. HOWE: The cost of collecting radio licences in Canada is lower than in any other country we know of; it is about twelve or thirteen per cent of the amount collected. I believe that the last time I saw the figures the cost of collection in England was about twenty-eight per cent of the total received.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): To carry it to its logical conclusion we should tax each radio receiving set. The man who has ten sets should not have to pay only $2.50 if the man who has only one set pays $2.50. Also it seems to me that there should be some other basis of collection. There is no equity in the way it is done now. There is no more reason for taxing the fellow who has a radio set than there is, as my colleague said the other night, for taxing the man who has a washing machine, or something of the kind. I cannot see any economy about a system which costs $527,000 for collection and which, further, has no real principle as a basis of collection.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will recall that at one time we did attempt to collect on a separate licence for each individual receiving set, but we found there was absolutely no way to check the number of receiving sets in a house, and we had to depend solely on the honour system. I may say that the honour system was so disappointing that we decided to make honest men of a great many people by going back to the principle of one licence for one house. I think the contention is that one can only listen to one set at a time, and that it is the same music whether you have one set or six, so there is a certain justice in making the charge for the broadcasting services of the country so much per household instead of so much per radio set.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why not so much per listener?

Mr. HOWE: Well, you could do that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): One person may have a radio set to which others will listen. There is no rhyme or reason in having a plan for the collection of money when the money can be obtained at much less cost from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask three questions. I gather from what has passed between the minister and the hon. member for St. Paul's that the questions may have been put already. How many receiving stations are there in Canada, including those installed in motor cars; what revenue is received from them; and how much does it cost to collect the revenue?

Mr. HOWE: I can give the hon. member that information in compact form. During the fiscal year 1945-46 which terminated on March 31 last a total of 1,754,351 receiving licences were issued, resulting in a gross revenue of $4,260,379.14. From that latter amount must be deducted total commissions paid, of $295,775.90, and the cost of administration, $231,818.48, leaving a balance of cash to be turned over to the broadcasting corporation of $3,732,784.76 in respect of receiving licences. In addition to the moneys from commercial broadcasting station licences, an amount of $40,500, being the fees accruing from the issue of private commercial broadcasting station licences, will also be turned over to the C.B.C.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The minister mentioned the amount paid in commissions for the sale of these licences. Last year when I was home one of these men making the house to house canvass came to collect the licence fee and I paid it gladly. My neighbour, when paying his, asked the man where he came from, whether he was a veteran, what experience he had had in such matters, and I found to my surprise that this man who was selling licences on behalf of the government was, to begin with, not a veteran, that he did not even live in the constituency in which he was selling licences, and was very uncertain as to how much he received from the sale. Since the government is so anxious to provide employment for veterans, I would ask the minister first of all how these house to house canvassers are employed, whether they need be veterans, whether they are required to be residents of the locality in which they collect the licence fees, which obviously would be helpful since they would know the district, the streets and the area; and finally whether there is a veteran's preference in connection with the house to house sale of radio licences.

Mr. HOWE: There has always been a veteran's preference in these appointments. The appointments are recommended by the district office of the department and are managed by that office. It is not a very attractive job. It pays twenty-five cents per licence, but the difficulty is that if the man calls on you and suggests that you buy the licence from him, you have the option of going to your post office and getting it there.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): But they ask to see your licence, and of course, everyone who has not a licence buys one. That is a way to make money.

Mr. HOWE: It is not bad for a month or two, but we expect these men to stay with the job to the bitter end, taking not only the flush period that comes around the first of April but also the dull period around the first of November when practically everyone has already bought a licence and it is merely a matter of cleaning up.

Mr. GOLDING: In my constituency the Legion makes the recommendation.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I hope that practice will extend to the riding of Vancouver North and that the Legion will recommend the appointment and not someone in some other constituency.

Mr. HOWE: Some time ago the practice was established by the department of accepting a recommendation from a member of the Legion. It is not an attractive job, as I have said.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Any ob is better than no job at all.

Mr. GOLDING: One of our members, who is not at present here, is interested in the method of insuring, as far as the C.B.C. is concerned. What companies carry insurance for C.B.C., and how is the insurance distributed?

Mr. HOWE: The matter of C.B.C. insurance appertains to another department of government.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister the figures for prosecutions for non-payment of radio licence fees?

Mr. HOWE: The total for the year 1945-46 was 8,749 convictions.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that if there was any interference, all a person had to do was to put in a complaint. To whom do they complain?

Mr. HOWE: The district inspector of radio for the locality.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. FRASER: Is that in the Department of Fisheries?

Mr. HOWE: No, Transport.

Mr. FRASER: Is it not a fisheries truck that is used?

Mr. HOWE: No, a transport truck equipped for the purpose.

Mr. BENTLEY: How many years does the department consider it reasonable for a radio owner to wait until interference is checked?

Mr. HOWE: If he had to wait years he would get used to the interference.

Mr. BENTLEY: That is what we have been doing.

Mr. HOWE: We try to give prompt service.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In connection with the question of interference, there are many electrical appliances that are sold without condensers. I refer particularly to the electric razor. In the last few months quite a number of these razors have been sold, and the moment one is turned on there is interference with all the radios in the block. I suggest that the electric appliance people be compelled to equip these appliances with proper condensers before they are sold.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Transport is particularly concerned about the electric razor situation, and discussions are going on with the provincial authorities to endeavour to set up standards which will do away with the interference. We are working on that and hope to get a razor that will cause less interference.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that a transport truck was used to check up on interference. I understand that at Perth it is a marine and fisheries truck that is used. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is thinking of the old department of marine and fisheries, which existed up to 1936. Perhaps they have not changed the name on the truck but that department disappeared in that year and became the Department of Transport.

Mr. FRASER: They still have "Marine and Fisheries" on the truck.

Mr. HOWE: That truck may be retired one of these days.

Mr. McKAY: I believe the minister indicated that there was a 25-cent commission allowed the house to house canvassers, but he did not say what commission is allowed the postmaster.

Mr. HOWE: The amount allowed canvassers is 25 cents; staff post offices, 5 cents; accounting post offices, 15 cents; radio dealers 15 cents; banks, 15 cents; R.C.M.P. 25 cents.

Mr. FERGUSON: The law would seem to be objectionable when you have 8,000 convictions. The department is trying to enforce the law and it costs us over half a million dollars to collect a little over four millions. I should think the government would endeavour to collect that amount in some other manner which would not necessitate the prosecution of 8,000 Canadian citizens annually. Apparently prosecutions under this method are necessary. Is it not possible to devise some other method of collecting this money, which seems to be needed, and collecting it with less difficulty and far less inconvenience to the public?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be very glad to receive suggestions. The matter is studied every year, and no country in the world has succeeded in collecting at lower costs. I can assure my hon. friend that if prosecution stopped collections would rapidly drop.

Mr. FERGUSON: I realize that collecting would be necessary, but it does appear that the service must be irritating since it is somewhat similar to the Ontario Temperance Act which was unpopular and unnecessary.

Mr. HANSELL: We seem to be dealing with two items. Item 442 deals with suppression of local electrical interferences. Has that item been carried? If so, I should like to ask a question on item 443.

The CHAIRMAN: We should first of all carry item 442.

Item agreed to.

Air services—radio division—

443. Issue of radio receiving licences—(transport department only), $223,515.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to know why this amount is $223,515 when the department will require more than that, although I do not know that I am willing to vote more than that. The position is that if the amendment to the broadcasting act is passed this session, which I hope it is not—

Mr. MacNICOL: Everybody hopes the same thing.

Mr. HANSELL: The position will be that the Department of Transport, which has been receiving over half a million dollars in collection fees, will not receive that amount in the coming year. If they are to continue the collecting of fees and pay the expenses connected therewith, instead of needing the appropriation of nearly a quarter of a million they will need three-quarters of a million. I do not see anything in the supplementary estimates which would indicate that they will receive that amount. How are they to get this extra half million?

Mr. HOWE: This item covers the cost of collections to the department, but it does not cover the commissions which are deducted by the collecting agencies. In other words, the funds paid over by the collecting agencies are paid with the commissions deducted. About $290,000 of commissions are deducted from the fees themselves. If the new bill passes, in order to square with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it will be necessary to enlarge this vote by about $290,000 to cover the commissions which are paid to post offices, banks, dealers and private individuals who are assigned to the job of collecting radio licence fees.

Mr. HANSELL: Why does the minister give the amount which he just mentioned when the amount turned over to the corporation last year was $527,000 odd? There is very little difference in the amount we are asked to vote for 1946-47 from the amount we voted for 1945-46; yet the department turned over to the C.B.C. only $500,000. The figures do not jibe.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend does not mean "turned over"; he means held back from the gross receipts of radio licences.

Mr. HANSELL: Which they will not now be able to hold back.

Mr. HOWE: If the bill passes they will not. We may have a further supplementary estimate at the end of the year to make up the difference. At the moment we are not obligated to pay to the C.B.C. any more than the net of the collections. There will be an item for perhaps $100,000 which we shall have to vote as a further supplementary payment before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. HANSELL: The committee should know that this involves an additional taxation of the people to the extent of half a million dollars.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. LENNARD: A few moments ago the minister said that he would like suggestions as to other methods of collecting the necessary radio licence fees. I think it was about eight years ago that on a similar item in committee I made a suggestion to tax radios at their source. In other words, when a new radio is sold a tax of $10, $15 or $20 should be put on it. Then there would be no further taxes; there would be no collection fees. At the present time I doubt whether half the radios in the country are paying taxes in the form of yearly fees. If the minister adopted my suggestion he would save half a million dollars which it costs to collect these fees regularly; he would have the taxes and the people would not be bothered from year to year with this nuisance tax.

Mr. HOWE: That was considered some years ago, probably on the suggestion of my hon. friend, but it was found to be undesirable. It would mean an excise tax on the sale of radios. It was recommended against at the time. Perhaps it could be reconsidered when the matter is again up for consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like to offer a suggestion. Since this extra cost to the Canadian people comes out of the people who are negligent in buying their operating licences, if after thirty days a person were charged a double fee or perhaps a triple fee for their licences it might save the people of Canada a great deal of money. In that way the people who are delinquent are the ones who would pay the bill.

Mr. HOWE: The fines collected are usually more than triple the cost of the licences. As a matter of fact the cost of prosecutions is more than covered by the fines collected.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would it not be possible to increase the licence fee if the licence were not bought within a certain date? Is it not possible to impose penalties such as are imposed if one does not pay his water or light bill?

Mr. HOWE: The probabilities are that the people who are willing to take a chance on being prosecuted when the fee is $2.50 would be equally willing to take a chance on being prosecuted if the fee were $5.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is worth looking into.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: My understanding is that where a battery set is used the licence fee is reduced. There are places where electricity is supplied for only a certain period of the day. In my district particularly, it is supplied from six o'clock in the evening on. Some people think they should be given the same consideration as owners of battery sets, and I agree with them. In my district the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with its usual generosity supplies electricity only from six o'clock at night to six o'clock in the morning. I believe the people in that district should have the same consideration as owners of battery sets. I took the matter up with the department and it received official recognition by an official in the department. I was given to understand in writing that my suggestion would be put into effect. Later on, some other official had the idea that it should not be put into effect and he cancelled the previous order. It was embarrassing to a member of parliament. On receipt of the letter from the first official I sent out the information to my constituents telling them that it would be done. Then the other official cancelled it, and as that happened in June a year ago it was most embarrassing to me. I suggest to the minister that it is a reasonable request, particularly in places where power is supplied, as in this particular instance, only from six o'clock at night to six o'clock in the morning. These people should have the same consideration as the owners of battery sets; it would mean a reduction of only fifty cents, as I understand it.

Mr. HOWE: There are only two classes of licences. There is the licence for a set which is designed to use electric current, and which costs $2.50, and the licence for a set which is designed to use batteries, which is $2. I presume that the rate of licence fee depends on whether it is a set designed to use electricity from the mains or one designed to use batteries. It is pretty hard to make other classes for places where the current is on for only certain hours of the day. I hardly think that would be possible.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: With all respect to the minister, I disagree with him. I cannot see why, when the power is used only at certain hours of the day by the company which is licensed by the minister's department, it should be so difficult. It is producing power between six o'clock in the evening and six in the morning. When I say this I am referring to North Bend, British Columbia. I cannot see why it should be so difficult, at all, when the power is not for sale on a twenty-four-hour basis.

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me that it would be better all round for the citizens of North Bend if they would get battery sets. Then they could get radio reception twenty-four hours in the day and pay a $2 fee.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: For the benefit of the Minister of Reconstruction, let me say that the citizens in Fraser Valley riding are not going to go back to the horse-and-buggy days for the C.P.R., or for anybody else.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is the minister responsible for the introduction of frequency modulation in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: That is a matter for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. ADAMSON: And that is also true of television and short wave stations.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: It is not under the minister's jurisdiction, at all?

Mr. HOWE: The policy is not; but the actual licensing is under this department. This department is responsible for the administration of radio telegraph communications. In other words, my hon. friend could not put in a frequency modulation broadcasting station unless he had a licence from the Department of Transport. The Department of Transport would issue the licence only on the recommendation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is in charge of policy in all broadcasting matters.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister has raised a most important point. Why is this under his department? I cannot figure it out at all as to why they are separate.

Mr. HOWE: There are many more uses for radio channels in the air, in other branches of communication, than there are in connection with radio broadcasting. Radio broadcasting is but a small band in the radio spectrum, whereas there are very large bands used for other purposes. It is necessary that all bands of the spectrum be controlled by one department. That is to prevent encroachment from one band to another. For example, there is far more radio used in connection with radio beams than in connection with broadcasting. For that reason, and on account of the international aspects of the policing of the radio airways, it is under one act called the Radio Act. That act is administered by the Department of Transport which is, by far, the largest user of the airways.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I understand that fully. I think what the minister is saying is an argument in favour of what I was saying.

Mr. HOWE: They are administered by one department. Is the hon. member referring to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The whole thing.

Mr. HOWE: It was originally in our department, but it is now in another department. I think it makes very little difference.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was separated during the war. Why is it not put back again?

Mr. HOWE: There is no particular reason for it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to mention one more thing with which I disagree. I believe registration comes under the jurisdiction of this act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the Radio Act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In connection with the collection of licences, we had a man appointed to make collections for the entire district. For instance, I have in mind the Chilliwack district. Then, for some unknown reason, the minister's department abandoned that idea, and collections were made through the post office. The department has not collected as much in that district as it did before. It was all very fine for it to say that it wanted to help the veterans. But the veterans are not interested in it, I understand, because they have to buy a book of so many licences and prepay the charges. Then the department reimburses them. In the Chilliwack district there was an excellent collection of licences made when there was a regional collector, and one man collected for the entire area. Then, because Doctor Frigon or somebody else wrote a letter that idea was rejected. I want to know why the minister rejected that system of making collections where, certainly in British Columbia, he collected far more licence fees than he is collecting at the present time.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to support the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Exactly the same condition prevails in my own constituency. I suggest to the minister that if he wishes to give jobs to veterans he should cut out the post office collection, and give the men a territory, as they had it before, so that they could make a living out of it.

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty in connection with cutting out collection agencies is that we compel people by law to pay a broadcasting fee. If we are going to do that we think there must be ways and means through which a private individual would be able to comply with the law. If we are depending entirely upon a collector, we must depend upon the collector calling upon an individual persistently until the licence fee is paid.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. HOWE: The individual must be able to find a place where he can pay the fee at any time which suits him within the period in which payments are due. Whether we have collectors in the country districts depends entirely upon whether we get results from them. A study has been made, and we find that collectors do well in the cities, and that collections are improved by having the collectors. In the country districts, generally speaking, we find there is frequently not sufficient revenue to warrant a collector doing the job he should do. In many country districts we have found it better, from the viewpoint of the department, not to depend entirely upon the collectors.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the minister get the figures for me because, so far as my district is concerned, I dispute what he says. I am afraid the officials back here in Ottawa are thinking purely in terms of West Ottawa, or some of these districts in Ottawa where one can either get on a street car or walk up town. But that is not true in the rural districts. I defy the minister to show me anywhere in my district where he is able to get collectors for the fee he pays at the present time. The figures in his own department will show, as they were submitted to me, that we doubled our collections when we had the individual process. I believe that is universal in all rural parts of Canada, so far as I know. Why the department changed, I cannot say.

One of the highlights of this session, so far as I was concerned, was the other day when for the first time in the House of Commons a minister admitted he was wrong. I should think that might be so in this instance. The minister should admit he was wrong, and change the system. If the officials do not want to change it, then let him fire the officials and put some in who will make the necessary change.

Mr. FRASER: Why will the Department of Transport not allow into Canada tank receiver and transmitter sets? I ask this question, because War Assets Corporation have sold many of these sets in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: There has been no effort to keep tank receiver sets out of Canada. But it so happens that they cannot be used on Canadian wave lengths. They are all built specially for the military type wave length. They would be quite useless in Canada. However, if anyone wishes to bring one in, he may bring it in.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad to hear the minister say that, that anyone may bring one in. I have in mind a man in Peterborough who wrote to me in this connection, and stated he had been refused permission to bring one in, although he had ordered it in the United States and paid for it. In my letter to the department I mentioned the fact that this man wanted the set only for instructional purposes in the armouries. The official in the Department of Transport said that he could not get it in and the customs said he could not get it in. Then he tried to send it back to the United States and they would not take it. It is now half-way between, and the man is out his money despite the fact that War Assets have sold a great number of these sets in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: My officer who knows about these matters simply advised the customs that there was no purpose in this man bringing it in because it could not be operated with the frequencies we have in Canada. If he wishes to bring it in we will make sure that he is able to do so, because there is no law that prevents him.

Mr. FRASER: This man has been trying to get it in for months. The last letter I have from the United States is dated July 16, which was three or four months after he came back.

Mr. HOWE: Take it up again with the customs.

Demobilization and reconversion—air service—civil aviation division—airways and airports—

628. Construction and improvements, including radio facilities, capital, $8,163,000.

Mr. FRASER: Just what does this cover?

Mr. HOWE: This is to provide for the construction and improvement of air fields and radio services. There is an item of $600,000 for administration. Then Edmonton-Winnipeg route, $2,186,000, chiefly for the airport at Saskatoon and certain radio beams. Then the main T.C.A. route, $1,155,300. Then the great lakes route, which is the route from Toronto to Winnipeg, $1,993,400, and the Mackenzie river route, $391,000. There is also the Montreal-Goose Bay route, $144,000, and the Malton-Windsor route, $163,000.

Mr. FRASER: What is covered in connection with each route?

Mr. HOWE: These are capital construction expenditures for airports and radio ranges on the route.

Mr. FRASER: And the layout of fields?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, everything.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think it should be made clear whether or not the Aeronautics Act, 1940, is to apply, whether we are to allow private corporations like the T.C.A. and the C.P.A.L. to take these over or whether the government is to continue to operate them. Is it the intention of the government to build these facilities and turn them over later on to private corporations, or will the government maintain them as a government concern? I think the whole matter should be settled now. Certainly the Canadian people will be wondering whether or not the Canadian government is building up something in order to turn it over later on to private corporations.

Mr. HOWE: It is government policy to own and operate all radio facilities and all weather services. There are two classes of fields, those built and owned and operated by the government and those built by municipalities with government assistance and operated by the municipalities. In order to discuss policy, it would be necessary to find out the particular field the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many stations are on the Edmonton-Winnipeg route?

Mr. MacNICOL: We had that before.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then there is what is called the main route, $1,828,000; I presume that is the Trans-Canada route?

Mr. HOWE: The only two airports affected by this vote are Saskatoon, where we are expending $1,606,000 on the airport and $80,000 for lighting and power, and Winnipeg, where we are expending $460,000 for the airfield and building construction and $40,000 for lighting and power.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What airfields are being established to serve mining in isolated districts?

Mr. HOWE: I do not seem to have that information in detail, but there is one airfield at Red Lake, there is one at Chibougamau and I believe there are three or four more in remote areas. There is one at Lac La Biche.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister allow this item to stand until he is able to give us complete information with regard to these airfields in remote areas?

Mr. HOWE: All right.

Mr. ADAMSON: When two or three air lines use an airport operated by the Department of Transport what is the basis of the charges made? Take Regina, for instance, which is used by the C.P.A.L., the T.C.A. and an American airline; on what basis are charges made, on a cost basis, on a per ton basis or on an annual basis?

Mr. HOWE: I gave that information earlier this afternoon. An air line using a field is charged $150 a month for the first daily flight and $100 a month for each succeeding flight. Then there is the scale of prices for itinerant planes on a weight basis.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—air service—civil aviation division—

631. Radio aviation services, $1,625,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How does this item differ from item 441 under the radio division? What does this item take in?

Mr. HOWE: This covers the operating of the radio facilities, whereas the other item was a capital item.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think we should have a breakdown of this item. I notice in the details we have temporary assistance, $805,975. On page 283 of the estimates there is an item of $805,975 for temporary assistance but no details are given of how many persons that covers or what their work is.

Mr. HOWE: Those are radio operators and diesel operators. They were taken on as temporaries for war purposes, as contrasted with the operators under the civil vote.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many are there of them?

Mr. HOWE: There are 425 personnel, of whom 370 are radio operators.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—civil aviation division—

633. Care, operation and maintenance of Royal Canadian Air Force airfields transferred to the Department of Transport, $275,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What airfields have been taken over? Have they been declared surplus and are they awaiting disposal?

Mr. HOWE: They have been taken over by the Department of Transport from the R.C.A.F. No disposition has yet been made of them. Some may be returned to their pre-war use and others incorporated in the airways. At the moment they are simply in the custody of the department, under care and maintenance.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can the minister give the names of these stations?

Mr. HOWE: There are 180 of them. Does my hon. friend want them all?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was particularly interested in the ones in Saskatchewan.

Mr. HOWE: The ones in Saskatchewan are at Assiniboia, Boharm, Brada, Brora, Burdick, Buttress, Caron, Chandler, Davidson West, Hagen, Halbrite, Hamlin, Lethburn, Osler, Outram, Ralph, Rhein, St. Aldwyn, Vanscoy and Wymark. These have been declared surplus. They are mostly fields used to relieve the larger airfields.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—civil aviation division—

635. North East (Crimson) staging route—maintenance of airfields, $65,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is this the route from Goose Bay or the route to Churchill?

Mr. HOWE: There are three stations on the route, Le Pas, Churchill and Southampton island, and from there to Blooie East and Blooie West and Iceland.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has it been in operation?

Mr. HOWE: It is in operation as far as the Canadian bases are concerned, but the route is very little used.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—radio division—

638. Radio direction finding stations, radio beacons and radiotelegraph stations—Operation and maintenance, $226,565.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is this the item under which the radio beam for the air service comes?

Mr. HOWE: This covers beams for the marine service. It is the same appropriation that we discussed under the other item.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—civil aviation division—

628. Airways and airports—construction and improvements, including radio facilities, capital, $8,163,000.

Mr. HOWE: Surveys were undertaken in 1945 at Red Lake and Chibougamau, and construction work at both points to serve the mining districts will be under way this year. Provision has been made for certain other airports in other remote areas, one at Lac La Biche, which will be charged to this vote.

Mr. ADAMSON: How are you getting on with the one at Red Lake? Is it under construction and when will it be completed?

Mr. HOWE: It is under construction. I cannot say how we are getting on.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How about Saskatoon?

Mr. HOWE: We hope to get Saskatoon in operation late this year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

344. Office of the coal controller—Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $4,500,000.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I have had correspondence with Telkwa Collieries. Seemingly they cannot ship coal from there to Vancouver at the same rate as that at which it can be shipped from Edmonton to Vancouver. Is there any way in which they could be given the same subsidy on freight as the Alberta collieries.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I do not understand the first point my hon. friend made. There is a subsidy on Alberta coal moving to British Columbia.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It is by way of a freight subsidy, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The Telkwa Collieries, between Prince George and Prince Rupert in British Columbia, do not get in on that. They are "behind the eight-ball' in that respect.

Mr. HOWE: There is no subsidy on movements of coal within British Columbia.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Under this item I wish to ask the minister what progress is being made in completing the royal commission report on the inquiry into the coal and fuel requirements of Canada, production, importation and consumption. I should also like a statement from the minister with respect to the present situation as regards Caandian requirements for 1946-47; and also as to the subsidies being paid for the production of coal in Canada at the present time, particularly eastern Canada. I should like the minister to make what statement he is prepared to make about the whole coal situation as it affects eastern Canada.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Justice McLaurin, a member of the royal commission, assured me that the writing of the report is well under way and that it will be in the hands of the government within the next two months.

The coal situation as far as eastern Canada is concerned is far from good. Bituminous coal is coming in from the United States fairly well at the moment, but we have had serious interruptions. Between the coal strike in the United States and the shipping strike on the great lakes we lost some six or seven weeks of shipments; and while the shipments are coming in now at better than normal rates, the deficiency in bituminous coal has by no means been made up. However, we hope that by continuing shipments up to the close of navigation we shall have enough coal in eastern Canada to carry industry through the winter. The situation in connection with industrial coal is much better than the situation in connection with domestic coal. In domestic coal we hope to have about sixty-five per cent of our total requirements by the end of November, and prospects are that after that we shall have to depend on hand-to-mouth shipments and on coke which we can take away from our steel operations. The situation is by no means clear. We have undertaken a movement of coal from Alberta, which is helping out to some extent, but there is a serious deficiency in imported coke. Some is available this year, whereas last year we imported about 1,300,000 tons from the United States. This year we are importing less than half that amount from the United States for the reason that we are unable to buy coke in greater quantities from that country. Supplies of anthracite compare fairly well with the supplies last year. It is the serious decline from 1,300,000 tons of coke which is causing us worry. Just how we shall overcome it I am not sure. However, we shall keep fighting as long as the requirement exists.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the minister make a statement as regards the present rate of shipment of coal from Nova Scotia to central Canada? Those of us who were concerned with the securing of this market in central Canada for our surplus production, some fifteen or eighteen years ago, in Nova Scotia are very much concerned and disappointed regarding the volume of coal available for use in central Canada. At that time we aimed at a million, a million and a half or two million tons annually exported from Nova Scotia to central Canada. During the war years we realized that the local demands had increased greatly in the maritime provinces, and for bunker coal as well, and we could understand why there was a curtailment of shipments to central Canada. We secured this market after great effort and with the sympathetic consideration of the people in central Canada, and we hoped to hold this market, once gained, for future years. I for one was hopeful that the people of Nova Scotia would respond to the requirement in central Canada and make special efforts to supply it. I may say that in our efforts over the years the master mind in this part of Canada was Mr. Frank Neate, who had a thorough understanding of the markets, the quality of the coal, our capacity to produce the cost of transportating, and, I might say, the obligation upon the people in Nova Scotia to supply these markets. Some weeks ago the minister gave me a statement that he was fearful that the total supply from Nova Scotia for shipment to central Canada in the current year would not exceed 350,000 tons. That was a great disappointment to me, for I had hoped that Nova Scotia would be able to supply a much greater quantity. Is the minister prepared to make a more complete and up-to-date statement at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: We shall be very glad to move up the St. Lawrence every ton of coal which Nova Scotia will produce this year. Unfortunately, for the last several years the maritime provinces have not been able to take care of their own requirements. Last year we moved half a million tons up the St. Lawrence, but we had to ship more than that into the maritimes from United States sources. I do not think the prospect this year will be very much different; I expect it will be about the same as last year. On balance, the three maritime provinces have no coal surplus to their requirements. The fact is that imports would be necessary if they kept all their coal, but in the natural course of trade a certain amount is shipped up the St. Lawrence and replaced by United States coal.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the minister prepared to make a statement as to the amount of subsidies paid the different producers of coal in Nova Scotia in the current year, and if those subsidies are still being earned and still being paid? I should like a detailed statement if the figures are available, but if the minister does not wish to give them publicity at this time I shall not press for the information.

Mr. HOWE: The production subsidies for coal in Nova Scotia last year were about eight million dollars.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What would the amount be for the current year?

Mr. HOWE: About the same. There has been little change.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I want to follow up what I said about that freight differential between the Telkwa collieries and those in Alberta. The minister says that payments are not made within a province; but there is a section of our province which is completely divorced from the lower end. Why can they not get the same treatment as the Alberta collieries?

Mr. HOWE: All I can say is that it has never been the policy to subsidize movements of coal within a single province. We subsidize interprovincial movements but not movements within a province.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to carry this a little farther. There is an open field for development in there, and it is being hamstrung because of this policy and because of the lack of bunkers at Prince Rupert. They had to turn down orders. That country is greatly interested in becoming industrialized. In fact, it is the last great frontier for industrialization in Canada, and we would like to see the department take an interest in the matter and put in bunkers in Prince Rupert besides equalizing the freight rates.

Mr. HOWE: I am told there are no bunkers at Prince Rupert. Applications have been made, and I shall be glad to have them looked up and give the matter consideration. There should be bunkers there.

Mr. GILLIS: Has the minister any comparable figures of production in Nova Scotia for 1940 and 1945? He said he was paying $8 million in production subsidies. Did he get any increased production because of the subsidies?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Production is actually down?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Subsidies is not the answer?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the report is received will it be made public in the ordinary course? This question is of such vital importance that it should engage the maximum public attention as soon as possible.

Mr. HOWE: It has not been the policy to publicize subsidies to individual mines.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am speaking of the report to which the minister referred, the report of the coal commission.

Mr. HOWE: That will be widely publicized, I assure you.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the matter of subsidies to the Nova Scotia collieries and production in those collieries, has the department ever made any investigation to ascertain the cause of low production if there is low production?

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty in the past has been the unbalanced man-power situation. Apparently skilled mining is done by the older men and there is not the replacement at the mine face. The hon. member for Cape Breton South could give a better explanation than I can. The fact is, they have not been able to get the number of skilled coal miners to balance mine operations. Had they been able to add fifty per cent more skilled miners, face cutters, production would have gone up proportionately, I believe.

Demobilization and reconversion—

604. Departmental administration, $5,991,500.

Mr. BENTLEY: What progress is the department making with regard to assisting the provinces in the construction of necessary and useful projects? I believe the policy has been to assist the provinces and municipalities in worth-while undertakings. Will the minister give consideration to the building of a bridge across the South Saskatchewan river at Saskatchewan Landing as a necessary project both for the province and for the dominion? It is not merely a provincial affair, as he might be inclined to suggest. It is important from the point of view of tourist traffic and in the interests of people who are carrying on business in some other part of the country. There is a good deal of traffic back and forth; it is not altogether provincial, and there is a variety of reasons why there should be federal assistance in the building of the project.

Mr. HOWE: There is no over-all arrangement at the moment for subsidizing provinces in highway construction. A proposal was put before the provinces at the dominion-provincial conference; but, as my hon. friend is aware, no over-all agreement was obtained from the conference. There are one or two special arrangements between the provinces on highways of particular benefit to the present situation; but, generally speaking, there is more construction work in the country than can be undertaken, and as far as the Department of Reconstruction is concerned we do not think large highway programmes should be undertaken this year.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

605. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the department or an agency of the department; miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses and for recoverable advances, $29,900,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say a word about this item, particularly the $17 million for purchase of aircraft?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend refers to the item for purchase of aircraft, which is a revolving fund in the department covering the operation of aircraft plants. That particular item refers to Canadair. It is revolving fund to cover the operation of Canadair and the fund will be liquidated through the sale of airplanes to the customers. It is largely an item to cover the cost of twenty-five Douglas planes which will be purchased by Trans-Canada Air Lines. When Trans-Canada Air Lines pay for the planes that account will be liquidated.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
606. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board, $10,000,000.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Agriculture stated that there would be an allocation of $115,000 from this item to pay for the services of an engineer to check the engineering details in connection with the Red Deer diversion scheme. Has that been completed, and is there any possibility of tenders being let for construction work in the near future?

Mr. HOWE: That fund is available for reconstruction projects, but the projects themselves are handled by other departments of government. For instance, the Red Deer project is being handled by the Department of Agriculture. Whether the allocation has been made from this for the Red Deer project—I am told it has not—the Department of Agriculture is aware that the cost of the survey can be allocated from this fund upon application. I believe the Minister of Agriculture in his estimates stated that the work on the project this year would be confined to a survey and engineering studies but that no construction would take place in the current year.

Mr. QUELCH: Has not any money been used from this item for checking surveys? I understood that the surveys would be checked this year by an engineer and, if they proved satisfactory, tenders might be let next year to carry on construction work. I thought that work was to be done this year.

Mr. HOWE: I know that the surveys are under way. So far as I am aware, the Department of Agriculture has not asked for an allocation to pay for the cost of the surveys. I presume they are being financed at present from current funds in possession of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MacINNIS: The item says, "subject to allocation by the treasury board." Has that allocation been made yet? The minister also said that when the allocation was made it would be under another department, but I doubt whether the item will be repeated in another department, so that if we are to get information we shall have to get it from the minister.

Mr. HOWE: The item is used for financing other departments. For example the Department of Agriculture asked for an allocation of $115,000, I think, to carry out surveys and engineering studies of the Red Deer river project. That money will ultimately be paid by the Department of Agriculture and refunded to this account. We financed other really urgent projects from it, not large projects, but certain projects have been financed from this account for a period. Ultimately the departments which do the spending include the amounts in their own estimates, and from those estimates reimburse the reconstruction department.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the minister know of any other projects which have been approved or started under this item?

Mr. HOWE: Electric power development on the Snare river—that is near Yellowknife—$200,000; Yellowknife road, $18,500; South Saskatchewan river project, $137,000; Red Deer river diversion project, $115,000.

Mr. QUELCH: That has not been paid out?

Mr. HOWE: No. These are the allocations to date.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is the Yellowknife development under construction?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister any idea when they may expect power?

Mr. HOWE: No; that is actually for the Department of Mines and Resources to say.

Mr. MacINNIS: Outside of the items mentioned it is not likely that the remainder of this item will be used this year.

Mr. HOWE: No; it is an emergency item put in as part of the reconstruction programme, so that work could be provided in an area if acute unemployment developed, but fortunately acute unemployment has not developed and the fund is little used.

Mr. FRASER: For actual construction or planned?

Mr. HOWE: It can be used for construction. The fund is administered by the reconstruction committee of the cabinet; and if a department has a project not included in its normal estimates for which a good reason can be given for immediate commencement—and the best reason is that there is serious unemployment in the area—then the reconstruction committee of the cabinet may allocate funds from this vote temporarily to get the undertaking under way.

Mr. FRASER: I notice this item is up $5,000,000. Why is that?

Mr. HOWE: The original vote was for a short period, as I remember, the remainder of the fiscal year. This $10 million vote is intended to cover the full year. Really it was put at $10 million in the expectation that an agreement would be entered into with the provinces which would call for joint expenditure on certain types of public works. It is probably larger than is needed under the present circumstances but it was put in at $10 million. To date the expenditure has been small.

Mr. FRASER: Some time ago the minister's department sent men to different municipalities and asked them to plan reconstruction work. Is that right?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; but that had nothing to do with this vote. That was part of the plan for maintaining a high level of employment which we hoped to work out in conjunction with the provinces. The purpose of those visits was to see what urgent work was required and to make sure that the work was fully planned at this time so that it could be used as a balance-wheel to any sudden drop in employment. The proposal which the dominion government made to the provinces was that if the work was filed as a fully planned project it would be entitled to a twenty per cent grant at the time, if carried out at the time the government said the work was needed.

Mr. FRASER: The provinces would have to work with the municipalities?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: There are no crown companies included in this item?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would not this item cover items such as the Toronto street railway subway?

Mr. HOWE: It does not cover anything at the moment because no agreement between the dominion and the provinces was arrived at. There is no such arrangement in effect at the present time. There is no such thing as a timing grant at the moment and may not be unless there is an ultimate agreement with the provinces. Had the agreement been reached certain parts of the Toronto subway proposal would have been a suitable project for timing. It is a project which would have received a grant had it been built at the time that the Department of Reconstruction indicated the work was needed in the interests of unemployment.

Mr. ADAMSON: At the present time there is no grant available for the Toronto street railway subway?

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under any item in the department?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If an agreement had been reached there would be no grant until such time as the dominion government said it was necessary to go ahead with the work in order to take care of unemployment?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In any event, in to-day's circumstances there would probably be some considerable time before that money would be granted and it would be only as an emergency measure.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like the minister to say a word on the urgency of some of these projects, for instance, the Red Deer diversion scheme. Are we to understand that that scheme will not be constructed until such time as unemployment increases? There is real urgency for that scheme to be carried out as early as possible. In that area we have had four years of drought, and drought again this year. The sooner the government can construct that project, the sooner drought relief will be taken care of. Surely the government is not going to wait for unemployment to increase before the project is carried out.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing to prevent the Minister of Agriculture from including a vote in his estimates to carry out that project whenever parliament decides to give him money for that purpose. That would have nothing to do with this vote. The vote under reconstruction is simply to take care of emergency situations.

Mr. QUELCH: The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is limited to $3 million. The Red Deer diversion scheme will cost $6 million.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing to prevent parliament from granting the Department of Agriculture such amounts as may be determined.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Would this item cover surveys of natural resources which we may be short of at the moment? Would it apply to that?

Mr. HOWE: If an urgent situation came forward which would commend itself to the reconstruction committee it might be used for that purpose; but ordinarily surveys are taken care of by regular appropriations in the appropriate departments which conduct the surveys.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: In this connection, we seem to be fairly short of coal. I should like to bring the Ground Hog coal region to the attention of the minister. The board of trade want an appropriate survey made of it because there are millions of tons of coal there comparable to Pennsylvania coal. They should like to know what they have there, and they are anxious to see that country surveyed as soon as possible.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
607. Housing development, including commitments of previous years, $42,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Housing is a big question. Perhaps the minister could give us some information on this vote.

Mr. HOWE: Of the approved estimates for the fiscal year 1945-46, approximately $17 million will be unexpended as at March 31, 1946, but will be required for the fiscal year 1946-47. In other words, $17,000,000 of the amount is a carryover from last year. In addition, there is the amount of approximately $25,000,000 required for the construction of 6,000 new houses. These houses will be constructed at various points across Canada to meet the emergency housing requirements for the accommodation of war veterans and their dependents.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would they be constructed under Wartime Housing?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That does not come under the other company?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It comes under the Department of Finance, does it?

Mr. HOWE: The money for the insurance companies is raised by the insurance companies, and through a loan from the government under the Central Mortgage Corporation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any other government corporation which operates under this fund?

Mr. HOWE: No, it all refers to Wartime Housing.

Mr. LENNARD: Do I understand that the home conversion plan, which was being taken over by Central Mortgage Corporation, was taken over recently by the Department of Reconstruction?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: Does it come under this item?

Mr. HOWE: No. The funds for that were voted to the Department of Finance, and when the branch was taken over the vote came with it.

Mr. LENNARD: I will say this, that it has been battered around from pillar to post, in three different departments. There have been so many rash promises made to home owners that the minister will have to have an extremely good man in his department to straighten the matter out. He has taken over something that will be pretty hot in the next few months.

Mr. HOWE: I view it with alarm, myself.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
608. Emergency coal production board—production subsidies, loans and rentals as may be approved by the governor in council, $12,000,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: What does this item include? I am prompted to ask this question because I saw only recently that the Ontario government, owing to the emergency situation, was trying to reopen or re-develop the low-grade lignite areas in northern Ontario. Would this item assist in that operation? I realize it is thoroughly uncommercial. I am in agreement, however, that when winter comes, almost any low-grade type of coal, which is found to be combustible, might be put into a furnace. Would this include such materials as oil coke, a by-product of the refineries?

Mr. HOWE: I am happy to say that the lignite deposits in northern Ontario are entirely the property and responsibility of the provincial government. This subsidy does not cover coke.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is it for?

Mr. HOWE: I am told transportation subsidies are paid on coke, in certain circumstances—to maintain the price ceiling, if the coke has to be moved a considerable distance. For instance, on coke moved from the Algoma Steel Company plant to Toronto, there would be a subsidy to the extent of part of the freight rate.

Mr. ADAMSON: This is purely a transportation subsidy on fuel, is it?

Mr. HOWE: No; this is largely a production subsidy. Since costs of production of coal in practically all the mines in Canada increased during the war, an attempt was made to maintain the price of coal to the consumer. The extra pressure was taken up by production subsidies to the operators.

Mr. ADAMSON: This has nothing to do with the present coal emergency? It is similar to an item which was carried through during the war?

Mr. HOWE: It was built up during the war.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to ask whether the amount of subsidies paid is the same to producers of coal in Nova Scotia as it is to producers in British Columbia and Alberta, or do they vary from field to field?

Mr. HOWE: It varies all across the board. An attempt has been made to equalize, on an area basis. For example, in Alberta there is a pattern for subsidy, and in Nova Scotia there is a pattern, but the Alberta pattern is by no means the same as that in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will the minister give us the subsidy per ton in one field in Nova Scotia and the subsidy per ton in one field in Alberta?

Mr. HOWE: The independent mines in Nova Scotia have a subsidy of sixty-five cents a ton and it goes up to $2 in some cases; in New Brunswick the subsidy is $1 a ton; on Vancouver island it is sixty-five cents, and in Alberta it varies from thirty to sixty-five cents.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the total cost of the production of a ton of coal in the coal fields the minister mentioned?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to give that information at eight o'clock.

Mr. HARKNESS: How much of that $12,000,000 will be paid to each of the four provinces, respectively, for which the minister gave the rates?

Mr. HOWE: About $8,000,000 to Nova Scotia, about $400,000 to New Brunswick and the remainder about equally divided between Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. HARKNESS: It seems to me that in comparison with the amount of coal produced, these figures do not work out—unless all the Alberta coal receives the 30-cent rate. In other words, the figures do not jibe.

Mr. HOWE: Steam coal in Alberta is not subsidized.

Mr. HARKNESS: There is no subsidy on it at all?

Mr. HOWE: No, there is no subsidy on steam coal. The subsidy is on domestic coal in Alberta.

Mr. HARKNESS: It is on all types of coal in other provinces, is it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Why is that?

Mr. HOWE: The mines in Alberta are in a profit position. The ceiling price allows them a profit. That is not so in Nova Scotia.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. HARKNESS: Then the purpose of this subsidy, essentially, is to keep in operation what would otherwise be nonproductive mines, is it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is corrcet.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Demobilization and reconversion—

609. Administration, reconversion and operation of crown companies and/or crown plants, $20,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister give us a few words of explanation about this item?

Mr. HOWE: This vote covers a number of more or less clean-up items. The first has to do with Canadian Arsenals. A nucleus of war production capacity was established, the purpose being to make it possible to produce any article that was produced during the war in the permanent arsenals set-up. Specialized equipment was taken over from a number of plants and moved into the establishments which are included in the arsenals set-up. The cost of operating Dominion Arsenals for the full year is included in this item and it amounts to $3,600,000. It is probable that that is an outside figure because the practice of Canadian Arsenals is to charge for work carried on. A nucleus personnel must be kept on and there must be funds with which to pay that nucleus, but if a fair amount of work is provided by the services for the arsenals it is probable that they will be self-sustaining. The $3,600,000 is estimated to be the cost of operating the arsenals on a minimum basis.

The Dominion Arsenal at Quebec is put in as a separate item. This is the cartridge case and small arms division, and the amount provided is $1,828,940, for expenses of operating Quebec arsenal. I might say that that is much less than the pre-war vote for the same arsenal. Then the operating expenses for Chalk River are included, this amount being $4,500,000 which it is estimated will be needed to operate this plant for a full year.

Then, in connection with the winding up of crown operations I might say that when the actual work stops expenses go on for a time. This item is included to cover the cost of liquidating these crown companies. It includes operating companies such as Canadian Arsenals, Eldorado Mining and Refining Company, Park Steamship Company, Polymer Corporation, War Assets Corporation and Wartime Housing Limited. In some cases the winding up of companies involves a loss arising out of operating expenses during the winding-up period, and in this connection there is a long list of some thirty companies, which I shall be glad to read if my hon. friend wishes this information. The amount here is $10,071,060 for winding-up costs of these crown companies, making a total of $20,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suppose the arsenals which are to be operated now will be more or less pilot plants so that we shall be able to make anything we want and carry on experiments?

Mr. HOWE: The arsenals are publicly owned plants designed for the purpose of making small quantities of everything that the forces may require. The understanding is that larger quantities would be made by private industry based on shop practices established in Canadian Arsenals. The net result will be that Canada will be much better equipped to move into the large-scale production of war material than she was when the present war broke out.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is similar to what we suggested in this house many years ago, that we should have arsenals capable of keeping a number of men employed so that we would be able to move into large-scale production and have trained workmen who would be available as foremen to carry on the work.

Mr. HOWE: That is exactly the purpose.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconstruction—

941. Termination of contracts — further amount required, $25,000,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It seems to me that $25,000,000 is an astonishing large amount to be coming along as a supplement. Why is it that this vote could not have been calculated more accurately?

Mr. HOWE: It is entirely a revote. It was anticipated that a larger number of contracts would have been settled before the end of the last fiscal year. It is necessary to revote $25,000,000 in order to permit contracts to be settled this year which were provided for in the estimates of 1945-46, but which could not be settled until after that vote had lapsed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why is it in the supplementary rather than the main estimates?

Mr. HOWE: Item 610 in the main estimates is for $50,000,000, but that item was made up before the end of the last fiscal year. It was expected that the outlay during the last fiscal year would have been greater than it was, and therefore, in addition to the $50,000,000 voted in the main estimates, it is necessary to make provision for $25,000,000 in connection with contracts which it was expected would have been settled in the last fiscal year and for which provision was made in the last fiscal year, but for which settlement could not be concluded.

Mr. FRASER: Would War Assets come under this item?

Mr. HOWE: No. There is no vote here for War Assets, but I promised that War Assets could be discussed under an item in these estimates. If my hon. friend cares to discuss War Assets under this item I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. FRASER: I asked a question which was answered, but I have not the answer with me. The navy department gave a list of articles, such as Fairmiles, corvettes, et cetera, which had been turned over to War Assets and I should like to know what War Assets received. I am not referring to the inventory which the navy department handed over, because I know War Assets did not receive all that inventory. At Three Rivers two corvettes were turned over to War Assets, and we know for a fact that many things were taken off those boats. The same thing occurred at Hamilton. A number of people went through he boats, and dental and medical equipment and many other things were taken. I should like to know what was on the ships when War Assets took over.

Mr. HOWE: If there was any pilferage, I suppose that material would not be included in deliveries to War Assets Corporation. We guard these boats as best we can, and if there has been theft it could not be avoided. The cost of guarding them was high, and that was one of the reasons why we wanted to make a quick sale while there was something left on them.

Mr. FRASER: You have now over 1,000 guards with War Assets?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: How many employees altogether has War Assets at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: About 7,000.

Mr. FRASER: Are you taking on more employees at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: No, we have passed our peak. As soon as we empty a warehouse we can relieve ourselves of the cost of guarding it. The peak of the operations of War Assets was passed at the end of July. Up to then we had been receiving material faster than we had been selling it, but the peak has passed and we are now selling a little faster than we are receiving. That trend will accelerate during the rest of the year. So that the staff has passed its peak. My hon. friend mentioned 1,000 guards. Taking in the whole custodian branch of War Assets the number of personnel would be nearer 2,500.

Mr. FRASER: How many departments are there in War Assets?

Mr. HOWE: A complete report of the activities of War Assets was tabled a week or two ago. That would give the information. I dare say the figure of 1,000 guards who are acting only as guards may be about correct, but the entire staff having custody of the articles and materials that have been turned over to War Assets is nearer 2,500.

Mr. FRASER: What building material has War Assets at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: It has no building material other than the material that comes from the demolition of buildings. It is demolishing buildings and salvaging the building material as rapidly as that operation can be carried out. Other than that it keeps no stock of building material.

Mr. FRASER: What about pipe?

Mr. HOWE: No pipe, except as we take it out of the ground on some dismantled project.

Mr. FRASER: You had some new black iron standard pipe some months ago, I understand.

Mr. HOWE: The inventory is turning over all the time; we may have it to-day and sell it to-morrow. Most of the pipe we get goes to Wartime Housing to relieve the shortage there, or to some other government project such as veterans housing. It is turned over promptly.

Mr. FRASER: What vehicles has War Assets at the present time at New Sarum outside of St. Thomas?

Mr. HOWE: We process vehicles as fast as they are turned over to us, allowing time for advertising and the preliminaries that have to be gone through in disposing of government property. I venture to say that War Assets never had in its custody any vehicle for more than two months.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER: You did at that place. Perhaps they were not under War Assets but under navy or army or air. But they were stored there for much longer than two months.

Mr. HOWE: We can deal with them only after they are turned over to us and after documentation is completed. I still think I am right, and I am so assured by officers. We have never had a vehicle in the custody of War Assets for more than two months.

Mr. COYLE: That place is in my riding. I venture to say that there are 8,000 trucks sitting in the yard there to-day, and some of them have been there for over a year.

Mr. HOWE: Who owns them?

Mr. FRASER: The government owns them. You cannot pass the buck.

Mr. HOWE: My responsibility begins on the day that official documentation is completed and the property turned over to War Assets. Before that, I do not know that they exist.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Someone is at fault. Would the Minister of National Defence be the proper minister to ask about the matter? Surely we should not be put off with that as the final answer.

Mr. HOWE: The services can give you the date on which the trucks were turned over to War Assets, or I could if I had more time. The committee on war expenditures has been given that information. That committee was the place to get details of that kind.

Mr. FRASER: According to the answer I got, there should be just a few hundred trucks with War Assets at the present time, but I understand there are still thousands of trucks in that place. The information just does not jibe.

Mr. HOWE: The only trucks that War Assets has at this moment, so far as I know, are some trucks that were crated for shipment abroad. Some of them were being sold in Canada and some outside. Beyond that, we have no trucks in War Assets.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The matter should not be left in that position. We have had the statement made on the responsibility of a member that thousands of trucks still stand there. The minister says that they have not been in the custody of War Assets. Surely, then, we have the right to ask the government as a whole for an explanation of this situation, which seems a preposterous one. We are entitled to know just what the position is with respect to these trucks. Surely this item can stand until we have been given the information, which could be got to-day or to-morrow, or, if not then, the next day, and I presume we shall be here for a couple of days.

Mr. HOWE: This item has nothing to do with War Assets, but I said that War Assets could be discussed on this item.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then let the minister, who is more familiar with these matters, suggest another item on which it would be proper to raise this matter. But he did suggest that War Assets could be discussed on this item, and this question surely affects War Assets, or, if not, the Department of National Defence. Surely we do not want to have this thing just pushed out of sight on a technicality. We should have a statement from someone in the government who knows just what the situation is.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has been a member of the committee on war expenditures, which has been sitting three times a week for almost the entire session. Surely he could ask there.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have not been on that committee for many months, and unfortunately we have not a member of that committee sitting in this quarter of the house at the moment. Again I ask the minister for an answer to this question, which I think should be answered.

Mr. HOWE: There may be various explanations. I do not have the details in mind. I know that Hagersville is a permanent park for military vehicles. Is this town anywhere near Hagersville?

Mr. MacNICOL: New Sarum is half way between St. Thomas and Aylmer. It is a very old settlement.

Mr. COYLE: It is only five miles outside the city of St. Thomas. The information I got was that at one time there were 12,000 trucks there. There are not so many there now, but I would say that there are 8,000 there. Some have been there for a long time sitting right out in the open, ready to run. There was an auction sale or two there, but only a few trucks were sold and they all went to Jews in Toronto.

Mr. PROBE: I am one of those fortunate or unfortunate members of the house who have spent some considerable time in the war expenditures committee attempting to get information like that which is troubling the committee at the present moment. It might be due to the fact that those of us who were on the committee were not skilled in the art of proper cross-examination so that we could pin the witnesses down to a specific point and realize when we had been somewhat side-tracked and had not reached that point. But from time to time we have attempted to get some information and have not always been outstandingly successful.

In the matter of these vehicles which seem to be available, as far as the public is concerned, in such large numbers, I think the minister could very well give the committee a statement on the matter of declarations by departments of government to War Assets Corporation wherein materials which are declared surplus are left in the custody of the service concerned because War Assets Corporation said they did not have the man-power available to take over the materials. In circumstances like that there is, I think, the danger of manipulation.

I will try to illustrate what I mean. Various service groups, notably of the army and air force, attempted to turn over the contents of various buildings in various parts of this country to War Assets Corporation. The number of such declarations ran into several thousands at the time the committee inquired about them this spring. I have not here the minutes of the proceedings, but the exact number is on record of cases where War Assets Corporation stated that they were unable physically to inspect, check and take over the equipment which was declared surplus by the branch of the service. The result of that was something like this. People who are interested in what is contained in these buildings, if they have some means of finding out the contents, can go to War Assets Corporation, and if they are fortunate, secure a release from War Assets of that portion of the material in which they are interested. That actually happened in many cases, because the service organizations admitted to us in the war expenditures committee that some of the declarations they had made to War Assets Corporation had been taken over in part and that they were still custodians of various buildings with part of the equipment which they had originally intended to turn over to War Assets.

That situation perhaps will—and you cannot persuade the man on the street otherwise—if it has not done so, lend itself to some form of favouritism or manipulation, because, if one consumer or dealer can go to War Assets Corporation and get some of the commodities which are contained in the building where these items are stored, and can secure the release of part of them, you still leave the rest of them nominally within the control of the army or the air force, and the War Assets people can at any time say to a prospective buyer, if they are not interested in selling to him, "We have not physically received the goods which you say are in such-and-such a building." I think the minister owes the committee a specific statement concerning declarations covering part of the assets in buildings where the services have attempted to turn over the contents to War Assets Corporation. Would he give us some indication of how his department is now handling that situation?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has referred to a situation which existed seven or eight months ago.

Mr. PROBE: As recently as three months ago.

Mr. HOWE: Not as recently as that. In the very early stages War Assets was attempting to build up a staff which would permit it to take custody of equipment and apparatus as fast as it was turned over by the services. It took time to do that. I have told the committee to-day that at the present time War Assets Corporation has something over 2,500 people engaged in that particular work of maintaining custody of goods turned over by the services. It took weeks to build that staff, but to-day it has a staff, and to-day anything which is declared surplus by the services is in the custody of War Assets Corporation.

I find that this question about trucks was answered very fully at the meeting of the committee on war expenditures held on August 15. The last question is the one which seems to be agitating the committee:

Q. In what province or provinces are the remainder of these surplus vehicles located?

A. As of July 31, 1946, the corporation had the following passenger vehicles on hand located in the provinces indicated below:

Ontario	63	Saskatchewan .	3
Nova Scotia ..	49	Alberta	3
Manitoba	7	British Columbia	22
Quebec	15

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does it give trucks?

Mr. FRASER: These are passenger vehicles.

Mr. HOWE: I think I have the trucks here too.

Mr. FRASER: These are only passenger vehicles turned over by the service departments which have surplus vehicles.

Mr. HOWE: New Sarum is an airport taken over by the army for processing vehicles. About two months ago there were some four thousand vehicles, of which 3,000 to 3,500 have been declared surplus to War Assets but have not been processed for sale. I believe the matter is being actively followed up at present and probably some have already been disposed of. In other words, the army is processing these vehicles, for transfer to War Assets Corporation. In other words, they are in the course of being transferred from the army to War Assets at this time.

Mr. FRASER: The way the trucks have been serviced is a disgrace. In many cases the trucks look absolutely good: the agent is notified that a truck is at such-and-such a place for him; he sends his tow truck for it; he tows it to his place; it looks absolutely all right; they start to fill it up with water and service it, and they find that the block is absolutely split, owing to the fact that it had not been drained when it was laid away.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is giving an excellent reply to the many critics who said that the government sold those trucks too cheaply. We sell them "as is, where is", and we discount the state of repair of the vehicles.

Mr. FRASER: I know, but they should never have got in that state. It is just carelessness on somebody's part.

Mr. GRAYDON: When the senior member for Halifax brought in his report and presented it to the house I raised the question as to whether or not there was to be concurrence in the report. He was not very sure at the time whether there would be a motion for concurrence, and I did not press him at that moment; but the minister then said that on a certain item—he did not mention any definite item—

Mr. HOWE: This is the item.

Mr. GRAYDON: —of his estimates we might discuss War Assets. But the reason I rise now is that I thought the minister said a moment ago that this was not the item on which we could discuss War Assets.

Mr. HOWE: I said it was an item under which War Assets could be discussed, though I added that the item itself had nothing to do with War Assets. I told my hon. friend that it would be permissible to discuss War Assets under some item in the estimates and this seems to be as appropriate as any, but when it was suggested that this item be held up for some information regarding War Assets it seemed a little unreasonable.

Mr. GRAYDON: If this seems to be a proper time to mention War Assets, I notice in the report of war expenditures and economies committee certain recommendations by the committee to which I would refer the minister. May I ask what steps have been taken, either by himself or by War Assets Corporation, to implement the recommendations which were brought down by the committee in question? My own view, after reading the evidence, is that the committee was lenient in its recommendations so far as the government and War Assets Corporation were concerned, having in mind the nature of the evidence brought out. However, there are some pretty important recommendations; and we ought to have from the minister now, if the report is not to be concurred in, a statement as to how far he is prepared to go with respect to those recommendations, and also what has been done up to date in implementing them.

Mr. HOWE: Many of them had been acted on before the committee had concluded its sittings. The policy of indefinite loan to educational institutions is a matter regarding which the regional offices now have additional authority. How far we shall go is a matter of judgment, but something will be done there. As regards granting to educational institutions a discount equal to that received by any dealer for similar lines, that is under consideration. It is difficult to depart from the one-price policy, but study is being given that.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about No. 2?

Mr. HOWE: That will be permitted under the decentralized policy. Indefinite loan items were formerly handled by head office, and now they are decentralized and are handled by the branch office so that the difficulty of inspection will no longer arise. Regarding "sales at the site," we have been decentralizing to an increasing extent for months and I am told that the decentralizing is now complete. As regards selecting short-supply civilian items for immediate sale, that is being done. In dealing with the disposal of real property as quickly as possible, that has been the policy. As regards making all building material immediately available for construction purposes, that is very active. As regards the non-employment by War Assets Corporation of persons otherwise interested in outside business, it has not been the policy to engage persons under such circumstances. I know of no employee of War Assets Corporation engaged in outside business. As regards greater publicity, I wish we could find machinery. I think War Assets have suffered greatly from lack of publicity, but we are doing our best to get information before the public.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not so sure that it has suffered as greatly from lack of publicity as from the publicity it has received.

Mr. HOWE: We have had wonderful publicity recently, particularly in Maclean's magazine and in Toronto Saturday Night. That has been the greatest tribute paid to War Assets Corporation. I may point out that War Assets Corporation has sold to the end of July $226,523,150 worth of material. It is selling at the rate of considerably more than $20 million a month, and a great journal has devoted pages of its valuable circulation to an item on batteries costing less than $400, and exposing the claim that a battery which cost this country $14 could be salvaged and resold to replace a battery which cost the government $7. That is the story on batteries. As regards salvaging equipment, we have a reclamation depot that has sold close to $10 million of salvaged equipment which had been damaged beyond the point where it could be repaired for use in the services. It has carried out repairs to make possible these sales at a cost of about $2 million. In other words, it has netted some $7 million for this country, whereas the criticism to which I have referred was that an item of $40 worth of material was sold as scrap which it was claimed could also have been salvaged and sold as valuable material, and after we sold the material for scrap the dealer who bought it put it on the public dump because he could not get anything whatever for it. That is the nature of the criticism.

I see the problems of War Assets Corporation every day and they are problems running to three hundred, four hundred and five hundred thousand, perhaps a million or two millions. These are the problems of War Assets Corporation, and while we have had this committee working throughout the entire session it has not found a basis for criticism of any sale that runs larger than the ones I have mentioned. It seems to me that if the criticism of War Assets Corporation can be kept on that scale, then War Assets Corporation is a much better institution than I ever thought it was.

Mr. PROBE: While I should like to applaud the minister's statement at this particular point, seeing that he has made it with considerable vigour and in his usual superoptimistic tone, I may tell him that it is not an easy matter for the members of the committee to get information relevant to the operations of War Assets Corporation. That may or mav not be deliberate.

Mr. HOWE: Did the hon. member ever ask for any information that was not given him?

Mr. PROBE: I can answer at once by saying that an answer is always forthcoming.

Mr. McILRAITH: You always got it.

Mr. PROBE: It is not until you have examined the nature of the answer given as it appears on the record some days later that a layman like myself, ignorant of the intricacies involved in the answering of such questions, and grasping the implications of those answers, can discover that he has not received an answer at all; and if one presses for a proper answer, then one is told that the question is one which it would cost $4,000 to answer. I may tell the minister that.

Mr. HOWE. Did my hon. friend get $4,000 worth of satisfaction out of the answer which it cost $4,000 to prepare!

Mr. FRASER: It might have resulted in saving $4 million.

Mr. PROBE: If I had an axe to grind in any particular, possibly I could get satisfaction by asking a $4,000 question. We are concerned in seeing that the stated policy of War Assets Corporation is implemented in some reasonable degree. I do not agree with the policy of War Assets Corporation whereby sales must invariably be made through recognized business channels, particularly since there are certain legitimate business channels that did not exist before the date set by War Assets Corporation, June 30, 1941; and even so, the minister's department has made large sales to certain corporations that have come into being since that date.

The department insists that it is selling vehicles and commodities at the best possible returns consistent with the pursuit of sound business practices. I should like to remind the committee of one thing which is fairly generally known throughout the country, namely, that in the case of the eighty-four four-wheel drive vehicles which the government bought from the four-wheel drive people of Kitchener, Ontario, at $11,350 each, when there was an offer for these vehicles of $5,000 each, War Assets Corporation, instead of accepting that offer, sold them back to the original manufacturers at $4,801 each. I maintain that that is not sound business practice and that the minister and his department do not invariably follow sound business practices.

An hon. MEMBER: Chicken feed.

Mr. PROBE: I do not care what you call it. That was one example that I was able to unearth—I hate to use that word because it was not my intention to unearth anything. In the committee we tried to suggest to the War Assets Corporation officials that they make the materials which they have for sale available more widely throughout the country. I am pleased to hear that the policy of decentralization, which I think was necessary, is now in operation. I hope that what the minister says is correct, and that the policy of selling by the decentralized organization in the outlying provinces takes effect without consulting Montreal every time that a deal has to be made. That is a criticism which I think is perfectly valid; I trust that the minister's department has corrected that situation, because it may be a case of locking the stable door after the horses are gone, and in some provinces there may not be very much in the decentralized location now available in the district for the people to buy. I believe that the principle of having more extensive auction sales would have been a sound one. The minister will reply that they have had five or six. I agree with that, but we should have had five or six thousand auction sales of the entire contents of those buildings "as is, where is." That method would have done a better job of getting the things out to the consumers much quicker and would have brought in more revenue to the government of Canada. That is all I have to say.

I should like the minister to answer one question if he will. A few moments ago I spoke about partial declarations. The minister said that they have now taken over all buildings on which declarations have been proffered by declaring agencies. If I understood him correctly, my other question would not be necessary. There are no buildings now in the hands of the services where they have already proffered the contents to War Assets Corporation. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not know that this was the place to discuss War Assets. If it is I should like to ask a few questions. The minister suggested that the committee had met for some considerable time and that there was not a word of criticism. In order that he may not go home dissatisfied because he has had no criticism, I intend to mention a couple of items with which I was interested when I attended the committee. I was not able to be there all the time owing to the fact that I was engaged elsewhere.

In view of the encomiums—that is a big word—that he was throwing at War Assets Corporation, I should like to tell the committee one thing. In the city in which I live a bonfire burned for weeks and weeks and weeks at No. 10 repair depot, I think it is. In any event, it is the Currie barracks. War Assets admitted that they did the burning, using the agency of the R.C.A.F. No one in any government department could give us a list of the items or any idea of the value of the goods burned. That is a strong statement. I see the parliamentary assistant to the minister sitting over there, and he will agree that what I say in that regard is absolutely true. We did get a list from Penhold. After much digging, the hon. member for Red Deer did get an approximate list; but it was conducted on this basis, that things were destroyed and no lists whatever were kept of the destruction. I hear the parliamentary assistant to the minister speaking. If he has something to say let him say it now.

Mr. McILRAITH: I shall say it where I choose.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I shall be happy to oblige the hon. member, but I would suggest that he do it before I go home.

Mr. McILRAITH: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, surely I have the right to speak privately to the minister on a matter such as this, or on any other matters which have to do with the estimates, without objection from the hon. member opposite. I have been very courteous to him in giving him answers and any information that I could at any time that he thought would be of assistance to him. But I still have some rights as a private member of the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say that I have always found the hon. member courteous. I have tried to be that way with him and I trust that relation will continue as long as we know one another. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. McILRAITH: Very satisfactory.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I should now like to mention two other matters. The first one has to do with a place in Nova Scotia, the name of which I cannot remember. At that place small ships were being built at a cost of $68,000. Even while the committee was sitting, five were delivered and sold for $20,000, and five more were still being built at $68,000 and were being turned over to War Assets and sold for $20,000. That information was given in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Cumberland and appears as part of the record. This is the question I want to ask the minister, because it is his job. I am asking both the minister and the parliamentary assistant to correct me if I am inaccurate in any way in the summary which I shall give with respect to the sale of real estate, namely, lands and buildings.

The evidence given before the committee by the president of War Assets Corporation may be summarized in this way. We shall say that they have a building in a town anywhere in Ontario. They receive bids for that building. A person is buying it with the idea that he is going to convert into some useful purpose, some industry or something of that kind. In the first place, the minister and not War Assets must say whether or not that building being bought by A for the purpose of establishing a boot factory should be established there. If they do not think it should, then the man who wants to make boots does not get it, but the man who wants to make something else in that building gets it if the minister says so. The evidence is clear that, as to the price and the identity of the purchaser, it rests with the minister to say. In other words, under the present procedure of War Assets the minister—and I think we used these figures in the examination—has the say. Let us say that A bids half a million dollars for a property and B bids $400,000. The minister can sell that property to B for $400,000 and the country loses $100,000. The answer given by someone who spoke—I see my hon. friend over there; I am not going to name him, but he was not on my side anyway—was that there are many businesses started which go broke and therefore someone of more judgment must decide whether or not, after the man had paid his own money, not yours or mine, that industry could continue there because some people may be employed and when the industry went broke they would be out of a job. I am asking the parliamentary assistant to the minister if I have given a fairly accurate—I think a completely accurate—statement with respect to real estate? I am anxious to be corrected on this. My memory is that the same thing applied to ships. But these were questions of my own which I asked during the too short time I was able to sit on that committee. I should like someone to tell me if what I have said is correct.

Mr. HOWE: I will explain that. We had in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply a director general of industrial reconversion. The purpose of the director of reconversion was to get war plants converted into peacetime plants, and to maintain employment in bridging the transition.

The question came up as to the purpose to which a government plant would be put. We call for tenders on a building, and we may get a range in prices between $500,000 and $6,000. The director general of industrial reconversion then insisted that he should inspect those tenders to determine which buyer offered the most employment. If one was to be used as a dead building, and by that I mean a dead storage building, and another was to be used as a manufacturing plant, that certainly gave a preference to the man who wished to buy it for manufacturing. In other words, he was buying it for a purpose which promised reasonably substantial and steady employment.

In that case a decision was made. Sometimes it was referred to me, but more often it was not. I do not suppose I have seen five per cent of the real estate transactions, but occasionally one would come to me for final decision.

But let me point out the discrepancy in my hon. friend's report. Let us suppose the man who wanted it for dead storage had bid $600,000, and the man who wanted it for a manufacturing plant had bid only $500,000. The man who wanted it for manufacturing was offered it at the higher tender, and unless he was prepared to pay the high tender he did not get the plant. Usually he was prepared so to pay; usually the difference was not as much as $100,000. But that was the determining factor in deciding whether a plant would go to a firm which was offering considerable employment, or the firm which was offering little employment, provided that the discrepancy in price was not too great.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry that the evidence before the committee is almost directly contrary to what the minister has said.

Mr. HOWE: Can you produce that evidence?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister's parliamentary assistant will agree with what I am going to say, and without minute examination. In the first place, dead storage was never mentioned before the committee. But I have referred to these two cases of a nail factory and a boot factory. I know very little about those things, but the minister has just said that the property would not be sold unless the lower tenderer came up to the higher tenderer. The answer given to me by the president of War Assets Corporation was this, that they could do nothing but coax him to come up, and it was the responsibility of the minister to sell that property at a lower figure, if the minister so desired. I am really asking if I am not being accurate about this.

Mr. HOWE: In no case where there was a material discrepancy—there is no case on record where it was sold to a materially lower bidder. I do not remember one, but there may be one.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The thing I have in mind is this, that it is completely wrong. According to what I know, it seems to me completely wrong.

Mr. HOWE: How is it wrong?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That one man, a minister of the government, may be able to say—and I believe I am fair in assuming that one is—one is a manufacturer of shoes and another man of something else; but supposing they want both to make nails. So we have it laid down the alley where there was no escape, where there is the power to sell to one man for $400,000 rather than to another man for $500,000.

Mr. HOWE: The minister has power enough to make any decision he likes with regard to the sale of any war asset, and have his decision carried out.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the minister had said he had more than enough in a matter of this kind—if he had said he had cock-eyed power I would agree with him.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The minister has said that there are various places where this stuff is stored. Do the guards receive cost of living bonus?

Mr. HOWE: They are just temporary employees of War Assets Corporation; they are not civil servants.

Mr. FRASER: Did War Assets Corporation people or the air force have charge of the destruction of equipment at the Mount Hope airport?

Mr. HOWE: I never heard of any destruction at Mount Hope.

Mr. FRASER: The equipment was on the runway there, and it was destroyed by a vehicle running over it.

Mr. HOWE: Was the matter discussed in committee?

Mr. FRASER: No, it was not.

Mr. HOWE: Am I to take your say-so? I have never heard of it. Was it presented to the committee?

Mr. FRASER: No, it was not presented to the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Why bring it up here, then?

Mr. FRASER: Why not? This is the place to bring it up.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I can say that that was spoken of about a year ago. Upon investigation, it was found that what had been broken up was some home-made furniture made by the airmen out of some bits and pieces lying around the camp. When the camp was closed this furniture was turned in as scrap lumber.

Mr. FRASER: There was some four-inch and some six-inch stuff, and it was mixed up with the rest. I am speaking about some radio equipment which was run over by a bull-dozer.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to point out to the minister that under the rules of procedure he has no right to object to a question with respect to War Assets Corporation, whether it was raised in committee or not. After all, we control our own procedure in this committee, and I am sure that on reflection the minister will accept the view that the hon. member for Peterborough West is entitled to ask his question.

The minister has spoken about the raising of bids of successful tenderers or successful bidders on pieces of real estate owned by War Assets Corporation. I know of one instance where that was done. I want to ask the minister if it is a fair statement to say that in the early days of War Assets Corporation that policy was not followed, and that the policy now followed with respect to sales of war assets was a complete change? That is my information and I should like to have some comment from the minister. While in recent times some of the criticism which applied in earlier days may have been removed—it is to be hoped that is so—is it not true that in the earlier days some of these allegations had foundation? I would ask the minister to make comment on this and say whether or not this process of jacking up the successful bidder who might get a plant is not a comparatively new policy? Has that policy been followed in the case of each parcel of real estate that has been sold?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no case where property has been sold when War Assets had a better offer, and that applies from the beginning of time. I was more closely connected with the sale of properties in the early days than I have been in recent months.

Mr. GRAYDON: What part did the local reconstruction councils play in the sale of real estate when the factors of employment, warehousing, storage and so on were involved?

Mr. HOWE: As I stated, the reconstruction councils acting through the director general of industrial reconversion passed on sales before they were made. In other words, they indicated the type of industry among those bidding for a plant which would be the most beneficial from the point of view of reconversion, and those responsible for the sale attempted to act accordingly but never at a price lower than the best price offered. I would not be absolutely sure that that was always true, but I know of no case where it was not.

Mr. GRAYDON: As I understand it, the reconstruction council in an area such as Toronto would act in an advisory capacity to the director of reconversion. If that is so, why have these reconstruction councils been abolished in certain places?

Mr. HOWE: They were all abolished as at the end of August. The functions of the reconstruction councils had to do with government plans for full employment under the proposed dominion-provincial agreements. When the dominion-provincial agreements failed to materialize, it was felt that we were not justified in the expense involved in keeping the reconstruction councils alive.

Mr. GRAYDON: My understanding was that the expense involved was relatively small, and it seems to me that with War Assets still having substantial holdings of real estate to be sold there should be no change in government policy.

Mr. HOWE: I know of very few industrial plants which remain to be sold. The problem of reconversion is at least three-quarters completed. In other words, we now care very little for what purpose a plant is to be used, because the peacetime industries which were clamouring for accommodation a year ago have all been taken care of. I know of only one industrial property within thirty miles of Toronto that is for sale to-day and personally I do not care for what purpose it is used.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister is speaking of industrial properties which have been declared surplus, but I take it he is not in position to indicate what is likely to be declared surplus in that area. To my knowledge, there are some properties which have not yet been declared surplus.

Mr. HOWE: There may be military properties, but I know of no manufacturing property under the control of the Department of Munitions and Supply that has been declared surplus. The only property I know of in the whole area that may be sold is the property that was used for the making of cartridge cases.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the policy in connection with dividing up a property for sale or rent as has been done with the small arms plant at Long Branch?

Mr. HOWE: The small arms plant is a multiple occupancy plant owned and administered by the government. Part of the plant is required for the arsenals scheme, but the larger part was subdivided and rented to responsible tenants. As has been stated, there are a number of industries renting space in that building and they are all tenants of the government.

Mr. ADAMSON: Are they tenants of War Assets?

Mr. HOWE: Canadian Arsenals.

Mr. PROBE: Has a deadline been set by War Assets to the declaring government agencies with respect to the declaring of surplus materials? It would seem to me that it is about time the government agencies had put their houses in order. They should know the state of their surpluses. For example, the army gave us a clear-out picture of their stock position. Could the minister state whether there has been a deadline set with respect to the declaration of surpluses by the declaring agencies, or are they being given unlimited time?

Mr. HOWE: We are giving them unlimited time. War Assets Corporation acts under a statute of parliament and is bound to receive surpluses whenever the services may declare them. It has no power to declare a deadline.

Mr. PROBE: It seems to me that that is a rather unbusinesslike procedure. The government has power to say to its own agencies, "Get your business in such condition that we shall know what surpluses we have to sell at such a time".

Mr. HOWE: It is within the power of the government to do that, but it is not within the power of War Assets Corporation and my hon. friend asked if War Assets had declared a deadline. The latest report I have indicates that about ninety per cent of the material that will ultimately reach War Assets has now been declared surplus.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Among the returns in connection with the operations of War Assets is one dealing with machine tools and equipment. One of the favourite firms in Montreal which has obtained some of the larger equipment is the Associated Machinery Corporation, Balfour building, Montreal. This company purchased some $886,000 worth of machine tools and equipment. It is enlightening to see the way in which they have been handling these goods. I have an example of the type of thing that happens when an average man tries to deal with War Assets. We know that aeroplane producers in the United States are doing pretty well, but when it comes to the small machine shop in a small town it is entirely different. This particular company was advertising honing machines, complete with 110-volt motor. This particular man thought it was good value and he decided to invest $75 for a machine. But when he got the machine he found it was in rather bad shape. The whole thing had been stripped and what he got was simply a frame which was absolutely useless. He wrote back and he was told that he had brought it on an "as, is and where" basis. However, he protested further and finally they gave him a credit of $15.

This is one of the recognized dealers of the department and this is the kind of thing which Canadian people have objected to tremendously. Of course the whole operations of War Assets are pretty much of a dilemma for the government, supporting as they do the present system of the distribution of surplus goods by War Assets, goods which the Canadian people have paid for already through taxation and goods which should be available to the Canadian people. The whole idea of War Assets, under our present system of economy is that these goods should be destroyed so as not to interfere with business. The minister says that ninety per cent of all the goods that are ever going to reach War Assets have already been delivered. How much has it cost the Canadian people for these goods, and what percentage are the Canadian people going to realize out of the operations of War Assets Corporation in selling these goods? Their whole policy seems to be: Do not let these goods get out into the hands of the people; whatever you do, see that the goods are destroyed rather than go into channels that will interfere with trade.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend differs somewhat from the policy followed by his own province. One of our dealers, and one that was most insistent on being made a dealer, is Crown Assets Corporation of the province of Saskatchewan. Distribution in that province is handled through that dealer organization because of that insistence. So why my hon. friend is so bitter about dealers I do not know. The only practical way of handling sales of machinery is through dealers for the very reason my hon. friend states. A machine is shipped out and the buyer is not satisfied. He thinks he has not received all the parts the machine should have. War Assets is doing a wholesale business, whereas a retail dealer can make the required adjustment. That is the function of a dealer. I know of no way of distributing machine tools to individuals except through dealers.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister has not answered my question. I asked for an approximate estimate of the original cost to the Canadian people of the goods which War Assets is handling and what approximately the Canadian people will realize from the disposition of these goods. Will the Canadian people realize eight per cent, ten per cent or some other percentage of the cost of these goods to the Canadian people in the first place?

Mr. HOWE: I could give that by classifications. I could tell my hon. friend what proportion of the purchase price of real estate and buildings War Assets is receiving. I could give the percentage of recovery on machine tools. But take poison gas, for instance. It cost a great deal of money to produce and the recovery from it is nil. In fact, there was a very large bill against War Assets for disposing of it. Take fighter planes. The recovery on them is very small. A few types can be adapted at great expense to domestic uses but great numbers of them cannot be. The cheapest way to get rid of obsolete planes was the bonfire, but the bonfire was so disturbing to people that we adopted a new policy, which seems to work very well. We sold the carcasses of planes for $5 apiece, and if you drive through Saskatchewan or Alberta you will find an aeroplane carcass in almost every farmyard.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No.

Mr. HOWE: I am telling you.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are not telling me; you are telling these other fellows.

Mr. HOWE: The recovery on items like that is not great. On other classifications I believe that our percentage of recovery is very much higher than in the United States, and I think it will compare favourably with the recovery on similar items in other parts of the world.

Mr. ADAMSON: The difficulty is that so many of us who may want these things from time to time cannot find out where they can be bought. I was one of the fortunate ones in that I was able to buy a universal carrier, for which I paid $200.

Mr. HOWE: You must have had influence.

Mr. ISNOR: You bought it direct?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes. Living in the country I find it very useful for hauling lumber, and, as I said, it amuses the children, who love to drive it. It is amazing how young they can learn these things. I found out by mere chance that these universal carriers were for sale. In the United States press not a day goes by but what you see advertisements of war equipment for sale at the larger stores in New York. I mention one in particular. Macy's had an advertisement the other day of carburettors for the Merlin engine. The people bought them simply because they cost four or five hundred dollars originally and were selling at fifty dollars, and presumably a large amount of money went to the government and the agent in disposing of those carburettors. But there is very little advertising of these surplus goods that are for sale in Canada. The average man on the street has very little opportunity of seeing them advertised. The big stores do not advertise them. Take an article like flying boots, which are very useful and desirable in a country where there is lots of snow. I was in one of the larger stores in Toronto and they told me, "Oh, yes, we get flying boots occasionally but they are all snapped up by the people who are in the store at the time." I think a great deal more effort should be made by the agents to advertise War Assets goods that are for sale. Some people who are lucky and are in the store at the right moment are able to get them, but there are thousands and thousands of instances of goods which are considered unsaleable and are not advertised which could be sold. I believe that a great deal more effort should be made to advertise the goods which the department has for sale.

Mr. ISNOR: Before this item passes, perhaps I should say a word or two, particularly in regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Peel. I recall that when the report was tabled, with my name to it, he inquired whether I proposed to move concurrence. I replied, if I remember rightly, that I would be pleased to do so if an opportunity presented itself. I added that the committee had considered that question but had not felt it advisable to make a motion of concurrence or at least suggested to the chairman that that course be followed. Later on, the hon. member for Peel used the phrase "a whitewash" report. He may have something in mind in regard to whitewashing, but in fairness to the committee which I may say was a very fine committee, apart from the chairman—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The chairman gave us a dinner and it was an excellent one.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the bribe?

Mr. ISNOR: If I may answer that ungentlemanly remark, there was no bribe. The dinner was given at the conclusion of our deliberations.

Mr. FRASER: I heard that the chairman was very good and very impartial.

Mr. ISNOR: Coming to the suggestion that this was a "whitewash" report, I deny that it was a "whitewash." Hon. members agreed, and so stated, that it was a very fair report. We were not going to condemn the government for something it had not done, merely to satisfy certain hon. members who were not on the committee. We were not going to condemn War Assets Corporation for carrying on in a manner which they felt would bring the best returns to our country. Sitting there as chairman, listening to the evidence day in and day out during our deliberations, I say without fear of contradiction that War Assets Corporation has done an exceedingly fine job. It may have made mistakes. The armed services may have made mistakes; they may have destroyed in the early stages some useful material. But I should like to know of any other organization which could be set up that would handle a business of $226 million in the time in which they did it and perform a better job. It must be remembered that War Assets Corporation was brought into being without any previous experience of the kind; it had to establish a new structure; it had to bring into being an agency, first to collect, then to assemble, recondition and supply the market with these goods in such a way as, so far as possible, not to interfere with the regular sale of goods.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat referred to Macy's, New York, advertising war assets goods obtained from War Assets Association—"W.A.A." The same thing applied here in Canada: Eaton's, Simpson's and other stores throughout the dominion advertised the very articles that he mentioned. I remember they sold airmen's shoes retail for $12.50.

Mr. ADAMSON: I know. I bought a pair.

Mr. ISNOR: But War Assets Corporation could not possibly retail those, as some hon. members—inexperienced members—may think. War Assets Corporation could not sell those through retail channels; it would not be profitable to do so; they would not get the net return which they are getting to-day. The corporation was set up for the purpose of disposing as rapidly as possible of surplus materials, and I think they are doing that in the best possible way, in spite of what hon. members who were not on the committee, and have not had an opportunity of studying their policy, may say.

As regards the questions and answers, I do not know whether the replies received were satisfactory to all hon. members, but I believe that the officials of War Assets Corporation and of the armed services endeavoured, to the best of their ability, to give the information which was requested of them. I do not know of any case, with the possible exception of the question referring to repairs to ships, in which the information has not been given in a complete manner; and, as regards ships, I believe the request was made for the cost of repairs in connection with twenty-seven of them. Seventeen ships were covered in the first return and, if I recall rightly, seven in a later return, making twenty-four out of twenty-seven, and particulars as to the other three were promised as soon as the repairs are completed.

I could go on, Mr. Chairman, and talk at great length with regard to the evidence. There were over 1,200 pages of evidence. It is almost impossible for the minister, with his great ability, to begin to give all the details; and even though the members of this committee endeavoured to follow the evidence as closely as possible, I question whether any one of them could being to answer all the questions which have been put to us this evening. I do not pretend to say that I could answer a good many questions; but, after carefully following the evidence, I am satisfied that the policy being pursued is bringing about the best results possible, taking a broad and wide view.

As regards the question which has caused so much discussion, hon. members have read about it in the newspapers; the magazines also have printed a lot of material, and we investigated the subject. We have not fully covered the ground, and we frankly stated so. We criticized the Royal Canadian Air Force for not keeping better records. We also referred to the sensational and extravagant statements made by one of the witnesses. I recall that one of the words used in the original report was struck out. We endeavoured to make it just as fair for one as for the other; in other words, we presented a very reasonable report.

I am sorry to have taken up so much time, but I thought that as chairman of the committee I should put on record these few words.

Mr. ADAMSON: I feel that War Assets had an awful lot of material which they do not think is saleable but which is probably quite saleable to-day in Canada, and I do not think an attempt is being made to sell a great part of this material. The conclusion to which I came after visiting one of War Assets branch offices, and having looked at what they are marketing in the United States, is that there is a great deal of material which is marketable, but in the belief that there is no market for some of this stuff it is being put aside and assumed to be unsaleable. I mention as one specific instance the Merlin carburettor. One might think there was no appreciable market for an expensive and intricate piece of material like this carburettor, but it has been found that there is a market, and an extensive one, among people who have home machine shops, among mechanics who want bits and pieces from this intricate piece of machinery which is no longer used and for which, I believe, $50 apiece is paid. That is the sort of thing which suggests to me that we are not taking full advantage of our opportunities to sell this equipment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some reference was made by my genial friend the senior member for Halifax to a remark I made in the house when the report was first presented. Having read the articles in Maclean's with a certain degree of care, not having been privileged to serve on the war expenditures and economies committee, and having listened to the report as presented that day, it seemed to me, and I think to a number of other hon. members who were not on that committee, that the committee did not come to grips with charges which were so sensational, so spectacular, and seemed to be so well supported by Mr. Brown in that magazine. I do not think the senior member for Halifax needs to feel so very much offended at the word "whitewash" as applied to a committee which had a government majority, for although I might perhaps suggest some other word, "whitewash" seems to me as good a term as can be applied to the committee's treatment of Brown's charges, because it was these to which I was referring. Looking over the committee's report, it seems strange to me—and although I cannot speak for any other member I still have the right to speak for myself—that the committee left Brown's charges very much in the air, with this exception. They picked out, as they thought, two or three of the rotten apples in the barrel but they never made any reference to the sound ones left; I mean those charges of Brown's which could be founded on fact. It seems strange to me that the committee should pick out a couple of charges, refute them, and then say:

> Your committee's inquiry in this connection had not reached a stage where further comment on the evidence can be made, but your committee feels that what appear to be sensational articles should not go unchallenged.

That appears to me to have all the elements of whitewash and it may be that, even with my very convincing friend's arguments, the story in connection with this matter is not satisfactory. I want to know what has happened to Brown's allegations. He has charges by the dozen against War Assets Corporation. Where are they dealt with?

Mr. HOWE: Tell me one.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall send to the reading room for Maclean's night now, because if the minister wants me to read it I will. I have no objection to putting it on Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: Was his name Sherashevski or Brown?

Mr. WARREN: Will the hon. member tell us under what name this Mr. Brown signed a similar article which he wrote for the Winnipeg Free Press and also what his real name is?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not interested in names but in facts, and I suggest that at least the committee might have gone to the stage where they could go into Brown's charges and report whether they were right or wrong. I am in the position of everyone else in this house. I do not know whether they are right or wrong.

Mr. REID: I nailed one of them as a lie.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are many of them.

Mr. REID: Keep the record right. I nailed one.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will keep the record right. I am not attempting to be unfair in any way, but if in a flock of birds you bring down one, that does not mean that you have got rid of all the starlings in the country. The part of the report which I desire to bring to the attention of the committee, and which caused me to use the word "whitewash", is contained in the paragraph in which the committee says that it—

> . . . had not reached a stage where further comment on the evidence could be made . . . but your committee feels that what appear to be sensational articles should not go unchallenged.

In other words, you challenge the articles and leave them in mid-air, and that is the basis on which I made my statement.

Mr. ISNOR: We took his prize exhibit and placed it before the public, in which he stated that an $80 battery was bought for $5. We showed that it was a $14.68 battery, but he used the figure $80, and to repair that same battery it would have cost over $20. We leave it to any sensible person to figure the cost, respectively, to the country in the two cases.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am at a complete disadvantage in discussing further the details of the matter because I was not on the committee. Moreover, I speak from the point of view of the average layman who reads the article and wishes to know whether it is right or wrong, and I cannot find the answer. What the hon. member for York West has said deserves more than passing consideration. He refers to the question of the selling of various war assets material. Those hon. members who come from rural districts know what a lot of money can be realized out of auction sales. I do not care what sort of material it may be; to others it may be so much junk but to the purchaser it may be valuable. I have never gone to an auction sale when somehow or another, whether because of the spirit that prevails on such occasions or whether it is something that gets into one's blood, everyone did not want to bid. I believe that far too much war assets material has been perhaps discarded as junk or has been destroyed, as the evidence seems to have shown from time to time, when much of it could have been realized and turned over to the dominion treasury. I do not know whether it is too late, but I regard that as a constructive suggestion. After all, a dollar is a dollar, and we cannot afford to pass up any chances in seeing to it that the last cent is obtained from these things. What the hon. member for York West has said with regard to retail merchandising might more emphatically be said with regard to auction sales. I am a great believer in auction sales from the point of view of the seller, the man who holds the sale, and for that reason I think the government might properly consider the suggestion of a humble adviser like myself so far as rural matters are concerned.

Mr. HOWE: I admit that high prices can be obtained at an auction sale, but the government is supposed to have a price ceiling. Suppose we had some automobiles in the field. We would get a tremendous number of bids and we might make money, but what about the man who paid above the ceiling price. He would prosecute War Assets. A tag must be put on, which is a ceiling price set by wartime prices and trade board, and then it becomes no action at all, because we receive far more bids than we can supply. It became, therefore, a question of drawing lots among the bidders to see who would get the article. That is inevitable if the government is to obey its own price ceiling policy. It is common knowledge that an enterprising auctioneer bought up some old tractors in Ontario, took them to Manitoba and sold them at eight or ten times their value—I am told it was Yorkton, Saskatchewan. I believe the auctioneer actually bought one himself before he got through. A wonderful time was had by all. That is all very well, provided that no government agency is involved. My hon. friend will find, on reflection, that auction sales are not the source of revenue for the government which he may imagine.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister and I are thinking of two different things. I had not in mind those things which he speaks of, because I can understand that in some instances it would not be practicable to have an auction sale, but I am speaking of what is more less junk that has been destroyed and burned. I believe the government would have realized many hundreds of thousands of dollars if they had put up that material at auction in the usual way.

Mr. HOWE: Nothing has been destroyed since the early days of War Assets, and nothing is junk that has any real value. A highly skilled technician with an engineering background can dig over a junk pile if he has ample time, as our friend seems to have had, and to a scientist that will mean something. He can make something out of it, especially since he has a workshop in his own basement, he says. Take a partly fabricated article which is nothing but junk until extra work is put on it. That can be made into something useful. But nothing there was junk. It is suggested that we have not sold all that we can sell. I agree. I do not think we have sold all our possessions, but we come to them as we can. We are selling these things which are perhaps most easily saleable and most required for the conditions of shortage that we are in today. I may tell the hon. member that we have a good many hundred Merlin engines with carburettors tucked away. Some day or another we shall get around to selling these; but in any sales organization you must have a capacity and ours has been geared for sales of $20 million a month. We have been doing better than that in the last five months. It takes time to catch up. With all the articles that we have, I imagine we shall be selling war assets a year from now and that the present volume of sales will keep up from now to Christmas. After that, I think we shall be selling at a slower tempo, and will be able to merchandise all that we are not selling at the moment.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do not underestimate the number of amateur mechanics in the country.

Mr. LENNARD: A few days ago I asked the minister if an investigation had been completed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into the irregularities in the sale of war assets in Hamilton, and if he was prepared to make a statement. His answer was to the effect that he had not been given sufficient notice of the question, but that he understood a report had come from the police and, while he had not seen it, he understood that they did not recommend any prosecutions. Is the minister prepared to make any further statement?

Mr. HOWE: I shall simply confirm that. The mounted police reported that, after a thorough investigation, they had not uncovered facts which would warrant prosecution.

Mr. LENNARD: On good authority my understanding is that, after the Studebaker Corporation had bought the land and buildings of the Otis-Fensom war plant and had taken possession of the buildings, there was still considerable equipment in the buildings which belonged to War Assets, and which they wished to take over. Many of these machine tools, lathes, et cetera, or at least some of them, were disappearing nightly. The locks on the doors of the plant had to be changed to prevent further stealing from going on. My understanding is that, when they took over, there was considerably less in the building than the original inventory had shown. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Not to my knowledge. There may have been thievery afterwards, but the transactions for which the two young airmen were suspended were violations of the regulations of War Assets. The payments were recovered, and, as I say, after a thorough investigation the police were able to find no transactions which warranted prosecutions.

Mr. FRASER: When the senior member for Halifax was speaking he mentioned the sale of air force boots at $12.50 a pair and praised War Assets Corporation for selling them at that price. Some time ago a return was tabled in my name and, if I remember correctly, it showed that thousands of pairs of air force shoes were sold at $6 up to $7.20, but only about three pairs were sold at $12.50.

Mr. ISNOR: I quoted the retail price as advertised by Eaton's and Simpson's, I think.

Mr. FRASER: I am quoting the price at which War Assets sold the shoes. There were only three pairs sold at $12.50, and they were sold to individuals.

Mr. ISNOR: We are talking at cross-purposes. I cited the retail price to the consumer by the retailer. The hon. member is talking about the price charged by War Assets.

Mr. FRASER: No, I am talking about the retailer because these were sold to individuals, and they were members of different departments of the government.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am wondering when this item "termination of contracts" will be terminated so far as the estimates are concerned. In 1945-46 we voted $175 million for this item. The regular estimates for this year which were passed this evening showed $50 million. Here we are over a year after the war is over and the supplementary estimates come out with an item of $25 million for termination of contracts. I am wondering whether these are lifetime contracts, ten year, contracts, or when we can hope to see the end of them. I should have thought that more than a year after the war is over, all contracts for war materials would have been terminated. Can the minister tell us if this is the very last of these "termination of contract" votes that the committee will be required to vote?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot tell the hon. member anything of the kind. If he thinks it is possible to terminate about $14 billion worth of contracts in a few months he had better try it himself. Certainly we shall be terminating contracts for the next six months and shall be very glad to get finished up by then. We have dealt with this item before, and I explained that it is a revote of the money which was voted last year and which was not expended within the limitation fixed by the fiscal year. Therefore let us treat serious matters seriously and not be facetious about contract termination which is a bit of a job and is getting the full-time attention of the largest and most skilled staff that we have been able to train.

Mr. HARKNESS: Far from being facetious about it, I am quite concerned.

Mr. HOWE: Do not let it worry the hon. member's head.

Mr. HARKNESS: I still fail to understand how this item of $25 million appears in the supplementary estimates. It might well have been a revote in the regular estimates, but these are supplementary estimates which come down over a year after the war is over.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—
942. Emergency shelter — administration—further amount required, $750,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice in the evening press an article which states that the minister met a delegation of homeless veterans on Saturday. The statement which the minister made was certainly not the sort of one which should have been made at this particular time. The item states that the reconstruction minister's statement to the 150 homeless veterans on Saturday was that housing in Ottawa was a civic affair. It goes on to state that last night there was strong criticism from civic authorities. The article mentions some of the slogans which were carried. Here are some of them: "We want diversion of materials to veterans' housing", "homes before theatres, stores or bowling alleys". These suggestions were quite constructive. I understand that some months ago the minister passed the buck to the municipalities to determine priorities, but my information is that the municipalities have no authority to withhold permits from individuals who wish to build privately when they comply with city standards.

Mr. HOWE: I will correct my hon. friend there; we gave them that authority by order in council.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My information from the municipalities is that they cannot turn down an application.

Mr. HOWE: Your information is wrong.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why are they not doing it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Ask them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In Ottawa we have materials going into bowling alleys, theatres and whatnot, and the veterans claim that they cannot get the materials.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is for the city authorities to decide.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is not being accepted by the city authorities.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They grant the permits.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister's parliamentary assistant represents one of the city constituencies. If that is the situation, then he should work in closer cooperation with the civic authorities and clear this matter.

Mr. McILRAITH: It takes two to cooperate.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: The article goes on as follows:

Controller McRae said: "From now on it's the government's responsibility." The city was in no position to engage in a large-scale housing plan that might be temporary and result in unsightly slums when the houses were no longer required.

"It is a situation which became complex before it was recognized; but it should have been recognized before it became too complex to handle. And the government was in a better position to anticipate it than the city was."

Controller Goodwin said:

Ottawa had no more land for housing projects. Site for 400 houses on Carling avenue at Merivale road had been acquired by the city, but there is no place in Ottawa now for another project of that size.

He said it was easy to say that the city had only to ask the government for houses, but getting them was another matter.

And so on. I discussed this matter at the beginning of the session. I pointed out that it was time the minister took responsibility in bringing the provincial and municipal authorities together so that it might appear as to whose responsibility it was. Here we are with a situation all across Canada much the same as was experienced here on parliament hill on Saturday. These men, veterans of two wars, some of them with their wives, children and friends, paraded to parliament hill to appeal for assistance. One of the slogans read, "Where are those homes fit for heroes to live in?" And another, "Have you ever tried to live in one room with a child?" I suggest that the minister should make a statement as to what he proposes to do in this matter. He has now had more than a year since V-E day.

I have had a question on the order paper for weeks, and it is still there as question No. 1:

What is the total value of construction permits which have been issued to breweries and distilleries in Canada since V-E day?

It is not that I am quarrelling with hon. members who wish to consume the products of these breweries and distilleries. But I think we should have some sense of priority, and some sense of values. I cannot see any good reason why permission should have been given for such large commitments for breweries and distilleries, at a time when housing continues to be Canada's No. 1 problem. Would the minister make a statement at this stage as to what hope he holds out?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Some time ago I spoke in the house about building going on —motion-picture theatres and things of that kind. I said at that time that these buildings required workmen, supplies and so on. The mayor of Toronto said, according to the radio, that is was not up to him, and that he could not help it. The minister said that certain areas had been allotted certain supplies, and that they go to various areas in Canada. How are the supplies allotted? Is there a metropolitan area; are the supplies allotted to the city of Toronto alone, by priority, or are they allotted to outlying districts? Do mayors and reeves have to make up their minds as to whether this or that shall be built?

Mr. McILRAITH: Since I have been mentioned by the hon. member for Mackenzie, perhaps I should say something about the delegation which came to parliament hill on Saturday. There are one or two things which should be cleared up. I must say now that I cannot answer the statement in the press to-night, because I have not yet had an opportunity to see to-night's paper. I hope in due course to reach that stage.

First of all, hon. members can judge as to size of the group, in numbers, which marched up to parliament hill. I think it will be found that there were about sixty persons. In any event, nothing turns on that. I took the precaution, however, of making a count of them as they came up.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The paper says there were 150.

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, I know that. However, I took the precaution of counting them, and I believe some others did. However, I do not think anything turns on that, in any event.

There is no doubt that many of these veterans are in difficult circumstances so far as housing is concerned. I happened to know personally a considerable number who were in the parade, and to know something about their personal circumstances. When they reached the front of the building they were received and, as a matter of fact, a subcommittee from among them, numbering about eight or ten persons, came to my office. The minister was kind enough to come in and receive them, along with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the hon. member for Ottawa East, and myself.
