The statement about housing being a civic affair and that the city could have all the houses it wanted arose out of a question asked by a tenant in one of the present wartime housing houses on Carling avenue. This tenant recently arrived in Canada, for the first time; and when the question was raised some discussion developed because the other members in the delegation did not have any housing, and had somewhat different ideas as to what was needed. The question arose as to why we built only 200 last year on that particular project. An answer was given and an attempt made to explain that wartime housing houses are built in conjunction with and at the request of the municipality, and that the municipality has the responsibility of making the request. That is how the whole subject arose.

I saw the morning paper and I must say I was somewhat startled by the headline on the story. There was nothing wrong with the story; it had to mention only part of what went on, and not all of it: But the headline was a bit startling, to put it mildly. Those veterans had all sorts of difficult problems. One of them, who was a personal friend of mine, had come from the old country in 1934 to join the Canadian merchant marine. He served on the great lakes merchant ships in the summer, and on ocean-going vessels in the winter. He never came to any town or settlement in Canada at any time prior to the war. Upon the outbreak of war he enlisted in the navy, and has a most excellent record of service. During the war he was fortunate enough to marry an Ottawa girl. He has now applied for housing under a wartime housing project. Priority was given to persons who had residence in Ottawa at the outbreak of the war, so that he was shut out.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where would his residence be?

Mr. McILRAITH: That is a rather nice academic point. I have sent a memorandum to see if I can get a better opinion than my own as to where it would be.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On the high seas, I suppose.

Mr. McILRAITH: In any event, it presents a difficult problem. Most of these people were very much concerned with finding what we would probably class as emergency shelter, and finding it quickly. But to say that the minister was passing the buck to the municipality is just a lot of nonsense. And to say that there is any lack of cooperation between the hon. member for Ottawa West and the municipality is a lot of nonsense, too. There has always been close cooperation. The problem is one of a serious nature which requires all the cooperation which all elected representatives, in whatever capacity they may serve, can give it. I do not know that I can say more about it.

There was some reference made to the authority to issue or reject building permits. The municipality was given authority to reject permits for such things as theatres, bowling alleys and the like.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On what ground?

Mr. McILRAITH: That has been explained in the house several times. I think it is fair to say that the construction control was difficult to administer. There always was the cry, "We in the local area know what is needed to reestablish our men. We know when someone wants to be reestablished in business. How can you, in the central government in Ottawa, know what should be done in other parts of Canada?" Jurisdiction was given to the municipalities to decide, bearing in mind the needs of those particular municipalities. Many of them did not choose to exercise their power, although I believe some of them did. I understand that some municipalities do exercise the power and do reject applications for building permits for such things as have been under criticism to-night. Others do not.

But to say that there has been a passing of the buck on the municipalities does not quite meet the facts.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister explain what is provided in this vote of $750,000?

Mr. HOWE: This is supplementary to item 504. Before I have finished, I shall ask the committee to consider that vote, which appears in the Department of Finance. The hon. member will recall that in the early part of this year emergency shelter was a function of the Department of Finance, and it was transferred to the Department of Reconstruction about May. The vote of $1,547,000 was the estimated cost of assisting the cities and municipalities to provide emergency shelter. That is, temporary shelter to take care of the period until permanent housing could be supplied. This is used for fitting up buildings such as barracks, or redividing staff houses, and work of that kind. A good deal of it is associated with the universities. It was estimated that $1,547,000 would be sufficient, but the demands have been more substantial than was anticipated, with the result that we are asking for an additional $750,000 in the supplementary estimates, bringing the amount up to $2,297,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister give a breakdown according to provinces?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry, but I have not a breakdown according to provinces. In fact, I have not much of a breakdown at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could this item stand?

Mr. HOWE: I should like to get it through to-night if I could. I think the division between the provinces is fairly good. Wherever there was a lack of housing, funds were supplied. In Vancouver they were spent largely in connection with the Vancouver hotel, and on the prairies they were spent in assisting the municipalities or the provinces to convert temporary buildings into habitable quarters.

Mr. KNOWLES: You have a special item, No. 499, for the Vancouver hotel.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it is handled by Emergency Housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the figures for the various universities?

Mr. HOWE: No, I have not that, either.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This item calls for more than $500,000, and I think the minister should have a little more information to give us before he asks us to pass it. Either item 504 or item 914 should stand.

Mr. HOWE: Why not let item 504 stand, and then the Minister of Finance can deal wit it?

Mr. KNOWLES: Passing the buck again.

Mr. HOWE: No; it is in his estimates and I suppose he is responsible. I should like to get this through so that we could finish the reconstruction estimates.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do I understand that you are not taking item 504?

Mr. HOWE: How would it be if we let these items go through, and then I will undertake to get a breakdown and give it on a suitable item later on? After all it is getting toward the end of the session.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are you calling item 504 to-night?

Mr. HOWE: I should like to.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When could we have this information?

Mr. HOWE: On the orders of the day some time before the end of the session.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How are supplies allocated to the different parts of Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Equitably.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would not be surprised, but I cannot understand why moving-picture theatres and bowling alleys are being constructed when there is such a great need for materials and workmen. As far as my part of the country is concerned, it is not a question of a mayor or reeve making the decision. I asked about this before and I gave a couple of illustrations. I told of a man who would be able to take in two or three more families if he was able to get some material. There should be some basis on which this emergency housing was handled, because the whole thing is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. HOWE: People have been in the habit for years of buying materials on a certain basis and, as more material is available, proportionate allocations are made to those dealers. A dealer in Toronto may have a customer in Hamilton, and I do not see any reason why he should stop selling to that customer. That is beyond the power of those responsible for the distribution. A man living in one of the Yorks may be a customer of a dealer in Toronto, and he should be permitted to continue to deal with him. It is not a matter of distribution; it is a matter of retailing material after it is distributed by the wartime prices and trade board. There is that weakness, but the fact is that before a bowling alley or a moving-picture theatre can be built, some civil official must sign a permit permitting the building to be built. He has the power to sign it or not sign it. If he decides not to sign it, there is no recourse for the man who has applied. That is all there is to it, they just sign it as I suppose they feel they can secure the material.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suppose they think it would be in competition with the next municipality?

Mr. HOWE: It might be that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There should be some classification in connection with this thing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: With the housing situation as critical as it is, I think we should have more than a statement by the minister on the orders of the day. These are two rather large items, and I think the minister should make a further statement, or he should allow this item or item 504 to stand.

Mr. HOWE: I spoke on housing in this house for three hours and there was a full-fledged debate afterwards.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The situation is still unchanged.

Mr. HOWE: That was two or three weeks ago, and I do not remember hearing my hon. friend's voice in that debate, so that I assume he was on holidays. I can assure him that the debate did take place and I think the longest speech of the session was on housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was unavoidably absent at the time, but the situation is still critical.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to make the speech all over again for the benefit of my hon. friend, but I suggest that he read Hansard instead.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have asked for the breakdown of this item, and I think the item should stand until we get it, because the matter would not be debatable on the orders of the day.

Mr. HOWE: It is all very well to let items stand early in the session, but these are, we hope, the last two days of the session. I suggest that we let this item go through, on the understanding that I will see that a breakdown is put on Hansard.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I suggest that this item stand until to-morrow.

Item agreed to.

Housing branch—

60. To provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees given by the Minister of Finance pursuant to item 55 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act, No. 6, 1945 (and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts) to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses, such payments to be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, $1.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister explain what this dollar is to be used for?

Mr. HOWE: This item is just to preserve the legal authority to provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees by the Minister of Finance pursuant to item 55 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act, No. 6, 1945, and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts, to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses. The item preserves the right of the Minister of Finance to meet obligations incurred under the act, for which appropriations will be asked of parliament. There are none at the moment, but we have put in the item of $1 to keep it alive.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Marine service—

878. Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers—further amount required, $132,500.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This item refers to aids to navigation. Does it include dredging?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): There is no dredging under this item.

Item agreed to.

Marine service—

879. To provide for Canada's share of the cost of the north Atlantic ice patrol, $8,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I wish to raise a question with respect to this item for the north Atlantic ice patrol, in view of the relations at present existing with respect to the arctic region of our dominion. I am not sure which minister I should address, but I take it that it is the Minister of Transport. Would he indicate just what the north Atlantic ice patrol does and whether there have been any recommendations from the joint Canada-United States defence board with respect to the extension of the patrol into the arctic wastes about which we have heard so much in recent times.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This vote has nothing to do with any ice patrol in the arctic zone. The patrol covers the north Atlantic by virtue of an international agreement made in London in 1914 and extended in 1929, by which some thirteen powers agreed to share the cost of patrolling the north Atlantic during the season of ice menace. Canada's share was established at three per cent of the cost, and this item of $8,000 is to cover that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why was this item not included in the main estimates?

Mr. CHEVRIER: During the war years this vote was discontinued, and it was only after the main estimates were prepared that it was brought to my attention by the officials of the department.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any thought of undertaking any work in connection with the arctic region at all?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not to my knowledge.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—

881. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—To provide for the construction of an icebreaker-railway — car-highway — vehicle-passenger vessel for the Prince Edward Island car ferry service—capital—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to have an idea from the minister what this supplementary vote of $200,000 is for. Is it for the completion of the ship? In the regular estimates there was an item of $1,000,000 or so, and I should like the minister to tell us how far work on the ship has progressed. Is this for the finishing touches on the ship? Will she be finished and ready for service this fall?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In the main estimates there was an item of $2,000,000 to provide for payments under the contract, and this $200,000 is an additional payment to keep the contractor in sufficient funds under the terms of the payment clauses of the contract.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

568. Air services (commitments, $29,855,110), $118,124,753.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the members of the committee as a whole, regardless of party, realizing the world situation at the moment, would like to have a brief statement from the minister on the present position of the regular forces of the Royal Canadian Air Force, its numbers and the immediate plans. I suggest that it might save a lot of questions if the minister would make a brief statement.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): The R.C.A.F. during the past six months has progressed rapidly with demobilization, with the result that to-day we have a strength which is less than our estimated post-war strength. That means that we have demobilized rapidly. We have not taken in recruits as rapidly as we should have liked, but we have set a high standard and recruits have been coming in satisfactorily up to the present time. Those who have been accepted for the permanent force number 9,122. Our total strength is 15,373, of which 1,515 are members of the women's division, who will be going out by the end of this year.

Our forces overseas have been repatriated rapidly, and at the present time we have less than 500 serving overseas. Some of them will be remaining there on courses and on duty, and the remainder will eventually come back to Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: Are any of the 9,122 permanent force new recruits?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): New recruits are 1,313.

Mr. MASSEY: And in what general trades? The non-technical trades?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They are of all different trades.

Mr. MASSEY: But non-flying list?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Non-flyers.

Mr. MASSEY: And, of these 15,373, how many does the minister anticipate will remain in the permanent force or are likely to be accepted in the immediate future?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The number that has been accepted up to the present time is 9,122. There are 4,736 officers and airmen who either have not made up their minds, or will be released on priority, or are at present on retirement leave.

Mr. MASSEY: It is not anticipated that many of the remainder among those in the permanent force and those at present on strength will remain in?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is not anticipated that a great many of the 4,736 will remain, no.

Mr. MASSEY: Could the minister give the committee some idea of the rate of enlistment, the permanent force to be—presumably—17,000?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Between 400 and 450 a month are being enlisted at the present time.

Mr. MASSEY: Is that rate increasing?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It has been increasing quite considerably in the last month or two.

Mr. MASSEY: How many of these recruits are coming from the air cadets? Approximately, of course.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I cannot give a definite figure as to the number of the 1,313 that have come from the air cadets, but I know that we have enlisted a considerable number.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister will not misunderstand my purpose in saying this, that it seems to me that when recruiting first started many air cadet squadrons throughout Canada were not sufficiently canvassed or sufficiently informed, and many of the young air cadets did not know quite what their position might be; they were not close to recruiting centres in many cases and could not get the information they might have had. What steps have been taken to get in touch with the air cadet squadrons of recent date?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I admit that we did lose touch with the air cadets to some extent when recruiting for the air force was discontinued during the war, when we had a surplus to requirements, but since that time we have been maintaining very close contact with the air cadets. We are taking them to summer camps; we are providing flights for the boys who go to camp, and even training some of the outstanding air cadets to fly, so that our cooperation with the air cadet league and the air cadets is now very close.

Mr. MASSEY: Supposing we look at it from the point of view of a permanent force of 17,000, using a round figure, which I believe is correct, is it not?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is 16,100.

Mr. MASSEY: Well, 16,100;—that leaves 7,000 recruits to be added to the service to build it up to strength. The minister anticipates, then, that, at the rate of between 400 and 450 a month, it will take a year before the Royal Canadian Air Force is up to its peacetime strength—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, I do.

Mr. MASSEY: —with new recruits?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): With new recruits and ex-airmen. In the meantime we are having to employ civilians in some of the trades until we have the right type of recruits enlisted or re-enlisted in the service.

Mr. MASSEY: When does the minister anticipate that flying training will be resumed in all branches of aircrew?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I anticipate that it will be in full swing next year.

Mr. MASSEY: Not until next year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Not until next year.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister stated that there were 500 all ranks still overseas. Does that include those who are attached to the Royal Air Force and their various units throughout the world?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We have no more attached to the Royal Air Force except a few who are attached for liaison purposes. All the others have been returned to the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. MASSEY: The lads who are in the more remote places, India and Ceylon and other places, have been recovered, have they?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They have been recovered, yes.

Mr. MASSEY: May I ask the minister further: it seems to me that the statement he makes to the effect that it is anticipated it will be a year before the Royal Canadian Air Force is up to its peacetime strength with new recruits brings up the question of air cadets rather strongly, for I think any one of us who has had any contact with the service will realize the contribution which the air cadets not only have made but can make to the permanent force. What steps, other than what the minister has stated already, are being taken by the Royal Canadian Air Force to encourage air cadet squadrons throughout the coming school academic year?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Well, we are supporting the air cadet league. We supervise their training, we provide them with assistance in their training; we supply instructors. Our ambition is to have the air cadets limited both in numbers and in squadrons, so that the squadrons will be efficient and well trained. If we accomplish this purpose we shall have a waiting list of boys who want to get in, rather than have large numbers of partly trained boys. The success of that has been demonstrated in the past, and we feel that the support we are giving the air cadets and the training which they get in the summer are having a very good effect. This is increasing the keenness of the boys, and they realize that they have a future in the air force.

Mr. MASSEY: I appreciate that, because so many of the smaller municipalities have benefited so materially through the air cadets and the contribution they have made to the community as well as, in turn, to the air force. But I am not a little concerned at what the minister states to the effect that it will take virtually a year of recruiting at its present rate to build the force to its peacetime strength. The minister is, of course, well aware that subsequent to hostilities, in August of last year, many of the V.L.R's. went out very quickly. Those who had ideas about remaining in the service and that sort of thing were very much disappointed about the length of time it took before any announcement was made in regard either to the interim or to the permanent, or, as it is called now, I believe, the regular force, with the result that many outstanding types of all ranks and in all branches and trades left the service, taking their release in order to become civilians again. In many instances these lads have had difficulty with rehabilitation and finding their feet in civilian jobs. We know of some instances where lads have endeavoured recently to obtain information in regard to the permanent force and have claimed that that information has not been furnished in detail. For example, if they were released to the reserve as squadron leaders or as flight sergeants, would they return to the permanent force a flight lieutenants or flying officers, or as sergeants or corporals, or what would their ranks be? Many of these questions remain unanswered. Is full information now available to any applicant who falls within the age limit and who apparently—on paper, at least—meets the requirements of the permanent force?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There was difficulty at first in giving anybody definite information as to the rank or position he would hold in the regular force. After all, we had numbers of officers applying to remain in the force, far in excess of our vacancies. To secure our list it would not have been fair to take them on a "first come, first accepted" basis, and we had to find out the approximate total of officers who were applying; we had to review their qualifications, and then decide what ranks we would be in a position to offer them. Consequently, some officers whose records and qualifications were outstanding might be retained with the ranks they held at the end of the war; other officers might be required to revert to a lower rank; some officers we might not be able to keep in commissioned rank, and they were given an opportunity to enlist in one of the trades of the service. But that did take time, and consequently many who had applied for a permanent commission could not get a definite answer for several months. The list has been gone over thoroughly, and at present there are still some officers who are on the B list and who are being notified as to whether they have been accepted or not and what ranks they will hold.

With regard to the remarks made about our taking time to bring up our force to the required number, we could possibly recruit up to strength in a few months if we desired to lower our standard, but we have a high standard and we are endeavouring to maintain it at that level, because we believe that in the long run it will be beneficial to the air force to do so, instead of lowering the standard in order to get numbers rapidly.

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister says the intention is to maintain the standard. Does that take into consideration young men who enlisted from the collegiates and had not an opportunity to go through university, but who probably would have done so except for the conviction that they were enlisting to fight for their country? They enlisted at the age of nineteen or twenty. If the minister's idea of a high standard is university education, then I would think that young men coming out of university four or five years from now would have a preference over lads who enlisted when the war broke out and who, in my opinion, ought to be given a preference over newly graduating students from universities. The boy who enlisted at the age of nineteen and served four, five and almost six years overseas comes back too old to go to university. He retires from the flying corps with a marvellous record, having risen from the ranks to the rank of officer, and he should have a preference over boys who are graduating one, two and three years after the war. If the standard requires that one be a graduate from a university, then it is too bad, because it will reflect on the young men who had not time to go to university because they were too busy defending their country in the fighting force all over the world. What is the standard?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I am glad to be able to reassure my hon. friend. The educational standard that has been set for new entry is not required from those who have had active service during the war.

Mr. MASSEY: How many recruiting establishments are there in Canada, or recruiting centres, and where are they?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There is a recruiting centre at every command and at air force headquarters, and each command is responsible for the steps taken to secure recruits throughout the command. In the various commands we have had recruiting teams going throughout the municipalities interesting young lads outside the centre where the air command headquarters is located.

Mr. MASSEY: The question has often been asked me, "Where can I go to enlist?" The location of the centres is not well known. Only in the last few hours a lad asked me whether he should go to Ottawa or Trenton or Toronto to enlist. There seems to be great lack of publicity in connection with the recruiting now going forward; and in view of the remarks already made to-night, which I will not repeat, respecting the length of time it will take to recruit the force to full strength, I should like to know what consideration is being given to the stimulation of recruiting by way of advertising or by other means.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): We have been running a series of advertisements in the daily papers, giving the particulars of various trades in which vacancies exist, and in each advertisement the address of the nearest recruiting centre is published. Besides the publicity we have put out ourselves in the air force, there will shortly be a joint recruiting campaign for the three services which will set out the particulars of service in the three branches of the armed forces, so that those who wish to join may see the relative advantages of each of the forces and can decide accordingly which they wish to select.

Mr. MASSEY: I know that some time ago a letter was sent to virtually all those who had been transferred to the reserve, or released from the service, calling attention to the permanent force. It was a good letter. But that was a general letter and obviously it went to all personnel. On the other hand, the minister is aware that, particularly in the early days of demobilization, there were some peculiarly outstanding types in all branches and trades and of all ranks whom we lost to the service in view of the fact that the plans for the permanent force were still in the embryonic stages and nothing definite could be stated. The minister is well aware that in some cases lads have reestablished themselves in such a way that they are now permanently in the civil occupation into which they have gone. There is quite a percentage of these lads who are feeling their way back into "civvy" street not too happily, and I am sure the air member for personnel knows where these lads are and, further, who they are, which is more important. Has any thought been given to getting into contact with these lads and providing for them, within the establishment, a place for continued service? I am confident that some of them can be reclaimed and, in many instances, they may be recruited as the backbone of the minister's new service. Has any consideration been given to that?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I quite agree that during the war the policy of the force was to release men, particularly aircrew, who have had considerable service, and in that way a considerable number found their way back into civilian life before they had an opportunity of finding out, or before we ourselves knew the constitution of the post-war air force. We have endeavoured to communicate with them and give them an opportunity of applying to rejoin the services. A considerable number have come back, and others we hope to get, because it is certainly realized that some of the men with outstanding service in the war had qualified to be released and did go out before the war ended.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Did I understand the minister to say that there were a thousand odd new recruits being recruited into the air force, or are they from the veterans?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There are 1,313 new recruits who never served before.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What categories are they in? Are they in categories that could not be filled from the ranks of the veterans?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They are young recruits coming into the service learning all the various air force trades, and they are in the ranks of the air force. We did not have enough veterans of the war in the other ranks desiring to remain in to take up all the vacancies that we had available.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the minister say that he is turning away outstanding veterans and putting raw recruits in the service?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No, I am not saying that we are turning any away; we are delighted to have them, but we have not had sufficient applications from veterans to fill up the other ranks of the post-war force. Consequently we are to-day at a lower strength in our post-war force than we hope eventually to have. We have not sufficient applications from the "other rank" veterans to fill our vacancies.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The minister had an application from one of the most outstanding flyers in Canada and he turned him down; he was not given a position in the permanent force.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That may be true of the aircrew. We have many times more applications for aircrew that we have vacancies. It is in the other ranks, in the ground trades, where there is the shortage.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have had many applications from ex-service men who wanted to get into the permanent force as flyers or as aircrew. Can the minister give an estimate of the number who applied and the number taken in? Fifteen or twenty men made application to me and I do not think any of them got in.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): At the present time the number of those who have applied is somewhere in the neighbourhood of nine thousand, and 1,681 have been accepted for aircrew.

Mr. ADAMSON: A ratio of six to one?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Our officer establishment is 3,461, and up to the present time we have accepted 1,681.

Mr. ADAMSON: Let us get these figures straight. Nine thousand have applied and 1,681 have been accepted. The total strength is 2,400?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It will eventually reach 3,400.

Mr. ADAMSON: You have another 1,800 to go.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The minister has said that he intends to start air training again next spring. Perhaps he can tell the committee of the way in which he intends to recruit aircrew, whether as permanent force or special reserve or short term commissions, auxiliary air force, or as long-term commissions, or how.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Sixty per cent of the junior officers coming in are on short-service commission, a five-year basis. Of that sixty per cent, I think ten per cent will be granted regular long-service commission.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): What sort of gratuity does the minister intend to pay the short-service commission men who give four or five years of the best years of their early life to the service?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): On retirement they get as a bonus a month's pay for each year of service.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How does that compare with the R.A.F. system?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I think they have a cash bonus which is higher than we propose paying to-day.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the maximum age at which airmen are taken into the air service?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Is that for aircrew?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I shall have to get that information.

Mr. FERGUSON: I understood the minister to say that the required strength of the air force is approximately 3,500 and that, so far, approximately 1,600 applicants had been accepted?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: I happen to know young men who had matriculated and who rose from the ranks during the war. Many of them cannot get into the air force now to satisfy their own desires. They did good service on bombing expeditions over Europe. They have applied to the government to go back as flying officers, and they have been told that their applications could not be accepted. I can hardly believe that some of these young men who have made their application to be taken into the air force are not of the standing necessary for the Canadian air force to-day. So far as they know, they were discharged A-1 physically. They have a splendid active war record. No explanation is given to them as to why they were turned down. They are simply told that their applications had been declined. I should certainly like to know the standard of qualifications necessary for an ex-officer of the Canadian air force in order that he may re-enlist in the air force which now requires approximately 2,000 additional men to fill the ranks. I think it is an awful slap in the face to young men who served their country during the war to tell them that they cannot come up to the standards which are required to re-enlist, when they are young men who were in a force of which Canada was so proud during the war. I know these men. They were not discharged physically unfit. I have seen their names mentioned in dispatches. I have seen the number of active flights, and active bombing expeditions that they took over Germany. They have matriculated. They have served in the ranks as officers and they have been mentioned in dispatches. They have made many flights over Germany. There are still 2,000 vacancies to fill, and these young men are the kind of men who are capable of filling them. What requirements must they have?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to ask a question with regard to the permanent force men who contribute to a pension scheme. I have had some of them approach me and tell me that if they want to take their discharge they would lose all that they have put into the pension fund. Has it been arranged that they can get their money out on discharge?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Under the new act which has been passed, those who retire get a bonus for the number of years that they have served. Previously they did not get anything if they retired before they had completed their twenty years; that is, if they retired of their own volition, but now they get a bonus for each year's service repaid to them on retirement.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Would that bonus amount to the amount that they had paid into the pension scheme?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is considerably in excess of what they paid in.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I do not think the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North should pass without some comment on them. Obviously the air force is going to consist of a great number of these excellent operational aircrew, but our air force must be a continuous service. That is why the air force is enlisting these young ground crew who had no experience in warfare. It is especially important that the aircrew should be recruited and that there should be ample vacancies for the great mass of young lads of nineteen, twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two who are, without doubt, of the age best fitted for combat duty in the air. That is why the air force is so different from the army and the navy in particular. An army officer who has trained at twenty or twenty-two years of age is useful as a combat officer—and I asked other army men here about this—until he is at least forty-five, and beyond that. In the last war there were naval officers over the age of seventy serving as commodores on convoys on the north Atlantic. The very best years of an aircrew man of any description are the early years of the twenties. If we are to bog down our air force, as was done in the past by enlisting men as aircrew officers in the early twenties and using them for three or four years, teaching them how to be good aircrewmen and holding them in the air force as staff pilots or as ground officers, then our air force cannot be the air force that it should be, a large cadre of highly qualified pilots in the service of the country. That is why I asked this question about short-service commissions, because the foundation of the R.A.F. fighter force, certainly at the beginning of the war, was not so much permanent force, but rather the fact that in England, because of the vision, three or four years at least before the war, Lord Trenchard, the air chief marshal at that time, recruited the very cream of the young men of England out of the universities and public schools on the short-term commissions of three, five and seven years. They made them into skilled pilots. If the war had come during that time they would have had those men. Then they were returned to civilian life. When war did come they were returned easily.

That is why I have asked the minister what sort of gratuities were to be paid. If you ask a young man of nineteen, twenty or twenty-one years to join the air force, not as a career but as a short-service commission of five years, so that he may qualify himself technically to be part of a first-class aircrew, then that man will leave the air force at the age of twenty-six. The minister said that ten per cent of them will be kept. That means that ninety per cent of aircrew boys will leave the service at the age of twenty-six, and they must be taken care of. Men who did not serve their country, or at least have not prepared for service of their country in the same way, have been in civilian occupations getting themselves established for five years. The R.A.F. used to pay £100 gratuity for each year of service. This has recently been increased to £150, or $750. I would recommend to the government that, if they are to attract the best boys at the ages of nineteen, twenty or twenty-one into the air force, as short-term officers for aircrew they must give them some assurance that, when they leave at the ages of twenty-five or twenty-six, they will have sufficient cash in hand to establish themselves in civilian occupations. If that is not done the department will not get the type of young men they want. This is one case where it would certainly be very cheap economy to be niggardly, not so much in what is being paid to them, but in connection with the gratuities which they will have at the end of their service.

Mr. FERGUSON: The young men I am referring to are now at the age of twenty-one or twenty-two, and apparently they had sufficient training to fly aircraft during the war. We still should be able to use their capabilities in training. I certainly agree with the hon. member for Vancouver North that the inducement of $100, on retirement, for each year served, is far from adequate to induce any young, red-blooded boy to join the flying force. He should have something to compensate him for his excellent service, and a necessary service to the country in these days. The condition in this country, and the condition throughout the world at the present time is one which should encourage young men of the right calibre to go into our flying corps. We do not know when we shall need them, any more than we did in the latter part of 1939.

Mr. MASSEY: I was discussing the matter of recruiting and, although we got away from the subject for a while, we are back on it again. I certainly subscribe to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver North in regard to the attraction that should be developed for the recruit. In the first place, the minister will realize that the type of lad he is after is the type of lad who is the cream of the crop; he must be. If he comes into the R.C.A.F. at the age of eighteen, nineteen or twenty, he will be leaving it on short-term commission when he is twenty-four, twenty-five or twenty-six. Those five years are pretty valuable years. We hope he will not be required for combat duty. If he is not, and he is retired, he has given in the service of his country, just as if it were at war, those valuable years. We can therefore afford to compensate him, and compensate him well. But he wants to know what that compensation will be.

I should like to say to the minister, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that the more definite the information can be that will be given to the public at large, the more rapid his recruiting will be. One of the great difficulties up to the present time—and I am quite sure the minister will understand what I mean by "present"—has been that there have been a few feeble advertisements. I have seen them. They are small and, if the minister will forgive my saying so, they are not attractive. I say that as a former advertising man. They bring the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force to the attention of those who see it, but they are not particularly original, nor are they particularly good. Furthermore, they say very little.

In other words, the lad may be attracted by the advertising, and it may set him thinking. But it does not send him to a recruiting officer, saying, "I want to enlist." It sends him out to get further information. In other words, the minister relies upon the recruiting officer to sell the young man the idea. He is not sending the young man to the recruiting officer to enlist. In this way the burden is on the recruiting officer, because the lad has to go there first.

I believe there is a story to be told about the Royal Canadian Air Force in peace time, a story which is more attractive than perhaps many of the lads realize to-day. I believe the plans the minister placed before the committee this evening are good plans. But are they definite? Who knows them? If you are to recruit during a war, that is one thing. If you are to recruit during peace time, that is another thing. The minister is in a position of—and I use the word in quotation marks—"selling" the Royal Canadian Air Force. He has the grandest air service in the world to sell, and it can be sold. But I feel definitely that a clear statement must be made in regard to what the lad's position will be when his training will start and, if he is going to enlist for aircrew, when his air training will start. He wants to know that. I realize the difficulty in the way of coming to that definite decision. But on the other hand, before we get either the quality that we want, let alone the quantity, that story will have to be told. So I urge upon the minister, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that the story be told quickly. I am quite sure his 400 or 450 a month will increase rapidly.

While I am on my feet, I shall mention another matter. As the minister is probably aware, I can speak only for one release centre, namely No. 4 release centre. At that centre there were attached to the staff some eighteen officers as liaison officers, working in connection with employers. Those eighteen officers circulated through that portion of Ontario into which the releasees from No. 4 release centre went. The results of those contacts were good. If they did not already have it, employers were given a copy of the employers' guide, which was an excellent publication. It was explained to them in some detail by the visiting officer. Further, the employer was chatted with in regard to his treatment of returned personnel. The net result was that the national employment service were definitely interested in the work we were doing, and finally there were attached to the national employment service two officers on the permanent detachment to work in conjunction with that office.

I know from first-hand information and first-hand contact that the results of having these two officers in the national employment service office in Toronto were most beneficial, since many of the ex-service men seeking employment felt much freer talking to someone in uniform who spoke their language than they did to a civilian who was simply there to see about their possible future jobs. Has the minister given any consideration to extending that particular service to other employment centres in Canada?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is not a matter which comes within the air force, that is under the Department of Labour, and anything like that would have to be arranged by that department.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday August 27, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

UNITED NATIONS

MEETING OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY IN NEW YORK—CANADIAN DELEGATION

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house has already been informed, the second part of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations has been summoned to open in New York on September 23. Under the charter, member states are entitled to be represented in the general assembly by five delegates. The assembly will have before it a long and complicated agenda, and this will necessitate the appointment of a fairly large Canadian delegation. I am now able to inform the house of those who have been invited to serve as delegates and as alternate delegates. The names of the advisers will be announced later.

The five delegates will be myself, as chairman of the delegation; the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), and the minister without portfolio, Senator Robertson. I am happy to say that the leaders of the Progressive Conservative party and of the C.C.F., the hon. members for Neepawa (Mr. Bracken) and Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), have also accepted the invitation to serve as delegates.

The following gentlemen have been invited to serve as alternate delegates: The leader of the opposition in the senate, Hon. J. T. Haig; the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), who is the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; together with, from the public service, Mr. Hume Wrong, the Associate Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; Mr. M. W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and Mr. H. L. Keenleyside, Canadian Ambassador to Mexico.

The advisers to the delegation will be selected from those in the public service with special competence in the matters that are expected to come before the assembly.

SOAP

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that right across Canada the housewife cannot buy a cake of soap to-day for her laundry work, what is the government going to do about it? It is a serious problem—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that his question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. FRASER: Will the parliamentary assistant answer my question? It is a serious problem.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it would require a fairly lengthy statement to answer the hon. gentleman's question, and I think it should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: Cleanliness is next to godliness, you know.

Mr. FRASER: This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, and I think the parliamentary assistant ought to give an answer to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the minister, or his parliamentary assistant is not obliged to answer a question.

Mr. GRAYDON: This soap crisis surely is urgent enough to call for a reply.

Mr. FRASER: The whole thing is "no soap" with the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the members to be quiet and patient. I do not think the session will last very long.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

LABOUR PROGRESSIVE PARTY—RADIO TALKS OVER THE NATIONAL NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Right Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). According to press reports, Tim Buck, leader of the Labour Progressive party, and Guy Caron, another well-known communist, are scheduled to talk to-morrow evening over the C.B.C. In view of the findings of the report on espionage activities and the charges levelled against the Labour Progressive party, is it the minister's intention to intervene and prevent this communist propaganda over the C.B.C.?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Text): The hon. member asks if the Minister of Justice is going to intervene to prevent certain people from speaking over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I must say to the hon. member that the Minister of Justice has no right to do that under the statute which governs the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and which was passed by this parliament. There is before parliament at the present time a bill to amend that statute. If parliament deals with that bill it will be the privilege of any hon. member to propose any amendment that he sees fit to that bill to give other controls over the broadcasting facilities than those which are provided in accordance with the statute. Until that is done the Minister of Justice has no greater right to give direction to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation than has the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond).

SUPPLY

DISCONTINUANCE OF MILK SUBSIDY—STATEMENT OF MR. KNOWLES—AMENDMENT, MR. NICHOLSON

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair there is a matter I should like to draw to the attention of the house, and a request I should like to make to the government on behalf of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent. The fact is that the people of Winnipeg North Centre are not alone in their concern about this matter. I refer to announcement which has been made by the government to the effect that the milk subsidy is to be removed, with the result that an increase in the price of milk to consumers may take place very shortly.

It is well-established that one of the most nutritious foods needed by our people is milk.

Mr. REID: And still the cheapest.

Mr. KNOWLES: Canada's food rules as approved by the council of nutrition in 1944, contained in a report on nutrition and the production and distribution of food published this year under the authority of the minister of national health and welfare (Mr. Claxton), lists the desirability of a sufficient quantity of milk as the first of these food rules. Accordingly, the possibility of an increase in the price of milk to 14, 14½ or 15 cents a quart is a matter of very serious concern to all Canadian people. It is of particular concern to urban dwellers in a constituency such as mine.

The matter is not only of concern to the consumer; it is also of concern to the producer. A person engaged in the production of so vital a commodity as milk certainly should have his return from that effort guaranteed, and he should not be subject to losses such as are bound to result if the price of milk goes up and the purchase of milk is therefore reduced. I was interested in reading in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning a news dispatch from Ottawa which reads in part as follows: it is under the by-line of Kenneth Cragg:

> Ottawa, August 26.—Government decision, announced to parliament last Thursday, not to continue producer subsidies on whole milk after October 1, was taken contrary to the recommendation of agriculture minister Gardiner.
> Mr. Gardiner, it was learned to-day, when he left for Europe, left behind for his colleagues advice for a compromise on subsidy policy, in view of labour's wage demands and the government's determination to support price control.

The article goes on to suggest that, although the Minister of Agriculture is not rated as an authority on finance or labour, he had something very strong to say about this matter in relation to prices:

He argued that an increase now in milk price, which affects the consumer faster than an increase in almost any other food product, would be the worst possible timing.

I am not going to take time at the moment to comment on this division in the cabinet, similar to some other divisions which we have noted of late, but I do suggest that in this instance the minister is right in protesting against any change in policy which results in an increase in the price of milk.

I could go on, but the case is so strong that it is not necessary to add to it. I simply rise to register my strongest protest at this move being taken at this time, and I earnestly hope that the government will reconsider its policy and see to it that the price of milk does not go up any further; in fact in my view it should be restored to the ten cent ceiling that we had during the course of the war.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, having been a milk producer for twenty-five years I feel I should say something on this matter, because the situation which is facing Canada to-day is a serious one. We have had an increase of four cents in six months. The consumer subsidy of two cents has been removed, which means that the consumer has to pay 12 or 12½ cents, according to the city he lives in; and now, if the producer subsidy is taken off, as the government intends to do on October 1, the man who is getting his milk for ten cents will have to pay 14½ or 15 cents. I suggested in the house some considerable time ago that if the government had done this sort of thing to half the extent, that is if it had taken one cent off, it would have been better. We all know that these subsidies have to come off, and we have to get back to a pre-war basis. But on the one hand the government refuses to give increased wages to the man who is going to purchase the milk, and on the other hand the cost of producing milk is going up by leaps and bounds.

Mr. REID: What about the family allowances?

Mr. BRYCE: My hon. friend will make his speech after I have done, and I shall be delighted to listen to him.

Mr. REID: Will you? Thanks.

Mr. BRYCE: In answer to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) I might tell him that we had family allowances when we were getting these subsidies.

Mr. REID: Only for one year.

Mr. BRYCE: Until such time as we get back to normal conditions these things will have to be looked after, and if they are not looked after by the government, who is going to look after them?

To-day the cost of producing milk is going up. People who have followed that occupation all their lives just cannot make ends meet, because men are getting wages on the farms such as they never got before. Those increased wages have to be paid, because men can get fine jobs in industry to-day, where they do not have to work fourteen hours a day, as they do on the farm, so the farmer has to pay them high wages to get them to produce milk.

There is a scarcity of fodder in the western provinces. That may seem unbelievable, but it is true. I have been out there and have seen the condition myself. If the fifty-five cents producer subsidy is taken off, the price of milk will rise to 14½ cents. I think the government acted very unfairly in this matter. The war-time prices and trade board set the price of milk during the war, and now that the war is over and we are getting back to normal they throw the whole thing into the lap of the provincial milk boards. I asked the Minister of Agriculture a question about this, and he told me that they wanted it that way. I do not know whether it is so, but certainly the situation is a serious one and the government must face it. They have either to reinstate a part of these subsidies or make some other arrangement. As I have said before, milk is not only a drink; it is also a food, and if we want to build a healthy Canada we must see to it that the people get milk. In the Winnipeg area there are 1,000 shippers sending in milk now, whereas before the war there were only 600. The reason is that the big fellows are going out of business and it is only the man who is producing two or three cans of milk a day, who is able to exploit his children by getting them to milk the cows before they go to school and when they come home in the evening, who is producing milk. We shall never have a healthy situation so long as the milk producers are not enabled to stand on their feet.

I do not wish to take up a lot of time but I appeal to the member of the government, whoever it is that represents the Minister of Agriculture, and also to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, to do something about this and do it right away because, as I say, the situation is serious.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): I am prompted to say a word or two on this subject by an editorial which appeared in my local newspaper a couple of days ago, recapitulating the demands of the people of my particular city for the continuance of the milk subsidies. I do not think it is necessary for me to say, nor does anyone else need to say, that milk is a highly nutritious food, and it is important that there should be an adequate supply of it, particularly at this time when our children are returning to school. The ration of this commodity should not be reduced.

Some time ago I appealed through the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, and through him to the wartime prices and trade board, for a permit for a certain organization in my home town of Saskatoon. It is a newly organized cooperative store which has been in operation seven or eight months and in that time it has accumulated to itself seven or eight hundred families as customers. I appealed to the minister to try to get a quota of canned milk for that cooperative store. I do not think that the distribution of quotas for canned milk in Saskatoon is at the moment equitable, because this particular cooperative cannot get a tin of canned milk. I know there are reasons for that, but in the light of what has happened now, and in view of the fact that the subsidy is to be withdrawn, I would ask the minister if he thinks it is right that these people, who cannot procure canned milk, are also to be denied a supply of fresh milk because of the increased price in the commodity itself.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): I know that everyone wants to go home, but I must tell the house that every member here is precisely in my position—elected to do a certain job for his constituents and for the people of Canada. I will not discuss the question of a milk subsidy either as a producer of milk, because I am not one, or as a large consumer, since my family is grown up; but I will speak from information given me by a very important Canadian organization, the local council of women, the members of which make a particular job of studying the needs of less fortunate people in their communities. They are earnest, sincere citizens. I will not take time to put on the record a number of letters I have received from various councils of this organization but I would say that they are earnestly, desperately and sincerely concerned over the welfare of the children of the larger and less fortunate families in the areas from which they write me.

The government would be well advised to reconsider the whole matter and to continue the subsidies until the transition from wartime and semi-inflation or complete inflation, or whatever it is we have at the present time, is completed and things are properly organized. There are many children who will not have their full ration of milk this winter if the subsidy is taken off now. I am not trying to be critical. I know the trouble the government is having. I know the members of the government are doing the best they can in the light of the information they have and from their view of the situation, but I do believe they would do well to give the matter further consideration and continue the subsidies until such time as plentiful supplies of milk are on the market. If they do not, I know something of the producer and of milk production, and I know, as the hon. member for Selkirk says, that a great many people now in the business of producing milk will gradually get rid of their dairy herds, or some of them, reduce them to the point where they can handle the business with family labour. If they have to buy a lot of feed from outside, and hire outside labour, undoubtedly they will feel that the game is not worth all the work and expense and risk involved, and they will reduce their herds to the point where the risk is lowest and where they can handle the business with available labour in the family. In that event supplies of milk will be less than they are at the present time.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): I concur entirely in what the other speakers have said in this regard. Three weeks or a month ago I wrote to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture asking them to continue the subsidies. I am like these other gentlemen in that I was brought up on a farm and I know what the milk producers have to go through in producing milk. At the present time, with the clamour for high wages, it is impossible for the farmers to produce milk more cheaply than they are doing it now. Not only is the welfare of our children at stake; the welfare of the future population of Canada is involved if we do not provide the people now with the nutrition they need. I would therefore urge the government to reconsider their decision, if they have decided not to continue the subsidy because this is no time to have our children go without this valuable food.

There are very few members of this house, I would say there are no more than forty, who know what a farmer has to go through in order to produce milk, and if the majority of hon. members apart from those forty were on farms trying to produce milk themselves they would understand the difficulties of the dairy farmer. Again I urge the government to reconsider the decision.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I will not attempt to answer the various arguments that have been advanced. In a matter of a day or two the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board will be up for discussion and there will be no reason why this question could not be discussed at that time, when I can make necessary answers. In the meantime I will point out that the handling of milk has been turned back to the milk boards of the provinces, and whether they want an increase or not is something that is up to them.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) on the contribution which he has made to this important discussion. The views which he has expressed represent the opinions of hon. members in all sections of the house. The statement made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mayhew) is not very helpful. If we are to continue the wartime prices and trade board it is important that subsidies in connection with the production of milk be maintained. If something is not done in the next six months there will be an increase in that six months period of from ten to fifteen cents a quart in some parts of Canada. It is obvious that with the general increase in the cost of living, old age pensioners and people in the lower income brackets will find it impossible to obtain a sufficient quantity of milk at the high prices.

There has been little criticism of the subsidy policy carried out by the government during the war. This is no field in which the wartime prices and trade board should retreat and throw the matter back on the lap of the provincial authorities. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton:

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be left out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house desires to record its opinion that consideration should be given to the continuance of the milk subsidy so as to ensure adequate return to milk producers and make possible the consumption of milk for the nutrition of the Canadian people without any further increase in the price thereof to the consumers."

I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the decisions of former Speakers as recorded in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms at page 529. In 1912 the Hon. James S. Sproule ruled that:

Private members may introduce resolutions which do not directly involve the expenditure of public money but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant.

Then in a relative paragraph on the next page we find the following:

As this is a question not always understood, it may be explained that such resolutions, being framed in general terms, do not bind the house to future legislation on the subject, and are merely intended to point out to the government the importance and necessity of such expenditure.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): This milk question is of great interest to the house and Canada. The government could very well shorten the discussion by themselves giving us a little milk in the form of a word as to what their intentions are. The government have been particularly silent on the question. The people of the country who may have to suffer because of the lack of subsidy would not mind doing so if there was good reason for it. If the government have a good reason for doing this, let them say so now and we should all be ready to listen to reason.

That is all I wish to say. There is no use labouring the point, but we ought to have some real reply from the government as to why they still persist in the policy of withdrawing subsidies.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I do not want to take up much time; I want to say something but I still want to go home. Therefore I say that I concur in the remarks which have been made so far.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I favour the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). Having been a dairyman myself I know something of the difficulties of dairymen; I know something about the cost of production and the difficulties which people have in obtaining sufficient milk for the proper nutrition of their families. It is significant to note that prior to the introduction of the federal subsidies on milk, distribution in Ontario never did reach more than about 600,000 quarts a day. After the introduction of dominion subsidies, in Ontario the distribution of milk reached more than a million quarts a day, which is ample evidence that the subsidy resulted in bringing up the nutritional standards of the people, particularly of this province. I should say that was the general pattern of the effect in other provinces. I am in favour of the amendment, and would urge the government most strongly to continue the subsidy on milk.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The moment that this resolution was put before the house I fancy that what went through the minds of the members of the government was, we cannot find money; we cannot afford this thing. Either the government has meant what it has been saying during the last few years about the new order, or it has not. Here is a right good chance for the government to show whether or not it was deliberately deceiving the people, or whether it really meant what it said.

There is only one way in which the price of goods can be kept from rising, and that is by means of subsidy. At the present time we are in the midst of grave industrial unrest. Everyone knows that one of the major causes of that unrest is a rise in the price of living. Here is another measure proposed by the government which will increase the cost of living. How can we possibly conceive that we shall do away with the industrial unrest in the country when we adopt the very measures which are calculated to bring on industrial unrest?

The government will say, we cannot find the money for a milk subsidy. The government must find the money. The government will say, we cannot tax the people any more. They do not need to tax the people any more. The government will say, we do not want to go into debt any further. They do not need to go into debt any further. I simply say that if the government will take a realistic attitude toward the whole situation of the Canadian economy it will discover how it can keep down the cost of living without increasing taxation and debt. May I warn the government that if it does not adopt a streamlined modern method of dealing with the economic situation in Canada, it is leading the country into disaster, and leading it fast.

I heartily support the amendment made by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I would say a good deal more if the time were appropriate.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): In supporting the motion I wish to say that the government is ill-advised to take the subsidy off milk, particularly in view of the support which the Canadian people have given to the whole policy of price stabilization. The milk producers of Canada can present facts and figures to prove that even with the fifty-five cent subsidy on a hundred pounds of milk they cannot make money because they are not meeting their cost of production. In fact a demand will be made on the government for an increase in the subsidy. To take it off will place the producers in such a position that milk production will fall off tremendously. The scarcity of milk will increase the price to the consumer. The people in the cities who buy milk will find that the increase of two cents in the price, which in some places will bring it up to fifteen cents a quart, will result in the workers taking the view: What is the use of trying to help the government in maintaining stabilization? What chance is there for us to prevent an increase in the cost of living and the spiral of inflation? The people who have to buy milk for their children, the people who are living on fixed incomes, will find this a terrific hardship, and it will have a detrimental effect upon the economy of Canada and the welfare of the people.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would just say a word to urge the government to accept this motion, because the present conditions affecting the production and distribution of milk are of vital importance to the people of Canada. Statements have been made in the press and elsewhere to the effect that if the price of milk goes up, people will not be consuming the quantity of milk they have been consuming during the last five or six years. This will mean that milk production on the farm will be curtailed and less work will be available in rural areas. People who ordinarily work on the farm will flock to the cities, creating a situation such as we had during the depression.

The idea of subsidies is a reasonable one. It is a method of using the taxing power of the country to distribute income, thus increasing production and equalizing the opportunities for consumption. I would urge the government to accept this motion and give consideration to the matter involved.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have just one word to say—I am in favour of this motion. As it comes from the opposition, I think it is our duty to demand results from the government. Although our duty may end with demanding results, it is sometimes wise to make suggestions as to how results can be achieved. I am not going to offer any suggestions, because they have been made time and time again from this corner of the house. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said some mighty things in a few words. If the government cannot do it, if they find that their policy is such that they cannot possibly do it, then the country should know.

I suggest to the government that here is one opportunity of their taking the proposals which have been made over a number of years by the Social Credit group and demonstrating whether or not they are sound. The government do not have to use our proposals to run the economy of the country; all I am suggesting is that in connection with this one thing, the matter of milk subsidies, they take the proposals we have made over the years. Surely that is not going to upset the whole economy of the country; it is dealing with just one commodity. They should try it, if only as an experiment to see if it will not work. They are challenged to do it; we are demanding results and we suggest that this is the way to do it. I am in favour of the amendment.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my support of this amendment by simply saying this. Surely a government which can vote over $21,000,000 for munitions and arms this year can find a few millions for milk.

Mr. GILLIS: Tell them about the judges' salaries.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the feeling of a number of hon. members in regard to this matter, but I am not sure that the mover of the motion (Mr. Nicholson) wishes to do what the motion implies. The acceptance of this motion would prevent the house from going into supply, and I do not think that that is what the hon. member has in mind. I do not think anyone in the house wishes to take that attitude at this moment. I believe what the hon. member wishes to get is an expression of opinion from this house as to the carrying out of a policy which was announced last May. The motion asks that the house record its opinion as to whether consideration should be given to the continuance of the milk subsidy. Whether or not the motion passes, consideration certainly would be given to the continuance of the policy, because consideration is given from day to day to the economy of the nation.

At the present time there are factors in the national economy which were not present last May and which were not present a couple of weeks ago. A serious effort was being made to reconvert from a wartime to a peacetime economy, and it was felt that some day this policy of maintaining prices by government subsidies would have to be abandoned. Last spring it was felt that with respect to the milk subsidy the proper time to do it, in a manner that would not be charged as unfair or almost dishonest to the producer was not to cease paying the subsidy at the time milk was most plentiful. It would not have been fair to take off the subsidy at the beginning of a period when the producers were going to have large quantities of milk to which the subsidy would apply. It was thought proper to make an announcement at that time that the consumer subsidy would be removed at once and that the producer subsidy would be removed at the end of the pasture season.

Up to a relatively short time ago the reconversion of the Canadian economy was proceeding in a manner which was looked upon as being fairly satisfactory, but for some reason or other in recent weeks there has been what appears to be a change in the views of a substantial portion of the Canadian people. I refer to certain sections of organized labour. I do not think anyone will dispute the assertion that the only way to maintain our economy on a sound basis is by abundant production. Some sections of organized labour seem to have felt that the way for them to get what they believe they are entitled to is to stop production and hold up the economy of the nation until such time as they can make everybody agree that their share should be such and so. I think that is a most unfortunate development. I think it is a development not only which is harmful to the rest of the Canadian people but which constitutes a short-sighted policy for those sections of organized labour to follow. It has created a difficult position; it has put great pressure upon the price ceilings, and has made it much more difficult to proceed toward a stabilized peacetime economy. These facts are facts which are considered almost every twenty-four hours every day by the government, and would be considered whatever was the government in power. Those who become ministers of the crown are at least of average intelligence, average honesty and average Canadian patriotism. Whatever the label of the party to which they belong, I am convinced that when times get tough they do their best to serve their country honestly and efficiently. And that requires them to do what this motion asks to have done.

I do not think it requires a vote in the House of Commons to make us realize that not only the house but the country expects us to give consideration constantly to all these measures. That being so, and it being the fact that if the motion carries in this way we would not go into supply at this time, I think the motion might without harm be withdrawn. If it is not withdrawn I think it should be modified in such a way as to state that the house does not object to going into supply, but in doing so wishes to express a certain opinion about this subsidy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister as leader of the government give the assurance that this matter will be considered anew, not as a matter of day-to-day routine? Will he assure us that it will be considered specially and anew?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can give the house the assurance that before October 1 which, I understand, is the date which was announced on May 16, new consideration will be given to what may appear to be in the best interests of the Canadian public generally with respect to this milk subsidy. It cannot be paid without placing a burden on the general body of the population; and consideration will be given as to whether under present conditions it appears desirable to promote the speediest possible return to normal conditions to continue for a time the payment of that subsidy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister give the house the undertaking that, while careful consideration is being given anew to this whole question as to the advisibility of continuing the milk subsidy, there will be brought to the attention of the cabinet these three questions:

1. Is it proposed that we shall discontinue this milk subsidy because a subsidy in itself is unsound?

2. Is it proposed that we shall discontinue this milk subsidy because we cannot afford it—that is, because we cannot find the money?

3. Is it proposed that we shall discontinue this milk subsidy because the Canadian economy cannot produce enough goods to enable that Canadian economy to provide Canadian milk producers with what they ought to have?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I cannot give any undertaking whatsoever that the government will seriously consider adopting the policies of social credit. I will give an undertaking that the matter will be considered, but no undertaking as to what will be the mental processes of those engaged in that consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the government consider the question from the point of view of using plain, common horse sense?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under those conditions, and because I believe there is an honest desire on the part of all hon. members to proceed with supply, would it not be possible to have this motion withdrawn, and for hon. members to trust to the impression they have made upon the house, the country and the government as a result of what has been said this morning?

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to draw the attention of the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken once.

Mr. IRVINE: He is speaking to the amendment.

Mr. BRYCE: I am now speaking to the amendment; I spoke to the motion before.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then I give the floor to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is to go into committee of supply. The amendment, which I believe is a proper one, is that consideration be given to the continuance of the milk subsidy, which the government has announced it is withdrawing.

What is the position at the present time? This amendment is in order, or it is not. I suggest respectfully that however much the government may dislike it, it is in order. Being in order it must be dealt with and a vote taken, or withdrawn.

What are the merits of the proposal? In the early days of the war the government came along and said, "We are going to take certain steps to control our economy." Among other things the government said, "We are going to pay a subsidy of two cents on the cost to consumers of their milk, and to producers 55 cents per 100 pounds." When the first of these proposals was made, the danger we are facing to-day was pointed out by the producers of Canada. The impression it left with Canadian consumers was that they were getting milk for ten cents a quart or thereabouts. As a matter of fact is was costing twelve cents, the extra two cents being paid by the government and charged back to the taxpayers as a whole. But the impression was left with the consumers that they were getting cheap milk.

Now with these subsidies withdrawn there is the impression going around that the cost of milk is going up, that the farmers are thereby deriving some benefit, and the consumers having to pay more. Unfortunately that situation has arisen at the very time when farmers' costs are going up, and when the country finds itself embroiled in strikes and industrial unrest of one kind or another.

This question resolves itself down to this: What is the government's policy? If the government says now that it is going to remove these subsidies. I do not see how hon. members who have moved this amendment can withdraw it. What is the price of continuing with the amendment, in the event of its being carried? In the first instance we may be delayed for forty-eight hours before we can go into supply again. That of course is only a detail, on a question that merits consideration. With all respect I suggest that the house can get over this impasse and continue its work—if the government is disposed to do it—if the government will undertake to say within the next short period of time whether it intends to persist in withdrawing these subsidies. If it is, there is nothing that can prevent the opposition from taking the stand it is taking in pressing for a vote.

The question is very simple. It is just this. Is the government going to say now, after four or five years of these subsidies, that it is going to make consumers pay the whole cost of the milk, or is it going to continue to take out of the consolidated revenue fund several million dollars to pay two cents on the cost of each quart of milk. I do not remember just what the subsidies to the dairy industry amounted to, but speaking wholly from memory I think they were around $20,000,000. There is not a man in this country but recognizes that milk production to-day costs more now than it did in the past. And yet these subsidies to the producer and to the consumer are being removed, with the result that the consumer will have to pay more and the producer who needs more will get less.

The government, having a majority in this house and being the government, has the opportunity now of saying whether it will continue its policy or whether it will not. At the moment I am not saying which is right; I am not arguing the merits of the policy at the moment, but I must say that this difficult situation, the government has invited by its policies.

There seems to be a desire to avoid a vote, but I do not see any way of doing it, other than for the government to say: We have heard these representations, and we will consider them and we will let the house know in a short time whether there is to be any change in our policy. If the government is not disposed to say that I do not see how the opposition can agree to withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this discussion, and would not be doing so were it not for the fact that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in a few well chosen words attempted to unload the present unrest in our whole Canadian economy on one section of society, the industrial workers, who by being on strike and so forth, were responsible, according to the minister, for everything untoward that was happening.

I think this amendment should be voted on. The mere promise of the government to consider this matter should not be good enough. I think most of the members of this house have got in the habit of thinking in terms of getting home. We are dragging along to the end of the session, but what it is important for us in this house to remember is that things at home are not so good, and the most serious business in front of the members of the House of Commons now is to consider resetting the economy of this country, no matter how long we may have to sit here. I think earnest and serious consideration should be given to that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Even if it takes Social Credit to do it.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. The government is very heavily committed to the principle of subsidies now. I would point out to the Acting Prime Minister that the government removed the fifty cents duty on the imports of coal. That was a subsidy to that industry. Then there is a seventy-five cents drawback on all coal imported for metallurgical purposes. That is a subsidy to that industry, which is still being paid. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) pointed out last night that the government had spent around $8,000,000 in coal production subsidies in the maritimes. That is a very heavy subsidy.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) suggested that the family allowance was paid to offset the increase in the price of milk. But if you are paying the family allowance based on living standards as they were at the time it was introduced in order to enable the children to have clothes and shoes so that they may go to school, clothes and shoes which they did not have in the 1930's, you are taking it back from them when you allow increased prices on the essentials which the children need. If that be so, the gesture on the part of the government in instituting the family allowance will require considerable examination as to the motives behind it. I would not be so harsh as to suggest that it was done on the eve of an election because it was a popular thing and might get votes. But I think it should be followed through. If there is one thing in this country that should be subsidized it is milk, because that is something which the children of this country sadly lacked until the outbreak of the war.

I think the point made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was a very important one. He said that the production of milk in Ontario had doubled under the subsidy. I presume that is true of every province.

I think the house should be asked to vote on this amendment, even if it means that we may not go into supply for twenty-four or forty-eight hours. I think that would be time well spent. This business of just getting a promise is not good enough.

I agree with those that say there should be no curtailment of production in this country. We should be producing to our maximum in every line to-day, because Canada's production is required not only by this country but all over the world.

I would like to leave this thought with the Acting Prime Minister. The workers of this country are not asking for something that is unreasonable. The basic reason for industrial unrest in Canada to-day is that the price ceilings in this country were not maintained and consequently the standard of living of the workers was reduced. This was proven to me pretty conclusively by facts and figures and evidence presented from both sides in the industrial relations committee. It was established that if the increase of fifteen cents an hour asked for was granted it would merely maintain the standards of living for the workers that were established during the war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will permit a question, does he not take into account in that calculation the desire to have the same pay for a much smaller number of working hours?

Mr. GILLIS: That is a small factor, but it is a factor. Reducing the hours of work from 48 to 44—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To 40 and to 37½, as I saw suggested in a dispatch last night.

Mr. GILLIS: There was no evidence to that effect in the industrial relations committee. I also saw that dispatch, but I do not go to the Canadian Press as a source of accurate and definite information. I am talking of a committee set up by this house which sat for five weeks. You can read your Tory press and you will find all kinds of criticism of your government. I read the other press too and get the other side. I like to read in between and get the facts. The facts were given to the committee on industrial relations, and I think I am safe in saying that if the price line had been held, you would not have the industrial unrest you have right across the country to-day.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I have a clipping here from the Ottawa Journal of August 26 last. It is a Canadian Press dispatch and reads:

> Dividend payments by Canadian corporations in August were the highest for any corresponding month in years, the total of $11,416,528, as reported to J. R. Timmins & Company, comparing with $9,605,112 for August, 1945, and $9,072,169 for August, 1944.
> Cumulative total for the first eight months of the current year of $183,460,569, compared with $170,188,104 for corresponding months of the previous year, and $165,122,527 for similar period of 1944.

All the industrial workers of Canada are asking for at this time is, first, to maintain the standards established during the war, and, second, to get a share of the wealth they produce, as indicated by that statement in the Ottawa Journal, and that is not propaganda.

I suggest that some common sense should be applied in the present situation. I do not think we are going to fight our way out of this thing. The time has come when we must think our way out; and as the government is heavily committed in the matter of subsidies—I agree that it is the proper way of redistributing the income of this country, and taxing those who are able to pay in order to do that—the maintenance of this production bonus on milk is essential at this time. You are not going to cure industrial unrest by continuing subsidies to every large corporation in order that it may make profits, while you take it off a very essential commodity, and add to the cost of living, and create more arguments for increases of wages.

I seriously suggest to hon. members that, instead of passing the buck and thinking in terms of getting home, of our own selfish pleasures and interests, we make up our minds to analyse these problems now in the light of their seriousness, and that we register an opinion, as every member should register it, by standing up and being counted, as Mr. Trestrail, the agent of the corporations in this country, suggested to the Canadian people on the eve of the last election. This is where we should show our colours.

We of this group believe that this subsidy should be maintained, and we also believe that every member of this house should record his vote as to whether he believes this or not. This is merely asking for a recorded opinion as to whether we believe in the continuance of these subsidies. I believe we should do it.

Mr. BRYCE: There is just one point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Acting Prime Minister. He pointed out to the house that people are striking and stopping work when production is needed. There are rumblings in the west indicating that farmers are going to stop producing, and if you take this amendment into account and do something about it you may save that situation.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I realize how very difficult it is to maintain production of milk at a high level, and at the same time how essential it is that that production shall be maintained. One reason why it is difficult to maintain a high level of production of milk is that milking cows is one of the most unpopular jobs on the farm. When you hire labour, invariably the man will ask you whether he has to milk cows. If you tell him yes, he will not work for you; with the result that right across Canada to-day in many cases the farmer and his family have to milk cows because the farm hand refuses to do it. Therefore you have a decreased production of milk.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the farmer has to pay income tax on it.

Mr. QUELCH: You recall that when Doctor Thompson of McGill spoke before the reconstruction committee he stated that in order to maintain a liberal diet in this country it would be necessary to double our production of milk on the basis of the 1939 figures. The policy of subsidies is sound. We did not hesitate to vote hundreds of millions of dollars for subsidies during the war. We have to cut costs in the future. We have to make it possible for people to buy at lower levels in order to cut those costs. The logical way to do it is by subsidizing. The only question involved is that of the financial cost. We did not hesitate to meet that cost during the war. I am not going to discuss how the government may meet it. The government is familiar with the way in which this group would do it. But that is their responsibility; and if they believe in the financial system they are using, it is time they made that financial system work or adopted another one. We are not interested in that question.

Surely if it was necessary to use subsidies to win the war, and if subsidies are necessary to win the peace, then they should be used. Do not forget that if we make the same mistake we did after the last war and lose this peace, we are creating conditions which will make for another war. One of the first essentials of winning the peace is to build up the health of the population, and to build up the health of the population you must have a high level of production of milk.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated that he thought all that was necessary was for the members of this house to express an opinion on this matter. But the minister knows very well that time and again during this session this house has in no uncertain way expressed an opinion without a vote; and what have the government done? Absolutely disregarded that opinion. I have in mind especially the question of old age pensions. Hon. members have shown clearly time and again that they believe old age pensions should be at a higher level than they are to-day. Did the government act? They have callously disregarded the old people. If we just express an opinion on the question of milk we shall get about as much consideration as we did on the question of old age pensions.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): We have had considerable discussion on this motion. It seems to me that the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has given exactly the undertaking which is being asked for in the amendment, and that he has given it as forcibly and sincerely as could possibly be obtained by a vote of the house. Nevertheless the government has no objection to an expression of opinion from the members of the house. I suggest that the vote should be a free expression regardless of party. The various members represent various economies in this country, and an expression of this kind should be the expression of the individual opinion of every hon. member.

The difficulty of obtaining the expression arises from the form of the amendment, which in itself denies the right of the house to move into committee of supply at this time. However, Mr. Speaker, I would call your attention to article 489 of Beauchesne, which reads as follows:

> When an amendment has been adopted to the motion for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, it may be forthwith moved that the house resolve itself into such committee immediately or on a future day.

Therefore I should like to serve notice that if this vote carries the government will immediately move that the house go into committee of supply this day. I believe that that procedure is consistent with the rules, and if there can be general agreement on that point the work of the house can be facilitated and the objective of hon. members attained.

I ask hon. members to consider the fact that the question at issue is not quite as simple as has been suggested during this discussion. We have been through a war. We have been through a period when it was necessary at all costs to conserve the economy of the country in a manner which would permit the greatest war effort of the people of Canada. Unusual steps were taken in that period. I have heard complaints that the government is attempting to put the Canadian people in a straitjacket; to order their daily lives in a manner described, as dictatorial. Well, the method of subsidy is a part of that regimentation of the people, and it is a part which in my opinion should not become usual practice in our normal economy. Hon. members can make an excellent case for certain subsidies, and perhaps other sections of the country can make an excellent case for certain other subsidies; perhaps both can make a case for and against the same subsidy. But I suggest that those who have publicly demanded that the government remove wartime restrictions and wartime restraints on the living of the people should consider carefully before they cast their vote on this issue, since I consider a vote for the amendment to be an expression of opinion on a matter of policy which goes far beyond the subsidy on milk. It will be in effect an expression of the opinion of members of this House of Commons that the subsidy policy of the government should be continued indefinitely. I think it should be regarded in that light. Personally, as a member of the government, I should be glad to get an expression from the individual members of the house of their view of the policy of continuing indefinitely the principle of subsidies, which to-day is costing this country something over $100,000,000 per annum.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I want to commend the Minister of Reconstruction for the suggestion which he has made, which has the effect of providing for a free vote of the members of the house. One other point I wish to make in reply to the Minister of Justice in respect of the appeal he made for the withdrawal of the motion, which appeal is not acceptable to us. I would point out that in this house on August 14 we had a fairly lengthy discussion of the question of milk. It ended with the assurance being given to the house by the Minister of Agriculture that the matter was still under consideration and he used these definite words at page 4799:

> These questions are being discussed this week and will be determined, I assume, in sufficient time to make the announcement long enough before the first of October to acquaint the people with what that situation is.

That was on August 14 of this year when the assurance was given that the matter was still under consideration and would be discussed further. Eight days later, on August 22, we were given the result of that consideration. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance answered a question which had been asked the previous day by the hon. member for Churchill, and stated clearly that the policy announced by the Minister of Agriculture on May 16 was to be carried out, and then appears this significant question, which was asked by the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn):

> I understood the Minister of Agriculture to tell the house the other day—

That is a reference back to August 14.

> —that the matter was under advisement, and that a decision had not been reached. Does the parliamentary assistant mean, then, that a decision has been reached, and that there will be no further subsidy on milk?
> Hon. Douglas Abbott (Acting Minister of Finance): I will answer that question. The answer is, yes.

We feel therefore that, having had one experience of further consideration being given the matter, and the result of that further consideration being an answer very definitely that there will be no further subsidies on milk, we have no alternative but to ask the house to express itself in the one clear way it can, by voting on the amendment now before the chair.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I may be a particularly stupid man but I find it extremely difficult to know what I am voting on. The Minister of Reconstruction says that what we are voting on is the principle of control.

Mr. HOWE: The principle of subsidies.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No. He said it was the whole principle of whether we believed in controls or not. I believe, as I said before, that controls should be removed as fast as possible. On the other hand, if this resolution concerns wholly the question of the production of milk, then that is a very different matter. But if that is the matter, then it seems to me that one is entitled to know a little more about it.

Mr. HOWE: How can you administer subsidies without controls?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I made myself clear, I believe. I realize that you cannot administer subsidies without controls. I am not quarrelling with the statement the minister made, but it seems to me that what we are voting on is very complicated.

I wish to say a word with reference to what the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said. He said, and I believe he was right, that in the last few weeks a situation has occurred which might very well cause the government to reach a different conclusion from that which it reached some months ago. I understood what he meant by that, but I am still, frankly, in a great difficulty. Am I voting—and I am referring to the resolution—merely to express the view that the government should give further consideration to the continuance of the milk subsidy? Is that all I am voting for? And when that vote is carried does it mean that the government merely has an expression of this house that this house wants it to give consideration to the milk subsidy, which the Minister of Justice has said it certainly will do? Is that all that this resolution means? I want to know. I may be stupid in asking the question but I want to know. Does it merely mean that if we pass this resolution this house desires to record its opinion that consideration should be given? And does that mean given by the government, or does it mean that we go on now and then consider it further ourselves and reach a conclusion on it ourselves? Which does it mean? Can you answer me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. COLDWELL: The rules of the house do not provide that a private member may give to the government a definite instruction which involves an expenditure of money, and consequently the only way in which, under the rules, a resolution could be moved is in the form of this resolution. We take it that if this resolution is passed it will mean that the house, the sovereign body, desires the government to consider favourably—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was right when he asked what was meant by the resolution, and I am trying to tell you what is really meant by the group that moved the amendment. The only way in which we can do it—

Mr. CASSELMAN: You got yourself into trouble.

Mr. COLDWELL: I say, the only way in which we can do it is to ask for consideration of it. We cannot give the government an instruction, but we hope that the government will consider favourably the matter contained in the resolution.

Mr. BRACKEN: Which is the matter of the milk subsidy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Which is the matter of the milk subsidy only.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am grateful to the hon. member for explaining what I am voting on. It is an expression of opinion that the government will give consideration to the continuance of the milk subsidy.

Mr. HOWE: An excellent philosophy as an excuse for speaking one way on the hustings and voting another way in the house.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not old enough in politics to have learned how to do that and I hope I shall never learn.

Mr. REID: The motion is very clear and, as far as I am concerned, when I vote I vote on the wording of the motion, with no strings attached or commitments into the future regarding price ceilings.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. BRACKEN: Before you put the question, sir, may I ask one thing. In the past on some of these votes pairs have been recognized. In view of the statement of the hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) that this would be regarded as a free vote, I wonder if we could have some understanding with respect to whether pairs should or should not be respected.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think under the conditions stated by the Minister of Reconstruction no hon. member should feel bound by any pairing arrangement that would otherwise bind him.

Mr. BRACKEN: If it is really a free vote, pairs do not need to be respected.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Nicholson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that the house do now go into committee of supply.

Mr. BRACKEN: Under the circumstances I am glad to follow the lead of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before the motion passes I wish to make one or two comments arising from the attitude manifested by the Minister of Justice with regard to social credit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On a point of order, I think it is a rule of this house that it is not permitted to refer to a previous debate during the same session.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I withdraw the remarks I made about the previous debate, and will proceed now to say what I have to say.

It is an exceedingly dangerous matter for any men charged with responsibility in these dangerous times to lay down hard and specific rules as to what they will or will not do. All that hon. members in the government know is that they face a time of great uncertainty and great danger. Their task is to guide this nation through that great danger, and to come out successfully on the other side.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The house has decided on the amendment, and therefore has decided on the point mentioned by the hon. member. I would therefore tell him that he is out of order.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

568. Air services (commitments, $29,855,110), $118,124,753.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Chairman, it was customary, when the estimates for the Department of National Defence were being considered during the war, to table a list of members of the force who had been awarded decorations for service. I should like to take this opportunity of placing on Hansard, with the consent of the committee, the names of those who were awarded operational decorations since the last list was published. DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

132. Departmental administration, $173,255.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I consider in view of what happened this morning that this house is not constitutionally convened. This morning the Acting Prime Minister moved that the house go into committee of supply. An amendment to that motion was moved and carried. That meant that the government was defeated in this house. The government can quote all the rules they like, Beauchesne and any other authorities, but the fact remains that the government made a motion to go into supply this morning and was defeated on the motion. There was only one course open to the government after that defeat. The vote having been taken and the government defeated, before they can go into supply the government must ask the house for a vote of confidence in the government. No such motion was made. According to British parliamentary procedure, when a motion made by any member of the government is defeated in the house the government is defeated. I realize that certain passages can be quoted from various parliamentary authorities in support of the government; nevertheless the government was defeated this morning on a vote, and as a consequence there was only one thing for them to do and that was to move a vote of confidence in the government. After being sustained on such a vote of confidence it would be the right of the government to move that the house go into committee of supply. That was not done, and I contend that this house is now sitting unconstitutionally, that as the government was defeated on a vote this morning, we are not sitting legally as a parliament.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Ha! Ha!

Mr. HOMUTH: It is all very well for my hon. friend to say "Ha! Ha!" but there are certain parliamentary rules by which we must abide. I am not so sure but that if a vote of confidence in the government had been moved this morning I might have voted to sustain the government for the time being until the Prime Minister comes home so that we could really give him a defeat. But as it is I contend we are sitting unconstitutionally, and therefore this house should disband right now unless the government is prepared to call the Speaker to the chair and move a vote of confidence in the government.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you sit in during the debate this morning?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, and I know more about the rules than you ever did.

The CHAIRMAN: After the vote was taken this morning the Acting Prime Minister moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, paragraph 489:

> When an amendment has been adopted to the motion for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, it may be forthwith moved that the house resolve itself into such committee immediately or on a future day.

That motion was made, that the house go into committee of supply immediately, and the motion was carried with the unanimous vote of the house. Therefore I must rule that the committee is properly constituted.

Mr. HOMUTH: There was no vote at all as to whether the house should go into supply immediately. You said, Mr. Chairman, that the house went into committee by unanimous vote of the house. There was no such vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have heard that the government must resign if it meets an adverse vote in the house. It often happens in every British parliament that a government is defeated on a vote.

Mr. HOMUTH: Tell me of one case where a government was defeated on a vote.

Mr. CROLL: The British government was defeated on its educational bill at the last session.

Mr. HOMUTH: And moved a motion of confidence in itself.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the usual procedure is that there is an understanding between the government and the opposition as to what will be considered a major vote of want of confidence and what will be considered just an adverse vote on a minor matter. I am quite sure there is nothing in the point raised by the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think your decision, Mr. Chairman, is correct. There was a motion moved by the Acting Prime Minister that the Speaker leave the chair, and that was carried unanimously. Therefore I contend that the committee is sitting constitutionally.

Mr. HOMUTH: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, we have often seen questions raised in the house as to the meaning of certain clauses of a bill and heard a minister say: This is what I contend it means. Later the question comes before the courts and a lawyer will say to the court: This is what the minister said the clause meant. The judge will say: I am not concerned with what the minister thought it meant, but with the words of the act itself. I say that under our parliamentary rules the government was defeated this morning, and it should have moved a vote of confidence in itself, and if that was sustained it should then have moved to go into committee of supply.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: You have given your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that we should proceed with the business of the house. We have lost enough time to-day without losing any more.

Mr. HOMUTH: Don't try to get away with it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not trying to get away with anything. I am trying to act like a grown-up member of parliament. I do not know whether the hon. member was here or not this morning, but a motion was made and carried that the house go into committee of supply. It is now in committee of supply, and the chairman has ruled the hon. member's point of order out of order. There has been no appeal from his decision, and I suggest that we now carry on the business of parliament.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just a minute. I am not going to accept any such speech as that from the Acting Prime Minister. He says he is acting like a grown-up man. If he was a grown-up man he would not have done many things that he has done. He would not have refused the hon. member for Lake Centre many of the documents for which he has asked. He would not have refused to enforce the order in council at Hamilton. So do not let him stand up and say that he talks like a grown-up and that we are children. We were grown-up long before he was there.

The CHAIRMAN: I have heard the further representations that have been made, and I am satisfied that my ruling is correct—

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not.

The CHAIRMAN: —and that the committee has been properly constituted and can now proceed with its work.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Justice a question?

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to prolong the debate. I will allow one question.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of what has taken place here, if that was not a vote of confidence why did the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, speaking on behalf of the government, call for a free vote?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that I am required to answer the hon. gentleman. I do not appear to have it here, but my attention was called to a precedent which I have been trying to turn up and which I have not yet put my hand upon, according to which it was determined years ago, in the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that on a motion of that kind the government could, if it chose, make it a motion of confidence, but it could also if it chose allow a free expression of the opinions of hon. members on the matter concerned; and that was what was done this morning. There was a declaration by the Minister of Reconstruction that the government was not asking for support on party lines but was asking for an expression of the views of hon. members, and a vote was registered along those lines. Now I think the incident is closed. It was made a condition before the Minister of Reconstruction made that statement that there would be no objection from hon. members to a subsequent motion immediately to go in supply, and it was on the basis of that understanding that the vote was taken, that the vote was registered, and the motion was made. Those who were present acquiesced in the understanding that had been arrived at; the house went into committee of supply and proceeded with its business, and I think it should continue to do so now.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not in my province, of course, to decide whether motions are motions of want of confidence or not, but for the benefit of the committee may I read from Beauchesne, third edition, paragraph 475:

"Of course there are motions which by themselves carry censure, and such motions would necessarily imply want of confidence in the administration. But when the motion presented is such as this motion, affirming a general principle, not particularly calling question any practice or action of the government, it does not carry with it want of confidence, unless, indeed, it is made so by the will of the administration. If the administration cares to do so, it always has the power to declare that a motion moved in amendment to go into committee of supply is a motion of want of confidence; they have the power, and it follows they can take that course."

Now we will go on with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources, vote No. 132.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member for Regina City asked that he might be allowed, because he has to go away, to discuss the question of the trans-Canada highway, and although it does not properly come within this vote, but rather under item 170, I suggest that the hon. gentleman should have that opportunity.

Mr. PROBE: It has been up a couple of times already this session.

Mr. GLEN: It has been, but I promised to give the hon. member this opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. PROBE: I wish to thank the Minister of Mines and Resources for having accorded me the privilege of speaking for a moment or two on this very important subject of the trans-Canada highway, under his departmental estimates. It has been the wish of various hon. members to secure information through questions placed on the order paper with respect to the present status of the highway which ostensibly links the west of Canada to the east, or would do if there were such a thing as a trans-Canada highway, and no department of government has taken a direct responsibility for such a highway, although, to questions I have asked, the Department of Mines and Resources was good enough to prepare a reply.

A few weeks ago in the course of debate the Minister of Agriculture made the statement in this house that it was possible to drive an automobile from eastern Canada to western Canada remaining entirely on Canadian soil. With that bald statement of the possibility of moving a vehicle on purely Canadian soil there can be no disagreement. However, I have traversed some of the miles to which the Minister of Agriculture referred, and the road is definitely not one which we would call a first-class highway.

I want to place on the record at this time certain information which deals with the general subject of discussion, in the form of replies by the Department of Mines and Resources to questions I asked on July 29, 1946, with regard to the trans-Canada highway. The first question I wish to place on the record is this one:

What mileage of trans-Canada highway is now completed and hard-surfaced (a) in Canada, (b) in each of the provinces?

The answer to that question as given by the department was:

No definite standard or specification has been agreed upon or set for a trans-Canada highway, nor has the route of a trans-Canada highway been finally designated. There is a passable road east and west across Canada but it is in various stages of completion as regards grading, gravelling and paving. While a considerable mileage is hard-surfaced much of it is below modern standards and will have to be rebuilt. The following information is the best available and is based on information recently supplied by the provinces.

You will note that the information was supplied to the minister by the provinces. In other words, he had no official knowledge of the statistics. The answer continues:

The mileages shown as incomplete include road that is unpaved, or not graded to standard. It also includes approximately 220 miles of a trans-Canada route through Ontario along lake Superior, which is not yet built. An east and west road through Ontario has, however, been completed, but not all paved, on highways 17 and 11, via North Bay, Cochrane and Nipigon.

In answer to the question, what mileage is now completed and hard-surfaced in Canada, the departmental reply is, 1,997·5 miles. With reference to the mileage in each of the provinces, the following figures were given:

	Miles
Prince Edward Island	52
Nova Scotia	262
New Brunswick	272
Quebec	386
Ontario	427.6
Manitoba	37
Saskatchewan	40
British Columbia	377

In addition, there are 48·2 miles of what might be termed trans-Canada highway in dominion government areas, various national parks along the proposed route.

I should like to place on Hansard, Mr. Chairman, with your approval, a consolidation of the lengthy statement of the Department of Mines and Resources on the state of trans-Canada construction, giving by provinces the total mileage, mileage complete, mileage incomplete, percentage complete, and percentage incomplete.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

It seems to me as a citizen of Canada preposterous that we now call ourselves a middle-class nation when we have as yet no trans-Canada system, or even a recognized route on which the trans-Canada highway system may be some day built. Part of the difficulty, I assume, arises from our unwieldy constitution, if I may use that term, under which the provincial governments have within their prerogative the right to build highways where they please, but the practice has from time to time developed that certain roads are subsidized out of federal government contributions to the provincial governments generally on a fifty-fifty basis. With the growth of the country, it is preposterous that in order to get highway traffic between the eastern section and the west it is necessary for us to go through the Untied States, their national government having seen fit to provide out of the national revenue the funds necessary to make first-class roads.

Various political parties have in the past promised before elections that they would obligate themselves to the construction of a trans-Canada highway system. I do not intend to go over past election promises, but I think it is the almost unanimous wish of the citizens of Canada that we have good highways in these modern times and that the federal government should now take the lead in this very important matter.

I wish to put on the record a resolution which has been forwarded to the dominion government from my own constituency and which sums up the attitude in that part of the country. It is from the Saskatchewan tourist convention held in Regina on May 21 last:

This conference resolves that, regardless of the ultimate outcome of the dominion-provincial conference, an agreement be immediately arranged between Saskatchewan and the federal government for the construction of at least two east-west and at least one north-south hard-surfaced highways in Saskatchewan on the basis of federal responsibility similar to that followed in the United States federal highway system; and further be it resolved that the above programme be commenced this year and completed as speedily as physically possible, not deferring until such time as works of this character are considered necessary as an unemployment measure.

In the course of the discussion this afternoon I am sure reference will be made to the tourist business of Canada. Tourist agencies are set up all across the country for the purpose of attracting visitors to the playgrounds of Canada, which are internationally famous. But unless you fly—and then you must be prepared to take planes equipped with pontoons instead of wheels, so that you land on a lake instead of in a field—you cannot get to the various park centres of the country. The tourist business is recognized as an immensely lucrative one, and it will thrive better, in my opinion, if we make it possible for tourists to bring their families by the means considered modern, namely, the automobile. For tourist reasons as well as for the linking up of east and west in Canada, I suggest that when we prate of Canadian unity we should afford some opportunity for its realization physically through the intermingling of the people. We could reasonably ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to see that his department, or to suggest that some other department, take immediate steps towards implementing a programme for a trans-Canada highway system.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to support very strongly the remarks of the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are considering item 132, and I do not think the remarks in this regard are relevant.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member (Mr. Probe) has to leave this afternoon and he asked me whether an opportunity could be given him to make his statement, having to do with a matter which does not come under this vote. I agreed, so that he might speak now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the subject open for discussion now?

Mr. GLEN: No. An opportunity will come later. I simply made a promise to the member for Regina City. I did not think there would be a general discussion now.

Mr. IRVINE: Would I be in order in bringing to the attention of the minister a protest from the Yukon territory in connection with a matter which comes under the department? I shall be brief. I have discussed it with the minister and therefore I need say little beyond stating the actual problem.

Mr. GLEN: That would come under 151.

Mr. FRASER: On the item now before us, I find in checking over the figures that the department this year has an increase of $4,856,623. The minister is supposed to be Scotch, and the Scotch are supposed to be tight in the spending of money. I think the minister should give reasons for this increase.

Mr. GLEN: This vote is of course reflected in other votes of the department. There have been increases in staff, and there is the cost of living to be considered, the question of salaries, and so on. During the war the department was not functioning in the manner it had done previously. The hon. member will find the details on page 134.

Mr. FRASER: Is this mostly in staff and increases in salaries?

Mr. GLEN: Not only that, but for the development of roads and the expansion of the activities of the department, national parks and various matters of the kind.

Item agreed to.

Mines and Geology branch—

135. Mineral resources investigations, $555,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is an increase as compared with last year and I am pleased to see it. This is one branch in which the department can spend money. Certainly if this country is to advance at all it will be necessary for us to open up every mineral field in Canada we can.

Since this vote calls for the opening up of mineral resources through investigations I should be glad to hear the minister tell us how many parties are going out this year and where they are going to investigate the mineral resources.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the matter which I mentioned last night when the estimates of the Department of Reconstruction were under discussion. There is need of a movement to investigate scarce materials. Last night I said that a survey of the Ground Hog coal fields in northern central British Columbia should be undertaken. We up in that north country would like to have that field properly surveyed so that we may be able to draw on these resources in the future.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Davenport asked a question with respect to the number of parties in the field. I have a long list here, but I think it should be dealt with when we are discussing item 139. Will the hon. member allow his question to stand until we reach that item?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Mines and Geology Branch—

137. To provide for the fabrication, erection and equipping of a hydrogenation plant in the fuel research laboratories—engineering, design, etc., $50,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I notice that there is a reduction of $720,000 in this vote. I look upon this particular service as an important one for the future. I think it is a mistake to reduce the vote by that amount. Will the minister explain the large decrease?

Mr. GLEN: We had that vote before for the building of a hydrogenation plant, but after the war various opinions were obtained with regard to the processes then in vogue, and generally the picture became extremely confused. There was doubt in the mind of the department whether a hydrogenation plant would serve the purpose. We dealt with the matter by appointing a committee headed by Doctor Wallace of Queen's university, Kingston; Doctor Hopkins, vice-president of the Imperial Oil, and J. R. Donald, formerly director general of the chemicals division of the Department of Munitions and Supply. This committee held its sittings in Ottawa. It had evidence before it from experts who knew what the effect of a hydrogenation plant might be. They made a report to me which I hold in my hand, and which may be of interest to the committee. If the committee consents I shall place Doctor Wallace's report on Hansard.

Mr. GILLIS: Is it lengthy?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, about five pages.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be worth reading.

Mr. GLEN: I think it would be better to place it on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Pilot Hydrogenation Plant Committee
Terms of Reference

1. To review the petroleum resources of Canada, the United States and other countries with reference to future supplies for Canadian consumption, especially in the area of the prairie provinces;

2. To review methods and progress in producing synthetic liquid fuels in Germany, Great Britain, the United States and other countries with especial reference to actions of governments to produce or stimulate production of these fuels by research or otherwise, and the reasons for such actions;

3. To obtain information on the nature and extent of raw materials available in Canada for synthetic liquid fuel production and consider whether hydrogenation as presently known is a fully developed and practical process that can be applied to Canadian raw materials without further research and pilot plant tests;

4. To consider whether the production of synthetic liquid fuels in Canada is likely to be of future importance in the dominion's economy or for defence purposes and whether there is need for the dominion government to make the capital and operating expenditures necessary to carry on research and operation of a pilot hydrogenation plant to stimulate production;

5. To report to the dominion government what action, if any, the committee considers the government should take with respect to research on hydrogenation and erection of a pilot hydrogenation plant, taking into account the following questions:

(a) Whether a long period would elapse before it would become necessary to produce synthetic liquid fuels from Canadian coal;

(b) Whether Canadian oil companies can be expected without government research to undertake utilization of heavy refinery residues for production of lighter petroleum products;

(c) Whether the dominion government should stimulate production of motor fuels from Alberta bitumen by carrying on research into hydrogenation and by operation of a pilot hydrogenation plant;

(d) Whether the processes and economies of hydrogenation have been sufficiently determined to be applicable to Canadian raw materials, such as coal, crude petroleum, refinery residues and Alberta bitumen, without it being necessary for the dominion government to assist industry by pilot plant operation;

(e) Whether hydrogenation research is warranted and not too far removed from present-day Canadian problems to warrant dominion government expenditure.

Report of the Committee Appointed to Advise on the Proposal to Construct a Hydrogenation Pilot Plant by the Department of Mines and Resources

The committee, having heard and considered the facts and data which were submitted and which accompany this report, are reporting as follows:

Firstly—referring directly to the terms of reference, the committee have the following comments:

1. There is no world shortage of petroleum nor in supply of crude petroleum from the gulf coast regions of the United States or from South America. There is, however, a possible future shortage from the mid-continental regions of the United States, and conservation policies may limit future exports from the United States.

The crude oil required by eastern Canada and British Columbia, constitutes some 80-85 per cent of the total Canadian requirements, has been imported from the United States and South America. From the data given a larger proportion of the future imports for eastern Canada may come from South America or other countries than the United States, but no shortage of supply is envisaged for some considerable time.

The prairie provinces' requirements are at present largely supplied from Alberta production which is, however, declining. Consequently, new sources of crude oil for the prairie provinces are required.

2. Production of synthetic liquid fuels from coal has been developed further in Germany than in any other country, in large measure due to a policy of national self-sufficiency. Great Britain has also established synthetic liquid fuel production from coal. Both Germany and Great Britain used high pressure hydrogenation technique, although in Germany the Fischer-Tropsch technique was also being used. On the data presented, cost of synthetic liquid fuels from coal in Great Britain and Germany exceeded cost of imported petroleum.

No commercial synthetic liquid fuel plants have been established in the United States, although both government and industry are undertaking large scale research in this field. United States research programmes into synthetic liquid fuels from coal are based on long-range planning rather than on immediate use, and both hydrogenation and the improved Fischer-Tropsch technique are being studied.

Processes for the production of synthetic liquid fuels from natural gas have been developed by industry in the United States, making use of the fluid catalyst technique and an improved Fischer-Tropsch catalyst, to a point where manufacture is claimed to be commercially feasible with low cost natural gas.

3. The raw materials available in Canada are natural gas, natural bitumen from the oil sands of Alberta and coal. Plentiful supplies of coal suitable for hydrogenation are available in the prairie provinces and there are substantial coal reserves in the maritime provinces which are also suitable. The oil sands of Alberta are a large potential supply of bitumen. The natural gas reserves of Alberta and of western Saskatchewan are large and recent developments suggest that they may be sufficiently large to prove an important source of raw material for synthetic liquid fuel for the prairie provinces.

High pressure hydrogenation, as developed in Europe, is not directly applicable to natural gas. A high pressure hydrogenation plant, based on European technique, could probably be designed in Europe for treatment of either bitumen or Canadian coals, although, in either case, large scale tests in Europe would first be desirable. Alternatively, pilot plant tests are required in Canada or the United States.

An improved Fischer-Tropsch process for treatment of natural gas as already stated, has been developed in the United States and pilot plant operations have been established. It can be considered a feasible commercial operation.

4. Production of synthetic liquid fuel in the prairie provinces at reasonable cost will be of importance to the prairie economy and, consequently, to Canadian economy within a comparatively short period unless new oil fields are discovered in the prairie provinces or in the adjoining states to the south.

Synthetic liquid fuel production in eastern Canada and on the Pacific coast appears unlikely to be of importance for some time to come.

5. On the basis of the evidence and data submitted while the committee feel that further research and experimental pilot plant work should proceed in the field of synthetic liquid fuels, they also feel that further study must be undertaken before final plans can be developed which will ensure best results from the proposed expenditure.

Secondly—In addition to answering the terms of reference 1-5 specifically, the summary and conclusions of your committee are as follows:

1. Synthetic liquid fuel research would primarily apply to the needs of the prairie provinces.

2. The supply of crude petroleum products from the prairie provinces will in all probability prove inadequate for the prairie needs, as the reserves in known domestic fields will not meet the increasing demand.

[Mr. Glen.]

3. Sources of raw material for synthetic liquid fuels in the prairie provinces are natural gas, bitumen from the Alberta oil sands and coal. In any research project which may be undertaken, the relative availability and value of these three resources of raw materials must be continuously kept in mind. Further study is needed on this comprehensive level.

4. The synthesis of gas to liquid fuels is being actively investigated at the present time in connection with commercial installations. Costs are lower than for either coal or petroleum. Assuming adequate supplies, natural gas would appear to be the most suitable source of synthetic liquid fuels for the prairie provinces.

5. Recent work in the United States applying to fluid catalyst technique is of such importance that it must receive further study and consideration before any final decision can be reached as to the type of pilot plant which might be installed for experimental work on bitumen or coal.

6. The United States is planning large scale research on synthetic liquid fuels from coal by both direct hydrogenation and by Fischer-Tropsch technique. If close cooperation is maintained with this work, research in Canada might very properly be directed to the utilization of bitumen from the Alberta oil sands.

7. Inasmuch as the evidence submitted indicates that cost of separating the bitumen from the oil sand is at present too high for economic utilization and inasmuch as separation and processing must be dealt with together, further research of the relative value of bitumen as compared with coal as a raw material should be undertaken before a major programme is instituted.

8. The considerations in favour of establishing an experimental pilot plant in the west near the source of raw material and where future commercial operations might be undertaken should be again carefully reviewed before a decision as to location is finally reached. Integration of the pilot plant operations with the existing government synthetic gas ammonia plant at Calgary should also receive the most careful consideration.

9. It is the opinion of your committee that further study must be given to the problem of synthetic liquid fuel research as a whole before final plans are initiated; and that it will take at least six months to obtain the necessary information dealing with raw materials, processes and United States research programmes. In this connection your committee would point out that, even by making use of existing plans, it would probably take about two years to complete designs, let contracts and erect a large scale pilot plant. In the further studies that are, in your committee's opinion, required, the cooperation of industry should be secured in order that duplication of effort may be avoided and the most suitable research plan and pilot plant may be developed.

10. Having in mind the basic importance to Canadians of fuel problems in general and the fact that research work in the field of synthetic liquid fuels is closely related to and common to other fuel problems, your committee recommend the establishment of a fuel research board representative of the Department of Mines and Resources, the national research council, the research council of Alberta, and private industry, which should direct an overall programme of fuel research. Synthetic liquid fuel is one of the more urgent problems to be dealt with.

11. The members of the committee wish to record their warm appreciation of the able presentations by officers of the department and by officials from the United States and from private industry in Canada. The information which they supplied is given in full in the typescript which accompanies this report.

Signed: Robert C. Wallace
March 12, 1946. Oliver B. Hopkins.

It is the intention of the department to implement that recommendation and to make the appointment of a fuel research board for this purpose. In view of the further study that the committee considered should precede the development of plans for a synthetic liquid fuel pilot plant, the laboratory building item previously in the estimates of the Department of Public Works has been dropped for the present. Of the vote of $770,000 which stood in the mines and geology branch estimates for equipping of the plant, a revote of only $50,000 is required in order to maintain and preserve what is already in the hands of the department. This will be used for remodelling the present small scale equipment so that it can be employed for experimental work. I can tell the hon. gentleman that we are very seriously concerned. I did not want to spend $770,000 when it was not confirmed that we would receive any value from it afterwards. In the light of the evidence which was given before the committee and the recommendations they made, we thought we would defer the spending of money until we were sure that we would get the results from it. As I say, we intend to confirm that with the fuel research board and pursue the matter further and develop it the best we can in the light of actual circumstances which we now know since the war.

Mr. GILLIS: I notice that it is a hydrogenation plant.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Has the department given any consideration to the method of processing fuel known as low temperature carbonization?

Mr. GLEN: Yes; I am informed that studies of that have been made.

Mr. GILLIS: The department is not concentrating completely on the hydrogenation process?

Mr. GLEN: It will be found from the discussion before the committee to which I referred that all phases of fuel problems were discussed. We are not directing our activities solely to the one process of hydrogenation. We shall get the best we can before spending money, in order that we shall have something worth while in the end.

Mr. GILLIS: Personally I am in favour of the low temperature process. I am not going to go into that at any length at the moment, but I believe Canadian fuels are adaptable to the low temperature carbonization process. It is workable. One can get a practical demonstration of it in Burlington, Ontario. A man by the name of Caunt has a pilot plant there. He has been in Ottawa for many years trying to sell the idea. Personally I am sold on it. I have read considerably on it. Germany had a method of processing fuels, and it is used to a great extent in the old country. If we are to be successful in fuel research, low temperature carbonization is the method which should be applied to Canadian fuels. When the board is set up I hope the minister will see to it that due consideration is given to the low temperature process.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I am one who was partly responsible for the first vote for a hydrogenation vote being placed in the estimates. At that time the question was the probable advantage of having a hydrogenation plant to extract the oil from the tar sands of northern Alberta, and also to apply the same process to Nova Scotia coal to extract oil therefrom. The war was on at the time, and hon. members will remember that there was very little oil in the country. A number of people believe that the hydrogenation method used in Germany which gave perfect satisfaction could be used in this country. I remember saying on one or two occasions that when the war ended—

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member is referring to the Fischer-Tropsch process.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. I remember saying on one or two occasions that we should make an effort to obtain from Germany one of their hydrogenation plants, because they were producing 300 million barrels of oil a year out of coal. If they could do it, we can do it. Has the minister any information as to the probability of Canada obtaining one of the German hydrogenation plants as part of our portion of what we should get out of the war?

Mr. GLEN: Doctor Warren of the department was sent to Germany and he made a study of these matters and brought it before the committee of which I have already spoken. It was one of the subjects of discussion. In the light of that discussion and of other evidence that was given, we thought it best that research should be made not only in connection with that process but in connection with all forms of synthetic fuel processes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did Doctor Warren and the party he was associated with investigate hydrogenation processes in the United States?

Mr. GLEN: Yes, in the United States as well.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How long will it be before a report can be expected from this committee in order that we may hope to have some action in Canada?

Mr. GLEN: The committee is just in the course of being set up, and I could not state any length of time in which we could expect to have a report. It is a very involved matter and expert knowledge is required. We want to be sure that what we are doing is the correct and proper thing to do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to express approbation of the minister's action in setting up this committee. May I urge that a good deal of expedition be shown so that we shall not be too long in getting at this matter. I believe this is of great importance in connection with our national existence. We must try to work out some means of processing coal and getting fuel into Ontario and Quebec. I should like to see action taken as speedily as possible.

Item agreed to.

Mines and Geology branch—
139. Geological surveys, $500,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: How many geological surveying parties are out, and just where are they working?

Mr. GLEN: I have a long statement here which I could put on Hansard if it would satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON: It would.

Mr. GLEN: This gives the names of the provinces and the territories, the particular area, district and the name of the officer in charge.

Mr. ADAMSON: That would suit the case. I think this matter should be made public, and that is the best way of doing it.

Mr. GLEN: The statement follows:

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister care to make a brief statement as to the result of the geological investigation east of the Yellowknife toward Artillery lake?

Mr. GLEN: I have no information with regard to the district east of the Yellowknife, but there are many prospectors going into the Yellowknife now, and indications are that the area toward the east is a fertile field for further investigation and development. We have not dealt as yet with the area to the east of Yellowknife, because we have been concentrating mostly on the Yellowknife area itself. I think there is a party in there now.

Mr. MacNICOL: As far as Artillery lake?

Mr. GLEN: I do not know the place where it is, but I do know it is east of the Yellowknife and toward the district my hon. friend has in mind. We have no data at the moment on which to arrive at any conclusions as to what may be the possibilities of that particular territory, and I presume we will not have for some time to come. As I say, there are many prospectors in there drilling and doing other work and they feel that this is a large favourable field for mineral deposits.

141. Drafting and map reproduction, $150,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am in favour of the increase in this vote. This branch of the department is one that we all can be proud of, and I suggest that hon. members visit this branch. If they do they will see map-reproducing instruments, as good as any in the world, which have been made by young Canadians in that branch. They are doing a wonderful job, and I made up my mind that at the first opportunity I would compliment the department upon having the staff it has in the drafting and map reproduction branch.

142. National Museum of Canada, $72,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like to direct the attention of the government to a museum which I think is unique in the history of museums in this country. It was started by a group of local people in Battleford in an effort to preserve an old Northwest Mounted Police barracks originally built in 1876 and used until about 1926 by the Northwest Mounted Police. Since then they have not been in use and had started to decay. A group of patriotic citizens who were interested in preserving historic sites in Saskatchewan and through the west got together and decided that they would rebuild this old fort and make it a memorial and museum. This group is composed of citizens from all walks of life and it is non-political in character. The members are interested in saving relics of the early days of western Canada. I should like to give the names of some of these prominent men. Under administration there is the honorary president, Honourable J. L. Phelps; president, A. D. Connon; vice-president, Frank Swon, and secretary-treasurer, Campbell Innes. I might say that Mr. Innes is a school inspector and is one of the leading spirits in this idea. The members are divided up into a number of committees which look after the direction of this project. In the buildings and palisade committee are H. C. Adams, Battleford; Paul Prince, Battleford and Chas. Tubb, North Battleford. Another committee looks after the grounds, which comprise about forty acres situated on a plateau in the form of a "V". It overlooks a large part of the country. Judge Bence, of Battleford, is in charge of the grounds. They intend to make those grounds an attraction for the public. Recreation is under Doctor J. T. Cairns, of North Battleford. At the head of the painting and films division is Mr. R. Lindemere of North Battleford. He is a painter, and makes a specialty of painting Indian scenes. In charge of education and policy is Judge R. B. Mills of North Battleford. In charge of the library is Canon H. E. Hives, Battleford; and Miss P. M. Wesson is in charge of western drama. These names give some idea of the type of people who are supporting this plan. Some of those buildings have been torn down and used to fit up some of the other buildings. The palisade which was built around the original fort is to be rebuilt, using the old fashioned gates to match the palisade which was there in those early days.

To give some idea of their aims I shall read part of a letter which they have been sending out.

In the year 1876 the Battleford mounted police post was established by Colonel James Walker and linked up with such posts as MacLeod, Ft. Walsh, Calgary, Edmonton, Carlton and Swan river. This force served the north-west council 1878-1881 at Battleford. It served the Department of Indian Affairs. From this point its force went forth to battle at Duck lake, Carlton, Cutknife, Fort Pitt and Frenchman's Butte. Later, during the settlement days, it became a stabilizing and encouraging factor in our civilization. This locality is the home of the Cree Indian. In the early days it successfully held back the Blackfoot. There are also tribes at Saulteaux, Assiniboine and Sioux, with their long history and cultural development. The Indian agency office is still located here. The little red brick building which, served as an office is still standing on the north west council hill. Such early explorers as McGillivray, Pink, Cocking, Frobisher, Pond, Henry, Pangman, Umfreville, Thompson and Harmon passed up the North Saskatchewan and crossed to the Beaver river and Isle à la Crosse to Churchill. Their fur post sites are still to be seen. It has been a pleasure to search for these and have professor A. S. Morton come up from Saskatoon and check them over. These posts should be rebuilt or remarked, and the thrilling story of early fur days retold: Manchester House, Pine Island Post, Eagle Hills Post, Turtle Post, Buckingham House. The rich fur and pemmican trade of the Hudson's Bay and North-West Company was centred in this part of the Saskatchewan river and at Green lake, Isle à la Crosse, Prince Albert and Edmonton. As our young citizens grew up in the midst of this rich romantic and sacrificial story they too caught the spirit of enterprise. Such localities gave their best youth to the first and second world wars when the call came.

Peace has come again to our beloved Canada. A new youth is re-examining our national life. It asks, "How can harmony, brotherhood and culture be advanced and what shall we save in a new civilization?" Shall we study the social and economic factors of our localities in such a way to engender love for nobler purposes and make the land blossom and sing? It is a land with a tradition and a promise. What shall be done with these historic spots? Once more we have asked the government to help. The Saskatchewan government consented to renovate the famous mounted police barracks. This cluster of some dozen buildings has been standing idle since 1923. The superintendent's house, the inspector's house, the gaol, the hospital, stable and mess room are to be saved.

It was originally intended to take down the mess room. But they have been receiving so many relics and so many things they would like to save that it has now been decided to try to save this building so that it may be used as a museum. My purpose in rising this afternoon is to ask the government to make a small grant toward having a museum in that building. The letter continues:

The renovation work commenced in August 1945. Two of the main buildings are ready for use. Our citizens suggested a mounted police memorial and Indian museum. The government accepted this plan provided citizens would furnish and equip this memorial and museum. The challenge was accepted. Men and women of training and ability offered to help, plan, equip and interest their fellow citizens. Our plans are well advanced. Our letterhead shows the divisions and the names of chiefs. It is being added to continually. Citizens are being asked to furnish the necessary funds. This endowment fund will be used to furnish and operate this memorial and museum.

I could go on to tell more about the project, but I do not wish to take up too much time. I hope that the government will take an interest in this museum, because as I said at the outset, it is unique; there is nothing to match it in Canada. It would be a shame if these old historic forts were allowed to go to rack and ruin and finally disappear. If we can save them and make use of them in a cultural and educational way I am sure it will be worth while. If the minister will see that there is something placed in the estimates, only one or two thousand dollars to help finish the project, it will be deeply appreciated by the people in that district.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member has already spoken to me about this. I shall place this matter before the historic sites committee, because it would come under their control.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would ask the minister and his officials to consider whether the time has not arrived when we should have a large national museum here in Ottawa. Many precious materials found throughout the country, which can be traced to pioneer days, are now being lost. Large quantities of new materials, on the other hand, are being discovered. A national museum in Ottawa would house those priceless relics. Only to-day I was talking to a former employee of the government about communications instruments. They comprise only one group. There are multitudes of other types of materials; and we should have all these early Canadian relics of one kind or another displayed in the national capital.

As we get along further I should like to see a building of that kind, and plans could be organized now. One such building is to be seen in Washington. There they have a national museum to display the vast relic treasures of their country. In Canada much of this is being lost because of the lack of an appropriate place in which to put it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The department should receive commendation for its aerial photography. That branch is doing a marvellous work. I met departmental photographers in the far north, and I have reason to know that they are doing wonderful work. The maps which trace out what they have seen from the air are to be seen in the old map building on Dalhousie street. It is apparent to the department and to the country what these men have done from the time they began to take aerial pictures.

540. Maintenance of plant of Abasand Oils Limited, $50,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister going to make a statement on this item?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. gentleman has spoken to me about this project, in which he has been very much interested for many years. The hon. member for Athabaska is also much interested. I reviewed the project last year. The government undertook as a war emergency project to finance rehabilitation of the plant of Abasand Oils Limited, near Fort McMurray, Alberta, and to carry out pilot plant operations on the mining and treatment of bituminous sands. Test runs of the renovated separation plant commenced in June, 1944, and a considerable amount of information was gained regarding the process which the Abasand Company had used prior to the agreement with the government, namely, the McClave hot-water process of separating bitumen from the sands. Early in 1945 a new method of recovering the bitumen was being developed and appeared to have definite advantages, as separation was performed at room temperature with a very considerable economy in heat consumption. Equipment installed for this new process was about to be brought into operation when the separation plant, workshops and warehouse were destroyed by fire on June 16, 1945.

In my review of the project I pointed out that although the cost data obtained could not be regarded as conclusive the approximate estimates indicated that commercial utilization of the sands depended not only on securing much lower costs of mining and treating the sands, but upon processing the extracted bitumen so as to produce a large proportion of the high-priced petroleum products. A large scale refinery, of the order of 10,000 barrels a day capacity and employing either a catalytic cracking or hydrogenation process, was seen as necessary for low cost operation.

The government entered upon the project under the stress of a wartime emergency requiring every effort to be put forward to obtain oil supplies. Abasand Oils Limited transfererd its properties, mining rights and process rights to the government for the sum of $1 under the agreement, which is to terminate 180 days after the date of proclamation by the government that the state of war has ceased. The deferred settlement provisions of the agreement give the government the right to pay Abasand Oils Limited for its properties, mining rights and processes as existing when the agreement was entered into. If the government does not wish to exercise its option the company has the right to reassume the titles to its properties and mining rights and processes, and to assume ownership of the government's investment in plant, by making suitable settlement with the government for its expenditure. If neither party desires to exercise its option, the agreement contains provision for disposing of the plant and rights and for apportionment of the proceeds as the respective interests may appear.

The government did not purchase the ownership or stock of Abasand Oils Limited. Under the agreement the company placed its titles in the hands of the government and it entered into the position of being an agent or contractor in expending government moneys, through its board of directors, on improving the plant and operating it to develop tar sands treatment processes. The company is still a private corporation fully entitled, if the government does not wish to pay for its assets, to recover its business.

Good reason would not seem to exist for the dominion government remaining in an oil enterprise in peace time. The government, therefore, has not proceeded with financing the rebuilding of the separation plant destroyed in the fire, although the board of directors have desired to rebuild and install the new separation process for operations at an approximate capacity of 600 tons of sand per day. The proposal submitted by the board was that the government should provide $700,000 for rebuilding and operation of the plant for one year and that moneys recovered from fire insurance should be applied towards this proposed expenditure. The board maintained that it was necessary to have operations extend over a period of one year in all types of weather in order to demonstrate that a successful separation process has been achieved and that without such a demonstration by the pilot plant the investment by private enterprise of many millions of dollars for establishment of a large-scale refinery could not be expected. The board also expressed the view that abandonment of the project by the government would not only delay development of the tar sands resource but would destroy any hope of salvaging the investment not only of the government but of private enterprise. Abasand Oils has stated that its investment in plant and rights, before the government entered into the agreement, amounted to well over a million dollars.

The position of the Abasand project is that out of allotments of $2,300,000 from war appropriation and war and demobilization appropriations in the fiscal years 1943-44, 1944-45 and 1945-46, expenditures of $1,949,077.52 had been made to March 31, 1946, and revenues of $28,784.99 had been received and deposited in the consolidated revenue fund. The net expenditure to the end of the last fiscal year was, therefore, $1,920,292.53. Since the end of the fiscal year there has been received and deposited in the consolidated revenue fund proceeds of insurance amounting to $374,676.55. After credit of the insurance proceeds the net outlay of government on this project to March 31, 1946, has been $1,545,615.98. By means of this expenditure the government has assisted the company in developing mining methods and in the development of a partly-proven new separation process, and has a substantial investment in a rebuilt refinery, power plant, and office and townsite buildings.

With the close of hostilities the wartime emergency in which the Abasand project had its inception came to an end. Consequently, negotiations are now being carried on with the Abasand board of directors for the return of the company's mining rights and titles on a basis which would give the government a reasonable and equitable eventual settlement for its investment if future operations should prove successful. In these negotiations full cognizance must be taken of the company's contractual rights under the agreement and of its right to a part of the insurance proceeds representing original company property destroyed in the fire.

Pending the conclusion of an equitable arrangement with Abasand Oils Limited the government continues to hold the titles and to be responsible for the properties and rights. Because of the obligation incumbent upon the government until the titles and rights are returned it has been necessary that the estimates contain a provision of $50,000 for maintenance of the plant.

Subsequent to that, drilling took place in the Abasand fields which showed that there was liquid bitumen there which gave hopes that there might be some degree of success in operating these sands, and a request was made of the department that we should not now discontinue drilling operations because there were favourable prospects in several of the holes which had been drilled. If we had stopped operations then and subsequently had attempted to drill the sands again, our staff and equipment by that time might have disappeared. The company therefore proposed and we accepted that, rather than drop the project, we would explore the possibilities of liquid bitumen in these fields, which if it was in sufficient quantities might be a good commercial prospect. Accordingly, in the next item, 541, I am asking for a sum of money for drilling in these sands. If that is successful, and the company seems to be hopeful that it will be, I may say bluntly that we expect that this will be the last operation the government will undertake in these fields.

[Mr. Glen.]

We are drilling now. Some reports though not all, have been received. There is, if not a considerable hope, certainly a degree of hope that they may find there liquid bitumen which, if in sufficient quantities, would probably make this a prosperous commercial field. When that $100,000 which has been asked for is expended the results will be given to the company, and they are hopeful that they can carry on and expend their own money with advantage. They spent about a million dollars on the project before the government entered into it, and they are willing to take the chance of going ahead and operating as a company, and the government will then step out of the picture. I thought the committee ought to be informed of this. The company has been the subject of a good deal of comment and many optimistic opinions have been expressed. I am sure that what has been done by the government in exploring this area will be of benefit; and we feel that, having done this, they can take over. In the meantime we will transfer the titles of the properties to them, and pay to them a portion of the insurance money which we now hold and to which they may be entitled, the money to be paid over when the settlements are being made.

Mr. MacNICOL: Owing to the lateness of the session I shall speak very briefly. I should like to go into the whole story, but not now. When the estimates of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply were before the house I promised to go into the matter, but it is now too late.

The whole business connected with the government operation of the Abasand is a tragedy of the first water. I am happy to hear that the government is going to get out of it, apart from continuing to drill the sands to ascertain if there is oil or rich bitumen there. With that decision I am in hearty agreement; it is related to vote 141. The minister knows that I have been up to that plant on several different occasions. He has said that definite results have been obtained. As far as I know from those on the job there are no worthwhile results; no definite results have been obtained; and this is borne out by one of the minister's last statements in reference to the new plant which was burned down before definite results were obtained after it was brought into operation. That is true. The establishment was burnt down almost on the day it commenced operation. That was the third plant erected up there. It is an evidence of the impossibility of trying to operate any commercial enterprise from three or four thousand miles away—that is, from Ottawa. I am not finding fault with anyone in Ottawa who had to do with it.

Those here did their best, but they could not be up there and in Ottawa at the same time. I for one am very glad to know that the government is getting out of it and will give a private company a chance to take it over and, if they wish to do so, build a new plant; that is what is required.

As the minister has said, the country itself has already put up a net amount of $1,545,000, after deduction of insurance from the gross amount, and that is enough for us to put into it, outside of the drilling of the sands. My recommendation would be, since the government have all the equipment up there and have contractors on the job, that they continue to drill over the area which is now being drilled over to prove the richness of the deposits, near Steep Bank river. The Alberta government took over the former Fitzgerald plant, about forty miles down the river from Fort McMurray. There they have obtained very good results. When I was last in Edmonton I went to the university to see their new process, from which they expected to obtain better results; but the tar sands are not something to be guessed at. I do not for a minute say that no one has a process. If I get away from here in time I intend to visit a gentleman whose name was mentioned, Mr. McClave, who is now engaged in California taking oil out of the tar sands. I am thoroughly conversant with his process, and, contrary to what the minister read, the McClave process is a good one. I have that from men who have been in the tar sand business for many years. But no one can tell the worth of the process on which the government has spent so much money. I am not going into that matter because it is past and gone. As I have said, I am so pleased to hear the minister say that the government are getting out of it, but that they are going to continue drilling down the Athabaska river near Steep Bank river, which is a small river that flows in on the right bank of the Athabaska river, that I shall refrain from pursuing any further this Abasand business at present and am prepared as far as I am concerned to let these items go through.

545. Investigations of radio-active ores, $60,000.

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the procedure if a prospector in the normal course of prospecting discovers a deposit of radio-active material? There are, Mr. Chairman, a number of materials outside the uranium group with radio-active properties. Thorium is one; there are many others. What does the government do? Does the government take steps to find these deposits, and what does it do when a radio-active deposit is indicated? I ask this because I feel that we are not doing enough for the discovery and development of radio-active deposits. I should like to know and I think the country would like to know the policy and the machinery which the government has set up.

Mr. GLEN: The matter to which the hon. gentleman refers is under the control of a committee, I am informed, which deals with it under statutory authority. He will know generally, as I do, the provision under which uranium discovered within Canada belongs to and is under the control of that committee; no one can deal with the material except under the control, I would imagine, of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. ADAMSON: My question really is this. A deposit of radio-active material is discovered: what happens? Does the government step in and say, "We will buy this from you"? "We will prohibit you from developing it"? Or, "We will develop it ourselves"? Or does it say, "We will allow you to develop it and will control the end product"?

Mr. GLEN: I am informed that the regulations relating to the question asked by the hon. gentleman have not yet been completed, that they are still being considered under the atomic energy board. Until they arrive at a decision I cannot give any information.

546. Investigations in mineral economics, $30,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the purpose of these investigations in mineral economics, and what has been achieved by them in the past? Why is it considered worth while to spend money on them? It is not easy for an ordinary member to get a comprehension of what is involved.

Mr. GLEN: I might give a brief explanation of the vote. The chaotic conditions in which the world finds itself at the close of world war II necessitate continuous investigation of the economic effect these conditions are likely to have on Canada's mining, metallurgical and allied chemical industries.

In the immediate post-war period and for some time afterward, many problems will confront these industries; those that will be paramount will be economic, not technological. Consequently many studies must be made in anticipation of problems that bear upon home and foreign markets for Canadian products, Canada's mineral position relative to that of other countries, Canada's mineral reserves and mineral deficiencies, operating costs, cartels, competitive products, subsidies, new uses for minerals and mineral products, et cetera. More valuable assistance could, too, with this increase in activities, be given to the departments of Finance and National Revenue in problems of the character concerning which they ordinarily solicit the help of the mines and geology branch.

Because the existing staff of the division of economics could satisfactorily handle only a relatively small percentage of the problems enumerated above, the cabinet committee on reconstruction, on the recommendation of the Minister of Reconstruction, approved on May 18, 1945, a commencement of this work, and on July 23, 1945, treasury board approved a temporary establishment of eight positions. Four of these positions have been filled, and the remainder will be filled as quickly as suitable appointees become available.

922. To provide for investigations of petroliferous deposits and potential petroliferous areas in Canada—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. GLEN: This is the $100,000 that is now being used in the drilling of the tar sands in addition to the $50,000 in the main estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister sure that the $150,000 can be used, or has it been already spent?

Mr. GLEN: I am not anxious to have it spent unless it is absolutely necessary. If the results from drilling are such as to justify the company taking over and the government dropping out, we will stop and save as much money as we can. But we will drill as much of the property as is necessary.

Mr. MacNICOL: The information I had from a gentleman in the department in whom I have every confidence is that in a number of these drillings down the Athabaska river in the vicinity of Steep Bank river have been found rich deposits of almost pure bitumen.

Mr. GLEN: That is the area they are trying to prove.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is apparently a reservoir of oil or bitumen. If that is so it is worth while.

Lands, Parks and Forest branch—
143. Branch administration, $25,150.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There are a number of questions I want to ask under this head, and perhaps I might start with the parks. What measures are being taken to prevent and control fires in the national parks? I have a newspaper clipping which came to me recently from the Dauphin Herald in which it is stated that from 1935 to 1944 over $780,000 in value was lost by fires in the national parks. There were 653 fires which burned out 432,574 acres, destroying 84,000 board feet of lumber and 495,000 cords of wood. Reference is made also to loss of animal and bird life.

Mr. GLEN: That will come more appropriately under 158.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I will wait until we reach that item then. The next question has to do with timber limits in the national parks. Some are listed as timber licences and some as timber permits. I have been looking through the regulations and perhaps the minister can tell us in a general way what is the chief difference between the licence and the permit in the matter of timber limits.

Mr. GLEN: The licence is issued for a berth; permits are issued for the individual. I think that is the distinction between a licence and a permit.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In other words, a licensee is a person or a company who applies for a berth?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is a licensee and a permit holder treated in the same way in the matter of sale of their products? The licensee may sell the products of his mill to retail merchants in a wholesale way, or may retail it to his customers. Is a permit holder permitted to sell his lumber in the same way, or is there any restriction on the way in which he must dispose of his lumber?

Mr. GLEN: The licensee can sell his products in the retail and wholesale trade, as the hon. gentleman has decribed, but not the permit holder. He cannot sell; it is for himself only.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What is the maximum size of a timber berth which a licensee can hold and what is the size which a permit holder can hold?

Mr. GLEN: No timber berth licences are now being given in any of the national parks; that is a thing of the past, the policy which was in effect when the park was created, and we do not propose to continue it. The timber in the parks is subject to the regulations of the parks and is dealt with from the parks point of view, not from the point of view of any licensee.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Under present conditions there are still a number of limits which are held by licensees within the parks?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is there any limit on the maximum size of the berth which has been obtained? Is it limited to a certain number of square miles or not?

Mr. GLEN: There is no limit. These were licences that were given many years ago.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I understand that. Are the regulations, a copy of which I received from the minister's department, which were reprinted in July, 1929, still in force in connection with licensees and permit holders?

Mr. GLEN: There has been no change made in the timber berth licences. Some regulations have been made with regard to the conduct of the individual working the berth.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does that mean that the fees which are charged licensees and permit holders are the same now as are indicated in the regulations of 1929?

Mr. GLEN: Is my hon. friend asking about the rate of dues?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: No change in the rate of dues on timber berths.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Do the same rates apply to timber berths within Indian reserves, or do they come under a different set of regulations?

Mr. GLEN: A different management and a different set of regulations.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: In connection with fees and berths, I took the matter up last year—perhaps the minister will remember it—as it applied to Riding Mountain national park, in which we have a common interest since it is situated in the minister's constituency and right next to mine. At that time I drew attention to the timber berth owned by the Northern Trust Company, and attempted to find out more about it, but we were not able to come to much of a conclusion. Since that time I have been asking for a number of returns, as the minister may know, and I have gathered some information. There are a number of things which I should like to understand at this time. First of all in my opinion the fees which have been charged have not been very provident from the point of view of the treasury. The fees for lumber have been $1 a thousand. I realize that the company has been holding this limit for a long time. It is no longer the policy of the government to sell berths in that way. From the returns I have received I have worked out a simple calculation which shows that since 1889, which appears to be the first date on which this timber limit was held, the company has taken out 13,562,000 feet of lumber, exclusive of other timber products. According to the regulations they pay $1 a thousand which would amount to $13,562—I am leaving the other things aside for a moment, because the fees differ. In another return which I asked for last year it was indicated that a Mr. DeWitt of Sandy Lake took a permit in 1941-42 for 1,253,482 feet of lumber for which he paid $4.75 a thousand. I realize that there is some difference between a permit holder and a licensee in the other fees they have to pay, royalties and so on. But in the matter of lumber alone the difference of price between $1 and $4.75 is substantial. I have worked out some rough figures which show that had the trust company had to pay the same amount as this private individual had to pay in 1941-42, over that period of time they would have paid $64,419 instead of $13,562, which leaves a potential loss to the government of over $50,000. Some of that will be recovered in ground rents, royalties, and so on, but the net loss will still be a great deal of money. I cannot see the justification for allowing these timber limits to continue, with the price of lumber what it is to-day, regardless of what the policy used to be.

Here is a company which evidently has something of a monopoly in that park, and which is able to get its lumber at $1 a thousand, while other people who come in and bid for lumber, if they are successful in getting a permit, will have to pay up to $4.75 to get the same kind of lumber. While I am on this subject I should like to say that I took a little time to investigate this limit. I think my figures are correct, because I received them from the foreman of the saw mill. I believe the minister is familiar with the mill about which I am speaking. In December of last year the price of rough lumber at the mill ranged from $41 to $49 wholesale. That was the price if you took it away; if it was delivered there would be an additional charge. This is the same lumber which they were obtaining for $1 a thousand.

In addition I found that farmers who obtained a permit to cut logs in that limit were obliged to bring their logs to that saw mill, since it was the only one operating in there—as I say, it was a monopoly—and they were practically forced—because there was no other arrangement that I could learn about—to accept half the lumber cut from the logs which they brought to the mill. In other words, if logs were cut which would yield 2,000 feet of lumber, you would get only 1,000; the saw mill would get the other 1,000 as their part of the bargain. When lumber was selling at the mill at as high as $49 a thousand, that was a substantial amount to take from the farmer in return for the sawing of his product.

I also found that the farmer did not have much choice in the quality of lumber which he got, because at the time he brought his logs in to the saw mill there was no good lumber to take. There was no sawing going on at the time. They just piled up his logs, and he had the choice of either getting his lumber from the pile or waiting or coming back at the time of the sawing season. In many cases farmers living twenty-five, thirty or even fifty miles away from a mill will take their half by going to the lumber pile and taking what is there. I inspected a pile like that and, although I am no lumber expert, I could see that it was practically all culls; there was no quality lumber at all. The result was that the farmers got culls in return for their logs. I do not think that is a good arrangement. I do not know how much power the minister's department has over a thing like that, but something should be done in order to see that the farmer can either take his logs to the saw mill of his choice where he can get better terms or get a greater share of the lumber for the work he does in cutting the logs.

Another matter to which I should like to refer is the great difference in the treatment given permittees as compared with that given to licensees. It was pointed out a few minutes ago that the licensee was not limited in the size of the berth he could get, while, according to the regulations, the permittee is limited to one square mile. From the regulations I have prepared some figures which show what the permittee has to pay.

Mr. GLEN: Is the permittee not limited to a certain quantity?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I asked the minister whether these regulations were still in force, because these figures are based upon the regulation. It states here definitely that the permittee may get a limit to one square mile. If there has been a change made in the regulations I should be glad to know it. At page 19 of the regulations we find this:

> Permits to owners of sawmills to cut lumber, shingles, lath and other manufactured products over definitely described tract of contiguous lands not exceeding one square mile in extent . . .

Mr. GLEN: Is the hon. member not referring to licences for berths already granted?

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This comes under the heading of timber permits, so that it is definitely related to permits.

Mr. GLEN: I believe those are dated 1929.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: They do not apply to cutting in the parks except in the case of licences for timber berths that have been granted.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As I understand it, these regulations apply to the whole area, because they start off by saying:

> Regulations governing the granting of yearly licences and permits to cut timber on dominion lands.

It does not specify the parks of Canada; it specifies dominion lands. In other words, the regulations apply regardless of where the lands happen to be.

To come back to what I was going to say, I made a comparison of the fees paid by a permittee and those paid by a licensee, and these figures were taken from the regulations. These are:

Prices	Licensee	Permittee
Poplar lumber	$ 50 per M	$1 50
Other lumber	1 00 per M	3 00
Lath	30 per M	50
Hewn railway ties No. 1 and 2	06 each	10 each
Hewn railway ties No. 3 and cull	03 each	06 each
Sawn railway ties No. 1 and 2	05 each	09 each
Sawn railway ties No. 3 and cull	2½ each	05 each
Fence posts—round 7 ft. 6 in. top	01 each	02 each
Poles—all lengths, 8 in. top	02 a foot	03 foot
Cordwood — green poplar	25 a cord	50 cord
Cordwood—other	40 a cord	75 cord
Pulpwood	60 a cord	1 00 cord
Ground rent	10 00 sq m	100 00 sq m

When I look at regulations like this I wonder whether we really have free enterprise. I see no reason why a person, simply because he may have been of the right political shade some years ago, should be given a favourable contract of this kind so that to-day he is able to get these things at these favourable rates. There is no possibility of a man with a small sawmill being able to compete, if we want to put it that way, with someone who is in a monopolistic and favourable position. I cannot see any justification for this and, if the minister can explain it, I shall be glad to hear his explanation.

Last year I asked the minister why changes had not been made in the rates, why it was that licensees of these berths were continued in this favoured position. He replied, as reported at page 3360 of Hansard for that year.

We cannot interfere with what is already a contract with those who purchased these limits prior to the establishment of the park.

And on the same page:

That is so; we cannot alter the contract.

I am not sure that the minister is correct, and I turn to page 9 of the regulations where we find that the licensee is entitled to a renewal of his licence from year to year. Then there follows this proviso:

Provided that such renewal shall be subject to the payment of such rental and dues and to such terms and conditions as are fixed by the regulations in force at the time renewal is made.

If we go through the rest of the regulations we find that the minister has the power to make regulations, which I think is proof that the minister may set the fees from year to year according to what he thinks is proper. I think that has been the case in connection with timber limits or permits on Indian reserves. In those cases the fees are substantially higher than those charged licensees under these regulations. I believe it is quite definite that the minister has the right to set the fees from year to year.

The only argument which I think the minister can use is that a contract was entered into at the time the timber berth was sold some years ago and that he is not disposed now to change the terms of that contract. I do not think that is a good argument, because times have changed. The prices that prevailed when this company took over the timber berths in 1889 and 1898 are different from the prices that prevail to-day. Retail prices of lumber, shingles, lath and all these things have gone up tremendously, and there is no reason why the minister should not change the regulations to bring these prices up to compare with the present scale of prices.

I believe the treasury of the country is losing a substantial amount of money each year because of the favourable contracts held by these companies. I do not want to go into the matter of Indian reserves at the present time because it comes under a different vote. But I would point out that over the last five years 100 million feet of lumber have been taken out of the Indian reserves alone. I have here several returns showing the number of feet of lumber and other products taken from dominion crown lands. A simple calculation shows that we are losing thousands of dollars, perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars each year because the scale of fees is still in many cases what it was at the time the companies were formed, or at the time the individuals got their timber berths; and they are not comparable with prices people now pay for lumber and other timber products.

I do not know what justification there can be for a company like the Northern Trust Company owning timber in a national park and getting the lumber at a price which is about one-quarter the price being charged people who live around the park area. I suggest that attitude cannot be defended, and I hope the minister will give a satisfactory explanation of this situation.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member is deeply interested in Riding Mountain national park, as I am. I am anxious that everything in it will be as he would want it. The original licence was issued in 1890 to George H. Bradbury, comprising an area of fifty-four square miles. On March 5, 1892, eighteen square miles were assigned to Charles Geikie. This area remained under berth No. 551D. In 1942 there were 3·37 square miles cut over and withdrawn. In 1944 there were ·46 square miles withdrawn. The present area is 14·17 square miles. My information is that the Northern Trust Company acquired this berth on December 23, 1926, from the United Assets Company of Winnipeg.

The other berth, namely berth 571, is one concerning which the original licence was issued to James Shaw in 1890. The area was thirty-four square miles. The withdrawals are as follows: In 1902, there were ·39 square miles withdrawn; in 1904, there were 28·86 square miles assigned to T. A. Burrows. This reduced the area to 4·75 square miles which, on re-survey, was found to contain 4·93 square miles. The withdrawal figure for 1942 is 1·118 square miles, and for 1944 it is ·195 square miles, giving a present area of 3·617 square miles. The Northern Trust Company acquired the berth on December 23, 1926, from the United Assets Company.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There seems to be some confusion as to the date. In one of the returns I have the date for berth 551D given as December 31, 1889, under the name of the Northern Trust Company, and for berth 571, it is December 31, 1898. In another return I have November 10, 1926, for the same company; and in a third return it is December 23, 1926. Can we establish the exact date?

Mr. GLEN: These are the dates I have. I understand that the Northern Trust Company were acting for an estate.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Starting on what date?

Mr. GLEN: In December, 1926. The progress of timber cutting on both berths shows that from 1890 to 1897 practically no timber was cut. From 1898 to 1903 a small amount of timber was cut. From 1904 to 1905 a larger amount of timber was cut, the amount decreasing to 1908. From 1909 to 1936 no timber was cut. From 1937, to date, a mill has been erected and timber cutting carried out each year according to the regulations.

The dues charged were $1 per 1,000 feet; $10 per square mile ground rent and $2 annual licence fee, plus half the cost of fire protection. The licensee must dispose of all tops, branches and other debris resulting from timber operations.

The question has been asked as to why the timber dues were not raised to the same level as those charged by the province outside the park and by the dominion for timber permits under the park regulations.

In regard to the rates charged on timber berths, I would point out that these berths were not operated for many years prior to 1936. From 1936 until the war years the operator of these berths was carrying on under depression conditions, at which time he was required to sell his lumber at cheap prices. This was a definite benefit to the community, and it was felt at this time that we could not justify raising the rates. The dues on timber cut under park regulations were raised on November 2, 1940, to what the province was charging outside the park. The chief reason for this increase in dues was to discourage applications for timber permits in the park and to force all those who could secure their timber under more favourable conditions from provincial sources to do so. There is only a limited amount of timber which can be made available each year in the park.

In regard to the operations on the two licensed timber berths, the value of timber has changed greatly during the war years, but any time the wartime prices and trade board were consulted in regard to raising rates we were advised that it was not in accordance with government policy to raise such rates. Such a policy is still in force, and therefore in the meantime there is nothing which can be done in this connection. However, I think that as soon as the wartime restrictions are lifted the department proposes to (a) raise the rates on these licensed berths to what the province is charging; and (b) see that definite steps are taken in accordance with the licence to have the commercial timber cut and the cut-over areas withdrawn each year as the area is cut over.

The hon. member did not make any suggestion as to what policy the government should take other than that of raising the rates within the park. Of course he will realize that they have obligations in connection with fire protection, and the men who are required to look after the berth operations. This would make an increased cost which other persons would not have. However, the hon. member has not made any suggestion as to what we could do. What the hon. member is referring to as park regulations are really the regulations which were in effect before the park was formed. The permit holders who are cutting lumber are under park regulations, and there is that distinction. I should be glad to have from the hon. member his idea as to what I should do to protect that park, because I am just as concerned as he is that no one shall get more out of it than he is entitled to. He has not offered any suggestion that I think I could take. I have now stated what my policy will be, if I am in charge. We will raise the rates at the earliest possible date in accordance with provincial rates, and take care that the cut-over areas are immediately withdrawn and placed within the purview of the park itself.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have no particular quarrel with the minister's intentions. However, he has referred to the obligations this company has in connection with fire protection. I have here a return dated June 11, 1946, which shows the amount of money the company paid as its share of fire protection. It amounts to $38.12 for inspection of berth 551D and $9.75 for berth 571, which, I maintain, is not very much. Surely it is not an onerous sum to pay for fire protection, amounting in all to about $44.

Mr. GLEN: Of course the company have had to pay for men to look after their own plant, and timber berth operations, and to help take care of any fire in that particular part, over and above the amount spent in the park itself.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I agree that they would have to do that; anyone camping in the park would have to do it. I want also to point out that I am complaining particularly about the difference between the treatment of licensees and of other classes, not particularly in this park alone but as a general policy. I do not see why it should be that because this company got that favoured position—

Mr. GLEN: We are not granting any timber berth licences now.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I realize that. But the minister's attitude is this—he may have some valid ground for it but I have not seen it yet—that this company has a contract and therefore his department cannot do anything about it. Later, he said that as soon as the wartime prices and trade board permitted, his department would raise the fees to this company. I am amazed at that kind of statement from the minister. Surely the fee which this company has paid of $1 per 1,000 feet does not begin to compare with what people generally are paying for lumber at the present time, if they can get it. Surely the wartime prices and trade board would not prevent a department of government from raising the fees to what they considered the proper level. I find it hard to believe that the Department of Finance—

Mr. GLEN: The wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am amazed that the wartime prices and trade board would be so dictatorial as to dictate policy to the Department of Mines in respect of fees. I do not see why the minister did not put his foot down at the very beginning and point out to the rest of the government that here was a situation that should have been rectified long ago, a situation in which the people of this country have had their natural resources sold down the river. I am not blaming the present minister for having made such a contract because I do not think he would do it. I think he is too enlightened and progressive, but I should have felt much happier if the present minister would have seen fit to tell off the wartime prices and trade board, tell them where to go, when they ruled that just because this company was allowed to get its lumber at $1 per 1,000 feet before 1941, that price was a frozen price after 1941. Those are weak premises on which to base an argument, and I am amazed and unhappy to know that our government can allow its own creation, the wartime prices and trade board, to prevent it from rectifying an injustice which has been done for years with respect to our natural resources. I certainly hope that the minister will do something about the matter. He could well point out to the wartime prices and trade board that if they are interested in price stabilization and price control it should be based on a system of justice and not just simply on the freezing of prices as they were.

I cannot see any valid argument for continuing this contract. Suppose the Northern Trust Company had been given a limit of 1,000 square miles at twenty-five cents per 1,000 feet—and such things have happened in this country—would it follow that so long as prices and fees were frozen the people of Canada would continue to lose money on that contract for years and years because the wartime prices and trade board would not permit the government to raise its fees? Perhaps it is because I am a new member, but I am really amazed that such things can be done. I did not think it could happen, and I believe that there is a course which the minister must take.

The minister asked me if I had any suggestions. I would make this suggestion in the first place, that the minister in consultation with his colleagues in the cabinet immediately ask the government to pass an order in council—I understand the government is not averse to orders in council—to make it possible for his department to raise the fees in this particular field comparable with the fees other people have to pay. I would also ask the minister, for purposes of a long-range policy, to study the programme being followed in Saskatchewan with respect to the timber board there. I am not going into an exposé of that because it might lead to an argument. I will simply say that the Saskatchewan government have established a timber board which has been able to bring to the public treasury a substantial proportion of the value of the timber of that province. I think the Minister of Mines and Resources would be well advised to study the operations of that board, and then perhaps, with the benefit of their experience, he may be able to evolve a timber board for this dominion which would work even better than the one in Saskatchewan.

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—
145. Eastern arctic expedition, $75,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister explain what is being done under this item?

Mr. GLEN: This vote provides for expenses connected with the annual eastern arctic patrol; ocean and aerial transportation for government administrative and scientific personnel; freight charges on fuel, food, medicines and other supplies to administrative and medical headquarters, Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachments, radio stations, hospitals and missionary centres; carriage of royal mail; transportation of Eskimo families with household effects, boats, sledges and dogs; radio telegraph tolls and incidentals for an ocean voyage of more than 19,000 miles in three to five months through unorganized territories.

Under authority of order in council P.C. 2472 dated June 18, 1946, an agreement has been entered into with the Hudson's Bay Company whereby government passengers and freight for eastern arctic points will be carried on the Nascopie and auxiliary vessels at the same rates as approved in 1941. The officer in charge is J. G. Wright, of the lands, parks and forests branch, and his assistant is A. Stevenson.

The Nascopie sailed from Montreal on Saturday, July 6, 1946. The vessel is scheduled to reach Churchill, Manitoba, on August 9, and remain until August 17 to bunker and take on additional passengers and freight for the northern part of the voyage. The most northern port of call will be Dundas Harbour on Devon island, scheduled to be reached September 15. The vessel is due back in Montreal on October 8, 1946.

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—
146. Forest and wild life conservation including Wood Buffalo park, $252,500.

Mr. McLURE: With respect to this item and item 149 dealing with roads, is this large amount for the purpose of building roads to the parks, or is it for the parks in general? I brought up this matter last year.

Mr. GLEN: Item 146 deals with the northwest territories, not with roads.

Mr. McLURE: Item 149 deals with roads, and I was wondering whether it was for roads to the national parks.

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. McLURE: What item does that come under?

Mr. GLEN: Roads in the parks come under the parks votes, but not roads to the parks.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Under this item, which has to do with animal and wild life conservation, I should like to bring two points to the minister's attention. Charlotte island has no natural wild life at all. Elk have been put there in recent years, and I am led to understand that they are doing well. Deer have been there for quite a number of years, and they are beginning to lose size and weight, whether through inbreeding or not I do not know. But there are actually no predatory animals on the island, and I am not asking that they be put there, but I suggest, under this item, that the minister take an interest in raising a type of deer with better blood, if I may put it in that way. Also, there is no such thing as a squirrel on these islands, and the people would like an investigation into the possibility of putting squirrel, beaver, and so on, on these islands. I believe they would fit in very well.

While I am on this matter, I should like to mention Atlin and the lakes up there. That area is just beginning to open up, and I am told on good authority that the scenery in that district is equal to, if not better than, any of the mountain resorts in Europe. Wild life there, such as geese, has become almost extinct in recent years, and the citizens would be interested if some conservation work were done. It would be an added attraction to tourists in future years.

Mr. MacNICOL: I note under this vote, although it has considerably increased, that two of the medical officers are apparently not being provided for.

Mr. GLEN: That is under health and welfare estimates.

148. Buildings, $375,700.

Mr. MacNICOL: All these items, numbered 147 to 150 inclusive, go together, do they not, and pertain to the works which are going on in connection with Yellowknife townsite?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The Minister of Public Works referred me to the Department of Mines and Resources on a question I had about the road being built from Whitehorse down to Atlin. Can I ask the question under this item?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. ARCHBALD: What item would that come under?

Mr. GLEN: Vote 771, supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—government of the Yukon Territory—
151. Administration, $100,000.

Mr. IRVINE: I want to bring to the minister's attention a matter which I attempted to bring before the committee on a previous item, and was asked to wait until we reached item 151. I discussed it briefly with the minister before. It is a protest from the people of Dawson city against the action of the controller. I assume the minister is well aware of whatever constitutional rights the controller has and whatever constitutional rights the elected council of Yukon territory have, and will be in a position to deal with the matter without my going into that phase of it. Suffice it to say that the council, which was elected and is constantly elected to look after the local interests of the people, passed certain legislation, particularly legislation which had to do with labour. For instance, there was an ordinance dealing with annual vacations with pay; there was an amendment to the workmen's compensation ordinance; and an amendment to an ordinance respecting the office of public administrator. I can go into the details of the legislation if required; but I am sure the minister is very well acquainted with the details of it, so that unless it is questioned, I shall not trouble the committee with the details. But the point is that these ordinances, having been passed by a unanimous vote of the elected council, were vetoed by the controller. The controller is an appointee of this government and an absentee from the Yukon. He, exercising, I assume, an authority which he must have, has vetoed this legislation. The people who elected that council have, in my opinion, a just right to be disturbed over that arbitrary action on the part of the controller. In the words of their protest they say, "We choose to label such exercise of this power by a non-elected individual as class discrimination and smacking loudly of dictatorship in its most distasteful role." I imagine that His Majesty the King has the power to veto. I believe that His Excellency the Governor General has a limited power of veto. But these gentlemen are always too wise to exercise it except under very extraordinary circumstances. I wonder whether the controller of Yukon territory has any greater veto power than His Majesty the King or His Excellency the Governor General. At any rate I am asking the minister if he will give this matter his consideration, if he will review the case. If there is to be disallowance of legislation of that kind I think it will be far more satisfactory to the people there if the disallowance were effected by a government elected by the people rather than by some individual who is appointed, who perhaps knows little about the local situation, and has no direct responsibility to the people. I hope the minister will look into this matter, and I should be glad if he would make a statement about it now.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member had spoken to me regarding these matters in connection with an ordinance which was passed by the Yukon council, one dealing with workmen's compensation. At present that matter is being discussed with the workmen's compensation officer of the Department of Transport. No decision has yet been arrived at, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that I shall be dealing with it, I think sympathetically.

The other matter which the hon. gentleman is interested in is an ordinance with regard to vacations with pay. There is a good deal of ambiguity in the ordinance as to when the vacation will begin and when the pay will begin. I have sent it to the Department of Justice to deal with that matter, and I think we shall arrange it to the satisfaction even of the hon. gentleman.

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—Dominion forest service—

153. General scientific, economic, and administrative services, $373,890.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is aware, I believe, of the serious effects which the starlings are having on the trees at the east end of these buildings. Similar damage is apparently going on all over the province of Ontario, where trees, particularly in towns and cities, are being destroyed by these birds. Is the department making any effort to curb the menace?

Mr. GLEN: There is a committee on forest pests. The other night I was watching that beautiful tree which is being destroyed and I should like to see something done to preserve it.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the various municipalities they are studying what ought to be done to save the trees.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The starlings must be got rid of. Those around these buildings are particularly bad and I think some concerted effort should be made to get rid of them.

Mr. LOW: Is this item the place where I may ask with respect to a possible arrangement with the province of Alberta in connection with the preservation of the forests on the east slope of the Rockies?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. LOW: What progress is being made in the negotiations between the province and the department?

Mr. GLEN: For several months we have been discussing the question of the east slope of the Rockies, realizing the magnitude of the undertaking; and I had an interview, along with the Minister of Reconstruction, with Premier Manning and Mr. Tanner some time in June. We discussed the whole question, proposals for and against. Mr. Tanner brought forward certain proposals which we discussed and considered, and I wrote to him in July stating the department's point of view and that of the Minister of Reconstruction. Last week I had a telephone call from Mr. Tanner and, since then, I have been in touch with Premier Manning who has made certain proposals looking to a solution of the problem. Yesterday I had a meeting with the Minister of Reconstruction and we are submitting a proposal again to Mr. Manning immediately. I think I can say that we shall arrive at a settlement which will be satisfactory to both of us. In the meantime we shall work out the details together, and I hope we can come to an agreement that will provide for an operation to take care of the east slope of the Rockies in a manner satisfactory both to the dominion and to the provincial governments.

Mr. LOW: I thank the minister for what he has said. I am sure that in his approach to the problem he is aware of the tremendous importance of preserving the watershed, because the future irrigation and reclamation schemes in the west will depend upon such preservation. Again I wish to thank him.

Mr. GLEN: I expect to be in Edmonton within the next eight or ten days and I hope to see both Mr. Manning and Mr. Tanner.

Mr. MENARY: Back home we had two or three acres of beautiful grove at the side of the village, balsam and cedar trees, and today they are dead, having been killed by the starlings. The minister should do something to protect these trees. Shoot the starlings or do something about it.

Mr. GLEN: That is not under my jurisdiction, but I will bring it to the attention of my colleague who has charge of such matters.

Mr. WARREN: We have plenty of grievances as far as starlings are concerned, and I suggest to the hon. member for Wellington North that he import a few falcons. I have on occasion stood outside the parliament buildings and watched the starlings by the thousand, perhaps one might say the million, coming here from all over the country to spend the night.

Mr. MacINNIS: Lobbying.

Mr. WARREN: I happened to come across a most interesting piece of information the other day. The nearest point where falcons can be found is in the vicinity of Montreal and they come up once in a while and take off the heads of about two hundred of the starlings and go back home. If the hon. member could import a few falcons into his neighbourhood he might get rid of the starlings.

Mr. MENARY: I will send them an invitation.

Mr. ADAMSON: Perhaps you could do some falconing on the hill.

Lands, Parks and Forest branch—
154. Forest experiment stations, $252,010.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is being done under this item? I think we have come to the stage in our development in Canada, as far as timber is concerned, where something must be done and done quickly; otherwise we shall lose what has been one of the most valuable economic assets this country has had. There is scarcely a province in Canada that is not almost denuded of forest wealth, which at one time we thought would never be destroyed or be exhausted. How many forest stations are in operation and what work is being done in them?

Mr. GLEN: We are spending very much more now than we did before the war, nearly three times the amount. This vote is for the conduct of research work on five forest experiment stations and outside demonstration areas under the supervision of the stations as follows: Acadia, in New Brunswick, area 35 square miles; Valcartier, in Quebec, area 7¼ square miles, which was closed for the duration owing to the superintendent being on military service; Petawawa, in Ontario, area 97 square miles; Riding Mountain, area 25¼ square miles, within the Riding Mountain national park, Manitoba; Kananaskis, in Alberta, area 63 square miles.

These stations function as field laboratories for conducting silvicultural research and investigations in stands representative of the various forest regions in which they are located and in accordance with policies and plans evolved by the senior technical staff at headquarters.

With the end of the war and the greatly increased interest evident on the part of provinces, industry and the general public in Canada's forest resources, it becomes necessary to revise and expand the activities of the dominion forest service during the post-war period. Most of the labour during the war years was performed by alternative service workers at nominal rates of pay, and normal work had in the main to be drastically curtailed and reduced to a care and maintenance basis. It now becomes necessary not only to resume normal programmes, but to expand these on a basis designed to meet the requirements of a new era being ushered in during the post-war years.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to say a word with respect to the design of the monument which the minister unveiled recently at Campobello, and similar designs. In my opinion that is a much finer design than the ordinary type one sees in these days along the highways, which is made of stone and which comes to a triangular peak. I have a picture of the monument at Orillia to Champlain. It came from the department. It is similar to the monument which was erected at Campobello on Passamaquoddy bay to the memory of the late president Franklin D. Roosevelt, and to the one which is to be erected next year at Fairfield in Kent county, Ontario, to commemorate the founding of Fairfield by the Moravians in 1792. It is a rehabilitation programme in which I am interested and about which I shall say more in another year.

Mr. KNIGHT: I wish to say a few words about what is called the Prince Albert national park, commonly known to us who live in the neighbourhood as Waskesiu. The reason I bring up this matter is that I believe I detect a tendency which I deplore in the administration of our parks. I am glad that certain improvements are being carried out in the park, improvements to the golf course and things of that kind. New cottages have been built there, I believe, and it is about that subject that I should like to say a word. I myself do not live in the particular constituency, but I cannot ignore the letters I receive from the people in my constituency who make that park their summer home. I had occasion to protest once before in regard to the building of pretentious bungalows in the park. The method was that a certain piece of ground was leased by people who scrambled to get these particular leases and then built expensive cottages upon them. There was a building restriction in this section which placed a limit of $500 upon the amount to be spent, but in my judgment the cottages to which I refer cost on an average, at least four times that. That is all very fine, but the point is that in that particular row where these twenty cottages were built 120 families who had been using that space were displaced and moved back into the bush. I have no fault to find with the people who occupy these fine lots and who are able to afford to build upon them, except that the cottages were built by people who already owned houses in the cities, and of lumber which was badly needed to build houses for our returned veterans.

As I say, the improvements are welcomed, I suppose, as a promotion to tourist trade, as a general improvement. But I would urge upon the department not to be too much carried away by the policy of making this and other such places into a model camp to be kept, as it were, immaculate, and to serve the few. Let us look at it from the point of view of what is the real object, what is the real need, what is the real function of a national park. To my mind, these so-called shack tenters and campers are just as important as the people who can build and occupy more expensive bungalows. Many of the people who have patronized Waskesiu for years—and I may say that some of these people have gone there and occupied the same space of ground for as many as ten years; to my knowledge—consider that they have a definite grievance, and for some reason they keep writing to me about it; their grievance is that they have been displaced from their old quarters in the manner in which I have spoken, and that expensive cottages have been built. It is not as if there were any scarcity of ground. There are thousands and thousands of acres and hundreds and hundreds of miles of waterfront easily available. The point I wish to make is that the owner of sufficient wealth—and it does not have to be much wealth—can provide himself with one of these more expensive cottages. I say all power to him; I am gled that he is able to do that, but the point is that he should not have a priority in the matter of site which is somewhat important in lake locations.

I know that the present management at Waskesiu disagrees with me on this particular issue. A number of correspondents who have written to me say that the present management shows a considerable lack of imagination in regard to the running of the park generally. I know nothing of that, because I am not competent to say, but I do know that the only people whom I can hold responsible for the situation is this department of the government. I have in my possession a letter which was written by the assistant controller of the department in answer to one of these protests. The controller of the department assumes the responsibility for the policy in regard to the displacement of these people, thus exonerating, as it were, the superintendent.

As I have said, there was a building restriction of $500. In this particular letter to which I referred, the controller boasts:

> I doubt very much if there was a single cottage in the first unit of this subdivision which did not cost much beyond this figure.

I quite agree; I said that $2,500 would be closer to the value of some of these cottages. Hon. members see the point I am trying to make, namely, that you need to have some money in order to enjoy the blue sky and the wind on the water at Waskesiu. I would remind the government of the clause in the National Parks Act—I presume it is the preamble, although I have not looked it up; but it is quoted with pride by the assistant controller, although I am sure that the case he makes afterwards does not particularly show that the policy is being carried out—which says that our parks are hereby dedicated to the people of Canada. I submit, sir, that those who can build fine cottages, who can go where they like and have the accommodation they like, are not the people for whom I plead. The people for whom I plead are those people—and I hate to use this expression, although I am going to use it because hon. members will understand it—who have to work for a living, who have two short weeks in which they can enjoy a holiday; that is, the man of the family. If such a man as that can get a shack tent to which he can send his wife and family during the time when the children do not have to go to school, they have a cheap and healthy holiday for a couple of months.

I am complaining of the attitude and of the policy in regard to that park, which keeps that place, shall I say, ultra respectable. The letter I quoted speaks most disparagingly of these shack tents, as though the owners were slum dwellers or some inferior sort of person. The letter says:

> You will agree, I am sure, that a shack tent community is in no way comparable with the lakeview subdivision on which permanent cottages have been allowed.

"In no way comparable"; in what way not comparable? I will admit not as a show place. The letter continues:

> It would obviously have to be well removed from the other subdivisions.

What is wrong with these people? Have they smallpox? The letter continues:

> It is very important that the development at this point reflect credit on the park generally.

That is the sentence to which I should like to draw particular attention. I think we are missing the principle laid down in the statement of the preamble which I have just read, namely, that the parks are the property of and for the use of the people of Canada. Let me warn against making these national parks too stiff and formal. I am not sure that it is the best policy to build up our national parks so that they look like our home towns where we have streets and avenues and law and order and things of that sort; houses with little gardens in front of them and so on. We want to get away from that in our national parks. People come to our national parks to bask in the sunshine and the outdoors. So far as I am concerned, if I were an American tourist or any other kind of tourist I should like to get some fresh air at Waskesiu.

I do not want to hold up the committee too long, but I have received at least a dozen letters from people complaining about the action taken in Prince Albert national park. There are one or two definite questions I should like to ask the minister with regard to concessions in this park. There would seem to be some difference in the amounts charged for these concessions, and in this connection I should like to quote from sessional paper No. 235 of June 21, 1946. This states that Hillcrest Cabins Limited pay a business licence fee of $1 a year, presumably to the dominion government, as well as five per cent of the gross revenue derived from rentals. Another concessionaire. Waskesiu Bungalow Cabins pays a yearly licence fee of $50; a business licence fee of $1 a year and five per per cent of the gross revenue. Then the Lakeview Inn, which I am informed is the property of one John William Sanderson, pays a business licence fee of $15 and no percentage of the revenue. I should like to know why there is this difference in terms. I should also like to know if this man Sanderson is the sole owner of that particular concession or whether it is a partnership or a company.

Mr. GLEN: I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. friend has said with regard to the park and the apparent discrimination made between those already resident and those who come in. In connection with the park in Manitoba we were anxious that it should not become a millionaire's paradise but rather that it be a park for the common people. Camping grounds are provided there for the accommodation of visitors. I am informed that the superintendent in Waskesiu has plenty of accommodation in the way of camping grounds for those who may come there. As far as the apparent discrimination is concerned, I would tell my hon. friend that a request was made by many of those desiring lots that a portion be set apart so that they could get a lot on which to build a house commensurate with their desires. There was no intention of disturbing any one or depriving anyone of an opportunity of doing likewise.

In connection with the concessions to which my hon. friend has referred, the rule now is that five per cent of the gross turnover of the business be paid. Formerly that was not the case, because in previous days a rental charge was made. This may account for the apparent discrimination in the two cases mentioned.

Mr. KNIGHT: Has the minister any particulars with regard to the ownership of the Lakeview Inn?

Mr. GLEN: We have no information as to who is the owner.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Last session I asked the minister if he had had any discussion with the provincial government about taking over Forbidden Plateau park on Vancouver island. I understand that the premier of British Columbia was here some time ago and had some discussions with the department.

Mr. GLEN: No progress has been made along the lines indicated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HARKNESS: When we were discussing this item last year the hon. member for York South made some extremely valuable suggestions in connection with the development of our mountain parks from the point of view of skiing, hiking, and so on. I also made some suggestions with regard to the provision of low-cost accommodation in the form of lodges, cabins and so on, and the opening up of new hiking trails. Provision should be made for the accommodation of an increased number of people in these parks at a lower cost to the people. I notice that an amount of $700,000 is provided for temporary assistance and wages and $950,000 for equipment, materials and supplies. What progress has been made in the way of providing accommodation as well as the development of ski and hiking trails? Can the minister tell us also how the money provided for construction purposes was spent?

Mr. GLEN: I assume the hon. member is referring to Banff and Jasper particularly?

Mr. HARKNESS: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: I can give the following particulars with regard to Banff and Jasper:

Auto Bungalow Camp Concessions
Granted in 1946

Name—Location—Area—Minimum No. Cabins

Banff national park—

Walls, R. C., east of Banff auto camp, 2 acres—20.

Vanzant, C. A., and Tabuteau, N. J., near Tunnel Mountain drive, 3 acres—30.

Coughlan, Roy A., east of Banff, 2 acres—20.

Staple, Geoffry W., east of Banff, 2½ acres—25.

Bunnell, Everett L., Two Jacks lake, 2 acres—20.

Jasper national park—

Zeidler, Miss Gerda and Trudel, Victor E., jct. Miette and Athabasca, 2 acres—20.

Alexander, Kenneth H., vicinity Caledonia Cr., 2 acres,—20.

Wells, Ralph F., Athabaska Falls, 2 acres—20.

Webb, Victor F B., West Willow avenue, Jasper, 3 acres—30.

Bolli, Lloyd A., jct. Bonhomme and Aspen ave., Jasper, 2 acres—20.

I understand that all these are returned soldiers.

Mr. HARKNESS: When these licences are granted is any restriction placed on the prices that may be charged for accommodation, or is that left entirely up to the person providing the accommodation?

Mr. GLEN: The concessionaire must satisfy the park superintendent that his prices are fair and reasonable, and the rates charged must be posted on the walls of the cabins.

Mr. HARKNESS: Can the minister say anything about the development of ski and hiking trails and the providing of accommodation for people using these trails?

Mr. GLEN: The department are doing what they can, with the inadequate help they have at the present time so far as they possibly can, to keep the trails improved, and to extend them, too.

Mr. HARKNESS: Has any help been given to the Canadian Hostelers' Association, which provides places where young people may stay overnight for small charges. I know there was a request made in connection with a place in Kananaskis.

Mr. GLEN: Nothing has been done with regard to the building of hostels, because we do not wish to compete with the soldiers who are there in the park, and have to construct their buildings.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have had communications from the people in the Alberta parks, and particularly from the Alberta board of trade, respecting landing strips. I understand that one has been built at Banff, and that it is either completed or almost completed. The people at the other parks—Jasper, Waterton and Elk island—are anxious that landing strips be provided, evidently believing that with the increase in air travel a considerable number of private aircraft from the United States would land at those points, if any provision were made. Has anything been done at these other parks?

Mr. GLEN: The matter is being investigated by the Department of Transport. They are considering accommodation for small aircraft at the present time, but no decision has yet been made about a larger landing field.

Mr. HARKNESS: I take it that there are no air strips, except at Banff.

Mr. GLEN: And particulars are being prepared with respect to Jasper for submission by the Department of Transport.

Mr. HARKNESS: It was my information that the landing strip at Banff had been completed.

Mr. GLEN: For small aircraft only.

Mr. WEBB: When this item was under discussion last year I spoke respecting the Thousand Islands park area. I mentioned at that time that during the war those parks had become more or less run down, and the services are not any too satisfactory. I noticed this year there is an increase of $700,000 and, while I do not expect the minister would spend all of it in that area, I am wondering if he is considering spending at least a portion of it. These parks are crowded all the time. However, the docks are not in good condition and the services are not as they should be. I am hoping that from his estimates this year the minister may make some improvements and give some further services.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member knows that we have had investigations made by our officers, and that investigations are being made by United States officers. Separate reports are being submitted independently by the investigating officers, one for the United States and one for ourselves. Those reports have not yet been considered, and I am therefore not yet in a position to say what the result may be.

Mr. WEBB: I do not suppose the minister has anything to report on the international park.

Mr. GLEN: Not at the present time.

Mr. HAZEN: This item provides for the expenditure of $2,069,000 on national parks and historic sites. Has the minister received any communication this year from the government of New Brunswick respecting the establishment of a national park in that province? I understand that the dominion government is prepared to establish a park, if the provincial government will supply a suitable site and give a title in fee simple. I believe New Brunswick is the only province in Canada with no national park at the present time. Have there been any communications this year between the government of New Brunswick and his department about the establishment of a park in that province?

Mr. GLEN: No, we have had no communication. The hon. member has stated the procedure exactly.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to know how the $709,000 will be spent. I have visited the national park in Manitoba and benefited therefrom. I should like to see more people benefit from similar visits. I do not want to talk about discrimination between two classes, as happened at Prince Albert, but I would ask the minister to remember that there are more poor people than rich people, and that therefore more places have to be provided for them. I should hope that some of this money is being laid aside to provide these facilities.

Has the minister given any thought to providing bowling greens for the men who are getting old, like I am. They could have recreation in that way, or by playing horseshoes. I am sure that money would be well spent in a development of this kind.

Some of these parks will be crowded in the near future, and I am suggesting that the government should reserve a space in the interlake country for a second national park in Manitoba. There will be so many tourists coming to Canada that we shall require that extra accommodation, and this will be a good time to lay it aside.

Would the minister tell us how the concessions are let in our national parks in Manitoba? I know that in one park I visited there is a picture show which does a roaring business. Does the park pay for itself?

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member mean Riding Mountain?

Mr. BRYCE: Yes. Is it paying for itself, and is there enough money coming back into the consolidated revenue fund to pay the expenses of the park? It should be made to pay for itself.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member has spoken along the lines followed by the hon. member for Saskatoon City. He knows, as I do, that there is plenty of accommodation in the grounds for many more people than have ever gone into the park. There were 55,000 people who had gone into the park up to the end of July this year, and there is the probability that it will have a much larger attendance in the future. We shall have to provide sufficient accommodation.

Mr. BRYCE: We could have another in the interlake area.

Mr. GLEN: Perhaps. I have had some letters with respect to bowling greens, probably more than the hon. member has had. Many people have approached me in regard to the matter. Only recently an officer was appointed whose duty it will be to see about recreation in all the parks in Canada, of such types as may be useful and required in those parks. So far as money is made available, I shall spend it as carefully as possible and without discrimination.

WHEAT AND FLOUR

SUSPENSION OF RESTRICTIONS, EFFECTIVE SEPTEMBER 1

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I would ask for the consent of the house to make a statement on the wheat and flour restrictions. I should like to take this opportunity of informing the house that the restriction introduced on April 1 of this year, which limited the usage of wheat by millers and other processors of wheat for domestic human consumption to ninety per cent of the quantity of wheat so used in the corresponding months of 1945, is being suspended, effective September 1. This particular restriction has undoubtedly created serious inconvenience in some sections of the country, particularly in those areas affected by a heavy influx of tourists and by the repatriation of men from the forces and their families.

Hon. members will have noticed an announcement by the United States secretary of agriculture last Friday, in which it was stated that a number of emergency restrictions in the use of grain were being relaxed because of their anticipated record harvests. Both the United States and Canada agreed early this spring upon a series of export objectives and imposed varying restrictions on the domestic use of grain to ensure their fulfilment. Each country determined its own particular type of restriction in the light of its own circumstances and its own over-all food export programme, with the understanding that in the general result the measures would be equally effective.

As hon. members already know, we were able to exceed our combined commitments on wheat flour and other cereals for the crop year ended July 31. The crops now being harvested indicate that, having regard to transportation problems, we shall be able, at least for the next six months, to continue to make our maximum contribution to world requirements.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—National parks bureau—

158. National parks and historic sites services, $2,069,000.

Mr. McLURE: Last year I spoke on this item and made a request of the minister, and to refresh his memory I should like to say a few words with reference to our national park in Prince Edward Island.

As hon. members know, Prince Edward Island was discovered in 1534 by that great explorer Jacques Cartier, who was so greatly impressed by the beauty of the island that he wrote in his diary these words:

> Low and flat and the fairest
> That may possibly be seen,
> And full of beautiful trees and meadows.

Now, after a little more than four hundred years, Jacques Cartier's description can be intensified by the use of all the best adjectives one can find in Webster's dictionary to do justice to the island. We have a national park. It is one of the latest to be created. Established in 1937, it is a great addition to the tourist playgrounds of Canada. It extends along the north shore of Prince Edward Island for some twenty-five miles or more. While not large, it comprises over 4,000 acres.

It begins at Dalvay-Stanhope down by the sea on Tracadie bay and extends to Covehead harbour and then on to Brackley Beach, which is known to a great many even in this house. It follows along the coast to Rustico bay. The greater portion and perhaps the most interesting part of the park extends from Rustico harbour to the lake of Shining Waters at New London bay, and is known as the Rustico Cavendish part of our national park.

I know the minister has visited the park and had a delightful game of golf on the Green Gables golf course there. He also helped to open our national park. I am not going to dwell on the beauties of this park which, with its woodland beauties and fine bathing beaches, attracts hundreds of tourists, but I should like to mention that the finest advertising Prince Edward Island ever had as a beautiful tourist playground came from that wonderful writer, the late Lucy Maud Montgomery MacDonald, who by her writings did more to advertise the excellencies of Prince Edward Island and the beauties of its seacoast bordering our national park than all the advertising done by governments so far.

But the approaches to this park are not at all satisfactory. We were under the impression that the roads leading to the park were to be improved, and all the more so when last winter the national parks controller announced through the press that there were being drafted in Ottawa plans which included improvements on all the roads leading to the Prince Edward Island national park. The golf course and the park have become very popular with the tourists, who are going there in increasing numbers each year during the vacation season. They can be reached by the highway from Summerside via Kensington, and also from Summerside via Hunter's river to within 3½ miles of the park and golf course. They can also be reached from Rustico by a permanent highway, but what is required is the improvement of the road for a distance of 3½ miles more, which would extend the permanent highway in each case direct to the grounds.

I notice in these estimates that over $600,000 is to be spent on roadways for the national parks, and this six or seven miles of roadway which I am urging the minister to build would not cost very much. For instance, the highway goes to New Glasgow, first via Hunter's River, and then the McLure highway goes from there to Rustico. From Rustico a road could be built through to the Land of Green Gables, a distance of 3½ miles, which surely would not cost much more than a few dollars out of this vote of $600,000 which is now in the estimates for roads. I bring this matter again to the attention of the minister and I hope he will not forget it. Part of the road is already built. It was begun in 1935 and finished in 1936 from Hunter's River via New Glasgow to Rustico, a distance of twelve miles, and this hard-surfaced road was built by the federal government at not one cent of cost to the province of Prince Edward Island. We are looking forward to having this six or seven miles of road built, 3½ miles from New Glasgow to Green Gables, and the other 3½ from Rustico around the shore to Cavendish, making seven miles in all. I want the minister to make a special note of this in his mind, and if it is not included in these estimates, let us see that provision is made at another season.

Mr. GLEN: I have had an opportunity of visiting the park which the hon. member speaks of, although he credits me with more than I am entitled to, because it was my predecessor who opened the park. Nevertheless I have been over it. The policy of the government prior to the war was to assist in building roads to the parks, but at the present time all we can do and are doing is to maintain and repair the roads within the parks. One of the proposals to the dominion-provincial conference was to take care of any roads approaching the parks, but until a settlement is made with the provinces I am unable to hold out any hope that anything will be done, at any rate this year, on roads outside the park.

Item agreed to.

159. Administration of Migratory Birds Convention Act, $52,500.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest that what we are trying to do on behalf of the conservation of wild fowl is to a certain extent putting the cart before the horse. I say that for two or three reasons. We are trying to cut down the number of days when a man can shoot ducks and the number of ducks which can be taken a year. That is all to the good; I do not think anyobdy wants to be a hog in the matter of shooting. But we have a great heritage in Canada in our wild fowl population. I should like to read something which appeared in the magazine Rod and Gun. The writer says:

> All these governments are now keenly conscious of Ruskin's dictum, "God has given this earth for our life. It is a great entail. It belongs as much to those who come after us as to us, and we have no right, by anything we do or neglect to do, to involve them in unnecessary penalties or to deprive them of the benefits which are theirs by right."

This is not merely a question of shooting and killing ducks. The figures which are quoted in this magazine are interesting and, I think, are worth while putting on record for the information of hon. members:

> In 1875, it is estimated that we had 400,000,000 waterfowl. By 1900 there were, perhaps, only 200,000,000 and, by 1933, just seven per cent, or 28,000,000 of the 1875 waterfowl population was left on the continent. In the short space of 60 years 93 per cent of all waterfowl had disappeared and the balance was in a fair way to follow the fate of . . . other species of wild life now extinct.

We should try to find out the cause of this condition. There are a great many reasons for the depletion other than destruction by shooting. With the development of the prairies and other parts of our country much of the water supply dried up. The fowl would bring up their young, and in a short time the water would dry up and the youngsters would die.

As the minister knows, a great work has been done by Ducks Unlimited, but a great deal more remains to be done. We in Canada have a great trust in the matter of our wild fowl population. Most of the ducks nest up in the north country, although certain classes nest in Ontario and other provinces. Ducks Unlimited, consisting of public-spirited men in the United States, have spent some millions of dollars on conservation measures. They are aware that the United States cannot do anything directly about the nesting grounds of the ducks which come down and winter in the United States, because the nesting grounds are located in Canada. We, therefore, as Canadians have a duty to do all we possibly can to conserve for future generations the wild fowl of this country. I cannot speak too strongly on this matter. Shooting ducks is a great recreation, and, so far as we members of parliament are concerned, is likely to be the only one open to us this year, since we are not going to have any summer holidays. Let us see if we can do anything to further this enterprise.

Two or three considerations occur to me. We need more money spent in the north country to conserve the water supply, although much is being done in that direction at the present time. I am not much in favour of spending the country's money, but it would be worth our while to make a grant to Ducks Unlimited to assist in the work they are carrying on in Canada.

In this connection we have neglected the problem of predatory birds. We see flocks of crows around all the time. We see numbers of starlings outside these buildings. We have horny owls and other predatory birds that are destroying our young broods of ducks, and not only those, but the young partridge, the prairie chicken and other game birds and lovely fowl we have in this country. I think it might be worth while to give a lead to the people and help to preserve, not only for Canada but for the United States, the wild fowl population of this country.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I want to commend the minister for this—limited—grant in the estimates. I was much interested in the eloquent and forceful remarks of the hon. member for St. Paul's. We in my part of the country are greatly concerned with the protection of the migratory birds. We have a peculiar condition there which needs special consideration and which I wish to place before the minister. The citizens of the straits of Chignecto, Cumberland county and Westmorland county, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are anxious to protect these ducks and geese. They have done a great deal to protect them with their clubs, by having special guardians on the grounds in the closed season, and by planting bird food, wild oats and wild rice. For a great many years they have had a season which opens on September 15 and which closes earlier, because the birds leave earlier, than in other parts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I can understand the desire of the minister and the department to have the seasons as uniform as possible; but there is a request, almost a demand, from the people who are interested in the protection of the birds and in the sport, that an exception be made in that area and that the earlier season in that part of the two provinces be continued rather than have it open on October the first.

The gunners in the town of Amherst, the town of Sackville, the town of Moncton and in the contiguous country, who have organizations for the protection of birds, met recently and passed resolutions asking that the minister perpetuate the date of the opening of the season, as has been the practice for many years, on September 15. The birds arrive in that district later than in other parts of Nova Scotia and they leave earlier. When they come in the spring they are protected by the public, but they do a great deal of damage to the newly cropped land, the marsh lands, the hay fields and the newly seeded land by pulling up the roots and destroying crops. The people who are interested in the birds are satisfied to put up with that but they would like the season fixed to suit their conditions. There are some people—a few—who have leased lands or who own large acreage, who are able to get what gunning they desire during a late season. But the men I am speaking about, these members of the gunning clubs composed of industrial workers who work in the factory or on farms, have no other opportunity for an outing. They have been enjoying these outings for many years and they ask that the season be opened on September 15 as heretofore.

I will not ask the minister to make any definite decision now, but I would make a further appeal to him. I have already, together with the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), had conferences with the minister and his officers and have put before them the facts, and I should like the minister to make a statement now giving us an assurance that he will personally give the matter further consideration and see whether he cannot meet the special wishes of these gunners. They do not get nor do they want big bags. It is not for commercial shooting in their case, but for sporting in the widest sense of the term, that they make this request.

Mr. EMMERSON: I wish to align myself with the hon. member for Cumberland in this matter. Cumberland county and Westmorland lie together at the head of the bay of Fundy. A great many birds are bred in the Chignecto area. I have been receiving protests from the fish and game protective association branch in Sackville and also in Moncton against the recent order in council changing the date from September 15 to October 1. The men in that locality are not what one might call game hogs. They are prepared to go along with the government in its effort to meet the treaty arrangements with the United States for the preservation of birds, and they are also prepared to go to the extent of cutting down the daily bag and the total bag, but they want an opportunity to shoot. The birds start to leave in the first or second week in October and by the middle of October there is practically no shooting. This means that if the season begins on the first of October they get about two weeks. They are willing to cut down on the number of birds they shoot, but they want to have an opportunity to shoot for at least three or four weeks. Most of them have no opportunity at all, except in the evenings. A good many of the men working in the railway shops in Moncton and Sackville foundries and on the farms want to take advantage of that opportunity in the evening to shoot over the decoys, and I urge the minister to give serious consideration to restoring the date to September 15, where it has been for years. There are three zones in New Brunswick. Westmorland is in the large zone, and I have reason to know that the majority of the people in New Brunswick, particularly in the area of that large zone No. 3, want the season to open on September 15. There is a disadvantage, of course, in having it open early because, as duck hunters know, the early birds have too many pinfeathers; but it is better to have ducks with pinfeathers than no ducks at all.

Mr. HAZEN: No complaints have been brought to my attention, although for some years I was actively associated with the fish and game protective association in New Brunswick. I am not in the habit of congratulating the minister or other members of the government on what they do, and in that respect I differ from some of the members on this side of the house. At the same time I would say to the minister that I believe he has taken a step in the right direction in shortening the season and limiting the bag for our water-fowl. I think it is clear that the water-fowl, despite all conservation measures that have been taken, are decreasing in this country and the situation has to be faced. This may be due partly to the drought, but it is due largely to overshooting, and if it is due to overshooting in the last year or two, when so many of our men have been overseas, what will the condition be like in the next few years unless something is done? It would be a great calamity if these birds were wiped out or further reduced in numbers. The only suggestion I have to make is that the minister would be well advised to consult, as no doubt he does consult, Mr. Tufts, the migratory birds officer of the maritime provinces, who is familiar with these matters and who, I know, is very much interested in the conservation of such birds.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Westmorland and the hon. member for Cumberland have already seen me with regard to the matter. Apparently there is a peculiar situation in that district, differing from that in other parts of the eastern coast. I have been receiving communications. The hon. member for Cumberland has asked me to give the matter my personal attention and I shall do so. I understand that some communications have come in which I have not been able to see to-day, but I will look into the matter and, if possible, try to rectify it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I thank the minister. As far as Mr. Tufts is concerned, I know he has done excellent work and his intentions are good. But he lives in a part of the province where the season opens two or three weeks earlier than it does in the area about which the hon. member for Westmorland and I have been speaking, and it also closes later. So that if the season opened two weeks earlier in the Chignecto area it would be comparable to the season in the district in which Mr. Tufts himself lives. Again I wish to say I appreciate the splendid work which Mr. Tufts has done in protecting the bird life of this country.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think the migratory birds officer of the maritime provinces will be influenced by the particular district in which he lives. Knowing him as I do, I think what is going to influence him is his interest in the conservation of these birds. That will be his first and fundamental interest, and it is on that principle that he will base his judgment.

160. Forest and wild life conservation, $40,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I knew Jack Miner many years ago. There is no question that he did a fine job, but he cannot do it all by himself. He needs help. I am in favour of giving him all the help he needs. Jack Miner was one of those fellows who understood the reason for the decline in the duck population. I do not agree with my colleague who just spoke about shooting. The shooting season should be shortened. We need a limit on the number of ducks taken in a year. No one wants to be a hog about it. It is a sport. Shooting is not what is killing the duck population particularly since we have done away with a lot of these things like swivel-guns. What we need is more sanctuaries for the birds, some place where they can land and be fed. It is not enough for the ducks to have some place to land where they are protected. They require to be fed. We need more of these places where they are fed, such as Jack Miner's place.

I know a little about conservation of birds because I have had something to do with it for a great many years. I am not one of those fellows who go out in a hide just for the fun of shooting ducks. I have sat down and watched them come down in front of me and play around, and I was ashamed to shoot them. I like to shoot them when they are in the air. But we have crows, jackdaws, owls, jackfish, turtles and frogs which prey upon the young ducks. We ought to get the public interested in that aspect of the question so that the young birds could be protected and grow up. We have family allowances which take care of the children. Why should we not look after the young of the game birds so that our children will have a chance to shoot the birds when they grow up?

161. Grant to Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should be derelict in my duty if I did not express the appreciation of those who are so interested in the marvellous work which is being done at the Miner foundation near Kingsville. The raising of the estimate from $2,500 to $5,000 is a step in the right direction. Lest anyone should think the foundation profits out of this vote, it is my duty to say that the foundation feeds around 14,000 bushels of corn a year to the geese, and that amount is continually growing, is getting larger all the time because a large number of geese stay all winter. I am sure it will please the foundation very much to learn that this vote has been increased.

Mr. WINKLER: I rise not to criticize the vote of $5,000 to the Jack Miner migratory foundation but to remind the committee that there are other organizations and other people throughout the country who are engaged in the same kind of work. In the constituency of Lisgar in Manitoba about four miles from the town of Morris there is a family by the name of Gebauer who, for some twenty years, have been feeding migratory birds, mostly ducks and geese. They have scraped a hole in the ground on the bald prairie and, by means of dams and other arrangements, have been able to look after a great many birds. As the hon. member for Davenport has pointed out, the main cost is in the feeding. Has consideration been given to the comparative merits of other people who are engaged in this same kind of work?

164. Dominion Astrophysical observatory, Victoria, B.C., $36,273.

Mr. FRASER: What is the extra amount for?

Surveys and Engineering branch—
165. Dominion water and power bureau, including the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, $272,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister give us a summary of the activities of this water and power bureau?

Mr. GLEN: This vote was used in 1945-46 for the work of the dominion water and power bureau in making hydrometric measurements securing essential data on the flow of international and other waters and the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts. The vote for 1946-47 will be used for the same purpose, but with some extensions to provide for work particularly required in the water resource field.

The increase of $21,000 results from the return to duty of four engineers who have been on military leave, amounting to $11,460, and to statutory increases offset by the release of certain temporary employees. In addition, an increase in the hydrometric work in the southwestern portion of Ontario to the extent of $4,500 is being undertaken at the request of that province, which will be covered by an increased contribution of that amount from Ontario; also surveys at the Whitedog falls on the Winnipeg river being undertaken at the request of the Department of Reconstruction, estimated cost $5,000.

166. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $300,000.

Mr. FRASER: This is a new vote. Will the minister explain exactly what it is for?

Mr. GLEN: This was in the External Affairs vote last year. It is a new vote so far as we are concerned. On a joint reference of the governments of Canada and of the United States, the international joint commission was directed to have a complete investigation made of the Columbia river watershed.

Mr. MacNICOL: For what purpose?

Mr. GLEN: For the carrying out of the studies—for irrigation and power purposes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Partly that.

Mr. GLEN: The carrying out of the studies and the surveys in Canada has been entrusted to the dominion water and power bureau, surveys and engineering branch, by the Canadian section of the international joint commission. This bureau has its own staff and it has secured the cooperation of other services of the branch and also of the Department of Public Works for the purposes of carrying out the investigations and office studies which are now in progress. An increase of $300,000 is shown in the estimates, but the increase is in reality, $170,000. A total of $130,000 was provided for in 1945-46 in the votes of the Department of External Affairs, and the increase of $170,000 is due to the fact that field work is now well organized and it is anticipated that a full season's operations will be accomplished in 1946-47 by all the cooperating services, whereas in 1945-46, as was well foreseen, the season was well advanced before the field work could be undertaken, owing to the difficulties of securing personnel and the necessary transportation and other equipment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this not being provided for the purpose of discovering the height to which the Columbia river can be raised, in conjuction with the United States who wish to increase the height of Grand Coulee dam which would back up the waters of the river for perhaps fifty miles over the boundary?

[Mr. Glen.]

Mr. GLEN: I am told that is one of the purposes of the survey.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Since the bulk of the investigation work concerning the Columbia river is being done within my constituency, I can assure the minister that the people there are pleased to see this vote, particularly those who have lived in the district for forty or fifty years and have witnessed its development. This vote is an indication of the great development that will occur in that area. I should like to extend an invitation to the minister and to our parliamentary explorer, the hon. member for Davenport, to visit that section. I do not think the present Minister of Mines and Resources has been there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you; I will come.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I do not think we have had a minister out there for a number of years. When this development is completed it will be one of the greatest in the world. I believe the potential development will be in the neighbourhood of 30,000,000 horse-power. At the present time there is a greater development of electrical energy in Kootenay West than in the rest of British Columbia. I want to express the appreciation of my constituents for the policy undertaken by the department of seeing that news bulletins concerning the work are issued from time to time. The people there find these extremely interesting, and I think it is an excellent thing to keep the people concerned informed of what is taking place. What will be the procedure that will be followed by the international commission in dealing with these matters and how can those interested in the district express their views? There are many people who will be affected by the raising of these water levels, by the damming of rivers and so on.

Mr. GLEN: There will be a report by our own officers to the international joint commission and also one by the United States officers. Following that, the decision will be made.

Mr. HERRIDGE: What procedure will have to be followed by the people in the district in order to be able to express their views with regard to the development?

Mr. GLEN: I am told that the Canadian commission will have hearings at which any representative body or individual may make representations.

Surveys and Engineering branch—
167. Lake of the Woods control board, $8,950.

Mr. MacNICOL: This vote is of long standing. It should be a small matter to regulate the flow out of Lake of the Woods down the Winnipeg river. The Norman dam has been there a long time and it should be a simple matter to control the level of the lake. I believe the level should be 1,061·25 feet above sea level as registered at Warroad in the United States, and I cannot understand why such an expenditure is required.

Mr. GLEN: This vote is to provide for the salaries and operating expenses of the staff serving the Lake of the Woods control board which is responsible for regulating the levels in accordance with the treaty between Canada and the United States. These regulations cover the control of the run-off from the Lake of the Woods storage basin. Ontario, Manitoba and the dominion are all interested in the run-off and, as a consequence, there has to be a staff. Particulars will be found on page 147 of the main estimates. These show a senior engineering clerk and water and power engineers, as well as wages, including gauge readers. Total salaries and wages amount to $6,460, and then provision is made for cost of living bonuses, travelling expenses, supplies and equipment, sundries and field, travel and incidental expenses. It is necessary to have these engineers for the purpose of controlling the run-off.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not opposing the vote. Sixty-two per cent of the watershed is in Canada and the remainder in the United States, and that country must also contribute toward the regulating of the water level.

Mr. GLEN: They have a board also.

Mr. MacNICOL: It seems to me that this is a large amount of money for such a small thing as this. The Norman is a permanent dam and should be easily regulated, in fact, the regulation should be almost automatic.

170. Engineering and construction service, $106,880.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am not going to repeat what the hon. member for Regina City said this afternoon, but I heartily support his remarks in connection with the necessity of a government policy in regard to the trans-Canada highway. I understand that under the Canada Highways Act, 1919, the dominion government granted $20,000,000 to the provinces for assistance in building highways. At the beginning of 1936 there was certain assistance given to the provinces. As far as British Columbia is concerned, the larger measure of that assistance was given between 1929 and 1930 under what was at that time the Department of the Interior, in connection with the construction of the road between Golden and Revelstoke. Then the government made certain proposals at the dominion-provincial conference, which the people were hopeful would succeed, for the maintenance of the trans-Canada highway system on a fifty-fifty basis. Unfortunately the conference failed temporarily, and those plans are delayed. But the people in the southern and interior parts of British Columbia are concerned about this matter, particularly those who live in the mountainous district where road construction is expensive and the population sparse. They are particularly interested in the highway in British Columbia; but, because of their interest in that highway, they are generally interested in this government's having a policy with regard to the construction of sections of the trans-Canada highway in cooperation with the provinces.

I have here a publication issued by the public roads administration of the United States, and published in 1945. I shall read only a short paragraph from it, but I might point out that the whole publication deals with the urgent necessity for cooperation between the federal administration in the United States, and the states for the development of a federal highways system as part of their post-war reconstruction plan. The first paragraph reads:

> The Federal-Aid Highways Act, 1944, is the third great highway legislative act in the history of the country. It marks the pattern for highway improvements for the next ten to twenty years. This act authorizes $500 million for the construction of highways in each of the first three post-war years, and requires the designation of two new highways systems, in addition to the existing federal aid system.

I have quoted that only to show how they are approaching this question in the United States, and how they rely on this means to develop their country. If we in Canada were doing the same thing in a proportionate basis at this time we would be voting at least $50 million from the dominion treasury to cooperate with the provincial governments in the building of the trans-Canada highway. I urge that the government give this problem serious consideration. If there is failure to have a successful dominion-provincial conference in the near future, I would urge that the federal government ought not to delay its plan in this connection. It may be that at the present time or in the immediate future labour supplies and the supplies of materials may not be available. I think, however, the dominion government should take some concrete action in regard to its plan for the future.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just a word to say, after the appropriate remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West. In the first place, I shall do for him something he has never done for me; I will support what he has said, and with great pleasure.

The question of the trans-Canada highway is an important one, because it involves the convenience of Canadians who would travel on their own territory from coast to coast. Such a highway will promote national understanding and better trade relations throughout the country. I am informed that there is no vote in the estimates for the trans-Canada highway. However, a large amount has been spent by the dominion government in this connection, but the province of Quebec has been the forgotten child. It has received the least amount for the highway.

I shall not at the moment discuss the reason. It is a situation, however, which can be corrected. I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that one of the finest sections of the trans-Canada highway is that from Rivière du Loup going east to Edmundston. It is an old military road in which the late Hon. Norman Rogers was deeply interested when he was minister of labour. At that time the work was done under the Department of Labour, and not under the Department of Mines and Resources. He had a fine plan at the time he was transferred to another department, but for one reason or another that plan did not materialize. Now that we have in charge of the Department of Mines and Resources another genial minister who is a great Canadian, I am sure he will pay close attention to what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Regina City, what was said this evening by the hon. member for Kootenay West, and also the remarks just now being made.

I shall not insist further, because I know, when the minister's attention is directed to a matter, he has the gift of remembering it. If nothing is done at the present time, then I would hope that next year he would not forget the remarks which have been made by several members of parliament emphasizing the necessity for improvement of that great means of communication from coast to coast.

Mr. GLEN: Possibly I should point out that there is no vote on which we can discuss the trans-Canada highway. However, before leaving this afternoon the hon. member for Regina City wished to make his contribution to the debate, and I agreed that he should do so.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has pretty well established our present position. The trans-Canada highway is not the responsibility of the dominion government alone. It is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The dominion made its proposals before the dominion-provincial conference in connection with making its contribution to the building of the trans-Canada highway. Until arrangements are made with the provinces not much can be done. It is not within the jurisdiction of this department. Permission to discuss the matter was given really as a matter of courtesy to the hon. member before he left.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I associate myself with members who have spoken thus far on the subject, namely the hon. members for Regina City, Kootenay West and Temiscouata. It would be of value to the committee at the present time if the minister would give some idea as to the amount of money which has been spent in the various provinces on the construction of what might be coordinated into the trans-Canada highway.

I was somewhat concerned to hear that Quebec has been forgotten. If that is so—and I have no reason to doubt the hon. member for Temiscouata—then I think an explanation is forthcoming, and the matter should be rectified.

I should like to say a word or two respecting the trans-Canada highway from another angle. The other day we were discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence, and reference was made to the Alaska highway with which, of course, the minister is thoroughly familiar. I realize that that highway could be of great value from the point of view of tourists, and the point of view of the commercial use of the highway. If suitable roads were built, particularly from the western provinces, to that highway, it would be of great importance not only from the point of view of tourists, but from the commercial point of view, and also that of any possible emergency which might arise.

For this reason I am particularly interested in the trans-Canada highway because it would give a means of connecting up immediately western Ontario with the western coast, and of connecting the four provinces directly with the Alaska highway. Would the minister tell the committee why there has not been an item for the trans-Canada highway? I was looking this year in the estimates of the Minister of Public Works for such an item, but I looked in vain, and I do not find one in the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Could he give the committee some constructive information in the matter?

Before taking my seat, I would say that I do not like to see the good things the dominion government proposes to do tied up too securely with the contingency of the success of the dominion-provincial conference. Whether or not that conference is a success, I believe we should launch out with a bold policy. After all, the provinces are contributing substantially to the revenue of the country, and a development as important as the trans-Canada highway should not depend upon the success or failure of a dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member asked me to give some idea of the cost to the provinces of the building of the trans-Canada highway. I have said that I have no vote dealing with that highway, and therefore I have no information as to costs which I could supply. He has said he does not wish to see this matter tied up too closely with the dominion-provincial conference. The unfortunate thing is this, so far as that suggestion is concerned, that the roads are under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that will be taken into account in whatever arrangements are made between the dominion and the provinces. The dominion in its proposals to the conference had included the trans-Canada highway. While my estimates have no vote for this purpose, the discussion may be of value because the hon. member for Temiscouata has asked for something and so has the hon. member for Lethbridge, and I am sure that something will be done in the future. In the meantime, for the reasons I have indicated, I cannot give any estimate of the amounts contributed by the provinces.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I earnestly suggest that the minister take this matter up with his colleagues with the objective of having an item in the estimates next year. I think it is high time that the efforts of all the provinces were coordinated with the dominion with respect to the trans-Canada highway.

171. Grimshaw-Great Slave lake road—amount required for construction of provincial section in 1946-47, under terms of agreement with Alberta, $450,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I rise to support this item. It is the first time that a vote has been in our estimates for the Grimshaw-Hay River road. I understand that the federal government is building the road in conjunction with the government of Alberta, or is the federal government doing it all? It is about 272 miles of road from Grimshaw to the 60th parallel, all in the province of Alberta. But the province of Alberta has already built a roadway up there. I have been along it for ninety miles by motor car, and beyond that I believe the province of Alberta have built what they call a winter road over which they run sleighs drawn by tractors all the way from Grimshaw as far as Yellowknife. From Grimshaw itself to the lake is 272 miles plus eighty miles. That eighty miles of road is within dominion territory.

Mr. GLEN: It is eighty-one.

Mr. MacNICOL: Maybe the minister counts one mile farther than I did. That would make 353 miles, and then 100 miles across the lake from Hay River to Yellowknife. I think the minister told me that there is no intention at present of extending the road from Alexander falls, which is on the Grimshaw-Hay River road, west around the Great Slave lake because that would be a very long mileage. If I had any suggestion to make it would be that you build docks at Hay River and use wide flat-bottomed boats that would be suitable in the storms on Great Slave lake to cut across the 100 miles to Yellowknife. This road would provide much faster transportation than going down the Athabaska river and down the Slave river because of the portages that would have to be made between Fort Fitzgerald and Fort Smith on the Slave river. I heartily endorse this vote, which will help to develop that great country.

Mr. LOW: Has the minister given consideration to a resumption of the pre-war policy of contributing fifty per cent with the provinces for the construction of park-to-park highways and roads of that description in the parks?

Mr. GLEN: I am sorry that I have again to invoke the dominion-provincial conference as a reason why that is not being done. Nevertheless facts are facts and one must recognize them. The position is that we have not adopted the policy formerly carried on with regard to assistance for these roads. The Grimshaw road is one that came under that policy before. We are building that road in conjunction with the province of Alberta and paying two-thirds of the cost. Two hundred and forty-five miles of new road will go up to the northern boundary of Alberta, and from there eighty-one miles to the Hay river. We will build the road in the northwest territories at the dominion expense.

Mr. LOW: Just what progress has been made this season on the northern section of that road?

Mr. GLEN: In the northwest territories?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: We have made little progress in so far as actual construction is concerned. but the contract has been let, and they are getting in their supplies and equipment in order that they may be able, when the Grimshaw road gets to the northern Alberta boundary, to carry on to Great Slave lake.

Mr. LOW: Has the provincial government completed its section?

Mr. GLEN: No, not yet. But the two contractors have combined to have it completed, if possible, in 1947.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This is the item to which I made reference earlier with reference to the charting of lakes. The minister may recall that I have had some correspondence with him in connection with lake Winnipegosis which the board of trade informs me has never been charted, and because of the lack of dredging in the last few years—I understand that dredging was discontinued during the war—I am informed that navigation on the lake is becoming dangerous. As the minister knows, the whole town depends on the fishing business as well as the smaller towns on the west side of the lake. Is the charting of that lake being considered?

Mr. GLEN: Instructions have been given to get ready for the hydrographic work next year and the officers are preparing their material for doing that very work.

Mr. MENARY: What is to be done with these Japanese? Are they to be permanently employed there? How many of them are there, and in what districts are they located?

Mr. GLEN: This vote was used in 1945-46 to provide employment for persons of the Japanese race who had been removed from the protected areas in British Columbia. It is also to provide for the salaries of the engineers, and the vote will be used for the same purpose as last year's vote. It is not likely that more than $60,000 of this vote will be required because there is a diminishing number of these Japanese. It is just cleaning up the Japanese situation in these camps.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Is it wholly a dominion project?

Mr. GLEN: We pay for the Yukon survey and the province of British Columbia pays for its own survey.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: After the survey is through, is it intended to put the highway down in the Yukon section?

Mr. GLEN: I am afraid that will depend upon the survey. We shall have to wait until the survey is completed and then arrive at a decision.

Mr. GLEN: It is for extra staff and for reclassifications of the present staff.

Surveys and Engineering branch—

775. To provide for the construction in the Snare river drainage basin, Northwest Territories, of a combined storage and hydro-electric development to serve the Yellowknife district, and to authorize the Minister of Mines and Resources with the approval of the governor general in council to engage engineering assistance and to undertake all related works by day labour or contract, $950,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to say a word about this. The Snare river runs through a lake or two into the Great Slave lake bay, on which Fort Rae is located, and this vote is for the coupling up or joining together of the Snare river and the Emile river basin. One can easily see by the maps that the two rivers in their watersheds are very close together. What is the reason that the waters of these two rivers are to be joined?

Mr. GLEN: When we were approached with regard to hydro-development in the Yellowknife area, the Giant Yellowknife Company were proposing to make this expenditure and to provide power from the Snare river by three stages. The matter was discussed fully with the Minister of Reconstruction and myself, and we came to the conclusion that if any hydro-electric power plant was to be built in that territory, the dominion government should do it. We therefore decided we would enter into that project and harness the power there for the benefit not only of the mines now existing but also for the townsite of Yellowknife; and we have an agreement with the Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines whereby they are going to built the transmission lines in order to connect up with this hydro development. The amount of power to be developed there is not very large, 25,000 horse-power when the full project is completed, at levels which have been gauged by officers, not very much detailed, but they took that as the minimum, and the probabilities are that there will be more.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the powerhouse going to be?

Mr. GLEN: The powerhouse itself will be on the Snare river.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where it discharges in Slemon lake?

Mr. GLEN: No; that is a future development. The first development is being built now on the Snare river, and it is going to yield about 8,000 horse-power. That will take care of the mines which are in existence there as well as provide power for the Yellowknife townsite which is now being created. The contracts have been let; they now have their supplies in and they hope to finish that first portion of the scheme in 1948. We felt that this was a matter, for a large district, with a great influx of people coming into it, and the likelihood of very much more development in the mines, which required that the dominion, having jurisdiction over the northwest territories, should do, and in consequence the contracts have been let.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who is to build the power line from the power site to Yellowknife, which will be not less than seventy-five miles away, and perhaps more?

Mr. GLEN: The Giant Yellowknife Gold Mines are building this transmission line, but we have the right to take it over if and when we desire to do so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister able to give any information about the probability of developing power in the Lockhart river?

Lockhart river has four excellent falls within twenty-five miles between the outlet from Artillery lake to Great Slave lake. One of these falls is 135 feet high. There must be a vast amount of power there.

Mr. GLEN: There is no immediate project in view as far as Lockhart river is concerned. As my hon. friend knows, that is a considerable distance from the Yellowknife, and while it is true that a great deal of exploration is going on east of the Yellowknife, and, if one can believe fifty per cent of what one is told by the mining men, there is a very large field of development there, at the moment it is too soon in our judgment to enter into any project to harness the Lockhart river, although it is well known that in that river there is abundant power to take care of all requirements, at least in the immediate mining field. But at the moment it is an unproven field. There are many prospectors there, but we do not at this time consider it a practical proposition.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the line from the Snare river power plant going to connect with the line from the Grayling river power plant, which now supplies Yellowknife?

Mr. GLEN: It will connect up with the Giant Yellowknife property, which is operating with some power obtained from another mine and with diesel engines.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Grayling dam is sixteen miles north of the Yellowknife?

Mr. GLEN: That is the one.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was not quite clear just how far the estimates for this job had gone. Is this the full amount required for developing the power at present contemplated?

Mr. GLEN: The whole project?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. GLEN: No. This is the first portion.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is there a plan covering the whole project?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the total amount for it?

Mr. GLEN: The present programme contemplates the construction of a storage dam to develop 8,000 horse-power. This plant will be constructed by the department and operated under its auspices, and the amount involved is $2,800,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the minister an estimate of the possible income to be derived from this?

Mr. GLEN: Rates will be charged for the power from the new plant, set on actual cost basis, and the rate per horse-power will cover overhead charges, capital investment and so forth. These rates will be set later. The initial rate will be about $95 per horse-power year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is anyone agreeing to pay this rate?

Mr. GLEN: Yes; they are willing to pay it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But have they contracted to pay it?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. There is no objection to the price. They realize that in the first instance the price has to be very high and that, as more users are found, it will be reduced.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is the first unit. Will it be self-sufficient, operated by itself in advance of the completion of the rest?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I observe it says, "to undertake works by day labour or contract." You are not sure yet whether you will get a contract.

Mr. GLEN: The contract has been let.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There is a firm contract from the mines to buy sufficient power to take care of operating costs. What about return on investment?

Mr. GLEN: There is no profit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is the government contributing this? Will it get only operating cost and no return of its money?

Mr. GLEN: The cost will be amortized over a period of fifteen years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And the rate is calculated to do that?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the minister to say that this hydro power will sell at $95 per horse-power.

Mr. GLEN: Per horse-power year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes. That is the way it is taken. I presume production will be around 7,000 horse-power.

Mr. GLEN: Eight thousand horse-power.

Mr. MacNICOL: That makes it worse. That would mean $760,000 a year. That is a pretty stiff price to pay for power. When we were buying Niagara falls power we paid in Toronto $18 per horse-power.

Mr. GLEN: I am told they are glad to have it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There is a contract to pay for power at this rate for the whole 8,000 horse-power, and that is calculated to be sufficient to pay carrying charges, interest and amortization.

Mr. GLEN: Giant Yellowknife will not be the only ones using it. There will be other mines that will be using it as well. Giant Yellowknife will have to have 4,000 horse-power.

Item agreed to.

178. Branch administration, $61,005.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This is a particularly important item in that it has to do with the responsibility of the Canadian people toward 130,000 or so of our red brothers who live among us. These people have hopes, fears, and ambitions just as we have. The vast majority of them, when you go among them to study their conditions, are found to be severely subjected and frustrated in their efforts to do anything. They are badly exploited and greatly misunderstood in Canada. They are often blamed for many things of which they are not guilty. Our responsibility should go to the extent of training these people, informing them and maintaining them under a proper standard of living, giving them an opportunity to make that contribution to Canadian life of which they are capable. Some of the worst features of the whole situation are found to be that under the administration to-day the Indian himself has no appeal, no voice in his own affairs, no way of making his difficulties and trials heard, and he lives in a state of abject subjugation. The result is disease, want and suffering among these people, such as should not prevail in Canada, and it goes even to the extent of ill treatment.

In making a study of conditions among the Indians, and the principles under which we operate this department, I find that there are certain treaties signed by those people who, years ago, took over this Canada of ours from the Indians. They signed treaties with various Indians in different parts of the dominion. If you study these treaties signed by representatives of Queen Victoria and other sovereigns you will find how the government of to-day lives up to them. You find such flagrant violations of the treaties as to give us pause. You find also that those officials who were put in charge of the Indians have in many cases dictatorial power and complete control over the life and existence of these people. The training of the Indian is incomplete. There is no real opportunity for him such as there is for the whites, and one is sometimes astounded at the apathy of Canadians generally to the conditions among these people. They are put off on reserves in sparsely settled areas.

Mr. REID: They can fish in British Columbia just as well as the white man.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I know the hon. member is capable of giving us his opinion and I have no doubt he will do so, but there are 130,000 Indians and they are not all fishing salmon in British Columbia. They have no place to which to appeal to obtain redress for their conditions; there is no one in authority to speak for them; they have no voice. They have not the capacity properly to organize themselves. These people have character and ability. They have a fine attitude toward one another and toward life generally. When we have conscripted them into the army or when they have volunteered they have made good soldiers. They can be a great people; they have proved that when they have been able to escape from the control of the department. Many things remain to be done to make them economically sound. First of all, they can make a living. Where they have had an opportunity they have proved themselves to be good.

I am not going to deal with the troubles of the past or the record of Canada in the past in the treatment of these fine people. I am looking forward to what we can do toward salvaging them and helping them to make their contribution to Canada, and they can make a great contribution. Toward this end I think this year has marked a step forward. The minister in charge of the department is to be congratulated on the fact that he has some new officials who seem to have a vision of what is needed. After some years of protest, a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate was finally set up to make a study of this problem. It was not a royal commission as we had hoped. I was disappointed that, after the committee met, it did not see fit to invite Indians to send representatives who could sit on the committee and give us some evidence of actual conditions of life on the reserve and what opportunities they have. After all, people living on these reserves under the Indian agents and under the control as they have it to-day could give us the best information. As proof of my contention that the Indians can give us the best information, on August 6 last we had before us an Indian. His story is of great interest and should be an eye-opener to the Canadian people. This Indian has gone so far and has made such a success of his life because twenty-five years ago he made up his mind to escape from the Indian reserve and controls. He made a living for himself. He joined the army in the two wars and rose to the highly important position of being a brigadier in the Canadian army. As I say, he appeared before the committee, and I shall put on the record one or two things which he said which were particularly revealing.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): They are already on the record.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They should be on the record here; the members of this committee should have them. He told how his father started out on the Indian reserve at Brantford. His father was a carpenter, an industrious man who worked his way up. He obtained some contracts and worked in the Indian department on his own reserve. He said:

> Therefore whenever he was awarded a contract, it was necessary for him to make an arrangement with a Brantford city merchant, through the Indian agent, to supply him with materials and cash for his work, to be paid back when the cheque came through, as it eventually did, in payment for the completed job.

He was talking about building a bridge on the reserve. He said:

> During the summer of 1911 or 1912 he got a larger contract than usual, for building a reinforced concrete bridge which took some two or three months to complete. In due course the work was done. The cheque came along. The accounting was made with the merchant showing that my father had a balance due him of $1,600. The cheque was endorsed, and when he called for his money a day or so later, he was given $1,100 only, with the explanation from the agent that somewhere a mistake had been made. When he demanded to be shown where the mistake was he was put off, time after time, and never was shown to the time of his death. To get contracts, you have to do what is commonly known as "play ball" with the Indian agents. In those days, although the council of the Six Nations awarded the contract, the agent had to approve and recommend it to the then department before it was finally granted by them. I am not at this late date accusing the agent of theft. I intend only to show how some agents disregard the obligations which they should have towards the people they are expected to instruct and guide.

Then he goes on to show how he was denied an education, and although the Six Nations themselves passed resolutions asking the government to grant money for the education of these men, it was turned down. He went to the department and asked why they turned down the request of the Six Nations Indians themselves to spend some of their own money in educating these men. He was surprised to get their answer which was as follows:

> It is no use sending you Indians to school, you just go back to the reserve anyway.

He served in the army, went back to the reserve, got some education and started teaching school there. He got some land under the soldier settlement board of the first great war and found that he would not be allowed to rent this land and continue with his work of teaching, in spite of the fact that he had been given the assurance that he would be allowed to do so. He found that his job was taken away from him. He then proceeded to tell the story of his whole life. Finally, in despair he became so angered at the Indian agent—he was so badly treated—that he decided to get away. This man was particularly anxious that the department should do something about their conduct toward the Indians in order to remove the antagonism which existed amongst many of the old people toward the administration.

There is also the efforts of the Indians themselves. Another representative of the Indians was a man by the name of Andrew Paul, who is the chairman or president of some North American Indian brotherhood. He appeared before the committee. He was chosen by the Indians to protest against the way they have been treated. Probably the North American Indian brotherhood was not constitutionally organized. There are difficulties in their organization, but it was the best the Indians could do. I do not think he himself had done very much in the way of preparing his work, and his evidence before the committee was not as good as that of the brigadier. At any rate it showed the efforts of the Indians themselves to get redress for their wrongs.

Generally speaking, the committee has done a great deal of good. It has done a great deal toward focusing attention on a serious problem in Canada. It has revealed serious conditions and has given a great deal of hope to these frustrated people. It has given facts and figures which should be of great help to hon. members in dealing with the problem of how the Canadian people are to treat their red brothers.

The committee soon realized what a great job there was to be done, particularly when they started to investigate some of the treaties and the problems of the Indians as a whole as they exist from coast to coast among the different Indians. That was particularly true of some of the Indians in certain areas who are not so well advanced or so well able to take care of themselves, or are so progressively minded as the Indians on the Mohawk Indian reserve at Brantford or the Indians on the Caughnawaga reserve south of Montreal. This is also true of the Indians of the northwest territories in the far north.

The committee tabled its report in the house. I think all members were in hearty agreement with every clause. The first recommendation was that members of the committee should voluntarily visit, during the coming recess, such Indians reserves as are in or near their division or constituency.

The second recommendation was an important one and reads as follows:

> That at least ten members of your special joint committee be empowered by order in council as a commission to sit at such times as the said commission shall decide at various places in the maritime provinces and eastern Quebec for the purpose of continuing the inquiry into and reporting upon all those matters mentioned in your order of reference...

The second part of the second recommendation was:

> That the members of your committee be empowered by order in council to sit in Ottawa as a commission during the two weeks immediately prior to the opening of the next session of parliament, for the purpose of continuing the inquiry into and reporting upon all those matters mentioned...

This recommendation empowered us to hear evidence from the Indians and to learn of conditions among the Indians in Canada.

In order to deal further with the matter, they recommended that a small inter-departmental committee be set up to survey and report to the next committee with regard to that particular subject matter.

Recommendation No. 5 is that the director of the Indian Affairs branch, in conjunction with the civil service commission, take immediate steps to fill such vacant key posts as Indian agents and such other vacancies in Indian Affairs branch which in the public interest must be filled forthwith.

Then the committee recommends also that the Indian Affairs branch immediately undertake the drafting of plans, first, for the construction of such additional accommodation as is necessary to relieve the present overcrowding in certain Indian day schools and, second, to provide for the construction of such other Indian day schools as, in the opinion of the said branch, are needed.

This report was concurred in by this house, and I am sure the members of the committee would like to know whether it is the intention of the department to implement these recommendations. The committee was unanimous in its decision that this work must be continued at all costs, and even with the short time between sessions they felt that the work should be carried on them. If conditions across the whole country are to be studied, at least two years more work will have to be done. I am sure that the minister will have the support of all members of that committee and most members in the house in carrying on that work.

There are a number of things which the Indian organizations across Canada have demanded in connection with the Indian Act which this committee is studying. It was asked that a commission be set up to get actual data on conditions, and they were emphatic that there should be Indian representation on that committee, that there should be a complete revision and study of the Indian treaties and that the federal government should be asked to take care of Indians seventy years of age and over in the same way that their white brothers are cared for.

They also requested that the Indian Act be so amended that no decision affecting the welfare of the Indians could be made without the consent of the Indian band. This would cover such matters as membership in the band, training and so on. They asked for properly equipped and staffed day schools and that assistance be granted to indigent, ill and disabled Indians. They asked also that steps be taken immediately to improve the terrible health conditions that exist across Canada.

I think the committee will approve the general steps taken by the department. The Indians are only too anxious to do what they can in bringing about a greater assimilation. They want to work along with their white brothers. All they are asking is a fair deal, the right to the pursuit of happiness, the right to make a living for themselves and the right to make the contribution of which they are capable. There is a new hope among these Indians and it is up to us to see that those hopes are not frustrated.

Mr. WARREN: I doubt if I would have been making this speech had it not been that one morning I looked out of my office window and saw a delegation of Indians coming up to the House of Commons. I was interested enough to visit the railway committee room and listen in for a time on the interviews. I am not going to repeat the doleful song of the hon. member for Yorkton. He has lived up to his record in connection with this subject as well as with others. I am going to tell a bright story about the Indians.

I was elected in the spring of 1937 and I commenced getting complaints from around my riding. I got complaints from the Indian reserve at Golden Lake. I visited that reserve on a number of occasions and found that conditions were not too happy. I went to the department and made some suggestions. These Indians are located on poor land, but I suggested that this land be torn up even if the department had to purchase a tractor and other mechanized equipment to do this. After I listened to the proceedings in the railway committee room and heard some of the complaints made about the treatment of Indians in Canada, I took occasion to run up one evening to this reserve. Although it was a hurried trip, I was able to pick up a few things which were quite enlightening as to what can be accomplished by the Indians in the way of helping themselves.

I understand it was a Mr. Morris in the department who was largely responsible for what has been done there. The department did not accept my suggestion about buying a tractor but they did buy some good horses. These were not little, scrubby horses that were not able to pull a wheelbarrow; they were well-matched teams with proper harness. These horses were put in the hands of a man who knew how to handle them, who knew how to care for them, who knew how to shoe them, who knew how to keep their harness in good shape. The department paid this man a moderate sum per month to take care of these horses and the chickens and hogs that they had.

The result was that before very long they were able to tear up a few acres here and a few acres a mile or so away. They picked out the best land and they went to work in a cooperative way. We hear talk about Indian agents who are dictators, but the agent there is just the opposite. This man would not think of saying a cross word to an Indian. When they go to plant potatoes he does not stand around and watch the men and women do the work; he picks up a pail and goes along with them. The result of all this has been that, instead of importing almost 100 per cent of the food they need, they are practically self-supporting. A marvellous transformation has taken place in that reserve.

They built a community pit. During the season the Indians come to the pit once a week, and the Indian agent is there to hand them out their allotment of the different vegetables that have been grown. They can grow anything at all. The land is poor, but there is plenty of it and it is no poorer than other land that has raised large families. They get their supplies of vegetables from the community pit. There is one thing about our Indians; they will not take any more than they require.

Then they began to bring in day-old chicks. These chicks are kept until they are large enough to be shipped to other reserves, even as far away as the one at Moosonee. This means that Indians on these outlying reserves now have hens. Indians who never before tasted hens' eggs now have their own little flock of hens around their doors, and their own eggs. They raise their own hogs and keep a number of brood sows. These hogs are distributed among the Indians as they require them.

In the earlier days, when one would drive through that reserve, he would never see a supply of wood in front of an Indian's home, although he might see a few green poles. When I was up there this summer I saw in front of every home a large pile of dry wood. They get together and cut their wood, and by working together, sawing it and splitting it, they have a plentiful supply of dry wood for the winter months, rather than a hand-to-mouth supply of green wood.

After they have shipped their pullets to the outlying reserves, the roosters are left to handle. The hon. member for Yorkton has talked about the government taking care of the aged and the ill. But the Indians in the reserve in Renfrew North are not asking anyone to take care of their aged or ill. They keep those roosters until the weather gets cold. Then they kill and freeze them, and after they are stored they are ready to be handed out to the aged and the ill.

They ask no one to take care of their sick. They work cooperatively and take turns sitting with any sick persons night after night. They have organized a homemakers' club. A lady named Mrs. LaValle, who, I believe, is one of the finest citizens to be found in any county, has taken responsibility in this matter. Through the operations of the homemakers' club the clothing is sent to the Indian reserve. Mrs. LaValle, as president, gets the ladies together, and any clothing that is sent in is transformed into clothing for the children. In this way they are warmly clothed and well clad, without any great effort on the part of anyone.

Then, in these years of transformation numerous new homes have been going up. Instead of being content to live in shacks, many of the Indians are building themselves fine homes. These are not too expensive, because they cut the timber on the reserve, take it to the sawmill to have it sawed, and do the building operations themselves. The result is that they are building good homes.

It is interesting to point out that the Indians in this reserve went up the river and there secured a discarded lumber camp. They had to cut it in two to get it across the railway tracks; but, after considerable difficulty, they brought it down the river, with the result that, when I was there, they were just putting the finishing touches on a fine community hall, and that right in the Indian reserve.

A new industry is being established on that reserve in the form of a sawmill and planing mill. One of the regulations is that Indians on the reserve get a preference in the matter of labour.

Perhaps one of the most interesting advances made by those Indians is that they have gone in for the raising of goats. They developed breeding stock, although not so much for themselves, because they have a supply of milk from the dairies, if they want to avail themselves of it. However, they are raising goats and shipping them to all the reserves across Canada. Indeed, some of them may reach the Indians in Yorkton constituency. These goats are taken, at times, by the nomad Indians who get into their boats in the spring of the year, camping here and there as they choose. They will tie the legs of a goat and put it into a boat. As they proceed, the goat finds no difficulty in securing fodder, and in return the Indians have a supply of milk.

We hear much complaint about tuberculosis among the Indians, and I have no reason to doubt the reports. We were troubled with it in the Renfrew North reserve. I believe there were half a dozen cases among the Indians in that reserve, but when they started to keep goats there were no new cases reported. It seems to me that is proof—and I am sure there is other proof available—that goats' milk is at least a preventive of tuberculosis.

Large quantities of hay are required to feed their goats. They do not depend altogether on what they can grow on their reserve. If they have not enough there they go out into the neighbouring country and buy the hay as it stands. With their mowing machines, their wagons and horses they cut the hay, buy it at a moderate price and bring it to the reserve. In this way they save possibly $400 or $500 in a year.

One-fifth of the population of that reserve entered the armed forces and made a fine record for themselves. That is a most creditable showing.

The hon. member for Yorkton referred to training. Let me tell him that the training on the reserve in Renfrew North is becoming inadequate, owing to the fact that they are so anxious to go to school and to keep their children at school. The result has been that they have to build a new schoolhouse this year, or double the present accommodation and add a new teacher.

If the hon. member for Yorkton feels like complaining about the Indians I would suggest that he visit the reserve in Renfrew North and observe the happy faces and the general health of the Indians there.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): There would be no political value in that, at all.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You should travel across the rest of Canada.

Mr. WARREN: Following the introduction of family allowances, it was found that they did not want to keep their children out of school, or to remove them from school until they had reached sixteen years of age, because, by so doing, they would be losing that amount of money. That is one of the benefits family allowances have brought to that district.

I am not greatly concerned about the political value of the Indian reserve, but I know that one derives a pleasant feeling when he sees the change which has taken place. If the hon. member for Yorkton were to ask one of the officials in the department I think he would be told that, prior to the transformation I have been talking about, that reserve was one of the worst spots in Canada. However, this change has been brought about by work, by finding people who will help the Indians and work with them, and through cooperation having them work together. I doubt if you could find a happier community in the Dominion of Canada than the fine Indians we have on the Indian reserve at Golden lake.

Mrs. STRUM: I was very much interested to hear the fine report of the hon. member for Renfrew North on the reserves he has visited. I think it proves several things, one being that given a chance, Indians are people and capable of improving their own conditions if they are given intelligent leadership. That is all that we in this group have ever asked for the Indians, that we remove the stigma of colour, just as we ask that the colour stigma be removed from the black man because his skin is black, or from the Chinese because his skin is yellow, or that the stigma be removed from woman just because she is born a female. We recognize that these are people and that, as people, they have basic human rights.

It is interesting to know that the family allowance has had a reflection in better school attendance. If we gave the Indians the old age pension, more of them might live to be seventy. I do not think the hon. member's idea of old age security agrees with mine. If all I get when I get to be seventy is some frozen roosters, I do not want to live to be seventy, and I want chicken before I am seventy. The roosters are a good thing for children and middle-aged people too. Again I do not think they are old age security.

Mr. WARREN: When I get to be seventy I should like some chicken soup.

Mrs. STRUM: I hope the hon. member will be on a reserve too if old age pensions are still withheld from the Indians. It is a shame and disgrace that we should withhold the old age pension from any Canadian, most of all from the first and original Canadians in this country who should have first claim on it. I am reminded of the story I heard not long ago of an Indian who was taken to Hollywood and, after he was shown its wonders, the director said to him, "How do you like our lay-out?". The Indian replied, "How do you like our country?" Some of us seem to forget that this land was the original birthright of the Indian. We have taken from him all but the poorest land, and we insist that dozens of Indian families live on a very small acreage that no white man would attempt to use as a basis for a family farm. I have many Indians in my constituency. I not only visit them but I visit the Indians across the river in the constituency of the Minister of Agriculture, and they are not any better off than mine, because too many Indian families are trying to exist on a very small and poor hilly valley where the arable land is extremely limited and the equipment very poor. A white man would not attempt to live in a community where one binder was shared with forty families.

I was interested in what the hon. member said about horses. I like horses too and I should expect the Indians would, but I would hate to have to share a team of horses with thirty families, because none of us would have the use of the horses for a sufficient number of days to be of any use.

I think our whole approach to this problem is wrong, but any time that I hear of an experiment which has succeeded I am glad of it. I hope we shall have a change of attitude and regard these people as capable of intelligence and integrity and that we shall give them a chance to exercise it.

I had the pleasure of listening to Brigadier Martin over the air last week. He made an excellent speech and said the very same things that the hon. member for Yorkton has said. He said this too, "We do not expect to turn into white men but we are capable of becoming good Indians." I think truer words were never spoken. I wish the minister would see fit to put education into the hands of the province because, by keeping it under the jurisdiction of the federal government, you rob yourself of the best educators in every province. The teachers now are organized. They pay into a superannuation fund and at a certain age they enjoy retirement and superannuation benefits. But if they go to teach in an Indian school they lose those years and get no credit for them, so that the good teachers will not teach on your reserves, because that destroys their superannuation continuity and means that they lose so many years out of their teaching life. I think we might well make an arrangement with the provinces whereby we would spend the money we now spend on education, in grants-in-aid on a per capita basis, and put into the hands of the provincial governments the administration of education not only for white children but for Indian children. I think we would have new standards of education in our schools and there would be more people like Brigadier Martin coming out of them, individuals in a position to give capable leadership to their own people. Brigadier Martin is an example of the sort of thing that happens when you expose intelligence to the process of education. We should have several of Brigadier Martin's kind in this house representing the Indian people. I hope the day is not far distant when Indians will elect Indians to speak for them and represent them in this house as they now do in New Zealand—where four Maoris sit in the New Zealand house and one of them is always in the cabinet because of a statutory provision to that effect. Sometimes the Maori has sat in the cabinet without portfolio, but one of the best ministers of health that New Zealand has ever produced was a Maori. I think people of the calibre of Brigadier Martin could very well sit in this house with members like you and me.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that the only dental care the Indians are allowed is to have a tooth extracted; there is no dental treatment given. I think that is why so many Indian children and adults, when they reach twenty or twenty-five years of age have no teeth at all.

Mr. GLEN: Prior to the transfer of the health of Indians to the Department of Health and Welfare there were dental clinics in many of the reserves throughout the country, perhaps not to the extent one might desire, but still there was that endeavour made.

Mr. FRASER: Are there dental clinics now on all the reserves?

Mr. GLEN: I do not know what the programme of the Department of Health and Welfare is. That inquiry should really be addressed to it.

Mr. FRASER: That is now entirely under the Department of Health and Welfare?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: And not under the Indian Affairs branch?

Mr. GLEN: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I asked whether it is the intention of the department to carry out the recommendation of the committee and have some body carry on the investigation of affairs among the Indians between the sessions of parliament.

Mr. GLEN: The recommendation was made and I shall endeavour to further it as far as I can. We shall have a commission set up in order that the evidence of those in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the eastern part of Quebec can be taken. I do not wish to enter into anything that has been said to-night by hon. members, because I think the matters they have discussed are matters that should come before the committee and anything I might say now might be considered as prejudging what the committee would do. Interest in the Indians has been created by the sittings of the joint committee, and it is hoped that the Indians will ultimately take their place in the life of Canada that we would expect them to do. I think the remarks that have been made to-night can be of value so far as the welfare of the Indians is concerned. We shall hope that the committee will be constituted early in the next session, in order to carry out this work and to take care of these problems which we all know of and which we are all seeking to remedy. We trust that, with the aid of the Indian affairs committee, solutions will be found.

182. Indian education, $1,046,241.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In spite of what the hon. member for Renfrew North said about the rosy picture of the training and welfare of Indians across Canada. I find that, while there are 130,000 Indians in the country, our education and training of these people take care of only about 16,000. Of this number enrolled, only 883 reach grade 7, 324 reach grade 8, and seventy-one reach grade 9. I notice that in three of the provinces there are no grade 9 students. Has the department facilities for training these children, and what is the present condition with regard to school accommodation?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. gentleman was inquiring regarding grade 9 students. Provision is being made for grade 9 scholarships of which Indian children may take advantage.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But there are no facilities for teaching grade 9 in the maritime provinces at the present time?

Mr. GLEN: There are.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But there are no students in grade 9, according to the last departmental report.

Mr. GLEN: In the new consolidated schools which are being built in the maritimes there will be provision for grade 9 students.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But there is none now?

Mr. GLEN: At the moment there is one school.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the department made application to War Assets Corporation for equipment and material to equip schools and assist in the building of schools, and are any schools now getting material from War Assets Corporation? I am thinking of material such as heating units, lantern slides, motion-picture equipment and other articles that can be used for education purposes among the Indians.

Mr. GLEN: The director informs me that they have been constantly in touch with War Assets Corporation and have been successful in getting a good deal of material.

185. Grant to provide additional services to Indians of British Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I had intended to bring up several points as regards Indians in my section of the country, but owing to the committee being in session I will wait and see what it brings forth. However, I have one complaint which has come to my attention in the last day or so. It is from the Glenvowel corps of the Salvation Army, that has to do with Indians on the reserve in the Kispiox valley, just outside Hazelton. One mile of road is on the Indian reserve and connects it with the Kispiox valley road, and the Indian office at Hazelton has been trying without success for the last two years to get that road repaired. The taxis refuse to go into it, and as I know the taxicab drivers in that part of the country, it must be in a terrible condition.

Mr. GLEN: Is the road on the reserve?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It is the reserve in the Kispiox valley.

Mr. GLEN: Is the road in the reserve?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: According to the provincial authorities, the road is a federal matter, and the Indian office has been trying through the department to get it fixed. The Salvation Army car was broken down there and it has cost them $120 already this year for repairs. Last year they had to pack a sick child out in their arms because of the impassable condition of the road, and I would think the minister, being informed of these conditions, would do something to help them out.

Mr. GLEN: I shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. GLEN: Item 762 of the lands, parks and forests branch was stood over because the leader of the opposition wished to make some comments on it, Mr. Chairman. Will you please call that number now?

Lands, Parks and Forests branch—National Parks bureau—
762. National parks and historic sites services —further amount required, $21,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not ask that this item be held over in order that I might make comments upon it. I asked rather that it should stand over in order that I might ask the minister to explain, in not too elaborate detail, the administration of the lumber resources of some of these national parks, and what the government is doing to prevent flood damage arising from streams running out of these parks. In order to let the committee and the minister understand my problem, let me say this:

When the three prairie provinces became provinces, forty-one years ago, in 1905, their resources were retained by the dominion government. In 1930, I think it was, the resources were returned to the provinces, and for the last sixteen years have been under provincial jurisdiction. In the province of Manitoba one section of these resources, the land area now called the Riding Mountain national park, was turned over to the administration of the dominion government for the purpose of making it a national park. The resources, including this park, are now owned by the province. But this park is completely turned over for administrative purposes to the dominion, on an undertaking by the dominion that it would establish there and maintain a national park. I suppose it is from ten to thirty miles wide and perhaps 100 miles or more long: these are not the exact boundaries but approximately. This park is an elevated section of the province in the western central part of southern Manitoba. The ground is undulating and covered with trees. Because of its elevation, it is subject to late spring and early fall frosts. This combination of conditions prompted the government to make it first into a forest reserve and now into a national park.

The people adjoining the area are interested in two things, among others. They are interested in getting some of the surplus lumber from the park for purposes of build- and construction and bridge construction and so on. I want to ask the minister what the government's policy—perhaps his policy is the same for the other parks—is with respect to making the lumber in that park available, because now the people adjoining the area find it difficult to get lumber at all, and if they can get it from the park, and if they can get it in rather larger quantities than before, a good community service will have been rendered.

The other point I want to ask the minister about is this. Because of the large extent of that area, and because it is elevated, perhaps about twice as high above sea level as the ordinary farm lands of Manitoba, and because during the last half century some of the trees have been removed and the beavers have nearly all been destroyed—beavers which built dams that held back the streams—the result now is that in the spring the waters rush down the streams rapidly, carrying silt and filling up the ditches in the farming communities below and causing serious flood damage. The farmers in the municipalities just out from the foothills of these mountains have not only had that added burden put upon them; but, as a result of these floods, their crops have in some years been partly and in other years largely destroyed. It is possible the minister may have outlined his policy on these matters when I was not here, and I do not want him to take up time in repeating what he may have already said with respect to the preservation of timber and making it available to the people adjoining the reserves. But I should like to know what the government is doing to avoid the recurring damage year after year from these mountain streams which rush down carrying silt and filling the ditches which the people have gone to great expense to dig, thus delaying the time of seeding and often damaging and sometimes destroying the growing crops.

To bring the matter more specifically to the minister's attention, here is a typical request from a municipality with reference to lumber. I quote:

Owing to the scarcity of lumber it is impossible to repair municipal bridges as well as necessary repairs to other buildings, therefore we request that the amount of lumber allowed on timber limits in the Riding Mountain national park be increased and also that the area where cutting is permitted be enlarged.

That is a specific request, and the minister can say whether he can grant it or not, whether his policy will permit larger amounts of lumber to each permittee, or whether he can extend the area where lumber is being cut. This is typical of the problems of the farmers and the requests from those out on the farm land below the mountains. This is the area where their crops, for forty years to my knowledge, have been frequently damaged because of surplus water running from this elevated section of country. I quote again from one of these representations from municipalities with respect to flood damage:

> Our main trouble is the drainage maintenance. As you know, spring thaw and heavy June rains rush down from Riding Mountain carrying silt and depositing it on the low land, filling ditches, which means we have to be continually dredging. The cost is more than the municipality can bear.

From those two brief statements and from other requests, I think the minister will see what it is that I should like him to tell us—what his policy is with respect to making more lumber in that area available to farmers in the adjoining communities, and what the government is doing to lessen the damage that is done every spring by these flood waters rushing down and damaging crops.

Mr. GLEN: The leader of the opposition has asked me two questions, one with regard to the permits for cutting timber. The practice in the Riding Mountain park is this. A survey was made by officers of all timber in the park, and that survey shows what was old and what was new, what could be cut and what should be left. That survey is in the hands of the superintendent of the park; all permits that are issued are issued only for that portion of the forest which can be cut, and it is given to those in the immediate neighbourhood. When the hon. member speaks of preserving the parks, one of the greatest means of preservation is, of course, the timber in it, and therefore it is strictly looked after to see that the park is not denuded of that which makes it so beautiful in itself. Permits are given to those in the surrounding areas who are able to go and get their lumber. That is the policy of the department.

With regard to the flow and control of water from Riding Mountain, the hon. member for Dauphin has also been communicating with me, interested through the municipalities adjoining, who are suffering in consequence. It has been the subject of investigation by the engineers of the department, and the province of Manitoba is extremely interested also, with the result that the premier of that province, Mr. Garson, communicated with me, indicating what was happening and expressing the hope that something might be done as a joint effort between ourselves and the province. I had a letter from Mr. Garson on July 5, in which he makes this statement:

> My suggestion would be that the P.F.R.A. be requested to proceed with the construction of the proposed reservoirs and experimental check dams in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of December 13, 1945; that your department provide the necessary dumping grounds as recommended in the report (which lands may subsequently be included within the boundaries of the Riding Mountain park); and that the province, in conjunction with interested municipalities, undertake the work of rehabilitating existing ditches as well as providing such additional ditches as may be required to carry the face water from the dumping grounds to a proper outlet. If you agree with the general suggestions contained in the preceding paragraph, I would further suggest that an early joint dominion-provincial survey be undertaken at the earliest possible date.

We had our officers in before this matter had been brought up by the hon. member for Dauphin or the leader of the opposition and they were making a survey, but on receipt of Premier Garson's letter we have now sent an officer with instructions to make a survey of the park and to advise as to what should be done to remedy the condition now existing. He will get in contact with the officials of the province of Manitoba, and together they may make recommendations for alleviating and controlling the waters that are flowing down and damaging surrounding farm property. That report, I hope, we shall receive very soon. I wish to have it clearly understood that I am just as anxious to have that done as the hon. member for Dauphin or the leader of the opposition. I hope I shall have the report shortly and, in conjunction with the province, have something done to rectify what is certainly a grave difficulty in the way of farming around that country.

Mr. BRACKEN: From what the minister has said, apparently it is the policy of the department to develop the forestry resources of that park to the maximum extent and allow cutting each year of only an amount equal to the annual increment.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: And that is done by issuing permits chiefly to citizens in adjoining territory.

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister say whether the amount of lumber allowed on the permits can be increased or not? That is the request. Can he say whether the area to be cut can be increased or not?

Mr. GLEN: The budget will vary every year. Under the survey, the quantity of timber which can be cut and which is becoming mature as the years go on will vary every year.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have asked a specific question for the present year. They are short of lumber, and they ask the question. I am not pressing the minister to state other than his policy. I want only an answer. A certain amount of lumber is allowed on the permits. Can that amount be increased beyond what it has been, or can the area to be cut over this year be made larger?

Mr. GLEN: Not this year.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister's answer then is, no.

With respect to flood control plans, what the minister says is that they are investigating in cooperation with the provincial government authorities. From that I take it that the government has no plans now for lessening the damage from floods coming off these mountains.

Mr. GLEN: The reason we have sent the engineers there is to advise us on what to do. Naturally we have no plans until we get the advice of the engineers.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is sixteen years—no, less than that—since the dominion government took over this park. All I want to know is what are the facts. The minister says they are studying the question, but they have no plans at the moment for lessening the flood damage.

Mr. GLEN: So far as I am concerned this is the first time that any complaint has ever been made of the water flow of the Riding mountain. The matter has been investigated under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and, as I say, we are now sending our engineers there in order that they may consult with the province. The hon. gentleman asks if there are any plans. There are no plans until we know what the engineers will suggest or advise should be done. When we receive that we shall act accordingly.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is not a matter of complaint; it is just a statement of conditions. I am surprised that the minister says this is the first time that a complaint—

Mr. GLEN: That I have had one.

Mr. BRACKEN: —has been made, if he chooses to use that term, because to my knowledge it has been referred to the department over a considerable period.

Mr. GLEN: I said, to my knowledge.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. BRACKEN: At the moment I am not seeking to criticize the minister. I just want the responsible—

Mr. GLEN: What I said was, so far as I was concerned that is the first intimation I have had that a request was made.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like, then, to take this opportunity of emphasizing to the minister and to the department that there is a serious problem in that drainage area below Riding mountain in Manitoba. How much of it is the responsibility of the dominion government and how much the responsibility of the province and of the people on the land itself is a question; but whatever the responsibilities of the federal authorities are, the dominion government should assume them and assume them quickly, because every year tremendous losses occur—losses in the prevention or delay in the seeding of fertile land and in the spoiling of crops which have already been sown, when these spring torrents come down these little streams and spill out over the cropped land. Since the government has no plans for doing anything now, I urge that they get out some plans at the earliest possible time; otherwise large crop losses will continue. The opportunity faces the government to help prevent these losses. There will be no criticism, but every credit will be given to the department if it will undertake and carry out whatever the federal government responsibilities are in lessening that yearly damage.

Immigration branch—

186. Administration of the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, $218,866.

Mr. CROLL: May I say to the minister it is heartening to see that the vote has been considerably increased this year. I do not know whether he has made provision for sufficient money to carry him through. I had hoped that he would increase the vote even more than he did, and I am sure the committee would agree to it in order to ensure that he had sufficient money to carry out fairly bold plans.

However, I rose to remind him and the government that immigration in this country is still a front-page topic and will remain so until such time as we do something definite about it. There are no groups, or no organization or representative bodies, in fact very few individuals in this country, who do not think we need more people. We need them now. I do not suggest that the government is unmindful of the situation, but it is the government's responsibility to arrange the how and how many. The committee is well aware that the number of emigrants in Europe is not unlimited. In the main, those who survived were young people. These young people are needed by their own countries not only to rebuild but to repopulate them. At the present time we are merely nibbling at the problem, while other countries are stealing a march on us. Australia is up to her neck in emigrants from the British isles and Scandinavian countries. They have already made provision for some 70,000 this year, and 50,000 war orphans over a period of three years. Brazil is in the field for 250,000 from continental Europe, and so is the Argentine. I merely bring these facts to the attention of the committee to indicate that there is some hurry about this matter, because the best will likely be picked over.

Here we have a country with unlimited reserves and great potentialities, with an abundance of international good will, and yet for all purposes we are a land without people. It is well to realize that the first wave of immigrants who came to this country was for the expansive development of the country and entirely in the field of agricultural economy. It was an introduction of the people to the land and the land to the people. We are now ready for another wave, a second wave of immigrants for the intensive development of our resources, for the use of the country by the people and in order to be able to consolidate the industrial position which we now occupy as a result of the tremendous and agreeable job which we did during the war. Pessimists notwithstanding, I point out that there is a shortage and there will continue to be a shortage of construction workers, miners, people for the forests, agriculturists, domestics, and in almost any other walk of life in the country.

There is one aspect of this whole problem that we sometimes ignore, namely, the problem of emigration. As the committee well knows, we are suffering some cruel losses to the United States at the rate of 30,000 this year. This 30,000 is draining away our young and our trained. It is well for the committee to recall that from 1900 to 1945 some 5,000,000 immigrants came to this country. At the same time 3,500,000 left. An infinitesimal number went back to their own country; in the main the rest went to the United States. We seem to be a nation that is truly looking south for greater opportunities for recognition of our capabilities and for a larger material compensation. Too long we have been a feeder and a half-way house to the United States. We have our country here to build up. Our destiny is to be the front door to the world rather than the back door to another nation. We have to make Canada more attractive. We have to replace those whom we have lost. It is necessary that we consolidate our industrial market; we should increase our home markets and we should populate our unpopulated areas. We have established ourselves as the first of the middle powers, and we should try to hold that position.

I think, when we discussed this matter last, the minister told us that we had to look after the soldiers and their wives. Since then, we have had an announcement from the Department of National Defence that they will all be back by December 1. The minister also said that we were short of transports. That may be true, but at the present time I think it is we who are missing the boat, not the immigrants. I recall a statement made by the hon. member about transportation. I know I did not come over on a Queen or a Lady boat and it did not do me any harm. A great deal of transportation is now available in the Scandinavian countries, and I am reliably informed that ships from Denmark and Sweden are making trips across the ocean not fully loaded.

As far as administrative details are concerned, I think the department did an excellent job in arranging for inspectional services in connection with the 4,000 Polish soldiers in Italy. That was a quick and able job. These obstacles are gradually being removed, and I only repeat what I said before to the minister: What are we waiting for?

At the end of the war we had two opportunities. We had the opportunity to export our goods to the world and we had the opportunity to import people from other parts of the world. In some respects we have not taken advantage of these opportunities, and we shall have only ourselves to blame if we are failures in that respect. I am not going to burden the committee by repeating myself. So far, we have had an order in council providing for the entry of blood relatives. This was a humanitarian move on the part of the government and it was highly commendable, but the number of people who will be eligible to enter under that, plus the 4,000 Poles who will be coming here in October, constitutes merely a fleabite in the number of people we need in this country.

I do not think we differ as far as policy is concerned. There are three requisites for an immigration policy. First it should be planned, second it should have selective immigration and it should be digestible immigration. There is no question about that. I say to the minister that at the present time the country demands that we wrestle with this problem and we cannot deal with it by shooing it off. I ask the minister to plan boldly as quickly as possible in order that we may take advantage of the people who are available before other nations step into the field.

Mr. KIDD: Before the hon. member for Spadina took the floor I was going to ask the minister a question on this item, but first I think we should have something from the minister. Does the minister intend to make a statement on the immigration policy?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Mr. KIDD: Since we came here in March, immigration has come up on two occasions. The first was the citizenship bill when the minister made a statement about British subjects coming into Canada. The second occasion was on the orders of the day when the Minister of Justice, as leader of the government, tabled an order in council regarding the 4,000 Poles. I think we should have a statement.

In what I have to say I think I can more or less answer the hon. member for Spadina, particularly with regard to British immigrants. There is hardly an hon. member who, since coming to Ottawa, has not received letters from boys and their families overseas who want to come to Canada. Before the minister gets into any scheme of European immigration, I would advise him to think carefully. I am going to deal with this question from a purely local point of view.

At Collins Bay near Kingston there was a fleet air arm school. During the period of the war, nearly five thousand British boys studied there, in about one hundred classes of fifty each. The first ten or twelve of those classes were composed of boys from the best families in England, boys who had studied at the best universities and schools. During their stay in Canada, many of them married Canadian girls whom they took back home with them. Many of these boys now want to return to Canada with their wives. Within the last week I brought one case to the attention of the minister.

These boys are not Canadians; they are British subjects who have married Canadian girls. Many of the boys who were members of ground crews are the best of mechanics. I want to urge as strongly as I can that these boys be given immediate consideration. I will not enlarge upon the immigration policy, but hon. members know there is an old saying that it is better to have an empty house than a poor tenant. At the present time we should have selective immigration, and we should expect something from the minister.

[Mr. Croll.]

Mr. GLEN: I did intend to make a statement, but the hon. member for Spadina got ahead of me. I may be a little longer than eleven o'clock and I hope I shall be able to finish my statement. As the committee knows, the present regulations and law concerning immigration are quite clear and they have been referred to already this session. In addition to British subjects and United States citizens, the present regulations provide for the admission of, first, the wife or unmarried child under eighteen years of age of any person legally admitted to Canada who has sufficient means to maintain himself until employment is secured; second, an agriculturist having sufficient means to farm in Canada; third, the fiancee of an adult male legally admitted to and resident in Canada, who is in a position to receive, marry and care for his intended wife; fourth, a person, who, having entered Canada as a non-immigrant, enlisted in the Canadian armed forces and, having served in such forces, has been honourably discharged therefrom.

Alien immigrants other than United States citizens require to be in possession of a properly viséd passport, but by the order in council which I tabled on May 28 last, the door was opened and the following were admitted:

> The father or mother, the unmarried son or daughter eighteen years of age or over, the unmarried brother or sister, the orphan nephew or niece under sixteen years of age, of any person legally admitted to and resident in Canada who is in a position to receive and care for such relative. The term "orphan" means a child bereaved of both parents.

Then there was a provision made with regard to passports. These people could not obtain passports because they were stateless persons, and it was provided that it would be sufficient to have a travel document establishing the identity of the holder in the case of an immigrant who had been displaced from his country of origin as a result of the war and who was not in possession of a valid passport. That is the way we have it to-day. It was thought at the time that that extension was warranted, and I thought so too. But the first thing dealt with after the war was the transportation of our forces and their dependents from overseas, and it was felt that they should have a priority over others. That was done.

I recall to the committee, too, that during the war we had, I believe, about 4,000 refugees who came from Great Britain and other countries, and ultimately we gave them permanent landing. These persons, while here, proved to be very good citizens, and many of them had given a fine contribution to our war effort. These persons—the exact number was about 3,900—have been given landings, after being investigated, and are now legally resident in Canada.

In addition to that, there are 4,000 Polish soldiers, the investigating officers for which are now on their way. I believe they are now in Italy making investigations with regard to these Polish soldiers to bring them to this country. They will be apportioned throughout the Dominion of Canada, according to the regulations laid down by the Department of Labour.

As to these 7,000 or 8,000 people—well, no one will say, in answer to the remarks by the hon. member for Spadina, that that is a very large contribution which Canada has made. But at all events it is, I believe, a positive indication of the regard Canada has in this question.

Then, when we come to the question of the rehabilitation of our own soldiers and their dependents, it will be remembered that the Minister of National Defence (Army) has said that there were about 12,000 to 13,000 soldiers yet to be returned. Their dependents are still over there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister say why these Polish soldiers were admitted?

Mr. GLEN: The reason was that we were making an effort to take in soldiers who would go on the land, and into agricultural pursuits. We had many requests, and there was quite an agitation with regard to the Polish soldiers. They had expressed their intention most freely, that they were not going back to Poland, and that they intended to look elsewhere. Canada was one of the places to which they would go.

Our soldiers and their dependents were the first obligation we had.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many still remain?

Mr. GLEN: Twelve thousand dependents, but my officials cannot tell me how many soldiers. But our first duty, of course, was to see that our soldiers were returned, as well as their dependents.

Now, with the passage of time, the numbers are decreasing. The soldiers are being brought here and rehabilitating themselves in the country. The numbers are lessening as the days go by.

There was another vexed question, namely the question of fiancees. Many of our young men are to-day anxious to have their fiancees come here. But priority was given first to the wives and children, rather than to the fiancees.

The whole question resolved itself into one of transportation. One hon. member spoke about the numbers in England who wanted to come. There is nothing to prevent their going to our office in London, being examined there and settlement conditions investigated in connection with coming to Canada, with the exception of that one thing, namely that they could not get transportation. This problem will always come up when we are dealing with this matter. The hon. member for Spadina mentioned shipping from the continent. There has been an indication given that the Scandinavian line are going to send some vessels, and also the Holland-American line. But these may convey only a very few of those who are on the continent now. We have there about 2,000 dependents and about 2,000 fiancees, and, in addition, there are 1,000 dependents of residents of Canada to be repatriated. They were there all during the war, are still there, and have no transportation.

Therefore, owing to this extreme shortage of vessels, I have had to say to all those who are asking to come to this country, "How are we going to do it? We have no method by which we, as a department, can give priority to anyone sailing to this country." They must, of themselves, find that sailing. But when it came to the question of an individual who was not a dependent and not a soldier, that person simply could not get passage in preference to those, and none of us would have wished to encourage them in the slightest degree.

On the other question with regard to the opening of the door for these other people in Europe, they were exactly in the same position. Some of them may have relatives in this country. Transportation in Europe today is in chaos; there is no method by which they can be transferred from one country to another in the manner in which they could prior to the war. There is the difficulty in connection with the exchanges between countries; there is the difficulty of travelling in any one country.

The question came up then, of course, with regard to our medical facilities which must be on hand before we can deal with these. We are in a position now whereby, if we can get accommodation on the continent with respect to offices, we can staff those offices and deal with them. We have, of course, to have the consent of the countries through which these immigrants must pass. At the present time we are reopening the Paris office and also the office at The Hague. Perhaps in Antwerp there may be some chance later, of also establishing an office there. So far as the Scandinavian countries are concerned, the only method by which it can be done is by sending officers there in order to investigate those who desire to come. At the present time the Department of External Affairs is dealing with the countries involved. They are seeking their permission and concurrence in order that we may open our offices there, and that the immigrants coming from those different countries can be funneled to those offices, inspected, and provision made for transportation to this country.

But that takes time. It is not likely that in the next two months there will be any degree of transportation of immigrants to this country from the continent. But I venture to say this, without even making a guess, that there are a great many in the British isles who are ready and willing to come, and whose settlement conditions are such that they could be accepted now, were it not for the fact that they cannot get transportation to come here.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. GLEN: May I be allowed to finish? I shall not be long. I should like to proceed, so that hon. members may have it on the record and discuss it to-morrow.

Then, repeatedly we have been asked throughout the country to formulate a policy. It has been suggested that that policy should be a large one, and one would think that it must be done overnight. The government is fully alive to the seriousness and magnitude of the immigration policy. I believe that the country generally is fully aware of that. When it is suggested in an editorial that there should be selective immigration, and in the next breath that there should be no discrimination, then I venture to say to those who are making the suggestions that I do not see how we can have selective immigration without discrimination. I should like to have the answer to that, because there have been many editorials. I have no complaints against them. I wish to have as many opinions as there are in order that a worthwhile policy may be evolved. The government is thoroughly seized of the fact that an immigration policy must necessarily be stated sooner or later, and a subcommittee of the cabinet has been formed. We have had that subcommittee established for some months, as well as an inter-departmental committee of high-ranking officers who have been engaged in studying different questions dealing with immigration, and who will of course, give us the benefit of their advice. That concerns domestic policy.

Then we have the refugee question. That is not purely Canadian; it is international in scope. We have a representative on the united nations organization which will be meeting in September. At that meeting consideration will be given to the question of refugees and the stateless persons of Europe, and as one of the united nations Canada will, I presume, be asked to take her share of these stateless persons and will have to assume her obligations as a member of the united nations. So that we are dealing with the matter as best we can. Anyone coming within the admissible classes who goes to our offices in England and passes the medical inspection can come here, provided that settlement conditions in this country are satisfactory and provided that they can get transportation.

I do not think there is anything I can add except that I hope in the near future we shall have some word with regard to the setting up of our offices in Europe and some idea of what we may plan in the way of government policy.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the minister made his whole statement?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, August 28, 1946

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

VISIT OF FIELD MARSHAL MONTGOMERY—NOON RECESS FROM 2 TO 4 P.M.

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery of Alamein is arriving for his visit to Ottawa at three o'clock this afternoon and proceeding immediately from the central station to parliament hill to meet the veterans. Several hon. members have told me that they felt it might be difficult to retain a quorum in the chamber while that ceremony was proceeding on parliament hill. I have no personal feeling in the matter, but if it is the desire of the house to extend the recess beyond the normal hour of three o'clock I shall be prepared to submit a motion to that effect.

Mr. MacNICOL: To four o'clock?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To four o'clock instead of three, unless hon. members feel that it will not inconvenience them to make sure that there is a quorum in the house from three to four o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would it be possible to extend this morning's sitting to two o'clock and reassemble at four? I do not think we should lose an hour at this stage of the session.

Mr. FRASER: Unless parliament intends to sit next week.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it appears to be the general desire of hon. members, I would move that the recess for the lunch hour be from two to four p.m. instead of from one to three p.m.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would it be better to have the afternoon session go from four to seven?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A dinner has been arranged for the field marshal at a time when it was felt that this house would not be sitting, and the arrangement has to be carried out. This means that those attending the dinner will have to leave town not later than seven o'clock. I think it would be very inconvenient if the house were to sit until seven. It is perhaps difficult to meet the wish of every hon. member, but it seems to me that it would meet the views of a large majority if we were to extend this morning's sitting until two o'clock and then not resume until four. I move accordingly.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I shall be glad to second the motion moved by the leader of the house, but on the distinct understanding that there will be enough government members here so that the government will not be defeated again to-day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. leader of the opposition gave such an undertaking to the Prime Minister before he left that there is no possibility of anything like that happening.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. WINKLER:

By provinces, how much has been advanced by loan by the Industrial Development Bank since its inception?

Mr. MAYHEW: The Industrial Development bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29 (1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month". This statement as at July 31, 1946, appeared in the Canada Gazette of August 24, 1946, and showed loans and investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $4,234,023.46.

In addition, section 29 (2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it". This return, tabled in the House of Commons on December 6, 1945, showed that on September 30, 1945, there were 80 authorized credits on the books of the bank totalling $3,198,050, of which $871,752 was outstanding as shown by the balance sheet.

The classification of loans and investments by provinces at September 30, 1945, was shown by this return as follows:

	Authorized	Outstanding
Prince Edward Island	$ —	$ —
Nova Scotia	115,000	—
New Brunswick	200,000	66,064
Quebec	1,052,500	459,912

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

FISH HATCHERIES—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many fish hatcheries are there in the maritime provinces?

2. Where is each of them located?

3. What did it cost to maintain and operate each of them last year?

COAL

AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLIES FOR COMING WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction. I regret that I have not been able to send him notice. Has there been any favourable change in the coal situation? I am swamped with wires from Toronto asking when people will be able to get coal for the coming winter.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The coal situation is no better. I shall be glad to make a statement to the house to-morrow. I think the public have been lulled into a sense of false security on the question of domestic coal, since supplies of Alberta coal are not being sold as rapidly as they should, considering the acute shortages of domestic coal. However, I will make a statement to-morrow. I thank my hon. friend for calling the attention of the house to the matter.

HOUSING

APARTMENTS—REGULATIONS AFFECTING TERMINATION OF TENANCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I have not been able to give the Acting Minister of Finance notice of the question I am about to ask, but perhaps he can take this as notice and answer later. I am appealed to by a multitude of people in my own riding who now occupy apartments. For some reason or other present tenants of apartments may be put out if some relative of the owner wishes to get into the apartment. The situation is shocking. Is there any possible relief in such cases?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I have forgotten what the regulation is in that respect, but I will take the question as notice and give an answer to-morrow.

EMERGENCY SHELTER COMMITMENTS AND DISBURSEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I promised, when my estimates were under discussion, to lay on the table a breakdown of emergency shelter commitments and disbursements as at August 27. There are no disbursements or commitments for municipalities in Manitoba and British Columbia. We are now in negotiation with the city of Winnipeg, but we have not advanced to the stage where we can give a figure for Manitoba. The same remarks apply to the province of British Columbia. I would however point out that the figures I am tabling do not include emergency shelter provided by the old hotel Vancouver, for which a separate vote was included in the estimates. In the matter of universities, conversations are taking place with the province of Saskatchewan and it is likely that we shall have a commitment in that province before long. The real problem is to get the municipalities to promote a sufficient quantity of emergency shelter to meet anticipated needs. So far as we are concerned we are trying to build a backlog against anticipated needs of this fall.

With the consent of the house I would ask that the table be printed in Hansard.

Emergency Shelter Administration

WHEAT

MEETING OF PREPARATORY COMMITTEE OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have not given notice of it and therefore do not expect him to answer it this morning. It has to do with the possibility of an international wheat agreement. Recent press reports indicate that the preparatory committee of the international wheat council is meeting in Washington at the present time. My questions are: (1) What is the object of the meeting? (2) How many nations are represented on the preparatory committee? (3) Who is Canada's representative at this meeting, if any, and (4) has the U.S.S.R. been invited to attend? I do not expect the minister to answer these questions to-day, but he can take this as notice, give the matter his consideration, and furnish the house with such information as he has at an early date.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can answer the first three questions to-day, but it would be better to accept this as notice and give the answer to-morrow or as soon as possible.

CANADIAN ARMY

STAFF CARS AT SOMERSET STREET BRIDGE, OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the space at Somerset bridge belongs to the defence department, or is it War Assets? That is where the army staff cars are parked.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I shall have to look into the question and give an answer later.

SUPPLY

STATEMENT OF MR. POULIOT—THE MINISTRY—BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Before the motion is carried, I have to deal with a most important matter. I read in one of the morning contemporaries that parliament should await Mr. King, and the editorial, after referring to reports that parliament may prorogue this week-end, goes on, "We don't think parliament should do anything of the sort", et cetera. It is an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of to-day. I notice that the Prime Minister has given an interview to the effect that all his ministers should be here upon his arrival. When I look at the treasury benches and see many vacant seats, I realize that our cabinet ministers have become ambassadors of good will at large in various countries of the world. The Postmaster General is going to South America; another minister is away from Ottawa; the Minister of Agriculture is in Copenhagen, the Minister of Veterans Affairs has fled to Scotland to count the numbers of men who have not returned home, and the Prime Minister is at sea, as we are, while the Minister of Finance—

Mr. KNOWLES: Speak for the Liberal party.

Mr. POULIOT: I speak for the whole house at the present time in saying that. The Minister of Finance enjoys the scenery of Switzerland and looks at the paintings of Mr. Churchill over there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why don't you go away?

Mr. POULIOT: Because it is my duty to be here. The Minister of Health is at the Paris conference and expects the translator to make him understand what is said there. The ministers who are here deserve our sympathy to the utmost.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We all deserve something right now.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell my hon. friend that if he interrupts me—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He will not be elected.

Mr. POULIOT: —he will no longer be called the Jean-François Pouliot of British Columbia and will run to defeat. By the way, it is always easy to heckle, but I have to speak of the sad position in which the House of Commons finds itself. It is not a matter for jokes. The other day when the members of the C.C.F. group were making their cases about labour matters I regretted very deeply that they were interrupted, because they are hard workers. I believe in freedom of speech, and when they have something to say they should be listened to. Those who do not want to listen to them have only to take the door or smoke outside the curtain. I say that in regard to all hecklers, because I certainly believe in freedom of speech, which is one of the guarantees of democracy in the country.

Now, sir, I wonder if this is what we call world government, to have the cabinet shelves empty and to have seats filled at UNO, UNRRA and all the other organizations of the world. For fifteen years I have suffered mental cruelty in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: In this sense, that there is not one measure which has been sponsored by the government which has entirely satisfied my mind. Even when the purpose was good, the legislation was half-baked. This year we have enlarged bureaucratic control immensely by piling Ossa upon Pelion, meaning that we have piled reams of paper on top of reams of paper, legislation on legislation. It does not mean any replacement of bureaucracy; it means more bureaucracy than ever, and more bureaucracy means more taxation. I wonder whether there is one member of parliament who is satisfied with this session. Everybody wants to go home. I feel the same way as my colleagues, but I want to go home with some accomplishment of which the House of Commons will be proud. If we go home and tell our constituents merely that the session has lasted from March until September, it will not satisfy them. If we tell them that we have passed legislation, such a quantity of legislation as was never passed before, they will say: What is the use? What the Canadian people want is order and good government. That is all they want. We cannot expect order in the country unless we have order within the government. To have order within the government we must have leadership. I say that with fervour and sincerity. I want to be just as proud of the government of my country as I was from the first time I was elected until 1930. Since then there has been a great change. No longer do we have democratic rule in the country. We have irresponsible rule from outside. I wonder whether there will be any change in the method of government, if a change of government should occur some time in the future.

The last election took place in June of last year. Is there one member of parliament who is satisfied with the work that he has accomplished during the session? I do not say that to depreciate my colleagues, whom I respect even when I disagree with them, and for whom I have admiration and sympathy; because the result which they achieve is far from the task which is imposed on them and from the sacrifices which they have to make to be true to the national duty of representing the people of Canada in the house.

It is unfortunate that so many ministers are away. It is most unfortunate because it puts a heavier burden on the shoulders of their colleagues who are acting ministers. In my view all the cabinet ministers, even those who are away, are able men. But I will tell you, sir, that in my view the House of Commons is a dense forest of cabinet timber—and not only within the ranks of the Liberal party, but also within the ranks of the official opposition and the other groups opposite. Members are not given the opportunity to show what they can do, because they are kept at work which keeps them very busy, which does not leave them the time or give them the opportunity to accomplish reforms which they desire to make in the public interest.

We have heard something about world government, world government for Canada. Are we for it? Is Canada to become a second Newfoundland to be looked after financially by those whom we have helped so much during the war? Sir, there was a pathetic moment in this house; when the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) left for overseas, that old gentleman, who has been in office longer than any other prime minister, was about to sail for Paris, who wished him godspeed? It was the leader of the official opposition; it was the leader of the C.C.F. group; it was the leader of the Social Credit group, but no one rose from this side of the house to extend greetings and good wishes to him. I went before the whole house to shake hands with him, to give him my personal good wishes. It was not for me to rise after the leaders, to speak in the same vein and to the same effect, although my wishes were sincere.

I will tell you more than that, Mr. Speaker. At a gathering of the Liberal party after the Prime Minister had said he had made up his mind to leave, that it was definite and that he would not reconsider it, I waited for a few moments, and then as I saw that nobody rose to say a word of appreciation to him, I did so, as an old member of the house, an old supporter of the party who had kept his independence intact and held it as a treasure. Those are facts. I find it pathetic that a man who has been the Santa Claus of so many people did not get a word of thanks from those who had been eating from his hand in the expectation of the fulfilment of some untold wish and desire; but, sir, that is human nature. There is a fact which is of the utmost importance. Nobody wished Mr. King to go; nobody dared to say that. We have too much respect and reverence for him. But Mr. King, as old man Simeon in his Nunc Dimittis, has said, "My task is completed. I desire to leave the leadership of the party to enjoy the last years of my life." A fair wish; a wish that is reasonable, because he has done his duty for so many years. His reward is obvious. He wants to enjoy the last years of his life in comfort and peace in his home, so as to meditate and write for the benefit of future generations.

Some people say Mr. King will have to stay in office, that we must await his return, and that parliament shall remain idle until he comes back. They say, "We must wait for him." I do not think Mr. King would agree with the editorial to which I referred just a moment ago. He is too big a man to think that he is more than parliament. How many times shall I have to repeat that parliament has power that reaches far above the government; because in my view, after having read authorities on constitutional law, the government is not at all more than parliament. It is just a committee of parliament. Therefore, sir, it belongs to us, members of the House of Commons, to make suggestions in these difficult times so that the ship of state will get out of the fog, and so that we may have clear vision of what we have to do for the benefit of the Canadian people.

It is impossible to make any decision, because decisions are not made by some of those who adorn the treasury benches. Most of the time decisions are made outside, by outsiders. Those decisions by outsiders are often to sabotage what has been done by those of us who are supposed to hold in our hands the destiny of this country.

Well, sir, I read a Canadian dispatch which appeared yesterday in all the papers. It was a dispatch respecting an interview given by the Prime Minister before leaving for Canada, on his way home. Everybody has read it. I could easily refer to it, but hon. members will know what it is about. But is there anyone who will suggest that Mr. Mackenzie King's glory would not have shone more if he had resigned three months ago, before leaving for Europe? If he had done so, anybody could have gone to Paris. They would not have achieved more success than Mr. King has achieved. But everybody would have said, "Oh, if Mr. King had been there he would have had a branch of the olive tree in his hand to settle all difficulties and all differences. It is most unfortunate that Mr. King resigned so early. He should have been there."

As a supporter of Mr. King I want his glory to remain intact. That is precisely the reason I regret so much the pressure that has been put upon him to prevent his doing what apparently he wanted to do, what the National Liberal Federation wanted to do immediately after the last election, in the summer of 1945, according to the statement made not long ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he said that the leadership of the Liberal party had been offered to him by someone of importance outside the house.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who was that man?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know; I never heard about it. I never am consulted, any more than the hon. member is.

Mr. BRADETTE: Nobody made any offer to the leader of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. POULIOT: I would take the word of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar just as much as I would the word of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I respect them both.

Mr. BRADETTE: On a question of privilege, there has been mention inside and outside the house with respect to a man prominent in Liberal circles approaching the leader of the C.C.F. party. No name has been given, and I should like to know what the name is. I believe the house is entitled to know that name, too.

Mr. POULIOT: I remember that a former president of the National Liberal Federation had said in Windsor a long time ago, before the election in 1935, that there was no difference between the C.C.F. and the Liberal party. And that is precisely why I was called by the party to Windsor to support the nomination of the late Hon. Norman McLarty, who later became secretary of state. I do not know whether it was the same gentleman who spoke to the leader of the C.C.F. group, because he was away when the conversation took place. But it could have been said by the National Liberal Federation, and it could have been said by Mr. Gordon Fogo, whom I object to as president of the liberal federation, because of his dealings with the Tories during the war. And, by the way, sir, I know my onions. When I state something I can give the evidence for what I am contending.

Well now, is it true that in this house—it is not necessary to go outside the house—there is no one who could slip into the shoes of the Prime Minister, when the duty of remaining leader of the house and Prime Minister against his own will is being imposed upon the present Prime Minister? I do not think so. I do not think it is fair to make a suggestion to the effect that Mr. King is the only man who can be prime minister of Canada, after he has been prime minister for twenty years.

I repeat it is not a matter of disrespect, but rather one of urgency and of national importance. And if I had not spoken on this motion, sir, I am sure the house would have given its consent to debate the matter on a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, as this one is.

As I am proud of my colleagues, as I appreciate all of them, and as I appreciate the ungrateful task they are performing in the house, I want them to leave Ottawa not with a sour mouth but with content in their hearts and satisfaction in their minds. I would want them to go home with the conviction that we are contributing together to put the country on its feet for a better future for all Canadians.

The other day I listened to a moving speech by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in which he said that party considerations did not affect him much. That is my position. I have been fighting for the Liberal party for a number of years because I expected reform. I have tried many ways to obtain reform, first by suggesting a union opposition composed of men of good will, before the three war ministers were out. Then I appealed to patriotism and to love of Canada, but without success. I appealed to liberal minded members of all parties of the house, leaving aside political labels, ignoring them; I appealed to their sense of duty, which is another form of patriotism; now I make a special appeal to all true reformers.

The question is to obtain reform in the government; the question is to go back to the old democratic rule of responsible government; the question is not to use abstractions, to curse and denounce abstractions. We will get nowhere with that. It has been an honour for a long time to be the Prime Minister of this country; it was an honour when life was easier, when taxation was less, when there were no labour difficulties, when people earned less money but when money had more purchasing power. The people were contented and satisfied with their lot.

I remember having seen prime ministers of Canada in coaches driven by fine horses parading through our cities, which were all decorated, and making fine speeches that got great applause. Now conditions are different. Social life is of no importance for those who govern this country. We have evidence of that in the fact that prior to the war there were receptions that we do not have any longer. I do not complain about it; I understand very well that cabinet ministers do not have the time to entertain members of parliament as they did before the war. What is important is not to listen to fine, moving speeches made to large crowds on special occasions by the right hon. Prime Minister of this country and the hon. gentlemen who are his cabinet ministers, et cetera, et cetera; what we have to do is to roll up our sleeves and work.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear hear; let us get at it.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly. This is all the more so because last week in the senate committee I heard the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Towers, declare that Canada can pay the tremendous debt we have—he seemed absorbed in his thoughts when he spoke those words—only with the sweat of our brow, with lots of luck and with plenty of time. Lots of luck provided that we come back to reality, provided that we put aside all dreamers, provided we give our confidence to men who have accomplished things, provided we give our confidence to realists and reformers.

I have never understood why in the world the Prime Minister holds so many portfolios. He is the Prime Minister of Canada, the first minister, which is the same thing. He is the President of the Privy Council. He is the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He is the leader of this house. It is an unusual situation that the minister whom he appointed to replace him as leader of the house should have gone away while the house is still sitting. He is the President of the Privy Council, and the President of the Privy Council is far away from the east block at the present time.

In my humble view, and in the view of my constituents and of several English and French speaking Canadians, in these crucial times through which we are passing the Prime Minister should be only the Prime Minister. He would not have enough time to head the Department of External Affairs. The foremost duty of the first minister of the land should be to supervise the departments and give them leadership and inspiration to rebuild and reconstruct this country. Is it impossible to find in this house a man who can fill that position in order to give the Prime Minister of Canada, whom I respect and whom I have defended, at times even against himself, a real rest when he has expressed so definitely his desire to get it?

It is the privilege of a Prime Minister to choose his colleagues in his cabinet. I know that, and I knew it when I was rebuked by the Prime Minister after I had said that Tom Moore should not be minister of labour. I expressed that pious wish, and I was at once rebuked by the Prime Minister, who told me to mind my own business. In fact Tom Moore was not appointed minister of labour, and although I had received the rebuke I had the satisfaction of winning my point.

I admit it is the privilege of the Prime Minister to choose those with whom he wants to surround himself in the council room. That is his business, but it is the duty of the house to make suggestions so that the best choice is made of his successor, not by the Prime Minister but by the party as far as the leader of the party is concerned, and by the house in order to find a leader of the house. Government exists only as long as it has the support of this house.

After major consideration and thought I have come to a conclusion which I offer through you, Mr. Speaker, to the House of Commons. We are starting a new era. The war has been left behind and we are starting a real post-war and peace era. There are many ungrateful tasks, and I sympathize with the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who has had to do things that were most unpleasant to him. But he did them from a sense of duty, he did them to be true to the dicta of his conscience and I admire him greatly for that. He enjoys the respect of all of us. When I think of all his colleagues I also have great admiration for them. Some of them are personal friends, and others deserve the consideration that they enjoy from all of us. I am sorry when I disagree with them on some matters. However, this is a free country and I appreciate the fact that I have never been canvassed in my office by any whip, by any minister or by any other Liberal member to change my views. The Liberal party is a party where freedom of thought is respected.

The war effort of Canada was referred to by Mr. Churchill in New York during the war as being a massive effort. He said that in the presence of the Prime Minister. I cannot forget that the main artisan of the Canadian war effort, the man who organized war production in the country, was a man who worked day and night for his country. I know of no man in this house, and I say this with due respect to my colleagues whom I respect and admire, who could have achieved the miracle accomplished during the war by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe). I have disagreed with him at times, especially in the early part of the war, but he and the able men whom he gathered around him deserved and got my admiration for the splendid task that they performed in those difficult times. In proportion to her population Canada has done more than any other country in the world for the war effort, and no one will say that the Minister of Reconstruction was not the main artisan of that magnificent and massive production.

The conclusion is obvious. The Prime Minister has said that he wants to go. It is absurd to force a gentleman who will reach his seventy-second birthday in a few months to stay at the helm of the ship of state any longer when he himself wants to go. I regret it, but that is his decision. But there is somebody to replace him, and I say this without deprecating the fine work done by all the colleagues of the Prime Minister. I think the man who should be in charge of reconstruction for peace should be the man who was in charge of our war production. He is a realist; he has the finest possible background to accomplish that task. I suggest that he should be prime minister, but only prime minister to supervise the work of his colleagues whom he will be free to choose.

It is easy for any hon. member to "slate" a cabinet. All one has to do is to take a sheet of paper and put names on it. But it would be unjust. It pertains to the Prime Minister to make his own choice and come before the house and have the support of the house for his government. When I look around, I would not be surprised if some of the ablest men—and they are many—in the other groups would be invited to join in the formation of such a cabinet, which would be a real peace cabinet. How can anyone go to other countries and lecture them on what they should do when there is disorder in this country? The first duty of the Prime Minister is to stay here. The first duty of the Prime Minister is to his country. Mr. King has realized it, and now he is on his way back to Canada; and are we waiting for word from him to decide what we have to do? Therefore, sir, my suggestion is that the house should comply with the wishes expressed so often by the Prime Minister of Canada,—and this is for his own glory—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the house the hon. gentleman is not limited to forty minutes.

An hon. MEMBER: Have we got to stand for this all day?

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he learn the rules of the house. Besides that, we could make a motion so that he be appointed to the senate after the formation of the new cabinet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I refer hon. gentlemen to Beauchesne, page 93, rule 219:

> A member speaking immediately after the minister has moved that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply or ways and means, may speak for more than forty minutes. He has that right whether he moves an amendment or not.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; and through you I will say to the house: Stop, look, and listen.

An hon. MEMBER: Have a heart.

Mr. POULIOT: What I am saying now is for the prompt expedition of the business of parliament. I have no other intention. We are all in the fog; we do not know where we are, and it is time to decide something. It is time to lose that inferiority complex which is the characteristic of fascist states, and we should come back to the democracy which is so often preached in this house when in fact it does not exist. As a Liberal, sir, I regret that when I defend the rights of democracy in this house, everyone who speaks his own mind, everyone who says aloud all that is said behind doors, is interrupted by those who have not the courage to speak out what they say in catimini.

An hon. MEMBER: Have a heart.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely I have a heart, and if I had not been interrupted I would have finished my speech a long time ago. That is the reason I am still standing here, sir. I congratulate you, sir, because you do your duty, and I admire the way in which you perform it. But I will tell you, sir, that I hope those who have interrupted me, who call themselves Liberals but who are no more Liberals than they are Chinese, will be put out of the party in power and will be replaced by men of good will, by liberal-minded men coming from all other parties of the house; and the gain would be to the government of the day. As a Liberal I am convinced, when I hear shouts and screams and howls and groans every time a member has the courage to stand up and express his convictions, that if we are in a democratic country, if the right of free speech exists, it is the duty of a man who has the faculty of saying what he thinks, to speak here what he believes is for the good of this country. And now, sir, I am nearly through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I will speak longer. Those who have just interrupted me are those who make no contribution to the debate except by groans, by howls, by shouts and by screams. They are like those musical instruments which are called drums; they are very noisy, but they are empty. And, sir, having said what I think—

Mr. BRADETTE: Loud laughs.

Mr. POULIOT: It reminds me of what Mr. Lapointe told me one day when I denounced some of the parasites we had on this side of the house and who, thank God, have gone away. He told me that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) had said to him across the floor, "Don't laugh; you encourage him." I do not need to be encouraged.

Mr. FRASER: You're telling us!

Mr. POULIOT: It is no pleasure to me to leave my part of the country to come here to-day and to take advantage of the last day on which I am afforded the opportunity to speak as I do now to say all I have to say to members of parliament, to complete what I have already said so often during the session, to inspire in them self-assurance so that they will be confident of themselves and can go back with pride to their constituents and say, "We have accomplished our duty; we have done our best to put the country in order."

The reason I mentioned the name of Mr. Howe is that his work has been sabotaged on housing and on aviation, and he has not been given full freedom of action to do what he wanted to do. Every time he has been prevented from doing what he wanted to do by those who think we can pay the tremendous debt of this country by the sweat of our brow in lots of time and with lots of luck. Let us help ourselves now. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is in good health; he is not an old man; but I do not think that he will stay very long; it is a sacrifice which the country asks of him to require him to finish his job in order that he can organize peace. It is a great sacrifice and it will be a burden for him. I show that I have no narrowness of mind and no prejudice when I mention for such a high post one from whom I have differed at times but whose merit I recognize.

In all friendliness, sir, I thank very sincerely the house for the kind reception they have given me. I hope some things will be done to comply with the wishes expressed by the Prime Minister, and that, without discrimination as regards any one of his colleagues, the house will choose a leader who is a realist, and who has accomplished so many important things in the past.

There will be young men who have legitimate ambitions, and after the country is again on its feet there will be opportunity for the party or for any organization to select a new leader. In the meantime we will have no elections, except under special circumstances, for a few years. The task of reconstruction must start now. It must not start in a month, in a year, in two years; it must start now, and be given a new impulse by a man who will have the supervision of all departments and who will have the authority to tell his cabinet colleagues what they shall do, each one as the head of his department, so as to perform the best possible task and enable us to achieve reform, not by speeches, but by example. I thank the house, sir, and I thank you.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Immigration branch—
186. Administration of the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, $218,866.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister give some information about the preparations being made, in addition to those he mentioned last night, to receive refugees, of whom quite a number have applied for admittance into the country? In my riding there are two or three thousand Ukrainians, six or seven thousand Jewish people, four or five thousand Italians, perhaps two thousand Poles, and people of other European nationalities, as well as of course a large number of people of British origin. I have received from many of them, particularly from those originally from the continent, requests that last remaining relatives be allowed to come to Canada. In most cases, after inquiry I have sent the application on to the department. Some of these people who would like last remaining relatives on the continent to come to Canada are comfortably off and able to take care of them, and they are ready to give any bonds required by the government so that the immigrants will not become a public charge.

I wish to support what the member for Spadina said last night. In my opinion, too, the time has come when we should follow the United States programme in preparing for an over-all immigration policy to see to it that folks of the best type are admitted, irrespective of race, ensuring of course that the predominant number will be from the British isles. To my own knowledge representatives of all the races I have mentioned, so far as my own riding is concerned, have done wonderfully well in helping to build up the country. I refer first to the Jews, the Ukrainians and the Poles. We have two Ukrainian members of parliament, one in the C.C.F. representing the constituency of Dauphin, and the hon. member for Vegreville; and we have one hon. member of Jewish race representing the constituency of Spadina. There may be others whose names I have overlooked. But certainly these three gentlemen, representing their races, have all demonstrated what this country owes to the people of their nationalities. The Italians, Poles, Russians and Scandinavians are also well represented in my riding. I concur in what the hon. member for Spadina said about the proposal to organize an over-all immigration plan, not forgetting that the predominant stock be British origin. I am in contact with organizations representing thousands of people of the nationalities to which I have referred, and I think that every effort should be made to allow the applicants to come in if they are fit and if and when they can be absorbed.

Mr. MICHAUD: In view of the remarks that have been made urging a greater degree of immigration, I think I should say a few words lest the impression be left that the house unanimously favours more immigration. I for one cannot subscribe to the policy, and I wish to place on record my opposition to any opening of the doors until such time as we have set our own house in order.

In the first place, Canada has for years been the stepping stone for immigrants wishing to go to the United States. I have not had time to look up the figures, but I have seen them, and my recollection is that over a period of forty years the national increase in population has been almost as large as if not larger than the number of immigrants who have left the country for the United States. This establishes clearly that a good many of these immigrants went to the United States or else drove some of our own Canadians to the United States. Just as phony money drives good money out of circulation, immigrants have been driving out the natives of this country. Statistics show that the proportion of Canadians of British descent is decreasing steadily and that of French extraction remains stationary. Is this situation healthy, or is it one that should be encouraged further?

While the majority of the people from continental Europe have proved to be fine citizens, particularly Ukrainians and Scandinavians, the fact remains that other groups have been a source of trouble at times. Before talking about bringing more people into the country we should look into our own labour situation. As the minister pointed out, we have yet to reestablish in civilian life a number of our servicemen, those actually in service and those taking vocational courses. Moreover, according to the report of the Minister of Labour, even at this favourable time of the year our unemployment is still quite high. Until this number is further reduced it would not be in the interests of labour to bring more labourers into Canada.

After all, the great majority of immigrants who have come to this country, including farm help and farmers, were manual labourers. All those in this house who champion the cause of labour must realize that labour is better served where unemployment is at the lowest ebb. For that reason immigration of labourers, except under special circumstances, cannot serve the cause of labour. Abundant labour always means a lower standard of living. In my humble opinion the only immigrants we might be able to absorb without too much danger at this time are farmers and would-be farmers.

Everyone realizes the importance of having this country thickly settled. There is only one way of doing that, and that is by occupying the greatest area of land and farming it. Merely increasing the population of the cities and towns would not in my opinion better our situation as a nation. If we wish to be a great nation we must occupy and cultivate more of our arable land. We shall not do this by bringing in industrial workers.

This may sound rather arbitrary, but I believe that in the best interest of Canada all unskilled immigrants should be admitted to the country on the understanding that they remain on the farm for at least one generation. The best way to develop love and devotion to a country and its institutions is to develop love and devotion to the land and the soil, and practically the only way to develop love and devotion to the land of the country is to clear that land and cultivate it.

I venture to say that all new Canadians who have spent the early years of their lives in this country in the pursuit of agriculture are far better citizens than those who have had to depend for their livelihood on other types of manual labour. Therefore our immigration policy should be directed towards bringing in people who are willing and anxious to till the soil. When this situation arises, to prove to the house that I am not opposed to immigrants of all types, I claim that we in the maritimes, and New Brunswick particularly, should have our proper share of immigrants. In my own riding there are hundreds of acres of good arable land, quite as arable and as valuable as the land in the western provinces. Let us have our share of farmer immigrants. We could settle thousands of them in my own riding, but I warn the government that what we need is farmers and not industrial workers, not pick and shovel immigrants.

Another reason why I consider immigration inadvisable is the housing situation, which is so serious. Where will you house the immigrants when you are unable to take care of your own people, your own veterans? I cannot understand the position of those who are clamouring for further immigration under present housing conditions. If deserving and desirable immigrants are anxious to come and ask us to receive them, then I think charity and justice bid us to receive them and treat them with the greatest degree of Christian kindness; but I see no reason for our making any special effort to bring people to this country unless they are anxious to come. If we do so we give them an implied undertaking that they will be pleased and well taken care of here. If they should be disappointed, they are apt to blame us for it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not propose to discuss the question of the whole immigration policy, because I believe the minister intimated yesterday that in a short time from now it would be his mission to give to the house and to the country his view and the view of the government on the question of immigration as a whole. Therefore I shall confine my remarks to the question of the admitting of refugees and displaced persons.

Before I do that may I express my deep gratitude to the hon. member for Davenport for what he has said in his broad-minded way about the people of Ukrainian origin. I also express my gratitude to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. I do that because anything that I would say about the question of Ukrainian refugees or displaced persons can better be said by hon. members who are not of Ukrainian origin. For that reason I want to place on record part of the report of the immigration and labour committee of the senate, which makes reference to the Ukrainian question. For obvious reasons I would rather have their opinion on record than my own views. May I say that this committee did a fine job in taking evidence both for and against the admission of immigrants into Canada. Therefore their report is based upon evidence taken on all sides of the question. First they make reference to other persons who are in displaced persons' camps, and then they have this to say about Ukrainians:

> Ukrainians Available
> There would appear to be at least an equal number of refugees and displaced persons of Ukrainian origin in the camps of Germany or drifting about Europe. Some millions of men and women were driven by the Germans from the territories they occupied to be used as slave labour. The home country of these people has been devastated, and it is thought that many would welcome an opportunity to recommence life in Canada. How suitable they are for settlement could be learned by careful investigations where they are, and by no other means. Our agents should be in Europe now engaged in this work, for if they are such people as the Ukrainian settlers who came to Canada in the years preceding the last war they will possess characteristics of intelligence and industry which may well contribute to Canada's development.

I place that on record because I would rather have the views of a body of men who took evidence from all sides, pro and con, and came to that conclusion, than place my own interpretation on it.

I should also like to make reference to another organization which appeared before the immigration and labour committee of the senate. I refer to the Canadian national committee on refugees, which was organized in 1938, the chairman of which is the Hon. Cairine Wilson, and the honorary chairman, Mr. B. K. Sandwell, two persons both well-known in Canadian life. After discussing the question of displaced persons and refugees before the committee they made, among other recommendations, this one which I consider to be most valuable in the immediate future. Their first recommendation was:

> That Canada should state her policy on displaced persons immediately without waiting for decisions of the united nations.

They go on to say:

> Australia has already made known her intention to take 70,000 immigrants annually. Great Britain, having accepted 150,000 to 200,000 before the end of the war, announced in the latter part of 1945 that relatives and concentration camp survivors would be admitted. The United States having taken about 250,000, has reopened quotas to provide for displaced persons of several nationalities and will admit a total of 39,000 a year.

They advocate that in proportion Canada do her share in admitting whatever number of refugees and displaced persons it is possible to admit in the immediate future. Another recommendation they make is as fallows:

> That the important distinction be recognized between immigration policy and policy concerning refugees and displaced persons.

May I say that I found much with which I could agree when I listened to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, particularly when he said that at the present time it was not a question of opening the door wide to immigration until Canada's house is in order.

May I also refer to the attitude which organized labour may take? I wish to put on record what the Canadian Congress of Labour had to pay on this question on July 25, 1946. They recognized the distinction between imigration as a policy and the immediate policy of bringing displaced persons and refugees here to find a sanctuary. This is their fifth recommendation:

> The admission of refugees, though it has, of course, economic aspects, is primarily a humanitarian question. Canada is under an obligation to humanity to admit her due share of refugees even if it costs her something. It may actually bring her important economic benefits. But even if it does not, she must do her part.

That is the view of organized labour, speaking as recently as July 25 of this year. It is a fair and humanitarian stand to take. Organized labour realizes that there is a danger in a period of mass unemployment, and in the housing crisis we are now experiencing overcrowding may work to the detriment of labour; but even in the face of that, from the point of view of helping people less fortunate than ourselves, organized labour is prepared to allow that class of people to come to Canada.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

May I also refer to the recent convention of the National Council of Women, in which Mrs. R. T. Tanner, Toronto, who was the convener of the united nations committee of the National Council of Women, had this to say on June 6 of this year:

> Approximately 750,000 persons in Europe cannot return home and must find new homes abroad. We must be willing to take a number of these unfortunate people and let the government know Canadian people are anxious to help solve this problem.

May I come back to another recommendation of the Canadian national committee on refugees. In their fifth point they recommend:

> That immigration officers be sent immediately to the distress areas, particularly into the displaced persons camps.

The reason for that is obvious. In addition to the shipping question, as the minister pointed out yesterday, there is the question of the inspection and selection right on the continent. I quite realize that the minister and the government want to be as careful as possible, and they should be, to see that the right type of person is admitted to Canada; that anyone who may bring in some malignant disease, whether it be physical or mental, should not be permitted to come to Canada. I agree that great care should be taken. On the other hand there is definitely a question of urgency. We must remember that this problem of displaced persons and refugees arose even before the war ended. The war has now been over for a considerable period of time. Thees who are in the displaced persons camps have had the feeling that since the war is over, since conditions are more favourable, the allies will come to their rescue. The people are suffering, not only physically but mentally, because they are in a state of uncertainty; they do not know what is going to happen. They have looked to the United States and Canada as a sort of paradise to which they will be admitted when conditions permit. I feel strongly on this question. Perhaps because I am of Ukrainian origin I get more letters from people on this question than the average member would. But I know other members have received letters telling them of the desperate urgency of the situation. In fact I have received letters directly from overseas, from the displaced persons camps. I have taken pains to ascertain the truth of the allegations made in the letters, and I am satisfied that in respect of many of these people there is a degree of urgency which almost reaches desperation.

Let me make it clear that I am in favour of the government being very careful in checking anyone who applies for passage to this country, in that only those who will make good Canadians shall be admitted; but beyond that I doubt whether we should be too strict or too technical. Certainly we can no longer be dilatory. We should take as many of these people as it is possible for the country to absorb at this time, in order that they may get away from the conditions which surround them.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I had not intended to say anything on this subject, but after listening with interest last night to the minister's statement I think something should be said now, because it may be too late when we meet next session.

One hon. member suggested giving a preference to European peasants rather than to English slum dwellers as immigrants. It just so happens there are thousands of city dwellers in England who would like to come to Canada.

Before proceeding further I should like to remind the house of what the English slum dweller has contributed to the welfare of democracy. It was slum dwellers in England who formed the first trade union in Great Britain. I refer to the Tolpuddle martyrs, who were slum dwellers and who were the originators of the trade union movement in Great Britain, a movement which has been supported loyally throughout the years by large numbers of people who would be termed slum dwellers. Those people have strong democratic instincts. I would say, too, that the foundation of the cooperative movement in Great Britain rests on the activities and support of the slum dwellers, as it was originated in the village of Rochdale. And that movement was begun by what would be described as slum dwellers in what would be called now a slum. The cooperative movement in Great Britain has been built to a great extent by the activities and support and loyalty of the so-called slum dwellers of that country. It was built on the poverty and the pluck for which the slum dwellers in Great Britain are known.

Who first sensed the dangers of the fascist creed in Great Britain when some in high positions failed to realize it, and laughed Mosley's black-shirts into the backwaters of impotence? It was the slum dwellers of that country who did it. Who gave the world a greater example of heroism among a civilian population than the slum dwellers in the cities of England did during the last war? What civil population in the world's history has stood so fast and so firm, and under such difficult circumstances, and has defied tyranny, as the slum dwellers of England? We owe them a debt of gratitude. If they had faltered at that time, if their morale had collapsed, history would be written in different terms to-day.

How many thousands of the troops on the beaches at Dunkirk came from the slums of Great Britain? How many men in the eighth army came from the slums of Great Britain? How many men who came from those slums served in the British navy, air force and merchant marine?

Mr. BLACKMORE: And in world war I, too.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Some people may question the advisability of bringing the so-called slum dwellers of Great Britain to Canada as immigrants. Anyone who knows Canadian history must know that thousands of them came to this country and have made an excellent contribution to its development. Hundreds of men in the public life of this country to-day, in different communities across the country, came from the slums of England. I mention these few facts because I want people fully to realize what contribution these humble people, who had so very little, have made to the development of democracy in Great Britain.

I am disturbed by the lack of immigration policy on the part of the government, and by statements which have been made. I was particularly disturbed when I read one of the reports of the senate committee on immigration, where a certain Lieutenant-Colonel Hicks, of Montreal, who until recently was a member of the Canadian portion of the military government in Germany, and who had under his control some twenty-two or twenty-three Canadian officers, suggested that we should admit four million Germans to this country as immigrants. Anyone who reads the record will see that. At the same time there are thousands in Great Britain who wish to come to Canada, but who are not getting any encouragement. I should like to tell the committee about an experience I had in the winter of 1938, just before the war. A young chap knocked at my door and asked lodging for the night. He was a young seaman from Glasgow who could not get employment in Great Britain. He had been on the dole for some years, and had heard that he could get employment on our great lakes as a seaman. He came to Canada, and after working two or three weeks on the great lakes on a pulpwood barge, the job was completed. Following that he hitchhiked across Canada, having been told that he could get a job on a ship in Vancouver. He travelled from Winnipeg to my home in the Kootenays, when, as I have said, that dark winter's night he knocked on my door, asking if I could put him up. I did so, keeping him for a week or so and in the meantime making arrangements for his transportation to Vancouver, where he thought a shipping job was available. The Canadian government deported that young man back to Glasgow. Throughout the years I corresponded with him because I was interested in what he was doing. The day war was declared he joined the merchant marine because a call had gone out for men to serve on the ships. He served throughout the war and was torpedoed several times.

Quite by accident, just before coming to Ottawa in March to attend the sitting of the house, I had the opportunity of speaking to him for ten or fifteen minutes in Vancouver. I said, "What do you intend to do when you get out of the merchant marine?" He said, "There is nothing I would like better than to come to British Columbia and stay on a piece of land." I might add that he was a hard-working chap, and capable. I said, "What have you done about it?" He said, "When we were in London I went to the office in that city, but I was given no encouragement whatsoever. I was practically told that they did not want any immigrants from Great Britain in Canada at the present time."

Mr. BLACKMORE: Imagine that!

Mr. HERRIDGE: When we are discussing the matter of immigration I believe we must remember that, on the whole, Europe is short of man-power. Man-power is required throughout the devastated sections; but in Great Britain, with the exception of immediate reconstruction requirements, there will be a surplus of man-power.

I should like to read from a publication which quotes what a Mr. Wickman has to say. This man is a progressive British industrialist who was in Toronto some months ago. He said this:

> "Canada is one of the millionaires of the new era. We in Britain, who were the pioneers of industrial development, are now one of the new poor. Britain's population is far above the ability of her domestic raw materials to supply."
> Mr. Wickman advocated the transplanting of British industries to Canada with the transplanting geared to immigration. He left no doubt that if adequate labour were available, he would move his own vast enterprises to this country.

The hon. member who has just spoken said, I believe, that life on the land developed the greatest degree of loyalty and devotion to the country. I do not think any group of workers could excel the industrial workers of Great Britain in the loyalty and devotion to democratic ideals they have shown in past years.

I realize that the question of displaced persons is a difficult one. I should like to pay tribute to all those of European stock who came to this country, and who assisted in its development and in our war effort. Many fine people have come to Canada from Europe; I have known many of them. But this is a question which causes many Canadians serious concern. There are some displaced persons in Europe who have suffered nazi tyranny and nazi oppression. Some of them want to come to this country, and we should admit them at the first possible opportunity. At the same time there are hundreds of thousands of displaced persons who helped Hitler until the day of allied victory. In this connection I should like to read from a letter written by a Canadian soldier and published in the Oshawa Times-Gazette, as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> I was very much surprised that there should be circles in Oshawa who would champion the right of Ukrainian quislings to receive asylum in this country. I refer to the item in your paper of November 27 which deals with a resolution adopted at the Ukrainian National Hall in regard to the so-called Ukrainian displaced persons now in Germany in the British and American zone.
> I have first hand knowledge of these traitors since I met them in Upper Silesia while I was a prisoner of war. That is why I am not impressed about the claim that these people "are unable to return to their native land without endangering their lives on account of a system of terror practised by the Soviet government."
> I ask you, Mr. Editor, what we Canadians would say about a number of our people joining the German army, fighting us and our allies and then seeking asylum in Russia on the grounds that we may want to try them for treason and therefore they should be protected from our justice?
> These traitors should not be given asylum in Canada. I for one believe they should be returned to the Soviet authorities for trial.
> I first came into contact with these Ukrainian quislings when I was shipped from Stalag No. 344, Lamsdorf to Bankau, Upper Silesia, in June, 1944.
> I was in a working party of 24 Canadian prisoners of war who were engaged in forestry and sawmill work. This is how we came to know of the Ukrainian settlement nearby. The women used to work in the woods and their men would come to visit them on their leave. Our German guards told us they were Ukrainian volunteers in the German army. They wore the green-grey uniform of the Wehrmacht and acted like regular Germans. We often saw them when they came on leave.
> There were other Ukrainians in Bankau, as well as Poles, Russians and other European nationalities. But these wore the tag of forced labourers and were treated as such.
> You can well imagine how we Canadians felt about these Ukrainian volunteers in the German army. If we had an opportunity we would have shot them there and then ourselves. We had more respect, if it could be called such, for our German guards as at least they were of the enemy.

Perhaps someone may ask: how come these people are now in the British and American zone? It's simple. They were afraid of the Red army and fled west into our lines figuring they can fool the allies with their anti-Soviet stories and claims that they were merely refugees from the terrible bolsheviki.

On January 18, 1945, our German guards began evacuating us westward into Germany because the red army was pressing the wehrmacht further and further west. The first to flee were these Ukrainian quislings. While we were forced to march hundreds of miles on foot they grabbed every vehicle in sight to get out of the way of the red army. We met hundreds of them, a disorderly mob, scared for their skins. Their objective was the American and British lines.

Now these same people have got in touch with their friends in Canada and want to be brought here to continue their dirty work. As an ex-prisoner of war I thought I would give the citizens of Oshawa an idea just who are these alleged displaced Ukrainians. They do not deserve our sympathy. They are traitors to the Ukraine, our ally and should be shunned as such. Certainly we should not put a premium on treachery.

The honest, patriotic Ukrainians, Russians and Poles and others who were forced labourers or prisoners of war are back home in their own countries. It is only the quislings who are afraid to face their own people, who are left in the American and British zones. I say, return them to their country to face the music there. They deserve no better.

Yours truly,

George Metcalfe.

I am not suggesting that all displaced persons are of that type, but it should put us on our guard in the selection of immigrants. If we want to have a satisfactory immigration policy we should first do more to retain in Canada those Canadians who have been trained at Canadian expense. We are losing hundreds of our choicest men to the United States because of a lack of opportunity in this country for their particular type of trained minds and brains.

We should welcome all those British people who fought the battle of Britain, those who fought in the army, the air force and the navy of Great Britain, or of any country in the commonwealth, and their relatives; those who defended our freedom and our opportunities should be welcomed. At the present time we are providing transportation for 4,000 Poles, and I understand we are to provide transportation for 6,000 displaced persons. It is hardly enough to say that British people can come to Canada provided that they get transportation. The fact is they are not in a preferred position. I have had numbers of letters from people in the old country who are anxious to come to Canada. There is no doubt that our offices in England are not giving encouragement to these people.

First, we should make arrangements for the transportation of people of British stock who want to come to this country. Second, we should give every consideration to the refugees of Europe—and by these I mean those people who were proved to be opposed to nazism and fascism, people who have suffered because of their loyalty to democracy. No group in Europe has been proven to be more completely anti-nazi than the Jewish race. These people have suffered terrific trials throughout the years and they should be given every consideration.

This is a problem that should receive the serious consideration of the government. We need immigrants in Canada, but we should have selective immigration. We must not forget that we have displaced veterans and displaced industrial workers in Canada, and we should have a policy which will permit us to absorb those people as fast as we can without disturbing our national economy. By adopting a policy which will make certain that only people of democratic faith shall be permitted to come to this country we shall be basing our future on sound foundations.

Mr. HANSELL: May I ask the member one simple question: Would he say that the people whom he refers to as being anti-nazi were also anti-communist?

Mr. HERRIDGE: I am not a communist, and in fact with my views I think I would be considered a poor candidate for membership in the communist party. We must remember that these people fought against Hitler; they fought against fascism and nazism. Those were the terrors to mankind, and they still threaten mankind to-day, but they will not wish to come.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think there are two things we should seek to avoid in discussing this matter of immigration. First, we should avoid dealing with it on an emotional basis. Second, we should avoid any effort to bring immigrants into this country on the basis that prevailed for so many years in this country when people were brought here only for the purpose of being exploited. I think it was a predecessor of the Minister of Mines and Resources, who held office when the department was known as the Department of the Interior, who said that the kind of immigrant we wanted in Canada was a sturdy peasant in a sheepskin coat with a stout wife and half a dozen children. He said we wanted people who were accustomed to working on the land, who all their lives had worked from dawn until dark, who did not know anything else and who did not expect anything else. We do not want immigration based on that kind of philosophy. We want the people who come to Canada to have ideas as well as the ability to work and produce.

It was stated this morning that we should not bring anyone here until we had provided for our own people, until we had made our own people secure. That would be a good position to take if we had worked out a policy to take care of our people. Our people will remain in insecurity, poverty and misery whether or not other people are brought in, unless we have some planned policy for developing our resources. In my opinion that is not a very strong position to take. It was said that the standard of living of workers is always at its lowest when we have large numbers of people looking for work. True, but that applies not only to thickly populated countries but to countries with sparse populations, as we learned to our sorrow during the depression years. It will always apply as long as labour is regarded as a commodity, as long as working people are mere packets of labour power looking for a purchaser. We are not going to overcome that difficulty simply by keeping people out of the country and to that extent preventing its development.

Then the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska said that we should bring into this country only those who could be put on the land. But our farmers will continue to have difficulties in disposing of their produce if we do not organize our production and marketing. The only essential difference between the economic position of the farmer and the industrial worker is that the industrial worker sells his labour direct to an employer for a price, wages, while the farmer turns his labour into certain commodities, depending upon the particular type of agricultural production he is engaged in, after which he is in the same position as the industrial worker, that is, he must find a buyer for his commodity. As long as that condition prevails both the farmer and the industrial worker will be insecure, not because there is a scarcity of the things they need but because there is an over-abundance. What we have to do first is to organize our economy on a basis whereby the people will be prosperous when we have an abundance and not quite so prosperous when we have shortages. It is with that understanding that we should approach these questions.

It was said that an immigrant coming into this country should be compelled to remain on the land for a generation in order that he might learn to love the land. That is a fallacious argument, and we will realize that if we will only observe that our land is being denuded to-day by people who have owned it and tilled it for several generations. They are leaving the land, not because they do not love the land but because the organization of our economy is such that they are not able to make a living on the land. These problems all have to be solved, and they are not going to be made any easier or any harder of solution because a few immigrants are allowed to come into the country from parts of the world where their circumstances are worse than ours.

The hon. member for Dauphin in opening his remarks said that he was a Canadian of Ukrainian extraction. I am not particular what his national origin is; the sentiments he expressed to-day are those of a Canadian, and as such they are good enough for me, who because of accident happen to be Canadian born. I am sorry I was not in the house last night when the minister spoke, but I would impress upon him, though perhaps it is unnecessary, that we in Canada have an obligation to people in other parts of the world where conditions are hard. We should be careful and selective in choosing those who are to come, because it is a high honour to be accorded the privilege of Canadian citizenship. But we should not be so careful that we keep out worthy people in order to exclude those who are unworthy. As has already been said by a number of speakers, there are people who because of their necessity are not in a position to wait, and special provision should be made in cases of that kind.

We should have an immigration policy which would enable people to come to this country—and in this I agree with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska—who are anxious to come here, and we should do everything possible to see that they are properly settled and are not brought here for exploitation, as has been so often the case in the past, and that in the process of settling them here we may also put our own domestic affairs in order.

Mr. WINKLER: I was very much interested in the speech of the hon. member for Kootenay West and his support of the industrial workers of Great Britain. It should not be forgotten by any of us who hail from the prairie provinces that perhaps the greatest contribution to agriculture which was ever made in the prairie provinces was made by a man who spent the first forty years of his life in the city of London. He migrated to Canada to become a farmer, and made such a success of it that he is regarded as a distinguished agriculturist. Though he had no academic training, he is one of the greatest authorities on agriculture in western Canada: I refer to Doctor Seager Wheeler. I learned also just the other day in my constituency that one of our most substantial farmers was born and raised in the city of London and is a nephew of a former lord mayor of London. I just mention these things to indicate what I believe to be the resourcefulness of the British industrial worker: he acquits himself admirably in any situation which he may be called upon to face in this country.

But my purpose in rising was to support particularly the stand of the hon. member for Dauphin, who was championing the cause of the displaced persons or refugees who find themselves in a very serious position, in western Europe particularly. They are located in Germany, for the most part, in some areas in France, in Belgium and in Holland. Most of them were forced out of their homes through fear of persecution, religious or otherwise, and found themselves in these locations at the end of hostilities. They have made the best of their very difficult situation by living in barracks which they constructed out of any makeshift materials. Those of us who were fortunate enough to visit Great Britain last December and were able to go to the continent, including the hon. member for Peel, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and myself, had the opportunity of visiting some of these displaced persons' camps in the vicinity of Oldenburg, in Germany, and our opinion was that they are just about the very best of immigrant material that Canada could want to have. We did not see them all, of course. They are scattered pretty well all over allied-occupied Germany. How many there are is a question; I doubt if there are any accurate statistics regarding the number; but the Christian Science Monitor, which has good sources of information, has placed the number at approximately one and two-thirds million. Most of these people come from Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, and many of them, from south of there, who are known as Ukrainians. They are of course unable to come to Canada at the present time, and they expressed themselves to us as being desirous of coming here rather than to any other country. I should like to place on the record the opinion of a very important body of people in this country. I quote from United Nations News, June number, a publication printed in Ottawa by the United Nations Society in Canada: one short resolution is as follows:

U.N. Society supports . . . more liberal immigration policy . . .

"Whereas there are many people throughout the world, particularly in Europe, whose lives have been disrupted by the war and who wish to make a new life for themselves, and whereas many of these people could make a valuable contribution to the life of Canada:

Therefore, be it resolved that the United Nations Society in Canada urges the government to initiate a programme of selective immigration which will permit immigrants to come to Canada in greater numbers and under more liberal conditions than was possible before the war."

I emphasize the last part of that sentence. I should also like to refer to a publication called the International Journal, which is published by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. The spring number of 1946 contains an article entitled "Parallels in Soviet and Canadian Settlement." I do not intend to quote from this article, which is quite long. It describes the two countries and points out that, whereas Russia has at least twice as large an area as Canada, her population, at least as regards the rehabilitation of Siberia, has been going up by leaps and bounds as compared with ours. A synopsis of this article has been made by the financial editor of the Toronto Globe and Mail, May 9, 1946. I quote from it in part as follows:

The dominion covers 3·7 million square miles, the Soviets control over 8 million. There are 170 millions in the Soviet and only 12 million Canadians. The Soviets speak with assurance of a population of 340 million people and some Canadians talk as though 12 million is a good place to stop.

Although this article does not directly assert this conclusion, the inference is that it would be dangerous for any country in the world to-day to tolerate a vacuum, and also an inference which I, at any rate, read into it, that if we do not fill the vacuum by our own volition, somebody else may fill it for us some day to suit themselves and not to suit us. Therefore I am very glad to support the argument of the hon. member for Dauphin; for I believe that in Europe we now have the last potential reservoir of good citizens, or the making of good citizens, who should be brought to Canada in large numbers. I am not arguing that we could take them all, because a great many of them will be unfit for colonists anywhere. Possibly through health or age or infirmity, many of them will never be taken out except in a spirit of tolerance or more or less for humanitarian reasons.

The minister said last night there would be a division of these among the various countries who would be obliged to relieve the congestion; nevertheless that would be a very small part of our obligation and it would be far outweighed by the good results we would receive by obtaining this very fine type of immigrants. There are very few Ukrainian settlers in my part of the province, but the population of Manitoba is over ten per cent Ukrainian in origin, and we have no better citizens. I am not saying this to gain any personal support because there would be none coming to me in my own area; but I know many, among them school inspectors, from our district, who have been working among the Ukrainians and they will vouch for it that there are no better citizens to be found anywhere in western Canada than the Ukrainians. Therefore I urge the department to consider in every possible way bringing as many of these potential citizens as can be brought in at as early a time as we can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Last night the minister made a remark regarding the four thousand Polish soldiers who are being considered as possible immigrants into Canada. I think the house would be remiss in its duty if it did not probe into the matter of the Poles with some care, because we may be getting ourselves into difficulties we might be sorry for if all should not be found as well as it might appear to be. At page 5495 of Hansard the minister said:

> In addition to that, there are 4,000 Polish soldiers, the investigating officers for which are now on their way. I believe they are now in Italy making investigations with regard to these Polish soldiers to bring them to this country. They will be apportioned throughout the Dominion of Canada, according to the regulations laid down by the Department of Labour.

I asked the minister this question:

> Will the minister say why these Polish soldiers were admitted?

I have gathered since that they have not yet been admitted, and I hope they have not. The minister then replied:

> The reason was that we were making an effort to take in soldiers who would go on the land, and into agricultural pursuits. We had many requests, and there was quite an agitation with regard to the Polish soldiers. They had expressed their intention most freely, that they were not going back to Poland, and that they intended to look elsewhere. Canada was one of the places to which they would go.
> Our soldiers and their dependents were the first obligation we had.

I might have been a little over-suspicious, but something about the words the minister used troubled me at the time and it has been troubling me more ever since. Therefore I would like to find out more about the meanning of some of the expressions he used. I am going to ask him a series of questions to which I would like to get answers. If he can give them now, so much the better; if not he can give them later. I think the dominion as a whole is entitled to have an answer to every one of these questions and to have it in the minutest and most sincere detail.

The minister spoke of the soldiers going on the land. Have we put on the land all our own soldiers who would go on the land? Have the soldiers from Holland, Denmark, Roumania and the Ukraine sought admittance to Canada, and has their request been considered as sympathetically as the request of the Polish soldiers?

May I make this comment at this point—the member for Vancouver East was, I thought, on that line of thought. Canada had a surplus of agricultural products before the war. What assurance have we that we shall not have a surplus of meat, grain, dairy products, fruits, et cetera early in the post-war years? Is it proposed to have these Poles displace Canadian farmers?

Let me pause here for a moment to comment. It has been my observation that many times people have been brought in from European countries and placed in good Canadian communities to help in various agricultural activities. They have remained there probably fifteen years and have then begun to buy out the original Canadians who had good British names, and in whole areas of the country you can hardly find a name like Smith or Brown or Jones or McNab. They are all some sort of un-British name now. I am not reflecting on any nationality, but I am not sure the tendency I refer to is in the best interests of Canada as a whole. I think that matter should be carefully assessed. Perhaps the minister cannot reply to these comments, but I should think he would be able to answer some of the questions I am going to ask.

"Quite an agitation", he said, was being conducted in respect of the Poles. I believe the house is entitled to know who were the people who were agitating. Was it the Polish soldiers themselves? Was it the Polish government in exile? Were there any organized groups outside Canada or were there any organized groups inside Canada? I trust I can ask the questions I am going to ask without offending anyone. We have to face facts exactly as they are, and ask questions even if they do hurt. Was the agitation by any provincial government in Canada? Was it by any labour organization? Was it by any industrial organization? Was it by any political organization? Was it by any religious organization? Was it by any political leader or any religious leader? The facts are probably government secrets, but I believe every person in the dominion to-day is entitled to know exactly who the people were who were conducting the agitation, and I believe the members of the house have a solemn duty to find out before many more hours pass.

I have also this question to ask: What are the political affiliations or predilections of these Polish soldiers? That matter has already been referred to to some extent. Were they fascists when in Poland? I gather from some of the remarks I have heard that these people were not welcome in Russia. Why? And if they were not welcome there, what might be the reason why they should be particularly welcome in Canada? Were they fascist or communist or liberal? Were they monarchists or totalitarians or democrats? What is the record of each of these soldiers?

I know there are four thousand, but if it is expected to bring them all here, these questions should be asked with narrow scrutiny and the answers recorded. We have about all the troubles in Canada that we can take care of right now; let us see to it that we do not bring agents here who will aggravate those troubles. I want to see Canada a home for all honourable people and people of good will who will become worthy Canadians, but I am not at all in favour of bringing in people who will become agitators from the day they set foot on our shores—and we have too many of that type right now.

I want to know what are the religious affiliations of these Polish soldiers. Are they Protestant, atheistic, Roman Catholic or Judaistic? I do not want to do anything I ought not to do but I believe every member of the house realizes that any preponderance of any one of these among new immigrants would certainly be creating a handicap to large bodies of the Canadian people.

We have to face these facts realistically, and in particular with reference to these Poles—and may I just stop for a minute to refer to all the members that the hon. member for Lisgar was referring to. I sympathize with the fine ideals which were expressed in the quotations which the hon. member read. Nevertheless I tell the committee that we have all the internationalists that we want in the country right now; we have all the centralizers and general stargazers that we need. I do not want a whole lot of others in here. Of course, now it is popular to go clean crazy over internationalism, but by and by, unless we are careful, we shall wake up from the honeymoon phantasy we are in and begin to realize that in being too international we made a colossal mistake.

I should like to know what are the religious affiliations of these men. Are they evenly divided in the proportion that the major religions are divided in Canada? If it should be found that these men all belong to one religion, no matter what religion that is, I do not think that, taking them as a whole, it would be the will of the Canadian people that they be admitted.

In what provinces are the Polish soldiers to be settled? Has each province concerned been asked its consent? I do not wish to comment too much on that, but already we have groups in this country who were located by shortsighted governments in Ottawa and were placed on the lap of certain provinces. Those provinces are even yet not sure that they are going to be able to get rid of the problem so created. I see very serious complications. It is easy enough to get people in and plant them on the doorstep of the province and wash your hands of the problem. That simply is not good enough.

Is it proposed to settle these Polish soldiers in a block, or community? What are the "regulations laid down by the Department of Labour" under which these people will be settled? In my judgment every hon. member is responsible for speaking to the house in accordance with the experiences which he has had. That is how we make a contribution to each other. I have had unfortunate experiences with groups of people who settled in communities and cannot be changed into Canadians, who insist on keeping their own language and culture and going on from generation to generation. That is not good. If people are to be good Canadians they must be ready to assimilate in this country. The settling of groups in blocks is not conducive to that laudable objective. That ought to be definitely understood.

Where is it proposed to settle these soldiers? Are these proposed soldiers already in Canada? I gather from a rereading of the minister's words that they are not, and I am glad they are not, because we can still deal with the situation without being too severe. Where are they? Why all the haste about bringing them in? I understand that there was an order in council passed to admit 4,000 Polish soldiers. That seems to be an astounding thing. Why should there be such desperate haste that an order in council had to be passed to admit 4,000 Polish soldiers? Was it because the soldiers are suffering? Well, there are hundreds of thousands of other suffering people in Europe. Try to get one of these people into the country and see what happens. Every hon. member knows that you cannot get one of them in. You cannot even get a budge in the department of immigration; no, sir. I am not saying that is not as it should be, but what astonishes me is that we should pass an order in council, if that is what was done, to permit the entry of 4,000 soldiers because they are suffering! If that was not the reason for consenting to admit them, what was the reason? Why were they not going back to Poland? We can have whatever attitude towards Russia we wish, but when a body of people 4,000 strong are undesirable in their own homeland under Russian control and they seek admission to ours, we owe it to ourselves as a great duty to know something about the reasons why they were not going back to Poland.

The minister used these words: "Our soldiers and their dependents were the first obligation we had." That sounds innocent enough until you begin to think about it. "Our soldiers"; were these 4,000 Polish soldiers our soldiers? If they are classified as such what claim have they to be classified as our soldiers?

An hon. MEMBER: They fought for us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It can be said that they fought for us. So did soldiers from a score of different countries. That did not make them our soldiers. I am not sure that they joined the Canadian forces or were ever identified with the Canadian forces. At this moment I wish to stop and pay respect to the splendid Polish airmen who formed so solid and dependable a portion of the R.A.F. in the critical days of the battle of Britain and perhaps played an important part in turning the scale of battle in our favour. I wish to give them all credit, but that does not mean that they are Canadian soldiers or British soldiers. Why we should become so solicitous of the welfare of these 4,000 Polish soldiers as being our soldiers needs to be explained.

Are these 4,000 Polish soldiers to have their wives and children, brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers come to Canada in due course? If you once let them come in and get naturalized then under the regulations as they now exist, I understand that they can bring in all these connections. Suppose they are settled in one community, or nearly all in one, and they bring in all the accumulation of people who would be involved under the regulations, it does not require a vivid or factual imagination to get some sort of appreciation of what might be in store for the area round about or the province which will have the responsibility.

Who are the investigating officers who are now in Italy investigating these Polish soldiers? Under the circumstances I rather fancy that the committee is entitled to know just who these officers are. The minister speaks vaguely of it. I am not reflecting on the minister's sincerity.

Mr. GLEN: Information as to the officers was given some days ago by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is fine. I just want to make sure that everything is aboveboard. It is so easy to slip in something under a smoke screen and sow the seeds for bountiful trouble in the future.

By what standards will these officers judge of the fitness of these Polish soldiers for admission to Canada? I think I have said enough for the present time. Before I resume my seat however I will say that we must share responsibility as members of parliament to see that no organization, racial, religious or political, shall be permitted to play high politics behind a smoke screen of generous Canadian sentimental sympathy for refugees or displaced persons. I should be glad to have an answer to these questions when the minister is able to prepare them.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Dealing only with the question of the 4,000 Polish soldiers, the hon. gentleman expressed a good deal of suspicion of the word "agitation" which I used last night. He seemed to imply from the word that there was a good deal of lobbying going on regarding the admission of these soldiers. Let me hasten to assure the hon. member that there is no such thing as lobbying in connection with this matter at all. He knows as well as all of us know that there are 200,000 Polish soldiers who fought with our armies and who were fighting against nazism about which the hon. member spoke. He knows that the soldiers cannot return to their home for the very reason that they have fought against nazism, and in effect they are to-day stateless.

The hon. gentleman wants to know what religious denomination they are. I personally will say that I will not inquire as to the religious denomination of any immigrant who wants to come to Canada provided he is a citizen worthy to be received into the country. When these officers go that is one of the questions that will not be asked, whether they are of a certain religious persuasion. There is no discrimination against any immigrant coming into Canada on the basis of his religion, and there has not been from any time back. The agitation for their admission to Canada, if that word is to be used, came from all over the world.

In every editorial of every newspaper in Canada one read accounts of the hardships being endured by these Polish soldiers, and the need that something should be done in order if possible to rectify their condition. There were 200,000 of them; and the dominion government, without any special references I know of from any particular body, but following the general opinion of the country, decided that it would make that contribution to the relief of these soldiers.

Our officers are going over there. I did not know, personally, any of those officers, but when I was informed as to the gentleman who was heading them I found he was a personal friend of mine. I did not know that, however, until he had been appointed. He was attached to the Department of Agriculture. Formerly he had been in the university of British Columbia, and had been identified with agriculture all his life. His present position is that of economic adviser to the Department of Labour. This man knows the agricultural conditions of Canada from coast to coast, as few men know them. I have entire confidence in his judgment, in the belief that he will accept those soldiers who will be of value and of benefit to this country, and who can be placed in Canada properly.

This matter is more in the hands of the Department of Labour than in the immigration branch. However, I would say that our branch will attend to the landing of these soldiers when they come. The department has given careful consideration to those very matters about which the hon. member has spoken. I do not know whether the hon. member is aware of the fact that all those who come will be single persons, and that there is no question as to families coming.

Perhaps the Minister of Labour can deal with this matter in more detail than I can, but I believe the same process will be adopted as was adopted by the provinces with regard to the supply of labour for harvest. The provinces will be consulted. These people will be placed on individual farms, not with any intention of having them form a block, as was suggested by the hon. member—because that is not the intention at all. They will be placed on individual farms, and in that way will make their contribution. After a period of two years, if they prove to be acceptable as citizens they will be given their landings in Canada, with a view to becoming Canadian citizens under our new act. There is nothing of a sinister nature behind it at all; there is only the desire of the government to make its contribution to what was a grievous situation so far as these soldiers were concerned. In respect of farm labour, let me say that I have heard it stated time and again in the house that there is not sufficient labour on the farms. These men are being chosen as farm labourers. The hon. member asked if they would be put into blocks in connection with the purchasing of farms. The government has no such intention. In the very nature of things, with 4,000 people spread over the Dominion of Canada, it must be clear that there is no purpose in putting them into blocks, because that would not be advantageous to individual farmers in Canada. They will be spread over the country, in the manner that the Department of Labour deals with the provinces and will be apportioned accordingly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My questions were not implying anything. I was asking ordinary questions that the ordinary person using common sense is asking, on the street. I have had those questions asked me twenty times in my own constituency. I have asked the questions only to have the matter cleared up in an endeavour to do my duty as a member of parliament. There has been no implication on my part that religion should play any part in the admission or non-admission of people to Canada. But I believe all hon. members in the House of Commons will realize that probably the time may come when we would need to be a little careful. I am not saying what should be done.

I appreciate very much the answer the minister has given. I want to have these questions cleared up for my own satisfaction, and having done so I shall say no more.

Mr. GLEN: I should like to deal with one other statement made by the hon. member, namely his reference to political affiliations. I do not know what their political affiliations may be. But I do know and it seems to me that those of the Polish army would certainly be opposed to nazism. The Department of Labour has taken certain precautions in this connection. Among the delegation are officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who will deal with the very matter the hon. member has mentioned. What their methods of inspection may be I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to say, or even the Minister of Labour. However the matter of the background of any immigrants will certainly be an important factor in any policy of immigration in Canada.

The discussion in the committee bears out what I said last night, namely that there are many opinions in Canada with regard to immigration and it is well that this matter should be discussed. I am not objecting to what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said. He strengthens my statement that this must be a matter of careful investigation before any definite policy of immigration is evolved by government, in order that the factors mentioned here by hon. members may be taken into consideration when such time arrives. Apparently there is need for investigation to clarify the facts; that must be evident from the discussion we have had to-day.

I am glad to have heard these expressions of opinion. It has been mentioned that in the house are hon. members of European descent. The hon. member for Dauphin made a first-class contribution to the debate this morning, and I would say that his race is most fortunate in having a spokesman like him in the House of Commons.

I can add nothing more. I have set out the policy of the department which feels that these estimates are necessary for the carrying out of the purposes of the immigration branch. I am hopeful that the committee will see fit to accept these estimates.

Mr. JAQUES: Hon. members have stressed the importance of selecting immigrants for Canada. I am wondering what tests are to be applied to immigrants. It used to be simple. The immigrants were selected on their physical condition, with perhaps some regard for their financial position. If they had a little money it was all to the good. However, the physical condition was the chief consideration. That is not true to-day. Physical condition should be neither the only nor the chief test. It is the mental and moral condition of immigrants that should be examined. Why are so many people anxious to come to Canada to make their living and to spend their lives here? Why are they so anxious to leave countries which physically are just as desirable, and some of them more desirable as a place of residence, than is Canada? Is it for material reasons that these people desire to come to and live in Canada? No! They seek the individual freedom which the people of Canada still enjoy, but which has been destroyed in the greater part of Europe. It is that freedom which we enjoy in Canada that must be guarded at all costs.

The minister has said it was not the purpose of the department to inquire into a person's religion. That may be so. But to-day if we are to safeguard the freedom of the Canadian people, it is necessary to inquire into the political affiliations of immigrants wishing to come to this country. There can be no doubt that those countries of which Canada is one, which have thus far preserved the freedom of individuals, have become the mecca of all peoples who now exist where freedom has been lost. The very reason for our freedom is this: So far Canada has resisted the disruptive poisons of Marxian socialism which destroyed the freedom of the people of Europe and brought about the terrible calamities which have overtaken that continent. Perhaps the minister will be able to tell the committee by what means they will test the mental and moral fitness of those who want to come to Canada. Personally I do not know how it can be done especially in these days of turmoil when it is almost impossible to find out just what a person does stand for.

I should like to say one word on behalf of these Polish soldiers. It seems to me that they have qualified for entry. When I was in England I was told on all sides that no one had fought more gallantly against the nazis than these Poles. That rules out any possibility of their being fascists or nazis. Since they are not welcomed in any country controlled by Russia, that rules out the probability of their being communists. It would seem to me that being neither one nor the other they should become good supporters of the Canadian way of life, which is neither socialist, nor communistic nor fascist.

One magazine—I do not know how large a circulation it has—is opposing the entry of these Poles because they are Roman Catholics. I think I am right in saying that of necessity any Christian in Poland would be a Roman Catholic because that is the religion of the country. I have no religious prejudice at all. I am not a Roman Catholic, but just the same I believe that catholicism is one of the safeguards against communism and nazism. I sincerely hope it is, anyway.

That is all I wanted to say. I do not know whether it is possible for the minister to tell us how the suitability of these immigrants is to be decided. Physically it is a simple thing, but when you come to philosophic reasons it would seem to be a most difficult thing to determine. I want to impress upon the government the necessity of taking every precaution against the entry of those imbued with ideas contrary to the Canadian spirit which has made Canada the mecca for the free. I refer to our personal freedom of the individual.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—

187. Field and inspectional service, Canada, $1,693,694.

Mr. FRASER: This item is $383,349 greater than it was last year. Is that because of the extra field service required?

Mr. GLEN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—Immigration branch—

567. Repatriation of wives and dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces overseas, $2,000.

Mr. FRASER: How about the fiancees who are still in Holland and Belgium? Could not they be brought here before these Poles?

Mr. GLEN: There is a different type of transportation required. As I said last night, some of these fiancees in Holland and Belgium are coming across by other means. They will have to have medical inspection. We have that in London, and some are coming there to be inspected and then continuing to Canada by air. First we must attend to wives and children.

Mr. FRASER: I know you must look after them first, but after these Poles have been inspected could not the inspectors go into Belgium and Holland?

Mr. GLEN: They are working in Italy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SINCLAIR (VANCOUVER NORTH)—SERVICE OF CANADIANS IN AFRICA UNDER FIELD MARSHAL MONTGOMERY

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to rise to a very personal and friendly point of privilege. Hon. members of this house object occasionally to what is said in this house, and also to what is said in the press of this country. To-day I wish to make a correction, not of what has been said in this house, or of what has been said in the press of this country, but of what was said on parliament hill to-day by, I think, the greatest soldier this war has seen, the soldiers' soldier, Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery of Alamein. It was a pleasure to hear him, but there was one special remark he made to which I have to take, on behalf of my own comrades, a personal objection, when he said that he had led Canadians everywhere except in Africa; because I should like in this house to remind the Field Marshal and to remind this house that, as Commander of the Eighth Army he led the desert air force, in which over five thousand Canadian aircrew served, and which, before Field Marshal Montgomery got to the desert, was led by the greatest Canadian airman who ever took wing, Air Vice-Marshal Raymond Collishaw, and in which desert air force, after Field Marshal Montgomery took command, there was one all-Canadian squadron, the City of Windsor squadron, of which I was a very humble member.

More than that, before I sit down I should like to pay a personal tribute to one of the staff of this House of Commons. As I stood in my office, which fortunately fronts on parliament hill, and listened to our excellent Royal Canadian Mounted Police band play tunes of the last war, and tunes which I did not recognize, it occurred to me that these bands are missing one thing; because for Field Marshal Montgomery of Alamein one piece should have been played. The ceremony ended, and our carillonneur of the peace tower here, who is, I am glad to say, a former airman, played the one piece of the desert, the piece of the Luftwaffe and the Afrika Korps, the piece of the Eighth Army and the desert air force, "Lili Marlene."

I hope that Field Marshal Montgomery will accept this correction, for there were a great many Canadians who did fight very gallantly in the desert.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

76. Departmental administration, $170,340.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, in presenting the estimates for the Department of Fisheries for this year, it is not my intention to make any prolonged or extended remarks, but there are some observations regarding the reorganization and expansion of the department which I feel I should make at this time.

When speaking before the committee of the whole house on my estimates, December 17 last, I made the following statement:

> No doubt the future will entail certain expansion and changes in the department. I cannot go into detail at this time but we have hopes of producing adequate staff of high calibre and properly trained. In this connection I might mention that we shall be looking for recruits from among those of our young men who have been in the three armed services and who are now returning from overseas. These new recruits will be given proper courses of instruction which, it is hoped, will make them educationists as well as police officers.

I am pleased now to be able to report to the committee that, in so far as the outside administrative service of this department is concerned, those plans have now become crystallized and steps are now being taken to bring 100 new fisheries inspectors into the field service on the east and west coasts. A basic feature of this plan is an arrangement under which a group of applicants on each coast will undergo a period of probationary training carried on under the joint auspices of the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the vocational training branch of the Department of Labour. Thirty-five appointments to inspectorships are to be made in British Columbia; and in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, where our problems are different and local conditions necessitate a greater enlargement of field force there will be sixty-five all told new inspectors appointed, making the total of 100 for both coasts.

Increase in our inspectorship strength in British Columbia and the maritimes has been made necessary by the increase which has taken place in recent years in departmental functions and by changes in their nature and scope. In order that we may serve present-day needs of the fishing industry as effectively as possible and assist in further fisheries development, the department must have additional field officers, and we are setting out to get them from among men who not only show natural qualifications for this sort of work, but have also been specially trained for the job.

The core of our recruitment scheme is in this arrangement to obtain the new officers from among people who have satisfactorily completed specific probationary training. I am told that we are breaking new ground in requiring applicants for positions in the public service to qualify for appointment by taking prescribed training under departmental control, but I do not think there is any question that it is a sound move.

In this connection, only applicants approved by the Department of Veterans Affairs for grants, which it provides for ex-servicemen completing their education or undergoing training, will be considered for these new inspectorships. Preference will be given to applicants not more than thirty-five years old when applications close, but exceptions may be made in the case of men not over forty years of age who are considered to possess outstanding qualifications. Education equivalent to high school graduation will be an essential requirement. Full details as to conditions governing application and appointment will be announced by the civil service commission shortly, but without going into these matters in detail I may add that applicants who are taken on training and complete their work will qualify for appointment as inspectors either grade II or grade I, depending on their rating as trainees. In British Columbia there are sixteen grade II posts to be filled and nineteen grade I positions. On the east coast there are, in New Brunswick, fourteen grade II and nineteen grade I posts to be filled; in Nova Scotia, seventeen grade II and ten grade I, and in Prince Edward Island, four grade II and one grade I, or thirty-five grade II and thirty grade I on the east coast.

As stated before, there will be, in all, thirty-five new inspectorships for British Columbia and sixty-five for the maritimes. In order to fill these appointments, forty-four candidates in British Columbia and ninety-three in the maritimes will be selected by the civil service commission. The commission will make the selection by "screening" all applications, thus determining by an evaluation of the information the applicants give regarding themselves in their application papers, by interviews and by oral tests, if necessary, what men are best suited to be taken on as trainees. For about the first month of their probationary training period, which will cover something like five months in all, the trainees will be employed in the field as temporary fishery guardians with pay, working under the supervision of some of our present inspectors. Those of them whose work as guardians has indicated that they have an aptitude for fisheries service will then attend a fishery course; for those on the west coast, in the Vancouver area, and, for those on the east coast; probably at Windsor, Nova Scotia. This course will be carried on jointly by fisheries, veterans affairs and labour's vocational training section, and will include a study of such subjects as methods of fish processing and inspection, fisheries biology, and so on, as well as instruction in the duties of fisheries inspectors. During the course the men will receive the basic grants provided under the vocational and educational training plan for veterans, together with the monthly allowances for dependent children. At the end of the course the candidates will be rated on their work, and those who have reached the required standing will be given an oral examination. The course record and the showing made in the oral test will together determine the candidate's final rating. In the maritimes there are, in addition to the new inspectorships, a number of permanent seasonal vacancies which offer employment for from seven to eleven months of the year. Should qualified eligible candidates remain after the full-time positions have been filled, they may be offered seasonal positions.

The established preference for ex-servicemen with overseas service will apply in case of appointments. In addition, preference in appointments will be given, first, to qualified residents of the fisheries sub-district in which the vacancy occurs and, second, to qualified residents of the province concerned.

That briefly outlines the present plans for the expansion and improvement of the outside service of the department, and it is expected that all the 100 new inspectors will have completed their training, be appointed and on the job by May 1, 1947. I sincerely hope that, with the training these new inspectors receive, they will prove themselves to be educationists and not mere police officers. I want them to be regarded as friends of the fishermen. I also hope and trust that these plans will meet with the approval of this committee and of the industry as a whole. I further hope that these new younger men in the service will eventually provide, by way of future promotion, many suitable administrative officials for this department in the years to come. I am firmly convinced that the best way to obtain suitable officials is by way of promotion within the service, provided that they have had the proper groundwork and training; and that proper groundwork and training should be in the early years of their employment and in the outside field service of the department.

I am not as yet in a position to make any announcement as regards the reorganization and expansion of the inside service of the department, but I hope it will not be long before I shall be able to do so. I have adopted the policy of reorganizing from the bottom to the top instead of vice versa. By adopting these present plans for reorganization, I hope that in the future, whoever may be minister of fisheries, will not find himself in the position in which I have found myself, in that there is an inadequate number of suitable officials in the department. In saying this, I am not casting any reflections on my predecessors in office, because it must be borne in mind that we had those years of depression when every effort was made to cut expenditures to a minimum, followed by the war years when this department had to be neglected by reason of the prosecution of the war. Nor am I casting any reflection on the officials of this department. I can frankly say that, on the whole, the Department of Fisheries has able, competent and suitable officials, but the one big drawback is that there are not enough of them. To-day we have several senior officials either going out on pension or soon to go out, and we have not, in some instances, suitable men in the department to be promoted to take their places. The officials that we have are good and competent; but, as I have said before, there are not enough of them. I wish to take this opportunity of paying special tribute to them. I am not going to mention any names. They have given loyal and efficient service to the government of Canada. Many have been overworked and have had to work over a period of years with few or no holidays. This is definitely not a good situation. With the coming reorganization of the inside service, I hope that I shall be able to improve that situation.

With these remarks regarding the reorganization and expansion of the department, I submit these estimates for the consideration of this committee.

Mr. REID: May I, first of all, compliment the minister on the statement he has just made. Those of us who have been interested in fisheries for any considerable number of years have long recognized the fact that, if there was any one department that required new blood in the way of officials and experts, it was the Department of Fisheries. But the need for these officials and experts did not merely arise during the war period. It was evident, to me at least, that steps of this kind should have been taken in the pre-war years. However, I trust that the matter will turn out as the minister expects it will, and personally I have no doubt that the step taken is one which will redound to the benefit not only of the department but of the country and fishing industry as well.

The matter I have to deal with is one on which I would not at this time delay the committee, but it has to do with important questions that are more than national. It has to do with international affairs and therefore, in my opinion, it cannot wait. It has relation to the policy of four countries outside Canada, and I trust that the committee will be a little lenient with me if I do something that I have not been in the habit of doing, namely, to follow my notes closely.

Prior to the commencement of the session, I placed on the order paper a resolution drawing attention to the danger and possible destruction of Canada's offshore fisheries. Unfortunately, however, no opportunity was afforded to discuss this resolution, so that I am taking this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the government in the hope that some action will be taken along the lines I am about to suggest.

May I say at the outset that the matter, although it has to do with fisheries, comes, in the first instance, under the Department of External Affairs. But since the Minister of Fisheries is the minister in the government representing that portfolio, it is his duty, I believe, to take the matters I am about to lay before the committee and place them before the government for action.

The question of fishing in offshore areas of the sea, that is, fisheries outside the narrow belt of waters around our shores known as the three-mile limit, is a question which has perplexed many nations since early days. Time will not permit me on this occasion to deal with the history of the rights of nations on the high seas. Suffice it for me to say, however, that, contrary to popular belief, the three-mile limit of jurisdiction is not an accepted international law by any manner of means. Important maritime countries such as Norway, Sweden, Russia, Italy, Portugal and others have never recognized, and do not at the present time recognize or admit the principle of a three-mile limit of jurisdiction.

While it is true that Great Britain and the United States, on the other hand, have generally adhered to the three-mile limit, nevertheless both these countries have on many occasions changed the limit to suit some special occasion. In 1926 the league of nations sent a draft agreement regarding this matter to almost all the nations, the replies to which are most interesting. Norway claimed rights over ten marine miles, a limit which, by the way, that country has maintained for over two hundred years. The Swedish government claimed rights to four miles; Portugal claimed rights to twelve marine miles, and Portugal also stated in her reply that it was absolutely necessary for that country to preserve the species of fish which inhabit her waters, pointing out that, if those species became depleted or disappeared, Portugal's economic position would be endangered.

Canada's position in regard to her fisheries is similar to that of Portugal. The Spanish government has long adopted jurisdiction over territorial waters for six miles out from her shores. Russia has extended and claims sea control for a distance of twelve miles from all her coasts bordering on the ocean. It is not generally known that on September 16, 1821 the Emperor Alexander issued an order in which the whole west coast of America north of the fifty-first parallel was declared to belong exclusively to Russia, foreign ships being prohibited from approaching within 100 Italian miles off the North American Pacific shores under penalty of confiscation.

Although most countries replied to the draft agreement of the league of nations, it is interesting to note that the British government made no statement whatsoever on the matter. The silence of Great Britain and other governments of the British empire is significant and would seem to indicate at least some recognition that the three-mile limit is becoming obsolete in view of present-day conditions. As already mentioned, and as could be proved if time permitted, there is no international law designating three miles as the limit of jurisdiction off our shores. Down through the ages the nations have at various times taken jurisdictional powers on the high seas and for greater distances than the distance ancient cannon were able to fire, which in those days was not more than three miles.

I want now particularly to deal with the reasons why I believe it is important and imperative that Canada take steps to control the waters off her shores so as to protect from possible exploitation and destruction our great fisheries. First of all, may I say that few countries are so fortunate as Canada in having their fisheries at their own back door, so to speak. Most nations have to travel far afield for fish supplies or catches.

Many foolishly believe that the fish in the sea or in the ocean are inexhaustible. Such, however, is not the case. It has been incontestably proved that some of the most valuable coastal and ocean fisheries are susceptible to depletion by overfishing, even though such fishing may be carried on more than three miles from shore. The great banks on the Atlantic are proof alone of this statement. The North sea and the Arctic ocean, as well as the great banks of Newfoundland and Labrador, draw the fleets of more than a score of nations.

Canada, however, especially on the Pacific coast, can obtain her supplies of fish within short sailing distances of her shores. The great Canadian fisheries are either in inside waters or offshore within safe distance of our harbours. Canada so far, however, has paid little attention, if any, to fishing on the high seas either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific. The Canadian government has made no effort whatsoever to define Canadian fishermen's offshore limits if they should be challenged by another nation, except in a treaty with the United States covering halibut; nor, so far as I know, has the government disclosed its reaction or intention in regard to the proposal of protective conservation zones in offshore waters made recently by the President of the United States.

As a matter of fact, the Canadian government has scarcely lifted a finger to survey and explore the riches of our offshore fishing grounds in which every nation at the present time could fish with impunity and to the destruction of these fisheries. Whilst what I have to say applies to Atlantic as well as Pacific waters, I want to emphasize the problem from the Pacific outlook, owing to the fact that I am more familiar with the Pacific than with the Atlantic.

The Pacific deep sea fisheries, like those of the Atlantic, are extremely important to Canada and her economy. Canadian fishermen in these offshore waters fish side by side with fishermen of the United States not only for halibut but for pilchard, herring, salmon, cod, tuna, sardines and many other types of fish as well.

It is obvious that at the present time no regulation or limitation can or should be placed upon Canadian vessels fishing outside the three-mile limit, unless similar limitations are enforced upon vessels of the United States fleet. Whilst it is true that the United States fishing fleet has taken the cream of the fisheries, from waters off the Canadian coast, the greatest danger tc our Pacific fisheries, as well as to our Atlantic fisheries in the future, is from the danger of exploitation by nations other than the United States. Take the case of but one variety alone, that of our salmon.

Here is an industry which gives employment to many thousands of our citizens, and one in which many millions of dollars are invested. All the salmon caught either in offshore waters or inshore waters or in our rivers and lakes are all salmon which have been born and reared in Canadian or United States streams and lakes. Where it not for the fact that Canada, and the United States as well, have enacted conservation measures to protect these fish, there would be no salmon fishery on the Atlantic or the Pacific to-day. The importance of the Canadian fishing industry to our economy is shown by the following statistics:

The total marketed value of all fish in 1945	$100 million
Total capital invested	67 million
Total numbers employed	81,000

However, this is but part of the story. To preserve this industry, Canada has spent over $122 million in the protection, conservation and rehabilitation of the fisheries on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that Canadian rivers and lakes provide the home and nursery beds for all species of salmon. After hatching, the salmon remains from six to eighteen months in the lakes and streams and then goes out to sea. Included in the many salmon streams and rivers we have in Canada is the greatest salmon producing river in the world, namely, the Fraser. Quite a few years ago Canada entered into a treaty with the United States regarding both coasts and with the state of Washington and British Columbia. Over the entire length of both coast lines there runs an undershelf known as the continental shelf. In some places the water over the shelf of rock is not over a hundred feet in depth. It is to this shelf of rock on the Pacific and the Atlantic that the salmon go and play around until they reach maturity. In the second, third and fourth year, depending on the species and variety of salmon, when fully grown to maturity they return to lay their eggs on the gravel bars of Canadian rivers and lakes whence they came.

Here is the danger. While the fish are playing around in these shallow waters, any country other than the United States and Canada can send fleets of boats to where the salmon are and, by intense fishing, entirely wipe them out. Is Canada, therefore, going to stand idly by while this happens, or shall we be sensible and join with the United States in designating these waters as ours for fishing? Canada and the United States have a just and prior claim to these fish, even though they are out in the open sea, because, but for Canada and the United States, there might not be any salmon there at all, because we provide the home and nursery for them. On the other hand, we not only regulate and control our own fishermen in order to preserve and perpetuate the fish, but we have also expended considerable sums of money in doing so.

The United States is much more alert to the dangers threatening her offshore fisheries than we in Canada seem to be, and therefore is taking action to avoid disaster. As recently as September last, President Truman announced that the United States government had decided to regulate and control fisheries on the high seas contiguous to United States territory. The order by President Truman provides for establishment, under recommendation of the secretary of the interior and the state department, of conservation zones in areas of the high seas contiguous to United States coasts. Until this order was passed, the only sea fisheries which the United States had participated in regulating were those of whales, pacific halibut and fur seals. The new order by President Truman notifies other nations that in areas where fisheries have been, or hereafter shall be developed and maintained by nationals of United States alone, bounded zones will be set up in which United States may regulate and control all fishing activities. This new policy announced by the president will enable the United States to protect effectively at least one of its most valuable Pacific fisheries, that of the Alaska salmon. As the President stated in his proclamation, uncontrolled fishery activities and fisheries which allow foreign nations to fish with no thought of conservation, have constituted an ever-increasing menace to the salmon fishery of the United States, and therefore, he declares, to United States welfare.

Canada's position is similar to that of the United States. An underwater shelf of rock similar to that of the continental shelf on the Pacific runs parallel to the Atlantic coasts of the United States and Canada, and it is my information that the United States are considering taking steps also to protect those outside shallow waters on the Atlantic from exploitation by foreign fishing vessels.

The bill introduced by the President goes much farther than this, however, in that an invitation is made to other countries to join with him in this important measure. It is intended that, in areas where the nationals of other countries may be involved, zones will be established by agreements, and joint regulations will be made effective.

Here, Mr. Chairman, I would ask permission of the committee to place on record the proclamation of the President of the United States rather than take the time to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(The proclamation is as follows:)

Policy of the United States With Respect to Coastal Fisheries in Certain Areas of the High Seas

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Whereas for some years the government of the United States of America has viewed with concern the inadequacy of present arrangements for the protection and perpetuation of the fishery resources contiguous to its coasts, and in view of the potentially disturbing effect of this situation, has carefully studied the possibility of improving the jurisdictional basis for conservation measures and international cooperation in this field; and

Whereas such fishery resources have a special importance to coastal communities as a source of livelihood and to the nation as a food and industrial resource; and

Whereas the progressive development of new methods and techniques contributes to intensified fishing over wide sea areas and in certain cases seriously threatens fisheries with depletion; and

Whereas there is an urgent need to protect coastal fishery resources from destructive exploitation, having due regard to conditions peculiar to each region and situation and to the special rights and equities of the coastal state and of any other state which may have established a legitimate interest therein;

Now, therefore, I, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the following policy of the United States of America with respect to coastal fisheries in certain areas of the high seas:

In view of the pressing need for conservation and protection of fishery resources, the government of the United States regards it as proper to establish conservation zones in those areas of the high seas contiguous to the coasts of the United States wherein fishing activities have been or in the future may be developed and maintained on a substantial scale. Where such activities have been or shall hereafter be developed and maintained by its nationals alone, the United States regards it as proper to establish explicitly bounded conservation zones in which fishing activities shall be subject to the regulation and control of the United States. Where such activities have been or shall hereafter be legitimately developed and maintained jointly by nationals of the United States and nationals of other states, explicity bounded conservation zones may be established under agreements between the United States and such other states; and all fishing activities in such zones shall be subject to regulation and control as provided in such agreements. The right of any state to establish conservation zones off its shores and in accordance with the above principles is conceded, provided that corresponding recognition is given to any fishing interests of nationals of the United States which may exist in such areas. The character as high seas of the areas in which such conservation zones are established and the right to their free and unimpeded navigation are in no way thus affected.

Executive Order

Providing For the Establishment of Fishery Conservation Zones

By virtue of and pursuant to the authority vested in me as President of the United States, it is hereby ordered that the Secretary of State and and Secretary of the Interior shall from time to time jointly recommend the establismment by Executive orders of fishery conservation zones in areas of the high seas contiguous to the coasts of the United States, pursuant to the proclamation entitled "Policy of the United States with Respect to Coastal Fisheries in Certain Areas of the High Seas," this day signed by me, and said Secretaries shall in each case recommend provisions to be incorporated in such orders relating to the administration, regulation and control of the fishery resources of and fishing activities in such zones, pursuant to authority of law heretofore or hereafter provided.

Harry S. Truman.

The White House
September 28, 1945

Mr. REID: This, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most important proclamations made by President Truman since he became president. Following the announcement of this policy, the republic of Mexico through its president also issued a proclamation for the control of offshore fishery resources, along similar lines to that of the United States, and likewise instructing the government of Mexico to take steps to negotiate with other countries treaties which may be necessary. I should like to place on record the proclamation by Mexico, which is along similar lines to that made by President Truman of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN: Agreed.

Proclamation of the President of the Republic of Mexico

The President Recovers, in the Name of the Nation, our Submarine Continental Territory

Control of Fisheries Resources in the High Seas

Present and Future Conservation of Incalculable Natural Riches Which Clearly Constitute Part of the Natural Resources

The Executive Recommends the Carrying out of the Bills for the Establishment of Pertinent Law—the Submarine Bed Adjacent to the Coastline Out to 200 Meters Below the Surface is to Belong to Mexico

The President of the Republic issued yesterday an order of historic importance in accordance with which the national territory of our nation is to extend to include dominion over all the platform or submarine continental shelf adjacent to our shores provided it not be in excess of a depth of 200 meters with a view to preserving all the natural known or unknown riches that may be found in the seabed, such as mineral products, fauna and flora. Particular pains will be taken for vigilance, use and control of zones of fisheries protection with a view to seeking the development of the resources of the high seas irrespective of the distance separating them from the coastline.

The Chief of the Nation in taking this exceedingly important step announces that he is already giving appropriate orders so that the authorities who have jurisdiction over this new thesis of Mexican territory may proceed to form the appropriate projects of law and the fulfillment of those treaties which may be necessary.

The experience of recent years has shown the increasing necessity for state to preserve those natural riches which throughout the years for various reasons have been beyond their control and beyond integrated development.

As is known, the lands constituting the continental masses in general do not rise in steep slope from the great depths of the ocean but rather rest upon a submarine foundation termed continental shelf which is limited by a line joining points of equal depth (200 meters) from which the slope descends either suddenly or gradually into the zones of middle depth of the seas. Obviously, therefore, this platform or shelf constitutes an integral part of continental countries and it is neither reasonable, nor wise, nor possible that Mexico shall fail to take care of jurisdiction, development, and control of this shelf in those areas adjoining its territory in both oceans.

It is now known, as a result of various scientific investigations, that in this continental shelf there are natural riches, minerals, liquids and gases, phosphates, calcium, hydrocarbons, etc., of an incalculable value contained in the submarine platform the legal incorporation of which to the national territory is necessary and not to be deferred.

On the other hand it is equally urgent that the Mexican nation, which nature has endowed with fisheries resources of an extraordinary wealth, such as those which are to be found, not to mention others, in the maritime area off Lower California, protect, exploit, and develop these resources in an orderly fashion. This matter is the more urgent today when the world impoverished and needy through the war brought about by totalitarianism, must increase to the maximum its food production.

In the years before the war the western hemisphere had to watch permanent fleets of non-continental countries dedicating themselves to immoderate and exhaustive exploitation of these great resources which, while it is true must help in the welfare of peoples, obviously belong first to that country which possessed them and to that continent to which they belong. Because of its very nature, it is necessary that this protection be carried as far out as those places or zones indicated by science for the development of the fisheries resources of the high seas irrespective of the distance separating them from the coast.

Basing its action upon these reasons, the government of the Republic recovers all the platform or continental shelf adjacent to its coastline and every and each natural resource, whether known or unknown, found therein, and is moving toward that vigilance, use, and control in the zones of fisheries protection necessary to the conservation of such a source of well being.

The above does not imply that the government of Mexico intends to fail to recognize legitimate rights of third parties on a basis of reciprocity or that the government of Mexico intends to affect legitimate rights of free navigation on the high seas since the only thing it seeks is the conservation of these resources for the national, the continental, and world well being.

The government is already issuing orders to the appropriate authorities so that the latter may take steps to formulate the projects of law which are necessary and to negotiate those treaties which may be required.

Manuel Avila Camacho
The President of the Republic.

Mexico, D.F.
October 29, 1945

Mr. REID: The action of both these countries, particularly that of the United States, is of such importance that Canada cannot very well ignore what has been done, and I intend to show, before concluding, that for the future peace of the world, as well as for Canada's own future economy, we should without delay accept President Truman's offer.

For a moment or two, let us first look at the Pacific halibut fishery. It is not generally known that more halibut is produced from off the Canadian and United States shores than in any other ocean or area of water in the world. Of the total world production of halibut, sixty-six per cent is produced by United States and Canadian fishermen in the Pacific right off our shores. Here is a fishery which, but for the regulatory measures taken by the United States and Canada, might today be largely non-existent. In the early years of halibut fishing, all fishing was done comparatively close to shore. We had not at that time developed the diesel engine. Nevertheless, without regulation, this fishery, owing to over-fishing, commenced a rapid decline after the year 1911. In that year the catch of halibut reached a total of 56.9 million pounds. In 1930 this had gone down to 22.6 million pounds.

The Pacific halibut has always been exclusively a United States and Canadian activity. Employed in that industry in 1941 were 576 fishing boats, 173 of these being Canadian. The gross earnings of the Canadian fishermen in 1941 were well over $1 million, which makes this industry both for Americans and Canadians an extremely important means of livelihood for great numbers of citizens. Fifty per cent of all halibut caught are now taken in area 2 in the open waters off British Columbia shores. The halibut fishery banks are divided into three areas by the international halibut commission, one of these areas being in the gulf of Alaska and some seventy-five miles or more offshore.

Do not let us forget that, before the war, the United States had considerable trouble with the Japanese in regard to fishing in Alaskan waters, and so serious was it at one time that there was almost open warfare. Prior to the war, the Japanese had been for years in the habit of sending out large ships on extended investigational and fishing trips to various parts of the world. These ships are known as mother ships and able to go a long way from their home port, for a year at least, without the necessity of returning for supplies. Japan claimed she was merely testing the salinity and the temperature of the sea water in Alaskan waters but admitted, when pressed, they were fishing for crabs as well. Japan denied most emphatically she was catching salmon. When it was reported to Washington that the real purpose of Japan was to engage in salmon fishing, as well as at the same time mapping out the Alaska coast for military purposes, the authorities at Washington refused to believe such statements. The fishermen of Alaska, however, were able to procure the services of a plane which flew a number of times over these mother ships, and by taking actual photographs were able to show that the Japanese were deliberately lying, and were actually fishing for salmon and using nets between three to four miles in length. It was only when the American fishermen of Alaska, however, threatened to take direct action themselves, that Washington officially protested to the Japanese government, and so Japan had the mother ships withdrawn. Bear in mind that Japan was not then quite ready for war. It is a well known fact, however, that, had war on the Pacific not intervened, these mother ships from Japan would have increased fishing operations there. They would later have moved down the Alaskan and Canadian coasts, and by the use of their intensive fishing methods and three to four mile long nets destroyed not only the halibut banks, but the salmon and other fisheries off our coast as well. It is to prevent this kind of exploitation and destruction from taking place in the future that President Truman has issued the recent proclamation with the view of extending control over all these offshore fisheries in the Pacific and Atlantic, and inviting Canada or any other country to join with them in the matter of control and conservation.

For the future peace of the world, now is the proper time to join with the United States in designating these offshore areas as areas in which Canada and the United States have distinct claims and justifiable priority rights.

No country can dispute the fact that all varieties of salmon frequenting the continental shelf in offshore Canadian waters have been born and reared under protective and conservative measures in Canadian rivers and lakes. No country can dispute the fact also that the halibut and salmon banks would be largely non-existent were it not for the regulatory and conservation measures enforced by Canada and the United States under mutual agreement, and carried out under an international treaty between the two countries. Let us boldly face the fact that other nations, with no thought or consideration for conservation, may desire to invade these offshore north Pacific fisheries.

The total world production of fish and fishing products in 1940 was around 40,000 million pounds. Of this quantity Japan, prior to the war, produced twenty-two percent of the world's total fisheries production. The United States came second with eleven per cent, and the Soviet Union produced ten per cent, while Canada came tenth on the list with our share amounting to only 3·3 per cent.

Recent reports from Tokyo indicate a systematic campaign by the Japanese government and fisheries officials to break out of the fisheries areas assigned to Japan since their surrender, and with a view to Japan's gradually regaining something of their former dominant fishing empire.

Just what part the Soviet Union will take in the fishing areas of the Pacific formerly controlled by Japan is something which has not yet been made clear. In all likelihood, Russia will take back from Japan the fishing rights and areas around Kamchatka, which fishing rights, as we know, were forced from Russia following the Russo-Japanese war of 1911.

Information has only recently come from Moscow that Russia has set up two distinct ministries of fisheries, one for the Black and Caspian seas areas, and the other for the northern Pacific. Before that country gets time to become wholly equipped for fishing or before Japan once again sails the seas of the world with her large mother ships, notification should be served on the world by Canada in conjunction with the United States of the justifiable rights and protective interests both countries have in these important fisheries off the British Columbia and Alaskan coasts. By doing so now, all countries will know in advance what our claims are and the reasons for our claims in these areas and will, I believe, be reluctant, in the face of these justifiably claimed rights, to invade the designated fishing areas. Action of this kind by Canada and the United States may be one practical way of keeping peace and preventing war. It will certainly be much more difficult in the future, if action of this kind is not taken, to remove fishing vessels belonging to other nations, if they invade these fisheries, and who might have no hesitation in sending vessels to fish in these areas, were no such protective regulations in existence.

Three countries, Russia, the United States and Canada, have an equal stake in the potentialities of the north Pacific fisheries, and a vital interest in how modern mechanized methods of fishing will affect the fishery of their respective territorial waters. All the salmon found in the north Pacific ocean propagate in the rivers flowing into the north Pacific from the hinterland of Russia, Alaska, British Columbia, Washington and Oregon.

Following an agreement being reached between Canada and the United States regarding regulatory and protective measures on the fishery off United States and Canadian territory, a further step could then be taken jointly by both governments looking toward the pooling of all the scientific information now available within all three countries, and with the further object of the establishment of an international commission, through which to assess all the facts upon which regulations should be based. The examples of the international halibut commission and the international Pacific salmon commission, both of which are under the joint control of the United States and Canada, places us in a position to make a valuable contribution to the greater objective, embracing the fisheries of the entire North Pacific.

Here is a further opportunity for Canada to show leadership in world affairs, by first joining with the United States along the lines contained in the recent proclamation and then later moving forward conjointly with the United States in friendly discussions with Russia, and invite that country to join with the United States and Canada in any protective measures deemed desirable for the development of the fisheries in north Pacific waters, in which all three countries have special interests.

It has been stated that one of the difficulties which might confront Canada, were we to accept the invitation outlined in President Truman's proclamation, has to do with the fisheries on the Atlantic. Whilst this may or may not be correct, it will be most unfortunate if we close our eyes to the situation, and nothing is done by Canada, owing perhaps to some seeming difficulties, which certain high officials at Ottawa think may arise, regarding any protective regulation of fisheries off the Canadian or Atlantic coast.

In the past, Canada has been far too reluctant to protect her own interests where other countries were involved. Two striking instances of the truth of this statement have occurred on the Pacific coast. By our negligence we lost all the rights on the Columbia river given to Canada under a treaty with the United States in 1845. So far as I can find out, no protest was ever made by Canada against the loss of these rights.

I have brought this matter before the house on two occasions, under Prime Minister Bennett and under the present Prime Minister. The only answer I could get was that I had introduced a matter of a delicate nature affecting another nation. But we had rights; we were given rights in 1845, under a treaty. I shall not take time to read the treaty, but as Canadians we had rights of sailing from the interior of British Columbia right to the Pacific coast. But we sat quietly by and allowed the Americans to close up the entire river by the construction of large dams.

Another case I have in mind, where Canada has been derelict in her duty to defend her rights, is that on the coastal waters known as Hecate strait between the mainland of British Columbia and Queen Charlotte islands. Here is a stretch of water, which is strictly Canadian waters and was so regarded by Canada up until at least the year 1907. However, for quite a number of years past United States fishing vessels have been fishing with impunity in these Canadian waters, and without objection or protest by Canada. Prior to 1907,

United States fishing vessels had attempted to fish in Hecate strait, but on every such occasion instructions were given by the Canadian government to the Canadian fisheries patrol service to chase them off and prevent what was then termed illegal fishing.

Back in 1905 the government of that day set up a commission to investigate all fishing matters on the Pacific coast. One of the particular matters investigated by the commission was that of Hecate strait, and a report of their recommendation was made in 1907.

While it is not my intention to quote the entire recommendations, I shall quote an excerpt from them, because I believe it is necessary that I do so at this time. I quote from page 29 of the Report and Recommendations of the British Columbia Fisheries Commission, 1905-1907, where it states:

> This strait has always been regarded as British Columbian waters, and no fishing operations by parties not British subjects were carried on there until about fifteen years ago. As soon as it was realized that the halibut banks between Queen Charlotte islands and the mainland coast were being marauded by foreign vessels, an order was issued by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries at the time, warning all fishing vessels, not flying the British flag, out of these waters. The wire conveying these instructions to the officer in command of the dominion cruiser Quadra is dated April 18, 1896.

I am going to read only one or two further excerpts from these recommendations. I would say, however, that they deal with the matter completely. The recommendation to the government was that these waters were strictly Canadian, and they said that no other fishing ships should be allowed to fish there. The report states further:

> The waters are territorial Canadian waters, from which United States and other foreign fishing vessels are legally excluded.

And again:

> In these waters occur the most valuable halibut and salmon resorts in the world, and no measures should be neglected to preserve them, and to prevent their threatened depletion by foreign poachers.

That was the last that was heard of the report. The Canadian government just shut their eyes or went to sleep in the matter, and appeared to be afraid, although right along, up to that time, they had been asserting that these waters were our waters. As I say, Canada has, since then, simply closed her eyes to the entire matter.

Action should certainly be taken by the Canadian government to clear up the matter as speedily as possible, making clear to the United States and to other nations that Hecate strait is, without any peradventure of doubt, Canadian waters and entirely under the jurisdiction and control of the Canadian government. I quite realize there may be difficulties now that Canada has entered into a treaty with the United States in regard to the regulation of halibut fishing in Hecate strait and in the gulf of Alaska. In view of this treaty, I am not suggesting that steps be taken now to chase the Americans off these waters. I am suggesting, however, that we should make it clear to the United States that, although we have entered into a treaty with them to preserve and control halibut fishing in the waters of the British Columbia and Alaskan coast, this does not give them any vested right of law, to fish with impunity in Hecate strait.

In Alaskan waters, the United States had no compunction back in 1924 in chasing a Canadian fishing boat in Clarence strait out of there, and later fining the owners for fishing illegally in those waters, even though the Canadian vessel was twenty miles off shore.

One way out of the difficulty with the United States in regard to Hecate strait would be for Canada to take the advantage offered us in President Truman's proclamation. In coming to an agreement with the United States to act conjointly in protecting the fisheries on the continental shelf off the United States and British Columbia coasts, we could come to some agreement with the United States regarding these waters. Such an agreement would strengthen Canada's position in the event of any attempted future exploitation by fishing vessels belonging to other foreign nations. In doing so, however, Canada should take a firm stand that the waters of Hecate strait are entirely and strictly Canadian waters. A further advantage in taking action of this kind now would be to deter, in the future, Japanese, Russian or citizens of any other country from fishing there. As the matter stands at present, there is nothing to hinder any country from sending vessels to fish there and in any protests or representations made by Canada against such exploitation, our position in the matter would be weakened owing to the fact that we have allowed the United States to fish there without protest and have not officially declared Hecate strait to be Canadian territory.

I urge the government that now is the opportune time for Canada to take action similar to that of the United States and the republic of Mexico. By so doing, it would indicate to the world that the governments of the three countries were in entire agreement on the matter, and that any exploitation by foreign fishing vessels on the continental shelf off the shores of the North American continent would be an unfriendly act and an encroachment involving the governments of Mexico, the United States and Canada. It is my belief that an agreement of this kind between the three governments mentioned, especially an agreement with that of the United States, would have a deterrent effect on other countries and thereby help preserve peace.

Before closing, may I mention one further cogent argument in favour of Canada accepting the invitation announced in President Truman's proclamation. Canadian fishermen at the present time fish for tuna and pilchards right off the coasts of Washington and Oregon. They do so side by side with fishing vessels of the United States. When the provisions of President Truman's proclamation are put into effect, the restrictions as to fishing will undoubtedly cover the offshore waters of Washington and Oregon. If no treaty or agreement is entered into with the United States, what will the position of the Canadian fishermen be, especially when one considers that under the proclamation the chief purpose of the United States is to protect for her own nationals the fisheries adjacent to United States territory. President Truman's proclamation, if ignored by Canada, will undoubtedly have the effect of preventing, in the future, Canadian fishermen from fishing in areas preserved solely for United States nationals.

I repeat, no time should be lost by Canada in taking action similar to that of the United States and Mexico. A committee of competent officials and representatives of the entire industry should be set up immediately to explore and examine the entire situation. It cannot be too strongly pointed out that in this matter time is extremely important for us. The world just now is in a state of flux. Japan at the moment, whilst in a strait-jacket, will not always be kept there. Soviet Russia, although having set up a ministry of fisheries for the Pacific, will require time to gather a fishing fleet together and get fully organized. Russia's first move may undoubtedly be the taking over from the Japanese all the Kamchatka fishing rights, which she was forced to relinquish to Japan by the terms of the Portsmouth treaty in 1911.

As I say, now that the United States is taking action to protect her national interests and realizing what might and could occur in the future, there should be no further hesitation or delay on the part of Canada to do likewise. One particularly strong factor, in favour of our doing so, is that we would have the assurance of the backing and support of the United States in whatever conservation and protective measures may be deemed desirable and necessary to prevent the exploitation, if not destruction, of the valuable fisheries off our shores.

Finally, in urging the government to accept President Truman's offer and in suggesting that Canada join with the United States in measures to protect our offshore fisheries, I quite realize that this may involve some change of policy in external affairs. I say this because, since confederation, Canada has made no foreign commitments involving matters as important as this without first seeking the advice of British authorities. This policy is quite understandable when one considers that we have had to depend on Great Britain for protection should Canada be attacked or become involved in serious difficulties with other countries. We cannot escape the fact, however, that in so far as our offshore fisheries are concerned, our interests are more closely allied with those of the United States, rather than with those of Great Britain. It is my belief that any measures taken by the United States to protect that country's offshore fisheries from exploitation by other countries, such as an invasion, would certainly affect the interests of this country. Canada could not very well in that event remain neutral or silent on such an important issue, for the exploitation of these offshore fisheries would affect the economy of Canada equally with that of the United States.

My chief purpose in appealing to the government at this time is to draw their attention to the grave dangers facing Canada's salmon fisheries, and to urge that we take action now, and before it is too late.

Mr. McLURE: Mr. Chairman, you and this committee must have appreciated the wonderful ministerial address or outline of his stewardship which the minister gave us to-day, and also the direct plans he has laid out for the benefit of fisheries in Canada. He was followed by the hon. member for New Westminster who gave us one of his classics on the history of fisheries, not only in British Columbia but throughout Canada generally. During the session we have listened to debates on bacon, wheat, milk and so on; I hope we can now make the fish diet as appetizing.

Before we pass on to the estimates, I should like to make a few remarks which may not be quite along the lines of the remarks of the minister or of the hon. member who has just spoken. I desire to make my remarks relative to the fisheries of the maritimes, and to the fisheries of Prince Edward Island particularly. Last year it was my pleasure to congratulate the minister on his appointment to the position he now holds. I hoped at that time that, being a maritimer, he would endeavour to give us some special benefits. After hearing what he said to-day, I am in duty bound to say that he has launched a policy which will be of benefit, not only to fisheries in general, but to those of the maritimes as well.

Last session I brought to the attention of the minister certain complaints which had been made by the fishermen in my riding. On their behalf I want to thank the minister for agreeing to their requests. They greatly appreciate his doing these things to which I will refer in a moment.

It is important to have a capable deputy in the Department of Fisheries. In the past the department has had capable deputies, one of whom I should like to mention, the late Doctor William Found. He was a Prince Edward Islander. The department was fortunate in securing as his successor another capable deputy, Doctor Finn. I regret that the department has since lost the services of Doctor Finn, at least for the time being. His ability has been recognized abroad, and I understand that almost 100 per cent more valuation has been placed upon his services, so that we could hardly hope to hold him. But if a man is as valuable as that to the fisheries of some other country I would think he would be just as valuable to the fisheries of Canada. We should not let dollars and cents take such a man away from us. I only hope that he will be available to assist at any time that he may be needed by the department.

The appointment of deputies is generally a political matter, but promotions should be in order. The minister has in his department men with excellent practical training, and I should like to mention a few of them. As director of fish culture he has J. A. Rodd; as director of western fisheries he has A. J. Whitmore; as assistant deputy minister he has D. H. Sutherland. I could go on and mention a number of others, all of them capable men. When a deputy is being appointed to assist the minister I hope that qualification for the position will be considered more than political affiliation. I feel that the man selected for this high position should be one with practical knowledge and experience gained from a contact with fisheries.

I am afraid that during the last five years of the war the controls which have been imposed have not always been for the benefit of the fishing industry. This was true in the case of the allocations made, and it was certainly true in the matter of price ceilings. For instance, the fish administration of the wartime prices and trade board made a distinct differentiation between the prices of canned chicken haddock and canned mackerel. Why? I do not know, because it should have been known to the department that there was no difference in the food value, nor was there much difference on the open market before the controls were instituted.

Another matter is the price ceiling which was set on canned shad, in which case the calculations were based on the cost of the raw materials. Then it was found out that, with the development of the industry, competition arose and the industry had to stop this particular variety because the price ceiling prohibited its production. In my opinion this matter should have been immediately investigated and the price ceiling adjusted, so that this fish could have been added to the already needed food supply; and it should have been investigated by the Department of Fisheries.

Another friendly criticism I have to make with reference to departmental affairs is that apparently they carry on those affairs without proper consultation with the industry itself. In case after case they have made regulations which in principle probably are right, but which in detail lack much. Usually it has happened, prior to the war and during the war, that these regulations—

Mr. BRIDGES: Would the hon. member tell me whether he is referring to regulations made by the wartime prices and trade board or by the department?

Mr. McLURE: The wartime prices and trade board. They have been dillydallying around, over and over, and they made the regulations law by order in council and sprung them on the industry without its foreknowledge but, almost invariably in the last years, after canning or processing was well under way. The point which must be emphasized is that if these new regulations are to be instituted they must be considered well in advance of the packing season, and proper notice given to the parties concerned so that plans can be made accordingly, and the man who should boss this proceeding is the Minister of Fisheries, not the wartime prices and trade board. The minister should have the final say, and I must add that this year he has had his say; the minister, when making some changes in regulations, did notify the fisheries and the fishermen throughout the maritime provinces and, probably, all over Canada.

Another little item I wish to speak on for a moment relates to the supervisors, similar to the men envisaged in the plan which is being put forth at the present time. What the department needs are good practical men as supervisors, men who, besides seeing that all regulations are properly carried out, will promote and improve all matters pertaining to local fishing conditions. We realize that they are not able to make policy or regulations for the department, but we believe that in many cases they are in a position to recommend things which would be beneficial to the industry, if they are capable of seeing these improvements.

Another matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister may not affect the maritimes generally as much as it affects Prince Edward Island: I refer to fishing facilities of the nature of navigation aids, wharves, boat harbours and shelters. Much provision of this kind is needed in various places, but I believe that it should only be carried out after the minister has consulted the local committees or the fishermen direct. I know that, in the past, engineers of the Department of Public Works have gone to work and put up structures which have been a mere waste of money because they were entirely unsuited to local conditions. Therefore the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Public Works should always get together with the local people to figure out the best possible way to provide satisfactory structures. This might be a little embarrassing to the engineers, but they do not seem to understand where or how to place many of the things that need to be built for the fisheries.

I believe that at present the trend of post-war fish business will be toward frozen products, and with this in view some definite plan might be drawn up to provide proper cold storage facilities at the right places. With this goes the question of transportation. Prince Edward Island is particularly hindered in this respect. I need not elaborate on this because the minister knows of our difficulties. I should, however, like to mention one instance, this last year, where the fishermen were promoting a new industry in Prince Edward Island fishing, namely, the trimming, shooking and marketing of frozen scallops taken from our own waters. The frozen product was to be marketed in central Canada; the buyers had to hold their goods in anything but reliable storage, where they were in anxiety day and night lest the machinery might break down, until such time as a truck load could be assembled, and this in turn was routed via the Canadian National main line at Moncton, via the Wood Island-Cariboo ferry. We could not entertain for one minute the idea of crossing at Borden because of the tremendous freight and truck charges involved therein. Neither could the C.N.R. express give the fishermen any suitable express service from Charlottetown. Incidentally the fishermen were not always able to get proper facilities on the main line of the C.N.R., and they had to await the dispatch of iced fish cars from Halifax. These had no definite schedule, and we were only given a very few hours' notice that shipments could be dispatched in those cars. Our fishermen intend to improve this industry if possible these coming years, and they certainly must have better handling facilities in order to do this in competition with other areas producing the same kind of fish. This is only one instance, and many other problems will develop as we try to invade the frozen fish market.

I am going to take only a few minutes to bring to the attention of the department the rope supply situation. Probably this has been rectified, but in the spring of 1946 it gave the fishermen a great deal of concern, and I had many letters with regard to it. The shortage of supplies of fishing rope gave supply dealers and fishermen in lobster fishing many headaches last spring, and the condition continues even now and affects the fall season of 1946. I am not placing any blame for this condition upon the minister or his department, but I am firmly convinced that the minister should dictate to the wartime prices and trade board, or their cotton administration, or the director of twine and cordage, instead of these bureaucrats controlling the situation and dictating to him and his department. In the quotas for 1946—I want the minister to understand that I am now dealing with and criticizing the wartime prices and trade board—

Mr. BRIDGES: Thank you.

Mr. McLURE: —suppliers and distributors were not given any extra quotas to take care of the reestablishment of war veterans in lobster fishing. They had been led to believe that, while priorities were filled for veterans, that would not affect the regular quota for these suppliers or dealers. But the distributors who were desirous of assisting and cooperating with the veterans were placed in a precarious condition. I have on my file letters from large distributors who had considered the case of the veteran, so much so that many old-established civilian accounts did not get their requirements. I want to tell the minister and his department that they should make demand on the wartime prices and trade board for a fairer allocation of rope to the veterans by an extra quota for them. All would have been well if the department had been dealing with this matter entirely themselves. As a matter of fact, some of these veterans who in the spring of 1946, had priorities filed were never taken care of, and some fishermen had to leave their gear on the shore and go to some other occupation. A set policy pertaining to the control and distribution of cordage for fishing purposes should be established in time, and I hope that the minister will not take any instructions from the wartime prices and trade board. He and his department are the ones who can give satisfaction to the fishermen and the dealers. I might say further that the bungles which were so far-reaching might have been investigated by the department, but I suppose it was a difficult thing to do. It would have been worth investigating just to find out whether the cordage companies are trying to erect a kind of tent over this whole business of rope, twine, et cetera. I believe that charity should begin at home, and, if we have rope and twine we should first supply our own fishermen, our own veterans who are going into the fishing business, and then, if we have any left over, we can ship it to foreign countries.

Mr. WINTERS: May I at first associate myself with the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Queen's in saying, on behalf of the Nova Scotia members, that we welcome the statement just brought down by the Minister of Fisheries. It shows a direct and healthy outlook toward the problems facing his department and those facing the fishing interests in Canada. Long-range planning of this type will do much for the fishing industry in years to come. I would also compliment most highly the hon. member for New Westminster on his splendid presentation of a problem that affects the west coast. I have never heard it presented so directly or clearly before, and we in the east have now a much better appreciation of what western fishermen are up against. I would say, too, that I enjoyed listening to the constructive speech of the hon. member for Queens, since it shows some of the problems facing the fishermen of Prince Edward Island.

I should now like to say something about the fishing problems of Nova Scotia. On the west coast there is definitely an international problem involving oriental nations. In Nova Scotia we have an international problem involving European nations. In the light of present-day world affairs, it is natural to be internationally minded, and I think Nova Scotians, by virtue of the fact that they have seafaring traditions, are probably more internationally minded than the average citizen. They are interested in such matters as the peace conference, UNRRA and the other international conferences that are taking place to-day. But of more immediate interest and direct concern to the fishermen, in the constituency of Queen's-Lunenburg in particular and Nova Scotia in general, is the international situation arising out of the destruction by trawlers of foreign registry of trawl gear set out by our fishing schooners on Quero bank off the coast of Nova Scotia. Quero bank is known officially on most maps and charts as Banquereau, and is located approximately 115 miles off Canso in a southeasterly direction and approximately 245 miles off Lunenburg.

The Department of Fisheries as well as the Department of External Affairs are fully familiar with the situation. It is acknowledged that it poses a difficult problem so far as prevention and redress are concerned because, in the absence of adequate proof of nationalities, the Canadian government is not in a position to approach the foreign government or governments concerned.

It has been known for several years that in some instances foreign trawlers have interfered with Nova Scotian fishing schooners and there have probably been rare cases when our own trawlers have been at fault. This destruction may or may not be intentional. Basic methods of fishing involved are widely different and isolated accidents are understandable. Nova Scotia schooners fish by setting out on the banks long lengths of line equipped with hooks attached at intervals. These lines thus equipped are called trawls. They are quite long and normally are set out in a radial pattern around the schooners. Trawlers, on the other hand, are much more like conventional steamships. They are larger, usually of steel construction, and their method of operating is to drag a net behind them and scoop up the fish, so that, although the gear of our schooners is well marked by buoys, it is understandable that a trawler could cut through it accidentally in isolated cases.

Our fishermen realize that accidents of this kind can happen and they would like to think that these recurrences are accidental. But one must be broad-minded indeed to accept this view in the face of repeated incidents in clear weather, in broad daylight and despite adequate warnings by the schooners. In fact, Quero bank was so congested recently with foreign trawlers, that our schooners oftentimes found it necessary to go around the bank in order to avoid collisions. The frequency of these incidents has, of course, increased since the war, because the banks are now safe from enemy craft and foreign nations are turning more to peacetime pursuits.

In May of this year the interference by foreign trawlers was brought to the attention of the government, but at that time the evidence was meagre and the government could not establish the identity of the trawlers concerned. The Canadian Fishermen's Union, which entered the complaints, did not provide this information. Skippers were reasonably sure of the nationalities of the offending trawlers, but presumably they did not have sufficient evidence to satisfy themselves completely and, despite repeated attempts, the government was not able to establish these identities.

It is understood that the foreign trawlers have now returned temporarily to their home ports to discharge their cargoes and to refit; but until they did leave the banks, the situation was becoming considerably worse, and it is likely it will deteriorate further when they return. A number of fishing schooners experienced losses of gear in the early summer, and at the request of the Department of Fisheries their skippers prepared sworn statements for submission to the government. It was hoped that these most recent statements would specify the nationalities of the trawlers, but it is understood that they did not. They did set forth much valuable information and evidence of specific instances of destruction, but in no case did they identify the offending trawlers by nationalities.

Both the Halifax Chronicle and the Halifax Herald have been emphasizing the seriousness of the situation, and the Financial Post of August 3 treated the matter rather fully. This last mentioned paper designated the offending trawlers as being of Spanish, Portuguese and French registry, and in an editorial dated August 16 the Herald said the offenders were Spanish, but I am not aware on what evidence these statements were based. The Financial Post further stated that in one instance a Spanish trawler deliberately swept through the well-marked gear of the schooner Irene Mary, but I understand that in his sworn statement the skipper of this schooner designated the offender only as a "foreign" trawler. The captain of this schooner is a neighbour of mine. As is the case with most fishing skippers, he is not given to exaggeration and, in fact, will tolerate a great deal before entering complaints. Under the circumstances, one can assume that the situation is intolerable. However, it is regretted that, although the nationalities of the offending trawlers appear to be common knowledge locally, and some newspapers are sufficiently sure of themselves to designate nationalities in print, the Department of Fisheries is having difficulty in obtaining this information in sworn statements from authoritative sources.

The department is, of course, aware that there are Spanish, Portuguese, and French trawlers on the banks, but no evidence has been presented which will permit it to associate a particular trawler with a specific act of destruction. The most recent affidavits submitted on August 20 and 22 are much more complete than any submitted prior to that time; but, although they again state in three instances that the trawlers were thought to be Spanish, none of them is specific as to country of registry, and the captain of the schooner Irene Mary, Capt. Leo Corkum, says that he cannot identify the nationality of the trawler that damaged his gear. I understand also that on June 3 an R.C.A.F. plane made a reconnaissance flight over Quero and found that, of twelve foreign trawlers on the bank that day, eight were of Spanish nationality. This situation has developed to the point where the existence of our fishing industry may very well be at stake. It is understood that foreign nations are building trawlers in large quantities. For example, it is reported that France is having thirty trawlers constructed in the United States at the present time, and that these trawlers are larger in size than those used by either Canada or the United States. Portugal is assuming an ambitious trawler programme. There is no doubt that these trawlers will fish on the banks which have always been ours by tradition, and it is greatly feared that these fishing grounds will suffer early depletion, just as the European banks have been depleted. Some international understanding is necessary, but pending a satisfactory understanding our fishermen must have adequate protection.

The nature of the protection presents a real difficulty. It is conceivable that this government can declare its rights to control the coastal waters extending to the edge of the continental shelf, just as the United States has done. In fact such a policy would appear highly desirable. The hon. member for New Westminster covered that situation exceptionally well in his treatment of fishing conditions on the west coast. I may say that we support his views entirely; we feel that there is a great deal of merit in his proposal, and I would recommend that the government consider it seriously. I do not deny that there are problems involved, nevertheless it is one approach to the problem which must be considered. Quero bank and other fishing grounds which we have long regarded as our own are well within the limits of the continental shelf. But having declared jurisdiction, it would still be necessary for us to provide adequate control measures to protect our rights, unless there were a workable agreement between the nations desirous of using the banks. The last thing in the world we want is unfriendly relations on these banks. Our fishermen do not want to fish surrounded by protective craft in the numbers that would be required if the foreign trawlers chose to ignore our proclaimed rights. Let us hope that enforcement measures of this kind will never be necessary.

In my opinion, therefore, it is of the utmost importance that this government take whatever action is necessary to satisfy itself of the identity of the offending trawlers, and that it come to understandings with their governments at the earliest possible date so that the rights of our fishermen may receive the consideration to which they are entitled. I was pleased to hear the minister say, in his statement on August 14 as reported in Hansard at page 4816, that the matter is being given further detailed investigation not only by his department but by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Quite apart from the problem of patrolling the fishing grounds under these extraordinary conditions, it is important that adequate patrols be provided even if fishing conditions are normal.

There are no patrol craft in operation on the banks at the present time. The minister provided this information on August 21 in reply to a question I placed on the order paper. Prior to the war, two patrol craft, Arras and Arleaux, did good work, but they were used for war purposes and are no longer available. The department has acquired another ship, the C.G.S. Cygnus. It is understood that this craft, which was formerly the Melville—a minesweeper of the Bangor type—will be ready for operation within the next week or two. It is a sizable craft, approximately 162 feet long and with a speed of seventeen knots. It is understood that she will carry a crew of twenty-seven. Her function will be primarily to provide protection and general services for our fishermen on the offshore banks. It would appear that consideration should be given to obtaining additional such craft to perform general coast guard duties.

It is the opinion of local fishermen that the services of boats such as C.G.S. Cygnus should be supplemented by craft which could travel at high speed and would be available for inshore work. It would seem to me that motor torpedo boats would lend themselves ideally for this purpose with a minimum of modification.

The R.C.A.F., the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Department of Transport and Department of Fisheries all have need for some rescue service, patrol service or other type of service along the coast. It is known that lawbreakers use speedy craft and, in order to cope with them, the departments concerned must also use fast boats. I would suggest, therefore, that the four departments I have just mentioned consolidate their efforts in this field and purchase several high speed craft of the motor torpedo boat or similar type. The combination of the Cygnus type craft and these smaller craft would provide more adequate offshore and inshore coverage.

The inland waterways in my constituency are presenting a problem of increasing magnitude. In the first place, there seems to be some uncertainty as to the present and future division of responsibility between the federal government and the provincial government of Nova Scotia in this field. It seems to me that the first problem is to establish these responsibilities clearly and beyond any doubt. This clarification would remove uncertainty from the minds of many departmental employees and thus result in greater over-all efficiency. It would result, too, in a programme which, by virtue of being clearly defined, would be more energetically executed.

There are in my constituency several first-class salmon and trout rivers. They present a major attraction for tourists as well as provide food and revenue for local residents. The condition of these rivers has been allowed to deteriorate to the point where they are losing their attraction for tourists and, if corrective steps are not taken in the very near future, this country will lose a valuable source of revenue.

When one sees the benefits accruing from improvements made to streams and rivers on the west coast, it becomes apparent that we must insist on prompt action to protect these resources in Nova Scotia. The minister knows that I speak particularly of the Mersey and Medway rivers in Queens county and LaHave river in Lunenburg county. But there are others of which the same can be said. The Department of Fisheries is fully familiar with the circumstances and knows the problems involved. I feel that the department is giving the problems full consideration, but I would urge that action be taken. If, as I intimated before, corrective action is impeded in any way because of uncertainty as to responsibilities between the dominion and the province, then I would say that it is most important that this vital matter be clarified without delay.

At this point, may I say that the Minister of Fisheries has at all times shown himself to be most anxious to cooperate. He has always taken a realistic and practical view of any problems I have placed before him, and in no case has he dismissed a reasonable request simply by saying that it was not the policy of his department to do "things of that nature."

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is it his opinion that the provincial government has failed to cooperate with the minister in taking the measures necessary?

Mr. WINTERS: I did not say that. I do not care to give a detailed opinion. In brief, I would say, no; I did not mean that at all. I do not know of any case in which the provincial government has not cooperated; but, as hon. members know, where there is any uncertainty as to who is responsible there is always inefficiency.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the hon. member mean—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member must not interrupt the speaker without his consent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I asked for consent.

Mr. WINTERS: What was the question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wondered whether the hon. member would tell the committee what were the corrective measures necessary. I am very much interested in his speech, and I am just seeking information as a westerner who does not know anything about the problems.

Mr. WINTERS: I should like to proceed, and, if time permits, I shall be glad to answer the question afterwards. Is that satisfactory?

I was speaking about the minister. At this particular point I was saying that the minister has shown himself to be willing to try new approaches to problems, and we have every confidence that, so long as he holds the portfolio, our fishing problems will receive every consideration.

Wherever there are shore fishermen, there is also the problem of dredging. Dredging, as such, is a matter for the Department of Public Works, but I mention it here because it is so integrally associated with the lot of inshore fishermen. These men leave their homes around two, three or four o'clock in the early morning; go offshore eight or ten miles to fish, and come back the same afternoon with their catch. Many times they return with a boatload of fish at low tide and, because of shallow water, they are forced to lie outside the harbour waiting for the tide to rise. Hon. members can well imagine that this is a precarious and uncomfortable situation in rough weather. There are one or two particularly bad places in my constituency where harbours have become filled up with sand or mud. The Minister of Public Works is fully familiar with them and is sympathetic to the predicament of the fishermen. The trouble is that dredging equipment is limited and, where a heavy programme is on the books, all projects cannot be carried out at the same time. The various jobs must, therefore, be listed in order of urgency. I can assure the committee, however, that when fishermen are lying offshore in a storm with a boatload of fish waiting for the tide to rise so that they can enter the harbour, it is not easy to persuade them that their need for dredging is less urgent than that of some other locality. I would, therefore, impress upon the Minister of Public Works through the Minister of Fisheries that any steps he can take to increase his dredging capacity will be well directed in the interests of the fishermen and the economy of this country.

Before concluding, I would say a few words about the Fisheries Research Board of Canada. As is the case with any organization, the board has its opponents and supporters. Scientific or research bodies seem more likely to be the object of misunderstanding and resulting criticism than almost any other type of agency.

The popular impression of scientists and researchers is that they are long-bearded—mentally if not physically—and that not only do they not have their feet on the ground, but their heads are in the clouds.

This thinking is often applied to a lesser extent to engineers. I recall that, in discussing the research council, an hon. member was concerned about the administrative ability of engineers and asked the minister if a practical businessman would be placed in the capacity of administrator over and above the engineers.

These are misconceptions. There are, of course, dreamers and theorizers in science and engineering just as there are in every other field of endeavour. It cannot be said that all who are not scientists or engineers are necessarily good administrators, and by the same token it must not be assumed that all scientists and engineers are poor administrators.

Research is normally a slow process. It usually requires long-range planning and a long period of work before results are achieved. It is not the sort of field in which one can approach a researcher and say, "Well, what did you discover to-day?" and expect to get a satisfying answer.

The fisheries research board has produced results since it was formed in 1937, and some of them have been outstanding. It is often criticized for what it has not done; that it has not given full help to industry; that it does not have a practical approach to problems and so on, but in all fairness one should give the board due credit for its achievements.

The annual reports set forth clearly the programme and achievements, and I would imagine that all hon. members are familiar with them. But, in particular it is desired to remind the committee of the work of the board in rehabilitating oyster culture in the maritimes; protecting the lobster industry by laying down policies based on long and arduous statistical studies; and the rehabilitation of shad fishing in the headwaters of the bay of Fundy with resultant increase in catch. It has also found the answer to the toxic condition in clams at certain times of the year in the bay of Fundy and has made the public aware when these clams are safely edible. The Nova Scotia department of health on the 17th August issued an official warning to the public, based on the findings of the research board. Fishermen on the east coast are optimistic that the herring investigation will result in herring being available on a year-round basis, rather than on the seasonal and uncertain basis as at present.

The programme laid down for the west coast will undoubtedly result in benefits in a variety of fields. The Skeena salmon investigation alone is an undertaking of great magnitude and great promise. Judging from the reports, I would imagine that whitefish fishermen on the prairies realize the value this board has been to them. The board has made many other contributions and advances which are clearly set forth in its reports, and it would not seem necessary for me to mention them at this time. But judging by the number of requests the board receives from the fishing industry for assistance in various projects, I would gather that its value to this industry is fully appreciated.

I have no particular reason or desire to defend the fisheries board. As far as I am concerned, it must be capable of standing or falling on its own merits. The board consists of a good cross-section of representatives from industry, government and science. Its terms of reference, as set forth in the Fisheries Research Board Act, appear to me to be sound, and the principle of having an organization established to do research in the fishing industry is sound.

That there is need for such a board is well indicated by the fact that it has already done much valuable work that would otherwise not have been undertaken either by private industry or any other agency.

In conclusion, I would say that we are keenly interested in the development of foreign markets for fish. The termination of the war has resulted in a decreased demand for our fish abroad and has increased the number of nations competing in the struggle for markets.

Recent action by UNRRA in suggesting that this organization be relieved of some of its obligations to accept large quantities of Canadian fish is an indication of the trend in the European market. New markets must be sought and old ones developed. I would, therefore, strongly urge that the Department of Trade and Commerce, through the Canadian Commercial Corporation and its other facilities, leave no stone unturned in its endeavour to develop foreign demands for our fish.

Mr. BARRETT: I shall take only a moment or two to say a few words about fresh-water fishermen and particularly the Ontario federation of commercial fishermen. This is a newly formed organization which consists of an amalgamation of regional fishermen's associations along the Canadian side of the great lakes and the lake of the Woods. One of its chief purposes is to make scientific and thorough investigations into the habits of useful species of fish in the great lakes, their feeding and spawning habits, with a view to conserving useful species and controlling predatory and useless fish.

I bring this matter up now because the federation feels that the federal department can be of great assistance, owing to the fact that the waters of the great lakes are international waters. I am particularly interested in the federation because one of its laboratories is situated at Port Dover, in my constituency. Port Dover is the home port of what is reputed to be the largest and best equipped fresh-water fishing fleet in the world.

Mr. REID: Is that a provincial or federal organization?

Mr. BARRETT: It is all in Ontario, and many of the regulations are provincial. However lake Erie in particular is concerned on account of the international feature, because on that lake there are bordering no less than four states of the United States.

My main purpose in rising is to express the appreciation of the federation for the cooperation of and the assistance given by the minister and his department. I know the federation is well pleased with the help it has been given, and I am sure that help will continue.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to make only a few remarks at this time about the one department concerning which I have no criticism. I would show my appreciation to the minister for the appointment of Mr. Whitmore, because I believe he will have the confidence of the rank and file of fishermen on the coast.

I would also thank the hon. member for New Westminster for his address this afternoon, in which he dealt with both the national and international aspects of the matter. As it applied to fisheries on the Pacific coast I would say the hon. member's speech was a masterpiece, and I know that in years to come it will be used as a reference.

I would point out, however, that, taken as a whole, our fishing fleet on the coast is not as modern as that of the United States, nor is it as well equipped to compete in fishing operations. I would suggest to the minister that some organization be set up by the department under which loans could be given to fishermen in respect of their floating equipment, on a basis which would compare with loans to industry inland. In this way the fishermen could have modern equipment and be better fitted to compete with other countries.

I would associate myself with what the hon. member for New Westminster said respecting Hecate strait. That is a problem facing the halibut fishermen especially, and I have a keen interest in it because the strait is in my riding.

There is one other small matter which, though small, is important. When I was home last, it was brought to my attention that fishermen, when out on the grounds, operating in their cramped quarters for hours, must depend upon refreshments in the nature of a cup of tea and a piece of bread and butter. The feeling is that the butter ration is not adequate. I do not know whether the ration has been increased since last winter, but they ask that a more adequate supply be allowed, because they depend upon it for quick energy.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): At the outset, may I say I support the views expressed to-day by the hon. member for New Westminster. I heartily endorse everything he has said. I am sorry to say the remarks I am about to make will, I realize, be critical to some extent. I can assure this committee that what I say will, I feel, be expressing the opinion of ninety per cent or more of the fishermen on the Atlantic coast. I know my remarks may not meet with the approval of the Department of Fisheries; but I am sincere when I state no other industry in Canada has a better outlook for the future, if given proper direction and guidance, than the fishing industry of this great country. I regret I have not had an opportunity of visiting my friends in British Columbia to view at first hand their fishing interests, so that naturally my remarks will be confined to the fisheries of New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces, with which I am more familiar.

This industry has gone a long way in the past twenty years toward producing a better commodity and the chief aim on the Atlantic coast over a great period of years has been to give the fishermen better equipment to work with, better boats in which to work, whereby there is less exposure and much more comfortable accommodation. The great improvement in this respect is readily seen if one visits the fishing villages to-day. Unquestionably this improvement is responsible for a much greater investment by the fishermen, because modern equipment is to-day costly, particularly boats which are costing several thousand dollars. Twenty years ago a boat used for the same purpose would cost a few hundred dollars. The size of the modern boat is much larger and, as I previously stated, in most cases it has all modern conveniences, making the life of a fisherman less hazardous and more desirable. This improved equipment makes it possible for fishermen to go farther afield to carry on their fishing activities; distances that a few years ago would have been prohibitive with the inferior boats, engines and gear that were at their disposal at that time.

Since I did not speak during the budget debate, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance on amending the Income War Tax Act to permit fishermen and farmers to average their incomes for a period of three years moving average. In 1948 all farmers and fishermen who have made returns for 1946 and 1947 will be entitled to average their incomes for the three years and pay their tax on their average earnings at the end of 1948. Since the incomes of these primary producers fluctuate to so great an extent, this amendment will rectify an injustice that has been imposed on these people for several years, and I can assure the Minister of Finance that the proposed change will be greatly appreciated by the people of Charlotte county.

Another matter I wish to deal with is the matter of floor prices. As I have stated before, this is the major problem confronting fishermen to-day. True, they have enjoyed, during the past few years a period of prosperity, which was long overdue. This was greatly appreciated, but the future must be faced, and without some security as to floor prices there is little enthusiasm.

To let the committee have some idea as to how prices paid fishermen fluctuate, I wish to give one illustration. During the months of January, February, March and April of this year, herring scales which are produced by sardine fishermen were sold to the processors in the state of Maine for prices ranging from sixty cents a pound to as high as three dollars a pound. Very recently the several buyers got together, and during the past few weeks the price has been ten cents a pound. Hon. members can readily understand the uncertainty with respect to prices paid these fishermen and the absolute necessity of legislation to rectify this unbearable situation. As has been explained to the committee previously, fishermen are producers of a perishable article that cannot be held indefinitely awaiting better marketing conditions, but on the contrary, it must be disposed of immediately or it will be a total loss. Therefore the fisherman is always at the mercy of the manufacturer.

At the same time, the manufacturer would be utterly helpless without the primary producer, because his great investment in buildings and machinery would be of little value if the fishermen, through adverse conditions, are compelled to leave this industry and seek some other form of employment in which they feel more secure and in which they would receive better protection. I am convinced that these men do not wish to have floor prices established that would be unreasonable or that would in any way inflict hardship upon buyers and manufacturers of their products, since we all realize these manufacturers must compete with similar manufacturers in other parts of the world. Canada is an exporting nation and, in respect of fish, seventy-five per cent or more must be sold in other parts of the world. The greater portion exported would go to the United States which is the market the maritime provinces have enjoyed over a great period of years.

In December, 1945, I brought this matter to the attention of this department, pointing out the deplorable situation the fishing industry would inevitably find itself drifting into unless it was safeguarded and protected by floor prices. At that time I suggested an international agreement as the solution, owing to our dependence upon United States markets for our products. Since that time, no action has been taken regarding this matter, and there are already signs of declining prices, as was explained in the great decrease in the prices paid for herring scales. It also shows how little control fishermen have of their own business and how rapidly prices can fall without some sort of protection. This matter is of vital importance to all our fishermen to-day and steps should be taken immediately, because it would perhaps be more opportune at the present time than to wait until prices begin to fall. It would be utterly impossible for these fishermen to carry on at the present time with prices that prevailed during the depression period, on account of the fact that prices which they are obliged to pay to-day for materials and equipment necessary to carry on their work, have greatly increased, and any major decline in prices paid to producers would be disastrous to the fishing industry.

I trust the department is fully aware of the situation and of the necessity of stabilized prices to all primary producers. The migration of our young men from the maritime provinces to the New England states was brought about by this very condition, because prices paid to primary producers other than during war years have been out of all proportion to prices paid by the consumer. In other words, prices paid by the consumer to retailers did not compare in any way with prices paid to the fishermen. The price spread has always been too great.

If the fisheries department are desirous of assisting this great industry, in no way could their effort be better exemplified or in no way could they please the fishermen of this dominion to a greater degree than by guaranteeing stabilized prices. If a poll could be taken within this industry and the question asked as to what the fisheries department could do that would benefit the greatest number of fishermen, the answer from ninety per cent of the fishermen would be, by establishing floor prices.

Regardless of this fact, nothing has been done in connection with this important matter. It has been brought to the attention of the department on different occasions, but apparently the feeling is that their effort can be put to better advantage, so that they have governed themselves accordingly.

I am of the same opinion to-day as last December and still feel confident that an international agreement can be worked out that would meet with the approval of the canners and fishermen on both sides of the border, and, as long as I am the member for Charlotte county, I will press the fisheries department for some action.

In 1942 a price ceiling was placed on sardines in the fresh state. This was done by the canners in New Brunswick and the state of Maine. The ceiling price was not unreasonable to either the producer or the canner. It has been strictly adhered to by both parties and, to my knowledge, no breach has been made, although during that period since the ceiling price was set we have had times of scarcity and times of plentiful supply. However, regardless of supply, the price has never been broken and has worked out advantageously and beneficially to both parties. During the first great war, in 1918 a ceiling and floor price were placed on sardines with exactly the same effect, although in the previous year, 1917, the price had fluctuated from $10 to $95.

If this regulation of prices is necessary in war time to protect the consumer, why should the same consideration and protection not be given the primary producer at all times to accord him adequate security and encouragement, to enable him to establish his business on a more sound basis in order that he might look to the future with a more optimistic viewpoint?

During the past few years, while conditions were more encouraging in the fishing industry, the fishermen have made large investments, particularly the younger men who, in order to establish themselves in the sardine industry, were obliged to build sardine weirs in deep water and locations which necessitated large expenditures, because the privileges that could be maintained at a more reasonable cost had been secured over a great period of years by the older fishermen and are handed down from one generation to another.

If the price of sardines should fall to pre-war levels the fishermen would be obliged to abandon a great proportion of these expensive structures and seek some other form of employment and, if past history repeats itself, you will again see the youth of the maritime provinces migrating to the New England states, not through choice perhaps, but by force of circumstances beyond their control. In fact many investments during this period of prosperity in expensive boats, nets and equipment cannot be maintained or replaced when necessary if prices paid to producers during that same time are reduced to such an extent that, after expenses are paid, the producer cannot make a profit.

I realize that no programme is fruitful if it is merely opposed to something. Successful programmes are those which are constructive and creative. What we need at this critical juncture is an affirmative demonstration that we have the qualities needed for survival. We must be resourceful and persistent in seeking ways to meet any emergency that may appear, and be in position to surmount any obstacle that might obstruct our path to higher standards of living. Retaliatory barriers would serve to increase distrust and express lack of cooperation. This would prove fatal, because the only solution to our problem is to have voluntary cooperation, both nationally and internationally. That security depends primarily upon ourselves, since we have the support of practically every primary producer in Canada and have also the authority to administer the cure through the cooperation of the primary producers and government officials in Canada and the United States. The old adage that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" could be applied in this circumstance, because it would appear to be a much more simple matter to have the necessary adjustments made at the present time than to postpone taking any action until such time as prices have started to decline.

These primary producers have no C.I.O. or A.F. of L. to look to for protection and would not wish to exert their authority if such an organization did exist, as long as agreements can be reached through friendly cooperative and intelligent discussion.

I have been given to understand that it would be an enormous task to have adjustments made whereby this protection would include all primary products. During the war the necessary machinery was assembled and put into effect to enforce price control. We all agree, I believe, that a very fine job was done in this country under capable management.

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1946-47

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1947, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Acting Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. ABBOTT moved that the estimates be referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the acting minister whether this is meant to take the place of the item in the bill now before the house respecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I understand it is the intention not to proceed with that bill this year, and therefore a further supplementary estimate is introduced to provide for a loan to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which I believe was provided in one of the sections of the bill.

Mr. BRACKEN: I want to commend the government for at least the decision to withdraw the bill now before the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not withdrawn. I said it would not be proceeded with this session.

Mr. GRAYDON: A pretty bad bill anyway.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—FRENCH TRANSLATION OF SPEECH ON AUGUST 19—REPORT IN "GLOBE AND MAIL", AUGUST 29

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I rise to a double question of privilege. In the first place the translation of the speeches made in this house should be accurate. At page 5042 I am reported as using the word "tom cat", which has been translated as "chat sauvage", which in English is wild cat. I did not use the expression wild tom cat; I purposely used the expression tom cat. With regard to the expression wild cat, I reserve it for somebody else. Kenneth C. Cragg, a member of the press gallery, is the reporter of the Globe and Mail, and in the Globe and Mail of to-day—this is another question of privilege—under his name appears the following sentence:

But is it recalled that Mr. Pouliot only last week in different rooms, corridors and places about the parliament buildings, advanced the name of Speaker Gaspard Fauteux as successor to Quebec Liberal leader Adelard Godbout.

Sir, I am not a gossiper, but I thought it was a great tribute to you to mention your name in that regard. That being said, all that the correspondent of the Globe and Mail has invented is a tissue of lies.

EVAPORATED MILK

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. What are the wholesale agencies in Saskatoon city through which canned milk is distributed?

2. How much such canned milk is distributed by each?

3. Have any of these agencies applied for extra quotas, and if so, what are they?

4. What new agencies have applied for quantities of evaporated milk?

5. What action has been taken by the wartime prices and trade board in regard to such applications for (a) an increase in the supply; (b) a new supply?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Campbell, Wilson & Millar, Central Wholesale Grocery, Godville Co. Ltd., T. Eaton Co. Ltd., Hudson's Bay Co., Macdonalds' Consolidated, Western Grocers Ltd.

2. In accordance with government policy, as stated from time to time in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance, it is not considered to be in the public interest to give details of operations of individual companies.

3. Yes—all agencies.

4. Saskatchewan Federated Cooperative.

5. Because supplies in Canada are substantially below last year's level and required for winter needs, no action has been possible, (a) to increase supply; (b) to provide new supply.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—FINGERPRINTS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has any action been taken to destroy the fingerprints of service personnel taken by the armed services during the war, particularly in the case of personnel since discharged?

2. If not, is such action contemplated, or what is to be done with the said fingerprints?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. No such action is contemplated. The finger prints of service personnel taken by the armed services during the war form part of their service record and as such are retained as part of their documents.

WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the leader of the opposition asked me a series of questions regarding the international wheat council meeting in Washington. I propose to read the questions and give the answers.

The first question is: "What is the object of the meeting?" The answer is: In 1941-42 the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States of America initialled a memorandum of agreement which contained a draft convention dealing with production control, control of quotas, stocks, and price controls of wheat. The agreement provided for an international wheat conference to be held, but recognized the impracticability of this during war time. The present meeting is assembled to revise the draft convention into an appropriate proposal for an international wheat agreement to be submitted subsequently to an international wheat conference.

The second question is: "How many nations are represented on the preparatory committee?" The following nations are represented on the preparatory committee: Australia, Argentina, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Belgium, India, Italy, Netherlands, United Kingdom and the United States of America.

The third question is: "Who is Canada's representative at this meeting, if any?" Canada's representative is Doctor C. F. Wilson, director, wheat and grain division, Department of Trade and Commerce.

The last question is: "Has the U.S.S.R. been invited to attend?" The U.S.S.R. was invited but they replied that it was not possible to consider attendance at this time.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask a supplementary question? The minister has intimated that this meeting is preparatory to deciding on an international agreement. Does that mean that the government has committed itself to the idea of an international wheat agreement? If so, what will be the effect of such an agreement on the United Kingdom wheat agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: The government has not committed itself at all. The conversations are merely exploratory; and after they proceed a certain distance, if they do, the matter of government policy will have to be decided. If an international wheat agreement is arrived at, it will supersede the contract recently executed between the United Kingdom and Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: In that event the last two years of the United Kingdom wheat agreement would not be in effect?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

[Later:]

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to ask a supplementary question in connection with what was said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this morning. Would the world wheat agreement necessarily supersede the British-Canadian agreement, or would there not have to be other negotiations in order to set it aside?

Mr. MacKINNON: Since answering the last question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) I have received a teletype message from Washington, and from the information contained in it—it is a confidential message—if the international wheat agreement were arrived at on the basis under discussion it would likely mean greater returns for all the years covered by the contract between Great Britain and Canada.

[Later:]

Mr. BRACKEN: I would like to ask a further supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I asked, if an international wheat agreement were entered into at an early date, would it supersede the United Kingdom wheat agreement. The minister said it would. Later the minister said that if an inernational wheat agreement were made on the basis now contemplated it would mean a larger return to producers. With all respect, I suggest that the Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to let the house and the public know something of what is now proposed, because of the criticisms that have been levelled at the United Kingdom agreement.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not in a position to give any information to the house on the discussions now under way, but just as soon as there is anything which should be reported to the house I shall be very glad to bring it forward.

FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): At the last sitting I promised the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) to make a statement this morning on coal. The statement which I shall make refers only to domestic coal for Ontario and Quebec, which are the areas in which there is a serious deficiency of coal. The Ontario and Quebec area consumes around 6,000,000 tons of anthracite, coke, low volatile bituminous and other high grade fuels suitable for burning in the domestic heating equipment in use in this area. Supplies of anthracite this coal year to date are running somewhat ahead of the previous year. However, the supply situation for coke is in a serious position, and there is very little low volatile bituminous coal coming in from the United States.

Latest statistics show that due to the falling off of imports brought about by the lack of reclaimed and other small-sized coke as used last season, our imports of coal from the United States for domestic purposes will show a drop of some 700,000 tons. In addition, because of the strike in the United States bituminous fields, the low volatile bituminous coal will also be down by some 150,000 tons, a total loss of imported domestic fuel of 850,000 tons. As against this, our imports of anthracite are up by 300,000 tons as at August 13, but this will probably fall off. It is estimated at present that the deficiency in imported domestic fuels as defined above will be about 600,000 tons. In addition, the effects of the United States bituminous strike, the seamen's strike and the present steel strike, will reduce our Canadian coke supply. The present deficiency from this source is about 150,000 tons, making a total deficiency of 750,000 tons, or 12½ per cent of our 6,000,000 ton requirement.

These figures are computed on the assurance that the various by-product plants will supply the same quantity of fuel for domestic purposes as last year.

It has already been pointed out that owing to the loss of production during the strikes, the supplying of this quantity to the domestic market would materially reduce the coke available for the production of pig iron. If pig iron production were continued at last year's rate, a further 300,000 tons of coke that it is planned to place in the domestic market would not be available; hence the total deficiency of domestic fuel in Ontario and Quebec would amount to 1,050,000 tons, or, say, 17½ per cent of the total domestic fuel requirements in this area of 6,000,000 tons.

Last year over 250,000 tons of Alberta domestic coal was moved to this area which was not available at the beginning of the fuel year. To overcome this and to help to meet the deficiency in United States supplies, this control has made arrangements with various dirt moving contractors in western Canada to produce by stripping some 500,000 tons of coal. On the basis of last year's experience, this should make available to Ontario and Quebec some 300,000 tons of Alberta domestic coal. In addition some 175,000 tons of briquettes or other high grade fuel will be diverted from the railways to this market. This makes in total some 225,000 tons of additional fuel from Alberta. However, should a coal strike occur in district 18, Alberta, this supply will not be available.

SUPPLY OF FUEL OIL AND OIL BURNERS

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): In view of the enormous increase in fuel oil equipment for heating purposes all over Canada, which will in future replace the market for coal, is the minister assuming responsibility for an adequate supply of fuel oil?

Mr. HOWE: The coal control is assuming responsibility for seeing that an adequate supply of fuel oil is available this winter. I think I can say that those who depend on oil for heating will be guaranteed a supply.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister a question with respect to heating by oil? What is the position now with respect to obtaining a good supply of oil burners? A number of persons in my constituency have asked me about this matter. Because of the coal shortage there is a move on foot to install oil burners, and some people have told me that it is difficult to get them; others have not had the same trouble. Will the minister clear up that point?

Mr. HOWE: The production of oil burning equipment has increased enormously, but the demand has also increased enormously. There is no government control on the distribution of oil heaters. The only method of obtaining them is to apply to a dealer and take such position as can be obtained on the dealers' lists.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are they in short supply generally?

Mr. HOWE: The supply is not sufficient for the demand.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction if there is anything he can do to expedite the report of the royal commission on fuel? The answer to the whole fuel problem will hinge upon that report. Another thought I have in that connection is that the mines workers will be holding their annual meeting on October 25; and if they are to bring down any comprehensive policy with respect to wages and working conditions it will be necessary that they have this report.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall be very glad to convey my hon. friend's remarks to the royal commission on coal. I have already told the house that the report is being prepared, and I have also requested that it be completed as rapidly as possible. From the information I have I should think the report would be available for the convention my hon. friend has referred to, and I shall make every effort to see that it is.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TEXTILE STRIKE—INQUIRY AS TO ARREST OF UNION LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, of which I have not sent him notice. If he desires to take it as a notice and answer to-morrow, that will be satisfactory. Is the minister aware that leaders of the textile workers' strike in Valleyfield have been arrested on charges of alleged conspiracy, and that they have been refused bail? Can the minister take any action which will result in their being granted bail? If not, does he think it is conducive to the best law and order to refuse bail to these people?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I can answer the question right away. I know nothing about the arrest of labour leaders beyond what I have seen in the press, or about the refusal of bail. I must point out that the granting or refusal of bail is a part of the administration of justice and is under the control of the judicial branch of the sovereignty of the Canadian nation. This parliament exercises legislative sovereignty. The government exercises the executive powers; the judiciary deal with the administration of justice. I have always taken the position that it would be quite improper for the executive or any member of the executive to try to interfere in any way with the process of the courts in the administration of justice.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if any reply has been made to the request of Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, premier of Nova Scotia, made on August 8, that another dominion-provincial conference should be called to make, using Mr. Macdonald's words, at least one more effort to bring about a true solution of the taxation and subsidy agreements. A similar request has been made, I understand, by the premiers of other provinces.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I do not know that any request has been received from the premier of Nova Scotia. I remember that some weeks ago there was publicity in the newspapers about some public statement made by Mr. Macdonald as to the desirability of there being further meetings of the representatives of the dominion and the provinces. I shall inquire and see if there has been any specific request from him. I do not remember seeing any, but I shall make some inquiries and find out. The most recent communication in that regard was a telegram received from the mayor of Fort William, mayor George R. Inglis, and dated August 16, to which a reply was dispatched on August 22. That reply was communicated to the press, and I think I saw it reproduced in two or three of our newspapers. I do not think it would serve any good purpose to read it into the record here. It contained a statement that negotiations were going on between the federal government and the governments of certain provinces, and that the federal government is prepared to proceed immediately with discussions on the proposals outlined in the budget speech, with any other province which may be interested.

Now, if there is a desire of the provinces to get together and agree upon what they would suggest, there is nothing to prevent them from doing so. The situation which arose was that the wartime tax agreements were running out, and it had not been found possible, in the meetings which had been held, to arrive at any common agreement. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) said in this house that there was nothing surprising about that. We had been at it only about nine months, and the discussions which preceded confederation took two or three years, and the investigation of the Rowell-Sirois commission also took more than two years. Nevertheless there had arisen a situation which it was necessary to deal with, and we attempted to see if anything could be done with the provinces individually for the purpose of continuing agreements about taxes. Those negotiations have been and are going on.

As I said before, if the provinces now think it would be preferable for them to have some scheme, upon which they were agreed, considered by the government, there is nothing to prevent their meeting and preparing such proposals. There have been many occasions in the past on which the provinces have met together to discuss representations which they wished jointly to make to the federal government. That can be done again.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Premier Macdonald's request has been widely publicized in the papers.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, we all know wide publicity is given to what is said on almost every controversial question which arises in this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Justice has just referred to the mayor of Fort William, but he used a name which was not that of the mayor of Fort William. The mayor of Fort William is Mr. Garfield Anderson.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That was my mistake. The telegram was filed from Fort William, but Mayor Inglis, who sent the telegram from Fort William, is the mayor of Niagara Falls.

Mr. McIVOR: The mayor of Fort William has good sense.

Mr. BRACKEN: I gather from the minister's remarks that the government has not taken any initiative toward calling another dominion-provincial conference; is that correct?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: The government has not closed the door, has it?

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, the government does not close doors on anything which may lead to a satisfactory solution of any problem of public interest.

Mr. GRAYDON: It looks like a closed door to me.

CANADIAN ARMY

STAFF CARS AT SOMERSET STREET BRIDGE, OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence, to which I was told that I would be given an answer. My question was whether his department or War Assets Corporation were in control of the automobile dump at the Somerset street bridge, where there are thirty or forty new staff cars. Has the minister an answer?

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): That is an ordnance depot in Ottawa for the army, and has nothing to do with War Assets Corporation. The vehicles there are the property of the army.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to know when those thirty or forty new vehicles are to be sold, because there is a doctor in my district—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: —who has been trying to get a car for the last three months, and who will have to give up practice unless he can get one.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

76. Departmental administration,, $170,340.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): When the house adjourned last evening I was discussing the matter of floor prices for primary products. I have been given to understand that it would be an enormous task to have adjustments made by which this protection would include all primary producers. During the war the necessary machinery was assembled and put into effect to enforce price control. We all agree, I believe, that a fine job was done in this country under capable management. If this could be accomplished under great pressure owing to increased buying power and an acute shortage of necessary supplies, I feel confident that, from experience gained during that period, we have the machinery already in operation that can solve our problem and put all primary producers of this country in the same position as that occupied by the farmers of western Canada. Why there should be any distinction between east and west I fail to understand.

On August 14 the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in this chamber, had this to say—Hansard, page 4809.

> We have contracts for pork; we have contracts for cheese; we have contracts for butter: we have contracts for milk; and all are on the same basis for a long period of time at a stabilized price . . . A beef contract is under negotiation. I think the final touches will be put to it while I am over in England during the next week or two.

When the present contract for wheat over a five year period is added to those just mentioned, I believe you will all agree the agricultural industry is adequately protected, and I wish to congratulate the minister upon establishing what I believe to be the greatest protective policy that any primary producer has ever enjoyed in the history of this dominion.

I might also mention in connection with this matter the act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace. This was assented to on August 15, 1944. One portion of it I should like to put on the record:

> 10. (2) Expenditures, for the purposes of this act, other than administrative expenses provided for under subsection one of this section, shall be paid by the Minister of Finance on the requisition of the board, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, under and by virtue of the authority of the governor in council on the recommendation of treasury board in an amount not to exceed in the aggregate two hundred millions dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is $200 million provided to protect agriculture. There is no mention, in relation to that vast sum, of the fishing industry or any other primary produces in the Dominion of Canada. So I feel that there was neglect somewhere in that the other primary producers were not considered when that agreement was drawn up.

In order to implement these several agreements, connected with the Minister of Agriculture's discussions on stabilizing prices, several trips by him were necessitated, as agreements such as these are not completed satisfactorily without extended negotiations and much study by both the exporter and the importer. Owing to the fact that the natural markets for our fish and fish products are on this side of the Atlantic, contacts could be made with much less difficulty than were encountered by the Minister of Agriculture, and much time and expense could be saved in organizing international gatherings.

After listening attentively to the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture as to the protection given the agricultural industry, I feel that great discrimination is being shown against the other primary producers of this country if every member of this house does not insist that the same long-term protection be given one and all. My personal opinion is that the protection given the agricultural industry must include every province in this dominion and every individual producer within these provinces; also that steps must be taken immediately, regardless of the enormous task involved, to establish and maintain contracts for the protection of all primary producers.

Surely the fisheries department would not be satisfied to sit idly by while a select group is singled out for special recognition and protection, nor could members representing counties where the fishing industry is of great importance do other than insist most emphatically that the products of the sea take their rightful place, and demand that the same treatment be accorded this industry as has been given agriculture. Let us not forget that the real wealth of this or any country can come from three sources only, the land, sea and forests, and now is the time to take the precautionary measures necessary to give adequate protection to the producers of this wealth.

Individual effort excluding the other groups would, I feel, increase distrust and intensify division at a time when equality and unity should be our aim. Assistance and guidance from this government is necessary if that aim is to be achieved.

Speaking on the fisheries estimates on December 17, 1945, I endeavoured to impress upon this department the important part the lobster fishery is taking to-day in the general welfare of the maritime provinces. Some years it is at the top in dollar value, and never below second place for a great many years. The legal season for lobster fishing in all parts of the maritime provinces is of short duration; it would not average more than five or six months in any one section, which greatly adds to the importance of the lobster fishery, as it gives the fishermen the opportunity of engaging in other branches of the industry during the closed season.

Winter fishing is the most profitable, as prices at this season of the year are usually higher owing to the uncertainty of weather conditions and the greater hazards that must be encountered by the fishermen. If they are able to operate three days weekly during this season of the year it would be considered a good average, and there is always the danger of a bad storm that would practically destroy all their equipment and leave them no choice but to cease operations for that year, and go to great expense to prepare for the next season. As I have before stated in this house, no part of this equipment can be insured. The fishermen must always be in position to finance his own business and therefore must have a working capital.

A few weeks ago two thousand live lobsters were shipped from St. Andrews, New Brunswick, to British Columbia. This is another experiment on the Pacific coast to build up a lobster fishery. This province has experimented with lobsters before, unsuccessfully, but knowing the value this industry would be to their fishermen and to the province generally they are determined that regardless of expense and discouraging results obtained in previous ventures everything possible must be done and every suggestion given careful consideration before admitting defeat.

I regret this department does not take the same attitude with respect to the value of the lobster fisheries on the Atlantic coast. I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind that lobster hatcheries can be operated successfully by this department in the maritime provinces, if they are given the same enthusiastic consideration that is given hatcheries for the propagation of fresh water fish to attract tourists to our provinces. Several years ago a few lobster hatcheries were operated in eastern Canada. I have information from a reliable source, a gentleman with great knowledge of the fishing industry and many years of experience with this department, that very little interest was taken in these hatcheries when they were in operation, and practically every person employed in their operation was a politician with no knowledge of this type of work and little interest other than his pay cheque.

Since suggesting lobster hatcheries to this department nearly one year ago I have been informed that the cost connected with their operation and the result obtained does not warrant the expenditure. This information, I have been given to understand, was obtained by scientific research and after consultation with officials who are responsible for maintaining hatcheries in the United States.

To show the committee that the same check is not made concerning sport fish, I wish to relate one incident to which I was an eye witness. At Loch Lomond in St. John county we have a hatchery maintained by this department, and from the number employed directly and indirectly the cost of operation without doubt is a large sum. In the year 1942 a few hundred small bass were taken from this hatchery in about twenty-five large cans. These were taken in the morning to Blacks Harbour, a distance of over fifty miles by truck. There they were loaded on the Department of Fisheries patrol boat and taken across the bay of Fundy to Nova Scotia by water, another distance of fifty miles or more, taking eight or nine hours. During this trip salt water had to be bailed in the cans frequently to keep the fish cool. Arriving in Nova Scotia the cans were again loaded on trucks and taken several miles to a lake. By this time it was late at night and the truck could not drive within quite some distance of the lake, which made it necessary with the aid of flashlights to carry these heavy cans from the truck to the lake over a very rough path. Men stumbled and fell, spilling some fish over this wood road, but the job was completed about midnight. The following day the boat returned to Blacks Harbour, and the gentlemen in charge of operations from Loch Lomond reported a job well done. Just what these fish cost the people of Canada I do not know, but I should be interested to know the cost from the time they were spawn until they were delivered to their final destination. This is one case in many, and has been brought to the minister's attention for one purpose only, to prove that where there is a will there is always a way. And if the same determination and energy could be injected into matters pertaining to commercial fishing, much could be done to improve the industry.

I do not wish to minimize the contribution science has made to this country and to the world, but I think that in some cases practical experience is worth while, and the two together could work wonders. There are in the employ of the research board two gentlemen whom I know well. They have been in their employ for nearly thirty years. Neither of these gentlemen is a scientist, but over that period of years they have had great practical experience in all parts of the maritime provinces and all waters adjacent in connection with work having to do with the fishing industry. They have been given some tough assignments by the research board, but have always managed to come through with the required information. I should be pleased to see either of these men given a free hand by the fisheries department in connection with lobster hatcheries. With the aid of the scientific staff, the two working harmoniously with full support of this department could, I am convinced, come through once more with the desired results. The two gentlemen I have in mind are Captain A. E. Calder and E. A. Rigby. Their record with this department will, I am sure, substantiate any statement I have made. If they were given the opportunity and the support I have suggested and decided after a fair trial that lobster hatcheries were not feasible, then I myself would be thoroughly convinced that the idea could be forgotten. But until such time as every conceivable idea has been tested and all the knowledge at the disposal of this department coordinated without result, I will continue to remind those responsible that one of our greatest industries is being terribly neglected.

From a memorandum presented to the secretary of the fisheries research board, dated April 2, 1946, regarding lobster hatcheries, signed by A. W. H. Needler, J. L. Tremblay and D. C. Wilder, it would appear the operation of lobster hatcheries would not be profitable except on a purely experimental basis. Great emphasis is laid on the cost of establishing and maintaining rearing stations. To my knowledge the cost in connection with other hatcheries has never been considered in relation to the results obtained, and since the year 1917 no effort has been made to experiment with rearing stations, although millions of dollars have been found for other experiments that will never return dollar value to this country and were never intended to.

I notice in the estimates for 1946 that the salaries for employees of the fisheries research board alone are over one-half million dollars. Why any additional help would be required to carry on this proposed service, I fail to understand. The operation and maintenance for this branch alone is three quarters of a million dollars, not including the fish culture branch, for which the estimate is $230,000; $140,000 of this amount is for salaries and wages. This would make a total of $643,000 in wages paid the research board and the fish culture branch. Surely with this amount available the personnel could be found to maintain lobster hatcheries.

Another section of the report, page 2, states that after the hatcheries were closed in 1917, reliance was placed on the protection of berried lobsters rather than on artificial hatching of the eggs. Just how this protection has been given is not explained to my knowledge. The regulation which affords this protection in most cases has forced lobster dealers to dispose of the female lobsters before they spawn, which I feel is very harmful and in no way a protection. This is done by giving fisheries inspectors authority to liberate berried lobsters which were bought and paid for legally and held in pounds several weeks or months before the spawn appeared. These inspectors have authority to liberate these lobsters without remunerating the owner, although they were bought and held legally. To avoid this injustice the dealer separates the females when they are impounded and holds them in a separate compartment. The time of spawning is known to this operator who, by this regulation, is forced to sell all female lobsters just before they spawn in order to protect his investment, as the actual loss he would be obliged to sustain would in some cases amount to thousands of dollars. In other words, the pound operator is compelled by this regulation to kill the lobster before it spawns. This, I believe you will agree, is anything but protection.

On page 3 of this same report there appears a table of lobsters produced by hatcheries in the state of Maine for the years 1938 to 1945, inclusive. The average over that period is about 300,000 annually.

Mr. BRIDGES: May I interrupt to point out that page 3 of the report refers to rearing ponds. The hon. member stated it referred to hatcheries.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): These figures may be correct. However, I have figures for the years 1942 and 1943 taken from a pamphlet published by the United States department of the interior, fish and wildlife service. Under the column "Summary by states of the distribution of fishes," the number of lobsters distributed in the state of Maine for the year 1942 was 4,898,510; for 1943, 4,008,420; total for the two years about 9,000,000. The table previously given by this department for the same period shows 343,000. I am unable to state which is correct.

The report of the fisheries research board states also:

> Artificial hatching and rearing not responsible for increased Maine lobster catches.

In the same report it states that lobster rearing began in Maine in the year 1938 and has continued since that time. Also included is table No. 2, giving the lobster catch in pounds for the years 1935 to 1945 inclusive.

I wish the committee to note that it takes about five years from the time a rearing station is started before any results are obtained. The catch in pounds is shown from 1935 to 1945 in the following table:

Year	Catch in pounds
1935	7,687,200
1937	7,348,500
1938	7,659,200
1939	7,570,800
1940	7,643,005
1941	8,937,182
1942	8,403,793
1943	11,468,025
1944	13,300,000
1945	19,130,000

The report states definitely that a great increase has occurred over that period. It states that hatcheries are not responsible for the increase but fails to explain or suggest what is responsible for greatly improved conditions.

From information contained in this report of the research board, acknowledgement is made that no action has been taken on their part during the past thirty years to acquire knowledge regarding the rearing of lobsters, although during that time the lobster catch in certain years was very low and in certain areas lobster fishermen were practically forced out of the business.

I know of no way in which during the past thirty years the efforts of the research board and fish culture branch and the funds at their disposal could have been used to greater advantage than with experiments that might have been beneficial to one of the greatest industries in the maritime provinces. Why this experiment was discarded is still not explained in their report, and it certainly was not justified in the opinion of maritime lobster fishermen, particularly when it is evident that large funds have been found for experimenting with fresh water or game fish upon which no citizen would depend for a livelihood.

I can definitely assure this department that they would receive little criticism if this experiment were given a fair trial over a period of years and failed to produce the required result, because the fishermen who are greatly concerned would be convinced that the research board and the fish culture branch were interested in their welfare and had at least tried to be of assistance.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This is an important department dealing with a great natural resource that we have in the maritimes and on the Pacific coast. I do not propose to take up very much time at this stage of the session.

The Department of Fisheries was established on the recommendation of the Duncan commission, composed of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, Doctor Cyrus Macmillan, who had a seat in this house for a number of years and was highly respected by all of us, and the late Judge Wallace, at the request of the government of Nova Scotia, when I was a member. The department has done splendid work in the intervening years, and I feel it is doing a splendid work to-day. The minister is certainly applying himself to the needs and requirements of the fishermen in Canada. He may have been at a considerable disadvantage in the beginning at least, because he belongs to the legal profession and represents an inland constituency. On the other hand he is supported by an able staff, some of whom come from my province. I should like to name them but I shall not do so.

I was very much impressed, Mr. Chairman, by the addresses made on these estimates by the hon. member for New Westminster, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the hon. member for Queens, Prince Edward Island (Mr. McLure), the hon. member for Charlotte and others. Cumberland is not a big fishing centre, although it is bounded by both the waters of the Northumberland strait and by the bay of Fundy. It has a large lobster interest, the centre of the world's lobster supply, and it has also a considerable smelt fishing interest, as well as oysters. All these fishing activities can be expanded, and I believe this applies in a very large measure to the oyster industry. There is no better oyster in the world than is produced in the waters of Cumberland county and nearby counties. These oyster areas are producing only a small fraction of their potential capacity to produce oysters. In Cumberland county, in my constituency, we have a very considerable smelt industry, which is followed by the local residents. The smelt is one of the tastiest salt-water fish that is produced, and if it is marketed in a fresh state and properly prepared there is no finer fish than the smelt which are marketed late in the season and in the early winter. We have in Cumberland small smelt rivers, with shoal waters and long sand banks. In these rivers the ice forms early in the season. Recognizing this condition the Department of Fisheries for a number of years established an earlier season to enable the local smelt fisherman to get a fair catch and market it at a time when the smelt would first come on the market in this country and in the United States. These waters were closed weeks or months earlier because of ice conditions, but unfortunately the department made the season uniform and so our fishermen were denied the privilege of a full season which they had enjoyed over a number of years. I would ask the minister again to investigate and see if in view of the special conditions an earlier season could be established for these shoal waters and small rivers in Cumberland and Westmorland counties.

The activities of these fishermen were also interfered with last year by smelt fishermen who came in from distant points and established what are called box traps at the very mouth of these rivers, which interfered with the access of the smelt up the rivers and ruined the catch of the regular smelt fishermen. I feel that the department should investigate that question and provide all the advantages that are possible for the regular net fishermen who have been pursuing that occupation for many years, and not allow outsiders to come in and block their efforts and interfere with their business and living.

As I said this is a very important department dealing with a great natural resource. The fishermen themselves endure great hardships, and they have suffered over the years. At the time the Duncan commission made its report some of them were receiving only 50 cents per hundred pounds for whole fish, from 50 to 75 cents. There was no adequate market, and the fish were not properly prepared and shipped quickly to the markets. Much has been done in the intervening years to improve the price of fish and to assist in its marketing, and I want to express my appreciation to the minister and his officials for what they have done.

I would also point out the desirability of improving and protecting the sport fishing opportunities in Nova Scotia and in the maritime provinces generally. This is one of the great attractions for our own people and for the tourist. The department has made some efforts through hatcheries to increase the angling and sport fisheries, as well as salmon and other commercial fisheries, but a great deal more could be done. I do not believe that anything is more attractive to the tourist than successful sport fishing. I ask the minister to give the attention of his department to the improving and planting of as large a quantity of fish and oysters as possible and to protect these fisheries and the regular fishermen in getting their hazardous living, so that not only may the local people have the benefit of improved trout and sport fishing, but the fish will be there in greater numbers for the tourists who come to our part of Canada.

I will not delay the committee any longer. This is one of the most important natural resources pursued by men who carry on their occupation under great hardship, and I am pleased that the returns they have been receiving in the last few years have been more adequate than formerly. It will be the object of the department, I am sure, to see that these prices are maintained and that there are adequate markets for the fishermen of the maritime provinces.

Mr. LANGLOIS: I listened attentively to and have studied the statement made yesterday afternoon in this chamber by the Minister of Fisheries. Though his new policy relative to the inspectorship does not and will not apply to the fisheries of my county, I wish to comment briefly upon it.

The Department of Fisheries is taking a most important step in the right direction by introducing this policy. Surely the minister deserves to be congratulated on this timely innovation. He had no need to apologize, as he seemed to be doing yesterday, for breaking new ground, and I trust he will keep on doing so whenever he deems it necessary. By thus injecting new blood into his department and by planning for the future he is working in the best interests of the fishermen of Canada. In addition to securing a staff of trained inspectors for his department he is at the same time helping along a most deserving class of our Canadian society by opening up new careers to our worthy returned soldiers.

I also appreciate the idea of having men charged with the duty of seeing the regulations complied with, who will help along our fishermen and act—I like to use the minister's own words here—as educationists. I must add that I did not expect anything else from the hon. gentleman. Since my election to this parliament indeed I have always found in the course of my numerous dealings with him the same spirit of cooperation on his part that he is himself to-day going to request from his officers in their dealings with the fishermen.

I said in my opening remarks that the fishermen in my county were not going to benefit by this new policy. I explained the other day in this house that, since 1922, the fisheries of my province have come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and I gave in some detail the advantages which were then lost for ever to the Quebec fishermen who, like the fishermen of other provinces, contribute to the federal treasury. I need not therefore repeat here my views in this respect. I leave it to those who were at the time and who are now responsible for this only exception in the administration of our Canadian fisheries to shoulder their responsibility and to compensate the losses suffered by our Quebec fishermen under the pretense of provincial autonomy. I hope that at least they will have the courage to follow the fine example set by the federal department of fisheries, and that, if their so-called provincial autonomy is not at stake, they will endeavour to make similar arrangements with both the Department of Labour and the Department of Veterans Affairs to achieve the same end in their own sphere.

I must also congratulate the minister on, and thank him for, having gifted my county with a most modern experimental fishing station. I hope that in the very near future this establishment will also provide a meteorological service, which is so much needed by our fishermen. This affords the Minister of Fisheries an opportunity to reward our fishermen for the great sacrifices they have been asked to make and for the loss they have been asked to suffer by their Quebec leaders.

I have but one more remark to make, and it concerns our present policy regarding the export of salted fish. As this matter stands to-day, no producer can export salted fish if he was not in the trade during the base period of 1941-42. The result is that this trade is closed to newcomers, unless—and I appreciate this exception—the applicant for the export permit is a veteran of our armed services, a buffer having been provided for such cases. However, many examples have been brought to my attention during the past fishing season where the fishing trade was greatly handicapped by this 1941-42 quota rule. I cite here a few of these examples. A producer who has a great number of fishermen fishing for his account has filled his orders for say, fresh or frozen cod, but the fish are still coming in in great quantities from the sea. Instead of dumping the catch he decides to produce salted fish. Since the only market for his salted fish open to-day is in the United States, he applies for an export permit. The application is turned down, because, unfortunately for him, he was not in this kind of export business during the 1941-42 period; and therefore he is left with the fish on his hands. Another example is the one which occurred frequently, according to my information, during the past fishing season in my county. All the frozen space in this particular fishing village was taken up on account of a more abundant catch during a couple of exceptionally good fishing days, or on account of lack of transportation usually caused by lack of refrigeration cars at the time. The producers who had to absorb the incoming catches were faced with the problem either of salting away the fish with no open market in sight, if they were not eligible for export permits according to the 1941-42 regulations, or of asking their fishermen to stop fishing for two or three days when fishing was good.

I think that these examples will suffice to illustrate my point and to show the disastrous consequences of this policy on our fishing trade. I am told that some of our producers had to resort to the expedient of asking some Montreal or Quebec brokers for permission to use the quotas which most of the brokers had accidentally acquired during the base period by placing orders on outside markets, though they were not in the trade before and never have been since. I must add that in all cases brought to my attention these lucky brokers did not hesitate to lend their firm's quotas, provided, of course, that substantial remuneration was received for this good service.

Mr. MacINNIS: That also was an accident.

Mr. LANGLOIS: I know that these regulations are entangled in international food agreements, but I think that this situation, which is most detrimental to our fishermen, must be remedied forthwith. Perhaps, if I may offer a suggestion, a policy such as the one adopted recently by the timber control to regulate the quantum of the production going both in the domestic and in the foreign markets could be satisfactorily worked out in this instance without penalizing the producers who were not in the export trade during the base period. I know that the minister has been very busy struggling to tackle this problem, and I hope that my remarks will urge him to keep on working in this direction and that a solution will be found in the near future.

Mr. MacINNIS: Because of the importance of the subject with which we are dealing I regret that it is necessary for one to be brief at this time. First we have the important statement made by the minister yesterday afternoon in connection with which hon. members representing constituencies either adjacent to or in areas where people make their living by fishing, would like to ask some questions. I shall ask the minister certain questions later in regard to his statement. Then we have the speech made by the member for New Westminster, which merits consideration which I fear we shall not be able to give it at this time. Following that is the question of marketing which was raised by the hon. member for Charlotte. These are all questions of the utmost importance and should have a thorough airing when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are under discussion.

It is my hope that at some time or other the estimates of the Department of Fisheries will be called first instead of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, so that those of us who are interested in the fishing industry may have the same chance to go as thoroughly into matters pertaining to that department as do those who are interested in agriculture go into the agriculture estimates. However, that is not possible at this late stage of the session.

Now that the war is over, great difficulties confront the fishing industry on both coasts. I do not pretend to have as great a grasp of the fishing industry as has the hon. member for New Westminster, who has made it a special study for many years, but I am quite sure that given the proper attention, the fish packs, particularly the salmon pack on the Pacific coast, could be more than doubled in a period of four or five years. All that would have to be done to accomplish this does not lie wholly with the federal Department of Fisheries; a great deal would have to be done by the provincial governments.

On the Pacific coast there is a possibility that the fishing industry may become overcrowded. A great many people are going into that industry, and if it is not carefully watched there may be more people in it than can make a living out of it. These are all important matters which we should have a longer time to discuss.

Referring to the question raised by the hon. member for Charlotte as to prices and marketing; I believe that while the war was a very terrible experience, one thing at least has come out of it. People have learned that by proper control and regulation production can be assured, together with proper rewards to those who actually do the work. We have learned something that the producers of all sorts of commodities will not give up willingly. I repeat that I hope the minister will at the next session so arrange matters that his estimates will come before us earlier.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I was very much interested in the minister's plans for the expansion of his department. I do not intend to say anything on the programme or on the appointment of inspectors which has been proposed. Before I proceed, however, I wish to say that the minister to-day has the confidence of all who are interested in the fishing industry. This places a great responsibility on him, and I know that his administration will fully justify the confidence placed in him. I intend to say something on a matter which was covered in the fine speeches delivered by the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, namely, the position of our fishermen off the Nova Scotia coast and on what we call the Sable Island and Quero banks.

This question presents two problems. One has to do with the destruction of the fishermen's nets, trawls and gear by steam trawlers. The other problem has to do with the conservation of the fish population now existing in those waters.

The first question as to the destruction of gear is not a new one in Nova Scotia. It has been brought up on many occasions in the past. This question was brought to the attention of the minister of marine and fisheries over twenty years ago. In 1924 a petition signed by fifty or sixty fishing masters protested against the destruction of their nets and gear in the waters in or near Sable Island banks. The Sable Island banks lie southwest of the Quero banks. The petition was sent to the department of marine and fisheries of that day. Many declarations were sent accompanying it. These declarations, which were made by masters of fishing schooners, set out the particulars in detail of the damage done to the nets, and also in most cases gave the nationalities of the owners of the trawlers, as well as the names of the trawlers.

In consequence of those representations the government provided a protection vessel, the Arras to patrol the fishing banks off Sable island. The question of depredations by trawlers was also raised before the royal commission which was set up to investigate the fisheries of the maritime provinces and the Magdalen islands. This commission was headed by the late Hon. A. K. Maclean, who at the time was president of the Exchequer Court of Canada. There were several members on the commission, one of whom was the Hon. Cyrus Macmillan, who was afterwards minister of fisheries. The commission made its report in 1928. I should like to read one or two extracts from the report, which sets out clearly and concisely the complaints of the Nova Scotia fishermen in respect of the operation of foreign trawlers at that time. I might add that there was a minority report by the Hon. A. K. Maclean, dealing with trawlers. However, in respect of this question of the destruction of fishing nets and gear the commission as a whole were in complete agreement.

At page 93 of the report there is this statement:

> Under the second general heading of direct protection of the fishermen, two objections to steam-trawlers were expressed to us—that the steam-trawlers are foreign-owned and foreign-manned, and that they destroy fishermen's gear without making restitution. With reference to the first of these protests, six of the ten trawlers now operating from ports in the maritime provinces are said to be owned in Canada; and the majority of the crews are said to be naturalized British citizens. This objection may therefore be considered as relatively unimportant. But the contention that steam-trawlers destroy the fishermen's gear was supported by well substantiated statements by many fishermen who themselves had suffered loss. At Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, the captains' association was represented before us by counsel who stated that the damage to gear of some of the Lunenburg fishing fleet by steam-trawlers amounted in recent years to at least five thousand dollars. We were told by several fishermen that it is sometimes the practice of steam-trawlers to set their fishing course where other fishing vessels have taken up their position, and that they destroy, particularly during their night fishing operations, the gear that lies in the track of their trawl. In Great Britain, there have been many prosecutions of operators of steam-trawlers for such destruction of the gear of other fishermen and many convictions have resulted. There, however, the aggrieved fisherman may place his case, for equitable adjustment, before a general court specially established for this purpose. The Canadian shore fisherman has no such privilege; he has to depend on his own effors to protect his rights and his property, and his efforts are usually futile. France, it is said, maintains a light cruiser or patrol boat to enforce discipline among French steam-trawlers operating on the banks; and we were told that the Canadian hospital ship on these fishing grounds endeavours to provide protection for Canadian fishermen's gear. But the statements made to us by many fishermen indicate that the protection is far from adequate.

Then the report goes on to say that—

Beyond her territorial waters, Canada has no jurisdiction. The high seas are free to all nations as fishing grounds, and no country alone can prevent the steam-trawlers of other countries from operating there with their own methods and in their own way.

The two important questions above, which call for consideration, are the taking of immature fish and the destruction of fishermen's gear. They are questions that can be disposed of solely by international negotiations and arrangements. We, therefore, recommend that an effort be made by the government of Canada to bring about an international conference or negotiations among the nations from which steam-trawlers now operate on the fishing banks of the North Atlantic, with a view to making international arrangements or agreements for the regulating of all fishing vessels on the banks, particularly for the protection of fishermen's gear and for the more complete conservation of the fisheries in those areas. The desirability of such negotiations has frequently in the past been discussed and advocated, but no practical or definite plan has yet been formulated.

Those are extracts from the majority report of the commission. The Hon. A. K. Maclean, in his minority report with reference to this matter, had this to say:

Complaints were made to the commission, particularly at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, concerning the damage done to line trawlers and fishing gear by Canadian and foreign trawlers. Such damage occurs in international waters. This being the case, regulations to effectively alleviate or end these complaints must be the subject of international action. In the North Sea, where fishermen of many nations are engaged in fishing, it was found necessary to regulate the manner and methods of fishing, and to police the fishing areas. To achieve this end a convention between Great Britain, Germany, Belgium, Denmark, France and Holland was entered into, in 1882. It is said that this convention has in a large degree accomplished its purpose. For the same reason, as well as others to be later mentioned, I would recommend that the government of Canada take the proper steps to secure, if possible, an international conference representative of the countries whose citizens fish on the North Atlantic fishing grounds, with a view to the enactment of international regulations governing the operation of trawlers in these waters, and the punishment of offences against such regulations.

I said a few minutes ago that this question of the destruction of gear and nets of fishermen is not new. In the course of my law practice I have been concerned with several cases where fishing schooners have been run down by trawlers. One of these, which is a typical case, and reference to which may be useful, concerned the vessel Mahaska. This was a Lunenburg fishing schooner which was run down by a French trawler in 1929, and sank as a result. The material facts are set out in two or three sentences of the judgment of Mr. Justice Mellish, the admiralty judge who tried the action. I quote:

This is an action for damages by collision. The Mahaska is a fishing schooner. On the 22nd March, 1929, she was lying at anchor near Sable island banks.

I have said that the Sable Island banks lie immediately southwest of the Quero banks which were mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. The judgment goes on to say:

At about two a.m. on said date she was when so lying rammed and sunk by the defendant ship —a steam trawler. The weather at the time was fine and clear.

In that case two lives were lost and the schooner sank in four minutes. It was only because of the skill of the members of the crew handling the dories that a much greater loss of life was prevented. What I wish to bring to the attention of the committee is this, that so far as I know no action has ever been taken to implement the recommendations of the royal commission that an international conference be held with a view of making agreements for the regulating of fishing vessels on the banks.

The second problem which is presented in connection with the Quero banks is that of the conservation of the fish. Some question was raised yesterday as to the international law bearing on this subject. It is true textbooks say that the fish in the high seas are the property of the persons who first catch them, and the jurisdiction of a country extends over adjacent waters only to the three-mile limit. That may have been international law when these textbooks were written, but law can, I suggest, become obsolete or should not be followed because of changed circumstances. The world has changed since the days when these principles of law were first enunciated: it has become smaller. Te experience we have had of recent years shows that international law as known at one time is not respected generally by all nations. The Canadian Bar Association is meeting to-day in Winnipeg, and I read in the morning papers that one of the questions to be considered there is the codification of international law.

Mr. REID: There is no international law on the three-mile limit.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): It has never been codified, but I think it has generally been accepted in British countries that the three-mile limit was the extent of the limit over which British power extends. That is modified in many cases by conventions and by agreements. But I would say that the mere fact that that was the law does not mean that that law should continue to exist as it is. It never had any scientific or logical basis. I think it was settled on the basis that when the question arose the range of a coastal gun was three miles. But we know to-day rockets go hundreds of miles, to say nothing of the distances which bombs from aeroplanes can be carried.

The hon. member for New Westminster referred to a proclamation of President Truman which was issued last December. It related to fisheries in waters contiguous to the United States. I have read the operative part of that document, which appears in Hansard, August 28, page 5524. It seems to me that this proclamation expressly reserves the rights of fishermen of other nations, and it also reserves navigational rights. It does not go so far as to provide that the United States can legislate in respect of waters which have been fished by their own nationals in common with nationals of other countries. The order provides, dealing with fishing activities in areas of the high seas contiguous to the United States, that—

> Where such activities have been or shall hereafter be developed and maintained by its nationals alone, the United States regards it as proper to establish explicitly bounded conservation zones in which fishing activities shall be subject to the regulation and control of the United States. Where such activities have been or shall hereafter be legitimately developed and maintained jointly by nationals of the United States and nationals of other states, explicitly bounded conservation zones may be established under agreements between the United States and such other states; and all fishing activities in such zones shall be subject to regulation and control as provided in such agreements.

I take that to mean that if you have areas where the fishing was carried on solely by the nationals of the United States, then United States can make regulations dealing with the activities of the fishermen engaged on the particular area. On the other hand, if it is an area which has been fished not only by nationals of the United States but also by nationals of other countries, the control by regulation of the area must take place in consequence of an agreement arrived at between the countries concerned.

I mention these reservations in order to point out that proclamations alone will not cure the troubles of our Nova Scotia off-shore fishermen. I see no objection at all to the Canadian government issuing a proclamation which would follow the lines of President Truman's proclamation; in fact there may be a distinct advantage, because the mere assertion or declaration of our right to the control of fisheries over certain areas may of itself begin to establish a prior claim to those fisheries.

The banks with which the Nova Scotia fishermen are most concerned have I think been fished at times by nationals of other countries, and before any controls over the fisheries were exercised negotiations would have to be entered into with these other countries. At the same time there could be no possible objection that I can see to a declaration of our intention to establish conservation zones. The purpose will be to conserve the fish, and that is in effect the conservation of the food supply of a great part of Canada. It is proved, I believe, beyond question by those who have given scientific study to the matter that the new methods of fishing and constant fishing with those improved methods will deplete any fishery unless proper measures are taken for the control.

That brings up another question, to which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg referred, that of an improved patrol service on the fishing banks. I think that is really the immediate problem which now faces the Department of Fisheries. The proclamation can be made, and we can assert our rights in these international waters, but in the meantime the loss of nets and fishing gear will continue to go on. I suggest to the Minister of Fisheries that we might have considered by the government the amalgamation of the water services carried on by the government by the formation of a coast guard service or in some other manner. Five government departments maintain marine services at the present time, and this quite apart from those carried on by the navy. These services include the protection of fisheries, aids to navigation, lighthouses, the protection of customs revenue, hydrographic surveys and air-sea search and rescue work. The departments carrying on this work are the R.C.A.F., the R.C.M.P., the Department of Transport, the Department of Mines and Resources with its hydrographic section, and the Department of Fisheries.

Recommendations for the formation of a Canadian coast guard service have been made by the maritime marine federation, the Nova Scotia federation of labour and the white ensign association of Halifax. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, maritimers are a seafaring people. Many of them earn their living by fishing on the high seas or serving as seamen. They are sea-minded; they have a natural liking for the sea, and the formation of a coast guard service would appeal to them. They are not alone in advocating the formation of a coast guard service. The commission on veterans legislation headed by Colonel Bovey found that a coast guard service would be justified, not only for the employment of discharged naval personnel but also on the grounds of actual need.

If the amalgamation of the water services of the various departments other than the navy is desirable, and I think it is, the most satisfactory solution would appear to lie in the formation of a coast guard service. The existence of so many departments maintaining marine services seems illogical and may result in some duplication of government expenditure. There is a further consideration. Ships for these various services could be of standardized design and adaptable for naval use. The ships could more easily become part of the navy in the event of an emergency. Furthermore, a Canadian coast guard could advantageously form the nucleus of an expanded service should the need arise in war time. The members of the marine section of the R.C.M.P. were incorporated into the navy at the beginning of the war. They made a great contribution and many of them served with great distinction. When hostilities ceased, the R.C.M.P. marine section was again absorbed by that force.

There is another consideration. An amalgamated service would be the logical instrument for the discharge of Canada's responsibilities in such international undertakings as air-sea rescue, ocean meteorological stations or other commitments of like nature which do not fall clearly within the work of a single department. During the war the R.C.A.F. had the responsibility for air-sea rescue service, and this service was operated by the R.C.A.F., assisted by the R.C.N. Under the terms of one of the conventions or agreements arrived at at the international civilian aviation conference held in Chicago in 1944, Canada undertook to provide such measure of assistance to aircraft in distress in its territory as it might find practicable. If we are to have a coast guard it might well be patterned on that of the United States. No other country has a similar service.

If anyone is interested in the activities of the United States coast guard I would refer him to the hearings before the subcommittee of the committee on appropriations when it was dealing with the coast guard appropriation bill for 1947. These proceedings set out clearly the functions of the United States coast guard both in war and peace. In war time it became part of the military forces of the United States and was operated by the navy. Under a directive issued by President Truman in December last it was directed that on and after January 1, 1946, the coast guard would operate under the department of the treasury. In other words, in war time the United States coast guard is part of the military forces of that country; in peace time it assumes its ordinary peacetime functions, such as the maintenance of aids to navigation, sea rescue activities, the enforcement of navigational laws at sea and along the coast and other such things.

In conclusion I would ask the Minister of Fisheries to give this matter consideration at an early day and bring it to the attention of the government.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, once again the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are being brought up toward the close of the session. We maritimers all feel more or less like criminals taking up the time of the committee, but I ask hon. friends from agricultural ridings to continue to be patient. I am sure they will, because we have listened to them for many long weeks: we have heard all the wails of the agriculturist on the prairies, and sometimes listening to all their tales of hard luck it seems to me that Jonah must have been a C.C.F. farmer from Saskatchewan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sure we are very much interested.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot take it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We can take it all right.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it with a sense of humour.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let it be given with a sense of humour.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I want to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for New Westminster on the thoughtful, masterly and scholarly address he gave yesterday. It has not been my privilege while in parliament to hear a finer speech on fisheries. The minister would be wise to take into careful consideration his comments and observations and the data he provided. This is an important subject and should be treated accordingly.

I should like to refer particularly to the situation in Hecate strait to which the hon. member referred. Those waters have always been Canadian waters, and I think it was just an oversight that they were allowed to slip out of our control and be considered international fishing grounds.

The fisheries on the Pacific coast suffered a severe blow by the retirement of Major Motherwell, the chief supervisor. However, I am glad to know that the department is sending out Mr. Whitmore, who has been the western director of fisheries, to take over his duties, at least temporarily. The fisheries on the Pacific coast will be in most capable hands. I was glad to hear the minister say yesterday that he had plans for bringing along young men in his department so that they would be available to take the place of officials who might be retiring. There is only one way in which you can keep the right men in government service, and that is to pay them adequate salaries so that they will be available when needed.

For a short time I should like to discuss an important and urgent question involving the fishing industry of British Columbia. I refer to the salmon run on the Fraser river. I know the minister has given this subject considerable thought and I realize it represents a knotty problem. There are a large number of seine boats in Comox-Alberni, and the owners of these boats are waiting anxiously for some decision to be made in this matter. In view of the present very low salmon catch this year, unless the seiners get some consideration from the minister, it looks like a hungry winter for them. Hon. members are familiar with the disputes that occur between various branches of the industry and between the various types of boats and gear. When the steam trawlers came along, the old sailing boats resented them very much. Ever since the war we have been able to dispose of every pound of fish that we have been able to catch, but I must warn the minister that the time is rapidly coming, and I know he appreciates this fact, when Canada will once again have to go into the markets of the world and meet keen competition. It is not going to be long before Siberian salmon is again on the market, and Japanese salmon and Norwegian fish will also be coming on to the markets of the world. There is only one way in which we shall be able to meet that competition, and that is by having the finest quality of fish products to offer on world markets. I can assure the minister that, as I think everybody is well aware, there will be no sentiment in regard to traditional markets that we have been able to gain during the war. The buyers there will look at things from a strictly dollars-and-cents angle.

I would like to read a telegram that I have received with regard to the Fraser river fisheries. A great many members have received a copy of this telegram, but I should like to put it on the record so that the committee generally will be familiar with the situation out there. It is dated Vancouver, August 23, 1946, and reads:

> Further to our former representations re seining area seventeen at mouth of Fraser river. Present situation is that seine catches in areas contiguous to Fraser, namely, Johnston straits and straits Juan de Fuca, have been extremely disappointing to date in spite of visible evidence of substantial bodies of salmon passing through these waters en route Fraser. This run due in American waters this coming week and, as informed you previously, American seine fleet over double that of last cycle year. Our only possibility attain our full share this catch is to have boundaries for seine fishing as recommended by this committee. This committee consisting of fully accredited representatives of gill netters, seiners and industry fully prepared to control seining in gulf area that fair distribution of catch to be made between gill netters and seiners.
> Our joint idea this regard, roughly two-thirds to gill-netters, one-third to seiners. This committee with full authority to exercise such control, willing and anxious work with governmental authorities for purposes of proper protection and conservation.
> Unless seining boundaries altered to permit proper seining in gulf this committee will disband and any eventuality in matter of dispute between types of gear, and any gluts and losses that might occur will be responsibility of fishery department and/or other authorities concerned. Extremely low present pack figures lowest in at least fifteen years indicate Canadian fishermen's earnings extremely poor to date and they feel unless above-mentioned boundaries revised our fishermen unable physically obtain their share of Fraser production as provided by international salmon treaty. Full significance must be given fact that in 1942 American effort ceased September first whereas this year they have no closure. Delay in obtaining decision is extremely harmful causing uncertainty and confusion. Every day that passes without decision means that necessary preparation for establishment and patrol of boundaries cannot be made, which will endanger proper control.

That is signed by Salmon Canners Operating Committee, which is the organization representing all the salmon canner companies in British Columbia, and by the Allied Workers Union, who are the bargaining agents for the fishermen, both seiners and gill netters, out there.

I am extremely sorry to have to disagree in this matter in some measure with the hon. member for New Westminster, who is particularly well informed on the salmon problems in British Columbia. He has been an able and effective member of the international salmon fisheries commission, and has made a great contribution to the establishment and building up of the Fraser river salmon run. Naturally, of course, representing as I do Comox-Alberni, where there are mostly seine boat fishermen, I appreciate the fact that the member for Fraser Valley and the member for New Westminster must speak for the gill netters, who principally reside in their ridings, and with that I certainly have no quarrel. They have always been able very effectively to take care of both their fishermen and their fruit growers.

I have often heard the idea expressed, for some strange reason, that the seiners are the rich people and the gill netters the poor people. That probably is entirely opposite to the facts. The seiners are men who do not necessarily own the boat they are on; they are usualy working men, whereas most of the gill netters have an investment of from five to ten thousand dollars in their nets and seines. So if our socialist friends over there have any prejudice against capitalists, I would say that the seiners are less capitalist than the gill netters. The seiners out in British Columbia have tried to be very fair in this problem and have suggested that the regulations be made such that the gill netters get two fish to the seiners' one; that is, that the gill netters get 66⅔ per cent of the fish. The telegram I have read in itself indicates the desire of the seiners to be very fair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Continuing from where I was when Father Time caught up with me at one o'clock, I believe the present difficulty arises over the Sloan commission's report made in 1939-40. At that time two problems were submitted to the commissioner for solution, one concerning the traps at Sooke, and the other with regard to allowing seining at the mouth of the Fraser river. It is interesting to observe from the figures what a small percentage of the Fraser river catch the seines have caught in the past, and despite the fact that the percentages are very low for fish taken by seine, the gill net fishermen feel that they have been allowed to take too many.

In 1933 seine boats took only 4·9 per cent of the catch; in 1934, 21 per cent; in 1935, 20 per cent; in 1936, they were not allowed to seine at all and consequently they got nothing; in 1937, less than one per cent; in 1938, 12 per cent; and in 1939 they took 14·75 per cent. That, I submit, proves how little the gill netters have had to complain about in this regard.

In his report Commissioner Sloan found, so far as the traps were concerned, that they were not unduly destructive of the salmon run and did not take more than a reasonable share. He pointed out that they were caught so far from the Fraser river that the fish were of very fine quality there. These lease traps are owned by one compnay, and it seems strange that a short time later, when the report was made that the traps should be allowed to remain there, another company applied for adjacent trap sites and the government refused these on the very grounds that Commissioner Sloan found untenable. It appears to me the same may be said as far as seining is concerned. I think that his findings with regard to seining at the mouth of the Fraser river are equally untenable.

When the commission sat, matters were brought to a head in the discussion of the 1938 salmon run. In that year only 1,500,000 sockeye salmon were taken from the Fraser river. Of that quantity, only 214,000, or twelve per cent, were taken by seine boats; nevertheless it brought a protest from the gill netters. This run has since been built up greatly through the efforts of the international salmon fisheries commission, of which the hon. member for New Westminster is a member, but it has also been built up by the expenditure of public funds in Canada, to which we all contribute, as well as by the restrictions that have been placed both on gill netters and on the seiners, all of which has resulted in an increase in the run.

This year it is expected there will be 4,000,000 sockeye taken as Canada's share from the same run. The run has been built up to such an extent from the level of 1,500,000 in 1938 that this year we shall have, it is expected, 4,000,000, or an increase of approximately 3,000,000 dollars in value; and as far as I have been able to gather, the gill netters feel that they are entitled to all the increase, notwithstanding the fact that it has been made possible by the restrictions on both gill netters and seiners and by the expenditure of public funds in this country.

What I regret particularly this year is that every stump rancher and office boy, every worker in the lower mainland area, has heard of the great run of salmon coming this year and therefore has obtained a gill net. Anyone who has a rowboat has a gill net licence and is there to get in on the harvest, and I say that the regular fishermen—I mean the regular seine fishermen—should be allowed to participate in this greatly increased national asset which we have this year. It will be one of the great problems to be solved, as the international fisheries commission realizes, and as the minister also knows, to see that Canada gets its fair share.

It has been decided this year that if 12,000,000 fish come to the Fraser river the Americans should have 4,000,000, Canada 4,000,000, and 4,000,000 should be allowed to go to the spawning ground for reseeding purposes. The Americans have no inhibitions about using seines or modern gear. They have the greatest seine fleet in their history waiting for these salmon. No one knows what part of the sea the salmon come from, but they suddenly show up on the Swiftsure banks between Canada and the United States. They come from the ocean through our waters and go down for about three weeks in United States territory where there are few restrictions as far as seining is concerned, so that the Americans have a great opportunity to take their share of them.

It will be our problem to make certain that if they get their 4,000,000 we shall get our 4,000,000 also, and I know that the commissioners are concerned, as is the minister, that we should get a fair division of the salmon. When the fish leave United States waters they cross over to the Canadian side of the line and it is there that we hope to be able to seine some of these fish. The fish come to our waters and stay for about three weeks, playing around off the mouth of the Fraser river, gradually getting used to the taste of fresh water; but owing to tide and wind conditions they often drift back across the line, and there will certainly be a great fleet of American boats there waiting to trap the fish that happen to be foolish enough to go back to the United States.

I would point out that salmon playing off the mouth of the Fraser river for a period of three weeks are not eating during that time. It is one of the marked characteristics of these fish that they do not eat on the way to the spawning ground, and anything that does not eat for a period of three weeks certainly deteriorates in quality. I believe that Chief Justice Sloan was very remiss in his report in that he did not give us a definite recommendation as far as quality is concerned. I have been a fish buyer for twenty years and I know something about the quality of fish. I know that the moment fish get into brackish water they begin to deteriorate every day. For that reason I am sorry that Chief Justice Sloan did not see fit to make a definite recommendation in this regard. The only thing I can find in the report, as far as quality is concerned, is the following statement:

> There is no appreciable difference for canning purposes between the quality of fish caught by either types of gear in area 17.

That is true. It does not matter whether you catch a fish with a seine or hit it on the head with a club; if it is in the same water the fish will be of the same quality. I am not complaining about that. It is the fact that while these fish are at their peak in quality we are not allowed to catch them because we are trying to protect the man who lives fifty miles up the Fraser river, and we are only allowing the fish to deteriorate in quality so that he may have an opportunity to catch them. Such a thing is not sensible. I do not think we should allow political, sentimental or any other reasons to stop us from getting quality in our fish, because it is so important to the maintenance of the export trade.

The member for New Westminster has advised me that there is a possibility this year that the salmon run may be late, and it may be disappointingly smaller than we have anticipated. If so, I am heartily in accord with the fisheries department and with the hon. gentleman in that we should take every step possible to see that we have adequate seeding on the spawning grounds. I am all for conservation, and as I have pointed out, this run has been built up with great difficulty. I trust therefore that we shall take every precaution to see that nothing happens to it. I am of the opinion, however, that if the run is small or late, or if there are imposed upon the fishermen restrictions which are necessary for the preservation of the run, those restrictions should be imposed impartially on both gill netters and seiners. From the telegram I have read the committee will have a general idea of the views of the industry. Both the fishermen and the canned salmon operators have made joint representation that steps be taken to make this area available for seine fishing.

I would point out to the minister that another colleague of his got into a little trouble through accepting some of the findings of Chief Justice Sloan; he said that Chief Justice Sloan's recommendations were just, fair and reasonable. I often think that he wishes he had never made that statement. The minister would do well to disregard this Sloan report. I know he does not like to do that. I appreciate the fact that when a minister steps into a portfolio he has to follow the recommendations made by so-called competent authority, but I think he would be well advised to throw away the Sloan report and start off on an entirely new basis. Chief Justice Sloan was reporting on a run of 1,500,000 fish, and therefore was interested in seeing that these gill netters of the Fraser river had enough to eat for the coming winter. But that run has now been built up. It is now a run of five million; therefore the minister could very easily see to it that regulations are made along the lines of those recommended to him by the industry in general which will allow a fair division of the catch.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I should like to follow up the remarks already made by the other British Columbia members on the fisheries department's general estimates. Before doing so, however, like my other colleagues, I should like to congratulate most heartily the hon. member for New Westminster upon his thorough and searching analysis of our position as to fishing on the continental shelf, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. It is an analysis which should be studied closely not only by the Minister of Fisheries but also by the minister of external affairs.

We have had a fine example of international cooperation on this continent. We are proud of our long undefended international boundary. Of all forms of international cooperation I think the cooperation between the Americans and the Canadians in the Pacific fisheries reaches a high which should be worthy of emulation by any other country in the world. There is no antagonism at all. We have pooled our resources; we have set up these international joint commissions to control both sockeye and halibut fishing. The Americans have spent a lot of money in Canada building up fisheries which will be used both by themselves and by Canadians. Certainly this is true on the Pacific coast of fish which spawn either in Canada or in the United States or in offshore waters. To us in British Columbia it seems a most unfortunate situation that the United States and Canada cooperate to conserve the fish, to encourage the propagation of fish, and then countries like Russia and Japan on the Pacific and Spain and Portugal on the Atlantic are allowed to come in and plunder them by ruthless fishing on the continental shelf. I suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he should study the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster, especially that part of it in which he suggests that since the United States and Mexico have proclaimed the continental shelf of United States and Mexico, American and Mexican territory, we should be considering the same thing in Canada.

I should like to say a word or two about the excellent work the fisheries department is doing, and especially to commend the minister for his announced plan of increasing his staff by at least one hundred young fishery recruits. Excellent work has been done in British Columbia by his research staff. They have been exceptionally good in advising the fishermen and the industry in regard to the processing of fish and in the use of fish. They have not been perhaps quite as helpful in their biological studies. There is still too much about western fish that neither the fishermen nor the industry really understand. May I give one example? It is that of the new anchovy fishing, which is being done for the first time on the west coast this year. I am especially interested in anchovy fishing, because the two canneries which pack them are in my own riding. But where the anchovies come from and where they go is entirely unknown to the fisheries department and the fishermen themselves. Therefore in the process of expansion of his department I urge the minister to make a more generous contribution toward the expansion of the biological division of his research department.

I should now like to offer just one word of criticism of certain methods of the fisheries department. I am glad the Minister of Justice is in his place, because it involves him perhaps more than it does the Minister of Fisheries. During this session we have heard a great deal on the invasion of the rights of British subjects, particularly with regard to the espionage trials. I have been thinking that some of our west coast fishermen are treated much worse in so far as their rights are concerned in the matter of trials than were the people who appeared before the royal commission on espionage. Let me explain what I mean by that. Up in the north end of my riding there is a very large fishing ground called Rivers inlet. In the area there are regulations which say, for example, that a fisherman must fish within certain boundaries. In areas where strong tides run or where there are high winds the fishermen on occasions may drift over the boundary. Quite often the fisheries department allege he has drifted over the boundary, and the fisheries inspector or guard who arrests that man does not take him before an ordinary magistrate or judge and charge him with an offence. He is brought before the fisheries supervisor who is put there by the fisheries department, and he is told that he can be tried right there or his gear will be confiscated and his licence removed until he can be tried in the fall before a regular magistrate. Just think of the position of a man who is three hundred miles away from the nearest magistrate. He is told that he can plead guilty, and be fined $50 or $100 and that he can go back fishing the next morning, otherwise he must wait until the fall but in the meantime he cannot fish, although it is the height of the fishing season. In these circumstances you can well understand what the fisherman will do. He pleads guilty, even though innocent, because it is cheapest. The best example of that is the record of fisheries prosecutions in the Rivers inlet area. I doubt very much whether more than one or two have pleaded not guilty before the fisheries supervisors in the past two or three years. Fishermen would far rather plead guilty, pay the $100 fine and get back to fishing the next day, than wait till the fall to be tried in Vancouver or some other place, and in the interval be stopped from fishing. May I give an example of how it would affect prairie members if the same thing happened in their section of the country. If you grew a little grain just outside the boundary of your farm, the local policeman would come along and arrest you and would take you to the chief of police, not to a judge. The chief of police would say, "You can plead guilty now and pay a fine of $50 or $100; otherwise I will take away your harvesting equipment from you; I will not allow you to harvest your crop until all the other farmers have harvested theirs; and then often your crop is destroyed. You can appear before a magistrate in your community and have an ordinary trial." That is the condition which the fishermen have accepted up until now. The time has come when we should have a circulating magistrate removed from the fisheries department to administer proper justice. I submit it is not fair that these fishery supervisors should be conducting summary trials. The situation is not grave near Vancouver, because there are magistrates in that city, but in the north end of my own riding and in the riding of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, where some of the principal fisheries of British Columbia are located, that is the situation, and it is not good enough. When the minister comments later I should like him to touch on this subject of summary trials by fisheries supervisors.

Members from eastern Canada may have been a little puzzled to-day to see members from British Columbia disagreeing with each other. Generally we all present a united front, but to-day the hon. member for Comox-Alberni disagreed with the suggestions of the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to gill netters. When the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for New Westminster speak a little later I am sure that they will offer rebuttal. The answer, of course, is that in the riding of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni the fishermen are chiefly seine fishermen; in the other areas they are almost entirely gill netters. To those who are not familiar with fishing may I say that there are just three principal methods of fishing for salmon on the west coast. There is the small boat which has a gill net perhaps a hundred yards long. The net is laid out from the boat and the salmon run into it and are caught by the gills. Obviously that fishing must be done at night, or, in the alternative, in muddy waters, because otherwise the salmon see the net and avoid it. A much better way of fishing is to find a school of salmon, lay a long net around the school, pull the bottom tight, forming a purse, and lift the salmon out. That is seining. Finally, the best way of catching salmon is undoubtedly the fish trap, where a large fixed trap is built out from the shore, and as the salmon come from the sea along the shore they go into the trap. Undoubtedly the trap provides the least employment in terms of men. The gill net provides the most employment, but we must think not so much in terms of what fishing will supply in terms of employment, but of which is most efficient in view of conditions five or ten years from now, when we shall have to compete on the world market with Russian and Japanese salmon, because the Russians will use traps, not gill nets.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, the Americans catch their half of the Fraser river salmon with seines. The situation is exactly as though, to refer to the prairie provinces, there were a law in Saskatchewan forbidding the use of combines to cut wheat, and requiring that all wheat be cut with a hand sickle and threshing be done by oxen, as in biblical times, in order to provide more work. That is all right if you have a closed economy, but if British Columbia is to compete again on open world markets, as we had to do in the years before the war, we must fish economically. I suggest that the time has come for the departmental officials to give leadership to the fishermen and point out that salmon fishing, which has been so wonderful during the war years in the way of returns, because we could sell every can of salmon we produced, is going to compete in the post-war years with the same Pacific salmon caught by Russia and Japan, and that these gill netters should start to do as all American gill netters did years ago, and turn their thoughts to seining Aside from that I do not propose to enter into the controversy between the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for New Westminster as to the relative values of gill netting and seining.

I should be glad if the minister would give in his reply some indication that fishermen fishing in the rivers off the west coast of Vancouver island should have the right to plead not guilty to an infraction of fisheries regulations and be tried by their magistrates without their gear being impounded and their licences removed until they are found guilty or not guilty.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am in a rather embarrassing position. To-day I have to follow and disagree with two of my colleagues from British Columbia who happen to be my closest personal friends. I have one advantage they do not have—or maybe it is a disadvantage. For reasons known only to myself they had to make good speeches to-day. I do not have to.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You could not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member is unkind to me; he says I could not, but I will not show him up by making one of my usual good speeches, only a normal one, which will still be better than his. When he told us about the anchovies, I wondered if any hon. member had ever seen an anchovy. It is a baby sardine, and a baby sardine, as I understand it, is a baby salmon. Incidentally, for the benefit of some of my hon. friends I am not an expert on fisheries. I have had more interesting things to do than to watch the love life of anchovies; I do not know whether they have love nests or not. But I have had a few samples of the finest salmon in the world sent to me from British Columbia. Whether I was being lobbied or not I do not know. By the way, speaking to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I have some chickens on my farm for which I would welcome some wheat from Saskatchewan. So far the maritimes have not sent me any tins of lobsters; I am still waiting, and I should be glad to receive them.

The hon. member for New Westminster is the greatest authority in this House of Commons on fish, and he will speak in detail on my behalf, as to why the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Fraser Valley are opposing the use of the seine in favour of the gill net.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Would you know yourself?

[Mr. J. Sinclair.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not interrupt the hon. member for Vancouver North, because I wanted to give him every chance in the world to try to make a good speech. And as the hon. member for Temiscouata is not here to advise me to-day, I hope the hon. member for Vancouver North will help me by not interrupting. I am going to give some of the reasons why I am opposed to the use of seines and am in favour of gill nets.

One of the most practical reasons is something which members of all parties will appreciate, in spite of the fact that they may deny it: we are all interested in votes. We are accused of talking politics. All right; frankly I am talking politics.

Mr. BENTLEY: Do you use gill nets for that?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would use gill nets or anything else. One reason I received one hundred per cent of the fishermen's votes in my riding is that I have been fighting for the fishermen, not for the canners. And one reason I am in favour of gill netting is that we have more employment through gill netting. Ninety-nine per cent of the seine boats are owned by the big canning interests. One hundred per cent of the gill nets are owned by individual fishermen. The average gill net boat with net costs $1,500 to $2,000. I do not know what a seine net boat costs, but is is a much larger amount of money. To the best of my ability I am attempting to support the gill netters of my riding, and I have many hundreds resident there, although they do not necessarily fish there all the time. One hundred per cent own nets, and ninety per cent are veterans of this or the last war. We recognized as a government that we should encourage these men; under the Veterans Land Act we enable them to borrow the capital needed to go into the business. Therefore why we should by any manner of means detract from their opportunity to earn a living I cannot understand.

There is a very appropriate name for Vancouver North, given to a place which happens to be situated in my riding. The life or death of the salmon business on the whole Pacific coast depends on a district which, as I have said, has a name far more appropriate to some point in Vancouver North or Comox-Alberni: It is "Hell's Gate." But for the improvements which the international commission of which the hon. member for New Westminster is a member put in at this gateway, you would have no salmon fisheries in British Columbia or on the Pacific coast. Hell's Gate happens to be situated in my riding.

The salmon industry works with the seiners. Admittedly if you put in a seiner you take all the fish out, whether edible fish or not; that net gathers in all the fish which happen to be in that particular area. As I understand it, although I am ready to be corrected, the only net which allows for selective fishing is the gill net. That is the second reason I am particularly interested in it. I would point out to hon. members, and again I am speaking from memory, that prior to 1913, I think it was, we had the slide at Hell's Gate caused by the Canadian National, and had it not been removed, the revenue to the people of Canada from the salmon industry of British Columbia would have been much less than $41,000,000. We went to all this trouble and expense internationally to remove the slide in order that the fish might come to their little love nests in Adam river and elsewhere. Why should we now, by any legislative act, curb the operations of the gill netters? I will leave it to the hon. member for New Westminster to enlarge on this matter on my behalf, as he is more familiar with it. After all, what we are interested in is to obtain enough fish for our food and a fair share of the external market on an international basis with the United States, without worrying about the seiners.

I have no particular quarrel with the canning industry. But these gill netters, according to the figures given us by the international fisheries commission, are quite capable of looking after the present cycle of fishing. I want to be fair about it. One of the unions in my own riding has wired and written me asking me to change my stand. Again I am like the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the only difference being that he has never given that advice to his union. They will have to show a much stronger reason than they have shown thus far before I will make any change in my opinion.

So far as the Fraser Valley riding is concerned, we are definitely and unalterably opposed to the use of seine fishing at the mouth of the Fraser river, and we are definitely opposed to any alteration in the report of the Sloan commission. The Sloan commission was credited with making the finest report ever brought in with respect to fisheries on the Pacific coast. The author of that report was also asked to make one with respect to reforestation, and he was thought of so highly that he was asked to advise with respect to labour legislation in western Canada. In the Fraser river valley I can see no reason as yet why his recommendation should be altered in any shape or form.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that consideration of a subject, as important as this has been left until the tail end of the session. I must say in fairness, however, that it is not the fault of the Minister of Fisheries, because for at least the past two weeks he has been prepared to bring his estimates before the house, although they were reached only yesterday.

First of all, before asking the minister one or two questions I have in mind, I should like to reply briefly to some of the statements made by the hon. members for Comox-Alberni and Vancouver North. To-day history repeats itself in the House of Commons. I am reminded of the old seine and gill net fight which took place in the house when I came in the early thirties. I need not repeat the facts respecting the three types of fishing mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North. However, the seine boats which are spoken of to-day were not allowed in those areas from the days of confederation until about 1933. The argument put forward by the seine boats in those days was that the variety of fish caught—not the sockeye salmon, but a variety of fish known as the pink salmon—had better value if they were caught out in the open water where the American seiners were fishing, or in close proximity thereto. So in the year 1933, for one variety of salmon only—not for the sockeye but for the pink salmon—those seine fishing boats were allowed into the gulf of Georgia. I predicted, and it has come true, that if the seine boats were ever allowed to go into those areas in the gulf of Georgia they would not stop at fishing for pinks, but they would want to get sockeye and all other varieties as well.

The fight was carried on here in the House of Commons year after year. Each year when the estimates came up we battled it out, until the matter was placed before the fisheries committee. There the battle was continued. Entering also into the picture in those days was the matter of traps. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver North, there are three types of fishing—trap fishing, seine fishing and gill netting. If you want to get the best quality of fish and to get it in the cheapest way, you do it by traps. But everyone who is looking toward the giving of employment will, for more than one reason, be in favour of allowing fishermen to catch their fish by gill nets.

In answer to one of the arguments put forward to-day, even if one catches fish with seines he is not cheapening the cost of the fish, because all fish are paid for at the same price by the cannery men, whether they be caught by traps, by seines, or by gill nets. So the question of price does not enter into it at all.

We fought all this out in the fisheries committee, with the result that it was decided to place the entire matter in the hands of a commission, and Mr. Chief Justice Sloan was given the job of looking into it. Public meetings were held in three of the important towns or cities including New Westminster, to which all interested parties were invited. There, they had the opportunity to air their views fully. The commissioner, following the investigation, then placed his recommendation before the government in 1940, a copy of which I have in my hand. He recommended that the seines be confined to a small area in the gulf only. Now we come to 1942; and under the excuse that more food was required for Great Britain and other countries, seines were allowed into a larger part of the area. This is now the fourth year since 1942, the year of the big run —it takes place every four years—and of course the seines want to get in there again. When the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says that the seine fishermen were asking for something that was fair, I must conclude that he has not read the correspondence which has come to the department, because not only are they asking that the area be allowed to an extent similar to 1942, but they are asking that they get right back to the position in 1933, and take the whole thing right up to the mouth of the Fraser river.

What did they do when they were in the mouth of the Fraser in 1933? They cut the fishermen's nets. Gill net fishermen could not fish in there at all because of the number of seines in the area. Then the matter of quality arises. The commissioner invited cannery men to give evidence in this particular. They did not try to prove nor could they prove that fish caught with one type of gear were better than those caught with another type. As a matter of fact the fish from the two or three types are usually dumped on the wharf at one time, and one can not distinguish whether fish had been caught by gill nets or by seines.

As to the point made about fish with no food inside them being of better quality, I believe there may be some validity in the argument, as it has been put forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, in regard to pink salmon. Pink salmon may deteriorate as they go farther up the river. But I can say now without fear of successful contradiction that the sockeye salmon that is caught right up in the Fraser river, and as far up as the constituency represented by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, produces the finest quality of canned salmon that can be found anywhere. That has not been disproved. As a matter of fact it has been found that the salmon are of better quality when there is no food or feed in them. I am sorry we have not more time to go into this matter at greater length, but owing to the nearness of the end of the session one does not have an opportunity to give as much time to the subject as its importance demands. It is a question, however, of the greatest good to the greatest number.

We are accused of fighting for the individual fisherman. Let me point out that seine boats have been proven to be large, mobile trap nets. Nothing escapes, once the circle goes around the fish. Immature fish and all other kinds are caught within the seine net. We claim that not only does the seine net catch immature fish, but that it interferes with schools of fish by breaking them up, and delays their progress up to the spawning beds. That is our contention. So it is not a matter of our fighting politically, although even if we were fighting politically I cannot see any disgrace in fighting for the people one represents. Surely one need not apologize for that. I approach the matter, however, on broader grounds—because there are fishermen in my riding who operate or work on seine boats; but a greater number of them operate and own their boats and gill nets.

I do not know whether I have answered fully the statement made this afternoon, but I draw the minister's attention to the fact that there should be a better reason for opening area 17 this year than was given in 1942. The minister has the report of the royal commission which investigated the matter fully, and I say the conditions have not changed since that time.

I shall pass on to one or two other matters which I have in mind. Have any steps been taken by the minister's department to popularize the consumption of fish? It is a remarkable fact that during the war the consumption of fish dropped considerably in Canada. I have the authentic figures given by one of the departments in Ottawa.

Mr. BRIDGES: I wonder if the hon. member would take that up under item 79.

Mr. REID: Very well, I shall do so. In pre-war years our per capita consumption of fish amounted to 11·9 pounds. By 1944 the per capita consumption had dropped to 9·8 pounds.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that per year?

Mr. REID: Yes, that is the per capita consumption. It is less than any other country.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the difficulty in getting canned salmon in Canada during the war years have anything to do with that?

Mr. REID: I am not sure. The same reason would have to be given in relation to consumption in the United States, because it dropped there as well, and the canned salmon must have interfered with their consumption.

Mr. WARREN: Do those figures take into account the very fine fish we get from Mink lake and other lakes in North Renfrew?

Mr. REID: One always likes to hear a member get in a word for his riding. I have no doubt that wonderful fish are caught in that district, but they are caught by sportsmen, and the figures here apply to consumption from commercial sales. I simply want to draw to the attention of the minister what other countries are doing with regard to the sale of fish. For instance, in Newfoundland they are starting an air service to deliver fish so that it will reach the public as fresh as possible. The same thing is being done in Southern Ireland, where they intend to fly fish and fish products right across to England so that the public may obtain these in as fresh a condition as possible. This is bound to create a greater market for their fish. Perhaps the minister when he speaks will tell us what steps are being taken in that direction.

I should like to deal with a matter mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East, the depletion of our fish. In 1944 the department received a brief presented on behalf of twenty companies and the fishermen's union, which drew attention to the fact that the fish in almost every fishing district in British Columbia were becoming depleted and production was gradually going down. I have said to many returned men, and I say it now to the minister, that it would be unfair to encourage many more men to enter the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. At the present time that industry has about all it can stand profitably. I believe there are now something like 4,000 gill net boats down in the Fraser river waiting for the great Adams river run of salmon which is now heading through the straits to the spawning beds in the upper reaches of the Fraser river. It is not entirely correct to tell ex-service men that there is a great future for them in fishing. Only so much fish is available in each year and the greater the number of the men that enter the industry, the less there will be for those already in it.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to something which was mentioned yesterday. Our share of the world production of fish is very small indeed. We have done practically nothing to develop fishing away out in the open waters. I notice that the United States has taken steps to encourage new types of fishing and have besides discovered various new kinds of fisheries off the shores of Washington and Oregon, and also off Alaska. They have discovered sardines, herring and other types of fish, and are taking steps to encourage their fishermen to leave the inside fisheries and go out into the open waters. If we are to encourage men to enter the fishing industry, something more will have to be done, and I am suggesting that they be assisted to go out into the open waters on the Pacific ocean and catch varieties of fish available there rather than to keep close inshore and thus cut down the livelihood of those already in the industry.

Exports of fish are down. We did export a considerable amount during the war, but exports have fallen off over a number of years. It may interest the committee to know that in 1879 there were more men employed on the fishing boats on both coasts than there are at the present time. It may be true that they are catching more fish by better and improved methods, but the fact remains that if we are looking at this matter from the employment point of view, our fisheries will have to be developed with a much wider outlook than that which has prevailed during the past fifteen or sixteen years.

When the minister speaks I should like him to deal with this matter and to tell us also what steps are being taken to make fish more readily available to the public. Besides the need for new blood in the department in the way of fisheries experts, we need a more vigorous policy. I have here a calendar put out by the Health League of Canada. The picture here shows milk, meat, bread, eggs, cheese, beef, carrots and potatoes, but not one picture of fish.

Mr. BRIDGES: What is the Health League of Canada?

Mr. FRASER: It is sponsored by the dominion government.

Mr. REID: All I know is that this is printed in Toronto, so you can judge for yourself.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is there any soap on that calendar?

Mr. REID: No, there is not. There is a need for an awakening on the part of the officials of the department if we are to sell more fish to our people. We shall have to see that the fish is made available in a fresher state. There is more protein value in fish than there is in any product produced on the land, and I shall have a little more to say about that when we reach the item.

Another matter: What is the department doing about the production of fish flour? South Africa is producing fish flour, and it has been found that the addition of this flour in the manufacture of bread makes a more nutritious product. I am bringing these matters to the attention of the minister so he can make a note of them and see that steps are taken during the recess to carry on such investigation as may be necessary to have them implemented.

Mr. BRYCE: Mr. Chairman, I expected that this debate would be finished some considerable time ago, and as I had to attend a committee meeting I sent my questions in written form to the minister in order to save time. However, having listened to hon. members from British Columbia and the Atlantic coast I feel that I must rise to congratulate them upon the wonderful story they have told. It has been a great education for me. I have never visited British Columbia, but I am hopeful of doing so soon. I have heard about salmon, I have heard about lobsters, I have heard about sardines, and it has all been new to me. If the fisheries of Manitoba were not under provincial jurisdiction I would like to tell the committee how wonderful the Winnipeg goldeye, the Winnipeg white fish and the Winnipeg pickerel are.

I concur in a great deal of what hon. members have said regarding the fishing industry as a whole. The member for Charlotte talked about the price of fish, and that is what the fishermen are really concerned about—the price. I hope that the minister will see that the fish support board does a real job. I do not know whether he has a fisherman on the board; if not, I think he should have, because the fishermen have a real interest in the work of the board. We had an instance of the value of that when we saw various hon. gentlemen getting up in this house and talking about the fishing industry which they really knew something about. We should have men like that on the board, and then I think the fishermen would get better justice done to them than they have ever had before. If the price can be maintained in wartime it can be maintained in peace. The surplus fish should become our necessary reserves in cold-storage plants. It will perhaps be a new way of doing business, but if it is a good way, the government could provide the cold storage and other facilities required.

I congratulate the minister upon bringing new blood into his department. I think it will work for the benefit of the fishing industry in general. I shall not take any more time. I have given the minister my questions; I know he will answer them as he has done in the past, and that is quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have listened with interest to the speeches made by hon. members on the fishing industry. Sometimes hon. members of this house must have felt a bit bored when members from the prairies pursued their agricultural objectives, but I want to assure these gentlemen that we have been profoundly interested in the problems of the fishing industry, and I should like to congratulate them upon the way in which they have presented them. I know that my constituents will feel equally interested with me if I can explain from the Hansard report of my hon. friend's speeches what they have tried to tell us. We would not offer any solution, because obviously there is disagreement among hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and probably honest disagreement. But I can assure them that so far as our people on the prairies are concerned, anything they can do to help the fishermen of British Columbia and the maritimes will be done without question. We appreciate what they have told us.

Will the minister be good enough when making his statement to tell us whether items 78, 79 and 90 will be applicable to the provinces and to our very small fishing industry in Saskatchewan?

Mr. FRASER: I am not going to make a speech on the fishing industry, because we have no commercial fishing in my riding. It is a paradise for those who want fishing for sport. But in my riding there are firms which supply the fishermen, and therefore I am very much interested in commercial fishing. I understand that during the last year our foreign markets for fish have dwindled. I would like the minister to explain why, if he can give us the reason. Perhaps the minister would also tell us whether his department or the Department of Trade and Commerce is out after new markets for our commercial fish, and why it is that we have lost these markets. Is it on account of price, or on account of quality? Is it because of poor inspection on the part of the department here?

I should also like to know what quantity of British Columbia salmon is to be exported this year, both frozen and canned, and what quantity will there be for home consumption. During the war years the Canadian housewife has not seen a can of salmon, although we are supposed to have had some 200,000 cases on the domestic market last year.

The member for New Westminster mentioned the drop in the domestic consumption of fish during the past few years. The riding of Peterborough, which I represent, during the last few years has received fish from the Atlantic and the Pacific, but mostly from the Atlantic, and it has been of extremely poor quality. That is the reason why in my opinion the consumption in Canada has dropped. The best quality has been exported and the poor quality kept at home. I have heard not one but a number of housewives say in the fish stores: Why can we not get some decent fish?

Mr. ISNOR: What kind of fish is the hon. gentleman talking about?

Mr. FRASER: Salmon.

Mr. ISNOR: Canned?

Mr. FRASER: Any salmon, frozen or fresh.

An hon. MEMBER: From Gaspe or British Columbia?

Mr. FRASER: We seldom get British Columbia salmon. The hon. member for New Westminster brought out another aspect of the matter, namely, the preparing of fish. I think that the department should put out a really attractive folder, not a half-hearted one, but one that will really show the housewife in how many ways British Columbia salmon, for instance, can be attractively cooked and served.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can eat British Columbia salmon raw and it is still good.

Mr. FRASER: I have eaten raw fish caught off the island of Hawaii, sliced thinly by the natives in their little boats and put between two slices of bread. I was nearly starving and I ate it, but I have never tried British Columbia salmon that way. I would emphasize the necessity of getting out, not a book, but an attractive folder showing how to cook different kinds of fish and then distributing it among the fish stores, particularly in central Canada, where it would be made available to the housewives, thus letting them know in how many attractive ways fish can be cooked and served.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I desire to express my appreciation to the members from British Columbia and the maritimes for the able way in which they have presented their opinions. The only one regret I have is that they have not elaborated on their problems because we have reached so late a stage in the session. Next year they should make up their minds to present their case one hundred per cent, no matter how late the estimates may be brought in. They have a case, and a very important one, and it ought to be presented in a thorough and effective manner. So far as I am concerned they have a standing invitation and a welcome to take all the time they want to air their problem so that we can come to an understanding of the various aspects of this important fishing industry in Canada.

In a country as large as ours, with such varied interests, each area is apt to forget the importance of the other areas which constitute the rest of Canada. We cannot hear too much about the facts pertaining to the industries of the country. This country either stands or falls as a unit. I have always rejoiced that there was at least one member in the house from the two central provinces who appreciated the necessity of seeing to it that all Canada was prosperous. I refer to the member for Davenport. How many times has he not stood up in the house and told us that you cannot have a prosperous industrial Canada unless you have a prosperous rural Canada? And I am sure you cannot have a prosperous industrial or rural Canada unless you have a prosperous maritime Canada. We stand or fall as a unit. Our interests are integrated; they form a closely woven pattern.

The questions of price and of markets are troubling fishermen just as they are troubling the producers of wheat and other agricultural and primary products. I am not minimizing the importance or the difficulty of the problem involved, but somehow in this country we must devise ways and means of guaranteeing a market so that the people who produce will know that they will always have that market, and of guaranteeing a minimum price so that they will know that they will have a price at least above a given floor. I see no way in which this can be done except by dominion government subsidies.

The hon. member for Charlotte was, I believe, on the right track last night when he submitted that there must be a floor under the product. There is, I repeat, only one way in which that can be done, and that is by dominion government subsidies. We must face the necessity of providing such subsidies, just as in the west we expect a subsidy under the price of wheat, and we shall expect one under the price of meats and other primary products. It will involve a good many details and technical studies of monetary affairs and all that, which we do not wish to go into at the present time.

There is another matter which is quite important, and that is the question of seeing to it that the man who does the work gets the pay for doing that work. Unquestionably the man who is entitled to the major portion of the income from fishing is the man who goes into the water and catches the fish. Measures must be taken to see to it that that man gets the major portion of the income from fishing. Such has not been the case up to the present time by any means. The necessity for it was well brought out by the member for Charlotte and other members in their speeches. What public or social mechanism must be established in order to give the guarantee to which I have referred is a matter for grave consideration by the members of this house, and particularly by members who come from the areas affected. If they will devise what they consider to be an effective mechanism, and then come to the house and speak boldly and straightforwardly and tell us what they think has to be done, and how it must be done, they will find that they have earnest listeners at least in my group, and I am sure in the group to my right, who are deeply interested in such matters.

It may be necessary for the fishermen in the maritimes to organize themselves into a pool, probably a great cooperative producing organization, a great cooperative processing organization, a great cooperative marketing organization. It was facing problems such as the maritime fishermen face that caused the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan to build the great pools like the Alberta wheat pool and the Saskatchewan grain growers organization. It may be necessary for the people in the maritimes to organize a pool the object of which would be to purchase the product and process and market it where necessary. They may require a good deal of government assistance to that end, and a good deal of leadership to attain the objects that must be reached. I have often been impressed by the way the British Columbia fruit growers have gone about their problem. The member for Kootenay West has told us several things about what they did. They almost remade the situation for the fruit producer in British Columbia by attacking their problems cooperatively. They grade and market and control the industry cooperatively. The same may be necessary for the fishing industry.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

I will say no more at the present time, but I assure members representing the maritime constituencies that when they present the problems of their constituencies they are not speaking to deaf ears or inattentive minds.

Mrs. STRUM: I am not going to take up more than a few minutes. I am merely going to tell you why housewives are not buying more fish. It does not matter how good your cook book is, if you smell your fish when you begin to unwrap it you will not like it, and I think this particular phase, the consumption of fish, is going to narrow down to distribution. I am sure that people on the prairies love British Columbia salmon, and when we go to British Columbia we haunt your sea food places. We have feeds of oysters, crab and fresh cod fillets, and I am equally sure that if we went to the maritimes we would do the same thing; we would want to get our fill of the excellent sea foods that abound in those waters. But there are thousands upon thousands of people who live far from the source of these sea foods, and our greatest difficulty has been in getting sea food that is really attractive. We could depend on canned salmon and canned sardines, because the time lapse between the moment when the fish come out of of the sea and the moment it went into the cans was controlled. But the time lapse between the moment the fish goes into the refrigerator car, or whatever it is they use to ship the fish in, and the journey over the prairies to the local butcher shop, seems to be a sort of indefinite quantity. I think the quick freezing method is something that should be explored, and research should be carried on in the interests of the Canadian family. We can go to almost any store and buy fresh frozen peas, blueberries, strawberries or corn on the cob and take them home and have the very finest flavour, colour and texture preserved in that way. I think that quick freezing applied to sea foods would preserve the freshness as nothing else would, and I would urge the minister to try to do something about the handling of sea foods for people remote from the coast. In our country we confine our fish season to winter because then we get fresh frozen fish. It is the only thing we can trust. Fish can be like the curate's egg—good in spots. You only need one feed of that sort of egg or that sort of fish, and you do not want to see it again in months. One batch of not-so-fresh fish can ruin your appetite for that commodity. We want your fish. We like it and we have far too little of it. We would buy it if we could buy it in such a condition that we could be sure when we served it our families would like it.

I wish to assure hon. members that we are also interested in the incomes of the fishermen. I have been fascinated by the story of fishing. We are deeply indebted to hon. members who have given us so much information on this matter yesterday and to-day. I wish to assure them that we want good homes in the east and in the west; we want good family incomes for fishermen. We do not want poverty-stricken fishing villages any more than we want poverty-stricken prairie villages. But I shall not attempt to tell hon. members how that should be accomplished. From the point of view of the housewife we would buy fish if we could really enjoy the fish that we buy. Until the quality, the method of handling and transportation are improved and treated differently, we shall not promise to buy fish that we can smell.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): I had hoped that it would not be necessary for me to make any statement on the first general item of the estimates. Having listened to the general remarks of the various members for a period of about four and a half hours, I have a feeling that it would be difficult for me to reply to all the questions and suggestions which have been made. However, there will be another opportunity when certain individual items come up, and I can make some remarks on those items. In the meantime I seem to have been pressed to make a few remarks on this occasion, and I do not wish to disappoint hon. members by not doing so. At the same time I have a feeling, as I said before in committee, that one does not wish to make a speech with the result of blocking his own estimates. I am perfectly frank about that.

First of all I should like to congratulate most sincerely and most heartily the speakers whom we have heard during consideration of these estimates. I would say without hesitation that two of the hon. members who dealt with international problems and the problem of the continental shelf, the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, one from the west and the other from the east, excelled themselves. The speeches which they delivered on an intricate and ticklish subject were most interesting and instructive. I listened to other speeches with a great deal of interest. They offered criticism of a constructive nature, and this, I assure hon. members, I do appreciate. In a way I am pleased that we should have had so much interest taken this year in the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, even though they have been presented at such a late date. For many weeks I have been most anxious to get these estimates before the committee, and even at this time, considering other estimates which have to follow, those of the Department of Fisheries have not been placed anywhere near the last position.

May I come back to the questions raised by the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. These are really international questions, and no doubt will be dealt with when the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are before the house. The question of the continental shelf is a most interesting and ticklish one, and one which will require a great deal of study. I cannot do more than assure hon. members that the matter is receiving not only the study of my department but also the study of the Department of External Affairs, which has been consulting my department in this matter. However, if any announcement is to be made or should be made concerning any policy of the kind, it would be, as hon. members know, a matter of high government policy and the announcement would eventually be made by whoever is presiding over the Department of External Affairs. I therefore tell my hon. friends that I cannot say very much about the question of the continental shelf.

I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Charlotte. Several constructive suggestions were made by him. As to the work of the fisheries research board and the question of lobster hatcheries, I will deal with that on one of the individual items. With regard to the question of floor prices for fish, I would advise the hon. member that on our statute book we have the Fisheries Prices Support Act, passed in 1944, which sets aside $25 million for that purpose. However, as yet the actual effective section of the act, namely section 9, has not been proclaimed by the government. This is a matter which is receiving the consideration of myself and of the department. I can frankly say that the problem is not an easy one to solve. I have exactly the same feeling as he has, that every effort must be made by this department to give the same protection to those engaged in the fishing industry as is given to those who are engaged in agriculture.

I should like to refer for a moment or two to area 17 on the west coast, concerning which some comments were made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. After listening to the remarks made by him and by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the hon. member for Vancouver North and the hon. member for New Westminster, I am sure hon. members will realize what a difficult position I am in at this time. It is not easy to be in a disagreement or in a quarrel with my friends from British Columbia, even when they are all against me, but when you have one on one side of you and another on the other side, and they are against each other and you are in the middle, it is a very unpleasant situation. I should like to point out to them that the matter is receiving careful consideration by the department. Mr. A. J. Whitmore, the director of western fisheries, who knows as much as anybody knows about fisheries in British Columbia is, I believe, on the scene. He went west last week. He is keeping me posted and advised regarding the matter.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for New Westminster, some years ago a royal commission was appointed and a careful investigation was made by Chief Justice Sloan. He made certain recommendations. Some members of the committee wish me to stand by the recommendations contained in the Sloan report; others wish me to go against or change those recommendations. In assuming an office such as this, a position which I have held for only a year, it is not easy for a new minister to make up his mind to go against the recommendation of a royal commission appointed by the government of Canada. But it is my duty and my responsibility as Minister of Fisheries to see that this year Canada gets her fair share of the salmon.

The hon. member for Peterborough West asked a monent or two ago about the quantity of canned salmon which would be available for domestic consumption this year. Some weeks ago I made a statement in the house that some 500,000 cases would be available for domestic consumption. At that time I pointed out that it would be some months before this canned salmon actually got on the shelves in the grocery stores across Canada, because then fishing in British Columbia had just begun, and it is of course still being carried on. I might add that 500,000 cases is approximately the equivalent of what was the average annual consumption of British Columbia salmon in Canada before the war years. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle—

Mr. FRASER: Before the minister leaves that, will he refer to the question of foreign trade?

Mr. BRIDGES: I think the hon. member realizes that the question of foreign trade comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. So far as the government of Canada is concerned the buying and selling of fish to foreign countries would have to be done through the Canadian Commercial Corporation which has recently been set up. The Department of Fisheries does not actually engage in foreign trade; it merely gives advice to the Department of Trade and Commerce when we are asked for it.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, but the minister's department would know why we are not holding these foreign markets.

Mr. BRIDGES: For a period of three years or more we have had, under international agreement, the combined food board, and under the jurisdiction of that board the salt fish was allocated and later canned fish, to different countries. We got our fair share of the allocation in exactly the same manner as the other countries received their fair share of the allocation. It is purely a matter of rationing to the requirement countries of the world the fish that is available.

Mr. FRASER: But we have definitely lost the trade.

Mr. BRIDGES: No, I would not admit that.

Mr. FRASER: Well, have not two European countries taken our fish markets away from us?

Mr. BRIDGES: No. I would advise my hon. friend that they have been out of production.

Mr. FRASER: That is not the way I heard it.

Mr. BRIDGES: Well, I am sure my hon. friend will admit that they were out of production as far as competition with us during the war years was concerned.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that at the present time Great Britain is taking a lot of our foreign market for fish.

Mr. BRIDGES: The Department of Fisheries has no information to that effect.

Coming to the remarks made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I would like to compliment her. I was pleased to find that the only lady member of the house is taking such an interest in the Department of Fisheries. She approaches the matter from an entirely different point of view, that of the housewife, which is probably the most important way of approaching it. She made some reference to quick freezing. I would advise her that this matter has been under constant study for some years by officials of the fisheries research board of Canada; it has been one of their major investigations, and as a matter of fact it was through our fisheries research board that the overhead bunker car was developed for the transportation of frozen fish. I do not believe that as yet many of these cars are available to either railway, but more of them will be added this year. They have proved themselves more than satisfactory, and I take considerable pride in stating that the development of the overhead bunker cars is one of the accomplishments of the fisheries research board.

As I said at the outset, I do not wish to speak too long, because I know that questions will be brought up on other items of these estimates. If in these few brief remarks I have not dealt with all the questions which have been referred to by hon. members, I assure them that they may bring them up again on individual items and I shall endeavour to reply to them at that time.

Item agreed to.

77. Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and protection services, $1,518,150.

Mr. WINTERS: There are a few questions I should like to ask to emphasize certain specific points not raised in connection with the general item, and also to get the department's attitude toward some of these points. I think the minister can answer them briefly. The minister just now gave the government's point of view regarding the control of the continental shelf, and I fully appreciate that it will take some time to work the problem out. My first question is this. Pending some arrangements with the countries concerned, what patrol facilities does the department visualize to protect our fishermen?

Mr. BRIDGES: This question of patrolling the international waters is in my opinion essentially a police problem. In dealing with this problem it will be necessary—and I can assure the hon. member we are already doing it—if we find that Canadian fishermen are actually being driven off or are having their gear destroyed, that a scheme be worked out between the Department of Fisheries, the Department of External Affairs, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Royal Canadian Air Force. In other words, that is the attitude and the position we are taking at the present time; we are endeavouring to work out some scheme which will be satisfactory to us so that our fishermen shall receive proper protection.

Mr. WINTERS: In view of the fact that it seems to be common knowledge locally in Nova Scotia and in some of the newspapers across the country what nations are involved in fishing on these banks, is the minister prepared to state officially what nations are concerned?

Mr. BRIDGES: The nations which have had vessels fishing on the Quero and adjacent banks, to our knowledge, are the United States, Canada, Newfoundland, Spain, Portugal and France.

Mr. WINTERS: Having that knowledge, I would ask the minister if the governments of any of these foreign countries have been approached by any Canadian department, officially or unofficially?

Mr. BRIDGES: This is really a matter for external affairs, but I happen to know that none of the nations I have named have been approached as far as the fishing on Quero banks is concerned. As I have said before in this house, we have as yet received no definite statement from any individual fisherman which clearly identifies either the trawler or the nationality of any European or other foreign trawlers which have been fishing on these banks.

Mr. WINTERS: I should like to ask the minister about the origin of the complaints. Were the first complaints received from the fishermen's union, or from the fishing skippers themselves?

Mr. BRIDGES: The first complaints were received from the fishermen's union, and if I remember correctly, the date was May 21.

Mr. WINTERS: Have all skippers with whom the government has come in contact experienced interference from foreign trawlers?

Mr. BRIDGES: No, definitely not.

Mr. WINTERS: Have there been complaints from owners and operators other than skippers?

Mr. BRIDGES: There have been no complaints from owners who have not also been skippers. In other words there have been no complaints from owners other than skippers.

Mr. WINTERS: We have referred to affidavits submitted by these skippers. Would the minister be good enough to read to the committee a typical affidavit submitted by a fishing skipper? I suggest those submitted by Captain Leo Corkum of the schooner Irene Mary.

Mr. BRIDGES: Captain Leo Corkum supplied the department originally with one affidavit dealing with three different instances. Subsequently we received other affidavits from him. I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the committee, but if hon. members wish it I shall place part of these affidavits on record. These affidavits describe incidents on April 15, April 23 and May 25. The one respecting April 15 states, in part:

On April 15, 1946, I was under sail fishing on the S/W peak of the Quero Banks—in position Lat. 44.10 N. and Long. 58.35 W on 45 fathoms of water. It was about 10.00 a.m. and I had my trawls set for the day. It was a clear day and the visibility was good. Each trawl had the usual three buoys, marker, flying "black balls" and each buoy would be approx. ½ mile apart. The sea was fairly smooth and the buoys could be quite readily seen a distance of approx. ⅛ of a mile away.

There were several trawlers, which in my opinion were of foreign registry, fishing near by me but I am unable to identify any of them.

At about the time mentioned above, while my men were engaged hauling the trawls, some foreign trawler approached me from a S/E direction and dragged through part of my trawls, destroying approx. $100 worth of lines and hooks together with the fish we had on the trawls they destroyed. It all happened so suddenly that I did not have a chance to warn him or contact him by radio, in order to avoid the incident. The trawler I am referring to came in from the S/E cut through about half of my trawls and when it turned out in an easterly direction it would be about half a mile away from me. It then carried on its dragging operation farther east. After having completed hauling the remaining part of my trawls, I decided to leave for elsewhere. I might add, however, that the fishing in this particular area was very good at that time, but in view of the fact that the foreign trawlers disregarded the rights of other fishermen on the banks I considered it unwise to run the chance of losing more gear.

I am not in a position to say what nationality this trawler was, neither do any of my crew members because we were not close enough to it to be able to obtain its name or number.

The incident of April 23 is almost similar to the one I have just described. One paragraph in the affidavit reads:

At the time I made my investigation, as described above, I did not know what damage, if any at all, has been caused by this trawler dragging through my trawls, however, when my men had finished hauling the trawls set that day I found I had lost about $75 worth of lines and hooks.

The incident on that date is similar in that neither the name nor the nationality of the trawler was secured. With respect to the incident of May 25, the affidavit is as follows:

On May 25, 1946, I was under sail fishing on the east end of the Quero banks—position, Lat. 44.50N. and 57.45 W., on 26 fathoms of water. It was an exceptionally fine day and visibility was perfect—the sea was smooth and the fish was plentiful at this particular time. All around me I could see anywheres between ten to fifteen foreign trawlers fishing with dragnets. At the time the incident, which I am about to describe happened, occurred I did not recognize any of these trawlers.

[Mr. Bridges.]

It was about 3.00 p.m. and I had my trawls out for my second set—what we call the afternoon set. I had 33 lines to each small boat with the usual buoys on each line, approx ½ mile apart. On the western end of the trawls I had placed an extra large buoy which we refer to as a mark buoy. On a clear day and calm sea a person can see this "mark buoy" a distance of about five miles. My trawler was located at the west end of the trawls and my men were engaged dressing the fish from the first set.

At about the time above mentioned I sighted some foreign trawler approaching my trawls from the south. I immediately started my engine and proceeded east along the south side of my trawls in order to head this trawler off. When I got alongside of it, I called and shouted, as a matter of a warning, to the captain and his men who were on deck, but for some unknown reason they did not seem to pay any attention to my warning and signals. It did not seem to slow down any at all until it reached the buoys on the south side of the trawls. He then hauled his nets up, after having brought the trawler to a stop, but shortly afterward dropped the nets again and steamed west right alongside my men who were then in the small boats engaged hauling the trawls. He then passed through between the "mark buoy" and the west end of my trawls, turned starboard in a N/E direction and again dragged in to my trawls in the N/W corner of my set. While this was going on I steamed up alongside of him again and made every effort to warn him to keep away from my trawls but without result—it is true that as they were foreigners, perhaps they did not understand what I was saying, but as this was a clear day there is no reason why they did not see the buoys and also my men who were then in the small boats engaged hauling the trawls. After it cleared out of my gear it continued in an easterly direction and I did not see it again.

As the trawler departed from the scene, after having caused approx. $200 worth of damage to my gear, I managed to secure its number located on the port-bow. I wrote it down on a piece of paper and kept it in my possession for some time, however, I later lost this paper and I am not in a position to recall the figures I wrote down.

After completing hauling the remaining part of my trawls, I decided to leave this location and go elsewhere. I then went to the Grand Banks and on my way there I counted thirty-five foreign trawlers fishing in the vicinity of the eastern part of the Quero Banks.

I have made enquiries among my crew members to see if they are in a position to recall or identify the trawler above mentioned, but neither can they recall its description or number.

Mr. WINTERS: These affidavits are highly significant, in that they indicate that although departmental officials asked these skippers specifically to identify the trawlers by nation of registry, in no instance were they able to do so. This gives a pretty good idea of the difficulty the government is encountering in trying to deal with this problem internationally. Can the minister say how many schooners suffered damage, and the approximate dollar value of that damage to date?

Mr. BRIDGES: Five schooners suffered damage totalling $1,350, and eight schooners whose skippers were interviewed suffered no damage at all.

Mr. FERGUSON: I do not see why these particular fishermen should waste so much of the government's time over an amount of $75. From my knowledge of fishermen in my part of the country, in the Georgian bay area, particularly around Collingwood, if any person destroyed their nets to an amount of $75, particularly a Spaniard, they would take hold of him by the scruff of the neck and chase him back to his own country. They would not waste the government's time in writing letters. A man who cannot protect his own interests to the extent of $75 ought to stop wasting our time.

Mr. WINTERS: I would say to the hon. member that sail chases steam in some cases.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): There are a few things I should like to mention. It would appear to me that some employees of the Department of Fisheries are underpaid in comparison with what is paid in other departments for similar services. One case I have in mind is the crew of the Fundy Rover, a patrol boat in the bay of Fundy belonging to this department. Four men comprise the crew of this boat and they are obliged to be away from home practically the whole year. The deck hand, with whom I am well acquainted, is a veteran of the last war where he was seriously wounded. For his services during the year he is paid $80 a month. It costs him $20 a month to live on board the boat and, when superannuation deductions of $4 a month are made he has about $55 a month to take home. This man is married with a family; he is an experienced seaman and is a war veteran. I trust the department will consider seriously granting a generous increase to the crews of these patrol boats, particularly when men who have been employed in recent months by the department to do similar work and who have had less experience are receiving more than some employees who have served over a great period of years. I would also be interested in knowing why living allowances are paid in some provinces and are not paid to employees doing exactly the same work in other provinces.

Mr. BRIDGES: I do not have complete control over the matter of wages, because those things are eventually determined by the treasury board. I assure the hon. member that I will make every effort to see that increases are granted, but I cannot always get what I want. Then there are instances where the labour board must be consulted. I am informed that living allowances are paid only for services in remote sections of the country.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Will the minister explain what are the remote sections?

Mr. BRIDGES: What does my hon. friend mean by living allowances? Does he mean found on the boat?

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Yes. These men are obliged to be away from home the year round.

Mr. BRIDGES: If it is found that the hon. member is referring to, I am advised that that is applicable only to remote sections of the Pacific coast.

Mr. STUART (Charlotte): Another matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the department is the necessity of providing office space for fisheries inspectors. Other civil servants such as customs officials, immigration inspectors, postal officials, harbour masters and so on have in most cases been provided with offices by their respective departments. During the past three or four months I have had some experience in trying to get office space for one fisheries inspector, and I have found that there is very little cooperation between the different government departments in connection with furnishing office space. In many cases public buildings are being maintained in towns where fisheries inspectors reside, but they cannot get office space. This discriminatory and selfish attitude should be condemned and, wherever possible, all civil servants should receive exactly the same consideration. When a fisheries inspector uses his own home for office space a fair rental should be paid by the department. I cannot understand why there is so little cooperation between the different departments.

There is one other thing I should like to mention which I believe comes under this same item. My remarks last December were critical with regard to the wages paid to fisheries guardians. Since then, their rate of pay has been increased from $2.25 a day to $2.70. I realize that this was a twenty per cent increase, but I trust that the government will consider another raise for these guardians. They are doing good work; it is only seasonal employment and I hope something can be done for them.

Mr. BRIDGES: As far as office space for officials of the department is concerned, that matter is being considered in connection with the reorganization we are putting through. I think my hon. friend knows how I feel about the matter of wages. I have not always been able to get what I wanted, but I always do the best I can.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I would remind the minister of the question I asked about the extraordinary situation which exists on the fishing grounds of British Columbia where, in connection with any violation of the regulations, the fishery officer is policeman, prosecutor and judge. If the fisherman does not plead guilty before the fishery supervisor and wants to be heard by a regular magistrate, his licence is taken away until such time as he can be heard. I suggest that either the Department of Justice send magistrates around to the fishing districts or that these men be admitted to bail if they do not want to plead guilty before the fishery supervisor.

Mr. BRIDGES: These powers have been in the Fisheries Act for some years.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That does not make them good.

Mr. BRIDGES: I do not allege that. Section 5, subsection 2 of the act reads:

> Every fishery officer shall for all the purposes of this act and the regulations made thereunder be a justice of the peace during his term of office as a fishery officer.

Apparently that is the section under which he would act as a judge. Then section 35 reads:

> Any fishery officer or justice of the peace may, on view, convict any person committing any of the offences punishable under the provisions of this act, or under any regulations made hereunder, and may remove and detain any fish unlawfully caught and any boat, vessel, fishing apparatus or other materials used in committing any offence or in connection therewith, or which such fishery officer or justice of the peace has reason to believe was so used.

Then section 64 deals with confiscation, and it reads in part:

> . . . shall be confiscated to His Majesty and may be seized and confiscated on view, by any fishery officer, or taken and removed by any person for delivery to any fishery officer or justice of the peace.

I am quite ready to admit that those are rather strong sections, certainly contrary to anything we are accustomed to in British countries. However, they have been in the act for some years. The reason would appear to be that in these remote sections there are no magistrates. It might be possible to work out a system whereby the provinces would have magistrates in these remote sections, but I assure my hon. friend that since he has brought the matter up I will certainly look into it further.

[Mr. Bridges.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In the meantime, could not instructions be given to these fishery inspectors, who act as judges as well as prosecutors, that if a man wants to plead not guilty he should be admitted to bail and allowed to go on fishing until he can appear before a magistrate in the fall? I have in mind one case which occurred in my constituency. A father and son were picked up by an inspector. Although the father and son were living together, it was alleged that they were fishing too close to each other's nets. They did not choose to plead guilty. They were men with a long record, and the reason for that long record was the fact that they had always fished in remote areas and were ready to pay a $50 fine rather than be prevented from fishing for the rest of the season. But this time, being Scotch and stubborn, they decided they were not going to plead guilty. They were remanded and the fishery inspector seized their gear. Two or three weeks later they were taken before a stipendiary magistrate and the case was dismissed on the ground that it was trivial. The men went to get their gear and they found that it had been piled in the sun and had rotted. These men had been out of fishing for three weeks; when they went to get their gear it was rotten, and it took them one year to succeed in a damage action against the crown. That type of administration of justice does not bring respect for the fisheries department. I understand that the judgment against the fisheries department was divided as to costs between the fisheries department and the fishery supervisor who made the seizure. I would ask the minister whether the inspector paid his seizure costs out of his own pocket or whether the government refunded that to him.

Mr. BRIDGES: My understanding is that the case has been appealed and a new trial ordered.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The crown appealed?

Mr. BRIDGES: I think it would not be the crown but the officer who was being sued.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That again brings home just what the average fisherman is up against. These two Scotch fishermen fighting for justice launch a suit against the crown for damages, and now the supervisor launches an appeal against the judgment of the court. That is just going to discourage the fishermen from thinking they will ever get their just desserts. They will figure that it is much easier to plead guilty and pay the $50. That only emphasizes that the minister should bring British justice into the administration of his department.

Mr. BRIDGES: I shall make every effort to do that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say, in connection with the case which the hon. member from Vancouver North has brought up, that when I was acting in his behalf I had some correspondence on the matter and the Department of Fisheries agreed in writing as to everything the hon. member for Vancouver North said, and why these Scotsmen should have to carry the case farther when the department agreed that it was wrong is beyond me.

I overlooked one thing when I was speaking before. I want to compliment the minister. I do not do that usually; I do so now partly for the benefit of some other ministers of whom I see one here, and I wish the others were present. The Minister of Fisheries when he paid a visit to British Columbia last year got in contact with every member from British Columbia. I say that for the benefit of the rest of the cabinet. The Minister of Fisheries has not always taken my advice, but he has at least done me the honour of consulting my riding.

I want now to ask a couple of questions and I hope for a favourable answer. Has any provision been made to supply a patrol boat for the Fraser river? The reason I ask is that, so far as the Fraser river in my riding is concerned, the only patrol vessels there in the past have been a couple of rowboats, and in certain cases the fisheries guardians had to pay for the hire of the boats themselves.

Mr. BRIDGES: There is provision in these estimates for a proper patrol boat, but on account of the shortage of labour it may be difficult to get it built just now. That is as far as I can go.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am delighted that the minister has assured me that we are to have a patrol boat, but the other part of his answer, that there is a difficulty on account of the shortage of labour—

Mr. BRIDGES: Labour and materials.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: War Assets Corporation was giving away hundreds of boats suitable for this very purpose, so that argument does not hold with me. I hope the minister will see that one of these boats is purchased immediately for the upper portion of the Fraser river.

Is provision being made to keep the fishery guardians on the payroll throughout the year? The department requires, and quite properly, that these men must have practical experience, must know the fisheries regulations, and so on. Yet in the past, so far as the Fraser river is concerned, these men have been kept on the payroll for only six months in the year. To expect a qualified man, with a practical knowledge of fisheries and a thorough knowledge of the regulations, to carry on this work for only six months of the year and then have to seek other employment is nonsense. I have taken this matter up with the minister's predecessor on several occasions, and I ask the minister now whether consideration is being given to keeping these men on the payroll for twelve months in the year. No other department expects qualified men, with the knowledge and experience these men have, to work for only six months in the year and then look for another job.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How about the House of Commons stenographers?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member may do something popular along that line. In my riding we have four fishery guardians, two of whom were employed the year round and the other two were let out, if I remember correctly, at the end of July. It is not reasonable to expect these men, who, I expect, would be married war veterans, to work for only six months out of the year for $100 a month and then look out for other employment, particularly since they are required to have a practical knowledge of the fisheries and a thorough knowledge of the regulations, which they must have to carry them out properly. These men should be employed the year round.

Mr. BRIDGES: The hon. member will probably remember that I stated yesterday that the outside service of my department was to be reorganized. In this reorganization it is anticipated that, in any instance where full-time service is required, the employee will be employed full-time. I think the hon. member will find that the situation will be relieved when the reorganization of the outside service is completed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the minister, but he qualified his answer by saying that they will be employed full-time where that is required. My argument is that when a man must have all these qualifications to be a fishery guardian provision should be made for his employment the whole year round and not for just six months.

Item agreed to.

79. Educational extension service, $78,780.

Mr. BENTLEY: I was going to ask the minister if this amount, the $25,000 in the previous item and the $56,000 in item 90 apply to the smaller fisheries in the provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan?

Mr. BRIDGES: The previous item, 78, does not apply to the prairie provinces, but item 79 does in part. As to item 90 the answer there is no.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries Research Board of Canada—
82. Operation and maintenance, $740,610.

Mr. REID: I raised some objection last year to this vote, which shows a considerable increase. I would ask the minister to reconsider this vote because, in my opinion, the country is not getting full value for the money expended. I am not against scientists and I do not want my remarks to be interpreted that I am, but I know the experience we have had with scientists on the international salmon fisheries commission. If it had not been for the laymen on the commission; if the scientists had been allowed to spend money and do what they liked, we would not have obtained the results we did. Every year the scientists were asking for more money for various objects. I suggest that the minister consider revamping the whole fisheries research board, and that he include on it representatives of the fishing industry, of the canning industry, members of the provincial government and members of his own department.

I challenge any member of the house to refute what I am about to say. I can produce reports which were made by fishery experts forty years ago, which you will now find contained in the reports that are submitted to-day by the fisheries research board, and I contend that they are not doing the work from a practical point of view of the industry. I am not finding fault with the minister because he has not had time to check up on what they are doing; but from the fisherman's point of view, the practical point of view, I submit that the whole set-up is entirely wrong. In fact, had these estimates come up earlier I might have moved that the vote be reduced. I had declared my intention of doing so when they first came before us in November last, but it is too late in the session now to debate the issue fully. Here, however, we have $3,000,000 spent since the inception of the board just a few short years ago. From 1935 up to the present time this amount of money has been spent. I will not say that some good has not been accomplished, for example, in respect of the freezing method, and some other matters as well; but I invite any hon. member to go to Nanaimo station and later read the reports, as I have read them, and see for himself what is being done. I do not believe many hon. members have read all the reports of the fisheries research board, and after a careful study of the situation I would express the view that we are not getting the results we should expect. Let me quote the following article that has appeared in the press:

> Fish species, fishing methods and modes of processing are considerably different on the Pacific than on the Atlantic coast. Eastern research board members need first-hand knowledge of west coast conditions, and western board members tour the Atlantic coast for the same reason.
> "We now have the money to carry out this travel policy," a research board official told The Standard. "During the war we had to pull in our belts. Now our personnel is increasing and our work is expanding tremendously."

Mr. BRIDGES: Will my hon. friend say what he is quoting from?

Mr. REID: I am quoting from the Montreal Standard of June 22, 1946. Travelling may be necessary to some extent, but I suggest that last year there were some joy trips taken. We are increasing the amount this year by $198,000, and I would ask the minister for an explanation. I know he has not had time to keep his eye on the situation; but the actual fact is that he and his officials cannot control the board, and if the present tendency is not stopped they will come back next year and we shall find ourselves voting perhaps a million dollars. And what for? If the minister takes up this challenge I will bring reports from experts to prove the point I mentioned a moment ago. I am against the increase and I am inclined to move that it be reduced. I should like to hear what the minister has to say, what view he takes of the proposal I have made, that certain members of the fishing industry be called upon to constitute a practical board to map out a programme for the research board. As matters stand, we are not getting the results that we should look for.

Mr. BRIDGES: The fisheries research board comprises nine scientists from various universities in Canada together with two representatives from the Department of Fisheries and four representatives of industry, two from the Pacific coast and two from the Atlantic coast. The members receive no remuneration for their services, except the chairman, who is given an honorarium of $1,000. Travelling and living expenses are paid when incurred by the members in attending meetings or on business for the board. My hon. friend criticizes the board. May I read the names of those who constitute this body. I think hon. members will realize, when I do so, that these are not men who would be inclined to waste the public money of Canada. The chairman is Professor A. T. Cameron, university of Manitoba, one of the best known biochemists in the world. In fact, he is professor of biochemistry of that university. The honorary secretary is the assistant deputy minister of this department. The other members are Professor C. W. Argue, of the university of New Brunswick; Mr. J. H. Deane, of Vancouver, British Columbia, who represents the fishermen's cooperative and who, I am sure, the hon. member will admit is a representative of industry. Then there are Professor J. R. Dymond of the university of Toronto, who is extremely well known throughout the country; Professor W. A. Clemens of the university of British Columbia; Professor J. H. L. Johnstone of Halifax, Nova Scotia, a member of the faculty of Dalhousie university; Mr. O. F. MacKenzie of Halifax, Nova Scotia —and I am sure he would not like to be told that he was not a representative of industry— Mr. Burke McInerney of Halifax, who was secretary-manager of the united maritime fishermen. Another member is Professor Prefontaine, professor of biology in the university of Montreal. Another member is Professor G. D. Reed of Queens university. Another member is Mr. J. A. Rodd, director of fish culture, of this department; another member is Professor D. L. Thomson of McGill university. Then there is Professor J. L. Tremblay of Laval university, and the last named member of this body is Mr. R. E. Walker of Vancouver, British Columbia, who is with British Columbia Packers. I do not think the hon. member would suggest that he was not a representative of industry.

These are the men who direct the affairs of the fisheries research board and, when my hon. friend criticizes the board, he is criticizing these gentlemen. They are the men who direct its affairs entirely and they come within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries. Therefore I do not hesitate to say that I am proud of the work they have done, and I am happy that the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, speaking yesterday, made fitting reference to the work of the research board.

I should like to read some letters with reference to the work now being done by the fisheries research board, and first I will quote from one received from the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Cooperative Association. This is dated December 28, 1945:

During the past years our membership consisting of approximately 1,500 British Columbia fishermen has followed with great interest the research carried out by the fisheries research board's stations across the dominion. We are all mostly interested in the work carried on closest to where our own part of the industry is affected, although we wish to go on record as being keenly interested in the welfare of the country as a whole, and therefore, no selfish interest is our guide in the recommendations contained in this letter.

The research work that is of the utmost importance to us at this time and which we strongly recommend your department to give its consideration is as follows:

1. The Skeena river investigation started in 1944.
2. The over-all salmon investigation which was actually started in 1945.
3. The trawl investigation started in 1944.
4. The institution of oceangraphic studies of sea life in general.

I will not read the whole of the letter, which is a very long one. It is signed by T. H. Sorensen, secretary of the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Cooperative Association. Let me quote from another letter with regard to the present work of the board. This one is from the Deep Sea Fishermen's Federal Union, Number 80 of British Columbia. It is dated Prince Rupert, December 27, 1945, and contains the following statement:

As the annual meeting of the Fisheries Research Board of Canada will be held in Ottawa on January 1 to 10, we wish to express our appreciation of the work carried out to date by this board regarding investigations of the fisheries, and we feel, it should not only be continued in the future but should be extended to all commercial fisheries on this coast, not only for the purpose of propagation, but it should also be carried on with the view to making recommendations for control of production of any given fishery whenever it was found too heavily exploited.

Then they make certain statements and ask us to do certain things in the following respects:

(1) The necessity of continuing the Skeena river investigation to its conclusion.

(2) The essentiality of increasing the over-all salmon investigation into a full-scale programme.

(3) The necessity for a more extensive study of the otter-trawl fishing and the populations of fish which it catches.

(4) The immediate essentiality to institute oceangraphic studies.

There is another communication from the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association of British Columbia, under date of January 4, 1946, in which similar statements are made. They say:

This association appreciates the great value of the investigations being conducted by the Fisheries Research Board of Canada under the guidance of your department. We would be very pleased if you would bring to the attention of the annual meeting of the board our appreciation of their work and our recommendations for future investigations.

I do not know whether the hon. member is criticizing some particular item or some special part of the work of the research board; but I do tell him this, that we are living in an age of research. It was my privilege last evening to listen to Field Marshal Montgomery in an address he gave at a private dinner, and one thing he emphasized was the necessity of research. It is research that has accomplished so many things and is responsible for so many advances in this world. In research, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, scientists cannot discover in a day or in a week, cannot discover overnight, the results which they are seeking. A great many scientists are working on the research board and devoting all their time and knowledge to the work they are doing. We have had instances of men with the degree of Ph.D.—and I am ashamed to say it—working for the board and receiving a remuneration of $2,200 a year. If they are not working for love of the work, then I do not know what it is for. If my hon. friend will mention some individual item that he is criticizing I am quite ready to discuss it with him, but if it is a general allegation that he wishes to make or an item which he desires to cut down and which is in the estimates for the fisheries research board, then I must advise him that I shall resist it.

Mr. REID: Every time that one rises to say a word or two about the fisheries research board, so-called, he is immediately accused of being against scientists and research work. We did not need to get a lecture from the minister about scientists. I might mention to him that he had one by the name of Forester. I met him last year. He has been at this work for a lifetime, and when he was asked a simple question which anybody could answer he could not answer it. The question he was asked was, were sport fish predators? Everybody who knows anything about fishing knows sport fish are predators. This man said he did not know, although he had spent practically a lifetime at the work. I am not against scientists or against scientific research. I hope the minister does not repeat what he said a moment ago, because I am with him, but I want this research to be guided and controlled. He has not yet had time to find out what they are doing. I say to him that if he does not guide them his department will get into difficulties. They cannot be left to themselves because, if they are, they will not produce the best results which should benefit the fishing industry.

The minister mentioned a lot of high-sounding names. How many times do they meet? Is there a representative of the industry among them?

[Mr. Bridges.]

Mr. BRIDGES: I am advised that there are four members of the board who do represent industry. If the hon. member feels that there should be more and makes the suggestion consideration might be given to increasing the board, but it would have to be done by an amendment to the act which establishes the fisheries research board.

Mr. REID: How many times do they meet?

Mr. BRIDGES: The board itself meets once a year; the executive meets four times a year, and the sub-executive in the different parts of Canada meets four times.

Mr. REID: Then they meet all together once a year.

Mr. BRIDGES: They meet all together once a year.

Mr. REID: And lay out the programme.

Mr. BRIDGES: They meet here in Ottawa once a year and approve the programme of fisheries research.

Mr. REID: The minister is satisfied that this increase of $198,000 is worth while?

Mr. BRIDGES: I am.

Mr. REID: I should not have asked that question, because I would have known the minister would say that, or the item would not be in the estimates. I will say to the minister that at the next session of parliament I shall ask questions on this matter again, and I would advise him not to listen entirely to men who have a lot of high degrees. That kind of thing does not always mean something.

Mr. BRIDGES: It means a lot to me.

Mr. REID: It is results that I am looking for, and the minister is not getting them, no matter what he says.

Mr. McLURE: Does this item include the work of Doctor Needler?

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to say a word in connection with the work of Doctor Needler and also Doctor Kerswill on oyster culture. Through their work these men have brought back a very fine industry to Prince Edward Island and the maritime provinces generally. Their work is highly recommended everywhere. Had it not been for the work of Doctor Needler and this department we should have lost a real industry in the actual farming of oysters. For that reason I support this item.

Item agreed to.

Mr. REID: On division.

86. To provide for Canadian share of expenses of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission to overcome obstructions to the ascent of sockeye salmon at Hell's Gate canyon, and for investigating and overcoming obstructions to such salmon at other points on the Fraser river watershed (revote), $400,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say a word on this item. Hell's Gate is in my riding.

Mr. MacINNIS: It would be.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am glad the fishing industry of British Columbia revolves around my riding. The hon. member for Vancouver East will agree with what I am going to say. A contract was let to construct this work. Excellent work was done. I am not criticizing the work, and nobody finds fault with what was done. As hon members know, it was an international contract, paid for by both the United States and Canada. I have heard rumours in my riding to the effect that the contracting company had absolutely no previous experience with this work, yet it underbid other contractors by some hundreds of thousands of dollars, including one company which had experience in all parts of the world in dealing with that type of rock. I am informed, but not officially, that this company is coming back, after having accepted the contract at a given figure, to ask for a cost-plus arrangement. It claims that it did not make anything out of it, and is now going to ask for several hundred thousand dollars more. A farmer who takes a chance on a contract for wheat, milk or anything else and does not make any money out of it, has to abide by his contract. If this company has any idea that it is going to come back—and I know one of the executives of this company said that it did not make any money on the price it accepted, because he said it in my presence, and that, therefore, it would be looked after—and receive more money, it will hear from the people of Fraser Valley. I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that if this government or any other government attempt to give to this company what I would call a handout above the price it accepted on the contract, they will hear plenty from the people in my riding.

Item agreed to.

88. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942, $300,000.

Mr. McLURE: When this vote came up last year I criticized it and took some objection to it, but that was on the ground that we did not get enough revenue from it. After speaking to the minister on several occasions about it this session, I am sure that everybody will be in favour of it. I wish the minister had the time to explain it, but I shall not ask him to do so now, because he is anxious to get his estimates through. On another occasion I hope that he will be able to give us information as to the plans he has in mind with regard to the fur seal industry. I also hope that he will be able to come before the committee and tell us that he has a revenue of over half a million dollars from this investment.

Special—

90. To provide for the extension of educational work in cooperative producing and selling among fishermen, $56,000.

Mr. BRYCE: I told the hon. member for Swift Current that the minister has said the prairie provinces could not participate in this vote. Was I right in that?

Mr. BRIDGES: I would advise the hon. member for Selkirk that this item of $56,000 is made up of grants to three universities in Canada: St. Francis Xavier, $37,000; Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, $14,000; university of British Columbia, $5,000, making a total of $56,000. It is for educational work among the fishermen themselves. It started first on the east coast, as a result of the work of the Maclean commission of 1927-28.

Mr. BRYCE: Is there any possibility of arranging matters so that the universities of the prairie provinces may benefit from it. We are just as good cooperatives as anyone else.

Mr. BRIDGES: This is just for universities which maintain extension departments. I do not know whether the universities of the three prairie provinces maintain extension departments.

Mr. BRYCE: Yes, they do.

Mr. BRIDGES: Agriculture, but not fisheries.

Mr. BRYCE: If they took that under consideration would money be available?

Mr. BRIDGES: It certainly would not be available this year. I can assure the hon. member that I am always ready to hear representations pertaining to the extension work of fisheries. I can make no promise, but I would certainly be ready to hear representations and give consideration to them.

Mr. REID: I asked the minister a question a while ago, but he did not answer it and I should like to repeat it now, if he has cooled off a little. We all like the Minister of Fisheries, but he has not had time to look into these matters. He will perhaps find out in later years that the member for New Westminster was right. Be that as it may, it will be too late then.

What steps has he taken, or is he taking any steps regarding the transportation of fish by air so as to bring it to the prairie provinces, as referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle? Other countries are now transporting fish by air, so that it is fresh to the people in inland cities. Has the minister made any investigations, and what steps are likely to be taken with a view to inaugurating some such service in this country?

Mr. BRIDGES: The actual study of the matter is being made by the fisheries research board.

Mr. REID: Oh, that is bad. We may wait for fifteen years, then.

Mr. BRIDGES: I do not think you will wait for fifteen years. I think the hon. member will remember the development of the overhead bunker car for the transportation of frozen fish. The board did a good deal along that line. I know it is being studied; it is something in which I am personally interested, and I am going to follow it up.

Mr. REID: I will ask the minister next year.

Item agreed to.

Special—

92. To provide for the construction of a vessel of particular design for experimental fishing for herring and mackerel (revote), $25,000.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Last year I brought up a point which was drawn to my attention by the halibut fishermen. The whalers used to notice schools of fish in the Jap current, about forty miles west of the northern tip of the Queen Charlotte islands, and at one time they thought they were salmon, but now they think they may be tuna. I ask that some investigation be done about that, inasmuch as the fishing season tends to become shorter, and a great many boats might be engaged there. I see there is an appropriation for experimental fishing, which is what I am asking the minister to do in these waters.

Mr. REID: Give it to the research board.

Mr. BRIDGES: As a matter of fact this item is for fishing in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Did the hon. member bring up this matter at the last session?

[Mr. Bridges.]

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes.

Mr. BRIDGES: Well, I assure the hon. member that if I have not looked into it, I certainly will.

Item agreed to.

730. To provide for transportation, dressing and dyeing, and other expenses incidental to receiving and disposing of fur seal skins accruing to Canada pursuant to provisional fur seal agreement between Canada and the United States by exchange of notes dated December 8 and 19, 1942—further amount required, $125,000.

Mr. FRASER: Why this extra amount under this item? Is it on account of catching more seal?

Mr. BRIDGES: When the main estimates, in which an amount of $300,000 was provided for the above service, were being prepared, it was not anticipated that the processing and dyeing of fur seal skins at London would be stepped up as quickly from wartime conditions as has been the case. Deliveries are being made of 1,000 skins a month, and to take care of processing, customs and other expenses a total amount of $425,000 for the fiscal year will be required. Of this amount, I would point out, approximately one-quarter is to cover payment of customs, excise and sales tax charges. It is all a bookkeeping entry. This is one of the few things we make a profit on.

Mr. FRASER: It comes back; I know that.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

57. Departmental administration, $803,594.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the proper item under which we can discuss the wartime prices and trade board?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): Under demobilization and reconversion, page 66 of the main estimates. Items 488 and 489.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not under departmental administration.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. There are special items for it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister say a word as to the substantial increase in departmental administration? I suppose one would have hoped, evidently wrongly, that after the end of the war there might have been some let-up in administrative work. There is a substantial increase.

Mr. GRAYDON: It takes more money to spend more money!

Mr. MAYHEW: This increase is mostly on personnel. There has been quite an increase in the staff, particularly in the cheque adjustment branch. Hon. members will notice, when we come to demobilization and reconstruction, that there is approximately a $3,000,000 reduction, so that there will be a reduction, on the whole, of about one and a half million dollars with respect to this item. It will be realized that, as the personnel of the army, the air force and the navy are demobilized, there is quite a large increase in the amount of work at home. These men are still receiving pay or allowances of some kind from the government; some are going to university, some attending other types of training, et cetera.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do I understand that the parliamentary assistant says that this increase is really to be offset against the figures shown in item 487?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes; "comptroller of the treasury," item 487 in the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

59. Royal Canadian Mint, including the Dominion of Canada assay office, $583,650.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the reason for the substantial increase in this item?

Mr. MAYHEW: There will be considerably more activity in refining and in connection with the striking of medals for the armed services. It is practically all temporary staff. The permanent staff remains as it was.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask a question which arises from one asked some weeks ago by the hon. member for Wellington South, as to whether or not there would be a discontinuance of the minting of those mean, measly copper five-cent pieces which have several corners on them and are in public disfavour everywhere. Are they to be withdrawn from circulation? I do not know what a five-cent piece could be used for these days; but when we get back to some kind of normalcy, when the five-cent piece might be of some use again, shall we have a decent type of coin, not of the kind now in circulation?

When the Minister of Finance replied to the hon. member he said the present multi-cornered five-cent piece would be withdrawn from circulation and a new one issued. What type of new one will take its place?

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member is quite right; the copper coin is being withdrawn and an order has gone out to that effect. A five-cent nickel piece will take its place.

Mr. GRAYDON: So that we shall not be bothered any longer with finding out whether we have in our pocket a one-cent or a five-cent piece; they will be real nickels, will they?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Superannuation and retirement benefits—

62. Government's contribution to the superannuation fund, $3,350,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): To what extent is this large increase made up of added personnel and, to what extent, of increased rates?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is accounted for chiefly by transfers of personnel who are under the retirement fund to the superannuation fund. Under a 1944 amendment they were given the option within one year to transfer from one type of pension plan to the other. Over 3,000 have transferred, and that accounts for the increase.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could the minister explain briefly the difference between the two? I am not thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not too familiar with it myself. However, it is my understanding that the retirement fund was simply a savings fund to which contributions were made by a five per cent reduction from a civil servant's salary. The superannuation fund is a contributory pension fund.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has indicated that the increased amount is on account of transfers from one fund to the other. I notice that the amount for administration is increased. Why is there that increase?

Mr. ABBOTT: It requires more personnel and more accounts. As I said, there are 3,000 additional numbers of civil servants who are transferring from one fund to the other, and I believe the proportionate increase is not too large.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to bring a new matter to the attention of the Acting Minister of Finance, one which affects only a small number of those who were formerly in the civil service of Canada and who, at the time of the outbreak of war in 1939, were no longer in the civil service but were in receipt of superannuation. Some of these men were taken into the armed services in various capacities, having regard to their special qualifications to perform special duties during the war. I am told they were asked to join the armed services because their country needed them in a time of war, and they were in a position to make a contribution which others not so favourably situated could not make. My information is that these people were assured that superannuation would be paid to them during their service in the armed forces, and that superannuation actually was paid, in addition to their pay of rank, up to May 3, 1940.

My further information is that all these persons regarded the payment of superannuation as well as service pay as one of the terms of contract between themselves and the government. Then, by order in council P.C. 51800 of May 3, 1940, the payment of superannuation to these persons was prohibited—not only to them, but to those in the services who had formerly been in receipt of superannuation. At the same time the order in council did not provide for any voluntary retirement in respect of those affected by it. These men had no choice but to remain in the armed services, despite the fact that the terms of service had been changed arbitrarily.

I could discuss this matter at considerable length, but in view of the fact that we are having long sittings to deal with these estimates I shall not do so. I could build up a certain volume of sentiment and establish a strong factual case in their favour. I speak, however, only to bring the matter to the attention of the minister in order that he may make a thorough investigation of circumstances as they affect these few people. Although there are only a dozen or so affected, the principle involved is important, and those who are affected feel they are being unjustly treated.

Civil servants who were actually in the civil service at the time they entered the armed forces were treated much differently. Their periods of service in the forces counted for superannuation benefits, the government absorbing the five per cent of the civil servant's salary, which would ordinarily have been deducted. But those superannuated civil servants who joined the armed services automatically, through the operation of the order in council, lost their superannuation during their period of service in the armed forces. Those whose implied contracts were broken appear to be in a different position.

I leave these facts for the consideration of the minister, at his earliest convenience, in the hope that he may decide that this group should receive further consideration by the department.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will look into the question raised by my hon. friend. I do not know whether he has all the facts, but in any event I will make a thorough investigation and see what is the situation.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Public debt charges—Servicing of public debt—

64. Commission for payment of interest on public debt, services of fiscal agents, London, registrar's fees, etc., $377,650.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice the amount for the interest on public debt payable in New York is down some $5,000,000, and I assume that is because large payments have been made in United States funds.

Mr. MAYHEW: I can give the hon. member the items. On November 15 there was a three per cent loan, $40,000,000; there was a further one for $55,000,000; there was one for $30,000,000 and another for $30,000,000. The interest charges were $4,650,000.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants and contributions—

68. Royal Astronomical Society, $1,620.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the government received a request from this society for a larger grant? If so, has the request been considered?

Mr. ABBOTT: The policy of the department this year has been not to increase these grants, and if such a request was made the reply would have been to that effect.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to refer back to the cost of loan flotations, which is reduced by $4,350,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is another statutory item.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Cannot one be interested in a statutory item?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that it is not expected that the amount of money we shall have to raise this year by borrowings will be anything like what it was in the previous fiscal period.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any statement to make with regard to the loan which will be open for public subscription this fall?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not yet.

Item agreed to.

70. Canadian Writers Foundation, $2,500.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice that this is a new item and I should like a little explanation. I do not know who compose this Canadian Writers Foundation, but I have a slight suspicion when I see a name like that. They may all be reliable men, but I want to be perfectly sure that we are not using the taxpayers' money to sponsor, help and encourage writers of communism. I want to know what relationship this Canadian Writers Foundation—it may be perfectly reliable; I do not know—has to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which may have scripts which they want to have read or put over their networks. I think we should know about this item. I intend vigorously to oppose anything that is likely to divide the loyalty of the Canadian people.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will oppose it too.

Mr. MAYHEW: This is a new item, and strong recommendations were made in connection therewith. The purpose of the foundation is to provide financial assistance to Canadian writers of distinction who may be in urgent need of such aid. At present many pressing cases must be neglected because of the lack of the necessary funds. The officers are: chairman, Pelham Edgar; honorary secretary, Wilfred Eggleston; honorary treasurer, H. S. Southam; executive secretary, Charles Clay.

Mr. HANSELL: It is very nice to hear those names, and some of them may be bosom friends of mine, although I do not know whether they are or not. Simply because this organization has certain patrons who permit their names to be published on the literature does not mean a thing to me. Are these writers of such distinction that they are in poverty and need a little money? I confess that I do not know anything about this organization, and I ask that the item stand until next session so that we can get more information. I move that it be reduced to $1.

Mr. ABBOTT: The government is not vitally interested in this grant any more than it is in some of the others, but provision was made in the estimates only after careful investigation. The foundation referred to here is supported by the Canadian Authors Association, and the executive, as will be seen from the list read by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, is composed of reputable, well known Canadian citizens. If the committee feels that it is improper to make this grant the government does not want to insist on it; but, as I say, the Minister of Finance, after considering the matter, decided that this was a proper case to include in the estimates. If the committee wants to defer it for another year, well and good, but I do not think it should be done.

Mr. McIVOR: I support this item wholeheartedly. Our writers have had a hard road to travel in the past and they should get a little encouragement. If I had had an opportunity of preparing a speech on this item I could speak more convincingly of the outstanding need for support for our writers, our poets and our artists. I think this item shows that there are some men of heart in the Department of Finance.

Mr. JAQUES: Would the minister tell us if this item has anything to do with the organization known as Canadian Authors, Writers and Artists? I remember distinctly that a few years ago, and not so long ago as that, they were purely a communist outfit.

Mr. KNOWLES: You would not call Mr. Southam a communist, would you?

Mr. JAQUES: It was a purely communist outfit. I want to second the ideas of the hon. member for Macleod. There has been too much altogether of this furthering of communists and their ideas.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think I am as opposed to communism as anyone can be.

Mr. JAQUES: Huh!

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, huh!

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope Hansard knows how to spell "huh!"

Mr. MacINNIS: If the purpose of this vote is to indicate the government's desire to assist people like artists, authors and writers, I do not think it will break the country. Canada is a very difficult country for authors and artists to make a living in. We have not the population necessary to make a profitable market for books by Canadian authors. The result is that when an author shows promise and produces writing that is in demand he usually moves to the United States, and Canada loses another valuable citizen. So that, while we should be careful that none of the money voted by this parliament is used for purposes inimical to the welfare of Canada, I think we should support the vote and I hope that in future years we may increase it.

Mr. HANSELL: I know these are all nice things and I do not want to be thought as being against the support of legitimate enterprises. I am all for such things as scholarships. I am all for such assistance as the Department of Finance might give to artists of one kind and another; of course I am, but I think we should be very careful in matters of this kind. Could not an amount of this kind be appropriated for scholarships for people who have ambitions along the line of authorship, and could not such things be handled through our various provincial departments of education? There have been arising in the past few years too many nondescript organizations, the names of which are simply smoke-screens for something else which, once it gets in the thin end of the wedge, is there to stay, and the first thing we know the vote appears in the estimates year after year, yes, and increases with the years. I am not against proper appropriations for proper purposes, but I think in these matters we have to be careful, and I suggest that this item be left over until next year.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the government has made the right kind of case for their estimate. It is not very often that I have to come to their rescue, but I think in this case I must. It is a case with which the minister and his parliamentary assistant may not have been familiar through the years. May I point out to the hon. member for Macleod that I think he knows me well enough, as I know him, to know I no more than he, would want a five-cent piece to get into the hands of anyone who was going to advocate communism or anything like it in this country, because we cannot afford to waste our money in that way.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where did you get that red bow-tie?

Mr. GRAYDON: I borrowed it for the occasion.

This is not a new vote.

Mr. ABBOTT: In its present form it is new.

Mr. GRAYDON: I disagree with the minister on its being a new vote, because in 1931 or 1932, by agreement among the parties in this house—this was before I came into it, but I learned about the matter afterwards—a vote of $2,500 was included in the estimates for this purpose. If hon. members will look at the estimates through the years they will find that that vote was continued all through the years up until about a year ago or the year before when a prominent Canadian writer died. The vote was for exactly the same amount, $2,500, not for the purposes of the Canadian Writers Foundation but, if my memory serves me correctly, for the purpose of preparing a report on cultural conditions in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think everybody remembers that. It is certainly very clear in my memory. From 1931 or 1932 that vote has been regularly passed unanimously by the house. I understand that Professor Edgar, whose name has been mentioned as chairman of this foundation, who, incidentally, was one of my professors when I went to university many long years ago, and who has none of those red leanings for which neither the hon. member for Macleod nor myself has any use, was interested in this vote all through those years, and the estimate before us under another name is for a similar purpose. The vote was formerly used for the benefit of a distinguished Canadian writer, perhaps more than one. I am not going to mention names to this committee because that would not be fair, but I know the vote was used in one particular instance to give a distinguished Canadian in the evening of his life at least some semblance of comfort and security. I think this vote is simply an extension of that policy. It is not, as my hon. friend suggests, a new approach, inserting the thin end of the wedge to get something. If it were, I would be more critical of it than I am. But I think, with that explanation and because perhaps the minister was not familiar with the vote in previous years—

Mr. ABBOTT: I was familiar with it. The previous appropriation was paid to a distinguished Canadian for the preparation of a report on social and cultural conditions in Canada. That distinguished Canadian died a year or two ago, and the vote was not included in last year's estimates. The same amount appears in this year's estimates for the foundation. The purpose will be somewhat similar, but I do not think the vote will be restricted to one individual.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am just as much interested as the hon. member for Macleod. Will the minister undertake to see that parliament is given a full report on how the money is spent from now on, so that we shall have a careful check on it to see that it is going into the right places?

Mr. ABBOTT: It might be difficult to disclose names. That is the only reservation I would put on that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does this not go to a foundation to which other contributions may be made from other sources?

Mr. MAYHEW: It is to support the writers foundation fund. It is financial assistance to them. It is not only money that is going to be given to needy writers.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member for Macleod wish to press the amendment?

Mr. HANSELL: Even if I do move to reduce it to $1, I know it will not pass, but I object. It can be passed on division, if you like. I will not hold it up.

Mr. ABBOTT: Carried on division.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is withdrawn by consent, and the vote carried on division.

General—

72. To provide for the expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office, $6,966,745.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like a little more explanation as to exactly what the functions of the comptroller of the treasury are, because the increase is a large one. I should like to understand it a little bit better.

Mr. MAYHEW: The Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, provides for the appointment of a comptroller of the treasury for the purpose of maintaining more complete control over the administration of the consolidated revenue fund. The act assigns the following duties to the comptroller: To remit all public moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund by cheque or other instrument as directed by the treasury board; certification that there is a balance available in the appropriations authorized by parliament for the specific service before any issue of public funds shall be made; certification that there are sufficiently unencumbered balances available out of the amount authorized by parliament for the particular service to pay any commitment before the contract or undertaking involving a charge on the consolidated revenue fund is entered into.

Since the outbreak of war, there has been a large increase in the work performed in many of the offices of the comptroller, owing to an enlarged working staff and increased expenditures. Funds have been made available under the war appropriations only for expenditures in connection with distinctly war services.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That does not explain why there is this increase of nearly $2 million. Now that the war is over, I would have thought the work would lessen.

Mr. MAYHEW: If my hon. friend will look at pages 107 and 108 of the main estimates which contain the details he will see that it is largely represented by an increase in staff. For instance, on page 108 there is an increase of nearly $1 million for temporary assistance.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I saw that, and that puzzled me very much. I could not understand why there was so much new temporary assistance in this list. If we were dealing with three or four years ago I would have understood it.

Mr. ABBOTT: Many other things enter into it, such as heavy additional expenditures in payment for veterans affairs, for gratuities, for the Veterans Land Act, and all that sort of thing. All these heavy payments are being made under veterans affairs. All these have to be audited, checked and approved by the department of the comptroller of the treasury, and that is why there is that big increase under the heading of "temporary assistance" rather than under the heading of "permanent staff", which is up from 838 to 904.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before this item passes, I want to draw the attention of the minister to a matter which received considerable attention in the standing committee on external affairs. During the sittings of that committee the question arose as to what kind of audit or what measure of control was being exercised over expenditures of this country in the international field. If the minister will turn to the final report of the external affairs committee which was concurred in—I have not it with me at the moment, but that is not material to my argument—he will see that it indicated a desire on the part of the committee generally to pay some special heed to the necessity of having a careful control over the expenditures of this nation on the international front. The reason it was brought up was that we were not satisfied that the same measure of control was being exercised over expenditures on international matters as in the domestic field. The suggestion I have to make is not a critical one, nor is it offered to confound or confuse in any way the government in its policies. I offer it rather to be helpful and constructive in seeing to it that our international commitments do not run away with us.

Through the comptroller of the treasury we are careful to see that, to some extent at least, our domestic expenditures are guarded. We are not always sure that they are guarded sufficiently, but in any event they are guarded. In the international field we think a similar situation should exist. This country cannot afford in some instances to keep up with the international Joneses. I am not suggesting that as a nation we have done that. I do not think it would be fair on my part to make that suggestion because, generally speaking, Canada has kept closely within the confines of the commitments she is able to meet. But it is only fit and proper that the committee should at least draw to the attention of the minister the importance of having some special control exercised over international expenditures to make sure that they are kept within the limits of government policy and to the extent that the national pocketbook can afford to pay.

Mr. ABBOTT: The same system of control applies to these expenditures as applies to our domestic expenditures. I think my hon. friend is referring to the expenditures themselves. We make our contribution to the various international organizations, and we have been pressing for a similar control to be exercised over the expenditures of these organizations as we exercise with respect to the expenditures of our domestic departments. So far as the contributions which we make to them are concerned, these are subject to exactly the same check as any other government payment. The point which my hon. friend makes is an important one and one which the government of Canada is pressing to see put into effect.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister says that the reason for the large increase in the expenditures proposed for this year as compared with last year is that there has been an increase in "temporary assistance." Is that temporary assistance only for the present year? Will it be discontinued after this year, or is it the kind of assistance which will change itself into permanent assistance later on?

Mr. ABBOTT: I indicated just before my hon. friend came into the chamber that a large part of this was for payments in connection with veterans affairs, rehabilitation grants, the Veterans Land Act, and the like. Whether they will be exhausted at the end of this year I am not in a position to say, but obviously it is a type of special expenditures which will cease at the end of a fairly limited period, and as I explained in answer to a question by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario a moment ago, that is why it is included under the heading of "temporary assistance" rather than under the heading of "permanent staff" of the department.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister say just a word about two details in the total of this item? One is the cost of living bonus and the other is paylist items, which is up $300,000 this year above what it was last year. The other item is postage on family allowance cheques, which is up $250,000 above last year. Will the minister explain the reasons for these two large increases?

Mr. ABBOTT: So far as family allowance is concerned, it was in for only part of the preceding year. That, I take it, explains the difference in the postage cost under that item. Perhaps my parliamentary assistant could say a word on the cost of living bonus.

Mr. MAYHEW: The cost of living bonus is $675,000; war duties supplement, $108,615; unemployment insurance, $45,000. I think I tried to explain on the first item that the numbers in here increase after the men come home but still stay on the government pay list in some way or another. Some of them are going to universities, and some of them are taking occupational training. That is one place. Also large numbers, when they are demobilized, come in on to the payroll in one form or another. Family allowances add greatly to the work, and a good deal of it is in the cheque adjustment branch. The cheque adjustment branch is a pretty heavy item, and it requires a great deal of detailed work after the cheques are issued and come back to Ottawa from the different branches, since they have to be checked to see that they are correct, that they have not been raised in any way, that the signatures are right; it involves a lot of work. The cheques which are being issued now run to 2,800,000 a month, and the hon. gentleman can understand that when these come back it takes a considerable staff to see that everything is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: Just one observation with respect to the answer given by the Acting Minister of Finance as to the increase in the postage. The estimate for last year was $500,000; the estimate for this year is $750,000, or an increase of fifty per cent. The explanation that this policy was in effect for less than a year last year would hardly account for the fifty per cent increase in the cost of postage.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it would.

Mr. BRACKEN: I would rather think there is another explanation as well. Is it not because you are in effect requiring that cheques be sent out to all people who have children coming under this legislation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The new rule applies only from 1947 on. That would not have any significant effect on the estimate. The new law with respect to everybody claiming family allowance applies only from January 1, 1947. This estimate was prepared before that matter was decided upon. As I said earlier, I think the main reason for the increase is the fact that the family allowance loan was only in force for a part of the preceding year. This is only an estimate, of course; if the money is not spent it will not be used, and it is payable to another department of government.

Mr. BRACKEN: But this fiscal year extends over three months of the next calendar year, when this new provision would be in effect.

Mr. CAMPBELL: On page 108 of the details there is an item of $150,000 for rent of equipment. It seems to me that an increase of $110,000 is pretty considerable.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is an increase of $40,000, from $110,000 to $150,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is that not a rather large item for rental of equipment? Have we not a lot of equipment under War Assets Corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is mostly veterans affairs and health and welfare, I am told.

Mr. FRASER: How many treasury officers are out looking after family allowances, in the different offices across Canada? We learned from the Minister of National Health and Welfare the cost of the different offices, but he would not tell us the number of treasury officers because, he said, it came under the Department of Finance.

Mr. McMASTER: As regards getting out the cheques, I understand they have some system whereby cheques can be made out rapidly. Why do they not buy these machines?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is mechanized equipment, and I understand the manufacturers do not sell machines, but only rent them.

As regards the question of the hon. member for Peterborough West, I will see if I can get that information and give it to him later.

Item agreed to.

General—

73. Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1943, and Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, administration, $151,515.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I notice that there is a reduction in this item and that it is almost wholly in the matter of fees. I should like the minister to explain something about the nature of that item, and I should also like to ask this question. I understand, and it is my hope and belief, that the largely improved farm conditions, particularly in western Canada, in the last few years must have greatly cut down the work under the act, and I should like to know how much it has been cut down. I wish to form an idea as to what relatively the amount of work is as compared with two or four years ago.

Mr. MAYHEW: I can give the hon. member the information from 1943 to 1945 in respect of each province.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And the number of applications under the act. I should like to go back starting about 1940.

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be under the old act, before the amendment, of course.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes, but I should like to find out the number of applications, because it gives a rough idea of the amount of work and to what extent it has been reduced.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think this will give the hon. gentleman an idea of what the board is doing—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister explain to us about that matter of fees—$100,000 last year and $50,000 this year?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might say something about that, because I had something to do with the revision of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act a year ago. That simply reflects the reduced number of applications which are received by the receivers in the three western provinces. As the hon. member knows, it applies now only to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Experience last year showed that, because of improved conditions, I take it, in the western provinces and because of restrictions which were imposed under the amended act there was a diminishing number of applications, and we contemplate that for the coming year they will be still further reduced, so that we have cut in half the estimate of receivers' fees for the current fiscal year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is it correct to say that the fees are paid at the same scale, and therefore that a fifty per cent cut in the fees anticipates a fifty per cent reduction in the number of applications?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is about exactly right.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then it seems to me that the reduction shown here is almost wholly an item of $50,000, and one would have hoped there might be other reductions.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are corresponding reductions in land appraisals and reductions in filings and legal costs, postage, rents and telephone.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No, it is not carried. I have asked questions which have not been answered, and they are going to be answered, if possible.

Mr. MAYHEW: The total number of cases in 1943 in Manitoba were 43, in Saskatchewan 2,414, in Alberta, 645, making a total of 3,102. The number of cases brought to conclusion by official receivers: Manitoba, nine—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want only the totals arising in each year.

Mr. MAYHEW: The total of cases brought to conclusion by official receivers was 464. The number of cases brought to conclusion by county and district courts was 1,997. The total number of cases disposed of was 2,461. Cases yet to be dealt with number 691; appeals taken from judgments of courts, 404; appeals allowed, 197; appeals disallowed, 117; appeals yet to be heard, or judgments pending, 90.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Could we have the figure for 1945 which would compare with the 3,102 for 1943?

Mr. MAYHEW: I am sorry we have not that information separately, but it can be obtained and sent to the hon. member.

Mr. McMASTER: With times as good as they are in the west at the present time, and in view of the fact that this was not popular except among those who might have been considered rather poor farmers, I should think it would soon be dispensed with.

Mr. LOW: What is the government's policy with respect to the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act? Will it be kept active?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are making no new grants under it. The only payments made are those flowing from commitments previously entered into.

Mr. LOW: Will the government hold this open and ready for use when loans under it are demanded?

Mr. ABBOTT: Obviously that is a matter of government policy which will have to be considered in due course.

Item agreed to.

General—
74. To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for salaries, cost of living bonus, reclassifications and increases, $100,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this for potential salary increases only within the Department of Finance, or for all departments?

Mr. ABBOTT: All through the service.

Item agreed to.

General—
75. Unforeseen expenses expenditure thereof to be subject to approval of the treasury board and a detailed statement to be laid before parliament within fifteen days of next session, $80,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is the kind of item all of us would like to have in our budgets, if we only could.

Mr. ABBOTT: And have to.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it only for the Department of Finance or for the entire government service? What was it used for last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend has said, this is an omnibus item. It covers all departments. As indicated in the item, it is to cover unforeseen contingencies in the various departments. I think hon. members will agree that, in view of the extent of the estimates, it is not a large item and is not out of proportion to an amount any ordinary businessman would include in his budget, if he were attempting to draw up a budget in which there were items which he could not foresee at the time the budget was being prepared. Hon. members will realize that these estimates are prepared well in advance of the time the moneys are expended.

Mr. KNOWLES: I grant that this is a relatively small item to spend any time on. But in view of the fact that we have regular estimates, supplementary estimates, further supplementary estimates, and probably more supplementary estimates when we meet next year, I believe it is reasonable to ask the minister to give some general idea of how this vote was spent last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: The first expenditure, for instance, was in connection with the royal commission on administrative reclassifications in the public service. The amount is $2,800 for that. Then there were certain expenses in connection with the return to England of Sir Shuldham Redfern of the governor general's staff, an amount of $2,000. There were minor expenses in connection with the official government reception for General Crerar on his return from overseas. They are items of that kind, amounts which were not contemplated when the estimates were prepared. I am informed that this figure has been included in the estimates for a number of years.

Mr. LOW: It has not all been spent, has it?

Mr. ABBOTT: Only $18,000 of the appropriation was spent last year. This amount of $80,000 has been included each year for a number of years.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before all the items for the Department of Finance are passed, I should like to point out that, in addition to the items dealt with by the committee, there is a total of $580,341,807.51 authorized by statute, and over which this committee has no authority. This figure represents an increase of about $91 million over the previous year, and represents heavy expenditures. I should like to inquire about it, because it affects the provinces.

At the foot of page 11 of the estimates there is a summary of expenditures to provinces by way of compensation "in lieu of income and corporation taxes under the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act, 1942." I notice that the only provinces which suffered reductions this year as compared with the previous year are the three maritime provinces. Prince Edward Island has a reduction of $210,583.18, Nova Scotia of $436,661.70, and New Brunswick of $912,516.86. All other provinces are the same as in the previous year, with the exception of Alberta, where there is an increase of $1,746,933.30. Why should there be this substantial reduction as applied to the maritime provinces?

It is unfortunate we have not had more opportunity during this session to discuss the federal-provincial financial agreement. It is most important, especially to the maritime provinces. Down there one finds great dissatisfaction with it. As was mentioned this morning by the Acting Prime Minister, there is a great deal of uncertainty, although he gave as full an explanation as he could.

The gasoline tax takes about $30 million and is certainly applicable to provincial activities and highways. I was minister of highways of Nova Scotia when the first gasoline tax of three cents a gallon was imposed. I gave an undertaking which was confirmed year after year, that every cent of the taxation imposed on gasoline would be applied directly to the improvement of the highways. I believe that policy has been carried out ever since, but the federal government encroached on that field during the war years. The provinces and the motorists submitted to it, but now the government are trying to perpetuate their tax on gasoline. At the recent conference it was stated that they would not retire from this field which yields them $30,000,000 annually, which should go directly to the provinces or benefit the motorists.

We have not the opportunity or the time to discuss the matter as it should be discussed, but I should like a statement from the Acting Minister of Finance in explanation of the reduction in the subsidies payable to the three maritime provinces, while the payments to the other provinces, with the exception of Alberta, remain the same.

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason is very simple; it is because the agreements with the maritime provinces expire before the end of the fiscal year, which means that the obligations under those agreements will lapse, in the case of New Brunswick, on October 31. I do not remember the dates for the other provinces.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Have the governments of the three maritime provinces agreed to this reduction without any compensation for the remainder of the year?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am only assuming that if they do not enter into new tax agreements they will impose their own taxes. That is the obvious answer. If they enter into new agreements, of course those agreements will be substituted for the present wartime tax agreements. If they do not, they will reimpose the taxes which they relinquished under the wartime tax agreements.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But the fact is that the federal government is continuing to encroach upon sources of revenue which heretofore were available to the provinces. Is it the purpose of the federal government to continue to impose the gasoline tax after the lapse of these agreements? Will it be necessary for the provinces to raise additional taxes on gasoline to those exacted by the federal government? Of course the motorists are the ones who will have to pay the double taxation.

Mr. ABBOTT: The provinces were imposing a gasoline tax before the agreements were entered into and I presume they will continue to do so. They will have revenue from the corporation tax, the personal income tax and other tax fields which they relinquished to the dominion government during the war years.

Mr. McMASTER: I have not heard any complaint from Alberta regarding the increase, and perhaps the minister could explain that.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not sure that the question of provincial-dominion agreements can be discussed under the item before the committee, which is vote 75. It would seem to me that this discussion is not in order.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just to answer my hon. friend shortly, this relates to the arrangement that was entered into with Alberta last year in connection with the refunding of their obligations which were in default. Since I did not anticipate the question I am not familiar with the details, but my hon. friends will remember that these were set out in the press at the time. The defaulted obligations were refunded and the dominion entered into a certain agreement. It was up before parliament last year.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think we might let the items having to do with the wartime prices and trade board stand until we have completed the other items.

494. To provide for the payment of premiums on Dominion of Canada sterling securities, $20,000.

Mr. FRASER: On many occasions during the past few weeks I handed a $10 bill to different storekeepers or to hotels or restaurants, and I did it with a purpose in mind. In many cases I was handed back all United States money and, when I said I wanted Canadian money, I was told that they had not any. Where does a Canadian citizen stand when he has to take United States money as change?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have never had the experience my hon. friend has had, and I would welcome it. This is a foreign exchange control matter, and it would come under the present foreign exchange control order, which will be followed by the Foreign Exchange Control Act. But to answer my hon. friend's question—I think there will be an amendment to the order and to the act which will permit an individual Canadian to hold, for the time being, a certain amount of United States currency without infringing the provisions of the order. He will not be permitted to export it out of the country, but if, under circumstances similar to what my hon. friend has in mind, he has to take large quantities of United States dollars, he can keep them for a time and then turn them into his bank and get the better currency which we have here, good Canadian dollars.

Mr. FRASER: This happened a week ago on the way down from Muskoka.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course that part of the country is inundated with Americans just now.

Mr. FRASER: They would not take United States money from me when I had Canadian money. That was the trouble all the way down.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am delighted to hear that.

Item agreed to.

Halifax area explosion and V-E day damage—

500. Administration expenses in connection with investigations, $85,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. ABBOTT: This item covers the estimated payment of claims arising out of the Halifax disturbances last year. The supplementaries contain an additional amount to what is indicated here.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): What will be the total expenditures in connection with the explosion and riot claims at Halifax. Item 500 commences with these words: "Halifax area explosion and V-E day damage."

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: This is the first time the appropriation has appeared in the estimates. There is an item of $1,800,000 for payment of claims, and in the supplementaries, on page 19, there is a further item of $650,000, or a total of $2,450,000. Did my hon. friend want to know, in addition, the amount that was voted last year?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to know the total expenditure in connection with the claims.

Mr. ABBOTT: Last year $4,610,118 was spent.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like at some time to get more details with respect to these disbursements. I have already asked for them, but the parliamentary assistant impressed on me that it would involve a great deal of work. Being good-natured and kindly disposed toward him, I did not press for it, but I have been pressing and still press for some statement with respect to the loss suffered, a very real loss, a loss as real as any for which compensation has been paid out of the $4,600,000 odd, by a settler in my constituency who shipped $129 worth of broilers on the 18th of July, 1945. Those broilers were delayed by the Canadian Express Company, not through any fault of the express company, but because the train was delayed owing to the explosion. I was put off by the statement that this was only a loss incidental to the explosion a "consequential loss," and this poor farmer who raised these early chickens was made the sufferer. I am not satisfied to see an expenditure totalling over $4,600,000 and this man under those circumstances denied reimbursement of the small amount claimed. Every member of the house will agree that he suffered a real loss through this explosion. The farmer who raised these broilers was endeavouring to market them among his customers in Halifax, and they were destroyed because the train was delayed as a result of the Halifax explosion. This man's claim has not been paid. I have not yet got satisfaction. I have had some encouragement that it is still under consideration. I am satisfied for it to remain under consideration and let this vote go through but I do not want the claim to remain under consideration too long.

Mr. WARREN: Might I ask the hon. member if the broilers by any chance could have any connection with the horse meat that was shipped from Cumberland county to Halifax and later was sent out to be examined somewhere in Saskatchewan?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If the hon. member wants the facts those were horses that came from Ontario. I assume no responsibility for them so far as my constituency is concerned.

Mr. WARREN: In Ontario we use our horses for work purposes; we do not can them.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think the hon. member for Cumberland is entitled to a reply. He took this matter up with me last session, and at that time we were told that the claim was not allowed because the damage was consequential. That was the legal opinion of the department at that time. But just a few days ago I discussed the matter again with the departmental officials and asked them to refer the case to justice for an opinion whether it was consequential damage or not. The matter went over to justice only a few days ago, and I imagine that in their usual speedy manner they will give the hon. gentleman a reply.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I thank the parliamentary assistant for his efforts on behalf of this settler in my constituency, and if he will see that this claim is paid we will waive the right to interest arrears which have been accumulating over a period of years.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE

94. Departmental administration, $195,795.

Mr. JAENICKE: I consider it my duty on behalf of a large number of my constituents to bring to the attention of the minister and of the committee certain questionable activities of a loan company in Winnipeg. The company to which I refer is the International Loan Company. Prior to 1921, this company was chartered under a provincial act. Then in 1921 it obtained a charter from this parliament, with an authorized capital of $20,000,000. Then they went out into the western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to sell their shares. The price of the shares was $100 each, but for some reason or another they added a premium of $20 to the price of the shares, so that if you bought ten shares, worth $1,000, you had to pay $1,200. The applicant for a share obligated himself to pay at least fifty per cent of the value of the share, and the other fifty per cent was to be paid through the application of dividends. The men who sold these shares went mainly amongst the farmers and, so far as my constituency is concerned, farmers of foreign extraction. In 1931 the subscribed capital of this company had reached $5,620,400. Only part of that was paid, the remainder remaining callable. We all know what happened after that. We had the economic depression, then years of crop failure, and of course farmers who had subscribed shares were unable to pay up when the call came. The company allowed the shares to stand until a few years ago and then started to forfeit them, shares on which a considerable amount had been paid. At the end of 1945 the subscribed capital amounted to only $1,785,800 from over $5 million in 1931. In 1945 alone, 23,214 shares were forfeited, having a par value of $2,321,400, and there had been paid on them a total of $159,151.35. I have a list of the shares.

I have taken the matter up with the superintendent of insurance and, while he is sympathetic in connection with the forfeitures, seeing that a considerable amount of money has been paid on the shares, there is apparently nothing that he can do. The loss of capital in my constituency is considerable. Let me cite two typical cases of farmers who bought shares over twenty years ago. They were told that it was a good investment and that by the time they reached the age of seventy they would have a comfortable income besides any other revenue they might get from the shares. In one case a man paid $1,800 in cash, and dividends at the time of the forfeiture amounted to $338.45. In other words, he had an investment of over $2,100 in the company and it was wiped out a year ago. Another man paid $1,500 and his earned dividends at the time of forfeiture were over $400, so that almost $2,000 of his investment was wiped out.

Looking over the cancellation of forfeitures in 1945—I have a list of them which I received from the superintendent of insurance—I find that there are scores of similar cases, making up a total of over $150,000 which was paid by poor people whose money has been lost through these forfeitures.

There is in Winnipeg a shareholder named George Batho, who has written an open letter on the subject and whom I had the pleasure of meeting. I told him I would mention his name. He is a retired civil servant, a shareholder in good standing. He has interested himself in the matter and spent his own money and time, and he has done a great deal of work to bring to the attention of other shareholders the deplorable conditions under which the shares were cancelled. I should like to read from this open letter which he wrote to the shareholders last month and in which he sets out some of the conditions I have mentioned:

The day in history wherein one man killed and ate his brother physically is, we hope, pretty well past and gone forever. But, in regard to fortunes, exactly the same trait of character is being exhibited by International Loan Company. About 25 years ago many hundreds of people responded to the suave persuasions of Doctor Argue, who had a monopoly on share selling, and they bought shares. Then some of the purchasers let their better judgment come to the rescue, and they never paid a "red cent" on the contract. About 570 of such non-payers were dropped in 1945. There was nothing whatsoever wrong with that; they should have been dropped many years earlier. But when they were dropped about 400 other persons, who together had paid to the company $102.932.28, as applied on paid capital, and $56,219.07, as applied on premium or $159,151.35 in all, also had their rights in the company forfeited and were left with not one cent's worth of value for all their money. It was confiscation of wealth, pure and simple—dog eat dog—big man eat little man—the wealthier ones gobbling up the less fortunate—financial cannibalism. The company really was not violating the present law of the land in doing this; but in many of the cases it was violating all ethical standards known to mankind. People who buy shares in a loan company and who cannot finish their contract ought to get at least part of the shares they have paid for. The company was solvent; it was not in distress to creditors; much of this forfeiture was just wanton confiscation, many of the forfeitures running into hundreds and even well up into thousands of dollars, where in different cases the contract was decidedly more than half completed. To the end of 1945 shareholders had paid $355,550.31 on share contracts that had been wiped out by forfeiture. This is almost 29 per cent of the present assets of the company.

This confiscation followed right on the heels of oft-repeated assurance to shareholders that their investment was secure.

Whether they are big financiers or little, the shareholders of this company should urge upon their members in the House of Commons that the Dominion Loan Companies Act in this respect should be amended.

The guiding genius of this company is Doctor Argue, to whom Mr. Batho refers in his letter, and lately there has come into the scene his son-in-law Mr. Dick. Doctor Argue holds shares amounting to $40,000 paid up and Mr. Dick holds $18,000 worth, and they can do what they like through proxies. I should like to quote again from Mr. Batho's letter.

To-day, for all practical purposes, this company is tied hand and foot by Messrs. Argue and Dick through the use of proxies. Proxies are commonly used in company business, and their use seems to be quite necessary. But in every other company, or practically every other company, the proxies sought are for one meeting only; and the need for these is to facilitate the doing of business in the event of a small attendance at that meeting. But Doctor Argue and Mr. Dick use continuing proxies, the most vicious proxy yet devised, to continue their stranglehold upon the control of the company. The reports of recent annual meetings tell us that the possession of proxies was announced as follows:

	Proxies Represented
1944	.....4,250 shares (one share, one vote)
1945	.....4,583 shares (one share, one vote)
1946	.....5,768 shares (one share, one vote)

Ever since this company began Doctor Argue has assiduously gathered proxies day in and day out. At first these proxies were all for himself; then later they were made to be used by either Argue or Dick. A number of these proxies are about 20 years old; the givers of many of them doubtless have forgotten that they ever gave a proxy; some without doubt never understood the nature of the paper they signed; many of the people giving these proxies have lost touch with the company.

With the use of these proxies, having the company entirely at their disposal, these two gentlemen put through resolutions and other business of the company at their will. They entered into an ingenious contract just a few years ago with this company which gives them exclusive right to sell shares, invest the company's money, rent properties and so on, all on a commission basis and on a fixed fee basis, and as to whether or not the company is making money, these two gentlemen apparently make sure that they make money. This is what Mr. Batho says with respect to the contract:

With all these proxies in their possession, Messrs. Argue and Dick, a few years ago, had the company issue to them a thirty-year contract as joint managers. The terms of that contract may be good or they may be bad; the point is that these two men, using continuing proxies could hire themselves on any kind of contract that did not violate the terms of the Loan Companies Act or the by-laws of the company. Even before the meeting began they knew that the contract was "in the bag."

The present proxy set-up is utterly bad and intolerable.

I would ask the minister to instruct the superintendent of insurance to look into the matter. With proper pressure being brought to bear on this company by the department, I think it could be persuaded, without a change in the law, to reinstate these shareholders who have paid such large amounts of money and whose money, being almost one-third of the total assets, has helped to make the profits and the dividends which the company has earned. I quite realize that an industrial company which assumes public obligations could not in this way have the continuing shareholders bear the liabilities which the company has, but this company never had any public liabilities. The money that these shareholders paid in, along with the money put in by the other shareholders, produced the dividends which they have earned.

I also think there is something wrong with their financial manipulations. The statement of assets and liabilities and of profits and losses which they publish and send to their shareholders differs from those which will be found on file with the department of insurance. Of course there is an explanation. The superintendent of insurance permits certain deductions to be taken from profits, and the company treats them in another way. In any event they make out their statement in such a way as to indicate that they are making a lot of money and in fact they are not. During the last twenty years they have only earned dividends of an average of 1·73 per cent on the capital investment.

Another suggestion I would make to the minister is that in a case like this where a company has no public liability, no shares should be forfeited unless it is with the consent of the minister or of the court.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the particular case to which my hon. friend has referred. As suggested, I will take note of his remarks and bring them to the attention of the superintendent of insurance. I think I should point out that the matter of dealing with the sale of shares and otherwise is something that is purely a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The superintendent of insurance is responsible, of course, for seeing that the company's reserves, or whatever they may be, are adequate to take care of its liabilities. But he is not primarily, if at all, concerned with how a company which operates in a particular province disposes of its shares.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do I understand from the minister that any company can operate, say in Manitoba, and be permitted to sell its shares anywhere at all throughout Canada and that the federal government would have no control over it?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it would have to obtain appropriate permission from the other province in which it wished to sell its shares, to do so; but that is a matter which is purely a question of property and civil rights and comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. JAENICKE: I was not complaining so much about the sale of shares as of the forfeiture of shares. The law ought to be amended so that where a company has no public liability its shares would not be forfeited. In other words, a shareholder who has paid in a certain amount, say ten or twenty per cent, should get a paid-up share for the amount of money that he has paid in.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend, who is an able lawyer, knows, that is purely a legal question. Most companies' acts provide a procedure whereby shares which are partly paid-up can be forfeited if the shareholder fails to pay a further call. I do not know the circumstances of the particular case to which he refers, but I shall have inquiries made. It is a legal question which would certainly require an amendment to the statute under which the company is incorporated, and that is a matter which would have to receive careful consideration before such an amendment were made. Obviously nothing can be done about it at this session.

Mr. BRYCE: If a company is operating under a dominion charter would it not be subject to federal law? Some of my constituents are in this company.

Mr. ABBOTT: If it were incorporated under a dominion charter there would be terms and conditions under which its shares could be issued; and a provision with respect to forfeiture. The charter would, of course, be determined by the dominion law, by the statute under which the company had been created.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There is nothing in the statutes of the dominion compelling any company without public liability to deal with those persons who are shareholders in such a way as to make it possible for the government to take action against a company or to cancel its charter or compel it to recognize the equity which shareholders have?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a pretty broad question. I do not pretend to be an expert in the particular line to which reference is made. I suggest that one of my colleagues at the bar might suitably earn a well-deserved fee by advising on the matter which we are discussing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am sure they will be glad to hear about it, but these people have not the money to hire these lawyers. It seems to me that justice would be done if there were regulations which prevented this kind of thing. If it is legal, then certainly we have an open form of legalized robbery. I think it should be stopped.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not a matter about which the superintendent of insurance can do anything, and that is the particular item that we are discussing at the moment.

Mr. FERGUSON: In cases of this kind one gets tired of some people always saying someone has been robbed. People of foreign extraction come here, and they do not buy stock in any corporation unless they have the idea that they are going to make a lot of money out of it. They take an option on certain shares of a stock in a company. The directors who are running corporations of this kind have a great difficulty in repeatedly asking these people to contribute the remainder of their subscription. The millions are not forthcoming to these people of foreign extraction. They do not see fit to answer the correspondence which they receive from head office. The people who run these corporations give these people plenty of warning. If these companies are not run on a sound business basis these people lose their money. They deserve to lose their money. If you take an option to buy a piece of furniture from the T. Eaton Company or a piece of property from some other company, and you do not see fit to go ahead with your contract and lose your money, that is your business. Why we should appeal to the government, and try to make it a collection agency for these people who do not want to carry out their contract, is something I do not understand. I do not see why we should waste our time talking about it.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like the hon. member who has just taken his seat to understand that the constituents whom I represent are not of foreign extraction. They are Canadians.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Wartime prices and trade board—
488. Administration, $11,575,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if he will make a statement to the committee at this time with reference to the situation in connection with the price of milk. I am not going to go into the matter in detail, because it was pretty thoroughly debated the other morning on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair. The minister and the other members of the government are fully aware of the stand taken by the house. I think it was one of the most significant recorded votes that we have had for a good many years. All members in all parties were given complete freedom to vote as they wished. All pairing was off, and the result of the vote was quite decisive. As I recall it, it was sixty-nine to forty-one in favour of consideration being given to the continuance of the milk subsidy so that adequate returns might be had by the producers and the price of milk to the consumer might be kept down. It is regrettable that the number of members present for the vote was so small; but in spite of that, it is significant to note that the number of government supporters who voted for the motion was so large that, had the entire house been present, the vote would still have been in the affirmative. A good deal of interest was created in the country because of the vote. The interest was already there, because milk is so important in every home. Now that parliament has expressed itself most decisively, the country is anxious to know just what is going to happen. Will the government carry out the wishes of this house? The time for the proposed discontinuance of the milk subsidy is not far off. I realize also that there has not been a great deal of time since the vote was taken the other morning, but I hope that the Acting Minister of Finance is now able to make some statement as to what we may expect from the government in this connection.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I can make a brief statement on that, and make it promptly. In accordance with the resolution passed by the house the other day, the government will consider the question of continuing this milk subsidy, but I want to make it perfectly clear that this does not necessarily mean that the policy will be changed. Another point I want to make clear is that the subsidy is fifty-five cents for about forty quarts, so that when we hear in the newspapers talk that the price of milk may go up two or three cents a quart if the subsidy is not continued, a very simple exercise in mathematics will indicate that even if the subsidy is continued it will not prevent any such rise as is intimated there, because the subsidy is only equivalent to a little over one cent per quart. But as I said, in accordance with the resolution of the house the question will be considered, and I also repeat that that must not be taken necessarily as an indication that the policy will be changed.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the minister concerning the details of this on page 262. There is $600,000 for advertising and $600,000 for printing. I should like to have details.

Mr. ABBOTT: The details will be available in a moment. My hon. friend will see from the details on page 262 of the estimates that there is a substantial reduction from the previous fiscal year. In the case of printing the amount is down from $1,000,000 to $600,000. In the case of advertising the reduction is from $1,750,000 to $600,000. We shall get the breakdown in a minute.

Mr. FRASER: While the minister's officials are getting the breakdown, will the minister tell me why postage is up some $60,000 while everything else is down?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that we can give a completely satisfactory explanation as to that. The actual expenditure last year was $236,000. I am told by officers of the board that, with the rather rapid change in policy; with certain controls being released and certain changes made, the volume of correspondence, particularly with district offices and the public, has increased substantially over the last few months, and therefore it was felt that perhaps it would be wise to increase the estimates for postage to some extent. But, as I said in connection with a similar estimate in another department, it is an estimate. If the money for postage is not spent, why—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We won't give the stamps away.

Mr. ABBOTT: Precisely; as the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario says, we won't give the stamps away. I am afraid that is about as detailed an explanation as I can give of the estimate of the increase in postage. I admit it does seem unusual that, where other items are substantially reduced, the postage item should be up.

Mr. FRASER: When the minister gives me the details of advertising I want them with reference to radio, the film board, the newspapers and the magazines.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: Hon. members may say, "oh, oh". This is the last of the session, and this is being rushed through, but there is no reason why we should not have the details.

Mr. ABBOTT: Here, again, it is an estimate. I can give my hon. friend the breakdown of the advertising costs for last year, which perhaps would be of some assistance in connection with the estimate for this year: radio serials, programmes of that type cost $326,000; farmers' bulletins, $81,000; advertising in connection with the emergency shelters, which is, of course, self-explanatory, $117,000; sugar services, $135,000; and meat rationing, $121,000; making a total of $780,000. Under "printing" the main cost is in connection with ration books, as the committee will appreciate. On that item last year substantial savings were achieved. Ration book No. 1 cost $173,228.

Mr. FRASER: I think that information has been given.

Mr. ABBOTT: Has that been given before?

Mr. FRASER: That has been given in the papers.

Mr. ABBOTT: That, I may say, is the important item of expenditure under the heading of printing costs. I hope that this year the cost of ration books will be substantially reduced.

Mr. FRASER: The minister gave the figures for radio last year. What is the amount this year?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is included in the lump appropriation. I do not know that there is a specific breakdown for radio. The total appropriation for all types of advertising and radio is, as the committee will see, $600,000, and out of that appropriation will have to come all forms of publicity and information to the public, whether it takes the form of newspaper advertising, radio, circulars and the like.

Mr. FRASER: The minister did not give the film board costs for last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will see if I have that. Miscellaneous films, $48,678.94.

Mr. FRASER: What is it this year?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no specific appropriation; no allotment at all. If it were utilized it would have to come out of this $600,000.

Mr. FRASER: I have another question which I should like to ask. In a release dated August 27 appears this statement:

> Women's and misses' suits and coats
> As a result of wage rate increases approved by the Quebec regional war labour board, the prices board has authorized an adjustment in manufacturers' prices for women's and misses' coats and suits for a number of manufacturers in Quebec.

What about Ontario and the other provinces? Are they affected on the price, too?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a question concerning which I shall have to get the information, and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. LENNARD: It is sweat-shop work; that is all.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may be that the wage scale was lower in Quebec than it is in Peterborough.

Mr. FRASER: We have well satisfied and excellent workers in Peterborough.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sure you have.

Mr. FRASER: Last winter, not only in Peterborough, but in a number of cities across Canada children between the ages of six and twelve years were unable to attend school owing to the fact that they could not obtain from any of the stores long stockings to wear to school. Was that because of price, or why were they not able to get them? Why are they not on the market? To-day the Acting Minister of Finance can go into any store down on Spark street and try to buy a pair of socks for himself, and he will find them very hard to get.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know that. The answer—and my hon. friend knows it as well as I do—is that it is the aftermath of an expensive and disrupting war. This country, in common with a great many other countries, is going through a period of shortages in many essential things. We hope that if people will get together and exercise moderation, as I said in other places, and do their fair share of work, that we shall overcome these shortages.

The condition to which the hon. member refers is not peculiar to Canada. As a matter of fact I believe that in that respect we are a bit better off than in some other countries. But it is perfectly true that I cannot buy shirts when I try to. I do not know so much about children's and misses' dresses, but I know that every effort is being made to overcome these shortages as quickly as possible. That is one of the great problems facing the prices board in trying to ensure a reasonable supply of essential goods. I agree with the hon. member that that type of clothing should have top priority.

Mr. FRASER: This release, which refers to an increase in price, it seems to me supplies the answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: In cases in which you authorize an increase in price, you cannot expect people to produce below cost. They will not do that. If a wage increase has been authorized it is pretty evident that if goods are to be produced people must pay the prices. That is the answer to that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister tell us the amount involved in both consumer and producer milk subsidies last year?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the exact figure here, but I know the consumer subsidy was greater than the producer subsidy. The consumer subsidy was in the vicinity of $21 million. The producer subsidy was paid by the Department of Agriculture and, although I cannot make a positive statement, I think it was about $14 million or $15 million.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to follow up for a moment what was said by the hon. member for Peterborough West. The release states definitely that the reason for the increase in the cost of women's and misses' coats was the wage increase recently granted in the industry. I think that is a misleading statement.

Mr. FRASER: Well, it is right there, in the document.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I know it is. It is obviously intended for one purpose, namely, to throw the onus of responsibility on the workers in the plant. Because there is a dollar or two added to the price of women's coats, that increase in the price of the coat in Quebec is not confined to Quebec alone. That coat is probably sold throughout Canada.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Does the wartime prices and trade board, when permitting an increase in the price of any commodity under its jurisdiction, make an examination of the cost factor involved, as to the position of the industry in question and as to whether the increase in price is warranted or otherwise?

Mr. ABBOTT: Invariably.

Mr. GILLIS: That was not done in the case of the increase in the price of basic steel.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes it was.

Mr. GILLIS: And that was proven conclusively by Mr. Gordon himself.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was not poven by Mr Gordon, or by anybody else.

Mr. GILLIS: It was proven in the industrial relations committee, of which I attended every session, the minister being there on only one occasion. I would advise him to check Mr. Gordon's evidence—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have.

Mr. GILLIS: —before the committee. because he stated quite distinctly that he did not make an audit. He accepted the statement of the company's auditors, and in my opinion that is no indication. I say that because a telegram was received from the cost accounting department of the Steel Company of Canada, from one of their trusted employees, who had checked costs and compared figures, which were in conflict with the figures presented to the committee by Mr. Hilton, the president of the company.

My point is that if the taxpayers of Canada are to maintain an organization costing the amount of money the minister is asking the committee to vote, then I think, before prices are changed, a check should be made. I am convinced of one thing, that a lot of our difficulty to-day in industry lies in the fact that price ceilings were not maintained, that they were thrown to one side indiscriminately without any check as to whether there was any justification for price increases. I am convinced of that.

I believe the minister should now be able to answer specifically as to whether the price increase mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough was checked, so as to ascertain whether it was justified.

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Because this is one time where a specific case is being brought to our attention. If one checks back on everything he buys to eat and wear to-day he finds the same relaxation of controls and increases in prices all along the line—in clothing, in hats and in other commodities that were produced four or five years ago, and where no cost factor was involved. But those price increases have been granted, and the consumer is being taken for a ride.

If we are to have price controls—and I believe in them—then I am accusing the government, and will continue to do so, of taking controls off much too quickly; because, if there ever was a time when we needed them, it was during the transition from war to peace. If we are to have price controls, then let us have them. Let us have them honestly; let us have them applied realistically, and have examinations made as to whether there is justification for price increases. I do not think any of these price increases, right along the line, from basic commodities right up to these coats for women and young girls, could have been justified if proper examinations had been made. I do not think we should continue to fool ourselves.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to make some remarks along the same line. I had intended raising this question, but it has been raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and by a number of others. When the house some time earlier in the summer was discussing the 12½ per cent increase in the price of agricultural implements I mentioned in the few remarks I made at the time that, before any price increases were granted, a public investigation should be held. I pointed out that when workers asked for increased wages they first had to convince their employers that such increase was justified. Then they had to go to the regional war labour board, either by way of a joint application with their employers or by way of an application by the organization representing them. If they were fortunate enough to get past the regional war labour board, then the matter went to the national war labour board.

However, when a company asks for an increase in prices of the commodities they are dealing in, they meet in private with the wartime prices and trade board and the public know nothing about it—mind you, it is the public who pay the shot—and the increases are granted or refused as the case may be. The question was discussed at considerable length in the industrial relations committee. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South mentioned, a telegram from a cost accountant working for the Steel Company of Canada was read. This telegram was addressed to myself, and it reads as follows:

Suggest you read lengthy telegram addressed to industrial relations committee at earliest opportunity. If our president continues using old figures I shall come to Ottawa to expose deception in public interest.

The chairman of the industrial relations committee received the lengthy telegram referred to, which in turn was referred to the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Gordon. On receipt of that, Mr. Gordon, we were told, sent chartered accountants—

Mr. ABBOTT: He had done so long before that.

Mr. MacINNIS: In any event the committee never got the report of the chartered accountants after they had gone into the plant following receipt of the telegram. That is one point I want to make. I have a letter from the same man. It is not confidential, and he states that a copy has been sent to the leader of each party in the house. I am going to read briefly from the letter. If any credence at all can be placed in it I think it supports the position I took in this house two or three months ago, that there should be public hearings before price increases are granted. We cannot allow representatives of companies to meet with officials of the government, no matter how trusted those officials may be, in private and then say that the information upon which the price increase was granted is confidential and cannot be made public. This man says:

Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, accepted the company's selection of facts—apparently without taking the precaution of indirectly contacting individuals acquainted with the costs which might be properly applied against a given period. I realize that Mr. Gordon is greatly overworked and has difficulty in finding and retaining competent men who neither own a business of their own nor plan to return to their previous employment in a particular industry. Nevertheless, I conceive it to be his duty to provide for brief public hearings before granting price increases or subsidies. It is beyond my comprehension that either the Steel Company of Canada Limited or the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board should be permitted to consider "confidential" any data so vitally affecting the cost of living of the Canadian people. Possibly I should add that public hearings in Hamilton would certainly have revealed that:

1. The Steel Company of Canada Limited was incurring out of pocket losses on some products and was therefore entitled to substantial price increases on such items.

2. Had these specific increases been granted, a general increase of $2—rather than $5—per ingot ton would have been quite adequate on all products of which the Steel Company of Canada Limited is the sole or principal producer.

3. The basic steel producers in Canada prefer to manufacture at a loss rather than allot unpopular sizes among themselves (with government cooperation if necessary) so that each could make a profit on the cumulative demand for most of his allotted sizes.

From the bluntness of my remarks, you may have received the impression that I am a member of some radical group. Nothing could be farther from the truth, as I usually vote for the Liberal party.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is that the letter to Mr. Gordon?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, the letter to Mr. Gordon is attached, one of the numerous letters to Mr. Gordon, I believe.

Mr. ABBOTT: The letter to Mr. Gordon was shown to me immediately it was received.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going to quote from the letter to Mr. Gordon.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was along the same line.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is attached to this one. I submit that it is only a matter of prudence for the administration, before an agency of this government grants price increases that affect the whole economy of this country in the way that these price increases have affected it, first to hold public hearings. I hope the government and the wartime prices and trade board will take note of this and see that such procedure is followed in the future if and when further price increases are asked for.

Mr. ABBOTT: I take it that letter is from Mr. Weber.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Weber wrote to the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board a month or two ago along the lines indicated in the letter which my hon. friend has read. I cannot say just when, but Mr. Gordon came to me and showed me the letter immediately it had been received. We came to the conclusion that if the charges in the letter were well founded they were most serious. With my authorization, the chairman of the prices and trade board retained Mr. Walter Gordon of Clarkson, Gordon and Company of Toronto, to investigate the matter. Mr. Gordon went there and he had ample time to do so. I do not know whether his investigation was completed at the time the industrial relations committee was sitting, but it is now and I am advised—I have not seen his report—that his report is that without qualification there is no foundation in the charges made in the letter to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are dealing here with a vote of some $11,000,000. As a matter of interest I was comparing it with the vote for the Department of Fisheries and I find it is a great deal larger. It seems to me that we should have a general statement from the acting minister with regard to this large enterprise which we are carrying on and on which we are spending $11,000,000. Various detailed questions have been asked and answered, but I suggest that we ought to have a brief general statement, without going into detail, of what has been accomplished, what controls have been abandoned, what controls are still being preserved and what is the objective that is guiding the board at the present time.

As I say, I realize that the minister cannot go into a lot of detail, but it seems to me that, when we are carrying on a business at the expense of $11,000,000, some attempt should be made to give us a picture of that business, to show us what is being attempted, what has been accomplished and what still remains to be done.

Mr. ABBOTT: The most recent comprehensive statement was made by the Minister of Finance on July 5 and will be found at page 3180 of Hansard. There is very little that I can add to-day to that statement. In addition, there is the report of the wartime prices and trade board covering the period from January 1 to December 31, 1945, and including important developments up to March 1, 1946. That report contains the general outline of the policy during that period and an indication of the policy for the future. There is nothing I can add to the carefully considered and comprehensive statement made by the minister five or six weeks ago.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I suggest that there have been certain important changes since that time.

Mr. ABBOTT: There really have been no changes because the minister's statement followed the change in the exchange rate between Canada and the United States and it followed the cessation of OPA in the United States. The minister indicated in considerable detail at that time the changes which were being made in our price control and economic stabilization policy to meet that situation. I could repeat what he said, but I am sure that is not what my hon. friend has in his mind. There is nothing I can add to what the minister set forth in his statement on July 5. The committee will recall that the question was fully debated on the want of confidence motion regarding agricultural implements. So that between those two debates I think the committee has a pretty comprehensive statement of government policy and intentions with respect to economic stabilization.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Acting Minister of Finance said that the special firm of auditors which had investigated the claims made by Mr. Weber of the Steel Company of Canada had made a report. Would the minister table it or furnish to the committee a copy of the facts contained in the report? It is not sufficient to say now that the report found that the contentions made by Mr. Weber were not well founded. I think we should have the report or the information contained in it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had not expected that this matter would be brough up. I can get the report. It may take me half an hour to get it. Then I would have to consider whether it was appropriate to ta' le it. Offhand I do not see any objection to tabling it. I will send for it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister make a statement regarding the supply of two necessary household commodities, soap and salt?

Mr. ABBOTT: The shortage of salt is a straight strike proposition, which has resulted in a stoppage of production. I have a statement here on oils and fats, which are related to soap.

It reads:

The world shortage of oils and fats is one of the most difficult supply problems we have to face. For a great many years Canada has been far from self-sufficient particularly in respect of vegetable oils. We are normally very large importers of vegetable oils and considerable importers of certain types of animal fats especially inedible tallow.

The current short position in Canada is due in part to reduced supplies of vegetable oils in foreign countries and in part to a decline in available lard produced in Canada. During the war years the serious reduction in vegetable oils was almost fully offset by increased lard production from Canadian hogs. During the past year we have had to face further declines in supplies of imported oils and at the same time a reduction in domestically produced lard.

The available world supplies of oils and fats are allocated by the international emergency food council. Canada has been allocated its fair share but during recent months there have been serious difficulties in the physical procurement of the allocated supplies. We believe that we are now in the midst of the most difficult period and we are hopeful that we can look forward to a moderate but steady improvement within the next two or three months. The wartime prices and trade board has taken a variety of measures to ease the impact of these shortages. It has allocated lard and shortening to bakers and other industrial users on the basis of 80 per cent of 1941 usage; it has encouraged the maximum diversion of suitable fats and oils to edible uses; through its compulsory de-fatting of carcasses order it has saved many millions of pounds of animal fats at the source, a high proportion of which would probably have gone to waste had it remained on the carcass through to the retail butcher and the final consumer; it has placed temporary limitations on the quantity of fats used in the production of soap.

The current shortage of soap is also due in part to shortages of caustic soda, the supply of which has been seriously diminished by reason of industrial disputes.

Mrs. STRUM: Is any collection of fats being carried on as was done some time ago, or has that been discontinued?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was done under national war services. That has lapsed, but the de-fatting order to which I referred has largely taken up the slack.

Mrs. STRUM: What about the household fats that accumulate in kitchens; is that not being used? It is not being collected now.

Mr. ABBOTT: It can be re-used by the housewife, of course, but no attempt has been made to collect that source of fat.

Mr NICHOLSON: I think the committee are not very well satisfied with the minister's statement regarding milk. A little earlier he made reference to OPA in the United States. While I agree that, on the whole, the performance of our wartime prices and trade board is better than that of OPA I noticed in the Ottawa Journal of August 28, yesterday, a dispatch from New York saying that:

Paul A. Porter, office of price administration administrator, said to-day he would insist on restoring ceiling prices in the United States for fluid milk and dairy products. He said he would ask for the ceiling price of June 30, with subsidies for fluid milk.

I submit that if in the United States they are taking that step with respect to fluid milk, the Canadian government might very well reconsider its decision to discontinue the producer subsidy on fluid milk.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is nothing in that. Their price of milk in the United States is seventeen to nineteen cents. The pricing of milk in Canada was turned back on June 1 to the provincial milk boards, which are free to impose any ceiling they see fit.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is not being turned over to the state authorities in the United States. The federal government there is taking the responsibility of seeing that the consumer will not pay more.

Mr. ABBOTT: In Canada we have the provincial milk boards. I do not think they have that in the United States. Our provincial milk boards are the best machinery to control the price of milk.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That was not the policy during the war. It was considered the responsibility of the federal government so that the cost of living might be kept down.

Mr. ABBOTT: With the abandonment of the consumer subsidy and the proposed abandonment of the producer subsidy, the control of the price of milk has been returned to the provincial milk boards.

Mr. DROPE: Would the minister say something further about the shortage of salt, which is getting worse and seriously affecting our cheese and creamery production. If something is not done to get a supply of salt, many of our cheese factories and creameries will be up against it to continue production. Would it not be possible to have salt imported from the United States to tide us over this shortage period?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that salt is pretty scarce in the United States. The shortage in Canada is entirely due to the industrial dispute in the C.I.L. plant at Windsor. If that can be settled the supply of salt will be increased.

Mr. DROPE: It is reported to me that many cheese factories are having to grind up rock salt to put in cheese, which is not good for the quality of our cheese. Something should be done to relieve the shortage, which is most serious.

Mr. GILLIS: I hate to bother the minister but he is tangled up with the most important agency in Canada, so that we have no alternative. I should like to know if any action has been taken by the wartime prices and trade board to remedy a serious defect which has become apparent in its machinery since its establishment. There should be greater cooperation or liaison between the wartime prices and trade board and the national war labour board, which fixes wages. There was a good deal of criticism in the industrial relations committee because of lack of coordination. While Mr. Gordon clearly stated that it was not the job of the wartime prices and trade board to fix wages, and there was no actual representative from the war labour board on his board, except the deputy Minister of labour, who sits in as an observer—

Mr. ABBOTT: He is a member of the board.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, in reality the wartime prices and trade board do fix wages. They set prices and ceilings beyond which wages cannot go, and in that way they definitely rule in the field of wages as in prices. Theoretically they may not, but practically they do. Perhaps many of the difficulties in the field of industrial unrest might have been avoided if there were some understanding and if an official representative of the wartime prices and trade board and the war labour board sat in and did one job. The committee, when they presented their report to the house, definitely recommended that there should be closer cooperation and some official contact. Has anything been done to implement that recommendation? I think the time has come when we should be perfecting that machinery.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can only answer by saying I am convinced that there is the closest liaison and cooperation between the two departments of government. There is a certain inconsistency in the hon. gentleman's remarks, because it seems to me, though I may be wrong, that only a month or so ago he was saying that it was not necessary to raise prices if wages were raised; that a wage rise did not necessarily mean an increase in prices.

Mr. GILLIS: I will not allow the minister to get away with that, because there was never any such statement on my part. What I did say was that an increase in wages did not necessarily mean an increase in prices or an increase in factory cost, because I actually put figures on the record from the Hamilton Steel Company to show why wages had gone up over 40 per cent, but the cost had come down proportionately as a result of increased productivity. That was true in that particular industry. I realize that it cannot happen in all, but the blanket statement attributed to me by the minister is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not suggest anything that could be taken as a blanket statement, but my hon. friend indicated pretty generally that a wage increase did not necessarily mean a price increase.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the item carries, I want to put something on the record. On August 28, 1939 I wired from Rivière du Loup to the Prime Minister as follows:

> War profiteers taking advantage of war scare to exploit people by raising price of necessary commodities of life sugar 45 cents flour 40 cents per bag in a few days stop It is a shame stop Please take means to stop it very urgent. Jean Francois Pouliot.
> Release to > Canadian Press, Mr. Flaherty—Ottawa.

Two days later, on August 30, I received the following wire from the Prime Minister:

> Jean Francois Pouliot
> Rivière du Loup, Q.
> Situation described in your telegram of yesterday will be given immediate attention of the government.
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

I put these on the record because, while I have been responsible to a certain extent for the creation of the wartime prices and trade board, I would not take the whole responsibility for it and for what it has done since its establishment, and I hope that the members of the board will do something other than try to justify their action when they refuse a reasonable request made by any member of parliament. We have an advantage over the members of the board in the fact that we live among the people and are in contact with them, and therefore we ask for a redress of their wrongs. I have a word to say in praise of Mr. Gordon for having closed the office in Cabano in my district. I prefer to have none than to have such trouble with a man who was making difficulty for all the good people who live there. I do not have so much to complain about the board in these later times, but I hope that when representations are made by any member of parliament we shall not speak to deaf ears.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: One question. Is it reasonable to presume that the minister is in favour of the continuation of the subsidy for milk in order to keep the cost of living down?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a matter which will be considered by the government, as I indicated earlier in the evening, and perhaps it would be improper for me as one member of the government to indicate my own views until the decision of the government as a whole is announced.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think the minister is going to do his best.

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not draw too hasty a conclusion.

Item agreed to.

489. Commodity prices stabilization corporation, $90,000,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister say a word about this? Unless there is a statement covering the situation, this seems tremendously important. It does not seem to cover the whole subsidy situation. I would suggest that we ought to have the subsidy picture, and I will ask the minister to deal with the question in a comprehensive way.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will ask the parliamentary assistant to give the detailed estimates.

To answer the latter part of the question, this does cover all subsidies with the exception of producer subsidies which may be paid in the Department of Agriculture and which have been covered, if any, in the estimates of that department. For instance, there is the producer milk subsidy, the one we have been discussing this evening. It is paid by the Department of Agriculture and provided for in the agriculture estimates.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But may I not ask the Department of Finance, which is the father and mother of all these things, to give us a complete picture of all our subsidies so that we may know what we are doing. This is an important part of our life. The impression sometimes gets abroad, I think, that in some mysterious way subsidies do not come out of our pockets, and therefore, it would be well to get the complete picture if we can.

Mr. MAYHEW: These are the estimates of the subsidies for the current fiscal year:

Coal and coke	$4,000,000
Fruits and vegetables, canned and dried	500,000
Iron	1,500,000
Milk consumers	6,600,000
Oils and fats	2,400,000
Rubber	900,000
Wood fuel	2,500,000
Woodenware and wooden containers	500,000
Miscellaneous	2,700,000

Then we have the trading losses:

Cocoa beans	$ 500,000
Coffee	4,000,000
Cotton yarn and fabrics	2,000,000
Dried fruit	3,000,000
Oils and fats	7,000,000
Tea	800,000
Wool and wool products	4,000,000
Miscellaneous	1,000,000

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does that total $90 million?

Mr. MAYHEW: Import subsidies $42,000,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do the items that the parliamentary assistant has read total $90,000,000?

Mr. MAYHEW: I left out Wartime Food Corporation Limited, $100,000; administration expenses, $1,200,000; making a total of $90,000,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where do oranges and other citrus fruits come in, in this total?

Mr. ABBOTT: They are not subsidized; other citrus fruits are not subsidized.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In connection with the firms that have been paid subsidies, would the parliamentary assistant indicate whether they came within the excess profits tax category at the same time? In other words, is the financial position of a corporation considered before a subsidy is granted? If a corporation was in the excess profits tax category, was a subsidy paid?

Mr. MAYHEW: We have profit control of most industries, but not on the import subsidies.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It would appear to me that, before a company became eligible to draw from the public exchequer, it should be necessary that information be submitted that the firm really required these payments before any subsidies were granted. The statement of the parliamentary assistant does not seem to me to be satisfactory.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have a question along the same line. How are these subsidies arrived at? Take the instance of coffee. It would seem to me that coffee would not be classed as a necessity; it could almost be looked upon as a luxury.

Mr. ABBOTT: We take a bulk trading loss on coffee. I do not know what the view of the committee is, but I do not think one can look on coffee as a luxury. I suppose 999 people out of 1,000 in the country have coffee or tea for breakfast every morning. It is just as much a part of their diet as bread is. These items are considered as being items in the ordinary average man's diet, and are not luxury items. So far as I know, there are no subsidies on items which can be classified as luxury items.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When a firm makes an application for a subsidy it would appear to me to be reasonable that the company should submit evidence that it could not operate and make a profit without it.

Mr. ABBOTT: It does that in order to get an import subsidy. The subsidy is granted in order to obtain supply, not to help the individual importer, but to enable the product to be sold under the domestic ceiling. That is the purpose of the import subsidy. When an importer applies for a subsidy he must show that, without the subsidy, he cannot sell under the ceiling.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Subsidies were paid not only on goods imported but on domestic goods.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, but in these cases, as the parliamentary assistant indicated, in most industries there is profit control. In the case of the flour subsidy, for instance, there is profit control, and in others. These are the domestic subsidies, but there is a system of profit control. If the person in receipt of the subsidy is in the 100 per cent bracket, to use a common phrase, then he does not receive the full subsidy. There is a profit control imposed, so that he will not receive the subsidy and at the same time retain the twenty per cent refundable portion of his tax. That has been rigorously enforced.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister indicate whether that has been followed throughout all the operations of the wartime prices and trade board? If a firm was in the category of an excess profits tax firm no subsidy would be paid on the operation?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know that I can say it is followed in all cases. I am advised that it is followed in the majority of cases.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is a matter of government policy, and it should be quite clear. If a firm was in the position where it was doing a better business than it had done in the basic period it would not seem to me to be in a position where it would require any subsidy.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I say, it is done in the majority of cases, but in some cases a firm was just not interested. It would say, we will not do business in this commodity; we have lots of others in which we can do business; let somebody else do the business. If it is an important factor in the distributing system we have to take action. In the vast majority of cases, in the cases which really count, that has been the policy which has been followed. In a good many cases the firms have not been too keen on it. They feel it is not fair. Nevertheless we have succeeded in establishing on the domestic subsidies a pretty comprehensive system of profit control and it has worked very well.

Mr. GILLIS: With regard to this $2,700,000 for the wood fuel industry, has the parliamentary assistant a breakdown province by province? How much wood was purchased under that subsidy arrangement?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am sorry to say we have not a breakdown of that item. The subsidy is paid by the commodity prices stabilization board, an agency of the board. This is where the vote is, but it is actually administered by the Department of Reconstruction, and in past years, as my hon. friend probably knows, it was administered by the Department of Munitions and Supply because the fuel controller is in that department.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not paid to the producer? That is what I am thinking of.

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. GILLIS: It is paid to the agency that sells it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: Can the minister obtain the figures province by province and place them on Hansard?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think the Department of Reconstruction and Supply can supply them. I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Reconstruction, to get the figures. I would hope that it might take a little longer than we are likely to be sitting here this session, but in any event we shall do the best we can.

Mr. McMASTER: Surely a subsidy on coffee would be so much a pound, or so much a hundred pounds. I cannot understand why it is given to anybody because they made a lot of money or did not.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a trading loss; it is not a subsidy. The corporation imports the coffee in bulk and sees that it is made available to be sold at ceiling prices. The trading loss on the coffee represents what would be the subsidy had it been paid pound by pound, but this is a more efficient and cheaper way of keeping down the cost of coffee than to pay a subsidy of so much per pound.

Mr. McMASTER: It amounts to the same thing; everybody is treated in the same way.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it may vary. To-day the corporation may be able to make a large purchase of coffee at the market price, but that particular purchase may be sold at the ceiling price without any loss at all. On the other hand, it may be necessary to take a loss on other purchases.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the fact that exchange is now at par make a considerable difference in favour of the finance department?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think it would be very helpful, yes. It is bound to be.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thought I had this clear in my mind, but the last remark of the minister has me fogged again. He spoke about a trading loss. First of all, I thought the agency referred to was the corporations themselves.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then the minister spoke about paying so much to the individual importer.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the government imports coffee and some wool, pays for these things and makes them available to the trade to be sold at ceiling prices. In most cases that results in a trading loss. That is the point I am trying to make clear.

Item agreed to.

490. Advances to Canadian wheat board for payments to millers and other manufacturers of wheat products, $18,000,000.

Mr. McKAY: What is the nature of these advances to manufacturers of wheat products?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the subsidizing down to 77⅜ cents from $1.25.

Mr. McKAY: The first part of that item has to do with the payments to millers, does it not? I am referring now to the manufacturers.

Mr. ABBOTT: This represents the payments to the millers. The subsidy is down from $1.25 to 77⅜ cents, and all these payments are subject to profit control, which was referred to by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many bushels would that represent? The difference between the 77⅜ cents and $1.25 is roughly 47 cents, and the total amount is about $18,000,000. That would be about thirty million bushels.

Mr. ABBOTT: It depends on the consumption. It is a mathematical problem, and an estimate. It covers all domestic uses—bread, cereals and so on.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The wheat board provides $1.25 for wheat milled in Canada.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. The subsidy to the miller is down to 77⅜, and that is subject to profit control.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That makes up for the difference, because this would mean that we use only 38,000,000 bushels in Canada. Our home consumption is about 60,000,000 bushels.

Mr. McKAY: Is the advance to the millers identical with the advance to cereal producers?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, the same.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MAYHEW: Before we leave, I promised the hon. member for Davenport to answer a question on rentals. It is a lengthy statement, and I am going to ask if I may put it on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it agreed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(The statement is as follows:)

Rental Regulations—Eviction Control.

The rental regulations have given some degree of security to tenants ever since rent control was first introduced. Until the summer of 1945 the landlord who wanted to occupy his own house could do so provided that he gave the tenant adequate notice. The regulations were changed from time to time, the length of notice varying from six to twelve months. Without this protection many landlords might have taken advantage of the shortage of housing to demand higher-than-ceiling rents on pain of immediate eviction. At the same time this protection prevented or minimized the inconvenience and suffering that would have been caused by virtue of the housing shortage.

During 1945 the shortage of housing became progressively more serious. Dwellings which were occupied by tenants were being sold in large numbers for early occupancy by the purchasers. At that time the purchaser could obtain possession of the house if it was needed for himself or for some member of his family on giving six months' notice to vacate. Tenants who had been served notice to vacate felt themselves compelled, in many cases, to purchase houses and, in turn, to serve notice to vacate on the tenants of these houses. By the early summer of 1945 the prospect of widespread evictions throughout the urban areas of Canada had created a serious social problem. In the city of Toronto alone, for example, there were some 3,500 notices to vacate maturing in the three summer months. Many of these notices to vacate had been served upon families or dependents of veterans. There was no alternative accommodation for the many thousands of people involved across Canada. Consequently, the Government instructed the Prices Board to enlarge the existing system of tenant protection. This was done by Order 537, which imposed an indefinite "freeze" upon all tenants. At the same time, all outstanding notices to vacate were suspended.

In order to be fair, those purchasers or landlords who had given the tenants the proper notice to vacate were permitted to go before a court of rental appeals for a hearing. The decisions of the appeal judges in thes cases were based upon an assessment of the relative burden of hardship involved as between landlord and tenant. The one other exception to this indefinite "freeze" related to discharged service personnel.

The government recognizes that, in freezing virtually all leases relating to self-contained accommodation, it has drastically interfered with the normal rights of the property owner. This action is justified as an emergency measure designed to avoid far greater dislocation and social distress. Notwithstanding the many individual cases that can be shown to exist where the regulation works great hardship on a man who had purchased a home for the occupation of himself and his family, the situation would be far more desperate if the regulation did not exist. If this regulation were not in force to-day, it would be found that the turnover in houses would be enormously greater, tens of thousands of families would be under threat of eviction, and virtually every tenant family would feel itself insecure. At the same time, the enforcement of rental ceilings would be impossible, in many cases, if landlords were free to give notice to vacate to their tenants, or to threaten to give such notice. It is the extreme housing shortage which has created this situation, and nothing short of a considerable increase in the supply of housing will make it possible to relax this extra-contractual system of tenant protection.

The government is aware that some people have bought houses since order 537 was issued in ignorance of the fact that they could not obtain possession for occupancy. There have been cases where the sellers or the agents concerned have refrained from advising the purchaser of this condition. The government has done everything it can to acquaint the people with the existence of this regulation and cannot be expected to rectify situations of this kind in favour of the purchaser without nullifying completely the purpose of the regulation. It should be noted that, while order 537 sometimes operates to make it impossible for a veteran to move into a house which he has purchased in recent years, a much greater number of veterans and veterans' families are protected, as tenants, by the regulation in question.

Special provisions relating to veterans.

The "freeze" in question (order 537) does not apply in certain cases where veterans are involved. Under order 511, passed May 14, 1945, where a veteran (or his wife) owned a dwelling at the date of enlistment, he is entitled to obtain possession of the property for his own occupation on giving the tenant a specified notice, which is never less than three months. The other exception in favour of veterans relates to the case where the accommodation was occupied by a veteran at the date of enlistment and where the veteran is closely related to the landlord. In such a case the landlord may give the tenant a specified notice to vacate in order to rent the property to the veteran in question. These exceptions to the "freeze" are fair and equitable. They have the effect of enabling many veterans to re-occupy premises which they owned and which they had rented to others while serving with the armed forces, or which they had rented from relatives previous to joining up.

In the case of multiple-family buildings order 511 also allows a landlord to dispossess a tenant (after at least three months' notice) in order to rent the accommodation to a veteran who is a close relative of the landlord in question. This further exception to the general "freeze" was also made in the interests of veterans and was supported by representations from veterans' organizations.

The evictions of tenants which are taking place to-day relate mainly to cases of this sort, or to cases originally decided under order 537 where the balance of hardship was decided by a judge in favour of the landlord, and where the notice to the tenant has now matured.

It must be admitted that in certain cases it sometimes happens that both parties are veterans, and one veteran may be evicted in favour of another. This only goes to demonstrate the difficulty of extending still further the list of exemptions to the "freeze" on tenants.

Conclusion

The protection now given to tenants was introduced in 1945 because of the emergency caused by the shortage of housing. In that situation it was necessary to take drastic steps to call a halt to the movement of tenants in the interest of the greatest good of the greatest number of people. To be effective, it was necessary to keep the number of exemptions to the rule to a minimum, and the exemptions have been mainly in favour of veterans. The protection of tenants undoubtedly inflicts hardship on a small minority of landlords, and the exemptions in favour of veterans also work hardship on a small number of tenants. In recognizing this we should not forget that the regulations are intended to serve the interests of the majority of people, and by and large that objective has been achieved.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that it was the desire of a large number of members to continue the discussion of these items of supply beyond eleven o'clock and to resume again at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. If that is the desire of the hon. members I would be glad to move:

That standing order 7 be suspended, and that from this day to the end of the present session Mr. Speaker do adjourn the house at twelve o'clock midnight instead of eleven o'clock p.m., and that the adjournment be to ten o'clock a.m. instead of eleven o'clock a.m. the following day, notwithstanding the resolution passed in the house on July 22 last.

If it is the desire of hon. members that that be done, I beg leave to submit this motion, although I would not wish to insist upon it if it did not meet with the wish of hon. members.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

369. Departmental administration, $199,115.

Mr. HOMUTH: I realize, Mr. Chairman, what a difficult position you have in your dual capacity of Deputy Speaker of the house and chairman of committees. There is one question I should like to raise, and I think I can raise it on this vote. I do not believe I shall be out of order in doing so because the vote has to do with salaries.

I raise the question at this time because, like many others in this country, I am somewhat worried about the trend of trade in the British empire. We have seen something of what our empire agreements meant to this country, and now we find that at a time like this, with shortages of materials, there is a tendency to open the flood-gates of trade without realizing what may happen in the future. One of the reasons I took so much interest in the industrial relations committee is that I realize that if we in Canada build up an expensive manufacturing policy we shall not be able to compete with foreign countries where wages are much lower and living conditions are quite different.

I think I know the British trader pretty well. I remember the empire conference in Canada, in which I took some part, I know something of the trade which is carried on within the empire, and of the businesslike way in which British traders go to work. I think the minister himself will admit that when it comes to a question of trade, when it comes to a question of making a deal, they do not think of the empire. They think of what kind of deal they can make; and they are pretty hard-headed dealers. The result is that we have to watch ourselves because, in the first place, in the United States and Canada we have the highest wage rates of anywhere in the world. We then come to England which has the second highest; France, Belgium, Denmark, Holland and those sections of western Europe the third highest; Germany and the Balkan states fourth highest; Russia and the neighbouring countries fifth highest, and what we call the eastern part of the world is sixth highest.

Those are the things we have to fight against. If we want to maintain our type of livelihood; if we mant to maintain our living conditions, we have to be most careful in our trade relations. So that I raise this point to-night, not because of this one particular item, but because of the effect it may have on the general trade of the country.

I do not think anyone would accuse me of reading speches, because that is not my practice. However, if to-night I refer to some material I have prepared I do so because I wish to set out certain points which are reviewed in an editorial which appeared in one of the local papers of the province of Quebec. The other day I chanced to read the leading editorial in the August 1 issue of the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph. I shall not read it in its entirety, but it first sketches the measures which this session of parliament has passed to aid the British people in their heavy and worthy fight for post-war economic rehabilitation.

We all know what those measures have been. We have made available a billion dollars credit. We have agreed to furnish wheat at $1.55 a bushel instead of at a much higher price, which we might have exacted. We have given wide encouragement to British imports, especially manufactured goods.

May I just for the moment say this, that never were imports from Great Britain higher than they are at the present time. While I am not objecting to them, I want hon. members to realize what effect they may have on the future labour situation in the Dominion of Canada.

Finally, we refrained from formal protest, despite our rights under empire trade agreements, against the banning of Canadian manufactured imports from Great Britain, and at a time when we realized that the British people were short of Canadian dollars and had to conserve all their slender supply for the purchase of foodstuffs.

In other words, under the British empire agreements there are certain standards on which we could have stood solid, and said, "You are not living up to your agreement." We did not do so. I realize, of course, that hon. members look upon this party as the party of protection in Canada. I am quite proud to say that, to a limited degree, that is so. We did not protest against this because we realized that here was an international situation, here was an empire situation that meant much to the British people who had sacrificed so heavily when the war was on. We were prepared to do our part to help them obtain so-called American dollars which, in fact, were our dollars.

After referring to all-out cooperation with the British people in their present critical economic struggle, the Quebec Chronicle Telegraph goes on to call attention to a specific British treatment of a Canadian interest which, in the light of all pertinent considerations, seems completely ungracious and to call definitely for correction. The editorial says:

> For over half a century Canadian Club or rye whiskey had been imported into the United Kingdom prior to the late war, during which time such a wide popularity was developed for the brand at great expense and effort that it became literally a household word. The last permit for the importation of Canadian Club into the United Kingdom was granted, however, in January, 1941, and since that time repeated applications for further permits have been made without avail. As a result, the good will obtained through the years is being rapidly lost, and will have to be reestablished again, if it can be done, by means of fresh effort and expense.

The editorial then goes on to say that the British attitude is made completely inexplicable by the fact that during the period in which Canadian Club has been persistently embargoed, the United Kingdom has imported spirits from no less than fifteen other foreign and empire countries. In this connection the editorial comments—and I confess I cannot bring myself to disagree from the observation—that these imports came from countries whose governments—

> . . . take a lively interest in the present and future prospects of their products, while both the Ottawa Department of Trade and Commerce and Canada House remain continuously asleep at the switch.

I say that, not unkindly.

[Mr. Homuth.]

This discrimination against a Canadian product by the United Kingdom authorities seemed so inexplicable to me that I could hardly believe the facts were being correctly stated. I took the trouble, therefore, to look up the most recent official figures of imports of spirits by Britain. Realizing that they had this embargo against them, to my amazement I found that the situation was precisely as the editorial had represented it. During the first four months of this year, spirit imports into the United Kingdom totaled 778,699 proof gallons as against 313,486 proof gallons in the corresponding pre-war period. On their very face, these figures established that, at a time when spirit imports are being barred from Canada by the United Kingdom authorities, they are being admitted at more than twice their pre-war volume from other countries.

I wonder if the minister, in whose qualities of tact and diplomacy we all have the highest confidence—and I say that in all sincerity, because I have had a lot to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce in the pre-war period when we were trying to sell to France and other countries, and on those occasions I found no one more cooperative than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I make that statement in all sincerity. I believe he has done everything he could, but I point out that here is something which, while on the surface it might appear unimportant, is in fact of considerable importance. It is important because everything we can sell in a foreign country is important to Canada.

So I say that I believe the minister could do a job in this instance. I believe that, in the interests of the continuance of the close relationship into which we have entered with the British people at the present time, no element of injustice should be left in the picture to breed possible future dissensions. I believe firmly in all the measures we have taken this session to assist the British people economically. But I do not believe that we should acquiesce in discrimination against our trade and see imports, with which we should certainly be allowed to compete, brought in from other countries. It may be that this matter of importing these spirits may not be thought to be important, but I want to remind the minister that, it does not matter what is exported, it is important for the people of Canada. I do not care what we import; it is important for the people of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, you represent a highly industrialized riding as I do. You have in your riding farmers and a rural population. We have to be careful that what we do to-day will be a precedent for the future. We have to do these things in a way that will look after our working men. We have a fight on for higher wages which are supposed to represent better living conditions. I am all for it, but if those higher wages and that type of living conditions are going to jeopardize our position economically with the rest of the world, with low wage countries, with Russia which to-day economically and industrially is the biggest threat we have to face, then I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we must be careful. He should make a strong protest to the government of Great Britain and make them realize that they cannot do these things against Canada.

Mr. BURTON: I had hoped that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would have opened this discussion with a general statement of the work of his department. I—and no doubt other hon. members—am somewhat perturbed at our lack of knowledge as to just what is going on in the department. Even though we are getting toward the close of the session, we still insist that we have some information in that regard. As far as I am concerned, when the next session rolls around, unless the minister can make arrangements with those who set the orders of the day so that we can have his estimates somewhat sooner, I am going to be prepared to stay a lot longer even though I have to bring a cot into the corridors in order to be able to stick it out.

As I say, we are all concerned about what is going on. Whom are we trading with? What are we trading for? How many trade envoys and other personnel have we? What are they doing?

An hon. MEMBER: Good work.

Mr. BURTON: Some one says, "good work", but that is what we want to have the minister tell us. As I said a moment ago, I was disappointed that we had not a statement from the minister.

Mr. MacKINNON: He has not had a chance.

Mr. BURTON: We hope they are doing good work, but we should like to know more about the work they are doing. We should like to know whether they are all doing good work or only some of them. We should like to know whether some are just making good fellows of themselves at somebody else's expense. We want to know what they are doing in the different countries.

When the meat board estimate was up for discussion I said something which I think I should repeat. Those people who represent us in different countries should make an effort to sell our articles to the people of those countries. If I am not mistaken, some countries have adopted a policy by which they attempt to follow their products, bacon for instance, right through to the distributor, so that the people buying that product will be certain that they are getting what they think they are getting under a proper trade name. There are many things like that we should have liked to discuss with the minister.

We should like to know whether we are just trading for the sake of trading, or whether we are trading to improve the living standards of the people of this country, in the first place, and to help people in other parts of the world who need help, in the second place. In trading, I realize it is necessary to operate with the idea of having a fair exchange of goods between countries. I realize that with some countries having had to face war for six years or longer economic conditions have been upset. I realize it is difficult to get off to a proper start. But I would point out that when we are trading we should always bear in mind that the people of our country—I have pointed this out in the house time after time—are entitled to a decent standard of living from the things they are able to produce from our natural resources.

We do not want to curtail in any way the movement of necessary supplies that can be sent to the countries that need them. Very often officials in the department become so much concerned with the carrying on of trade that they remind me of some of the old horse traders we used to have in the days when horses had still some attraction to many people. Many of those men traded horses just for the sake of trading, even though at times they might not make anything out of it. I am afraid we still have some old fashioned horse traders in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

As I told the minister last session, the department should become a little more up to date. In this connection I should like to quote from a letter which I received from a person who lives forty or fifty miles from my own home and which arrived only this morning. The things which he says in this letter are causing me considerable concern, because I know they apply not only to that neighbourhood but fairly generally over the prairie provinces. He said:

> Crops that looked like 40 bushels to the acre were caught by first—six weeks drought that burned them up bad. A heavy frost came on July 22. Then we had a hail storm that further reduced the yield and then to top it off, when we started to cut, all the low spots in the grain were under water. Result, about 15 bushels to the acre of grade No. 3 or 4.

So many people were going about the country talking about a bumper wheat crop as if it were in the bag already, when the wheat was only coming into the head. This writer continues:

Of course we cannot buck the elements, and years of adversity, as well as a few good crops have taught us to take things as they come. But when man-made laws interfere with garnering the little crop we have got, it is time to complain.

May I interject here that when I have an opportunity to speak with this man I shall try to explain to him that it is not only man-made laws he has to contend with, because very often officials in certain departments who like to show their authority put a few additional regulations into effect. I just point that out, because often some people would lead us to believe that it is the law which is interfering with the free movement of people and trade, when often it is not the law but regulations. When we are talking about trade we should never forget that our best customers are the people right here in Canada. We must remember the importance of trading with our people in the various provinces of this country. When this man complains of man-made laws I want to emphasize that very often the real fault is man-made regulations which have not the status of law, although some people would like to put that over. He goes on to say:

I have a plough on order, paid for over a year ago, but cannot get it. There are thousands of acres waiting to be swathed and combined, but machinery is not available. So we fetched out the old binder but repairs are hard to get. You have really no idea of the thousands of dollars that are spent every day on telephone calls to locate some piece of machinery or repair, and the thousands spent on travelling from town to town to locate some sorely needed piece of repair—not counting the loss of time.

That is the condition which also prevailed last year. I remember I was in a little town about twenty-five miles from my home one day and I met a man who lived another twenty-five miles from there. We went into a little cafe and had a bite to eat, and he told me that he had spent all that day chasing up and down the country from one point to another trying to locate a few repairs he needed for his machine so that he could go ahead with his harvesting. This writer continues:

Two of my neighbours travelled all the way to Wisconsin, the only place where they could get repairs for their tractor and other machinery.

[Mr. Burton.]

That is a fine how-do-you-do. We go to work and export farm machinery and parts to the United States, and then some of our own Canadians have to cross the line to get repairs they need for their own machines to take the crop off in this country, crops that not only we in this country need but other people whom we are proposing to help by sending them food and machines and other things.

As I said before, I want to cooperate as much as possible with the minister, but there are some questions which we want answered, and I can assure the minister that he will have the appreciation not only of myself but also of my colleagues if he will so arrange matters with the powers that be who make the orders of the day for this house that his estimates come up for consideration earlier in the session.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a few words, Mr. Chairman. But first let me say to the hon. member for Humboldt that if he wants that procedure to be followed in the house he should not say that he will tell us more than he has done to-day because, if he does that, the estimates may come only after the session is over. If he really wants to have the estimates brought up for consideration earlier in the session, he must state that he will speak with great brevity, make no long speeches.

Mr. BURTON: I can assure the hon. member that I have not taken up one fraction of the time he has in delaying the consideration of these estimates.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend must not consider what I said as a reproach. It was a most amicable suggestion because I want the same thing too, and I will tell the minister that if he will bring his estimates up earlier in the session I will make only five-minute speeches in the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell you that trade and commerce is the most important department in this country now that the war is over. Trade is the very lifeblood of our country, and those who do not believe that have not the least notion of the needs of this country in the postwar period. We have no information at all about trade. Trade does not exist. A trade of gifts, a Santa Claus trade, is not trade at all. Santa Claus is not a big merchant; he is not a big business man. But Canada is Santa Claus.

Mr. PARENT: Santa Claus makes a lot of money.

Mr. POULIOT: No; other people make a lot of money through Santa Claus. Santa Claus is not a businessman, according to one of the greatest men whom my hon. friend admires and supports so much, Doctor Chisholm. According to Doctor Chisholm, Santa Claus does not exist.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I am here to do my duty and I will perform it. This is not a joke at all. Trade is the most important thing in this country in the post-war period. It is important to the businessman, to the farmer, to the country storekeeper, to all those who are engaged in trade. All the men employed in industry benefit from trade, and if they ever knew that in this House of Commons a member who defends them is interrupted by some hecklers who are anxious to go home, and who unfortunately do not go, they would be astounded. How can a man go before the electors of his constituency and ask for their votes when he is untrue to his duty as a member of parliament and when he does not realize the importance of trade in the post-war period? I am most indignant on behalf of my constituents at these interjections, and I should like the constituents of those members who shouted out a moment ago to be here in this House of Commons and see the sad performance of their representatives in these late hours of the session.

If the estimates come before us late in the session, it is not our fault. These are some of the most important estimates that come before us because, if the Department of National Revenue succeeds in collecting taxation, it is precisely because of the benefits that will have come through trade to our merchants and to all our people in this country. Therefore trade is a vital thing, and it is just as vital for the farmers as it is for the industrialists and the working men.

What is the first condition of trade? The first condition of trade is economic independence. I repeat now what I said during the war, and which was not denied by a Tory to the core like the former leader of the opposition, the former member for York-Sunbury, Mr. Hanson: We must be economically independent. That is just as true as sunlight at noon. We must be economically independent, meaning by that that our commercial agents and representatives abroad shall not be under the tutelage of any other country and shall not have to report to British consulates, agents and British ambassadors.

The minister will remember that when the only consul general that we have, Mr. Scully, was appointed to New York, the Prime Minister announced that he would work in close cooperation with the British authorities. That is on record in Hansard. It is a fact, and if the position of our agent were such that there should happen to be a difference between English and Canadian businessmen, the Canadians should have the full support of our government. But in order to have it they should be prefectly independent and should not say to those of other countries, "Go ahead and we will follow you." I do not say that for the purpose of deprecating the merits of the minister, because I have profound admiration for him and, besides that, he is a personal friend of mine. But in these matters we must try to be realists and must realize the importance of both export and import trade. I have the more sympathy for the minister in that he is not the master of his department. There is the stabilization board, which is under the Minister of Finance, and he has also to wait for permits from the wartime prices and trade board, et cetera, et cetera. We are not free to export what we have. There are so many controls that the Canadian producer, the Canadian manufacturer, or the Canadian exporter is not free to trade with other nations, while the trade of other nations is made the easier. There are so many entanglements here that it is most difficult for any Canadian producer to ship his produce abroad to any other country in the world.

The first consideration in regard to trade being economic independence, the second is that we should sell at world prices; and of course it is not done in that way, because we sell at prices which are established by agreements. The Minister of Finance, on May 6, at page 1228-9 of Hansard, gave information about subsidies that are paid: For wheat flour, $147,000,000; fisheries products, $12,000,000; meat, eggs and cheese, $130,000,000, or a total of $273,005,422. It has been paid in part by a balance of $160,236,000 owing to the United Kingdom for the maintenance of Canadian troops in the United Kingdom and in theatres of operation between April 1, 1943, and February 28, 1945. I will not say now what I think of the controls at present. I will not say all I think of them, but I say that it is wrong, and I regret very much the inferiority complex of all the men in charge of public affairs, their inferiority complex toward graduates of Oxford, Cambridge and other universities. I find we need the least possible number of those men in all departments, including the Department of Trade and Commerce. What we need is men of experience and business standing like the minister himself, but his aides should be equal to himself.

We hear a good deal about the scarcity of wheat in England and it is very strange, but I always have something up my sleeve to establish the veracity of what I say. We are told they have no flour in England, and yet I have here the third letter that was sent to Mr. Emile Ouellette, a grocer of Riviére du Loup, by Peek Frean's Company Limited of London. It is impossible to get Canadian biscuits in any store here. One may get only a package at a time, and yet this is the third letter from Peek Frean's Biscuits to Mr. Ouellette. It is dated June 10, 1946 and reads:

Dear Sirs,

We beg to refer to our export price-list dated February 1946, and have to inform you that, as a result of the increased cost of ingredients and manufacture, we have found it necessary to adjust the price of our Vita-Weat (Regd.) Crispbread in order to maintain the high standard of this product.

All orders dated as from to-day, therefore, will be subject to the net prices shown below.

How is it, if flour is so scarce over there, they can send us biscuits made in England when we cannot get Canadian biscuits over here? As regards the wheat business, I do not know what will be the understanding in connection with world agreements compared with British agreements, but in the United States the price of wheat is $2.10 and at Fort William $1.55, or a difference of fifty-five cents. On daily shipments of a million bushels the loss to the Canadian farmer is $550,000, or a loss over 300 days of $165,000,000. There was a subsidy of $14,300,000 to the wheat pool. It is a little more this year.

The London surplus wheat, mostly Canadian, was a million tons, and on United States pressure 200,000 tons has been shipped to the continent. It is exploitation. Why not follow the example of Peron, the President of the Argentine, who has exchanged amicable messages with Canada? The government in the Argentine bought all wheat at $5. It sold part of it to Peru for $9 and the other part to the Argentineans for $2, so that the exports paid for the cheap sales to the people living within the country. That is an admirable policy. Why, therefore, should we have the kind of policy on wheat that we have when there is a world price that we could get and get across the border, and get anywhere, and which the farmers do not receive? A huge amount is paid in subsidies for wheat, but the farmers are not satisfied because, even with those subsidies, they make a loss of $165,000,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind the hon. member that the item with regard to wheat, under the Department of Trade and Commerce, item 375, was passed some time ago. It has already been approved by the committee. A discussion on wheat and grain at this time would not be in order.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, it is the practice to discuss everything connected with the department on the item of administration, because all that is done with regard to wheat, meat, milk and everything else and all the subsidies are controlled by the personnel of the department. The item that we are on is precisely the personnel of the department; but, as you insist, I shall not say much more, but I will ask questions.

Mr. DECHENE: Three cheers.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will make my speech, and I will ask the hon. member, who is an old member, to keep quiet.

Mr. DECHENE: I will not keep quiet for a mountebank like you; just turn the other way.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member does not impress me at all.

Mr. DECHENE: Just a mountebank.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just as cool as a block of ice, and if he were the same he would keep quiet.

Mr. DECHENE: You are just a mountebank.

Mr. POULIOT: I would suggest to him to keep quiet. I have never been bullied by anyone, and the one who would bully me is not yet born. I say that definitely to him. He may frown at me, and he may curse me, but it is absolutely indifferent to me.

Mr. DECHENE: Surely you have earned your money now.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DECHENE: Do we have to stand for this?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DECHENE: There must be some rules of the house—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I drew the hon. member's attention to the fact that the item concerning wheat had been settled and the hon. member stated that he would not continue discussing wheat. The hon. member for Temiscouata is in order to discuss other matters. He has the floor.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you, sir. I shall ask some questions of the minister. I shall not ask him to answer me now. My questions will appear in Hansard, and I shall request him to tell his officials to send me the information asked for at the earliest possible opportunity. It may be after parliament has prorogued, but I shall not mind having them in September, which seems to be reasonable.

What was the subsidy on bacon and ham sent to Great Britain under Mutual Aid? What quantity did we ship to the United Kingdom in 1944, 1945 and 1946? What was the subsidy each year? Then, with regard to milk, what has been paid on the domestic production of milk? What quantity of powdered milk and cheese has been sent each year to the United Kingdom, and what has been the subsidy paid on it?

The reason why I do not agree with all the policies of the Department of Trade and Commerce is that we have built up a one-way trade with the United Kingdom at great sacrifice, and we are paying taxation for it. I do not see why we do not take advantage of the facilities that we have in this country to trade with other countries of the world.

I have other questions to ask the minister, but I should like to have a complete list of the subsidies which have been paid on food especially by the government so as to know what encouragement has been given to the export trade.

Before closing, I have only one more remark to make, namely, that the payments which are made to us are made from gifts and loans which we have made. It is most extraordinary, because our exports are paid for by taxation. When Mr. Bennett was in power I was interested in statistics on imports and exports, but at the time Canada was paying for her imports and our exports were paid for by the countries which received our goods. At the present time we are paying for both. We pay for the imports which come from the outside and we also pay by taxes for the exports that are made to other countries, because all the loans, Mutual Aid, et cetera, et cetera, come down to taxes. I sympathize with the minister; I mean it; I know of the obstacles he has in his way; I know the difficulties he has to surmount to reestablish Canadian trade as it was before.

We have great facilities to trade with other countries of the world, especially South America. To-day there are not many difficulties because we can practise barter; we can practise barter with all the countries of the world, and we should follow those trade practices. Great Britain indulges a lot in barter and they make a success of their trade. When we are told that we should have the trade of Great Britain it is forgotten that the trade of Great Britain is better now than it was before the war. Official statistics are to that effect, and the news has appeared in the press. It is not a question of not being a good Britisher to say that Canada must go ahead and have the best possible trade as we had before. We have made gifts. It is time for us to think of ourselves and to give the greatest possible impulses to our own trade. I know that the minister understands me and I hope that he will be sympathetic to these suggestions.

Mr. FRASER: I believe the minister is going to make a statement.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I certainly have no wish to hold up the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I think it is fit and proper that I should make a brief statement on the estimates that we are asking the committee to approve.

Mr. FRASER: When the minister makes his statement will he mention the brief which was sent to him by the manufacturers' association and tell us what he intends to do about it?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not just sure which brief the hon. member for Peterborough West is referring to at the moment, but I can assure him—and I am sure he is aware of this—that the Department of Trade and Commerce works in close and helpful contact with the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The work that the Department of Trade and Commerce is doing to-day for the manufacturers and producers of Canada is highly appreciated.

I should like to refer, for a moment, to the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo South. The import licensing system being operated by the United Kingdom authorities is basically dictated by their shortage of dollars and the need to devote their resources to the purchase of essentials. Early this year we were able to make arrangements which should ultimately lead to ensuring that those who have had a past history of trade with the United Kingdom will not be completely excluded from the market on the basis that their product is non-essential, but will be allowed to make at least token shipments pending the removal of import controls, to which objective the British as well as we are striving.

This arrangement for token shipments is beginning to work in respect of a limited list of commodities, and it is expected that the list will be extended from time to time. We are continually working on this matter with the United Kingdom authorities, but so far the United Kingdom does not include whiskies in the permitted list.

During this difficult transition period, and at least until the acceptance of principles which it is hoped will be adopted in the forthcoming trade talks, the choice as to how the United Kingdom will use its limited supply of dollars is, in the last analysis, a matter on which the United Kingdom insists on making the decision. Frankly, as long as bread is being rationed in the United Kingdom it is difficult for Canada to insist on any particular export to that country.

Before going into the details of the different votes for the Department of Trade and Commerce, I am glad to make a brief preliminary statement on the major activities which the Department has in hand, more especially on those activities which occasion the chief increases that I am asking the committee to approve in the estimates for the current year.

The aggregate increase in the estimates for the department runs into a substantial figure—roundly $3,175,000—and I should perhaps emphasize the fact that the responsibilities of the department are spread over a much wider field than, I believe, is generally appreciated.

Roughly, one-third of the total increase, or something over a million dollars, is required for the six divisions that make up the foreign trade service. Here, during the remainder of this fiscal year, we are going to have to meet heavy additional costs if we are to be in a position to provide all the facilities that are needed to prosecute our trade with other countries in the most effective way. The main additional costs are those connected with the extension of our trade commissioner offices abroad, and of our trade publicity programme, both in Canada and in other countries. We shall have to make added expenditures also, but on a lesser scale, in order to place our headquarters organization here at Ottawa on a basis that will ensure that we can give the most efficient support to the men who are carrying on trade promotion in the field. Since the close of hostilities, we have made good headway in reopening our offices abroad, but there is still a great deal to be done in that direction before we can feel satisfied that we are adequately equipped to assist both import and export trade.

The heaviest increase in the votes for the current year, even larger than that for the foreign trade service, will be found in the estimates for the dominion bureau of statistics. Here the increase, compared with last year, amounts to roundly $1,360,000. Most of this is needed to cover the cost of the regular quinquennial census of the prairie provinces now being taken. However, there is a considerable increase also in connection with the bureau's general statistical work. This is mainly to take care of new lines of statistical investigation which were initiated by the war departments during the war years and which are now to be continued—but only in so far as they are considered to be essential—by the dominion bureau. May I emphasize the fact that great care is being taken to continue permanently only those wartime statistical developments that are really indispensable to the work of one or other of the departments of the government. We have in the dominion bureau of statistics a national institution of which we may all well be proud. The demands that are made upon the bureau for the extension of statistical work are literally endless and unceasing. There is no such thing as finality in limiting the kind and scope of the work which the bureau has to undertake, but I am satisfied that the utmost care is being exercised by the senior officials at the bureau to see that new work is taken on and new expenditures incurred only in connection with national statistical needs that cannot be put aside except to the actual and serious detriment of the public or of one branch or another of the public service.

May I add just a brief further word with reference to three or four other sections of the department which call for relatively small increases in this year's appropriations, but which, nevertheless, discharge very large responsibilities?

The work carried on by the board of grain commissioners relating to the grading and inspection of grain and to the management of the government elevators is, in itself, an enormous business, one which affects in the most vital way the world-wide trade of this country in grain and grain products.

Again, we now have in the Department of Trade and Commerce the Canadian travel bureau. The work of this bureau during the next few years is bound to be of the utmost importance in rebuilding a type of trade, which I think everyone regards as one of the most promising avenues of Canadian commercial development for many years to come.

Further, we are now in process of reviving the Canadian government exhibition commission, which was dismantled and dormant during the war years. In the field of international exhibitions an active period lies immediately ahead of us. Within recent months Canada has received invitations to participate in numerous exhibitions and trade fairs abroad, and I am convinced that in a business way Canada has much to gain by getting a first-class exhibitions organization set up as quickly as possible. Attention is being given to that need.

Finally, I should mention a group of three services in the department which, although they are not much in the public eye, discharge duties of great importance to the buying public. These include the weights and measures inspection, the electricity and gas inspection and the administration of the Precious Metals Marking Act—all designed to protect the Canadian public over a wide range of their consumer purchases. Work of this type—inspection of scales, electric meters and so on—requires highly competent technical officers, and it is a class of work in which there is likely to be material expansion within the next few years.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to pass over to the minister some remarkable articles from the pen of Mr. Lorenzo Paré, of the press gallery. They appeared in L'Action Catholique in May, and they relate to subsidies for exports to the United Kingdom. The minister's officials may have an opportunity to read them later on; and, if he has them translated, as I hope he will, I will ask him to send me an English copy which I will send to one of my colleagues for his information and education in trade matters—the one who has just said "carried".

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the hon. member for Waterloo South made some reference to the necessity of keeping costs of production down in order that we may get our due share of export trade. I have not the slightest doubt that representations will be made in that regard to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that they will be supported by some manufacturers with a view to lower wages. But I would suggest to the minister that he consider carefully pleas of that kind, because they may not be all they claim to be.

Those of us who have been interested in political affairs for some time will remember that certain textile companies in the province of Quebec, late in 1935, or early in 1936, made representations to the present government, which had just been elected to office, urging increased protection on cotton goods because of the competition with Great Britain, and for increased protection on rayon because of competition with Japan; and they threatened that, if such protection were not given, their plants might be closed.

The government of the day, to its credit, did not accede to those demands, and appointed a royal commission to investigate. It is some little time since that royal commission made its report, but I would just suggest to hon. members that the report is well worth reading, and particularly the brief presented by counsel appointed to assist the commissioner who, in this instance, was the Hon. Mr. Justice W. F. A. Turgeon. The counsel was Mr. J. C. McRuer, who at the present time is chief justice of the trial division of the supreme court of Ontario. Mr. McRuer began his brief with these striking, perhaps I might say startling, expressions:

> A shameful, sickening, story of heartless exploitation and wholesale robbery by men prominent in the public life of Canada. Inordinate greed, barefaced lying and criminal fraud characterize the careers of this gang of high-class crooks.

These were the leaders in the cotton manufacturing industry. Their plea was that, because of foreign competition and what they considered the high wages they were paying to their employees, they could not meet that competition. But when the commission had made its investigations and completed its findings, it found, as revealed in the report, that the wages paid were less than those paid to coolie labour in China.

Another gentleman who held the position of associate counsel with Mr. McRuer said this, in his brief respecting competition:

> It is destructive competition that maintains wages at a low level. When responsibility does not rest with foreign competition, it lies with domestic competition waged at the expense of the worker and resulting from the wage inequality between provinces, cities, towns and villages.

That is the statement made by Elie Beauregard, K.C., associate commission counsel at that time. So that I say the government and the minister should be particularly careful that they do not pay a great deal of regard to applications of this kind, and in any event, that such applications should be carefully investigated.

Export trade is important and, as I have said before in this chamber, the less self-sufficient a nation is, the fewer its resources, regardless of whether those resources are found in abundance or not, the greater is its need for export trade. But we need that trade, or we must have that trade as a necessity only in order that we may buy those things which we do not produce or cannot produce economically. Anything over and above that is trade that can and should be used to raise the standard of living of our own people. Let us be aware of the fact that Canada's best market should and must be in Canada itself.

Item agreed to.

371. Export division, $206,365.

Mr. FRASER: What is the position in connection with the export of fish products?

It is my understanding that our markets for fish have dropped away from us to a great extent in the last few years.

Mr. MacKINNON: During the war the export of fish has been under the allocation of an international board.

Mr. FRASER: Is it not now under UNRRA?

Mr. MacKINNON: UNRRA is only one organization that is getting some of our fish. The Department of Trade and Commerce is doing the buying for UNRRA.

Mr. FRASER: What about this commercial corporation that is set up?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are doing the buying through the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. FRASER: Have our foreign markets diminished? I understand they have.

Mr. MacKINNON: Smaller quantities of our fish exports have gone to certain traditional markets because, of necessity, we have been making much larger shipments than we did before to other countries in dire need.

Mr. McLURE: Must we still have export permits from Ottawa to make shipments to the United States?

Mr. MacKINNON: Some months ago it was necessary, over a wide range of products, to secure export permits. In recent months and weeks that list has been greatly reduced. Just as soon as we possibly can get away from the necessity for export permits we shall do so.

Mr. McLURE: We have in the maritime provinces numbers of small exporters. They will be shipping products valued at no more than $100 or $150, and it seems terrible nonsense to have to get a permit for each little shipment going to the United States. These are mostly fishermen who are shipping smelts in the summer time, or farmers who are shipping small quantities of their products during the season.

Mr. MacKINNON: This matter of export permits has been a great headache to the department. The Department of Trade and Commerce is merely the channel through which export permits work. These permits are issued by the department on the recommendation of controllers who are in touch with the supply situation in Canada and the necessity of maintaining sufficient in Canada for local consumption.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is a matter of great importance to the people living along the border, and I should like to ask the minister whether this is going to be cured. I can quite understand its necessity in connection with large quantities, but there is, I believe a legal maxim to the effect that the law does not concern itself with tiny things. It seems to me that a minimum ought to be applied. For instance, people are in the habit of sending over a few dozen eggs. Surely we can get some minimum to enable these people to live their ordinary lives.

Mr. MacKINNON: There is a minimum on certain products, and exports below that may be made without a permit.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But apparently not on all?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not on all. In our conversations with the various controllers and other branches we are trying to get away from these export permits just as soon as possible.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Who is the big bad wolf who will not let you do it? That is the fellow we really want to get after. You say there are controllers, and that is what we want to know.

Item agreed to.

372. Import division, $70,662.

Mr. McLURE: When exports are made to the free port at New York no duty has to be paid, but an export permit must still be obtained. If those goods are not sold an import permit must be obtained in order to bring them back to Canada. I do not know whether the minister can rectify this, but if these control boards are holding this up we should do our best to have them done away with.

Item agreed to.

374. Trade publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad, $459,000.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that during the last few months the department has advertised for advertising men. The Canadian information service are asking for $600,000 this year and I feel that the Department of Trade and Commerce should be doing this advertising rather than the information service.

Mr. MacKINNON: We do, definitely.

Mr. FRASER: What men have you obtained this year from the civil service commission to do advertising?

Mr. MacKINNON: We have employed a new director and an assistant director ourselves.

Mr. FRASER: They understand imports and exports and the advertising of our products?

Mr. MacKINNON: The director was a trade commissioner for fifteen years.

Mr. FRASER: Would you mind saying who he is and what is his experience?

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Butler was one of our No. 1 trade commissioners for a period of fifteen years.

Mr. FRASER: He ought to know something about the matter.

Mr. MacKINNON: He certainly does.

Mr. MASSEY: I notice from the details on page 217 of the estimates that $100,000 has been allocated to advertising abroad. Upon what basis is that amount arrived at?

Mr. MacKINNON: This is to enable us to do the advertising we think might be necessary. As a matter of fact we do not plan to spend more than a small portion, but we have asked for this amount in order to carry on a programme of trade publicity when we find it necessary.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister may be regarded as the sales manager for Canada and, as such, he should be vitally interested in the promotion of the sales which this country can achieve in the markets into which it exports. The sales manager of any business is interested in advertising, and he bases his appropriation on the extent of the markets and the volume which he hopes to sell. For example, what volume of sales had the minister in mind when he decided that only $100,000 would be required for advertising in foreign markets?

Mr. MacKINNON: We consider it inadvisable to go to even the extent of the amount asked for, because the government cannot be sure that we shall have the goods for export.

Mr. MASSEY: I can readily understand that, but no doubt the minister has noted the advertising carried on during the war by many companies which had no goods to deliver but who knew it was necessary to keep their names before the public. After all, you can build the finest mousetrap in the woods, but the world will not beat a path to your door unless you tell the world where you are and that you are making the best mousetrap. I do not wish to delay the committee at any length, but it seems to me that this item of only $100,000 is pathetically small.

We know in Canada that our goods are second to none. We have convinced the markets of the world that we can manufacture even the most intricate of goods with high success. The products that we made for use during the war had acceptance among the allied nations to such a degree that Canada was recognized as making the best munitions of war that were made. That reputation is hot at the moment, and we cannot afford to lose it. Therefore it seems to me that now is the time to bring Canada's name to the attention of the markets we hope to gain, and to have "Made in Canada" stand for quality. Actually "Made in Canada" means quality now to the personnel of the forces of the allied nations who used our war material, and "Made in Canada" can continue to mean quality. But we have to keep "Made in Canada" in front of the markets to which we hope to export, and if the vote for that purpose were $1,000,000 I would strongly support it, because it is one of the most profitable expenditures we can make. Any such expenditures will return to us manyfold.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Greenwood has said. The expenditure for advertising abroad has been increased by only $5,000, from $95,000 to $100,000, while the expenditure for advertising in Canada is being increased from $30,000 to $200,000. What is the explanation of that difference and what advertising programme is in contemplation?

Mr. MacKINNON: The pressure of our advertising is being directed toward urging our people in Canada to become export conscious. There has been considerable criticism of the department because we are carrying on that advertising programme now when very shortly afterwards we have to refuse export permits to those who have received inquiries and orders from outside. But we feel that it is most important that the Canadian manufacturer become export-minded and maintain at least token shipments to old customers in other countries and to new customers wherever possible.

Mr. MASSEY: There the minister is definitely putting the cart before the horse. Make your Canadian manufacturer export-conscious when he is sure of the market for his exports. The minister is spending double the amount on advertising in Canada that he is going to spend in foreign markets. That is completely reversing what I think is the proper thing to do under the present circumstances. Spend double the amount on foreign markets, and then let your Canadian manufacturer follow that up after the government has paved the way with its advertising programme. You are saying to the Canadian manufacturer: Export. He asks you: Where shall I send my exports? He says: I cannot afford to advertise Canada abroad; all I can afford to do is advertise my own business. It is the minister's job to advertise Canada. Let the minister say to the Canadian manufacturer: We are creating markets for you by our advertising. I think the amount which the minister proposes to spend on advertising abroad is pathetically small, as I have already said. I would ask the minister to comment on that.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am grateful to the hon. member for Greenwood for his comments, but as a matter of fact we do not need to do any advertising outside Canada to-day to get orders. We are turning orders away by the hundreds of thousands and by the millions every week because we simply cannot fill them. We could increase our export trade tremendously if we could only send more lumber, more paper, more agricultural machinery and other things abroad. It is not a matter of encouraging buyers from outside at the present time. Our great trouble is to make our producers and our manufacturers realize that the home market is not always going to take up their total production as it can do at the present time, and we want them to look forward to the day when they will be wanting to send their surplus production to foreign countries.

Mr. MASSEY: I fully appreciate what the minister has said, but let me add this as a final word. The minister will realize that "Made in Canada" has achieved a new position in the markets of the world to-day as a result of the last ghastly seven years. You cannot afford to let that go. Keep that phrase in its full implication vividly before the people of the nations to which we are going to export, whether we can export to them now or not. Have "Made in Canada" remain in the minds of those who know what "Made in Canada" means. If we do not do that, later on we shall have to advertise heavily to try to regain something we already possess.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Having had the privilege of hearing the hon. member for Greenwood for the first time since he returned to this house after an absence of two years, I want to endorse what he has said and to congratulate him on the excellent speech he made, endorsing the sale of salmon, a sample of which I sent over from British Columbia. I welcome the hon. member on his return to the house, congratulate him on his excellent speech and endorse everything he has said.

Item agreed to.

379. Exhibitions, $329,652.

Mr. MASSEY: Following along the line of what I said a moment or two ago I notice that $100,000 is being appropriated for participation in the Pan-American Exposition at Mexico City, whereas for participation in the British Industries Fair at London only $10,000 is being appropriated. It is unnecessary to remind the committee of the importance of the British Industries Fair. Would the minister explain the great difference in the amounts being spent on these exhibitions at Mexico City and London?

Mr. MacKINNON: These items were put in at the time the estimates were being prepared, and the $10,000 is just a preliminary item.

Mr. MASSEY: And it will be increased?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Hear, hear.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics—

381. Statistics, including contribution of $2,530 to the Inter-American Statistical Institute, $2,090,670.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the compilation of the cost of living index come under this department through the bureau of statistics?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: There has been considerable criticism of the basis on which the cost of living index is prepared. It is desirable that we should have as reliable, a cost of living index as possible because it is used so often. I would suggest to the minister that he give consideration to having an investigation made of the items that should go into a modern cost of living index, with proper weight being given to the various items. The number of items included should, I think, be greatly increased to enable us to have a truer estimate of what the cost of living really is.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There is a large increase here of nearly half a million dollars. We all believe in statistics and I have a high opinion of the head of the bureau; nevertheless it can run riot if there is no check. Who assumes responsibility for the size of the institution? It can be developed without limit unless there is someone keeping check on it. I do not know what it was the year before last, but it has increased twenty-five per cent this year.

Mr. MacKINNON: A very large portion of that amount is required for services which the bureau has been asked to provide for the Department of Health and Welfare in connection with various activities.

Mr. FRASER: Family allowance?

Mr. MacKINNON: Partly—vital statistics.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—
383. Administration, $18,333.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: When can the port of Prince Rupert expect the subsidy put back on steamships calling there?

Mr. MacKINNON: The matter is under consideration.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to mention a matter of importance, namely, the ferry boat Kipawo which served in Minas basin, calling at the ports of Kingsport, Parrsboro and Wolfville. There is one port in the constituency of Cumberland and there are two in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, represented by the Minister of Finance, who is not here to speak for his constituents. His constituents certainly need someone to speak for them in this matter. This boat was built in 1926 and named after the three towns involved, the ports of call. The boat was taken off early in the war and used for war purposes in Newfoundland. At the termination of the war it was sold in Newfoundland, even though the people interested agreed to invest a reasonable sum to purchase it or to secure a new boat to continue the service. During the war, motorists had to use gasoline and wear out their tires going 150 miles additional. This was the only ferry service in all Canada that was cancelled. I appreciate the attitude of the minister, because he told me personally that he was favourable to the continuance of it. The people have no service now. This ferry had been in operation for more than forty years. I would point out that unlimited sums were expended from the Canadian exchequer on the construction of ships of different kinds which have been sold at only a fraction of their cost. I have before me a list of some of these ships, but I will not delay the committee by reading them. I will mention only two items among those brought before the war expenditures and economies committee. There was the Andre Dupre, length 125 feet; monthly rental, $1,187.50, cost of repairs and rents while under R.C.N., $31,008.21; cost of reconditioning for return to owners, or cash settlement in lieu, $9,010.73. There is another one of which the cost of recondition amounts to $103,361.57. The people of the three ports were supported by the boards of trade in the ports of call and in the constituency of the Minister of Finance in order that this service which had been in operation for over forty years and which had always proved so useful might be restored. They have taken a great pride in the service. I would ask the minister to make a statement as to the policy of his department and its attitude toward securing a suitable ship and the question of having the service restored. If he takes steps to bring this about he will have the cooperation of all the people directly interested.

Mr. MacKINNON: I remember very well the hon. member speaking along the same line with reference to this same service a year ago. Since then, to the best of my recollection, I have not had a single request from anyone for it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The boards of trade have taken action in an endeavour to get a vote.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not think anything has come to the department. However, I will look into the matter.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The Kipawo was sold in Newfoundland under protest from the people concerned. They wanted it brought back.

Mr. MacKINNON: I will look into the matter.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—
389. Canadian government elevators, including equipment, $740,923.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: What use does the government intend to make of the Prince Rupert grain elevator this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: There is a great deal of wheat planned for shipment via the Pacific in this next crop year. I am not sure at the moment to what extent the Prince Rupert elevator is being used, but I shall make inquiries and write personally to the hon. member.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the minister make an additional statement in connection with Churchill facilities? There has been a good deal of discussion in the west, and he might indicate whether the Churchill elevator will be filled to capacity at the end of the grain season.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed that there is sufficient wheat at Churchill to fill the vessels which are already on their way to that port. I am further informed that the wheat board is providing from this crop sufficient wheat to fill at least two more vessels and to provide wheat for all ships that are being sent to Churchill. In addition to wheat, there are some other commodities that are being exported.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the elevator be filled at the end of the shipping season?

Mr. MacKINNON: With the situation in Europe we cannot promise to put any wheat in there that we shall not be able to move for a year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is better to have the grain there than in the fields.

Mr. MacKINNON: If we have a very large crop I can assure my hon. friend that the facilities at Churchill will be used.

Item agreed to.

Canadian government travel bureau—

390. To assist in promoting tourist business in Canada, $650,000.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Several provinces have travel bureaus. Does the department do anything to avoid overlapping?

Mr. MacKINNON: We have called a meeting of the various provincial departments that are in charge of tourist traffic. The meeting is called for October in Ottawa, and we have had responses from several provinces that their ministers, and, in most cases, officials, will be here so that we can coordinate our efforts along that line.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Where do we stand?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall I report the resolutions?

Mr. MASSEY: I have no desire to prolong the discussion of the estimates, but we were told it was twelve o'clock. Item 390 did not carry.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We carried item 390, but I am sure the minister will permit a discussion on it.

Mr. MacKINNON: Certainly.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the reports of the committee of supply made to the house on May 10, 16, 17, 28, 29, 30, June 7, 14, 17, 21, 24, 28, July 5, August 6, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, less amounts voted in interim supply be now received, read a second time and concurred in.

Mr. BRACKEN: As a matter of information, may I ask what the purpose is in making this motion now when there are still other resolutions to come?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that the resolutions should be printed in Votes and Proceedings, and if we left them all to the last day it would leave too much work to be done on that occasion. If they are concurred in this evening the printing can be started at once, and this will facilitate the arrangement for final adoption of the bill based upon the resolutions.

Mr. BRACKEN: The whole purpose is to avoid too large a bulk on some later matters?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To have the printing commence at once so as to facilitate the proceedings which will be required in connection with the bill based upon the resolutions.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 12.08 a.m.

Friday, August 30, 1946

The house met at ten o'clock.

CANADIAN ARMY

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MOUNTED POLICE AND NATIONAL DEFENCE RESPECTING FORMER OFFICER

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): The other day in the course of the army estimates the hon. member for Lake Centre asked me to produce any correspondence which might have passed between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Department of National Defence relating to one Mr. Elliott, a former officer in the army. I told him that if there were any letters which were properly producible, I would see that they were produced. My statement in that respect appears at page 5264 of Hansard, where I said:

If there is correspondence between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which I take it is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the Department of National Defence which is properly producible under the order, it will be produced. If there is such correspondence, I do not know why it was not produced. I will look over the files, and if there is correspondence that is producible under that order, I will see that it is produced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without any qualification?

Mr. Abbott: Without qualification.

I find that I was in error in my assumption that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is under the Department of Justice. The order calls for the production of correspondence between the Department of National Defence, the Department of Labour and the Department of Justice. There are five letters, three from the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and two I think from the deputy minister of national defence in reply to these letters. All the letters are marked "confidential" and are not producible under the order. Of course, even if the order did call for the production of such correspondence it would not cover the confidential letters; therefore the letters cannot be produced.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister please tell us why there are so many objections to giving the full facts in connection with this matter—because one letter after another has been refused production? The minister now raises another question of confidential letters.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not raise the question of confidential letters, if my hon. friend will permit me. I raised the point that the order of the house does not call for the production of these letters. The letters are letters which passed between the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the deputy minister of national defence. No order of the house would have been passed calling for the production of such letters, and no order was passed. That is the ground on which I say that the letters are not producible. In addition, I mentioned that they are marked "confidential." I do not think it has ever been the practice of the house to require the production of letters from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with their proceedings.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL STRIKE—FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Minister of Labour give us a progress statement on the strike situation in Hamilton?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): All I can say is that the conversations are going on.

COMMODITY SHORTAGES

CONDITIONS IN GLACE BAY AREA—MEAT RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Finance. I did not have the opportunity of sending him notice of this question, because it arises out of a telegram I received this morning from the Retail Merchants Association of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia. Is there a possibility of relieving the extreme shortage of shortening and lard in that area? The merchants claim that they are receiving only fifty per cent of the supplies they were receiving in 1945. There is also a serious shortage of paper bags and wrapping paper. The merchants say that they have to discontinue the handling of a large number of commodities because of the shortage. These merchants question whether it is necessary to continue meat rationing. Will the minister take note of these questions and give me an answer when he can? I would appreciate his doing this.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): I shall bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of the wartime prices and trade board and see what can be done. I think that is the best answer I can give.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON AUGUST 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): In the course of the discussion of the trade and commerce estimates yesterday an hon. member is reported at page 5608 of Hansard as having called me a mountebank. I will call him an angel, and both of us will be mistaken.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Canadian government travel bureau—

390. To assist in promoting tourist business in Canada, $650,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What coordination is there between the dominion and the provinces in advertising the tourist business? My riding is extremely interested in the tourist trade and the Ontario government is doing a good deal to that end. I should like to know something about the coordination between the two governments

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The tourist branch of the department realizes the importance of the closest cooperation with the various tourist agencies in the provinces and tries to maintain the closest contact with them. As Minister of Trade and Commerce I have called a meeting for Ottawa for the month of October, and all the provincial ministers in charge of the tourist business have responded one hundred per cent. In each case they have stated that they heartily approve our plans for coordination and have assured us that they will be present with their officials.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That seems wise and right. In what has actually been done up to the moment, has there been any consultation with the provinces? Take Ontario, for example. Have there been any conversations with the Ontario department?

Mr. MacKINNON: I understand the director of this department maintains close contact with similar organizations doing this work not only in Ontario but in the other provinces.

Mr. HANSELL: This morning I received a letter from the secretary of the Alberta boards of trade. This organization coordinates the work of all the boards of trade of the province. The letter urged me to press for action in respect to the building of landing strips for tourists coming into the country. I know that this is not directly under the minister's department, but the letter suggested that air strips should be built at such places as Banff and Lake Louise. I do not know whether there would be any place at Lake Louise, because it is mountainous, but the suggestion would apply to Jasper and other parks. A good deal of the tourist traffic in the future will be carried by air. I call this to the attention of the minister because it might be discussed at the future conference. I would ask him to take the matter up with his colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources and canvass the possibilities in that direction, because it deserves consideration.

Mr. MacKINNON: It does deserve the closest attention and support, and I am in close touch with it. I shall be glad to carry out the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. McLURE: I would remind the minister that in March last I pointed out to him that in the advertising of the tourist business, so far as maps are concerned, Prince Edward Island appeared to be entirely omitted. He kindly stated that he would give the matter his attention. I would once more remind him of it and ask him to make a note of this so that our province will not be left out again.

Mr. MacKINNON: The information that I had was that the map in question was not the product of any Canadian department of government or any Canadian institution, but was published by private individuals in the United States. I believe I pointed that out to the hon. member on a former occasion. However, I will make a note of the question.

Mr. FRASER: The map which the tourist bureau sends to Americans giving information about Canada does not show this country to good advantage. Accompanying the map should be a letter informing the recipients that maps of various sections would be sent to them. I also suggest that when the conference is held the provinces be asked to indicate on their maps the different highways to available camping sites, because many Americans come here in trailers with camp equipment and go hundreds of miles without being able to find a camp.

Item agreed to.

Foreign trade services—

861. Trade publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad—further amount required, $16,750.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have some questions on the order paper respecting the export of lumber. How does the minister's department ascertain whether any company is shipping more than fifty per cent of its lumber? My information respecting one company is that it is shipping practically one hundred per cent of the lumber it produces, and ignores representations made to it by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MacKINNON: The operations to which the hon. member has referred are under the direction of the timber controller, in another department of government. However he maintains a close check, and it would be difficult for me to believe that any one company is allowed to ship anything like its total production, or a quantity which would be out of line with the amount shipped by other companies seeking the export field.

Mr. MacINNIS: That may be so, but I should like to have some factual information on it. As the minister will have observed from my questions on the order paper, this company is also a producer of pulp and paper. All the lumber produced is of first-class quality, the poorer parts going into the pulp and paper mill. The people in Vancouver are having great difficulty in obtaining first-class lumber, my information being that the lumber offered for sale is of third or perhaps fourth quality, and that that is all that is left for the smaller dealers. It may be that we have already dealt with the item respecting the timber controller. I suggest however, that this matter should be checked further so that British Columbia builders may have at least a fair share of the lumber produced in that province.

Item agreed to.

863. Electricity and gas inspection services, including administration of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act—further amount required, $46,720.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I should like to ask a question respecting the checking of weights and measures. My understanding is that inspectors are appointed to check weights and measures throughout the country, for which they charge a fee. For instance, when a check is made on gasoline pumps a fee is charged for each pump. What is the revenue derived from these fees?

Mr. MacKINNON: This item was passed yesterday but I shall be glad to get the information and let the hon. member have it later to-day.

Mr. STEPHENSON: If an operator has three or four pumps it costs him $15 or $20 every time an inspector comes around. That inspector can check perhaps eight or ten places each day, and it would seem to me the fees charged would bring in considerable revenue. Yet this department asks for about $1,800,000 for the purpose. Would the revenue not cover the costs in the department?

Mr. MacKINNON: This is a self-supporting service, the fees taking care of the expenses. The revenue goes into the consolidated revenue fund account.

Mr. STEPHENSON: These inspectors when checking scales use weights running up to 500 pounds. I have in mind an instance in which scales were checked, but after several years it was found that because of wear in the scales, when a weight passed over them, near the weighing capacity of the scale, the mechanism would lower to the point that it was resting on the foundation. The weights were entirely wrong; yet these people had paid over a number of years for having the scales checked. When inspectors check the scales I suggest they should use a weight equalling the capacity of the scale, if they wish to ascertain whether or not the scale is operating efficiently. In the instance I have in mind it cost several hundred dollars to have the necessary repairs made, and it was the weighman who found the mistake. This scale would probably weigh a load from ten to twelve tons, but the check would be made with a weight of only 100 or 200 pounds. This does not give a true indication of the weighing capacity of the scale.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall see that that is brought to the attention of the department.

Mr. HANSELL: When item 861 was called, owing to the fact that we were proceeding rapidly I did not have an opportunity to ask a question I had in mind. I notice that this vote asks for a further amount of $16,750, although we have already passed an item of $459,000 for the same thing. While I do not object to these amounts, I would ask the minister to tell me what proportion of the money is to be spent on advertising in Canada. I have read carefully some of the advertisements issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and published in Canadian periodicals, and I must confess that I have never been able to see the sense in advertising our foreign trade to our own people. They are more interested in buying Canadian products than in being fed with propaganda to bolster a foreign trade mania. I can see no other purpose in this advertising than that of trying to influence the minds of the people with the thought that the present Liberal administration is attempting to do the right thing by pursuing this particular policy. It may be the right thing; but I claim there is at least an element of using the taxpayers money to support a particular policy. I am certain if I were to take the time to read one of these advertisements and to question the minister upon it, it would cause him some embarrassment. I am not going to do that, but I would ask what proportion of these amounts, now totalling about $476,000, is spent for advertising in Canada. If the minister cannot give me the information now, I shall be content to receive it later.

Mr. MacKINNON: I will do that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I take it we are still discussing the main item covering foreign trade services?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Item 863.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is only one of the items under foreign trade services. Are we not discussing the general item of foreign trade services and then the details under item 863?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This item deals with electricity and gas inspection services.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There were some matters I desired to discuss under foreign trade in general, and I suppose it will be in order to discuss them now, because we are dealing with the general item of foreign trade services. I should like to ask a question or two as to what is Canada's ultimate objective with respect to trade, why she wishes to attain that objective, and whether she is giving any consideration to the probable international disharmony which may result from attaining it. I think matters of this kind should be considered for a few minutes, but if you rule against me I shall have to desist.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We shall have to deal with the specific item. There was a general discussion on administration, but we are now dealing with a specific item.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—

864. Administration — further amount required, $5,810.

Mr. BRACKEN: I should like to revert back to item 862. You are proceeding pretty fast; I do not object to that, but when you do I should not like to be denied the right to go back to some of the items that have been passed. Item 862 deals with the wheat and grain division, I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to a matter that was raised yesterday, the meeting in Washington of the preparatory committee of the international wheat council. The minister knows and the committee will remember that we now have a wheat agreement with the United Kingdom for a period of five years. In answer to a question I asked yesterday the minister intimated that an official of his department, Mr. Wilson, was now in Washington attending the preparatory committee of the international wheat council. I asked the miinster if he could tell us anything as to what was going on, and he said that he did not feel that he could. In view of the agreement which has been made with Britain and the discussions now proceeding, in Washington, can the minister not tell us something more about what policies are being advanced by our officials in Washington? Under the United Kingdom agreement this country has arranged to sell two-thirds of its wheat crop for a period of four or five years, and we now have an official in Washington talking with other nations about some other plans for wheat. Will the minister tell us whatever he can as to what is going on and what position our representative is taking before that committee?

Mr. MacKINNON: As I stated to the committee yesterday or the day before, the international wheat conference has been in session on and off for several years, in an effort to bring forward definite recommendations which can be made to the various governments represented at the conference to regulate the supply and price of wheat internationally. The countries represented there are the importing and exporting countries. I think it would be inadvisable at the present time for me to say just what are the bases of the conversations, but the representatives of the various countries are endeavouring to arrive at some international arrangement that can be recommended to the countries they represent.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister be a little more specific? The government is sending officials to Washington, and they cannot be going without some instructions. Are they just sent there and told to sit down with the other people to talk things over and then come back and tell what they hear? Or are they sent there with some definite instructions or objectives in mind? I do not want to embarrass the minister, but this is an important matter affecting one of the major sections of the Canadian economy. With parliament in session the government has somebody down there dealing with our whole economy. Some action may be taken and decided upon before this house or the Canadian people even know what is going on. I would like the minister to tell us what he feels he can as to what instructions this official was given when he went to this meeting.

Mr. MacKINNON: The wheat committee of the cabinet are in frequent consultation with the present representative, the chairman of the Canadian wheat board, who also attends these meetings, and another official of ours at Washington. The progress of the discussion is reported to us and suggestions are made. It is inadvisable for me to say more than I have said. An effort is being made by the representatives of the various nations to reach some conclusion which they can recommend to their respective governments on the matter of international wheat prices. I do not think I can say anything else, and I want the hon. member to understand that I am not trying to hold back anything.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is it not correct that three or four years ago several countries agreed on a tentative international wheat agreement?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is the foundation of these present meetings.

Mr. BRACKEN: An agreement was arrived at which was to be carried out immediately on the termination of the war, but something has happened. Can the minister tell us why there has been delay in proceeding with these plans as originally contemplated?

Mr. MacKINNON: Meetings have been held from time to time and adjourned because of differences of opinion. An effort is being made to bring the countries to a common understanding. The reason for delay is simply the inability to bring the different countries to some common understanding or agreement.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then your representative is seeking to bring about something like what was proposed in the international wheat agreement of three or four years ago?

Mr. MacKINNON: He has no authority to bind this government, but he has instructions to continue discussions along that line.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are the government elevators at the head of the lakes still being leased, and if so, to whom, and what is the term of the lease and the amount involved?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yesterday I had one of the members of the board of Grain Commissioners here with me just for the purpose of assisting me in answering such questions, but when the item was passed yesterday this supplementary was overlooked and I think the official went home last night.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What company is leasing the elevators?

Mr. MacKINNON: We called for tenders some months ago for leasing the elevator, and the only tender we received was from McCabe Brothers.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They had it before.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes. The tender was not altogether satisfactory to us, and we negotiated with them and got a little better arrangement. Their tender was the only one, and the elevator is now under lease to McCabe Brothers.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: At what price?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not that before me, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. BRACKEN: One other question in regard to the matter I raised a few moments ago with regard to the tentative international wheat agreement which was proposed three or four years ago—five years ago, I am told. Can the minister now say whether that proposed agreement had the approval of this government, I rather thought it had, but I am not sure—or was it just a proposal that was advanced by officials of different governments?

Mr. MacKINNON: Any reply I make on that is subject to correction, because I am speaking from memory. I do not remember any formal approval by this government of the result of the negotiations referred to. If there is some specific point on which my hon. friend wants information, I shall endeavour to give it to him.

Mr. BRACKEN: My question is specific. I am asking, did this government approve the proposed international wheat agreement which was arranged in 1942, I think it was, by several governments? The minister said a little while ago that the officials had no power to bind the government, which everybody recognizes. But here was an agreement proposed and talked about as something good for the future, and I am asking whether it had the endorsation or approval of this government. The minister does not need to answer now, but I should like an answer before the house adjourns.

Mr. MacKINNON: I might as well answer now. I have no recollection of any formal ratification or adoption by this government of any arrangement made by the delegates at the international wheat conference. It is the wish of the government, though, that an agreement be reached between the exporting and importing companies that will guarantee the wheat economy of Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister say whether or not that arrangement had the endorsement of this government?

Mr. MacKINNON: I have just answered that.

Mr. BRACKEN: No, the minister said that he had no recollection of it.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am not trying to split hairs or avoid answering. I am telling the hon. member the exact truth. I have no recollection of that having been done. I do not think there was any formal acceptance by this government of any international wheat agreement or of the recommendations that were made, but I do not want to be too positive about it.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is not that question capable of a definite answer? Can the minister not look back over his records and then state definitely whether the agreement proposed was approved by the government or not? He has told us that he is speaking from memory, but surely he can ascertain definitely whether the agreement was approved by this government or not. I do not want to embarrass the minister, but I should like to have an answer later.

865. Statistics — further amount required, $196,718.

Mr. BURTON: This further amount of $196,718 is in addition to the main vote we passed last night of $2,090,670 for statistics for 1946-47. Why does the minister find it necessary to ask for this further amount in addition to the large vote we passed for statistics last night, and which in itself was an increase of $482,070 over the previous year? Why was not this $196,718 included in the main estimates tabled some months ago?

Mr. MacKINNON: The main estimates were prepared towards the end of October last, many months ago. The increase is largely accounted for by an item of $129,488 which the bureau of statistics requires for the preparation of an index of deaths as of January 1, 1925 to date and continuing.

Mr. BURTON: Did the minister not know last fall that this work was required to be done?

Mr. MacKINNON: No, the Department of Health and Welfare came to us comparatively recently and told us that they have found it necessary to have this index of deaths for checking purposes in connection with the family allowance.

Item agreed to.

Dominion bureau of statistics—
866. Census of population—further amount required, $86,680.

Mr. McLURE: I notice that $86,680 is the further amount required in addition to the $1,219,685 that we passed in item 382 in the main estimates for a census of population, making a total of $1,306,365. Is a census to be taken of the population this year?

Mr. MacKINNON: The quinquennial census for the three western provinces is under way now. That census has to be taken in accordance with the agreement made when these provinces were formed.

Mr. LENNARD: Is this amount and the amount voted last year in connection with the census all required for the census in the three western provinces?

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. LENNARD: It is not for any other part of Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON: No, just the three western provinces.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Last April I asked the names and addresses of the census commissioners in the three prairie provinces, which information I received. I asked also which of these are veterans of the first and second world wars. That question was not answered, but a note was added that the information was obtainable. I think I brought the matter to the minister's attention once since then. Has he the information now?

Mr. MacKINNON: I directed the officials of the bureau of statistics in charge of this census by circular letter to the census commissioners to obtain this information. The following memo was given to me. It is not a direct answer to the question, but I will give it as I have received it from the officials of the department.

The census commissioners must be carefully selected because of the importance of the work in their charge. Special qualifications are required. If the commissioners are well known and have numerous contacts, it facilitates the carrying out of the census, as people object to giving some information to enumerators. The right kind of commissioner can smooth out such difficulties. In consequence most of our commissioners appointed for the western census are men of quite mature years. There are fifty-six in all, thirty-three of whom are over fifty years of age, and eight between forty and fifty. A considerable number have been commissioners in previous censuses. Eleven of these men have had overseas service, seven of them in the first world war and four in the last. In addition, four served in Canada. Four were physically unfit and unable to take part in the war activities.

Mr. REID: May I ask whether, when the census takes place in 1950, the western provinces will be again included, or will the census taken for this year stand until 1956?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes; the three western provinces will be included in the next dominion census. This special census is taken for a variety of reasons. The main one, I think, is that upon it is based the amount of money given to each of these three provinces by the dominion government in lieu of other considerations.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: How are these census commissioners appointed? Is it through the civil service commission, or a matter of direct appointment by the department?

Mr. MacKINNON: These men are not appointed by the civil service commission. They are appointed by the department, or really by the minister in charge.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is it the policy of the department in appointments of this type to give preference to veterans of the first or the second world war? I imagine that that would be the policy, but apparently in this case it was not, because it was not even known in the first place when I asked this question which of them were veterans and which were not, so apparently there was no thought of giving any preference to veterans. I have further proof of that by checking up from the local branch of the Canadian Legion at Dauphin, asking them if they had been consulted on this appointment in the Dauphin district. Their reply, dated June 17 and signed by the secretary of the branch, is that they had not been consulted in any way in the appointment of the census commissioner for that district. I do not want to kick up too much of a dust about it at this time, because the thing is over; the census has been taken; it is a dead horse. But I do wish to lodge a protest. Here is one case in which the local branches should have been consulted and I think could have recommended to the minister suitable men who were veterans. To my knowledge there are men in the Dauphin district who could have served very well in that position. But the legion was not consulted, and in looking over the list I received in answer to question No. 1 I am inclined to suspect—I would not make this as a categorical statement—that the appointments seem to follow more or less of a patronage trend. The minister can say whether that is so or not.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would be an accident!

Mr. ZAPLITNY: He said a moment ago that appointments are made of men who have "wide contacts" within the district. I must say that in Winnipeg North, for example, the gentleman who was appointed happened to be the defeated Liberal candidate—who, I imagine has fairly good contacts.

Mr. MacKINNON: I imagine he would have.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Although experience showed, as an hon. friend suggests, that his contacts were not sufficient.

Mr. GRAYDON: He didn't make the best use of what he did contact.

Mr. MacINNIS: He just didn't have enough.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I find other instances of defeated candidates of the Liberal party or other good wheel-horses who did very good work for the Liberal candidate. I do not want to mention any names, but that has happened close to my own district. I want to tell the minister, while I have the opportunity, for his own information that there is a considerable amount of resentment amongst veterans who feel that they should have been consulted and should have had an opportunity of recommending men for these positions, because the men are available, men who served in the first great war and in the second great war, who could have done that job just as well, and to whom, I believe, the preference to which they were entitled should have been extended.

Mr. BURTON: I would like to support what the hon. member has said, in the line of reasoning with the minister—and we believe he is a man one can reason with—that it does not tend to the credit of the government to have that sort of thing going on. While some of these men have done good work and carried out their job properly, the fact of the matter is that the way they were appointed leaves that stigma.

A moment ago, when the minister was replying to a question of the hon. member for New Westminster he explained that the five year censuses in the prairie provinces are necessary in order to determine payments of subsidies due to those provinces. I should like to follow that up a little farther.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't go too far.

Mr. BURTON: Never mind; that is what we are here for, to go on to the proper conclusion, to get the proper answers.

An hon. MEMBER: No; he is here to go home.

Mr. BURTON: It is quite proper to go home when the work is done. I should like the minister to give the information, if it is available, as to just what benefit this has been in past years to these provinces or to the dominion government. I can understand that in the beginning, when the provinces were first organized and tremendous increases of population were taking place for a few years, these censuses were necessary. But is it worth while, now, after this period of time, to have a census every five years, and what action does the government take in respect to increases or decreases in population in that period? For instance, if we have a redistribution bill passed at the next session—and it might have been passed this session—it would not take into consideration any decided increase that we might have in Saskatchewan, but would still use the 1940 census as the basis, with the result that so far as the redistribution is concerned the census would not amount to anything to any of the three western provinces. I should like to know from the minister if the census at the present time every five years is worth while, or should steps be taken to make some arrangement with the provinces which we can get on the ordinary basis. I am not suggesting that we should; but I should like to know just what advantage has accrued to the provinces or to the dominion by having these censuses.

Mr. MacKINNON: The taking of this census is a statutory requirement. I am told that in 1936 there was a suggestion that this quinquennial census be dropped. But it was retained, not only because it is a statutory obligation but because of the strong demands from the three western provinces for its continuance. Redistribution is based on the ten year census, not on the quinquennial.

Mr. BURTON: I am not saying it should be done away with, but I should like to know what the three prairie provinces have gained from the quinquennial census.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have not the figures in front of me; I can get them for my hon. friend.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have been informed that the census commissioner for Yorkton is the president of the Liberal association. Does the minister know whether that is true or not?

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not know whether it is true, but quite possibly it is true.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Thank you very much.

Mr. MacKINNON: I can tell the hon. member that I listened carefully to the representations made by the hon. member for Dauphin, but in spite of that I have not had one single criticism from my province or from any other part of Canada as to the manner in which the census commissioners have carried on their work.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Since the minister has made that remark I want to make it clear that I am not complaining about the manner in which they are doing their work. I imagine that they do their work efficiently. I was complaining about the manner in which they were being appointed, because it smacks of political patronage, and I object to that.

[Mr. Burton.]

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—Eastern local services—

870. Grand Manan and the mainland, service between—further amount required, $52,000.

Halifax, Canso and Guysboro, service between—further amount required, $16,000.

Owen Sound and ports on Manitoulin island and Georgian bay, service between—further amount required, $30,000.

Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, service between—further amount required, $45,000.

Saint John, Westport and Yarmouth and other way ports, service between—further amount required, $7,000.

Mr. McLURE: There is an amount in this item for the Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia service on the Wood islands route, where there are two steamers.

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: The Prince Nova and the Charles A. Dunning; this service given by the Northumberland ferries is the very best service that we have with the mainland. They are giving a service to-day which is beneficial to the farmers, because their rates on automobiles and trucks with freight are common sense rates and not an overcharge in any way to be compared with those in effect on the Borden-Tormentine ferries. The rate is hardly more than one-third of that which is charged on the Canadian National Railway on the Borden-Tormentine ferry. Is that the limit that the minister is going to give to the Northumberland ferries for that excellent service. I suppose they have made representations to him. If they are satisfied with it I am glad to see it in the estimates this year.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

247. General administration, $1,040,595.

Mr. FRASER: Will the minister tell us why there is an increase this year.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): This appropriation covers the general administration of the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Special War Revenue Act and amendments, the Civil Service Act, 1918, with amendments, the Civil Service Superannuation Act of 1924 and the regulations established thereunder. This involves the responsibility for the collection of customs and excise revenue and the authority for legislative expenditures and repayments. The main addition in the expenditures is due to increased personnel and the increase of $38,720 in salaries. The cost of living bonus has increased by $3,200, and printing and stationery by $2,500. The total is $44,420, which brings the appropriation up to $1,040,595.

Mr. FRASER: The minister did not mention the one item which brings the increase up, namely, the short wave station.

Mr. McCANN: That has nothing to do with this item. We shall come to that. The administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Act is not under the national revenue department; it comes under the Minister of National Revenue personally, and further items are provided for it. It will be time to discuss it when we reach that item.

Mr. IRVINE: Will it be possible to reconsider the imposing of taxes on community groups which are organized for the chief purpose of developing the musical abilities of the individual boys and girls and young people in a community? I have particular reference to a group known as the Alcan Follies. The primary object of this group is not to provide entertainment but to educate boys and girls. To this end they have spent a good deal of their money to form their organization and get their instruments, music and so forth. We are at a loss to know why music festivals should not be taxed—and I do not think they should be—whereas organizations of this kind are. Will the minister promise to give reconsideration to this point? I have already discussed it with him privately, and I should like him to express an opinion on the matter.

Mr. McCANN: The matter as it stands is that where an amusement of the type referred to is entirely for charitable purposes the amusement tax is not collected; but where part of the benefits accrue to an individual or to a group of individuals, the amusement tax is applied. Where they are strictly charitable and for purposes that have been indicated by the hon. member, and where the money which is received does not accrue either to an individual or to a group of individuals, the tax is not collected. Further consideration might be given to what the hon. member suggests.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has any progress been made in the enterprise which the Minister of Finance outlined to us last autumn when he said there was to be a review of the whole machinery of taxation? He spoke strongly about it at the time. The minister will agree that there is a widespread feeling throughout the country that that should be done. I wish he would tell us just what progress is being made.

Mr. McCANN: I presume the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is referring more particularly to the income tax.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): More particularly, yes.

Mr. McCANN: I suggest that we delay that discussion until the taxation division is under review. We are now dealing with customs and excise.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to get some information on a question I brought up under other departments. Probably I can get it in this department. In the exporting of goods to the United States, to what are called the free port zones, the customs department in Charlottetown last year did not seem to have any information whatever as to how to proceed with shipments. I recall one case in which a man came into the province with the intention of exporting a considerable quantity of goods. He was buying and exporting goods to the free port zone in New York, and the customs officer at Charlottetown, properly so, took the matter up on this man's behalf with Ottawa, but it took a whole day before the exporter could get his papers through. What I am coming at is this. The department should provide these customs officers with all the necessary information for shipments of that kind. I realize that such shipments are new; that is, shipping dutiable goods into a country and placing them in the so-called free port zones. They do not pay the duty until the article is sold. I would ask the minister to give instructions to our customs agents and other men in similar positions so that too much trouble will not be caused the exporter. The department has a customs officer in Charlottetown who cannot be surpassed for service to the people. I believe he extracts every cent of duty it is possible to get on an article but he takes it by the painless method. I do not believe there is any man in the customs department in any province who is held in higher esteem than Mr. Goodwin, and I am glad to say this on his behalf, because he did excellent work on the occasion I speak of. He used the telephone and telegraph, he got in touch with New York and Ottawa, and as I say, it took a day for the man to get his papers completed.

Mr. McCANN: What sort of commodity was he dealing in?

Mr. McLURE: Furs. They were dutiable and were going into the free zone.

Mr. McCANN: The free zone would not make so much difference. Our department acts as agent for trade and commerce, and if the shipper had the proper export permit there would be no delay on our part. I am glad to hear the commendation of the officer at Charlottetown, and I may say that similar comments come from one end of the country to the other with regard to the service of all the officers.

Mr. McLURE: The express company should know that the article is dutiable and that the ordinary export entry is not sufficient. If they knew this they would not carry the article. I suggest that instructions be given the officer down there when he issues the export permit so as to have it acceptable to the express company or whatever transport company it may be.

Mr. McCANN: We will canvass the situation and see if it can be clarified.

Item agreed to.

Customs and excise divisions—

250. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime of officers notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals, $8,804,898.

Mr. McKAY: Is it the policy of the government now to reopen some of the ports of entry from the United States which were closed during the depression years? Conditions have changed since that time, and the reopening of these ports would not only facilitate tourist traffic coming into Canada but would in the long run be a good thing for our economy, because it would make it easier for our own people to move back and forth between this country and the United States and it would provide a certain number of veterans with employment, because at many of these ports of entry we have veterans who are doing an excellent job. I have in mind a certain port of entry in Saskatchewan which I know very well and which was closed. It is south of Weyburn at a place called Beaubier, which was closed in the depression years. There is a considerable demand that that port be reopened so as to facilitate traffic between the United States and Canada. The minister will no doubt say that when the traffic justifies the reopening of the port it will be reopened, but I would point out that there is no way of gauging what the traffic is, because many of these people go to other ports of entry and have to go many miles out of their way in order to move back and forth. Has there been any change of policy in relation to these ports?

[Mr. McLure.]

Mr. McCANN: It is not contemplated that there will be any change in the policy with reference to the opening of ports that have been closed. As a result of an investigation by a royal commission some years ago the recommendation was made that many of these smaller ports be closed with a view to improving the appraisal system. We have found that sufficient service is being given all along the border line, and that service is improved because of the fact that we are able to get men who are better fitted to make the appraisal. It has been a matter of economy, without diminishing the service rendered the country.

Item agreed to.

Customs and Excise divisions—

251. To provide for payment of expenses, law costs, refunds and awards arising out of seizures and charges of contravention of customs or excise laws, $300,000.

Mr. McLURE: Are bequests made by American citizens by will to Canadian beneficiaries duty free and tax free?

Mr. McCANN: There is a tariff item which covers that.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

252. General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $955,695.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In the budget speech last autumn the Minister of Finance said he realized there was a great deal of questioning in the country not only as to the taxation law, not only as to the amount of taxation fixed, but as to the procedure, the machinery of collection. He said at that time, if I remember correctly, that he was proposing to see that a full inquiry and review into the whole situation was made. I am not so sure he referred to it specifically in his last speech, but I believe there was a reference there, and I should like to know what has been done and is being done. Anyone will agree it is a matter of common knowledge that people throughout Canada are greatly troubled about the various aspects of the machinery and procedure, and have been longing for simplifications.

Mr. McCANN: I believe I can assure the hon. member that the matter is well in hand. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech said, I believe, that a departmental committee had been set up, and that the legislation is now under review. The matter of administration was canvassed by a committee which worked on it for some time and presented a report which I tabled in the house at the last session, early in December. That had to do with the establishment of adidtional district offices in Canada. It is proposed almost to double the number of offices at present in operation. In adition to the main office in Ottawa we have nineteen regional offices, and it is proposed to add thirteen, bringing the total to thirty-three. Because of the scarcity of materials for construction we are having some difficulty in getting available accommodation in towns and cities in which we intend to open these additional offices. The Department of Public Works has had difficulty in doing any building. It is equally difficult to lease premises. Then there is the matter of personnel. It is difficult to get a sufficient number of people with training as auditors or assessors or in other skills necessary in connection with income tax and succession duties. However this whole matter is under review, and progress is being made toward the objective we have in mind, that of giving better service to the public.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister's statement seems both satisfactory and unsatisfactory. As to having more local offices and extending facilities, I should think that would be a wise procedure. I had not expressed any opinion on that, but it sounds reasonable. What I wish still to know is this. Is there any basic revision—and this is what the Minister of Finance suggested last autumn—or is the department just ironing out little inequalities which might occur here and there? My impression is that the last time this matter was considered, and when it was discussed in the press, the view was that it went very deep. It was not simply a matter of adding a few offices here and there, but rather one of going to the very root of our taxation procedure. Probably that is difficult at the present time, owing to changing conditions. But has there been a basic study, not of this or that detail in connection with offices or personnel, but of the whole taxation structure? I am not referring only to a routine review, because I know it is always being subjected to that. I want to know whether a basic review is being made, because nothing less than that was contemplated in the minister's remarks last October.

Mr. McCANN: I think if the hon. member will review what was said by the Minister of Finance he will see that the basic review has to do with the legislative side of the matter. That is being studied. What I referred to more practicularly, and what I know more about, is the administration end of it. Progress is being made along that line. It is being studied from the legislative point of view, and ultimately will be reviewed.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said he was going to open new offices; I hope one of them will be at Peterborough, because we certainly need one. While I am on my feet I should like to ask about inspection of income tax. The department sends inspectors to different offices. I have in mind an instance in which two inspectors went into an office while the man in charge was busy. They said, "We would like to see your books." He said, "I am busy, but you are welcome to them. Come into my inner office and I shall get them for you." He seated them at a desk, got his books, placed them on the desk and said, "Gentlemen, if there is anything further, just call me and I shall come out and check it with you." He was busy for some time, and upon returning to the office discovered that the inspectors had gone. They had gone through his books—and had also gone through his desk and taken a few odds and ends out of it, without his knowledge. I do not think that is proper procedure.

Mr. McCANN: I agree with the hon. member, one hundred per cent. That was malfeasance of office, and will not be condoned.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad to hear that, because I did not think the minister would stand for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I was pleased to hear that the minister is considering the opening of more regional offices. Last winter I had occasion to meet a number of farmers in my constituency who were going to the regional office in Saskatoon. They had to travel three hundred miles, and it took them four days. If there were more regional offices I believe the department would get more funds and the farmers would get more satisfaction. I met these men when they were returning from Saskatoon, and they felt that they had received satisfaction from having travelled to that office. Some of the difficulties which had been troubling them were ironed out. They did not have to pay as much as they thought they would have to pay. When the minister is considering these new regional offices I hope he will put one in North Battleford. If he needs any help in securing a building, I shall be glad to cooperate with him.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not believe the setting up of more regional offices will remedy the situation. I do hope that the new legislation being considered in connection with the collection of income tax will put that collection on a businesslike basis. There is nothing more inadequate than the present method of collecting income tax. It would be against the law for any private business to penalize a person for not paying a bill which had been rendered. In my opinion a taxpayer should submit what he considers is an honest return on his income during a certain year, and the government in turn should render a bill, and until such time as the government has rendered the bill, there should be no penalty. A private concern could not do it, and it is ridiculous for the government to impose a penalty in connection with income tax returns that are not made out correctly, probably through no fault of the persons concerned. This is especially so when the department itself is two or three years behind in checking returns.

Mr. McCANN: There is no law that requires anyone to send a bill.

Mr. LENNARD: You know what I mean.

Mr. McCANN: A notice of assessment is not a bill, it is statutory; it must be in by April 30 of the succeeding year for which a return is made. In essence that is the bill. The man makes out his own bill, which is examined and corrected and then the assessment notice is sent out.

Mr. LENNARD: Does the minister consider it right that a man should be penalized when the department is three years behind?

Mr. McCANN: As a matter of equity any man who owes money to the crown for three years should not have the use of that money without paying for it.

Mr. LENNARD: Yes, but he is not aware that he owes the money to the crown until three years after he is supposed to have paid it.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Has there been any improvement in the checking of income tax returns in order that a person may know before four or five years whether the return is correct or not? Perhaps there was some excuse duing the war for this delay, but in peace time the returns should be along before four or five years. As the hon. member for Wentworth has said, a man does not know whether his return is correct or not. Then when he is advised that there is an error and he owes the government so much money, he is charged interest and then on top of that a penalty is imposed. One case was brought to my attention in which a man was advised after three or four years that he owed money and that they would garnishee his wages if it was not paid. He was able to show a marked cheque with which he had paid his income tax when it became due.

Mr. McCANN: The income tax officials are not infallible. You can pick out isolated cases in any business where errors occur. The matter of assessing is being much improved, but we cannot make the transition in the administration from war time to peace time as quickly as some people would like or as we would like. During the war years it was hard to get the proper type of official for the department, and as a result of that, and with the great increase in the number of returns during those years, there could not be anything but delay in making the assessments. We are on the road to bringing conditions back in conformity with normal business methods, and within a short time I think the public will see a considerable improvement.

There are some district offices in which the assessments are almost up to date for the preceding year. In the Ottawa office the assessments for 1944 are ninety-eight to ninety-nine per cent up to date, which is a good record. The 1945 return does not come in until the end of April, 1946; you have to have a period after that, and of necessity assessments are at least one year after the returns are made.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Does the minister think it fair that a man making a return which is correct to the best of his knowledge should have it sent back after a number of years with the statement that it is not correct and that he must pay a penalty? I cannot see any justice in that.

Mr. LENNARD: A few moments ago the minister answered me by saying that a person who owed the crown money should pay reasonable interest. I agree with him, but I support the hon. member for Durham who contends that he should not be penalized on top of having to pay the interest.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister may be correct in saying that legally a man who owes should pay interest; if he has calculated wrongly I suppose it is presumed to be his own fault and he should pay. However, the crown is not following its policy of extremely low interest rates, and I agree with hon. members who have spoken that if you charge a good round rate of interest, that ought to be enough.

Mr. McKAY: Has consideration been given to increasing the exemption, if I may put it that way, allowed for a farmer's wife? I do not particularly like the word "exemption," but I will have to use it. I know this matter comes under another department, but the administration is under the minister.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That would be under the Department of Finance.

Mr. McKAY: Administration would be under this department.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That does not come under National Revenue.

Mr. McCANN: As every one knows, the Department of National Revenue is entirely administrative. No matter what the rules or regulations are, we try to carry them out. If the hon. member wishes to have something changed, he should take it up with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. STEPHENSON: The minister did not answer my question. I asked him if he thought it fair that people should be penalized. Perhaps the Minister of Justice could give an opinion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As I understand it, there is no penalty. There is a statutory rate of interest charged up to thirty days after the notice of assessment is delivered to the taxpayer. It is only if he fails to pay within thirty days from the notice that there is an increase in the rate of interest. That increase is the only penalty I know of, unless there has been failure to comply with the requirements of the law in respect to the production of returns. As I understand it, the income tax is due on a certain date. A large number of the ratepayers are fortunate enough to be able to make out their returns in a manner that is not very much varied by the assessors when they go over the returns. Others, some no doubt in good faith and perhaps some who are not sure of their ground, take the benefit of the doubt in their own favour in making up the statement of what they should pay. If it is found that they have made it up at too low an amount, there is a rate of interest charged to them from the due date to the thirtieth day after the delivery of the notice of assessment. That is supposed to be a rate of interest charged for their having had in the meantime the use of the money.

Mr. LENNARD: Eight per cent.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is four per cent up to thirty days after the taxpayer receives his notice of assessment. Then, if the amount shown in the assessment is not paid within the thirty days, the rate goes up to seven per cent. I do not know of any penalty other than that additional two per cent which is the extra rate for not paying within the thirty days.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I have not a tax form with me, but I know I had to pay a penalty which was pretty near as much as the amount of the interest. I had no notification for three or four years after I made my return that it was not correct.

Mr. COYLE: What interest is due the man who has overpaid his tax three or four years ago?

Mr. McCANN: It is a long established rule and custom that the crown does not pay any interest.

Taxation division—

254. District offices, $11,594,826.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Does the refundable portion of the compulsory savings come under this item?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is it the intention to start paying back the refundable portion in the near future, and if so when?

Mr. McCANN: According to the law, the refund on 1942 tax must be paid by the end of March, 1948. That could be changed by order in council, but it has not been changed yet.

Mr. McLURE: I had an experience with a case that was sent to me this year which I think I should mention. I finally took it up with the deputy minister. This man had not made any returns for about a year and a half; he neglected all the notices that were sent to him, and finally received notice that drastic measures were threatened. He got excited about that and started to write to the members of parliament in his district, including myself. I appeared before the deputy minister of taxation, told him of all the good qualities of this man that I knew of, and presented his case in a sympathetic way. The deputy minister then said, "Well now, let me tell you all the headaches this man has given me and my department and all the costs in connection with it." I listened to that, and it was all true. But let me tell the committee how the department treated that man afterwards. The deputy minister said, "You have heard both sides of the case. What would you say should be done? Whatever you say we will do if it is fair." I must say on behalf of the deputy minister of taxation, with whom I was dealing, that he settled that case very satisfactorily to that man. That is the other side which I think should be told when we hear these complaints.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister said that the Ottawa regional office is pretty well caught up, which I was pleased to hear. Can he say what other regional offices in Canada are in the same position?

Mr. McCANN: I cannot give the figures, because they vary with the regional offices. The reason I mentioned the Ottawa office is that I am one of its customers myself, and when I happened to be in there the inspector proudly pointed out to me what the position was with respect to assessments in that office. Keeping up with the assessments is contingent, of course, upon obtaining suitable personnel and proper accommodation. Some of the offices are terribly overcrowded, and others are undermanned. It is hard to get the proper personnel for this kind of work. However, conditions generally with regard to assessments are improving.

Mr. LENNARD: Would the minister make a note of the question now so that he will have the information when the estimates come up next year?

Mr. McKAY: The 1945 income tax form was supposed to be in simplified form. Is the same form to be used for 1946?

Mr. McCANN: The form will be substantially the same, but every year the form has to be amended to conform with the amendments in the law. The 1946 form will contain the new table of rates.

Mr. McKAY: There will not be any radical change in the form?

Mr. McCANN: We do not expect any radical change.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In Toronto what we need more than anything else is more space for the income tax office. The staff is very efficient, but you just cannot pile more and more people into a crowded office and expect results. The business of the office will be conducted far more efficiently if more space is provided for the people who have to work there. They are very much overcrowded. I compliment this staff on the work they are doing under such conditions. They are doing a real good job. The deputy knows the situation in Toronto, and I would ask the minister to take this matter under his wing and see if we cannot get more office space. Then we should need fewer people, they would all be happier, and a far better job would be done.

General—

256. Government office economies control division—administration, $10,910.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This is a very important item, and I would like to hear the minister say something about it. I would like to know the scope of this new office and what has been the experience of the men in it. What have they been able to do in the important matter they have to deal with?

Mr. McCANN: The government office economies control was established in 1942 to examine and review all requisitions in the public service for printing, stationery, office equipment and furniture before purchases are made, and in general to apply the terms and regulations embodied in P.C. 4428 and amendments thereto. Administration is centred in the director, whose duty it is to determine the necessity for the articles requisitioned as also the quantity involved. While records are maintained showing the number of requisitions dealt with and estimated saving in each instance as a result of revision, any attempt to show by figures the economies effected in monetary value would not give the full amount, as no indication could be given of recurrent savings. In addition to screening requisitions received each day a careful review has been made of over 12,000 printed forms in use in the departments of the public service, and through substitution, lower grade quality of papers, standard size cut of forms, considerable initial and recurrent savings have been effected. All free mailing lists in the departments of government have been curtailed to a minimum. Standardization of qualities of paper in public printing and re-use of envelopes many times over have been effected, as well as reduction in qualities of binding of periodicals, publications, and so forth.

Careful review is made of all requisitions for publications, journals and other printed periodicals required for use of departments, and approval is confined to periodicals and scientific journals of use only to departments and libraries of government.

The teletype system in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has been extended to all departments of government through the efforts of the division, and is widely used by numerous departments, with an annual estimated saving of approximately $80,000 on telegraphic accounts alone. The amount of savings resultant by elimination of long distance phone calls cannot be computated.

Periodic inspection is made of all government stores at Ottawa to ensure that stock is properly shelved and kept in clean and good condition. Inspection is also made of duplicating sections of departments of government and examination made of qualities of papers used on duplicating machines; furtherance of single space and narrow margin on copy and elimination of waste of paper and inks, et cetera, maintained.

Careful scrutiny is given to requisitions for office machines and a number of transfers have been effected where machines are known to be surplus in any department.

A general tie-in has been made with this division acting as liaison between departments of government and War Assets Corporation for all office equipment declared surplus.

Considerable study has been given by the director to the advisability of having dormant records microfilmed so as to save the purchase of filing cabinets and space entailed in the filing and storage of dormant and semi-dormant files, and all departments have been advised accordingly. Several departments have adopted this process, and from information and records gathered it is believed that many other departments will follow.

I can give the duties of the director.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No. That is enough, thanks.

Mr. McCANN: I can give the hon. member some indication of the savings we have made.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I thank the minister, and I realize that I was wrong in my conception of the scope of the duty of this department. It is very much narrower than I realized. Perhaps I should have known that before. But it leads me to ask this question. At the time of the budget speech we on this side ventured to make some suggestions as to economy which the Minister of Finance, with unusual acerbity, said were very puny. The only thing I can say is that considering the actual economies which have been made they were like comparing a mountain with a mouse. I want to be realistic, and if possible even fair, and I know that reducing expenditures at this time is not easy. I know also that when you have a civil service of 150,000 it is difficult to know just where to begin, and I am equally convinced that unless there is somebody in a senior position who has the duty and the responsibility and the power, we need not expect any adequate reductions. I think we can also take it that when you have 150,000 people working, not all of them are working efficiently.

We all have the very greatest respect for a very large number of civil servants in all ranks. Nevertheless, I think I am correct in believing—though I hope I am wrong, and that the minister will tell me if I am—there is no person with power and authority and responsibility to deal with the larger matters where millions and tens of millions of dollars are involved, and to come to a conclusion with an independent outside view whether this, that or the other department has enough people or too many. That should not be left to persons inside the department, or to an overworked finance department if it is in the authority of the Department of Finance. It seems to me, as I ventured to say once before, that we are in much the position the navy would be in if you put up a lot of admirals to try to reduce the navy: you would not get very far. You do not take admirals, you take somebody else. Economy, though the word is a tiresome one, is important. It is a pity there are so few people here to-day to consider this matter. In the small scope which the minister has described it sounds as if a fair job is being done. But I may interject this, that when the question of furniture came up under the Department of Public Works, the Minister of Public Works did not leave us with the impression that it had been dealt with necessarily in the most efficient manner. There were doubts left, even doubts expressed on the other side of the house.

I would put forward one point which I think is very important: have we any authority with independence and power to look in a detached way at these expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars?

Mr. McCANN: As the hon. member realizes, when this division was set up it was for a specific purpose. As I have said, it was to review requisitions for printing, stationery, office equipment and furniture. Of course the biggest item of furniture that we have to deal with is filing cabinets.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am satisfied with the answer the minister made as to the scope of this authority. I do not want to press that further. I want to know if the broader situation is dealt with.

Mr. McCANN: I do not know that I can answer that question. I do know that it has been given considerable study. I understand what the hon. member has in mind is someone in the capacity, say, of an overall purchasing agent, to see if the purchases of the various departments cannot be interrelated and coordinated.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is something far beyond the matter of purchase; it is the whole set-up of the business of the Dominion of Canada with 150,000 people carrying it on. It is a tremendous operation, where right scrutiny and decision might result in savings, not of a few hundred thousands, but of tens and tens of millions. That is what we are considering, and I am sure we should all have it deeply at heart. If not, we certainly do not express the views of the ordinary citizen of Canada in this matter, because they have it in mind in no uncertain way.

Mr. McCANN: I might say that the government has, too.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): So far as I am concerned, the answer which the minister has given indicates that nothing adequate is being done to deal with the question of economies in a broad way.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation shortwave station—
257. Maintenance and operation, $1,232,700.

Mr. HANSELL: This, I understand, is an item for the operation of the short-wave station at Sackville. I am not opposing the item, because I think the short-wave station is an asset to Canada. But this vote with No. 258 and another supplementary item, amounts to approximately $1,500,000. One and a half million dollars is a lot of money to provide in one year for the operation of a short-wave broadcasting station from which we get no commercial return, or very little, and I should like to know whether this is to become an annual expenditure. I do not know anything about the technical end of radio, but it seems to me that $1,500,000 is a lot of money for maintenance and operation of a short-wave station for one year.

Mr. McCANN: I agree that a million and a half dollars is a lot of money for the administration of a short-wave station. I am afraid that it is going to continue to cost a lot of money from year to year. It was the general opinion of the house, and the matter was brought before the radio committee of 1942 and of previous years, that a short-wave station should be established. That was done. The capital expenditure was enormous. The position of the C.B.C. with reference to it is that they carry it on. The expenses are voted and will continue to be voted yearly by parliament for that purpose.

I can give the hon. gentleman something of a breakdown of the service and what it costs. The items of expenditures are as follows: Performers—these are the people who broadcast and make up the programmes, $475,000; salaries, $335,000. We pay $40,000 a year for a news service. That goes to the news agencies of Canada. Publicity costs us $25,000. We pay $12,000 a year for transmission lines. General operating overhead is $124,000. Rental of facilities in connection with that costs us $35,000. Power costs us $30,000 a year; tubes and maintenance, $31,000. Crescent street Sackville line, $42,000 a year. We have made improvements to the properties that we have leased, for which we pay rentals of $25,000. Supervision charges cost us $58,000. That makes up the total of $1,232,700. The capital expenditure for this year is $75,000. It was estimated that for improvements to grounds, dikes, roads, new structures, technical plant and antennæ, an amount of $125,000 will be required. Fifty thousand dollars was voted for the fiscal year 1945-46, but has not yet been expended because it was not possible to find materials and contractors to undertake the various jobs. This $50,000 is included in the supplementary vote for 1946-47. The major item in the new capital cost is 21 megacycle antenna, costing some $55,000, which will be required owing to conditions which are the result of sun spots.

I might perhaps give a little information which would be of some benefit to the committee. At the present time the international service schedule approximates a peacetime pattern and broadcasts forty-seven hours a week to Europe, an hour a day to the West Indies. Then there is a test transmission of one and a half hours per week to Latin America. In the European service twelve hours a week are devoted to programmes provided for the Canadian forces who are still overseas. This particular service will terminate this fall. The rest of the forty-seven hours is made up of daily programmes to the United Kingdom, France, Czechoslovakia and Germany.

The European service is being extended to include programmes to Norway, Sweden, Denmark Belgium and Russia. Plans also call for a daily service to Latin America, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. This proposed service will total 121½ broadcast hours per week. Because of the vastly greater audiences obtainable, the C.B.C. international service is making every effort to develop a relay system of broadcasting. A weekly programme from Canada has been relayed over one of the biggest stations in Rio de Janeiro since February. Other Canadian programmes have also been broadcast over local stations in that city. This fall a regular half hour programme to France will be inaugurated and will be carried on that country's national network. The B.B.C. are showing increasing interest in Canadian programmes, and several regular series of relays have been arranged and are under discussion. Our West Indies programmes have been rebroadcast widely throughout the Caribbean.

The international service will concentrate on those countries in which Canada is particularly interested. While the programme budget will not permit of many expensive feature programmes, the C.B.C. believes that by exercising ingenuity and imagination, and with the help of the domestic service of the C.B.C., the funds requested will make possible a comparatively modest but nonetheless effective job of advertising Canada.

There were two purposes for which the international short-wave system was set up. First was the matter of urgency. It was emphasized that we should have a short wave means of communicating with our troops who were overseas. The job was finished in sufficient time to be of great use not only in bringing news to our armed services who were in different parts of the European continent, but in spreading propaganda to the people who were our allies over there, and even propaganda to our enemies. In addition to that it has the commercial feature that it will keep Canada before the different nations of the world. This is not a revenue-producing service at all. It was built primarily for the purpose which I indicated and with the object in view that we should keep the name of Canada before the rest of the world and advertise Canada to our potential customers, as well as the products and the other things that we had for sale.

Mr. BURTON: Just to follow that up for a moment, I would express the hope that the short wave station does not carry the soap operas across the sea that we have to listen to in this country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is one thing that the minister forgot to say when he was speaking about the need of a high power short-wave station, namely, that a great many of us were disturbed in the early days of the war by the fact that the stations broadcasting in Great Britain would be bombed out.

Mr. McCANN: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That was the real urgency in the matter. At that time I had correspondence from Great Britain along the lines which I have just mentioned. I mentioned it in the house and other members as well. One or two things disturb me about the maintenance of the short-wave station. Personally I think this station can be used to great advantage to Canada. Each department of government which uses the station should buy the time from the C.B.C. and put it in their own estimates instead of charging it up to the short-wave station. I do not think it is fair to have everything free over the short-wave system. I am not in favour of having a lot of this time free over this station.

The minister said that we have a news service which cost $40,000. I do not understand that. We are paying $70,000 to the Canadian Press for radio news. I think it is $40,000 to the United Press. I believe in that, but I do not see why we should have to pay another $40,000 for our short-wave station as well. I want to justify the expenditures on the short wave station. This station will be of great value in the future if it is properly handled and used, but it should not cost us nearly as much as it is costing to-day. If it were properly managed it should cost us much less than that.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister mentioned $35,000 for rent. What premises have the C.B.C. rented for the short wave system?

Mr. McCANN: This item is covered by order in council of September 1, 1944. It is rental payable for the use of studios and equipment provided by the C.B.C. in Montreal, Crescent street. The international service, which is separate entirely from the domestic service, pays a rental to the domestic service for that part which is used for international purposes. The same obtains with reference to the news service. We do pay $90,000 a year for the domestic service and $40,000 for the international, the two amounting to $130,000. It does not make much difference whether you pay the $130,000 all to the one source and charge the $40,000 to this, or make it two separate items, because the same people in the main are supplying the news, the Canadian Press, the Associated Press and the news service.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that mean that the premises and headquarters of the short-wave system are in Montreal?

Mr. McCANN: No. The short-wave station is at Sackville, but you have your people who are administering it and your programmes originating not where the station is located. That is why you have to have expensive wire service from the place of production of the programmes to the station which transmits them.

Mr. STIRLING: What I was trying to ascertain was the wisdom of setting up in Montreal what is virtually the chief premises of the short-wave system, whose station is at Sackville when the C.B.C. headquarters are at Ottawa. What is the sense of going to Montreal? Would it not have been better to have them all together at Ottawa where the C.B.C. is situated?

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member will appreciate the difficulty. From the administrative end, it does not make so much difference where you have your offices, but from the point of view of producing programmes you could not possibly have your programme, studios and facilities where your short wave station is, because you have no big area there, nor have you the people to call upon to produce the programmes. So that we try to get that talent in metropolitan areas like Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, where the talent is available. As regards Montreal, the reason is that that city is closest to the large production centres of the short-wave station.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not want to see the C.B.C. charged, so far as short-wave operations are concerned, with a lot of expenditures which should not really be charged to them on their overseas broadcasting account. You have to have broadcasting in different languages, but you do not have to translate music, and you have wires there too. You also have your press service, and it should not be charged to the overseas broadcasting all the time. That is going to be the tendency if we do not look out. We shall have the operations in Canada charged against the short-wave broadcasting overseas.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is any revenue received at the moment from the short wave through advertising or otherwise, or is the policy against it? Is it anticipated in the future that there will be substantial revenue, or will it be entirely a voluntary service?

Mr. McCANN: There is no revenue at all from the operation, and it is not contemplated that there is likely to be a revenue, because it is not used by individual commercial people or firms. There are no countries that have commercial short-wave stations.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not seriously objecting to the amount. It is a lot of money, and I know it does cost a good deal to give such service; I only hope that we can convince ourselves that it is worth it. The people of Canada, however, should know that it is costing them a tremendous amount of money to run a broadcasting institution under what is commonly known as government ownership. There is not only this amount that we have here, and the amount in the supplementary estimates, almost half a million, but there is also the question of licence fees which the listening public pays, amounting to around $4,000,000. In addition to that, this year, we are going to be asked to appropriate another $2,000,000. That is just about $7,500,000 which this year the taxpayers are to be asked to pay. That is the financial burden. When we hear the argument about government ownership, it is usually stated that private industry is making a lot of money out of somebody and therefore by government ownership the profits can be turned back to the workers, and so forth and so on. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is in a commercial business, and yet in spite of that it is costing the Canadian taxpayer, without the extra $2,000,000, around $5,500,000. That is the picture which the Canadian people should know. I recognize that radio in Canada is giving a service to the people, for part of which there is no compensation by way of commercial return, but whether it is worth it or not I do not know. There is a question in my mind. I will not be too harsh, but I simply make the observation that that is what the taxpayer of Canada is having to put up because the government is in the field of radio.

Mr. KIRK: I take it that the station at Sackville is the only short-wave operated by the C.B.C. in Canada.

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. KIRK: How many days a week are they on the air, and how many hours a day?

Mr. McCANN: The short-wave station is on the air every day in the week. At the present time they are operating 47 hours a week, and we propose shortly to increase that output 121 hours.

Mr. KIRK: What is the policy of the C.B.C. regarding the insurance of the plant, towers, aerials and other equipment belonging to the C.B.C. at Sackville?

Mr. McCANN: The item last year for insurance was $1,402.

Mr. KIRK: Is that the amount of premiums?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. KIRK: What is the policy in the placing of this insurance? For some years I have been endeavouring to get the C.B.C. to place their insurance with maritime insurance firms. Finally after a good deal of correspondence and conversation with different ministers in charge of the work I got a letter, as far back as May 24, 1945, from the present minister. It is not marked as confidential, and I believe

I may be permitted to read it. I do this so that hon. members, and the people of Canada generally, will know the policy:

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of May 7 with reference to insurance on broadcasting station Sackville, N.B. It is your desire, I understand, that some of that insurance be given to a local firm.

I have taken the matter up officially with the general manager and chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It appears that the corporation have a definite policy with reference to the placing of their insurance. They have an expert who advises on the amount and the type of insurance to be placed on any plant, and they have found it most beneficial and economical that that business be placed with one large firm.

I say the department could still retain the expert, still get advice from him and still try to give some of those in the maritime provinces who are in the insurance business a chance to secure some of this business. Matters connected with price, and responsibility of insurance companies, could all be considered. But it does not appear right to me, and to those who have been talking to me, that this business should be centralized. There is too much of this centralization to suit some of us in the maritime provinces.

This is one place where the government can show the way. It is true they cannot tell private enterprise where they are going to set up business, but they can give a lead. If the government can show hon. members why it is better to place this business with one large firm, situated probably in Montreal or Toronto, I should like to hear it, and I know the people of Canada would, too.

Mr. McCANN: I have nothing to add to what was said in the letter. That is the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I do not make their policy. For business reasons they have established that policy and are carrying it out.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister has explained that this short-wave service was instituted during the war, that it was an excellent service for Canada at that time, as authorized by parliament, and that now in peace time it still functions and performs good service. Objection has been taken that it is costing the public money. If it were not done by the government, as it is being done, it would have to be done by a private corporation, with the service costing just as much, and probably a great deal more. Services we receive from private stations are not rendered free of charge. When we buy commodities we pay for those broadcasts, through the extra charge for advertising. That does not fool anybody.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Macleod take exception to this vote of about $1,250,000. Only a short time ago the same hon. member characterized a similar sum as chicken feed because he proposed to manufacture it in his particular way. I still think this is chicken feed, and that he was right in referring to the other item as chicken feed. This item involves a service to Canada in a special way, and I am in favour of it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to place one further point on the record. This is not a C.B.C. station.

Mr. McCANN: Not at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a government-owned short-wave station recommended by a parliamentary committee, the recommendation being adopted by the House of Commons and put into operation so as to give Canada a voice in the affairs of the world. The C.B.C. operates only as agent of the government, does not own the station, and does not charge the people of Canada out of revenues received for any service rendered in connection with this short-wave station.

Mr. HANSELL: Since the hon. member for Cariboo has referred to some of my remarks, may I tell him that I am willing to accept this vote for chicken feed. As I said, I am not seriously objecting to it. However, I do want people to get the picture I have in mind which I believe is the true one. The hon. member has said that when a private broadcasting station operates it does cost the people something because advertising is charged in the price of goods. He says that does not fool anybody. The fact of the matter is that it has fooled him. That is not what happens at all. While that amount may be charged in the price of the goods, by reason of the advertising the manufacturer is able to sell in such volume that as a result the price of the goods to the consumer is reduced. If they did not have this advertising, the price of the goods would be higher because the manufacturer could not produce the goods in sufficient volume to put them on the market at an attractive price. So there are a few people who are not being fooled.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member has revealed how he has been fooled, in the last analysis, to assume that people do not know what they want unless they hear it blared at them ten or fifteen times a day. Such an assumption is ridiculous. I can get my soap without anyone telling me what kind I must get.

Item agreed to.

Loans and investments: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—

965. Loans to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repayable with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine and to be applied in payment of expenditures on the construction, extension or improvement of capital works of the broadcasting facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in Canada. Such loans, with interest, shall be a charge on the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation next after the charge imposed under the provisions of section 17 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, $2,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is an interesting vote. Already we have had before the house a bill dealing with these matters; now we have something different. We have what I would call a subterfuge bill. It is just the same thing, but they are trying to make it smell a little sweeter by introducing it in this way. I do not wish to discuss the matter at length, but I should like to make some brief observations before this large amount of money is voted. This is your money, mine and everybody else's. It is the taxpayer's money. Before it is voted there should be more investigation of activities of this kind. The private corporations are willing to spend their own money to do a job which we are asking the taxpayers of Canada to put up the money for. These private corporations are also paying taxes into the treasury of Canada. We have no more need for another high-powered radio station in Canada than a cow has for a fifth foot. We are getting service there at the present time. Let the private stations do the job. Make them go up to their full power if you like, but do not spend the taxpayers' money.

It is all very well to say that we are going to have two voices in Canada, that we are going to have the trans-Canada network and the dominion network. The first thing you know we shall be spending more and more money. Let us have one really good network operated by the national corporation, and let us have another good network operated by the private stations. We shall then have two voices, and an opportunity to have two opinions. I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod:

That vote No. 965, for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, be reduced to one dollar.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. HANSELL: May I say to the hon. gentlemen who are crying "question" that they are a little previous.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. HANSELL: No matter how much they cry it will not prevent one from saying what he wants to say about the expenditure of money.

An hon. MEMBER: You have said it already.

Mr. HANSELL: I have not said nearly enough. If my hon. friends want to go out in the lobby and smoke—

An hon. MEMBER: Or sleep.

Mr. HANSELL: —or go out to lunch or go to sleep, I do not care, but I am going to take up a little time to discuss a few things. This is an important item.

An hon. MEMBER: Question.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member who is making so much noise was on the radio committee and he should know the importance of this item. It is not merely the voting of $2,000,000; we are voting on a vital principle. If my French Canadian friends, whom I—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Easy on that.

Mr. HANSELL: —admire for their stand—

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: There is such a mass of hysteria over there that I do not quite understand it. I admire them for their stand on Canadianism; I am for them, but I say to them that I am pleading now for the preservation of that same Canadianism. It will pay them to hear what I have to say. Perhaps this speech should be coming from that corner of the house instead of here.

As I say, there is a vital principle involved. This tremendous organization has within it inherent and potential powers, unlimited powers, almost unthinkable powers. We have an organization here which can reach the ears of a quarter of a million people almost any time in the day. Tell me if that is not a powerful organization, a powerful medium for the dissemination of information and propaganda.

During the sittings of the radio committee there was presented a brief on behalf of the Canadian Association for Adult Education. I am not criticizing that association for one moment. I believe in education; a man is a fool not to believe in education. But there is a sense in which our educators can be wrong. They have not always been right, as history will prove. As I say, this organization came to the committee urging that the present radio set-up in Canada be maintained, in other words that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be not interfered with in respect to their authoritarian powers and their control of radio in Canada. I have no criticism to make of their advancing that argument, because it is the right of any man or any organization to come before such a committee to make his or their desires known.

In the course of the hearings on their brief I brought out the fact that I had received a number of telegrams and letters from several farm forums in my constituency and others, organizations affiliated with the Canadian Association for Adult Education, which put out over the C.B.C. networks various talks on farm problems. I am not criticizing those programmes because I think some of them are very good. What I am criticizing is the fact that these farm forums were circularized by Canadian Association for Adult Education. They were asked to send in resolutions supporting the present radio policy in Canada, supporting the present status of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One might say they had the right to do that. I am not questioning their right to do it, but an incident arose in the radio committee to which I should like to direct attention. I desired to bring this before the committee but the circumstances were such that I agreed to leave it over until the bill was presented. Now we have the estimate. The incident was simply this. I brought out the fact that many of these farm forums which were sending out these resolutions were doing so without a full knowledge of the facts. I did use the expression that in one case these people did not know beans about radio, and of course that was put over the news wires. I am not objecting to that.

Mr. CLEAVER: You should not. You said it.

An hon. MEMBER: It was your constituents who were objecting.

Mr. CLEAVER: And you said it.

Mr. HANSELL: Certainly I said it.

Mr. CLEAVER: Then why back up?

Mr. HANSELL: I am not backing up; don't think I am. I know that a little smear campaign went on. I picked up the People's Weekly the other day. My C.C.F. friends may think I do not read the People's Weekly, but I like to read the funny papers occasionally and so I read that, and here on one page I saw in big type: Hansell scorns his constituents —or something to that effect. I can go before my constituents any time of the year and I am not afraid to put all my cards on the table. The fact of the matter is that what I said I repeat now, that many of the organizations which sent in those resolutions asking that C.B.C. maintain its present status do not know all the intricacies of radio and do not know the tremendous implications involved in Canada's radio policy.

Mr. CLEAVER: Their judgment may be just as good as yours.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not saying that there are not a good many people in the country who do know what it means but I am saying on the basis of the circularization of those petitions that people responded because they enjoyed the farm forum programme, not because they knew all that was involved in the future of radio.

Now I am coming to the point I want to bring to the attention of the committee. I asked in the radio committee if the Canadian Association for Adult Education might have circularized their organizations, and I got the answer: Yes, it was quite possible they had. I shall not take time to turn up the page of the evidence, but I was led to believe that a certain resolution was sent out, which resolution was all right. I am not criticizing the resolution that was passed by the Canadian Association for Adult Education, but what I do criticize is a letter that was sent out to the farm forums and was never brought to the attention of the radio committee. I want to read that letter now. The secretary of the farm forums is a gentleman by the name of Ralph S. Staples. Mr. Staples presented a brief to the committee as representative of the union of cooperatives in Canada. I have no objection to that, and no objection to the brief that he presented. But in the brief he claimed that those who were opposing the taxation of cooperatives were able to pay for broadcasts, while evidently the cooperatives could not get the same service in putting their arguments before the people. I have no particular objection to that, but this Mr. Staples is the man who sent out this circular letter to the farm forums. I am going to read the letter, and I will ask my friends over there on the Liberal side of the house how they like it. The letter is dated Toronto, June 19, addressed to the secretaries of farm forums in Canada and headed, "An Important Message". It reads:

National Farm Radio Forum could not exist without the tremendous contribution made to the project by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As you know the C.B.C. produces the broadcast and provides the time on the air, including the network facilities and so on. The C.B.C. does this as a service to the people of Canada, a service which does not cost farm forum or the other organizations which sponsor farm forum a single dollar.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is right.

Mr. HANSELL: Some gentleman says "That is right". That depends on the kind of glasses you are wearing. While it is true that farm forum is not a direct charge on the Canadian listening public, it is also true that the Canadian public are providing the networks and are paying four or five million dollars in licence fees to keep the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation going, thereby enabling the corporation to put over the programme known as farm forum. That is point No. 1 that should be made clear in the first paragraph of this letter. The second paragraph reads:

The national executive on farm radio forum meeting here yesterday expressed great concern because the C.B.C. is at the moment under heavy attack. The attack comes mainly from two sources: (1) the private radio stations through their organization, the National Association of Broadcasters, and (2) from the newspapers in Canada, many of which seem to regard radio as a competitor and some of which are controlled by interests financially involved in radio stations. The reasons for the attacks are not far to seek. Some of the larger private stations are making huge profits out of broadcasting and hope to make more if they are permitted to operate a network for profit. It is apparent that there are in this country interests which act as though they would like to choke off free discussion.

I want the members of this house to analyse that paragraph, and believe me, you cannot analyse it with any degree of intelligence without coming to the conclusion that a socialist wrote it.

Mr. CLEAVER: What a pipe dream!

Mr. MAYBANK: Suppose he did.

Mr. HANSELL: What is the situation? In the first place, where is the heavy attack coming from against the C.B.C. by press and radio? Apart from one or two editorials, which it is the freedom of the press to write, I do not believe the attack has been heavy at all—not nearly as heavy as I should have liked to see it. As for private radio making any attack on the C.B.C., the shoe is on the other foot. In the evidence submitted it was said that the most cordial relations existed between private stations and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. My criticism is of that sort of letter going out individually to farm forum organizations asking them to back the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in their present status. I am not saying that they have no right to be asked to do it; I am criticizing that kind of letter.

The third paragraph reads:

As is done at frequent intervals, the House of Commons has appointed a committee to make a study of radio broadcasting and to bring in recommendations. This committee represents all parties. There are twenty-five members of the committee. The national executive of farm radio forum feels that the forum should support those members of this parliamentary committee who contend that radio broadcasting in Canada should continue to be carried on primarily as a service to the people of Canada and not necessarily for the money which can be made.

Now, analyse that paragraph, and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is one of the most insidious reflections upon certain members of the radio committee. Let me read it again:

The national executive of farm radio forum feels that the forum should support those members of this parliamentary committee who contend that radio broadcasting in Canada should continue to be carried on—

He does not say, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

—primarily as a service to the people of Canada and not necessarily for the money which may be made.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with that?

Mr. HANSELL: There is a lot wrong with that.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. HANSELL: My friend wants it explained. I was going to say, any stupid muttonhead could read the meaning of that paragraph.

Mr. IRVINE: Otherwise you would never have got it, would you?

Mr. HANSELL: The letter was sent to these farm forums; it was not sent to me.

Mr. LENNARD: And to the hon. member for Cariboo.

Mr. HANSELL: It is saying that there is a section of members of the radio committee that are there for the specific purpose of seeing that radio is run so that men can make money out of it instead of giving service to the people of Canada. I repudiate and refute that.

Mr. MAYBANK: He does not say it is you.

Mr. HANSELL: He says, certain members of the committee.

Mr. MAYBANK: You are not all those members.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, of course I am only one, but the intention of the paragraph is as plain as anything can be.

Mr. MASSEY: Absolutely.

Mr. HANSELL: I say that every member of that radio committee was interested only in giving the best possible radio service to Canada, and at all times, commensurate with it, of preserving our glorious heritage of free institutions. Every last member of the committee had that in mind, and that only.

I support the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I speak to service clubs, and I have spoken on the subject of radio in Canada and plugged for the C.B.C. Now, believe it.

Mr. MAYBANK: We do.

Mr. HANSELL: Here is another paragraph:

A dangerous proposal has been made—

Who said it was dangerous?

A dangerous proposal has been made, namely that the broadcasting act should be amended in such a way as to remove from the board of governors of the C.B.C. the authority necessary to regulate radio broadcasting in Canada.

Here is a man who, with the Canadian radio networks at his disposal, takes it upon himself to circularize the people saying that a proposal which might be made to have a separate regulatory body that will be perfectly neutral is a very dangerous proposal. Let me go on:

It is unnecessary to set forth what the results of such a change might easily be.

There is an insidious sentence of inference, the writer knowing full well that the people to whom he addresses the letter are not cognizant of all the facts. And that is the thing I object to. Here is the last paragraph:

If you value a radio system that is not controlled by wealth—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is one o'clock.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well, Mr. Chairman. I thought may be I might finish the one paragraph.

Mr. COLDWELL: Finish the paragraph.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move, Mr. Chairman, that you report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. gentleman had just a few lines in the paragraph to put on the record to complete what he had to say, and I think it would be well if he were allowed to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: Probably it would be better if the hon. member completed the paragraph.

Mr. HANSELL: I will just read this part:

If you value a radio system that is not controlled by wealth then we urge you to get in touch with your member of parliament at Ottawa by wire just as soon as you can.

As to that, Mr. Chairman, let me say that if you can prove to me that a socialist did not write that sentence, then—

Mr. COLDWELL: Come off that! It makes no difference what a man's political views are when he writes a letter for an organization; and I don't know what he is.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the paragraph completed?

Mr. HANSELL: No. It continues:

A very short wire will do. All you need to indicate is that you like the C.B.C. and that you support it in its present form.

You might think he was writing to some school boys.

You should sign it as secretary of your farm forum. A copy of the wire should be mailed to Mr. Ralph Maybank, M.P., chairman of the special committee on radio broadcasting, House of Commons, Ottawa.

In matters of this nature the farm radio forums across Canada can have an influence far greater than their numbers would indicate.

Yours sincerely.

Mr. MAYBANK: Believe me, they did it.

Progress reported.

Resolutions reported.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I wish to move that these resolutions be read the second time and concurred in, so that they may be put in print immediately for the preparation of the bill which will be based on them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we go on with this, I am not at all certain of the procedure which is being followed, but I understand that we are not concurring in any resolution at this stage if it has to do with the matter now under discussion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. That resolution has not been passed.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The resolution which was under consideration by the committee when the committee rose has not been reported.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move:

That the resolutions considered in committee of supply this day and reported be read the second time and concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

NOON RECESS FROM ONE TO TWO O'CLOCK

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to several hon. members and I have the impression that it would be their desire that the intermission at mid-day to-day be of only one hour instead of two. I would therefore move:

That, notwithstanding the terms of standing order No. 2 and of the resolution of January 22 last the intermission at mid-day this day be from one to two o'clock p.m. instead of one to three o'clock p.m.

Mr. LENNARD: Might I suggest that "two o'clock" might be several minutes after two?

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL AVIATION

TABLING OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND AUSTRALIA

The house having reverted to motions:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copy of an agreement between Canada and Australia for air services between the two countries, signed in Ottawa, June 11, 1946, and effective of that date. I may say that simultaneous announcement is being made in Canberra and Ottawa on this day. I have a statement with regard to the air line which, if it is agreeable to hon. members, I will have printed in Hansard, to save time.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the understanding, Mr. Speaker, that after it is printed hon. members may ask any questions which may arise with respect to it, as is normally done when a statement is made in the house.

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

(The statement follows):

Canada has already signed bilateral agreements with the United States, United Kingdom and Newfoundland. The present agreement with Australia represents the fourth in a series which we shall be negotiating to open the way for the Canadian international air services we plan to operate in accordance with information I have on previous occasions given to this house.

The agreement with Australia follows the standard pattern of our other bilateral agreements,—a pattern which was approved for general international use at the Chicago conference on international civil aviation in 1944. It provides for an exchange of traffic rights between Canada and Australia so that an air line designated by the government of Australia may put down and take up at Vancouver passengers, mail and cargo from Australia, while an airline designated by the government of Canada, which will be Trans-Canada Air Lines, may put down and take up in Australia traffic to and from Canada. The route to be followed by the airline designated by Australia is via Fiji, Canton Island, Honolulu and San Francisco. The route to be followed by Trans-Canada Air Lines is not yet finally decided and accordingly is not specified in the agreement.

It is understood that the airline to be designated by Australia will be a joint company owned and operated by the governments of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. In order that arrangements may be completed for the Pacific route this will, of course, involve a further civil aviation agreement between Canada and New Zealand as well, and discussions to this end have already been initiated.

In order to provide for complete cooperation on the Pacific run, between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the joint Australia-New Zealand-United Kingdom airline, a special clause has been added in the annex to the agreement looking to a pooling arrangement between the two air lines and a reciprocal exchange between them of traffic rights enjoyed by each along the route. This complete and full cooperation will be in accordance with plans originally worked out at the commonwealth discussions on civil aviation held in Montreal in the autumn of 1944.

I am not at the moment able to give the house complete information as to when we may initiate our trans-Pacific air service. This will depend upon a number of factors such as the conclusion of other necessary bilateral agreements along the route and the availability of suitable equipment and facilities. It is my expectation, however, that the year 1947 may see Canadian planes making regular scheduled runs to the southern Pacific.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at two o'clock.

Mr. HANSELL: Before the luncheon adjournment I was dealing with a letter which was sent out to circularize the farm forums throughout Canada. I have finished with the reading and the explanation of the letter, but I should like to add that it is easy to see that the intent of the letter was to solidify the corporation in its present authoritative powers, and that at least by implication the letter would cause the farm forums to be alarmed lest their programmes be taken off the air by the coming into the picture of a private radio network.

I contend that there was no need for the letter, and certainly there was no need to imply that there was any such danger as was implied. Even if there were set up another network in Canada under the management of private radio, it would not render the corporation one bit less effective in the service that they are able to give to the country. The farm forum programmes would go over the air just the same, and so would the other educational features sponsored by the C.B.C. These features are going over the United States networks all the time as a service to the United States people, and there is no government-owned corporation there. I am not implying that we have to do away with the corporation just because some of us are recommending that there be a neutral regulatory body. It appears to me that the whole scheme and process of preventing that from happening is to strike fear into the minds of some people who are enjoying certain programmes, and by implication lead them to believe that radio service in this respect is to be curtailed.

I should like to ask the minister whether or not it would be possible to place on the record the names of the secretaries of the various farm forums. I do not wish to take up all the time, and it appears that my forty minutes have expired, but since the committee rose and reported progress, according to the rules of the house I could go on.

I should like for a moment or two to pursue another aspect of the matter and attempt to show the potential dangers which are inherent in the authoritarian powers now held by the corporation. When I was speaking on the first reading of the bill which was introduced the other day I likened the corporation to the possibility of a newspaper corporation under government ownership, should one be established. I tried to give an illustration to show that if the same thing were happening in newspaper enterprise which is happening to-day in radio, the people of the country would be seriously alarmed. I drew that illustration, but I want to go one step further. I did not have time to develop this particular point the other night, but it is well known, and we can put it down as basic, that radio is still in its infancy. It is a rapidly growing science, and there is now appearing in the field of radio a science known as facsimile. Hon. members of the committee are aware of just what it is, but should some who might occasionally read Hansard wonder what the term means may I explain that facsimile is a process of transmitting by the air waves over the radio the printed page. That branch of radio science is already an accomplished fact. It is true that in this development we in Canada have not gone so far, but two newspapers in the United States are, I understand, already giving that service. One of them is giving it as a service, and the other is in the experimental stage. The facsimile process simply means that one can tune in his radio, get the news as he does now, and at the same time the news is printed right there and then in front of him. After he has heard it he can go to his set and tear off the sheet just as you would tear a sheet of paper off a roll of wrapping paper, and there in front of his eyes is the record on the printed page. Not only is that an accomplished fact but it may be only four or five years before the same thing can be done in pictures in three or four colours. The point I am trying to make is that not only are the potential powers now inherent in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation going to drive private radio out of business, but I sound the alarm that by the method of facsimile they are going to drive the press out of business. Someone will say you cannot arrest the progress of science. No. You certainly cannot, but the point I want to put before the committee is that facsimile is done by radio process, and there is now inherent in the present broadcasting act all the powers of the present radio corporation to control radio. You do not need to give them one iota more power to control facsimile.

Perhaps we do not need to be greatly excited if the press of Canada should sound an alarm at the growing powers of C.B.C.; neither can we afford to be too much excited when some of us suggest that there be a neutral body with regulatory powers and that these powers be removed from the corporation. It would not diminish in any way the service which the corporation gives the country. I sound that alarm because that is something that is coming. Make no mistake about it. It is not very far off.

I would make as a further argument that because we are still in the infancy of radio, together with the growing part of radio known as frequency modulation and the other aspect known as facsimile, and so forth, the C.B.C. would be far better off financially and otherwise not to take over these channels at the present time, but to bide a wee and let the thing rest for a couple of years or so. Let them tell these private stations CFRB and CFCN that they must step up their power to 50 watts. My information is that they are prepared to do it. We know by the record that they have repeatedly asked permission to do it, and I am suggesting that they be given that permission and thus the 50 kilowatt channels will be reserved for Canada. I might point out further—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HANSELL: Very well, Mr. Chairman, but perhaps you are not aware that the committee rose and reported progress and asked leave to sit again, and this is the second sitting.

Mr. MAYBANK: May I break in for two or three minutes, thus giving the hon. member an opportunity to begin again? I am sure he will not impose upon the committee; he will take only the time which is really necessary for his case. After this interposition on my part, I submit that the hon. member has again the opportunity to speak, and I respectfully submit to the committee that he should be given that opportunity. I say that the more readily for the reason that the hon. member was very active in the radio committee and devoted a great deal of time to his labours. While he may have been in disagreement many times with most of the members of the committee, both his indefatigability and his persistence were such that I consider he is entitled to special treatment, if we ever give special treatment to anyone.

Mr. HANSELL: I wish to thank the hon. member, who was chairman of the committee, for these very kind remarks, and I can assure him, and you, Mr. Chairman, that I do wish to facilitate the business of the house. In fact, that is what I have done already, because I spoke personally with the Minister of National Revenue and the minister who is acting as house leader, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, when the bill was brought down, and made a commitment to them that I would not discuss the bill in the resolution stage. I undertook to facilitate the work if I could discuss the matter at a future stage, and this is the opportunity that offers now.

I do not ask all to agree with me. That would be an impossibility anyway. I would not want all people to agree with me because if they did I would have reason to think that I was wrong. However, I have serious convictions along these lines.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am wondering whether the hon. member is leading himself to believe that because he is in a minority he is right. That, I submit, is also a fallacy.

Mr. LENNARD: I believe he is in the majority so far as the people of Canada are concerned.

Mr. HANSELL: That, I think, is a keen observation. It is possible for the minority to be right, but I do not believe that if the people of Canada knew the entire facts I would be in the minority. I do not think I know all the facts, because I do not believe it is possible to get behind the scenes and get all the facts. I am not now saying that there is anything which the officials of the corporation do not want to let us know, but I am saying when it comes to peace, order and good government, when it comes to running a nation in a complex world, there are forces operating behind the scenes, and they invade human experiences. Those forces mould public opinion and bring pressure to bear even upon officials. Governments are not immune from that. Governments and organizations are dependent upon their advisers; and who are their advisers, and where does the advice come from? It is my conviction—it is not merely a passing thought with me, it is not a flash in the pan but a strong conviction—that there are forces at work in the world to destroy our Christian democracy, and these forces, believe me, have not overlooked and do not overlook anything. If you ask me to prove that, I must say that I may not be able to put my finger on a particular spot, but those forces, on the face of it, have not overlooked and would not overlook the most powerful medium for the dissemination of information, propaganda and education that exists in any nation. You have to accept that at its face value, and protect yourself against it.

I was reading the espionage report the other day. I brought the matter up in the committee, and therefore I do not believe I need to take a great deal of time in discussing it. But perhaps all hon. members do not read these reports; certainly the country does not have an opportunity to read them. At page 44 of the report of the royal commission on espionage we find this:

> It became manifest at an early stage of this inquiry, and has been overwhelmingly established by the evidence throughout, that the communist movement was the principal base within which the espionage network was recruited; and that it not only supplied personnel with adequately "developed" motivation, but provided the organizational framework wherein recruiting could be and was carried out safely and efficiently.
> In every instance but one, Zabotin's Canadian espionage agents were shown to be members of or sympathizers with the communist party.

Mr. JAQUES: Fellow travellers.

Mr. HANSELL: And it continues:

> Zabotin found already in existence in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto numerous study groups where communist philosophy and techniques were studied and where writings of Marx, Engels, Lenin and later authors were read and discussed. To outsiders these groups adopted various disguises, such as social gatherings, music-listening groups and groups for discussing international politics and economics.

In the light of that I would point out that the same communists, the same communist party, known as the Labour-Progressive party, are free in a series of political broadcasts to continue to broadcast over the Canadian networks. I know the argument is offered that it was a matter of government policy whether this organization constituted a political party, and that the corporation in a sense has washed its hands of that responsibiliy. But that was not the passage I had in mind. The one to which I would refer chiefly is found at page 49 of the report. It states:

> The evidence also discloses that secret members of the communist party played an important part in placing other secret communists in various positions in the public service which could be strategic not only for espionage but for propaganda or other purposes.

Does anyone suppose in the light of that that the communists forgot all about the C.B.C.?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: What about the private stations?

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend asks what about private stations. They have not overlooked those, either. Here is the point I want hon. members to get: I pointed out in committee that if I heard a philosophy coming over a private station which tended to divide the loyalties of the people of Canada I would be just as much in opposition to the management of that station as I am to anything else. I oppose that. One must remember, however, that when an individual broadcasts over a private station he has an audience of perhaps several thousands of people, depending upon the size of the station. I wonder if hon. members are aware that when an individual broadcasts over a national network he has an audience approximating 1,500,000 people. I understand that is the approximate listening audience in a national network broadcast of talks.

The corporation are continually reminding us that they are the guardians of free speech, and they do so by saying, "We are desirous that all shades of public opinion be broadcast over the air." I have no quarrel with that; their intentions may be good. But if free speech means anything it means that I have as much right to it as has any other individual. What is happening over the Canadian networks is that freedom of speech is confined to a handful of regular commentators. A commentator must be asked to come on the air by some official within the framework of the corporation. He is paid, and he is given the facilities of the network to talk to 1,500,000 people. How would my hon. friend sitting opposite like some time to talk to an audience of 1,500,000 people? It would be fine, would it not?

Mr. IRVINE: If he had something to say, it would be.

Mr. HANSELL: Let me ask the hon. member if he thinks he can get on the network and talk to 1,500,000 people.

Mr. HOMUTH: It depends on what party he belongs to.

Mr. HANSELL: Freedom of speech means this, that if one man gets on the air, or anywhere else, another person has a perfect right to answer him. If he has not that right, then we have not free speech. That is the position. I realize that where there are several millions of people in a nation we cannot have each of them saying, "I want to answer the commentator who was on the air last night." I know that would be physically impossible. But let us not accentuate the idea that the C.B.C. are the guardians of free speech because they say they want all shades of public opinion to be expressed. Free speech is free only when everybody has an opportunity to present his case.

I have two suggestions to make. The first is that they do away altogether with commentators. I do not think they are needed. But I am not offering that suggestion without making an alternative suggestion. In their place they should have weekly round-table discussions on the most recent topic, to be conducted by three or four speakers who would have directly opposite views. The discussions should be entirely unrehearsed. By this means the people could be told all about the particular subject. I would guarantee that such a programme would have one of the largest listening audiences in Canada. Often I listen to the town hall meeting of the air in the United States. That programme has prominent men taking part, government officials, heads of labour organizations and even governors of states. It is unrehearsed and is an extremely interesting programme. They stop at nothing—I suppose common sense would prevent a man swearing at another—in discussing the latest topic, whether it is politically hot, international or whatever it is.

I have a further suggestion to make. If the corporation is still bent on keeping this handful of commentators on the air, I suggest that no one commentator be allowed to stay on the programme for more than one or two months at the most, and then he should be heard no more for at least a few years. Surely there are enough well-informed men in Canada that we do not have to filter all this information through a dozen half pints of brain. Surely there are enough capable people in Canada to keep this thing going indefinitely. I could say a lot more about commentators, but I appreciate the courtesy of the committee in listening to what I have had to say, and I do not wish unduly to extend my remarks.

During the past year I have taken down many of the things that have been said over the air by commentators I am not going to take the time of the committee to read them all, but I think they would be found alarming, to say the least, as far as dividing loyalties in our own country is concerned. I am saying these things to the present administration in the hope that they will look at the matter clearly. I know they must have had conferences at times with their advisers, but they are busy men and cannot give their whole time and thought to these things. There is no question in my mind that they have been unduly influenced in connection with the radio policy.

I contend that it would pay us to revamp our whole radio policy. My Liberal friends may say they are sure that everything is safe in the present hands, but there is no guarantee in the world that things will always be in the present hands. We do not know who is going to take over in future years.

Mr. IRVINE: You may.

Mr. HANSELL: We might. If we do, and if I have anything to do with the Social Credit party, we will have a neutral regulatory body. I am not talking authoritatively, but I repeat that if I have any influence within the party that is what I will recommend. I do not want to deprecate the valuable services rendered by the C.B.C., but I believe radio should be run on a competitive basis. I did not say one system working in opposition to the other; I said we should have one system working in competition with the other. There is all the difference in the world. I despair of the future so long as these authoritarian powers are vested in the C.B.C.

I do not want my hon. friends to my right to take offence at what I am going to visualize as a probable future board of governors. Personally I would not want to see this happen, but it could happen. I do not think our C.C.F. friends will ever get in power, and I have my reasons for believing that, but if they did, could we assume that the present board of governors would continue indefinitely, or would they be replaced?

An hon. MEMBER: They would be replaced.

Mr. HANSELL: Who is going to take their place?

Mr. McKAY: Trestrail would be a good man.

Mr. HANSELL: Trestrail would not be an appointment of our C.C.F. friends, I am sure. I should like to suggest the names of a few men who might form this board of governors. They should have a lawyer, so we would have Mr. David Lewis. Then I suppose we would have to have some one interested in education.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that his right name?

Mr. HANSELL: That is the name I call him by; I do not know whether he would respond to any other. Then they will have to have some one on the board of governors who is interested in education, and I would suggest Professor Frank Scott. Then they would have to have some one interested in another type of people and I would suggest that Harold Winch might be a good member. Then by the time they gained power the hon. member for Vancouver East will probably have long grey hair. As my hon. friends are going to do away with the other place, he could not be appointed there, so perhaps the hon. member who sponsored Bill 37, making it a criminal offence to criticize a Jew, a Russian, an Englishman, a Catholic or a Protestant, would be a good man to have on the board of governors. Of course they should have a journalist, and perhaps Elmore Philpott could fill the bill.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who is he? He is a Liberal supporter, isn't he?

Mr. HANSELL: Then of course, they should have a woman on the board of governors. Perhaps it might be the one who said that our greatest danger was our British connection.

Mr. LOW: Agnes.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, Miss Agnes Macphail. That is quite a board, isn't it? Maybe they would do good work. I do not know.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you on it?

Mr. HANSELL: They would not put me on it. Imagine a board such as I have mentioned governing radio in Canada and clothed with all the authoritarian powers that are now vested in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You picked it yourself.

Mr. HANSELL: Does my hon. friend think that would be a good board of governors?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You are talking; don't ask me.

Mr. HANSELL: All I am saying is that the future is uncertain, and while my friends immediately across the way may think everything is all right now, that is no guarantee that they will be all right five or ten or fifteen years from now. Men's minds can be swung overnight. In the early days of the war, when the communists were busy in Canada trying to sabotage our labour organizations and our shipping and our productive activities as we were trying to speed them up to full wartime capacity, we recall how often the old propaganda machine got busy and painted the communists as terrible—Russia itself was a terrible dictatorship. But suddenly Russia entered the war on our side, and overnight the old propaganda machine changed its tune: Oh, Russia was quite a democracy then!

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Not for me.

Mr. HANSELL: Not for you. The fact of the matter is that somebody lied; they either lied first or lied afterwards, one or the other. You cannot have it both ways.

What is happening now? The picture is beginning to change again, and I am with my friends right across from me on the Liberal benches in their views about communism. Believe me, any philosophy that goes out into the world and results in murder, the shooting of eleven thousand priests and nuns and the burning of about twenty thousand churches and hospitals, is a philosophy that I am going to fight and fight hard, and I am with my friends right opposite me on that, and I want them to know that. Some people might call me a protestant simply because I am not a catholic. I am neither a protestant nor a catholic.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you?

Mr. HANSELL: I go by the simple name of Christian. But as a bulwark against atheistic communistic philosophy I bow to my hon. friends right opposite me, and that is why I say they should be making this speech instead of me, because nobody knows who will have charge of a machine like C.B.C. in a few years' time. I do not want to spread any false suspicions, but we do not know to what extent the communists have infiltrated into this organization.

Mr. McCUAIG: Can you not trust the majority of the people?

Mr. HANSELL: I trust the majority of the people when they know the truth, but my hon. friend knows as well as I do that mass psychology can work the masses up into a frenzy, and woe betide this country if that should ever happen.

Do not wonder, Mr. Chairman, that I am alarmed, because it is a conviction with me. I say again that I want the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to remain a great and vital institution for the service of the people of Canada in the field of radio, but I am just as strongly convinced and determined that we must guard safely our free institutions which the present Prime Minister has so often boasted that he himself would do his best to preserve.

Mr. MAYBANK: It is not my intention to endeavour to take up all the arguments, or rather all the statements, that have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just finally ceased—or at any rate ceased; I do not know whether finally or not. But there are a few observations which I think should be made.

I turn my attention first to his remarks about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and communism. The vote before the house is one for $2,000,000 to permit certain expansions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The hon. gentleman's argument, it seems to me, is that on this one score at any rate the vote should not be granted because of the danger of the infiltration of communists.

Mr. HANSELL: Not entirely.

Mr. JAQUES: And the fear is well founded.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is a proposition to which he and his fellow Social Credit members have a right to subcribe. But if you are going to refuse the development of an organization because of the danger of some "ism" creeping into its workings, there are all manner of developments in this country which could not go ahead. The Canadian National Railways are in the same danger. Every other organization under the government is in the same danger. The government itself is in the same danger. If we were to follow that sort of doctrine, the easiest way would be to cancel out government altogether and settle down into the anarchy which I fancy the hon. gentleman would think is a sound and sensible way of living, because his own methods of reasoning and arriving at conclusions are themselves thoroughly anarchic.

Mr. McIVOR: Paddle your own canoe.

Mr. MAYBANK: Surely this house is not going to refuse a reasonable and sensible expansion of a good institution by reason of the consideration of bogys of the sort spoken of at so great length and with so much misplaced fervour by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I shall deal in a moment with one or two features of this expansion.

A few days ago the consideration in radio matters was of a different sort. We were discussing a bill, and at that time several matters were introduced which are no longer quite germane to the question. For example, there is the question about an independent court, the question about the provincial governments owning broadcasting stations, the question about the divorcement of radio from newspapers. I submit, sir, that so far as the report of the radio committee is concerned all of these matters were simply left in abeyance because there was not time to get the evidence necessary upon them all. For example, with reference to the question of whether governments should own radio stations, the leader of the C.C.F. party, I have no doubt, would be in favour of that. For my own part, up to date I can see no objection to it, but I do not think the time has come for a decision, because there has not been enough evidence upon it. Again, the gentleman to whom I have last referred would desire to see the divorcement of newspapers from radio, and the hon. member for New Westminster indicated that he thought that way. So far I find myself in disagrement with that, but I do not think the time has come for a decision; I do not think sufficient evidence has yet been adduced for us to make a decision. It is true that if all newspapers owned radios there could come to be a combination that would keep people from getting news, and that they would have an improper control over the moulding of public opinion. But it would seem to me that before action along that line should be taken there ought to be some evidence of that sort of thing developing. It is not quite enough, it seems to me, to indicate merely a possibility, as the hon. member who has just spoken did when he was crying out about communism, of something happening. It would seem to me that is one of the questions which should be deferred until we have concrete evidence one way or another. I have a friend who has a shot gun.

Mr. IRVINE: Bring it along.

Mr. MAYBANK: I do not think we should take the shot gun away from him on the ground that he will go and shoot his wife. He has not shown any tendencies in that direction, and until he does, I should be in favour of leaving my friend in possession of his shot gun.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course if he aimed at his wife it might be different.

Mr. MAYBANK: If he were aiming the shot gun in this chamber at the present time and could scatter his shots to the point of hitting all those who join together to interrupt at the same moment, he would probably be doing a service. However, he is not here, he is not aiming, and the interruptions have stopped; so I will proceed.

These, I think, are the considerations to be kept in mind when we are talking about a separate court for radio. After all, there was but little evidence introduced to the radio committee pro or con with reference to the idea of a separate court, whether it be an appeal court or not an appeal court. The Canadian Association of Broadcasters indicated that they thought there ought to be a neutral body. It is true that Canadian Broadcasting Corporation officers said the contrary. I believe they said that upon being asked their opinion. I do not think, by the way, that it is their business. It is natural that they should express an opinion, and particularly it is natural when they are asked to express an opinion. However, that is a matter for government and not for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But I could not help being reminded that the whole framework of the Canadian Broadcasting Act developed as the result, first, of a very important and very good commission, and, second, was given a great deal of consideration by parliament in 1932, and that these principles in the main were carried over into the present act of 1936. It has seemed to me that these people in 1932, including the hon. member for Stanstead, who was one of the Conservative members of the house at that time and no doubt took an active part in coming to the decision underlying the bill of that year, must have gone pretty carefully into this question of control. Again, in 1936 the Tory party as well as all other parties joined in endorsing the principles which are thus put into statutory form. Now, to have the mere statement made that there ought to be a neutral court at this time, and immediately to accept it without again going into all the principles that underlay the legislation in 1932 and 1936, seems to me to be precipitate action, and as far as I am concerned I am confident I can keep an open mind upon the question until we can give it full consideration.

As to the theories which have been advanced with respect to an independent court, they strike me as reasonable, but I find myself checked by the fact that all this has been given careful consideration by such men as the present Lord Bennett, together with all of the members of his cabinet at the time, and again by the Bennett opposition of 1936, and again by this present government. I find myself checked when I remember that they went into this thing so carefully at that time. Hon. members may feel that the very moment something seems sound in theory it should be quickly adopted. I feel that it never does any harm to sleep on a proposition when you have come to a tentative conclusion that it is good; it is wise to wait a few more days before coming to a final conclusion. And that goes for the various things I have mentioned; they are all of the order, it seems to me, of matters which can properly be deferred.

Now I come to this question of expansion which has been mentioned and which is all that is called for at the present moment by the $2,000,000 vote. The expansion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been envisaged every year since 1936. It was part of the original plan; it was examined year by year from that time onward. Such expansion as could take place up to 1939 was necessarily interrupted by the war. Committees from time to time, unanimously I believe, have recommended that this expansion should go forward, and it is in this year that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation comes to the point where it can carry out the dictates of former committees and of parliament. That is our starting point this year. The expansion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation calls for the operation of certain stations which are at present being operated by private broadcasters. It does not call for the corporation taking over the stations; it calls for them operating upon certain wave lengths. Canada was granted a certain number of clear channel wave lengths. This was done by the Havana treaty, an international treaty, which assigned these wave lengths to us. It is understood that they must be operated at 50,000 watt power. They are as follows: CKY at Winnipeg, CFCN at Calgary and CFRB at Toronto. It is not necessary that Canada herself should develop these channels up to 50,000 watts; it could be done by a private owner so far as international law and treaty are concerned. But if we are to have these clear channels it is necessary that they be developed.

We find ourselves in this position. We have to decide whether we shall allow some private owner to develop these channels up to 50,000 watts, or whether we shall do it ourselves under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. When we obtained the channels it was intended that they would be developed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That has been known by parliament from that day to this. The measure has been endorsed whenever opportunity arose to endorse it. Moreover, all persons who have private stations have them clearly upon the understanding all these years that the amount of power allowed to them was the same as would be allowed to every other owner of a private station. They have clearly understood that no private station would be singled out and allowed to raise its power up to 50,000 watts. If we were to grant to the present owners of CFRB, CFCN and CKY the right to raise their power up to 50,000 watts we would be rankly and grossly discriminating in favour of them as against all other private station owners. With all the past behind us I do not think that as between the various operators it would be the fair thing to do.

It is clear that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation must have some further expansion if the people of the country are to be served by it. It has been asked why should there be another 50,000 watt station in or near Toronto. The hon. member who asked that question completely misunderstood the situation. It is not the desire to have another broadcasting station of that power in Toronto. That is not the point at issue at all. The main point is to have it as part of the broadcasting chain, so that the fine programmes which can be developed in Toronto—because it is understood and accepted that good programmes originate in the populous centres of Canada—can be given to Canada by a second network which cannot be given by the present network. The question really resolves itself into—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. member be specific in the statement he has just made?—because it seems to me to be a crucial one. It was made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who said that the present network of C.B.C. could not give national coverage. I understand it has been stated that C.B.C. now gives 94·7 per cent coverage. Will the hon. member make that clear?

Mr. MAYBANK: I shall do it now, even though it may cause some slight interruption in the connection of ideas that I was endeavouring to maintain. There is no doubt that at the present time the C.B.C. is giving 94 per cent coverage. There is no doubt that no matter how many stations are established in Canada, no more than 94 per cent of the people could be reached. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar expressed himself in the manner in which the hon. member just indicated, he was clearly in error, because an elementary knowledge of arithmetic shows that you cannot go much higher than 94 per cent. It is a fact that by taking over the stations and increasing the power some parts of that 94 per cent will be reached in a better way; that is, the signal may be weak in some places but the 94 per cent would, by the development of station CFRB and these other stations and this general expansion programme, get a second network programme. It is not a case of giving the listener any more on the same network programme; that just cannot be done. It is rather a case of further developing this second network programme which has already been started but is running only a few hours a day.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the hon. member agree, and if so will he point it out clearly, that it is not a question of this second network not being developed; it is rather a question of who shall develop it?

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. gentleman means that the second network can be developed by private stations; is that it?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is what I mean, yes.

Mr. MAYBANK: There is no doubt about it that if private stations were allowed to do so they could develop the network. The crux of the whole question is whether the law will be changed to allow private stations to have this network. There is no doubt that if private stations were given full sway, physically they could develop the network; that is possible, although it has always been definitely against the opinion of parliament that they should be allowed to do so, and it has been written into the act since 1932.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Not the opinion of parliament—the opinion of the Liberal government.

Mr. MAYBANK: Excuse me; it should have been a Liberal government in 1932, but the people went wrong a few years before. There were Tories here at that time and they wrote the act in 1932 which was modified in 1936. It is amazing how many people will forget even history which is so near to them. I do not know where the hon. member was at that time when his brethren were running the country and running it into the dirt.

An hon. MEMBER: He was asleep.

Mr. MAYBANK: An hon. member says he must have been asleep; I do not know about that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MAYBANK: When I was interrupted the first time I was about to say that it was a necessary part of the expansion programme of the C.B.C. to take over station CFRB for the purpose of building up a second network in order that the people may get fine programmes which can be obtained in the more thickly populated parts of Canada, in this particular instance in Toronto. That is the reason for it. It is not because Toronto needs it, or the area around Toronto. It is because it is the desire to bring these programmes to other parts of Canada. It is for that reason, if for no other, that I submit this expansion should go forward. We must continue as much as possible to bring fine programmes to the people on the farms, in the woods, in the small villages and in all these places where they do not have the amenities of life that are possible in Toronto, in Ottawa, in Montreal and in Winnipeg and in various other places; we must strive to bring to these people all the amenities of life which it is possible for us to extend to them. We sometimes talk about the difficulties of unifying Canada. These are some of the things that tend to knit the country together. You cannot get the best development of the country unless the people in the hinterland, socially speaking, enjoy some of the advantages of those who live in the populous parts of the country.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): CFRB has done a great job, and the people in my part of Ontario are convinced of it. If they were given an opportunity to go up to full power, would the people not have just as good a service as can be given by the present system, without cost to the taxpayers?

Mr. MAYBANK: I have answered that question already, but I will go a step further. The question really is whether private organizations shall be allowed network privileges. I submit that they should not be allowed network privileges, for the reason that they are interested only in their stations as commercial concerns, and the result would be that they would bring the network service only as far as their advertisers, who pay for the programmes, would desire their advertising to go, and there would be no reason for those private stations to carry their advertising programmes to distant parts. They would only strive to sell what the advertiser thought was worth buying. An advertiser would not wish to pay the cost of programmes going to the hinterland, because there is no one there to buy his product.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is a feeble argument for the socialist doctrine of the Liberal party.

Mr. MAYBANK: I have proceeded thus far, receiving from various parts of the house certain intelligent and always courteous questions, which I have endeavoured to answer in the spirit in which they were asked. I do not wish to reply to the hon. gentleman in the spirit which seems most common to him. If I have to stand for any more static from Waterloo, all right; I shall have to do so. However, I would suggest to the other members of the Tory party that they take in hand their brother from Waterloo and endeavour to instil into him some of the courtesy which they themselves usually exhibit. I am not hopeful that they can instil into him any of the intelligence that they themselves generally display.

I was dealing with the question of networks before I was so rudely interrupted.

Mr. HOMUTH: You are just a spider.

The CHAIRMAN: I hope the interjections have been completed. There has been a generous number of them.

Mr. MAYBANK: The reason that the private network should not in general be allowed, although I do not suggest a complete prohibition, is that the advertiser would only carry that network to the place where his product could be sold, and thus it would come about that these private networks would only go to those places which were most thickly settled; and secondly, the network programme which it is desired to give to people less fortunately situated in Canada would not in fact be extended to them. The whole question is a social one. The question is whether or not we shall endeavour to give to the people in these outlying parts some of the benefits which are obtainable in the cities and in the large centres of Canada. That is the whole question.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the hon. gentleman thought of the possibility, assuming the development of a privately operated network, of the C.B.C. picking up such fine advertising programmes as are put out by the private stations and putting them over the air?

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes. I had thought of that, and before long I hope to say a few words about advertising in general. If I forget to do so, I hope the hon. gentleman will remind me of it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask a question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It will not take a second.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: The chairman is willing to give the hon. gentleman time off.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection to allowing time off, but I must inform the committee that no questions can be asked without the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. MAYBANK: Dealing with what the hon. gentleman—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I simply wish to say—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must insist that the hon. member take his seat. Once more I remind the committee that questions may not be addressed to the member who has the floor without his consent.

Mr. HOMUTH: And it must be through the Chair.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask Your Honour whether I may be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. MAYBANK: It was not quite that, Mr. Chairman, though I do not blame you for thinking that was my attitude, because I could not make myself heard. I had intended to say to the hon. member for St. Paul's that I should be glad if he would wait a few minutes before asking his question. Obviously the question he wishes to ask is a very important one, because he is quite persistent. Perhaps, therefore, it would help all round if I took his question now.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The question I wish to ask it this. Does the hon. member believe in good commercial programmes, and does he not believe that it is in the interests of Canada to have good sponsors? Does he not believe also that there is a lot of nonsense talked about commercial programmes? I know he agrees with me that good commercial programmes are desirable. Just before I sit down, may I say this—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the question?

Mr. MAYBANK: The question the hon. gentleman has just asked shows an entire misconception of any remarks I have heretofore made. For this I do not blame him. I may not have been very clear in my exposition, but I have not at any time decried the commercial programme. The hon. member asks if I do not agree that many commercial programmes are indeed very good. That, in effect, I believe is the sense of the question. Well, one has only to mention the programme Fibber McGee and Molly—

Mr. HOMUTH: Who is Molly?

Mr. MAYBANK: —the best programme there is, so far as I am concerned. That is a commercial programme. So I am not decrying commercial programmes at all.

I believe I have said about all I can say on the general network idea, as to whether there should be a network, or whether there should not be, and whether we should have a private network system. I come back, then, to say that the taking over of high-powered stations is in large part, indeed in the main, necessary because people in Canada outside the populous centres must have more than one choice of network programme. Those who would not permit what is called the dominion network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation really are saying this, that they do not believe the people in the distant parts of Canada should have two choices of network programmes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No.

Mr. MAYBANK: It comes down to that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Oh, no.

Mr. MAYBANK: I submit that is what it is. I will agree that that is not what the hon. member for St. Paul's, who has interrupted me, has ever said in so many words. But when it is said that the dominion network should not be developed, then, under the present condition of the law, it comes down to saying that people in the hinterland may not have a second network choice. I know he would take care of that by allowing private stations to have the network.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is not fair; that statement is not fair.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am afraid I had better not say what I am thinking with reference to the interruptions of the hon. member for Waterloo South. I guess if I said what I am thinking I would be thrown out of the House of Commons—or even out of a saloon.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would be a grand idea if you were, because you have not added anything to this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Quack, quack!

Mr. MAYBANK: It will be recalled that for a considerable time the hon. member for Waterloo South used to carry on like that—day after day after day after day after day. He would sit over there and annoy people. He never annoyed me very much. Finally some members of the house decided to interrupt him by calling, "quack, quack, quack"! Even he came to realize how apt was the description in that manner of himself.

Mr. HOMUTH: I still did not hear what he said.

Mr. MAYBANK: There is but little more I desire to say upon this subject. Before discussing the matter of advertising I should like to advert to some observations suggesting that the private stations were not being well-treated. Only a very few sentences will be required to answer that.

In the first place anyone who will look up the records will find that these poor degraded stations, as the hon. member for Stanstead described them, are multiplying. Every year there are new applications for private stations. And these new applications are made by keen-sighted business men. They know that the opportunities in radio for them, as the operators of community stations, are very great. Many of them have been licensed, and I believe very few refused. The list will be found in the proceedings of the radio committee, and will disclose that the number has been growing from year to year, until in the last few years it has grown quite large.

Mr. HOMUTH: In the last three years it has depended entirely upon what political party it was.

Mr. MAYBANK: That is why I am interested when someone suggests that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation desires to keep down the number of private radio stations. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, of course, has no power either to grant or to refuse a licence; but it is always asked for its recommendation. Day after day, as these have come in, far from recommending against them, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been recommending in their favour. So that it is a mistake to suggest that that corporation—

Mr. HOMUTH: Then the hon. member has declared right now that the government has the final say.

Mr. MAYBANK: Oh, yes; the government has the final say.

Mr. HOMUTH: We wanted to find that out—to stop the independent stations.

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not think any member of the House of Commons would find it necessary to rise in his place and address a question as elementary as that one to anyone. Surely the world has known and the Canadian people have known that the Minister of Transport is the licensing authority. Surely everybody who has ever had any conversation with anybody about radio knows that. I have no objection to answering questions, but it amazes me that even the hon. member should ask that question.

Mr. HOMUTH: Of course I only ask it as a question from someone who is less bright than I am.

Mr. MAYBANK: I do not know what the last question was, and therefore I cannot answer it. But if it was not any more intelligent than the other interruptions of the hon. member, it does not matter whether it is answered or not.

Mr. FERGUSON: The hon. member has said that numerous new stations were being licensed. I suppose he makes that statement with full knowledge of the number of applications, the number of acceptances and rejections in connection with new stations. Can he give me those figures?

Mr. MAYBANK: I did make the statement with some knowledge, although I would not go so far as to say that I had full knowledge at the particular moment I made it. Some of the facts are not in my hand at the moment. I cannot give the complete list just now, but the hon. member will find the list of all those stations very close to page 741 in the proceedings of the radio committee. I have had the list among my papers right along, but it is not there just at the moment. However, perhaps the hon. member will be content to accept that until such time as he can consult his own copy and read the proceedings, when I am sure he will find what I have said is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I know the hon. member does not wish to be unfair. He has said that the licences are issued by the Department of Transport—and that is correct. But the last word as to whether any station is to be issued a licence or to have power to operate is with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. MAYBANK: I thank the hon. member for the manner in which he prefaced his statement, because he said he knew that I did not wish to be unfair. Such indeed is true. Not only do I not wish to be unfair, but I should like to be as accurate as I can. And in regard to the statement with which he has taken issue I have been not merely fair but also accurate. The final licensing authority is the Department of Transport; but the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has the right to make recommendations, and does so. Sometimes it may, for all I know, recommend against—although I believe that has not been done very often. I do not make that statement with complete certainty, but I believe it has generally recommended favourably. I would agree this far with the hon. member, that the recommendations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are very often, if not invariably, accepted; for that reason there is some warrant for his interrupting me in the manner he did. The legal position is that the Minister of Transport has the final word in licensing, but the influence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I should say, is very great. Perhaps that brings the two of us sufficiently close together on that point.

Mr. FERGUSON: The reason I asked my question was that in the town of Barrie two returned officers with quite a war record were desirous of opening a station which the people felt was badly needed in order that they could have news of the activities of that town and the surrounding country. They appeared in Ottawa on several occasions; they built up a sheaf of correspondence about two inches thick but they did not seem to be able to get anywhere with the corporation. Their application was virtually refused, and after spending several months trying to get a licence they found their money dwindling away and had to give up. That is why I asked if it was easy to obtain a licence, or whether the corporation had assumed dictatorial powers and would grant licences only to certain people under certain conditions.

Mr. MAYBANK: My hon. friend can hardly expect an answer from me on a particular case. I suppose there are many occasions on which delays occur. It is something like trying to obtain a route on a highway. When people desire a licence to operate over a certain wave length it generally means there is an engineering problem. I know so little about engineering that I do not like to say very much about it, but I understand you must be sure that the granting of the licence will not interfere with another wave length already operating, and no doubt there are many other considerations. One cannot expect to deal with a particular case with any sufficiency.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HOMUTH: I think the hon. member is entitled to extra time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. MAYBANK: I want to express my thanks to the hon. member for Waterloo South and the members of the committee.

I have just a few words to say with reference to advertising. Complaint has been made that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is entering the advertising field to a greater extent than in the past. It is said that private stations are being deprived of advertising because the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was taking it up. I suppose that would be true to the extent that private stations are carrying national advertising, but the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would have no effect upon local advertising. The only service the C.B.C. could give to an advertiser is in connection with national advertising. Except in a few instances the average private station does not handle national advertising. A station like CFRB in Toronto would probably serve 2,000,000 people in that area, and it has available a vast field of local advertising. I understand from people interested in private radio broadcasting, as well as from those in the C.B.C., that this type of advertising is the most lucrative. As far as national advertising is concerned, the greater part of the revenue obtained by the C.B.C. goes to the private stations. This money simply touches the hands of the C.B.C. and is passed on immediately to the private stations.

Assume there is a station called XYZ in the town of A in Alberta, not on a network. When the dominion network is established it would be included and would immediately benefit from any advertising revenue the C.B.C. obtained. I suppose in this development some private stations will be hurt by having their advertising intake reduced a little, but on the other hand many private stations will be helped by having their advertising intake increased.

Just a final word with reference to advertising. The Aird report stated that the national radio ought to go in only for indirect advertising, but that was in 1929. I suppose programmes have changed greatly since that time, and advertisers have also changed their methods greatly. It would not be feasible for any organization to attempt to exist only on indirect advertising. Indirect advertising is of the sort where a programme is put on the air and an announcer says, "This is brought to you with the compliments of such and such corporation." That ends the advertising and then follows the symphony or whatever the programme may be.

As every person knows, direct advertising is advertising which may occur right in the middle of a programme, and it generally occurs at the beginning and end. It takes the form of "Buy Camel cigarettes," or "Use Lifebuoy soap," and so on. We listen to hockey broadcasts which tell us about Imperial Oil. As I said, advertising methods have changed, and I do not see how C.B.C. or any other organization could continue to exist without that type of advertising. I mentioned Fibber McGee a little earlier. That programme could not go on a network if only indirect advertising was permitted, nor could we have these hockey broadcasts, because they are direct advertising.

We think we must have many of these programmes which we could not have if we had indirect advertising only. Long ago the public began to demand that they should have these programmes, and therefore reasonable allowance with regard to advertising in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation networks must be made. The hon. member for Eglinton wanted something included in the report, but later he withdrew his request, and following along those lines I would suggest a formula something like this: Direct advertising must always be such that it will not mar the programmes. That formula should apply to the private stations as well as to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Because of the ingenuity of advertisers, listeners to the radio feel that they must have the programmes of those advertisers. On the other hand the influence of radio upon the advertisers can be such that I think we can get good programmes with advertising, but not so much advertising or of such a nature as to impair the programme.

I did not intend to speak so long, Mr. Chairman, but you and the committee will agree that there have been certain interruptions which caused me to speak longer than I had intended. In closing I wish to thank you and the committee for its forbearance in listening to me.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, unquestionably the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the chairman of the radio committee, has made an excellent speech. He has placed before this committee the case of the C.B.C., and has given the reasons and arguments which have been put forward in order that Bill 391 may come to be. On the other hand I cannot help but feel that his arguments are as hollow as a drum, and I want to beat upon that drum for a few minutes. I do not for a moment wish to attempt to discredit his arguments from the point of view of the sincerity with which they have been put forward, first by the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and now by the chairman of the radio committee. Nor do I wish to take up one by one these arguments. I will make my own speech in my own way, which I hope will cover, for the information of the members, the ideas I have in mind.

In the first place I should like to make my own position clear. For reasons sufficiently well known to the members of the house, and upon which it is not necessary for me to dwell, I have not been able to sit in this house until just recently. But I have been able to follow the deliberations of the house through Hansard and the reports of the various committees; therefore I have some knowledge of what took place in the radio committee. From 1935 to 1940 I was a member of that committee, and I have been interested in radio since its very earliest beginning. In fact I personally broadcast over the air as early as 1922; I was on the air continuously from 1925 to 1939 and frequently since, and for two years in the 1930's I was interested in the radio advertising business, with which I have no connection whatever to-day. It so happens that some of my closest friends are in th radio business, either with C.B.C. or with private stations.

I want to make clear what my opinion of the C.B.C. is. I think the C.B.C. is an excellent organization for the purpose for which it was designed. But when it goes beyond that purpose I feel it is time for this house to check its progress along channels through which it was not designed to go. C.B.C. is a body possessed of as fine executive radio talent as there is in this country. I have nothing but the highest praise for men in the radio game such as Mr. Ernest Bushnell and Mr. Charles Jennings, to mention only two who are completely outstanding and have the respect of radio broadcasters in all countries. Their service and the service of the C.B.C. in many of its specialized functions is a credit to Canada and has done Canada good. I think therefore, speaking in those general terms, I have made myself clear as to what I think of the C.B.C. as it was designed to be. I should like to add this further word, that it has always been very kind and considerate to me in connection with matters in which I happened to be interested or with which I was connected.

I said a few moments ago, "the purpose for which it was designed." I think it would do no harm, Mr. Chairman, to take a few minutes of the committee's time to make clear the purpose for which C.B.C. was designed. That takes us back—I do not want to immerse the committee in a bath of history—to the inception of the Canadian Radio Commission, which later became the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There was a situation prevailing in radio at that time which was most involved and from the point of view of solution, most elusive. We were young in radio in Canada, while immediately next to us tens and later scores and then hundreds of millions of dollars were being spent by that mighty nation, the United States, whose programmes were infiltrating Canada. There was no particular policing of Canadian broadcasts. There were no particular regulations, except in a loose and general way, and there was a definite absence of service of Canadian programmes to all parts of Canada. This situation was thoroughly covered in the Aird report, which has been aired so often and so thoroughly. Hence it was felt desirable that there should be brought into being a regulatory body which in its turn would bring to all parts of Canada a Canadian radio service.

I was interested in the formation of the Canadian radio commission. I knew its chairman intimately, the late Hector Charlesworth, and I know whereof I speak. Hon. members may wish to draw out and expand and make deeper and put implications into the formation of the Canadian Radio Commission which later became the C.B.C., but I am telling this commitee the facts, and that is as far as the duties of the Canadian Radio Commission originally went. It was designed to control, to police and to censor. It was to be a regulatory body composed of those who knew something about radio broadcasting. It was to protect the radio listener from unfortunate Canadian programmes which might be aired from time to time, and it was to put Canada on the air map in so far as special services were concerned which were beyond the power or the pocket book of the Canadian advertiser. It was, then, to regulate and supervise. It was next to give programmes to all of Canada, and as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has said, especially to the more remote parts of Canada not served by radio. So it was that in 1932 there were those in parts of Canada which are not so remote who could get no programmes whatever, let alone from the United States. It was to give to Canada an impartial news service, not sponsored by any newspaper, which news might conceivably be coloured by the opinions of that paper, but a Canadian news service. It was to report on world events from its correspondents throughout the world, correspondents in the pay originally of the commission and later of the corporation, just the same as to-day the British Broadcasting Corporation, the Columbia, and other networks have their correspondents in all parts of the world. It was to bring reports of special events of wide interest. It was to bring to the listener, therefore, a specialized service. It was to canadianize its own programmes, divorced from advertising. It was to give a short-wave service to carry the voice of Canada to all parts of the world. It was to give educational programmes of a kind and type that no commercial sponsor would ever promote. It was therefore to raise radio out of merely the field of entertainment into the field of information and, shall I say, education.

I postulate, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as constituted to-day is virtually doing these very things. It may not be doing them as fully as is required by the listener; it may not be doing them as fully as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation themselves would like to do them, but within the limitations of the money at their disposal I consider the C.B.C. is doing an outstandingly good job. It can do better, and will. Then why this vote? Is this vote in order to employ more Canadian talent in Canada? Is it to raise the basic scale of pay to Canadian artists? Is it for the purpose of giving better programmes? No, it is not. This vote is for the physical expansion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In the face of the fact that 94·7 per cent of Canada is at present covered—which is virtually saturation—the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation wishes to expand network programmes, and the expansion of network programmes means perforce under this vote that monopolistic control will be totally, completely and finally in the hands of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has stated that the wave lengths provided under international agreement and at present in the possession of CFRB, Toronto, CFCN, Calgary, and CKY, Winnipeg, are wave lengths on which there must be broadcasting of a power of 50,000 watts. In spite of the fact that the possessors of those wave lengths have had them over a period of years and have given satisfactory service, as has been pointed out repeatedly, to the listeners in their community and within their range, they are not to be permitted to increase their power to the 50,000 watts because, were that permission granted, there would be discrimination against all other stations and discrimination in favour of them. That is the drum, Mr. Chairman, on which I am pounding. I think that is as hollow as a tympani. It is much better, therefore, in accordance with the arguments of my hon. friend, that these Canadian stations, giving a service to the people of Canada which—as has been pointed out too frequently for me to repeat—is a good service, should be put out of business. I asked the hon. gentleman if the facilities necessary for a privately owned network were made available to the private stations, could not the C.B.C. pick up the best of their programmes and air them through their own outlets? His answer was "Certainly." Well, then, why do we spend $2,000,000 of the taxpayers' money at this time when that can be done and done successfully without it? Why not let the advertiser's dollar develop that network?

This history of radio broadcasting has proven beyond peradventure that government-owned, government-operated and government-developed broadcasting cannot possibly compete with private enterprise under the advertising sponsor.

An hon. MEMBER: Soap.

Mr. MASSEY: Whether or not one wishes to have, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, a programme interrupted by somebody who says "Use Lifebuoy soap", or, "if you do not use our soap, use our perfumes", or something of that sort, the alternative is to go to a publicly owned system where it is public money which has to be spent for these programmes. Let us look for a moment at the wealth of the United States. We have become so much accustomed to dealing with millions and billions that I hesitate to use the figure which was given me the other day for the national income of the United States, but between four and five hundred million dollars are spent by advertisers alone over the national networks; and how many more hundreds of millions are spent in the operation and maintenance of these stations? Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that any government is going to set aside a billion dollars for programming in the United States? I do not think so. And what has happened in the United Kingdom? Going back into the days before the war, in 1939, as hon. members of this committee who were in the United Kingdom know, the vast majority of listeners there, according to surveys, listened to Radio-Normandie and Radio-Luxembourg, because it was only through those two outlets—there was a third—that commercially sponsored programmes could be aired in competition with the B.B.C. programme.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a network developed under private enterprise, permitted by the C.B.C., on which the Canadian advertiser can air his own programmes, will develop programmes which will be as much an advertisement for Canada in the United States as United States programmes are an advertisement for that country in ours. I should be much more interested in this vote if I thought for a moment that it was to give assistance to the creation of a network in Canada available to all.

Let us look at this vote in its true light. It is not for additional coverage. That has been clearly pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The purpose of the vote is to create a monopoly, a complete and absolute monopoly in the hands of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: That is absolutely right.

Mr. McCANN: There is nothing in it.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the minister permit me to develop my argument? May I say to the minister that the phrase I just used, "to create a monopoly", means that all power is placed in the hands of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; that private enterprise in radio will be entirely eliminated. That is the argument I wish to develop; that is why I made the statement. I repeat, the spending of $2,000,000 is the deathknell of private broadcasting in Canada. I ask all hon. members, no matter how they may feel about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as against private enterprise, or no matter how they may feel about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in conjunction with private enterprise, to realize before they vote for this item that it sounds the deathknell of private broadcasting.

I can support a vote for the betterment of the service of the C.B.C. This morning votes 257 and 258 for the increase of the facilities, the service and the maintenance of our short-wave station were before the committee. I heartily subscribed to it. If this vote of $2,000,000 were for the betterment of the service, for the employment of the finest news broadcasters who could be obtained as wandering reporters over the world for the C.B.C., I would vote for it, because that is the purpose of the C.B.C. Why should the end of private enterprise in broadcasting be brought about? I was about to deal with that point when the minister interrupted me a moment ago. I said that the purpose of this vote was to create a monopoly. Why should it be the end? I will tell him. Let me draw on my own experience in a practical way. He knows as well as I do that the success of any broadcasting station is based on the audience which it can acquire. The success of any newspaper is the extent of its circulation. Just as we have an audit bureau of circulation in the periodical and newspaper fields to study the circulation of a newspaper so that advertising rates may be based accordingly, so we have in radio. We have surveys. First it was comical the way they were done. Later on the methods were improved. To-day the chairman of the committee, the minister, the general manager of the broadcasting corporation or any one else can with great accuracy ascertain the audience of any station.

Habits of listening change. Let hon. members remember this. In the old days it was fun to turn on one's radio, monkey around with the dials, and become what was known as a D-X hound. You would hear one programme for a few minutes, shift over to another and so on to see how many stations you could hear in an evening. Those days have gone. Then the listener went through the phase of picking out the programmes he liked on one station and the programmes he liked on another and in between times he did not bother keeping the radio on. To-day it is altogether different. The greatest proportion of radio listeners have their own favourite station and to that station they listen most of the broadcasting hours of the day. That station therefore has developed what is called its own audiences.

Let it be understood that in going out to sell their time to a would-be sponsor or advertiser these private stations can say that their audience is such and so, and they are right. On the other hand if you smother a station, if you blanket it, if you take away its traditional wave length and put it off in the cat-fight somewhere, the audience goes. And in the case of CFRB—let me speak of it—I know where it will go. It will go over to Buffalo, over to WKBW, WGRN and WBN. The C.B.C. is in competition with what the private station is able to offer without the ability to have a network. What the private station is able to offer is a local station. They cannot go out and sell time on a network. The surveys have shown that the C.B.C. cannot take competition. There are programmes of the C.B.C. which are listened to, as they should be; but throughout the day the C.B.C. has had to bend the knee to the private station even when that private station has not had the advantage of a network. Therefore I ask, do we want elimination of private broadcasting? Let there be no misunderstanding about it; if hon. members want the elimination of private broadcasting, vote for this item, which will accomplish that purpose.

I cannot overestimate the importance of radio. Sometimes I think it is possible for us, close as we are to the centre of things in Ottawa, to lull ourselves into a sense of misunderstanding. Radio is dynamite. It is not understood. Its power has had one dramatic manifestation in the course of the world's history. Had it not been for radio there would have been no world war II. Adolf Hitler would not have been possible. It was only through the magic of radio, that fantastic medium, that he was able to speak again and again to the German nation all at one time, that he was able to rouse his rabble and poison the youth of his own country so that world war II took place. It is a medium of entertainment; it is a medium of information; it is a medium of education. But we must remember that in radio the element of competition is keenest, for the simple reason that if you buy the Saturday Evening Post and take it all the way home on a dark and stormy night, settle yourself comfortably in your living-room with your pipe, and you do not like it, you do not put it down and walk out again in the storm to the corner and buy Maclean's magazine, come back to your quarters again, sit down by the fire and read it. You do not do that; but if you tune in the equivalent of the Saturday Evening Post on the radio and you do not like it, you just flip the dial over a little bit and you have Maclean's. Competition in radio is very keen. People listen to that to which they like to listen. There is no power in Canada, thank God, that can make me listen to any radio programme, or make you or anybody else, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVINE: That is the weakness of this house.

Mr. MASSEY: Let me say to my hon. friend that it is fortunate in many instances that the people of the country do not hear the debates here.

Mr. IRVINE: Hear, hear!

Mr. MASSEY: There are no iron curtains on radio. The deputy minister of customs and excise may in his wisdom declare that this or that particular magazine, whatever it may be, is detrimental to the youth of Canada, that it is pornographic, lascivious, undesirable, that it shall not be brought into Canada. He may also say that it is a type of propaganda that is subversive and therefore has no place in our literature. It is therefore banned. But you cannot say to the radio listener, "You shall not listen to such and such a programme." You cannot say that, unless you want in Canada what Hitler introduced into Germany. The C.B.C. will become, through this vote, all-powerful, but it can draw no iron curtain along the 49th parallel of latitude, around the great lakes and out to the seaboard. It is in competition with the finest programmes that are aired in the world to-day, and in direct competition. Take Toronto, as I have suggested. Where CFRB under this vote loses its wave length, I think you can realize what will happen. Certainly I know what will happen. Hon. members realize that the audience for CFRB will not shift to CBL except for specialized programmes; it will go across the lake to Buffalo. You can multiply that across Canada. I am saying to you, sir, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that this vote is a vote for monopoly.

I should like to protest further that this vote is detrimental to the artists of Canada. We have developed in this country some of the finest talent in the world, out of proportion to the numbers of our population. This applies to the stage, the screen and the concert platform. Can you tell me that the expansion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with the salaries it is able to pay to artists, will promote the development of this talent in Canada? They may get their start here, but we will give those artists only their high school education, so to speak, and their university course in this respect will be taken in the United States. I could stand here for many a long hour giving you name after name and history after history of artists who have not been able financially to remain in Canada. Let me mention one. We hail the name of Ferdi Grofe and others in modern music as outstanding artists, Americans. But I stand here to hail the name of Percy Faith, a Canadian lad who worked for the C.B.C. and now has the Carnation Milk programme. He is internationally known, he is a coming young man whose name will be known throughout the musical world. Let me mention the name of Stanley Maxted. In my humble opinion he was the outstanding air reporter of this war. His record I need not recite here, but from D-day and long before that, anything of outstanding importance, including Arnhem, The Buldge, Wessel and even Tokyo and Hiroshima and Nagasaki, was reported by him over the B.B.C., to which he was attached during the war, and his reports were always the outstanding feature of any broadcast day. He is a Canadian. He came back to Canada after V-J day. Here was this wealth of talent, this magnificent record, and he was given a job in the C.B.C. I will not mention his salary, because that is not my business. Where is he to-day? He is in London, England, the advertising director for J. Walter Thompson, being paid a salary many times that which the C.B.C. could—I do not say would but could—pay him. My friends in the C.C.F. party who favour this vote, and the government and their supporters, will say, "We will pay artists what we wish to pay them and they will stay in Canada and broadcast and like it." Well, if they do, I think that our C.C.F. friends with their policy, and the government and their supporters, are hand in hand in this matter as never before.

An hon. MEMBER: No such thing.

Mr. MASSEY: I thought I would evoke some reply. I am disappointed that it is not more than that. Can the C.B.C. pay what it is necessary to pay these artists? I am not saying that it is right to pay someone $10,000 a week to broadcast, or right to pay some artists $250,000 to make a single film, or to pay Toscanini, Fritz Reiner or other outstanding performers what they are paid. They are paid these salaries in the United States and the result of their artistry comes over to us. Can the C.B.C. keep up that sort of thing. We have to compete, and I postulate that the paltry four or five millions a year which the C.B.C. obtains, not only for operation but for talent, is not sufficient to enable it to compete. Let the C.B.C. discharge the function for which it was designed. Let it give an excellent world news service, by first-hand observer, let it give cultural programmes and educational programmes, let it be the world reporter for Canada, let it be the propagandizer for Canada, if you like. But the C.B.C. at the moment wants the whole pie and not a portion of it. Let me remind those who would support government broadcasting that the B.B.C., with between fifteen and twenty millions to spend, with only one time, one language and land lines that do not matter, since they are insignificant, cannot do it. Do any members of this committee who have been in the United Kingdom and have listened all day, as attentive, intelligent listeners to the B.B.C. know why it is that English, Scotch and Irish listeners say what they do about it? The B.B.C. cannot, I say, do it under those circumstances that I have indicated, confined to one island, and with fifteen or twenty millions to spend. Can the C.B.C. do it in Canada with four time changes, two languages and thirty-five hundred miles of land lines? It is nonsense.

Now let us compare the C.B.C. with the B.B.C. for a moment. Here we are with four or five millions to spend; there is the B.B.C. with between fifteen and twenty millions. The news on the C.B.C. is very good. I listen to it whenever I can. Their News Round-up is excellent, and some of their men on the staff are doing a good job. The B.B.C.'s news is excellent in most respects. Their war reports during the war, to which I listened every evening at a quarter past nine whenever I was not on duty, I thoroughly admired and enjoyed. It was a magnificent round-up. Special events on the C.B.C. are in the main very well handled and reflect credit on their programme directors and their engineers. On the B.B.C. they are usually excellent.

Educational programmes on the C.B.C. are fair. And if one were to resort to the language of the services he would use an adjective in connection with some of them which would be followed by the word "awful." Educational programmes on the B.B.C. are terrible. I am speaking now as a listener, and I am not attacking it politically. General programmes on the C.B.C. are spotty—very spotty. Some are excellent, others are the reciprocal of that word, one which I cannot use in the House of Commons. On the B.B.C. they are awful.

Mr. HOMUTH: Use it; it is common among friends.

Mr. MASSEY: On the whole, as I have said, the C.B.C. within its own field is doing a good job; but when the C.B.C. gets into the entertainment field and into competition with the United States programmes it fails miserably. It is not doing a good job; stay out of it. If it is going to stay out of it, then do not vote for this.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. MASSEY: I am virtually through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MASSEY: I thank the committee. What about the United States?—and I shall hurry on to the conclusion. Every hon. member knows that the United States is the best in the world in broadcasting. They have had their difficulties. They were having far more difficulty than we were back in 1932 when the Canadian radio commission came into being. But they did not nationalize or socialize their radio. The federal communications commission had its faults and its failings, and did not always do its job as completely as it might. It made mistakes. But would any average listener in the United States wish to have the class A programmes discontinued? I do not think so.

Well, in connection with all of this, if I may resort to the vernacular, what's all the shootin' for? I repeat that this vote will eliminate private broadcasting. Oh, it is not going to do it this afternoon; it is not going to do it to-morrow; but it marks the beginning of the end of private broadcasting in Canada. Let no hon. member deceive himself about that. If he supports this vote he is saying to his constituents: "I believe that all broadcasting in Canada should be under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and that private enterprise in broadcasting should be eliminated." That is what his vote in this House of Commons will do. And so I say: Let us away with camouflage. Let us look at the bill.

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. member make his point clear?

Mr. MASSEY: Well, I thought most hon. members understood it.

Mr. IRVINE: He has not stated it clearly.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the bill is not before the committee. We are considering item 965 in the estimates.

Mr. MASSEY: I wish to refer to a matter contained in the bill, if I may.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The bill is not before the committee.

Mr. MASSEY: Then I shall say that the vote reads in this way:

—on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of expenditures on the construction, extension or improvement of capital works of the broadcasting facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in Canada.

Let hon. members compare the language of the vote with the language of the bill. It is not identical, but it is virtually so. In other words, let us away with camouflage. Let us away with all that this vote is surrounded. The vote is simply a substitute for the bill, and the government is holding up the bill and giving us the vote instead. I for one will not be hoodwinked by the vote; it is camouflage. Let the government shed its cloak; let us realize that this vote is governmental bureaucratic dust thrown in the eyes of this committee. I challenge any member in the house, I challenge any of our friends opposite to get up and say what this vote really says—"I am in favour of complete monopolistic control by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and I am totally and completely against private enterprise." Then, Mr. Chairman, that member will be honest.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I at the outset congratulate the hon. member who has just spoken, the name of whose riding I have not yet ascertained—

An hon. MEMBER: Greenwood.

Mr. KNIGHT: —upon his vigorous speech, with which of course I cannot agree. With the exception of making statements, I cannot see where anywhere in his speech he proved a single point. When I congratulate him, I am conscious that this business is new—well, perhaps not new, because I am sure he knows a lot about it—but it is at least new to him in this sense, that he is discussing it for the first time in the house.

Mr. MASSEY: I discussed it years ago in the house.

Mr. KNIGHT: Pardon me; I said that he is discussing it for the first time this session in the house.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The hon. member did not say "this session".

Mr. KNIGHT: What I have said is still correct, despite the protests of the hon. member. I am not impressed by his statement that it was the use of radio that caused the rise of Hitler in Europe.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member does not wish to be inaccurate. I made no such ridiculous statement. He can put all the ridiculous statements on Hansard he wishes, but he cannot misinterpret mine. I said it made possible the rise of Hitler.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I now continue by saying that I do not believe that the same process of radio, which was available to the fascist leader in England, had the same effect by any means in that country.

Speaking of broadcasting, I would suggest that Mr. Speaker during the recess of parliament might profitably look into the matter of having some way by which speeches in the House of Commons might be heard by the general public. I shall say nothing more about that, more than to add that I wish some of the proceedings in the house might be broadcast to the country. If they were, it might improve somewhat the tone of the debates to which we must listen. It has been tried with success in one other place—in my own province, if I may be pardoned for mentioning it.

Mr. MASSEY: Which province is that?

Mr. KNIGHT: To enlighten the ignorance of my hon. friend I would say it is the province of Saskatchewan—and it has become very popular there. I am not suggesting all the debates in the house should be broadcast, but I do say that on certain occasions such a service might be made available to our constituents.

Mr. HOMUTH: You don't think the speeches made in the Saskatchewan house are so bright, do you?

Mr. KNIGHT: Let us for a moment proceed to discuss the speech of the hon. member for Macleod, who sits to my left and who, although he said a lot, in my opinion said very little. I was not impressed by his attack on communism. It is all right to attack communism, and I have done so myself on many occasions, but I cannot for the life of me see how he connects his attack upon communism with the actions of the C.B.C. What point did the hon. gentleman make? He said that the C.B.C. spoke to one million people. Agreed. All I could get out of it was that his idea of freedom of speech is to put certain speakers off the air.

Mr. HOMUTH: He did not say that.

Mr. KNIGHT: He stated repeatedly that all sides of a question should be heard, and with that I agree. Then in the same breath the hon. member said that there were certain people whom he would rather not hear.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. KNIGHT: I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, in order that I may conclude without interruptions.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNIGHT: I merely wanted to speak for ten minutes, unlike the hon. gentleman who spoke a moment ago.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think it is the wish of every member of the committee that we make some progress and bring this debate to a close. The hon. member is not going to speak very long and there should be no interruptions by other hon. members. In that way I think we can make some progress.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member made certain references to what the hon. member for Greenwood had said and those references were not honest.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That is not a point of order. We are not going to permit an hon. member to be interrupted. Let the hon. member conclude his remarks and then my hon. friend may speak if he wishes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Unlike the hon. member for Greenwood, I am not making my maiden speech in this house this session, nor am I making my first speech in regard to this question of radio. I have spoken already on the bill, but I wanted to take just about ten minutes now and I hope I can get along with my remarks. There is one thing I am interested in in connection with radio, namely the matter of free speech. I agree with the hon. member for Macleod when he says that both sides of all questions should be aired, but, unlike him, I claim that the best way to have that freedom of speech, which I think is the desire of every hon. member, is by having some public vehicle over which that free speech may be transmitted.

As long as we have a publicly owned radio system subject to the control of the people through parliament we have a better chance to have free speech; we have a better chance to have both sides aired than we would by means of private companies whose main if not only aim is the accumulation of gain. You can buy time on a privately owned station in order to put your views on the air. The man with the most money can get the most time and there is no guarantee that the other side of the question will be represented. First, there may not be time available and, second, the opposing faction may not have the money to buy time on the air. So it goes on.

As an example I would refer to Mr. Trestrail, who was mentioned. We have some idea of his activities before the last election. Then there was the recent campaign against the cooperatives to which no effective reply was made because the cooperatives did not feel justified in spending money to reply to such twaddle. I ask the hon. member for Macleod in all reason and in all good friendship if these mysterious subversive forces to which he constantly referred in his witch-hunting speech could not work equally well over the private stations as they could through the C.B.C.? I do not think the C.B.C. is tied up in any way with any subversive element.

These private stations are run by good enough fellows, I take it, but I think we must admit that those men are interested primarily in the financial success of their stations. As was pointed out during the committee meetings, in some cases only about twenty per cent of their total time is devoted to such public service as sustaining programmes. It has been suggested here to-day that the C.B.C. is a giant competitor of these private stations, swallowing them up as it were, and that, therefore, they should be able to run their business without any grants of money. I would point out that the C.B.C. have other obligations besides making profits. One obligation of the C.B.C. is the putting out of sustaining programmes for the people of this country.

The private stations do not have any responsibility for the cultivation of public taste, and if you asked me I would say that is the main responsibility of the C.B.C., the cultivation of public taste in the matter of education, arts, literature and those things which make life worth while. Let me repeat: Freedom of speech can be guaranteed only by a radio system which can be controlled by a democratic parliament. The chairman of the radio committee when he spoke some time ago said one thing with which I do not agree. He referred to the dual ownership of radio and the ownership of radio by the great newspaper chains.

I believe that is a bad element in our national life. I believe it is a bad thing for a newspaper chain through the manipulation of funds or by the possession of funds, to provide itself with such a tremendous vehicle for influencing public opinion. Not that I am against their influencing public opinion all they can and in every way they can, but I do not think they should have an opportunity of ganging together, as it were, to put one particular opinion across in the country. For that reason I oppose, first of all, dual ownership and the ownership of radio stations by newspapers linked up in a single chain. I shall close by stating that I support the vote for the C.B.C.

Mr. HOMUTH: I think I heard the hon. member aright when he said that this was guaranteed by a democratic party.

Mr. KNIGHT: On a point of order, the word was "parliament".

Mr. HOMUTH: Democratic parliament; that is quite all right. This democratic parliament, so-called, is dominated by the Liberal party which was elected to power in this house. My hon. friend says that the policy would be guaranteed by a democratic parliament. We have heard that word used so much and so often that I begin to wonder what it really means. I have begun to think that democracy is interpreted here as being a question of who is in power. I should like to, although I shall not take the time to do so, deal with some meetings which members of the Liberal party, the C.C.F. party, the Social Credit party and ourselves have had with the chairman of the C.B.C. I might be violating some of the little agreements we had if I referred to that; but I want to say this and I say it with all the emphasis at my command, that we tried to work out an agreement to give a fair apportionment of radio time to the different parties in this house. That was predicated entirely upon whether Mr. McLean, organizer for the Liberal party, and his friends would agree to it. There are members in this house who will say that that cannot be true, but it is true. It was predicated entirely upon whether Mr. McLean, organizer for the Liberal party in Canada, and his friends would agree to that disposition of time.

Mr. HOWE: Did Mr. Bell have to agree to it too?

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Bell did not have to agree to it, because we were representing our party as constitutionally elected members. But Mr. McLean was there, and he said that he could not say definitely because he did not have the agreement of such men as my hon. friend.

Mr. HOWE: I was never interested in that in my life.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend and others. Then two or three days later he came back. The truth was that the Liberal party did not know just where they were going.

Mr. HOWE: We do not worry about it as much as my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend and I can chide each other as much as we like, but Mr. McLean was terribly worried. He could not say anything definite because the minister had not told him what he should say.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member speak louder, please?

Mr. HOMUTH: No one has ever asked me yet to use a loud speaker. Let me say seriously that in view of what was brought out in the investigation with regard to the money paid to the Toronto Daily Star, it is time that the country began to realize just what is going on. Surely no member of the Liberal party is prepared to rise in his place in this house and say the C.B.C. ought to be the mouthpiece of any particular party. But it is; it is to the extent that it gives the Toronto Star free time. That fact was brought out clearly.

In 1943 the Canadian Press contracted to make its complete news report available to the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The price agreed upon was $40,000 per annum. The news was to be delivered by wire to five C.B.C. regional offices from coast to coast, namely, Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. The term of the contract was to be the duration of the war and six months thereafter.

At the same time the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation made a contract with the British United Press for the use of the B.U.P. foreign news report. The price to be paid was $25,000. In its other details this contract largely followed the one made by the C.B.C.

with the Canadian Press, except that the term of the contract was one year, automatically renewed unless certain agreed notice of cancellation was given by either side.

During 1944 the C.B.C. organized its second trans-Canada network, which became known as the dominion network. The corporation took the stand that it was unnecessary to make a separate purchase of news services for use on this new system. The contracts of both the Canadian Press and the British United Press were held to give the corporation the right to use the news delivered to it for any news purposes which the corporation might have and without restriction as to any specific network.

Shortly after the C.B.C. had thus established its right to use the news which it was receiving for its general purposes, it undertook on behalf of the government the operation of the short-wave broadcasting station at Sackville. Almost its first act of management was to purchase a news service for the use of the station. The contract was given to Canadian Press, not only without any competition, but also with the stipulation that no other news service was to be purchased. Remember, the short-wave station at Sackville was to use only one news service, and—let us be fair about it—that news service was very complimentary to the government. Although the news was only for use by this one station, without any transcontinental carriage or delivery at regional points involved, the price given to the Canadian Press was $45,000.

The contrast between what the C.B.C. was securing for its national and dominion networks combined for $40,000, and what it was spending $45,000 upon for the single government-owned short-wave station is glaring. Quite obviously the corporation did not carry into its role as manager for the government the same financial thrift and close bargaining that it practised where its own finances were concerned.

During the past year, however, the C.B.C. agreed to increase its payment to the Canadian Press from $40,000 to $70,000 annually. This concession was made, regardless of the fact that, for purposes of government contracts, the end of the war has not yet been legally proclaimed. In other words, the contract ran to the end of the war and we have not yet legally reached the end of the war. So far as Canada is concerned, the war is not yet over, and yet C.B.C. changed its news contract and increased the price it was going to pay for it. These are the things we are worried about. We are concerned also about the power which we are giving to ministers of the crown and to the various bureaucratic organizations which they have created. The people of this country are finding that, no matter what move they make, what they do, what they say, they are responsible in some way or another to somebody who is an official of the government of Canada.

I can well remember back in 1917 and on to around 1930, at a time when everybody in the province of Ontario felt that he was under the eye of some spy, someone who was trying to find out whether he was violating the Ontario Temperance Act. I believe that one of the reasons which made the people of this province vote for the repeal of the Ontario Temperance Act was the fact that a spy system had been built up. We have done the same thing here. We have created organizations—the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for example, and the wartime prices and trade board—which have taken away from parliament the power to govern. Parliament has been deprived of its power to pass laws, to such an extent that it is a wonder to me how patient the people of Canada have been. We must be very careful before we continue along this course. I can readily understand why the C.C.F. party is supporting this bill, because it is just one more measure toward socialism, or communism—call it what you like. But those of us who believe in free enterprise, who hold that we have the right to live our own lives, to raise our children in freedom and enable them also to live their own lives, cannot possibly vote for such a measure as this.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I did not intend to say a word in this debate, because I am supporting this vote, although I am of opinion that the resolution should have been introduced much earlier in the session. But I rise particularly to protest certain derogatory references by the hon. member for Macleod to a great and gallant Canadian; I refer to Mr. Elmore Philpott, who, I am pleased to say, is a great personal friend of mine. Mr. Philpott has made a great contribution in this country. He served overseas with great distinction in the last war and was severly wounded and twice decorated for bravery. As a commentator he has the largest listening audience in British Columbia, and is respected by people, regardless of the party which they support. I am sure he would be an asset to any board. If all able-bodied Canadians were doing as much for the development and building up of this country as Mr. Elmore Philpott has done, under his severe and unusual disabilities, progress would be much faster in this country.

Mr. JAQUES: Progress where? Progress to Moscow?

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks I wish to read to the house a letter which I received from the Catholic Commercial Travellers' Professional Association.

Montreal, August 22, 1946.

Mr. Liguori Lacombe, M.P.,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

We have learned that Mr. Tim Buck, leader of the Labor-Progressive party (latest transformation of the Communist party) is scheduled to speak on the C.B.C. network on August 29 next.

Following the report of the Royal Commission and the statements in the house, the C.B.C. and the government have sufficient reasons for refusing the use of its network to a party which places loyalty to Moscow above that to Canada. Is it conceivable that complete freedom should be granted to people who want to overthrow our social regime and create confusion in our country for the benefit of another nation?

We hope that you will make it your duty to intervene in order to prevent the spread of subversive propaganda.

Yours truly,
Roger La Palme,
Secretary,
The Catholic Commercial Travellers' Professional Association.

That letter speaks for itself. The government should advise the C.B.C. to deny any broadcasting privilege to the labour-progressive party. The events which are occurring justify my intervention in this debate. Last winter there was held in Ottawa a communist rally at which Tim Buck, leader of the party, delivered an address. In view of the revelations made during the preliminary hearing of the people indicted for conspiracy and espionage, the government was in duty bound to prohibit that meeting. The infiltration of communist propaganda is continuing in Canada. How is it that at the very moment when the security of this country was threatened by traitors, the government should have allowed that revolutionary movement to hold meetings? What is the reason of their delay in outlawing the communist and labour-progressive party? On February 16, 1944, the day after the convention held by the communist party, under its new name of labour-progressive party, I called upon the government to outlaw the new-born group. They followed a laissez-faire policy.

Mr. LAFONTAINE: A legitimate policy.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. LACOMBE: We are now witnessing the disastrous consequences of that policy. It is better to suppress evil at its roots. Law-abiding Canadian citizens are alarmed when they think that the communist doctrine already has thousands of sympathizers in this country. Strong measures should be taken before it is too late.

A communist wave is overrunning the world. It threatens the very foundation of society. Religious and civil groups anxious to protect religion as well as the family feel justified concern. That is evidenced by this other letter I have received from the Catholic Organizations Committee of the Montreal district.

August 26, 1946.

Sir,

On behalf of the Catholic Organizations Committee of Montreal of the Sacred Heart leagues, of the Catholic Commercial Travellers Association, of National Catholic labour unions, of the Jeunes Laurentiens, and of many other associations, we ask you to intervene with a view to the banning of the addresses which the national leader of the Labor-Progressive party, Tim Buck, and the Quebec provincial leader, Guy Caron, are to broadcast over the C.B.C. on Wednesday next, August 28, in the interests of their party.

It is intolerable, after the investigation in Russian espionage activities and the serious charges made against the Labor-Progressive party, that its leaders should be allowed, at the expense of the taxpayers, to broadcast propaganda, in favour of a movement recognized as subversive.

Yours very truly,
Roland Germain,
Secretary
of the Catholic Organizations Committee.

Therefore, the government should take the necessary steps to prevent any communistic broadcasts and propaganda in Canada.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have followed very closely the remarks of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), but I noticed that the letter from Mr. Germain is dated August 26, while Mr. Caron and Mr. Tim Buck were to speak on the C.B.C. network Wednesday last.

Had the hon. member been present in the house before Wednesday last, he might have registered his protest at that time, in the hope that the government might have considered his request. Last Tuesday, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) asked the government whether the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) intended to allow these lectures to be broadcast. The Minister of Justice then gave his answer and, to my mind the hon. member from Laval-Two Mountains should have protested when it was still time to do so, that is before the lectures were broadcast. We were in the house when the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie registered his protests and requested that these talks be prohibited.

Mr. LACOMBE: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Surely.

Mr. LACOMBE: Does the hon. member believe that it would have been proper and in accordance with the rules of the house to register my protests at a time when the debate did not warrant such a step?

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Certainly. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains stated in his speech that communism was spreading subversive ideas. Knowing that, he should have uttered his protests before now; the proper time for them was before the subversive ideas had been repeated over the radio. The protests should have been made before the lectures were broadcast. The hon. member should have been present, as we were, to state his opposition at the proper time, as the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie has done.

(Text):

I should like to say a few words to the hon. member for Macleod. During the course of his speech he pointed at the French-Canadians several times. Let me tell him one thing. We are all Canadians; he knows that. Be we of French, Jewish, Ukrainian or English descent, we are all Canadians. It is not because we are French-Canadians that we shall stand with my hon. friend who points at us especially just to give the general impression that we are idle. We protest against communism. We have been protesting against communism and against the spreading of these ideas as early as my hon. friend. We did it in 1936 and 1937.

Mr. LOW: He said that.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): And we know that. We are against communism by tradition, mentality, creed and common sense. We do not speak as often as my hon. friend; that is all right, but we act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LOW: I have just a question or two to ask for information before I say a few words. I do not intend to hold the committee very long, nor do I intend to repeat any of the arguments which have been advanced as to why we should vote against this appropriation.

Is the $2,000,000 proposed in vote 965 to be additional to the $500,000 which is the maximum possible advance provided for in section 4, subsection 17, of the bill as it now stands? Perhaps the minister would like to answer these questions as I go along.

Mr. McCANN: It could be. There is nothing in the resolution which precludes the right of the corporation to borrow in accordance with the statute as it now exists.

Mr. LOW: Therefore there is $500,000 already available which the corporation could use between now and next session for whatever purpose it requires, according to the statute? Are the class 1-A channels now occupied by CFRB in Toronto and CFCN in Calgary protected for Canada's possession until the spring of 1949?

Mr. McCANN: No, just until 1947. The work must be well undertaken by 1947.

Mr. LOW: That does not answer my question. The minister says that the work must be well undertaken by 1947. Is it not true that according to the Havana international convention, these channels were to be protected for Canada until 1949? I may be mistaken, but that is what runs in my mind. If that is so, it makes quite a difference to the argument—

Mr. McCANN: The original agreement was until 1946; it was extended until 1949, but the work must be under way by 1947.

Mr. LOW: That is the answer I wanted to get. If Canada is protected in the possession of these channels until the spring of 1949, then I should like to ask the minister why the rush in the dying days of the session to put through a supplementary appropriation of $2,000,000, when it will be only a few months until the next session is convened when hon. members should be given the fullest possible opportunity to develop and to debate this whole question, and not be hampered, we will say, by the desire of every hon. member to get away after having been here so long as we have? If the minister will answer that question I shall continue with my few remarks.

Mr. McCANN: The answer to that is that it takes a long time to get the equipment which is ordered and to do the building which is contemplated. For these reasons it is necessary that the corporation be given such time to carry out these plans that they may be done successfully.

Mr. LOW: I shall just take a moment or two to say a word in answer to the arguments which were presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. At the outset I should like to emphasize that we of the Social Credit group are not opposing the appropriation of $2,000,000 solely because of the "bogey" of communism, not by any means.

Mr. HANSELL: That was not my argument.

Mr. LOW: No. The hon. member for Macleod did develop that phase of it somewhat fully, but we look upon this appropriation as something far beyond, we will say, creating the possibility of communism taking possession of Canada. We do not look upon communism as a bogey. The possibility of the destruction of Canada by communism is a reality and it must be faced. There is no bogey and we are not offering it as a bogey—

Mr. HANSELL: It is the government's biggest problem right now.

Mr. LOW: Without question it is the biggest problem that Canada faces to-day. Here are the reasons, in brief, beyond what the hon. member for Macleod suggested this afternoon, why we feel so keenly about having this appropriation held over until another session when it can be debated fully. In the first place, I feel, along with the hon. member for Greenwood, who made a splendid presentation this afternoon, that passing this appropriation now, giving the C.B.C. the right to use $2,000,000 more for expansion, will certainly destroy competition by private stations in Canada. Social Crediters hold that a government monopoly can be just as vicious as a private monopoly. In fact I am convinced personally that it can be more vicious. I feel that the only proper safeguard against a vicious government or commission monopoly would be to have strong competition from private stations. I stand for that and I shall fight for it as long as I have strength.

I believe that in the interests of the Canadian people we should maintain strength on both hands. I am not opposing the continuation of the C.B.C. as a government-owned proposition. I made that clear in my address the other day. It has done splendid things, but it should keep its place within the framework of the policy laid down for it when it was formed. I believe there would be an obvious injustice to certain private stations which have developed a listening audience and have given good service for years to that audience, if this vote were put through and those private stations were forced out of the channels they occupy and have occupied for so many years.

The third reason why I oppose the vote is this. I believe that if the C.B.C. were to take over these channels, and particularly the one I know about and have known about for a good many years, the 1010 kilocycle channel occupied by CFCN Calgary, it would be a patent injustice to a large group of people who do not want that channel taken over by the C.B.C.

The fourth reason why I feel I must oppose the appropriation is that there certainly is no rush. Canada is protected in the possession of the channels of CFRB and CFCN until the late spring of 1949. While the minister has given a plausible reason why the C.B.C. should get busy on the building of their proposed new stations, I would point out that the private station now occupying the channel 1010, CFCN Calgary, has already indicated its desire to go ahead and step up the power of its station to 50,000 watts, and if and when the people have decided that the C.B.C. should occupy that channel they would be willing, so they say, to make the transfer to the C.B.C. But in the meantime they could keep the spot warm for Canada, so that we shall not lose the channels.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre speaks of a shotgun, I would ask him whether he thinks it is right to allow anyone to point a shotgun at his wife and shoot her before we disarm him.

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LOW: Certainly.

Mr. MAYBANK: I would remind him that when I referred to the shotgun I was speaking of the question whether or not there should be a divorcement between newspaper and radio. That was the connection. I am afraid he misunderstood.

Mr. LOW: I am pleased to be set right, but under the circumstances I can use the illustration to good advantage—

Mr. MAYBANK: With my permission.

Mr. LOW: Yes, with the hon. member's permission. I should not like to infringe his patent rights.

Mr. MAYBANK: Go right ahead.

Mr. LOW: We must disarm the C.B.C. now before we allow it to shoot the private stations, their competitors, dead; and we are attempting to prevent that by opposing this appropriation.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre mentioned also that it was always well to sleep on an important matter before rushing into it. I agree with that 100 per cent, and that is the best argument for holding this appropriation over until next session, which will begin a few months hence. That is not too long to wait, and I am sure that no damage would be done by waiting. In the meantime the people of the country might be allowed to give expression to their views. In my opinion the people now served by these two private stations ought to have something to say in the matter. Surely the people themselves have rights, and it is the obligation and responsibility of members of this house to see that those rights are fully protected and that the people have a chance to express their wishes.

The hon. member's argument that it would be unfair to allow the private stations to increase to 50,000 watts has little or no force. If a private station has been assigned a frequency and has developed it in the interests of the people in the area—granted, in its own interest as well, though the same can be said of the C.B.C.—then the final indication of whether the station should be allowed to increase to 50,000 watts, or whether the C.B.C. should preempt the channel, is one that should be given by the people who have formed the listening audience in that area. I emphasize once again that the people themselves ought to have some right to express their views with respect to this appropriation. They have done so to me and to a number of other hon. members, and I suggest, with all deference, and with no malice in what I am saying, that the minister should hold the appropriation over and think the matter through for a while before he brings it in at the next session.

Mr. IRVINE: I know hon. members are all anxious to have the question put, but members from all sections have properly, I think, exercised their right to express their views on an important matter of this kind. It is regrettable that it should have to come before us in the dying days of the session and I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible. I wish to answer some of the arguments that have been put forward by hon. members who are opposing the vote before the committee, and I refer particularly to the hon. member for Waterloo South, the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Macleod.

The hon. member for Waterloo South tells us that the C.B.C. is now dominated by the Liberal party. From the democratic point of view, even if that were true, it would not be too bad, because, after all, the Liberal party does represent the majority vote of the people of the country; and while that is so, under our constitution, it has the right to give some direction to things. But I do not agree that they do dominate. I believe that in so far as it is possible, having regard to the weaknesses of human nature, the C.B.C. is doing a pretty fair job.

The next point the hon. gentleman made was that he does not know what democracy means. He need not have spent any time in telling us that. That is quite clear, so that I shall pass on to the next point. He says he wants equal time on the radio. I do not disagree with him so much on that. I think it is going to be a difficult thing to please all parties in deciding what time each shall have over the national broadcasting system. Perhaps it would be better to allow my Social Credit friends more time than anybody else, because their troubles are greater than anybody else's. I do not mean by that to insult my hon. friends; I mean that their ideas are newer than any other ideas, and, therefore, they need to have more time for explaining them than other people require. I certainly would be glad to vote that the Social Credit party have at least its quota of time on whatever basis the house or the government might decide political parties should be allotted time. I agree with that 100 per cent. And if it should be equal time, I agree to that, too. I am a believer in free speech; I am a believer in democratic principles, and, therefore, I will stand by that in this as in other matters.

The hon. member for Greenwood was answered pretty thoroughly by the hon. member for Saskatoon City. I suggest to the hon. member for Greenwood that it takes more than bald, unsupported statements to carry conviction. It is all very well for him to say, in his impressive manner, and with that fine personality of which he is the enviable possessor, that the C.B.C. is going beyond the purposes for which it was designed. I asked the hon. member to make that clear, and to bring forward the facts to support what he said.

I happened to be in the house when it was designed, and by one of his own leaders. I do not for one moment agree with him that the C.B.C. has deviated from its original purpose. But even if it had, that is no great argument against it, because conceivably it might have a better purpose still. He did not prove that if it has departed from its original purpose it is not now following a better one.

On his next point he declared most emphatically that this vote would mean the end of private broadcasting. That is another absolutely unwarranted and unsupported declaration. If it were taken logically it would mean that the defeat of this vote would be the end of the C.B.C. The logic in one is just as good as in the other. I question whether either is true. So that when the hon. member attempts to build up an argument and to prove a point of that kind, I should like to have the point made clear. I want evidence brought out to show that he has justification for the point he attempts to make.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat reiterated the same position. He says that a government monopoly is just as bad as any other monopoly.

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Mr. IRVINE: All right, "worse". As a matter of fact, it is a misnomer to speak of government monopoly at all. A monopoly means that an individual or a small group of them secure sufficient power to gain for themselves certain advantages over all the rest of the people. It is at that point that the government steps in and ends the monopoly, distributing the benefits to all the people. So that it is an absurdity to talk about a government monopoly. This is the thing which ends the evil effects of monopoly.

Mr. LOW: That is what you think.

Mr. IRVINE: The evil effect of monopoly is that a small group or an individual may benefit at the expense of everybody else. But when a government is doing a thing in the public interest, while such government may have failings and may have made mistakes, yet the object is not monopoly for any group but, if you wish to use the term, monopoly for all the people. That is the very soul and basis of democracy.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. IRVINE: I shall allow the hon. member to ask a question when I have finished; at that time I shall do my best to answer him. But I do not suppose it would help either of us at the moment if I were to stop to answer his questions.

Much has been said about sleeping on the matter before we rush ahead. Well, this house has been sleeping for a long time on a lot of matters. I do not want it to sleep any more. I should like to see it wake up and take action immediately.

I have noticed that the hon. member for Peace River differs sharply from the viewpoint expressed by the spokesman for his party on the committee. He very properly, perhaps, says that when a decision is to be made respecting certain airways or certain programmes concerning which a company shall have privileges in certain communities, such matters should be settled and decided by the listeners, the rank and file of the people. That sounds fine. But the hon. member for Macleod says they do not know anything about radio and that he repudiates their having the say as to what shall happen with this or that in respect of radio.

Mr. LOW: I qualified it by saying that they have the facts.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall allow the hon. member to qualify it now. I have no wish to indicate that he said anything which he did not say.

Mr. LOW: Right.

Mr. IRVINE: I wish to answer the hon. member for Macleod a little more fully, because I think he covered the ground taken in opposition to this vote perhaps more comprehensively than any other hon. member who has spoken. I should like to compliment him as a most effective member in the house. While I disagree with him, I respect his position and his point of view and I should hope that, while I know he disagrees with me, he will respect my opposition to his point of view. He has said very properly that there is a vital principle at stake in this matter of the C.B.C. He emphasized that by saying that it implied unlimited potential powers. He went on to argue or to suggest, as an interpretation of that point, that the C.B.C. or any other national broadcasting system has the ear of vast numbers of the nation's people at any time of the day. That is true, and it does make radio a vital question. It is precisely because of that point that I am in favour of the C.B.C. If the public did not have control of such a master instrument as this it would pass into the hands of private monopoly.

Let me in that connection read a short extract from our great national magazine, Maclean's. Perhaps I need not mention the name of the gentleman who is the hero of this article.

Mr. LOW: Oh, go on; name him.

Mr. IRVINE: I can name him, if necessary, but I do not want to give any unnecessary notoriety.

Mr. LOW: Oh, go on.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, all right. He is Mr. Roy Herbert Thomson. I quote:

> . . . a fast-talking Torontonian who traded mumbo jumbo for supersalesmanship, a magic wand for a fountain pen and proceeded to pull hundreds of thousands of dollars literally out of thin air.

A Social Crediter, per se.

Then it goes on:

> Nobody, except maybe Thomson himself, would have bet that within a decade he would become a big voice in the Canadian radio and newspaper scene.

To-day he directs the destinies of six newspapers and three radio stations in Canada, and has an interest in two other Canadian stations. He also owns the controlling interest in the only radio station in British Guiana, and has a newspaper in Jamaica.

He admits he would like to own a metropolitan daily, and rumour has it he wants to buy the Toronto Evening Telegram. Of this he says: "Everytime somebody is reported trying to buy something, I get blamed for it." But there's reason for it. A friend said recently: "He'd try to buy the B.B.C. if he knew Attlee a little better."

That is what happens when a master instrument of this kind is left to the grabbing of those who have the greatest brains, if you will, or the greatest pocketbook or the greatest agility or the greatest cunning or whatever particular factor enters into the successful control of an instrument of this kind. If it were not that we had the C.B.C. to protect the interests of the Canadian people we would find ourselves with the whole medium of public education passing into the hands of private monopoly. My information in this regard is that the privately owned radio stations in the United States of America refused, up until a few years ago, to sell time to the cooperatives. At that time they were forced by the government to extend that privilege to all classes in the community.

I finish that point by saying that the hon. member for Macleod is quite right when he says that this is important. With the private stations it is only those who have money who can buy any time. In that event I am afraid that neither my hon. friend nor I shall ever be heard. I have never been and I do not know whether my hon. friend has, but certainly neither of our parties would ever be if we had to buy time. I am glad that this control is in the hands of the C.B.C., which makes it possible for us to get at least a little time along with the other philosophies in this country. When you are buying services of this kind on a private basis it means whatever the traffic will bear, and there are two things that happen. First, you rule out to a great degree the large masses of people from having its benefits and, second, inevitably you build up a privately owned monopoly. Those are two things that come from your so-called free competition.

My hon. friend took a gratuitous slap at the People's Weekly, a paper which opposes the ideas for which he stands and referred to it as a funny paper. If my hon. friend found himself on the pages of a funny paper, then for the first time in his life he was where he ought to be. He went on to say that, when consulted, the people did not seem to understand about radio. I would say to him that no doubt the people understand as much about radio as they did about social credit when the Social Credit party came to power. I do not like the inference in my hon. friend's argument that some body somewhere must tell the people what they must do with respect to a technical question like radio.

If that is true, who is to do it? Is it to be a private corporation, or is it to be a body responsible to parliament? If any body is to do it, then I say that the people who control parliament should do it. Frankly, I have more faith in the people than my hon. friend has. I think he reflects on their judgment with respect to both of us, because they sent us here. I hope they did not make a mistake in both cases, but it is quite within the realm of possibility that they did. They have the right to make that mistake if, indeed, they made it.

I want to follow up a little farther the other argument of my hon. friend. He speaks of the board as being authoritarian; he laid emphasis on the authoritarian phase of the thing. There is no such authoritarian idea in the board. My hon. friend is playing fast and loose with a certain sentiment which is a hangover of a great world conflict. He is trying to scare the people into his way of thinking by utilizing an idea that has been scaring people very badly ever since Hitler began to come to power. There are no such authoritarian powers. This parliament is supreme over anything that this government handles. If it is not, we should go home; we should not be here at all. If I thought parliament was not supreme I would not stay here for two minutes.

It is supreme now, despite the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are Liberals and despite the fact that they do things with which I disagree most sharply. Still, what they do is what this parliament says they can do, because they represent the majority. Every four years the people of Canada have the right to say who shall represent the majority. While that is true, it is not true for anyone to say that a board appointed by this government and responsible to this government is exercising authoritarian powers.

Then he said he would like to have a neutral body governing these things. Where would he find it? What does a neutral body mean? Neuter is one of the genders in grammar. There is feminine, masculine and neuter. Two are virile, and the other is lifeless, a thing without life or sex. That is neuter, and my hon. friend would have a body governing our radio commission which would be a sort of polyglot, hermaphrodite conglomeration of something that stands for nothing in particular and is entirely neutral. There is no such individual; there is no such body; it is just another word. People will have bias. Even judges on the bench will have bias without knowing it. We cannot make people without bias. To think that any body will be so absolutely impartial as to be described as neutral is going far beyond anything that I have ever met.

He spoke next about driving the press out of business through the development of facsimile news. I think we must give the hon. gentleman credit for at least going quite a step beyond anything we have been able to achieve in this country in radio development. But the same thing would surely apply under private ownership, no matter how far he carries the development. My hon. friend and his party, just as I and my party, have often said that the press in Canada is controlled by the big interests. I think my hon. friend will never deny that the leaders of his party, if not he himself, have said that constantly, and I think they do yet. But the Social Credit government of Alberta, I would point out, is the only government that I know of in any British country that ever made any decided step toward the censorship of the press. Fortunately they were not permitted to do that.

Mr. LOW: That is not true.

Mr. IRVINE: If it is not true my hon. friend can bring the legislation here and leave it exposed in parliament and leave it to the judgment of the house. At any rate there was a decided effort made to control the press in Alberta.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. IRVINE: Call it what you like. What would you call it?

Mr. LOW: I will tell you exactly what it was. It was an attempt to have the facts as the newspapers saw them and as others saw them presented in the pages of the paper, with no control whatever over what the paper should say.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the hon. gentleman should have used another word. I think he should have used the word "truth." Of course, "truth" is a very slippery word. It is difficult to tell who is telling the truth. I think I am telling the truth in this matter and my hon. friend thinks he is telling the truth. Everybody has a different concept of what is the truth, and if you ever set up an organization that says, "This is the truth and anybody who says anything different is telling lies, and we must not let him tell lies," then you have complete control of the press.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. LOW: That is just your interpretation.

Mr. IRVINE: That was the legislation as I understand it.

Another point my hon. friend made was his expressed fear of Marxian and communistic teaching. He has every right to be afraid of what he must be afraid of and every right to oppose that with which he does not agree, but he has no right to prevent even the communists from having a say in this country.

Mr. JAQUES: Let them say they are communists. Put a label on them.

Mr. IRVINE: He has no right to say that any private station which might give time to these people would receive his censure if he were in power. That remark of his indicates to me that it would not be safe to entrust the spirit of democracy in the hands of the Social Credit party. If that is his idea—

Mr. LOW: That is not what he said. It is only your comment.

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad that the leader of his party has repudiated that. I think it ought to be repudiated. But that was actually what was said.

Mr. LOW: That was not what was said.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall have a word to say after my hon. friend is through.

Mr. McCANN: This thing cannot go on forever.

Mr. IRVINE: No, it cannot, and therefore I shall endeavour to bring my remarks to a close as speedily as possible.

My hon. friend was also kind enough to set up a board of governors for the C.B.C. for the benefit of the C.C.F. He was gratuitous in his complimentary prophecy. He pointed out that if this government should always be there it might be all right, but some day the C.C.F. might get into power. Then he went on to say what kind of board of governors we might have then, and he named a board of his own, although none of these people are here to defend themselves, except one. The ones he named were David Lewis, Professor Frank Scott, Harold Winch, leader of the opposition in British Columbia, the hon. member for Vancouver East, Mr. Elmore Philpott and Miss Macphail. I appreciate that. It is a fine board. I would suggest that the present board is no better. I do not think anyone could have named a better board than the one which was concocted by my hon. friend, and I hope that some day they will actually be in control of the C.B.C. in the interests of the people of Canada.

Let me conclude on the note on which my hon. friend concluded. He protested that he was a Christian. Yet when he came to speak of Russia his remarks were surcharged with irrational bitterness. Whatever things he or I or others may think about Russia this is no time and no place and certainly no occasion for any member of this house to take a rap at an erstwhile ally when the world is now in such turmoil and we are endeavouring to find a basis for the future peace of the world. I hope my hon. friend will repress his noble rage until a more convenient season. There may come a time when it will become necessary for him to criticize Russia, but at the present time the less he or I or anybody else has to say that will stir up animosity in the international field, the better. I want to say further with respect to his fear of communists controlling the C.B.C., and that communists are in control of strikes and communists are doing this and doing that, if all that is true the communists must be the most remarkable people in the world, and therefore most decidedly they should have charge because they certainly have competence if they can do all these things despite the opposition. I think that is all rubbish. To say that every strike is caused by communists or that everything Russia does is bad because she is a communist country—these things are ridiculous. The claim that the C.B.C. is controlled by communists or that it is in danger of being so controlled is untrue and has no basis in fact.

Mr. McCANN: I think it is the wish of all hon. members that we conclude this debate before six o'clock. I have not had an opportunity of saying anything in this debate—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister has the idea that no one else wishes to speak on this question I think I should tell him that he is wrong.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I move to report progress and ask leave to sit again. There are certain items on the order paper which I should like to have called before six o'clock if it suits the convenience of hon. members.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I would be meeting the wishes of all hon. members if I moved at this time:

That, notwithstanding the terms of standing order 6, when Mr. Speaker leaves the chair at six p.m. this day, the intermission extend only to 7 o'clock instead of 8 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 370, to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940.

He said: Mr. Speaker, they are merely verbal changes correcting an erroneous reference in one section to another section of the act.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency or non-residents.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Are we being asked to adopt these now?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Well, they seem to be multitudinous in number. Are we to have any chance of looking at them at all?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understood that they had been examined.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have had these in my hands for an hour or two. But we have been busy here this afternoon.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not want to do anything which will inconvenience any hon. members; but it was the hope that we would, some time, come to the end of this session, and that this might be an opportune time for clearing off the order paper matters that will have to be dealt with before any arrangements can be made to close the session. If the hon. member wishes to have this deferred until a later hour I have no objection. I was prepared to state what the amendments were.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister do so? Will the minister explain what the amendments are and whether the government accepts them in toto?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government had decided to accept them in toto. Most of them are amendments which consist of replacing the word "board" by "governor in council" with respect to certain things that could be done by regulation. There are certain other amendments. One is to provide that, subject to regulations, a person might have in his possession, without its being an offence, foreign currency not exceeding $100. Another is to replace the word "property" by the word "goods" in the section prohibiting exports without a permit. Then there is a provision made by the bill which it was intended to have made by regulation, that the requirements for a permit would not apply to travellers' or tourists' luggage or the things usually carried by persons passing from one side of the border to the border. Another, that subject to regulations, the requirement of being paid by non-residents in foreign currency would not apply to personal or professional services performed in the ordinary course of everyday life by residents of Canada. Another one, to provide that the officers at the border would not be entitled to search a person without going before a magistrate if that person did not wish it done. Then the two most important amendments are: one, that there be a time limit placed upon the duration of the act, namely that it expire sixty days after the opening of the first session of parliament meeting in 1949; the other is the deletion of the provision in the act whereby the Minister of National Revenue might communicate information obtained from income tax returns to the foreign exchange control board. This is something which had been done while the foreign exchange control board operated under the order in council. It proved to be of considerable advantage, and the government felt that it was a provision which was desirable. In the other place a majority came to the conclusion that the inviolability of the secrecy of the income tax returns should not be disturbed even for the purpose of the administration of the foreign exchange control regulations, and the government decided that it would not refuse to accept that amendment and would endeavour to see that the regulations were administered without it, but if it were found between now and the next session that the absence of this provision made it more difficult to track down evasions, a new bill would be brought in asking that the provision be restored.

These are the amendments that have been made.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, if I were asked now, if this came to a vote, I think I would be in the position where I would be bound to vote against this bill as amended by the other place. It seems to me that the most important protection they have given the people of Canada in regard to this bill is to protect evaders of income tax.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Personally I do not believe we should support that, but if the government is satisfied with it I will not oppose it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: May I point out to the hon. member that it is not a prohibition against the foreign exchange control board giving information to the Department of National Revenue in respect of income tax; it is the other way around. The foreign exchange control board will still be able to call to the attention of national revenue any matters which might affect the income of individuals, but will not be able to obtain from the Department of National Revenue information disclosed in income tax returns. It is not quite as serious as perhaps the hon. member felt. But the government still desired to have that provision, because it was a safeguard against evasions of the provisions of the foreign exchange control regulations, and if it is in a position to establish that there is prejudice we shall come back and ask that it be reinserted.

Mr. IRVINE: I just wish to say that I think the amendment which limits the time of the act is even more serious than the point referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is something which can be easily taken care of before the time expires.

Mr. IRVINE: The fact remains the opinion is left abroad in other nations that we may not take care of it. It expires on a certain date, and it may affect the very price of our currency, the thing we are trying to stabilize.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in, on division.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 372, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister explain the amendments?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): There are only two amendments. One is merely a clarification. It adds after the words "dividends" on page 1, line 15, of the bill "paid or credited to policyholders." This is what was intended and it spells it out in terms. The other one is to provide that where the tax is collected on an agreement for the sale of a security or the right to security it will not be paid again when the agreement is carried out. I do not think it was really necessary in order to avoid duplication of taxation, but there is certainly no objection to having it expressed that there would not be two taxes taken on the same transaction.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

MILITIA PENSION ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 392, to amend the Militia Pension Act.

He said: These amendments are merely to correct minor drafting points; there are no amendments of substance.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at seven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): In view of the motion that was adopted at six o'clock with respect to the duration of the intermission, I assume that we shall have the unanimous consent of the house to treat this as the time when private bills and public bills of private members should be called instead of waiting until eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The list of public bills having been exhausted the house will revert to its business at six o'clock.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ASSISTANCE IN DEVELOPMENT OF TRADE WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 201, to establish the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am moving this motion if I may have the unanimous consent of the house. The amendment consists merely of putting a time limit on the duration of the act. It would, under the amendment, come to an end on the sixtieth day after the opening of the session commencing in 1949 unless it is extended in the meantime.

Mr. HOMUTH: I realize that the Acting Prime Minister cannot tell us how long some hon. members will make speeches on certain subjects. I wonder if, by any arrangement with the whips, he can give us some idea as to when the house will get through. Can he give us some intimation as to what his hopes are at least?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is much easier for me to state what my hopes are than to make any prediction as to what the realization will be, but my hopes are that we may finish by twelve o'clock to-night and be able to send the appropriation act over to the other place for consideration. I understand they are meeting at half-past ten in the morning. If that hope were realized we could arrange to have prorogation about half-past eleven.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did I hear the minister aright? Is the senate meeting at ten-thirty o'clock in the morning?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The senate has arranged to meet at ten-thirty o'clock in the morning and to adjourn on call until such time as this house will have provided it with additional work.

Mr. HOMUTH: Thank you, sir.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The committee is considering item 965, loans and investments, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not having been a member of the radio committee this year, and having had several other heavy responsibilities to discharge, I have had to depend in large measure on what I have heard on the floor of the house for an understanding of what this is about. I may say at the outset that the bill which the government presented was repugnant to me and, if that bill indicated the general policy that guides the C.B.C., I would say it is cause for considerable alarm throughout the country. However, perhaps it did not exactly represent the government's idea or that of the C.B.C. I should like to ask several pointed questions of the minister and have his answers to them so that I may be able to form some accurate estimate of just what the C.B.C. is aiming at.

However, before I ask those questions, may I say that I have had great admiration for the C.B.C. ever since it began its activities. I have appreciated the high quality of programme that it has given the Canadian people. I have always felt that the C.B.C. had its place, just as I have felt that the private radio stations had theirs, and I have been of the view that the C.B.C. should keep its hands off private radio stations, leaving them to discharge their responsibility in the country. The evidence which has been presented before the house rather fills me with anxiety lest the C.B.C. is overstepping its bounds. I understand that when a private radio station receives its licence it is taken for granted that every year when it applies for a renewal of that licence it will receive that renewal on condition of good behaviour. I look upon the C.B.C., in reference to this parliament, in very much the same way. When the C.B.C. comes to parliament for grants of money to carry on each year I feel that it should look upon this as an application for the renewal of its licence, and I feel further that it should receive renewal of that licence on condition of good behaviour.

Some of the evidence which has come before us indicates that the C.B.C. has been trying to kick some of the private stations around. If that has occurred, then I believe the C.B.C. should be warned in the matter, advised to reform its ways in the future and given another chance.

In order to satisfy myself, I desire to ask a series of definite questions, for two purposes. First, they will give me an opportunity of learning things about the C.B.C. which I believe every member of the house ought to know and the country has a right to know. Then, it will give the government and the minister representing the C.B.C. a chance to set it right before the country. If there has been misrepresentation, such misrepresentation can be cleared away.

I am sorry I have not a copy of all these questions, but I have a copy of the first nine of them, and I shall send it to the minister so that he will be able to answer the questions one after the other. I should think he would not require a copy of the last ones in order to be able to answer them. I shall send the first ones to the minister, and shall proceed to ask the questions.

Is the government aiming to encourage the development of private radio stations in Canada? I take it, if that is the aim, then the C.B.C. must be aiming to do the same thing. Otherwise I must assume that it is beginning to act as though it were a law unto itself. If that should be shown to be the case, then I would suggest that the situation is not as it should be.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Is the government endeavouring to give the Canadian people what they want over the radio, or is the government aiming to give what the government, through the C.B.C., wants the Canadian people to hear?

If the government is trying to give the Canadian people what the Canadian people want, what steps has the government taken to make sure that it is doing this?

Is the government aiming to establish and maintain freedom of speech in Canada over the radio?

If so, what steps has the government taken —and when I refer to the government I would presume that we would mean the C.B.C.— to establish and maintain freedom of speech over the radio in Canada?

Does the government believe that the majority of the people in any given area of Canada—say a province, section of a province, an audience listening to a given local radio station—ought to be guaranteed the right to listen to any speaker or programme of the choice of those people in that area?

If so, what steps has the government or the C.B.C. taken to see that this state of affairs is brought about?

What in the minister's opinion ought to be the aim of radio in Canada?—entertainment, culture (literary, dramatic, or musical), education, enlightenment? If there are any others, the minister would be free to specify them.

Has the government provided adequate safeguards to prevent the C.B.C. from (a) impairing the strength and efficiency of private radio stations; (b) destroying the strength and efficiency of private radio stations; (c) destroying freedom of speech over private radio stations? What are the safeguards the government has taken in each of these respects?

From this series of questions dealing with the general attitude of the government and of the C.B.C. which, of course, would constitute their policy in Canada, I pass on to some details. The minister, I thought, resented the statement by the hon. member for Greenwood that, if this item were passed, it would ensure the destruction of private radio stations in Canada. I thought the minister was desirous of rising to refute that statement. I trust he will be able to make a good case in refutation of that charge.

I am now going to ask a number of questions about a particular case, so that the minister may put the facts on the record for all who are interested to read.

These are the questions: Did CFCN, Calgary, 1010 kilocycles, ask permission in 1944 to expand its power to 50,000 watts?

Was CFCN refused permission to increase its output to 50,000 watts?

Who were the men who refused this permission?

Did the C.B.C. seek concurrence of the government in C.B.C.'s decision to refuse?

Did the government concur?

Was the concurrence the result of ministerial decision or departmental decision or cabinet decision? What were the reasons for the decision to deny CFCN the privilege of extending its power to 50,000 watts in 1944?

If the decision was made by the C.B.C. without the concurrence of the government, what were the government's safeguards against preventing the development of private stations, that failed of effectiveness in preventing this unwarranted blocking of the development of the splendid private station known as CFCN? That is, if the government has safeguards to protect private stations, in what respect did the government safeguards prove deficient in this case?

Did the C.B.C. force CFCN to sell $158,473.44 worth of time for $28,680.72? How can the minister justify this action by C.B.C.?

Did C.B.C. on April 18, 1946, notify CFCN that CFCN must give up the CFCN channel of 1010 kilocycles and that CFCN must take the channel of 1060 kilocycles? How can the minister justify this action by the C.B.C.? Will this displacement from the 1010 kilocycle channel to the 1060 kilocycle channel lose for CFCN much of CFCN's financial income because CFCN on the new 1060 kilocycle channel must protect Philadelphia and Mexico, thereby cutting off CFCN from the great bulk of the radio audience in southern Alberta, a relatively thickly populated area and one that CFCN has served and served well for years? How does the minister justify this action of the C.B.C. in weakening the financial position of CFCN a private radio station?

Will this displacement of CFCN from the 1010 kilocycle channel to the 1060 channel lose for CFCN a large portion of its audience, thereby impairing the effectiveness of this efficient private station CFCN? How can the minister justify such action by the C.B.C.?

May I comment here and say that it has been argued that C.B.C. has to take over the CFCN, 1010 kilocycle channel and protect it by raising the power to 50,000 watts to ensure that Canada will have that channel allotted to her at the 1947 international conference. May I point out that CFCN had in 1944 sought to increase the strength or power of CFCN to 50,000 watts and was refused.

To go on with the questions. Is it proposed to establish in Alberta, at Red Deer or thereabouts, a 50,000 watt C.B.C. radio station?

Does the powerful C.B.C. station at Watrous, Saskatchewan, not easily reach all of Alberta from the United States border to a point far north of Edmonton?

What possible justification can there be for establishing a 50,000 watt C.B.C. station in Alberta and taking away from CFCN its 1010 kilocycle channel?

Finally, will not a powerful C.B.C. radio station near Red Deer tend to overwhelm the CFCN station even on 1060 kilocycles?

It will be obvious to all members of the committee that, if the answers to the questions which I have asked pertaining to the way in which C.B.C. has dealt with CFCN are such as I fear they will be, it will be difficult for the C.B.C. to justify itself on the ground of good behaviour. I am giving the C.B.C. an opportunity to explain all these matters through the minister.

May I return now to the questions and ask them one by one, so that the minister can answer, after having had an opportunity to consider them.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I know you wish it was carried.

An hon. MEMBER: Question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not blame you for questioning it; it is getting pretty hot.

An hon. MEMBER: We want to go home.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to go home when the business of this house is finished. I shall ask these questions slowly, so the minister can answer them.

Is the government aiming to encourage the development of private stations in Canada? What would the minister say?

Mr. McCANN: Yes, we are.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sure the minister would want to have his answers heard.

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister answer loudly enough, because others are trying to answer for him. Is the government endeavouring to give the Canadian people what the Canadian people want over the radio?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What steps has the government taken to make sure that this is being done?

Mr. McCANN: I do not know that this form of questioning is usual. If the hon. member wishes his questions answered we can answer them without his repeating them the second time. The first question which I have answered is: Is the government endeavouring to give the Canadian people what the Canadian people want over the radio? The answer is, yes.

Next, what measures or steps has the government taken to give the Canadian people what the Canadian people want? They have set up a corporation which is the trustee for the people of Canada as far as radio broadcasting is concerned and have attempted to carry out the wishes of the Canadian people in that regard.

The next was: Does the government mean to establish and maintain freedom of speech in Canada? The answer is, yes.

The next question is: If so, what steps has the government taken?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the minister give an answer to the question: What steps has the government taken to bring that about? I wonder if he can tell us what steps the government has in mind whereby it will ask the people in Alberta or western Canada whether they would like to listen to CFCN or C.B.C.?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member must not interrupt when the minister has the floor. There is no place for two hon. members to speak at once.

Mr. McCANN: The answer to that question is that C.B.C. keeps in contact with and is informed of what the Canadian public wants with reference to programmes, and tries to meet those conditions.

The hon. member's next question was:

What steps has the government taken to establish and maintain freedom of speech over the radio in Canada?

We are in favour of freedom of speech, but not the abuse of freedom.

The next question was:

Does the government believe that the majority of the people in any given area of Canada—say a province, section of a province, an audience listening to a given local radio station—ought to be guaranteed the right to listen to any speaker or programme of their choice?

There is nothing to interfere with people listening to anything on the radio.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Another question was:

What steps has the government taken to see that this state of affairs is guaranteed?

The ordinary rights of the ordinary citizen of this country secure that.

The next question was:

What in the minister's opinion ought to be the aim of radio in Canada with respect to entertainment, culture, literary, dramatic or musical, education, enlightment?

The aim of the corporation so far as programmes are concerned is to give a diversified variety of programmes in education, entertainment, newscasts, sports broadcasts, and information. Freedom is given for the discussion, under regulation, of religious, educational and controversial subjects. That is fairly inclusive, but perhaps not all-inclusive of the various types of programmes offered. The corporation is always glad to hear suggestions from people from one end of the country to the other as to the particular types of programme they prefer. The desires and the needs of people in the agricultural areas particularly are met by farm broadcasts. We have also educational and school broadcasts. It is really a waste of time to go over all this, because the radio committee sat for three months; every phase of its activity was gone into, and there has not been one question asked here since this discussion started that was not fully answered and reported in the minutes of the proceedings of the radio committee, so that I consider it is an absolute waste of our time to have a repetition of this type of question at this stage of the session. I fully recognize the right of anybody to ask questions and shall always be ready to give a fair and polite answer, but, under the circumstances, when everything has been done already to lay before parliament and the people all the information sought in answer to every type of question that could be thought of with reference to radio broadcasting, it is only being repetitious to go over these questions again. However, I will finish giving the answers.

The next question was:

Has the government provided adequate safeguards to prevent the C.B.C. from impairing the strength and efficiency of private radio stations?

C.B.C. simply carries out the Radio Broadcasting Act and the regulations under that act which was passed by the parliament of Canada. That act has been reviewed every year for several years past, and one radio committee after another has endorsed the policies which are being carried out by the broadcasting corporation.

The next question:

Did CFCN, Calgary, 1010 kilocycles, ask permission to increase its output to 50,000 watts?

Yes, it did make that request, and it was refused on grounds of general policy, under which private radio stations are not given the right to increase their power to that extent.

The next question was:

Was CFCN refused permission to increase its output to 50,000 watts?

The answer is, yes. The question went on:

Who were the men who refused this permission?

The procedure is that the application is made to the broadcasting corporation, which reviews it and makes a recommendation to the Minister of Transport, who, under the Radiotelegraph Act has the power to issue a licence if recommended.

Next:

Did C.B.C. seek concurrence of the government in C.B.C.'s decision to refuse?

The government does not interfere in the management of C.B.C.

Next:

Did the government concur? Was its concurrence the result of a ministerial decision, a departmental, decision, a cabinet decision?

I have given the answer to that.

Next:

What were the reasons for the decision to deny CFCN the privilege of expanding its power to 50,000 watts?

The reason was the general policy with reference to increasing the power of private stations. The policy follows the recommendations of committees of parliament which have given study to this matter.

Next:

If the decision was made by the C.B.C. without the government's concurrence, what were the government's safeguards against preventing the development of private stations that failed of effectiveness in preventing this unwarranted blocking of the development of the splendid private station known as CFCN?

There is no attempt to interfere with CFCN, except that the frequency it occupies is now to be occupied by C.B.C. itself.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is really the whole point. The minister cannot gloss over it like that. When you take away the frequency of a station you take away its listening audience to a great extent, as the hon. member from Greenwood indicated.

Mr. McCANN: A greater principle is involved there. The airways of this country belong to all of the people of Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: And not to C.B.C.

Mr. McCANN: No. C.B.C. acts as trustees of the airways for the people of Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: Operators.

Mr. McCANN: I for one believe in state-owned, state-operated and state-controlled radio in this country, and that is the policy of the party to which the hon. member belongs, the policy which his party endorsed in 1932.

Mr. MASSEY: No.

Mr. McCANN: Oh, yes. The then prime minister of this country, the leader of my hon. friend's party, brought in a radio act in 1932. Let me read what he said.

Mr. GRAYDON: At least you are going to a good source.

Mr. McCANN: A few days ago when speaking in this house the hon. member for Calgary West decried Mr. Bennett being quoted so often. I do not quote him because he was Mr. Bennett, or because I was on the intimate terms with him claimed by the hon. member for Calgary West. I quote him because he was the leader of a great party in this house, the only one in thirty years who was elected a member, leader of his party and prime minister. That puts him in a position where he may quite properly be quoted. In a speech that he made on May 18, 1932, on the second reading of a bill respecting radio broadcasting Mr. Bennett said, as reported at page 3035 of Hansard:

Secondly, no other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting. Private ownership must necessarily discriminate between densely and sparsely populated areas. This is not a correctable fault in private ownership; it is an inescapable and inherent demerit of that system. It does not seem right that in Canada the towns should be preferred to the countryside or the prosperous communities to those less fortunate. In fact, if no other course were possible, it might be fair to suggest that it should be the other way about. Happily, however, under this system, there is no need for discrimination; all may be served alike. Equality of service is assured by the plan which calls for a chain of high power stations throughout Canada. And furthermore, the particular requirements of any community may be met by the installation of low power stations by means of which local broadcasting service may be obtained.

That speech was made after the policy recommended by the Aird commission had been put into effect. He went on to say:

. . . I cannot think that any government would be warranted in leaving the air to private exploitation and not reserving it for development for the use of the people.

Mr. GRAYDON: That still does not back you up.

Mr. McCANN: Well, I can back myself up after I get through supporting you. The trouble is that the Conservative party show, by their whole attitude toward radio broadcasting, that they have repudiated the policies which were enunciated by a former prime minister and their former leader.

Mr. McLURE: What was your attitude in 1932?

Mr. McCANN: I have heard no announcement from the leader of the Progressive Conservative party with reference to their policy on radio broadcasting, and I suggest to them that they might well haul down their flag and delete from the hyphenated name the word "Progressive", because they are now no longer progressive as far as radio is concerned.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a good stump speech, anyway.

Mr. McCANN: It is time the hon. member knew something about it.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. McCANN: I would ask the hon. member to wait until I get through answering other questions. I am asked:

Did the C.B.C. force CFCN to sell C.B.C. $158,473.44 worth of time for $28,680.72?

The answer is, no.

Did the C.B.C. on April 18, 1946, notify CFCN that CFCN must give up CFCN's channel of 1010 kilocycles and that CFCN must take the channel 1060 kilocycles?

There is a double answer to that. They were notified that the 1010 frequency would be required, but they were not told they must take 1060. It was suggested to them that 1060 would be available for them as an alternative to the one they now hold, but the matter of another frequency might be canvassed and probably they would be given use of that. That notice was not sent by C.B.C.; it was sent by the Department of Transport.

Will displacement lose much revenue for CFCN?

No, I do not think it should lose any revenue for them. CFCN will still have the greatest coverage of any private station in the west, and should make money.

The hon. member for Lethbridge states how well they can hear the station at Watrous, Saskatchewan. What we want to do for Alberta is exactly the same thing as has been done for Saskatchewan—give them a high-power station which will provide complete coverage of the whole of that province, not only the southern part, but it will be so situated that there will be complete coverage for the whole of Alberta.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Alberta can hear Watrous very clearly.

Mr. McCANN: Not all of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: North of Edmonton they can hear it.

Mr. McCANN: That is the very reason we are putting in another high-power station in Alberta, namely, that we have had so many complaints from Alberta that, although in the southern portion of the province they can hear the Watrous station, in other parts of it they can not. In addition to that, we want to build up a chain of stations, one in Alberta, one in Manitoba, one in Saskatchewan, two in Ontario, one in Montreal, and the one we have in Sackville, to carry out the policy which was recommended by the Aird commission, the policy which has been endorsed by every radio committee which has sat and made inquiry from that day, to this.

This is not a matter of new policy with reference to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This appropriation, let me say, is not a matter of a gift or a vote; this is a matter of a loan. A loan to whom? To the C.B.C. on behalf of the people of Canada, for whom they are trustees. And I want to tell the committee that we are dealing with people who have on former occasions borrowed money and have paid every cent of it. The C.B.C. does not owe the people of Canada one five-cent piece. We have made loans to them on former occasions and on every occasion that money has been returned.

Mr. CASE: Have they paid any taxes or fees or like charges such as private enterprise pays?

Mr. McCANN: They pay the same taxes as other public bodies do.

Mr. CASE: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member himself knows the answer.

Mr. CASE: The answer is that they do not, and they should pay taxes.

Mr. McCANN: What this asks for is a loan, which will be repayable. All these discussions which have taken place upon the supplementary estimates might well have taken place had we gone ahead with the bill which was proposed and came to second reading. That bill was not dropped because we have changed any policy; this method was taken of securing the money with a view to expediting the work of the session, and we thought it would probably take a good deal less time than if the bill were discussed in every detail.

I think we should proceed to pass this item and get on with the rest of the business of the house. I should like, if opportunity permitted, to review what has been done by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, but I feel that we are on eminently safe ground and that we have the support of the great majority of the people of this country in carrying out the policies of a great nationally owned, controlled and operated radio system.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate very much the answers the minister has given. They are straightforward, and they give the point of view which obviously is actuating the minister and the C.B.C. The one great inconsistency lies in this fact. When I asked the minister if he favoured the development of private radio stations he said, yes.

Mr. McCANN: Yes, so I do.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then he immediately sanctioned a policy which will result in the serious impairment, if not the ultimate destruction of CFCN.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is something which needs explaining. I will leave it to those who read Hansard and to the members of the committee to judge. The mere fact that statements were made in forecasts by the leader of the Conservatives back in 1932 which would seem to justify the policy that C.B.C. is following does not, in my judgment, establish the soundness of that policy.

There are one or two matters to which I wish to refer. I asked the minister if C.B.C. had forced CFCN to sell $158,473.44 worth of time for $28,680.72. The minister said, "The answer is, no". May I read from the minutes of the hearings of the radio committee, at page 566, where Mr. Love is giving evidence for CFCN. At the end of the third paragraph, about one-fifth of the way from the bottom of the page, he says:

> In addition non-obligatory sustaining programmes carried by our station for the C.B.C., day and night, last year, if computed at our lowest rate, would amount to $61,800. Add to this the value of the commercial time used by the network for their commercials of $57,361.44 and it makes a grand total of $158,473.44. We received from the C.B.C. a total of $28,680.72, one-half of the commercial sponsors' money received by them.

That was the basis of my question. I leave it to the committee.

Now, as to the question whether the CFCN station will lose by the change-over, the minister expresses the opinion that it would not. That is certainly not what the manager of CFCN himself thinks about the matter, because he points out what the members of the committee will readily understand. CFCN is situated in Calgary. South of Calgary is the city of Lethbridge and a great number of small towns and Medicine Hat. CFCN has been serving these communities for many years. If CFCN is to screen its broadcasts in such a way as to protect Mexico and Philadelphia it has to screen out, according to my information, all these communities south of Calgary, which means that a large percentage of these towns will be lost. If I am correctly informed, that means that it would be less remunerative for CFCN to sell its advertising, because the rate at which people pay for advertising depends upon the listening audience. It may be argued that CFCN will not lose heavily financially by the change-over. I cannot say. The minister thinks it will not. The minister said that CFCN was offered a channel other than 1060. So far as I have gone into the records of the radio investigation, no mention was made of any other channel than 1060. If there were any other channel which has not the disadvantages which accrue to 1060 I would be reassured.

I have one or two other points. I could read a considerable section of the report of the committee, but I do not think I had better do that. In my judgment, the one important point that we have to determine is whether or not private radio stations are to be given the right to develop and make their contribution to this nation's thinking, its education and development, or whether they are to be submerged and reduced to relative colourlessness and ineffectiveness by the overriding C.B.C. If more stations like Watrous are to be established in every portion of Canada, then I would venture the supposition that in about fifteen years private radio stations will simply disappear. In other words, the move is one which will ultimately result in the strangulation of private radio stations, not necessarily because the C.B.C. will deliberately destroy them, but it will simply come in and take their business and allow them to die. That is quite evident from the answers which have been given to my questions.

I am not satisfied with the situation. Something better should be offered to the private radio stations. The fact that station CFCN was a pioneer, that it served the people of southern Alberta admirably for many years, and that to-day that radio station serves the people admirably, that the people of all over southern Alberta, so far as I know, are strongly attached to the station and would prefer to hear it rather than to listen to the C.B.C. programmes, makes it a serious matter for the C.B.C. to take any action whatsoever which will result in the impairment of that splendid radio station.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We have an amendment before the committee. I am not sure whether it has been moved. It was moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's:

That vote 965 for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be reduced to one dollar.

Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No. I am conscious that no one would willingly take on this task at this time. I know the committee is tired and all that sort of thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Take plenty of time.

An hon. MEMBER: It is going to snow.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The reason I am taking the time of the committee on this matter is very simple. I believe that, while nominally passing merely this item, what we are really doing is what the minister really indicated a moment or two ago. We are really settling an important question which is going to be irrevocably settled.

I want to say one thing, first, because of something that happened earlier in the day. I am far from criticizing the C.B.C. I wish to say this in particular—I do not think the hon. member for Waterloo South intended to suggest that the C.B.C. had dealt unfairly with our meeting. Sometimes he and I are a little prejudiced against the Liberals, and it may be that he suggested that the prejudice carried over. I wanted to say that in the presence of the officials of the C.B.C.

I now come back to what I intended to say. A bill came before the house which was discussed. There were only two speeches made on the other side about it. One was dead against it. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to-day suggested that most of the things in the bill were better left over for consideration later, with which I fully agree. Yet we are asked to take action here which, I submit, will really make the other points largely meaningless, because of the action which we are asked to take here. I submit this in spite of what the minister said about their wanting to encourage private radio. The important thing is not what people say but what they do. I believe that it has been established in this committee to my satisfaction—and no satisfactory answer has been given—that this action will have the effect of destroying or at any rate so crippling as virtually to destroy these companies in question.

I want to go back to what the minister said about what was said previously in the house by a previous leader of this party. I am not afraid of it; I do not want to run away from it. Conditions often change. I submit that never in the history of the world have conditions changed as much as in the last fifteen years. I submit, further, that if you take the words of Viscount Bennett they make it perfectly clear what he was talking about was not the situation we have now, because he was talking about "leaving the air to private enterprise." That is what he was complaining about. But nobody to-day is suggesting that. What we are suggesting is that this house should take time before it irrevocably closes the door on a policy which was so well established on other occasions, notably in regard to the railways. In the railways we have two enterprises: the great public enterprise and the great private enterprise. I would think what they have done is a pretty good way to combine public and private enterprise.

Let me say again that I believe there are hon. gentlemen opposite who feel as I do, not including the minister because he plainly and clearly said what was to be his policy. He said he was for state control, and I assume he means right across the board. It is fit and proper for the minister to say that. That makes it perfectly clear that what we are doing is not passing an item; we are deciding a principle finally and irrevocably. I believe that there are hon. gentlemen opposite who feel as I do. They do not want this thing irrevocably decided. I think I am safe in challenging them and asking them to rise in their places and say they believe that. I think I can pretty nearly dare most of them except the minister. His statement was plainly and honestly given, for which I respect him.

I wish to recall the situation which we have before us. It is not disputed that if we take this action it will result in the emasculation and virtual destruction of these stations. There are usually two reasons for mulcting or destroying or hampering private enterprise. One is that it is in danger of becoming a monopoly. That suggestion was made to-day—I forget by whom—and it seemed to me at the time that we might be saved from that kind of argument when we are having a serious discussion. The question is not whether private enterprise can create a monopoly; the real question is whether it can stay in the picture at all. The second reason given for mulcting private enterprise is usually that it has been doing a bad job, that it has not been serving the interests of the public and that the public do not want it. I want to bring to the attention of the committee—and I know perfectly well there are hon. gentlemen opposite who agree with me—certain evidence given by Mr. Porter of Calgary, statements from farm organizations in Alberta. There is a long telegram, which I will not read, from the western stock growers association, but there is a short one from the Alberta farmers' union, comprising twenty thousand members. I quote:

> This will give you permission to act in our behalf. Add the Alberta farmers' union to the brief presented to the radio committee tomorrow. Give you our moral support to establish a fifty thousand watt station in Alberta to be controlled by the people.

That is interesting, that we can get that in support of the application made by this private station in Alberta. I shall have some words to say about that.

Mr. KNIGHT: Was the suggestion made that this station should be owned and operated by these farm organizations or by the so-called people, or was it not a regular joint stock corporation?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think it was a company, but they established close contact with the farm organizations and are working in happy relationship together, and this telgram speaks for itself. There is a longer one which I will not read. I will spare the committee that one because the time is late. I said that the reason I am arguing in this way is that this is not simply a matter of passing an item; it is a question of settling a great principle.

I should like to come back to the debate of a week ago, and notwithstanding what the minister said, I suggest that no one in the house, when that debate was going on, could fail to sense that there was a feeling in the house against what was being done. The strongest speech made against the bill was made by the hon. member for New Westminster. He was attacking the power being given the corporation to act as judge and jury, as well as plaintiff and policeman. Further, I come back to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre today. He argued, I thought wisely, that in several of these instances we should delay, because delay would not hurt, and we could look at the matter in a wiser and more temperate way if we delayed it than we can at the present moment.

Let me point out the alternative. These private enterprises are hampered. The field is left open for the C.B.C. As the hon. member for Greenwood said this afternoon, they are to occupy the field "totally, completely, finally and absolutely"; and someone else—I have forgotten who it was—said that they wanted "to have the whole pie". I contend that nothing can be injured if this matter is allowed to stand. Let me refer to what the hon. member for Calgary West said, namely, that nothing could be hurt until next January, that you have things on order now and cannot get them until then.

There is no reason why this important principle cannot stand until then, and as a matter of fact, if there were urgency, which there is not—the minister made that clear—we have until 1949. If there were any urgency, the private stations are on record as saying that they would go ahead and build, and, heaven knows, we have enough power to expropriate later, if necessary.

I wish now to come to another matter which has been lightly considered here, lightly considered by the minister, and rather scoffed at by the member for Cariboo. Indeed, I was amazed at the attitude he took. I refer to the question of concentration of power. There seems to be an idea abroad that because power is in government hands it can never be abused. Twenty years ago that idea might have had currency; it might have been excusable. But how anyone can have such an idea in the world that we have lived in during the last fifteen years or so is something that I cannot understand. Yet steps are being taken to put this instrument of propaganda in one hand. The hon. member for Cariboo took the view, it seemed to me, that because it was under government control no harm could be done, but none of us believes that. We have all seen that harm can be done.

Mr. GILLIS: That will be only because the members of this house default.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Oh, no. Let me develop my argument. May I give an illustration from a socialist paper in England, discussing an incident that occurred on the B.B.C. I gave this illustration last week.

Mr. GILLIS: The Economist is not a socialist paper.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The item to which I refer did not appear in The Economist, but in The New Statesman, and that is as socialist as any you will find.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sorry. I thought you were quoting The Economist.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No; I try to be accurate in what I say. I know The Economist is not socialist, but I am speaking of The New Statesman, and that is socialist. A writer in that journal referred to a certain decision made by the B.B.C. to keep a certain man off the air, for reasons which I will not go into.

Mr. GILLIS: You are not quoting the article. If you are going to quote it put it on the record. You are only commenting on it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will quote the part which I wish to quote. The hon. member can check it up in Hansard of last Saturday. The writer, commenting on the incident in question, made this statement:

I believe in competition in the things of the mind.

I believe those are the right words. At any rate, the hon. gentleman can find the quotation given accurately last week.

Mr. GILLIS: Is that an editorial opinion?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): This writer said, "I believe in competition in the things of the mind." That was in a column which appears regularly, and to the best of my belief it represents the views of The New Statesman. There is nothing to indicate that it does not, and I explained all that on Saturday last. By that statement, I take it, they meant that it was desirable that no one body should have complete and exclusive access to means of propaganda which has such unbounded powers as the air now has. To me, the argument that is stronger than any other is that so expressed by this writer. To quote what was said fifteen years ago, in the light of all that has happened in the intervening years, is simply meaningless, because, I suggest, the argument which I have just quoted, in the words of that writer in The New Statesman, far outweighs all the others. That is the strongest argument in my opinion for accepting the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and allowing the matter to stand along with the other items in the bill until we can deal with them all together next session.

What is the reason for the urgency? I cannot find anything in all this debate that indicates any urgency. I have already indicated the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary West that the matter should stand until next session. I do not believe there is any difficulty in the way of that proposal. If work needs to be begun—

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. McCANN: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman to say that there is great difficulty, because equipment is ordered and will be here this fall.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am surprised that the minister should say that, because apparently the hon. member for Calgary West had an entirely different idea, and I assume he did not get it out of the air. He says:

You have already your material on order for the stations you intend to build. You know you cannot get it yet, but the time will come when this material can be obtained. So why not let this matter rest? Remember that all the Alberta members—I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is not here because he might not concur—at all events, all of us who are here will agree that we do not want this thing.

But if that is not so, and there is danger of time being lost, the private stations say they will do it and, as I said, you have plenty of power over them, so you need not be afraid.

I am going to tell the committee what I think is the real reason for this, and this is a reason which I submit most earnestly to hon. members. I think the reason is—and I say this with all due respect to the C.B.C.—that the C.B.C. feel that now is the time to get this power, and they do not want to delay. They do not want to run the risk of any further consideration, and perhaps by next session a different view arising, a view whereby perhaps we would decide that radio should be put in the same position as the railways, and that we should have two great institutions—which I think we should have—one national institution and one private institution.

At any rate, all I am asking is that we should use our time to look at this, and that we should not, in the dying moments of this session, and under the guise of voting an amount of money—take a step which will be irrevocable and which is so unfair to radio.

So I say again—and I am pleading as earnestly as I can—that no harm will come, and that if we debate this matter next January or February and reach the conclusion that we should follow the minister's advice and have state-operated, state-owned and state-controlled radio, then it will be all right with me. If that is decided by parliament, then I shall abide by it.

But what I point out is that if we are to decide on a vote to-night we shall come together next session and begin to talk about this, but by that time the private stations will be down the drain; the C.B.C. will have gone ahead, and everyone will say, "Oh, what's the use; it is all done? You are talking about water that has gone over the dam."

So I say, do not let us do this; there is no need of doing it. There is no emergency. It should be left to rest now, and the whole thing can be considered next session.

Mr. HANSELL: I wish to ask the minister a question with respect to the matter of time. Do I understand that a meeting was held in Washington—I believe it was in February of this year—in which the terms of the Havana agreement were extended until 1949? Is it not so that there was an interim agreement drawn up extending those terms? If that is so, why does the minister claim that they must start work on this by 1947, when we have until 1949 to do it?

If he persists in saying that they must start work in 1947, would he kindly tell me the article in the agreement which so states? I am not talking about the Havana agreement, but rather about the interim agreement drawn up in Washington last February.

While he is looking up that information, I should like to say one further word. This afternoon the hon. member for Cariboo delivered what I would call a colourful speech. I am not going to answer it—not because it is unanswerable. I will say only that he certainly is a past master at twisting that which other people say to suit his own argument. I shall leave it at that. I shall leave his speech and my speech on the record. I will leave it with people in Canada who know radio from the ground up; I will ask them to read those two speeches and I am willing to rest my case with those who know.

Mr. McCANN: The Havana agreement has been extended to 1949; but it is on the understanding that the channels which are given to Canada shall be occupied and completed by 1947.

Mr. HANSELL: My answer to that is that the channels are occupied now. I want to know what clause in the interim agreement says that the work must be started on them by 1947.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. BRACKEN: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have one word to say. I do not wish to hold up the committee, but I would repeat that I see great danger in the monopolistic control we have at the present time. If we vote this money we shall make it worse. Not only that, but the situation to-day is detrimental to the future of radio.

We have, for instance, the matter of television; no one can get a licence for television. We have facsimile, but no one can get a licence for facsimile. There are other enterprises going on, but no one can get licences for them.

It is just the same old story. Perhaps hon. members have heard about the dog in the manger. Well, he is here. The old dog in the manger sits over there. He will not let you do anything; that is that. That is the C.B.C. at the present time. I feel strongly about this matter, or I would not have moved the amendment.

Mr. HOWE: Don't cry about it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Let them talk as they like; but there are many in the House of Commons who do not know anything about broadcasting. We see private enterprise willing and ready to go ahead with the development of radio for Canada; on the other hand, we see the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation jealous of its position. And the reason they are jealous is that the government of the day wants to keep controls for itself. I hope every hon. member who believes in free enterprise will vote for my amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. CASE: Don't be in too big a hurry. After all, I think we are all anxious to conclude the session. This is an item of considerable magnitude and the results would be far-reaching. As the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has said, we are really determining policy; I believe that was admitted by the minister.

He has quoted from Viscount Bennett. I can say that I happened to be in a position where I was not a follower of Mr. Bennett, so that I do not necessarily approve what the minister has read. I am one of the newcomers to the Progressive Conservative party—

Mr. ABBOTT: Whom did you follow then?

Mr. CASE: I am over here as a matter of conviction. I certainly am not prepared to join with the minister when he suggests that we should remove the word "Progressive" from the name of our party. I believe all and sundry in Canada will recognize that we have progressive ideas. Among them is a means whereby we can preserve that one great measure of efficiency, and that is the old law of competition.

I am going to be brief, and say this—

Mr. ABBOTT: Take your time.

Mr. CASE: I thank the minister. I am glad I have his support.

I believe that the only method by which we can measure the standard of efficiency is by competition. As the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has said, that applies to our railroads. I suppose I might be in the wrong if I attempted to apply that yardstick in a limited way to the present administration of the C.B.C. I know that, according to the record, they are losing money. They receive all the licence fees and the licence fees from the private stations and they are still unable to make ends meet. I hope we shall have some regard for the future and make it possible that there will be paralleling this great government system a private chain of systems, so that we can vie with our neighbours to the south where they have more than one network, all privately owned and, as far as I know, all making money. Why is it that, once you introduce government ownership into anything, you seem to lose that standard of efficiency? I do not say that unkindly, because it may be that more is expected or that people lean too much on it.

I am opposed to monopoly of any kind and I have heard a lot about monopolies from my hon. friends to my left, the C.C.F. socialists. I am more unalterably opposed to a state monopoly than a monopoly of any other type. I say to hon. members opposite that the day may come when they will remember my words. Some day we may be occupying the treasury benches and then they will say that we are using the radio as a propaganda machine. That is what it has developed into at the present time, and I say that advisedly and sincerely. I do not know whether it is because of any sense of direction, but those who are in the driver's seat at the present time are certainly those who understand propaganda better than we who are sitting opposite.

I felt that I should make my position clear on this important item, and I join with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario in appealing to the minister to lay this to one side until we can deal with the whole bill and accept the consequences in the session of next year.

Mr. JAQUES: I assure hon. members that I am just as anxious to get home as they are and I have a much greater distance to travel. When I left the house this evening what did I see? Right across the front page of the evening paper were these words, "House voting millions in rush to close." That sounds very well to the public, I should think, especially since we have voted ourselves an extra $2,000 a year so that we can carry out our duties. It would be interesting to have a vote to-night to see how many hon. members have gone home.

I put it to this committee and I should like to put it to the people outside whether it is fair to bring in a motion like this in the last day of the session. Those people who feel very strongly about it are shut off, because the incessant cry is "carried". That is the atmosphere of this house.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes, it is. I have listened carefully to this debate, but I have not heard one argument to show that there should be government control of radio any more than government control of the press. Reference was made this afternoon to an alleged attempt by the Alberta government to control the press. There was an immediate outcry from the very people who are now clamouring to have monopoly of the radio. What was the proposal of the Alberta government? Without going into details, it was simply that the government should reserve one corner, less than one-half of one per cent if I remember correctly, of the space in order to make sure that their statements appeared as they were made. The press could then have all the rest of the paper to tear them to pieces, but the government wanted their statements shown correctly. That was the so-called control of the press and there was an outcry from one end of Canada to the other.

Here is an item which proposes a complete government monopoly of radio. That includes news, but news is the least part of it. The part I object to is that the government—I do not know what the government is these days as a matter of fact—is to have a monopoly, not just over giving out the news, which they cannot alter if they stick to the truth, but of interpreting the news and moulding public opinion. That is what I object to. If I could stop it by staying here until Christmas I would do so.

It has been said that this is a Conservative motion. I have no objection to the C.B.C. as a regulating body.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: C.B.C. or C.C.F.?

Mr. JAQUES: Both. What I do object to is that, if this goes through, it will be not only a regulating body but a controlling body, and I know very well where the control will come from. The other day I mentioned General Chisholm who, I understand, has a good international job.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What did he say about Santa Claus?

Mr. JAQUES: The remark I made about General Chisholm was that, if he had mentioned the passover instead of Christmas, he would not have got the job. I leave it to the committee to interpret what I mean. I have had a number of abusive letters from the supporters of General Chisholm, and who are they?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Read a couple.

Mr. JAQUES: Every one of them is a communist. Don't forget that the Labour Progressive—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member is getting away from the item under discussion.

Mr. JAQUES: I am sticking to it. My point is that the Labour Progressives supported the government in the election of a year ago. They are behind the radio bill too. Another defender of the radio bill this afternoon mentioned a shotgun and said that people would not take away your shotgun until you started to use it. He missed the point. There is no objection to the shotgun because everybody can see it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Fathers use a shotgun sometimes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. JAQUES: If this were the flag question we should hear plenty from the other side of the house, and I would have a great deal more respect for the views of those in that corner of the house on the flag if they would only think more of Canada and not be so willing to hand it over to international control.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There are so many members interrupting that I can hardly blame the hon. member for digressing, but I would ask hon. members not to interrupt and the hon. member who has the floor to confine his remarks to the vote.

Mr. JAQUES: I will if hon. members will confine their remarks to themselves.

Yesterday the empire's greatest soldier made the statement that the country's first defence was a strong national feeling. That is the truth. But if anyone can tell me that the C.B.C. stands for nationalism, then all I can say is that I have not heard what they said. If there is one thing that the Canadian people are being taught by the commentators of the C.B.C. it is that nationalism is isolationism, or fascism, and that we have all to be internationalists.

I am going to ask a question. I have asked it several times. Why is the communist Labour Progressive party, which has not a single member in this house and is not represented, so far as I know, in any provincial legislature, given the same amount of time over the air as the Social Credit party? That is what I want to know.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a good question.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes; why is it? Until that question is answered, and so long as the time given to the Labour Progressives is as much as that given to the Social Credit party, I am going to oppose the C.B.C. in every way I can.

Mr. MICHAUD: You said that before.

Mr. JAQUES: Yes, and I will say it again. I would make this suggestion to the C.B.C. Instead of building more high-powered stations—I have heard hon. members speak about radio in Alberta, where I have lived right in the centre of the province since 1901, and so far as I know Alberta is very well covered by radio to-day; I have heard of no demand for a great big station to be built out there by C.B.C., because we have all the radio we need—I would suggest, if C.B.C. has money to spend that it make a beginning on building a first-class symphony orchestra. The B.B.C. has one, and of course there are symphony orchestras on all the big networks in the United States. Why should we not have one? We have plenty of talent, and whatever may be the opinion of some members I think that good symphony orchestra music is a great deal better and more intelligible and more wholesome, if you like, than crooning and jazz. I hope the minister will take a note of my suggestion that the C.B.C. make a start in building up a first-class symphony orchestra. It could give concerts in our various cities and also broadcast, so that people would have the advantage and pleasure of hearing really great music played in a really great way.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The train does not leave until 11.45 p.m.

Mr. KUHL: Don't miss it.

Mr. JAQUES: I have had to raise my voice more than I like to. I do not want to take up any more of the time of the committee. I agree with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that this radio vote stand until we come beck next session. No harm would be done. In the meantime we can think the matter over and be in a position to have a proper discussion when we come back next year. I do not like speaking at this stage; yet I cannot avoid doing so. I could not go home with any satisfaction if I did not do it. I hope that the committee will allow this item to stand until January or when the house next meets.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak solely because I believe in competition. We have had competition here since early this morning between those who favour government ownership of radio broadcasting and those who are opposed to it. That is the issue which is involved. I am one of those who favour government ownership.

An hon. MEMBER: How about monopoly?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not masquerading in false colours. I am opposed to competition just as my hon. friends say they are opposed to monopoly. As a matter of fact no one is in favour of competition.

An hon. MEMBER: No?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. No one is in favour of competition. You may favour competition in the abstract, but the moment you begin to do something for yourself you want a monopoly. Is the C.P.R. in favour of competition? Does any business in Canada favour competition? It is in favour of competition in other fields but not in favour of competition in its own field. It is all tommyrot to say you favour competition—

Mr. KUHL: Your argument is tommyrot.

Mr. MacINNIS: You haven't brains enough to understand it.

An hon. MEMBER: That's the boy.

Mr. MacINNIS: This is the kind of argument that we have here. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin said he was opposed to the C.B.C., and would oppose it at every opportunity—

Mr. JAQUES: It is a monopoly.

Mr. MacINNIS: —and the very next moment he said, why not leave this over until next January when we come here? He would be opposed to it next January. I am as anxious as anyone to go home. I have a nice home which I have not seen lately; I have been away from this house only three days since we met here on March 14. But I say this to the government, let them resolve that they are going to deal with this matter however long it takes, and that we shall stay here until we deal with it, and not try to get these things done in a hurry and be stampeded into doing something which we do not approve. As I said, I am as anxious as any other member of this house to get home, but I am prepared to stay here until we finish our business in an orderly fashion. There is no substance in the argument to leave the matter over until next session. The people who oppose it now will oppose it next session, so that if we are going to debate it, let us have a full debate on it, with those who favour government ownership taking their share, as well as those who are opposed. In my opinion we have a much better case.

Mr. FERGUSON: When I hear the unnecessary noise and shouting from other quarters of this chamber, I can hardly believe that a matter affecting $2 million of the public's money is under discussion. I remind hon. members that this is a serious problem; it is not in the main their money, they are only small contributors to the $2 million involved. They are treating this matter as though they had nothing to do with it, but they are supporters of the government, and should not forget that the government in power is the only means through which this $2 million of the taxpayers' money can be spent, and the government insists on rushing this through, although we have asked that it be put over. It is verging on—

An hon. MEMBER: A filibuster.

Mr. FERGUSON: Liberalism, communism, nazism—

An hon. MEMBER: Toryism.

Mr. FERGUSON: —all these isms which depend on government control. Let me remind my French-Canadian friends of this house, who are giving wonderful support against communism in Canada, that this is a direct step toward communism. The government benches to-night are treating in the most flippant manner a huge expenditure to do away with private and public corporations and replace them by government rule. That is the first and decisive step on the direct road to communism.

Mr. WHITMAN: Approved by a viscount.

Mr. FERGUSON: Mark well when you read the daily paper to-day of the objections by Russia to the great United States sending a battleship to a port in Greece on a friendly visit.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with radio?

Mr. FERGUSON: In a few years this country may be in the same position as Russia is in, ruled by a regime of public ownership, of communism, with a government in power using this vital and powerful instrument of radio to control this country, and the very people who are footing this bill of $2 million will have nothing to say about it, because the way this government is headed it will control Canada by radio.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FERGUSON: Hon. members on the government benches should remember that people in the visitors' gallery of this house do not come here to hear them laugh and treat lightly the expenditure of $2 million of their money.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McLURE: No; it is not carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let us build the ferry or the tunnel or whatever they want, and get on with the business of the house.

Mr. LENNARD: If you are going to adopt that attitude we won't wind up as soon as you and I might want to.

Mr. McLURE: The government is asking this committee to make an investment in a kind of crown corporation. In other words, it is asking this committee to give dictatorial powers to a corporation in order that it may eventually push private enterprise in radio out into the deep. I was not a member of the radio committee, but I had the privilege of reading the evidence produced before that committee. Now, in this item presented to this committee we have this government anxious to put this vote through the house in the dying days of the session, and without due consideration.

In this item the government want to lend to or invest with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation $2 million, to give the C.B.C. the most high-handed power that can be given to any company, namely to have an exclusive monopoly of broadcasting.

The introduction of the item before the committee shows plainly that the government is lavishly buying its way into socialism, and doing so with the taxpayers' money. The Canadian people have little conception of the extent to which this government used the radio to mould public opinion during the last seven years. During that time they had a stranglehold on this great medium of propaganda. I admit that there is a definite place in this country for a national system of broadcasting.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What are you quoting from?

Mr. McLURE: If the hon. member would only stand up and look at himself he would not have very much to say.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You don't know him.

Mr. McLURE: But there is also a definite place for the privately owned station. In a country such as ours, a country of freedom of speech, it would not be well to have our air channels entirely taken over by a government radio monopoly. Canada's well-being and enterprises spring from the private enterprise system and not from bureaucratic fiddlers. Instead of improving by assisting our present system of broadcasting, the government proposes to unloose further hoards of business-baiting bureaucrats who stifle rather than assist the efforts of thrifty and industrious citizens to improve the material well-being of Canada.

In the light of demonstrated records of failure of experiments in this country in the direction of the totalitarian procedure, it is to be hoped that this committee will insist on a restoration of the people's own freedom of action and the right of private enterprise to get the green light. In my opinion it would be much better to grant some ray of hope to that hard-working group of patriotic citizens who comprise the membership of the Canadian association of broadcasters from coast to coast. I understand that the Canadian association of broadcasters this year asked for a simple amendment to the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936, namely, for an appeal court before which they could appear when they might have any grievance against the rulings of their big government competitor, the C.B.C. This was flatly refused.

There is much more I should like to bring before the committee with regard to this item, but I am not going to delay the committee. Let me say that the whole situation is so ridiculous that I cannot comprehend that this committee, supposedly representing the people of a democratic country, will concur in the vote; therefore I am opposed to it.

Amendment (Mr. Ross, St. Paul's) negatived.

Item agreed to, on division.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

General—National film board, including the motion picture bureau—

246. Production and distribution of films and other visual materials, $860,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make one comment on this item. I am in favour of this vote; I am in favour of the film board; I am in favour of the work they do. I want to make this request, that the department should seriously consider whether the film board cannot be made a much more self-sustaining organization; whether it cannot get its affairs on a much more businesslike basis, and whether when they come back a year from now with an item in next year's estimates it cannot have been advanced a considerable extent.

Mr. BRYCE: I wish to ask the minister a question about the franchises which the film board issue to different people in the country. I am talking about a section of my own constituency, namely, the district of Stonewall. In this district they have given the franchise to the gentleman who runs the theatre in Stonewall, and the ladies' organizations and the farm organizations cannot participate in the benefits of the film board films. I have taken this matter up with the minister and nothing has been done about it. I want to see something done about it, so that these organizations can have the use of the films which are produced by the film board. I do not mean the "March of Time", or any of these other films that are shown in the picture theatres. I am speaking of the films which are of an educational nature, films on health and that sort of thing which are suitable for farm folks.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): The wrong item was called. We shall have the film board estimates after these. We want to deal with the health side first.

Item stands.

Welfare branch—

799. Old age pensions (including pensions to the blind)—administration—further amount required, $6,285.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the minister make a statement on government policy regarding what has developed since the old age pension item was before the house the last time. Hon. members will recall that the collapse of the dominion-provincial conference made it impossible for arrangements to be worked out in detail so that pensions could be made available at an earlier age and in a more generous amount. At that time the minister was not in a position to indicate just what the future plans of the government might be. Several weeks have passed since the matter was before the house. Can the minister indicate just what has to be done to make it possible for the people in the old age pension bracket to meet the rising costs of living which are prevalent all across the country?

Mr. McCANN: I might explain that this additional amount of $6,000 odd is required to pay the travelling expenses of the members of the inter-provincial body in connection with a meeting arranged for September, 1946, estimated at $4,000; also to provide an additional amount of $2,000 to pay travelling expenses of the members of the old age pensions division in connection with the examination of provincial old age pension records. There has been a considerable increase in the number of new cases, and, in addition, increases as a result of orders in council passed under the authority of the War Measures Act. The increases are shown by the following items.

With reference to the question by the hon. gentleman which was what arrangements have been made so far as the old age pensions go to meet the increased cost of living, I cannot give him a positive answer, but I shall bring the matter to the attention of the officials. I am taking these estimates only in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. REID: At this late hour I am reluctant to bring any special case before the committee, but since there is not any likelihood of a dominion-provincial conference being called at this late hour, I say that a definite change is required in the old age pension regulations, particularly in the light of a case which came to my attention just a few days ago. This is the case of a man eighty-two years of age who went to visit his daughter in the United States, and an irresponsible driver of a car hit him on one of the streets in a city of that country and fractured his skull. He was taken to a hospital. After being in the hospital for sixty days, the doctor advised him that he had better stay in the home of his daughter and not return home. Lo and behold! on his return home he found that he could not get old age pension because he had been outside the country a certain number of days. Here is a man who has been in the country since 1885. He decides to visit his daughter and, through no fault of his own, he meets with an accident. Copies of the certificates were sent to him and also a copy of the ruling of the board in Vancouver which tells him that, according to the regulations of the Old Age Pensions Act, he cannot come under the provisions of that act until June, 1948. Since he is now eighty-three, he has a slim chance of ever getting the old age pension, because he has passed the allotted span by some years. I suggest to the minister that he take note of the case and, when the provinces meet with the dominion, regulations of this kind be amended. It seems to me that there is great injustice in the case I have stated.

The question I wish to ask the minister is this. Have representations been made to the various provincial governments, who seemed willing to accept the offers put forward by the dominion government in regard to old age pensions? We know there are two provinces that have remained aloof, but I understand there are some provinces that are ready to accept at least a part of the social legislation outlined by the dominion, and I am asking, therefore, whether the minister can give the committee some information on this question. I will not go into the subject of old age pensions, but I think everyone agrees that we must revise the entire act and bring it up to date in the light of present-day conditions so as to afford a decent standard of living and to enable our aged citizens to carry on. Can the minister give any information as to the attitude of the provinces?

Mr. McCANN: The question which the hon. gentleman asks has reference to the dominion-provincial agreements as far as they affect social legislation, more particularly old age pensions. The proposals put forward have not dealt with that particular phase, but I am taking note of the questions asked by the hon. gentleman and they will be brought to the attention of the department.

Mr. MENARY: I wish to say a few words in this debate on estimates, and I trust that what I have to say will be constructive and to the benefit of all our people in this great dominion. I desire to speak on annuities at the age of sixty. What I shall say will not take up much time but I believe that this subject merits our earnest consideration. As we all know, Canada has enjoyed great prosperity. When we look back and recall the amazing sums raised in the various war loans; when we remember the interest rates on these loans and note the steady increase in the price of these bonds, we say to ourselves, this truly is a new era. Yes, truly it is a new era, but perhaps not for all. It is not for the people who had retired, say, ten or fifteen years ago, or immediately prior to the war. To-day, if you wished to retire and had invested $100,000 in government bonds for the past five years, your annual income would be only $3,000. We will say that you live in Ottawa or Toronto, or in any other city where homes are scarce. If you wish to rent one you will want a home such as, I presume, a person of this wealth is accustomed to. Such a home would cost, I imagine, $100 a month or more. If you try to live in your former style and if you have dependents, the upkeep of a car, medical and ordinary living expenses, et cetera, may make it difficult to live on this interest. Your net income, if you are single, after taxes would be $2,024.75; if married, $2,250.

Now let us compare this man to a farmer, who has retired possibly at the age of sixty, because he has a boy at home who wishes to get married and start out in life for himself. We will say this farmer owns his farm and has $10,000 invested in bonds. The son agrees to pay the father $5,000 for the farm at an interest rate of three per cent. That will give the father an income of $450, but the taxes on his new home in town will probably be $75, his hydro, water rates and insurance on the house, at the very least $25. This man will have $350 to live on, buy coal, milk, food and clothes. He will contribute to his church. I ask this committee, can this man live on this income?

Then we come to the working man, say a white-collared one. We will say he has earned from $2,500 to $3,000, has lived in the city during the war, and has raised a family of three and tried to educate them. His savings would be small and he must still struggle to live. In the smaller town where there is usually a garden and rents are much lower, we drop into a lower scale, but here we ever have the increasing cost of living pressing heavily on his shoulders, as on the shoulders of all our citizens and especially on the people in the low-income brackets.

Then take the worker in a factory, or a store, a road builder, a street-car conductor, or any other worker with an average income. Take anyone working in a store or an office. When these people have raised their families and saved what is left for old age, and the time is approaching when they must retire, I ask, will they have sufficient to care for themselves after the age of sixty?

I have had some sorrowful letters from men on old age pensions in my riding. One case is that of a man of seventy years of age; his wife is sixty. How can this man live on $25 a month with the laws now framed so that under the means test he can earn only $100 a year? Even at that, his income would only be $400. I have another case where the husband is on the old age pension and his wife, who, I would say, is aged about sixty, is not eligible. This couple cultivated a garden and sold a few vegetables. The wife helped out by doing housework, washing and so forth. The husband, who was formerly a carpenter, filed a few saws. He could not do much of this work because he lived in a very small village. However, this became known to the inspector and deductions were made from the pension which this man receives. Consequently, this couple were without any income from December to February the following year, when representation was made to the pension board, who agreed to deduct the amount due by this pensioner in payments of $5 a month. Here is another case where the government penalizes thrift. I investigated these cases and know they are true.

There is only one remedy, and that is a form of old age annuity starting at sixty years, without the means test, contributed to by the pensioner from the age of twenty-one. This will not be called an old age pension, because the beneficiary would contribute to this fund as well as the government. If we take, for example, and only for example, that each person pays $1 a month, starting at the age of twenty-one, these payments over thirty-nine years, with compound interest at three per cent, would amount to $892.81. We will say that the government duplicates this amount. This would mean $1,785.62.

With living, rents and education for one's family, it is impossible for the average wage-earner, farmer or citizen of any group, to educate a family and keep enough for old age. The government can borrow money at three per cent—and now we hear that it may be less—but one can hardly live on the income on $10,000 invested in government bonds. For that reason and for humanity's sake, something must be done for all people, when they reach the age of sixty.

Then, again, to carry the idea one step further:

1. To ensure employment for others, it would be advantageous for the government and a benefit to the country to reduce the available labour supply in a few years by providing adequate security that will permit people to retire at the age of sixty. Toward this objective, people could start now to contribute to such a government pension fund and then, in years to come, they would themselves provide for their future security and not, as is the case now, have to look to the state for aid.

2. The government would have the use of the huge fund and save on money they have to borrow.

3. The security policy could be enlarged to include medical benefits and hospitalization.

4. The policy would be contributory for the group under sixty at the start, and would absorb all over this age who apply.

5. The insurance companies would still compete in the field, covering largely the deathrate element.

6. This rate of a $1 a month to be uniform throughout all Canada.

Last, the administration of this act, if passed by this house, could be administered through the county councils cheaper than in any other way and the county council is closer to the people.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to add my protest to those which have been expressed several times during the course of this session at the failure of the government to do anything this year about increasing the amount of the old age pension. The case is one which hardly needs to be made; it has been made repeatedly in the house in former years, and also this year in other debates. The simple fact that $25 is the maximum pension payable under the act as amended by order in council certainly makes it clear that we are not doing sufficient for our old people.

The fact that there have been increases in the cost of living is well known to all of us, and I am sure every hon. member is receiving letters from elderly people expressing their amazement that the government does not see that they need an increase in the amount of their pension, not two or five or ten years from now, when they are dead and can no longer use it, but now when they are alive and in desperate need of it.

I know the arguments and answers which have been given to our arguments for increasing the old age pension, such as problems arising out of dominion-provincial relations, and all that sort of thing. But it seems to me that the minister gave an even weaker answer to-night when he simply said there was not much he could do about the matter, because he was only speaking on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is out of the country at the present time. We have not said much about that in the house, but it does seem too bad that there should be so many ministers of the government away at the present time. I know that even in writing letters on matters which come before us we are sometimes presented with a problem in trying to find out to whom we should write for attention to the problems of our people.

Mr. MITCHELL: Take a look at your own party; lots of your people are away.

Mr. KNOWLES: Our party does not happen to be in the position of responsibility that members of the cabinet are.

Mr. MITCHELL: Thank goodness, for the Canadian people.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Canadian people will express themselves about that in due course.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They did, in 1945.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, in 1945 the Canadian people gave the Liberal party and the government now in power a job. They thought that one of the jobs to which the government was going to give its immediate attention was the improvement of old age pension legislation. Correspondence we are receiving and views being expressed across the country make it clear that the people are amazed and disappointed at the excuses found for delaying action in connection with this matter. I would urge that the government get its ear to the ground, so that it may realize what people are thinking about this matter, and that it ought not to delay any further the necessary increase in the amount of old age pensions.

There are other matters which could be discussed, including the eligible age, the means test and various other provisions. I would remind the government that, in discussing these matters, we are not now comparing their performance with standards which some of the rest of us might set; rather we are comparing their performance with their own standards as set out in the proposals they have made to the dominion-provincial conference. They have set the standard—the minimum standard at any rate. Some of us are not satisfied that that goes far enough. But at least they should not be allowed to rest until they have measured up to their own intimation that the old age pension ought to be at least $30 a month, without any further delay.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before the session closes, I wish to say only one brief word on behalf of old age pensioners. During the last two sessions of parliament we have made provisions, first of all, in the matter of our own indemnity, in salary boosts for various civil servants, if not for all of them. Only recently the cost of living bonus was increased for those who had been receiving increases in wages. Throughout the country organized labour and other workers are receiving increases in wages, all of which results in the meagre pension paid to old age pensioners being worth less than it was before.

It is the duty of the government not only to look after those who can look after themselves, but also to see that those members of the national family who are not able to look after themselves are provided for in as large a measure as the country can afford. I submit that this country can afford a much better pension than is now provided. I suggest to the minister and the government, if no other way can be found, that they add a cost of living bonus to the old age pension in order to remove some of the poverty from those who must subsist on the income provided by these pensions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Once more I wish to point out to the government that the amount this country can afford to pay its aged people, the senior citizens, does not depend upon the amount of money that can be wrung out of the people; it should depend upon the goods and services which this country can produce. There are four or five ministers in their seats at present and may I point out to them—

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said there were practically no ministers in their seats, so that I am glad to hear the hon. member for Lethbridge say what he has.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is not what I said; I referred to the large number of ministers who were out of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL: On very important government business.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is important business also.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Since the minister has raised the question I think the matter should be recorded in Hansard. The ministers who are away from this country are on very important business. Every person in this committee who faces facts realistically knows that, and I want the government to have credit for that fact. We hear silly talk once in a while, but let it be borne in mind that never in the history of this nation has it been so important that Canada be represented in so many different places by strong men. Of course those men have to be away to take care of the interests of this country, and that explains the absence of so many ministers.

I was referring to the number of ministers in their seats at present. I urge on them that, if they are to save this country from calamity, they must begin to realize that the amount this country can pay to its old age pensioners, to its labourers in industry, depends upon the goods and services this country can produce and not upon the money that can be wrung out of the people by taxation. When we approach the economy of Canada in a realistic manner we shall see that the old age pensioners, the senior citizens of this country, are in receipt of a sufficient income to support them in dignity and comfort for the remaining days of their lives. The longer this country neglects these senior citizens, the longer it will continue to cast reflection upon those in power in the country and upon the country itself.

I have stated on several occasions that a pension of not less than $50 a month at sixty years of age should be paid. That is an exceedingly moderate amount for the elder citizens of Canada. Once more I wish to put myself on record and, through me, the Social Credit group, as favouring the payment of at least $50 a month to all senior citizens of Canada sixty years of age and over.

Mrs. STRUM: I want to add my voice to those of the hon. members who have spoken for the last time on this important matter. We have heard from all sides of the house about the importance of establishing markets for Canadian goods in other parts of the world. I submit that here is a market which we do not have to seek. A few million dollars paid out in the form of old age pensions would immediately create that much demand for Canadian goods. It would be good economics as well as humanitarian. I think this government owes it to the old people of Canada to see that at the beginning of next session this matter is dealt with realistically.

I hope to heaven we shall not have to wait until we sign up every province individually in a separate agreement before anything is done about this group which is now living below subsistence levels. I wish all the ministers would take $25 and try to live on it for one month. They would find out how often they would eat. I suggest that until they have done that, they cannot begin to understand what it is like to be old, most likely sick and with the weather of the next few months, cold, because these people will not have sufficient to obtain heated quarters. Many of them will be hungry because their money will not spread over the thirty days. We have raised our own salaries, we shall be comfortable, but I hope our consciences will not be dead, even though we have failed to deal with this matter at this session.

246. Production and distribution of films and other visual materials, $860,000.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like the minister to explain this decrease of $39,500 and state if it is not due to a cut in trade union and industrial showings and in the production of films.

Mr. McCANN: The answer is that the films formerly produced under this vote were designed to supplement departmental films intended to stimulate industrial production and contribute to the maintenance of morale in war industry. It is expected that films to be produced under other votes and for other government departments will provide for the necessary programmes during the fiscal year 1946-47. There was an increased expenditure to meet the needs of war industry and now that the war is over the needs in peace-time industry can be met by a lesser expenditure.

Mr. KNIGHT: The Saskatchewan allotment is cut by twenty per cent. Last year I understand that the national film board had twelve men in the field in Saskatchewan and this year I understand there will only be three. Perhaps the minister would say whether my information is correct. While there is a distinct economy in reducing the number of field men from twelve to three, I think the expenditure for the province is still needed for the production of films, and I should like to see the appropriation for Saskatchewan as great as last year's. That is not merely based on wishing. The appropriation was formerly $75,000 and it is now $55,000. I would base my request for a grant equal to last year's upon the coverage given in Saskatchewan. I think the money saved by reducing the field men from twelve to three, if that is to be done, should be spent in the province, which I understand is providing out of its own funds this year for a large scheme of audio-visual education through the showing of films. Let the money saved on the salaries be spent on the production of more films to help out that programme. It would mean that more people would see more Canadian films; it would be the means of getting more information to the people of Saskatchewan. I understand that Saskatchewan is giving greater coverage than any other province. They will need part of the appropriation for school films. The national film board releases will receive greater coverage in Saskatchewan. My information is that in Saskatchewan they exceed the combined showings in all the other provinces. If that is true, they will need a good deal of money for the production of films to carry out that ambitious and, I think, worth-while programme.

Mr. McCANN: I am advised that the number of men in Saskatchewan will be substantially the same as last year. Although the amount here is somewhat less than the corresponding item last year, it will be increased by an item in the supplementaries with which we shall be dealing shortly.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am given to understand that, while there will be more men in the field this year in Saskatchewan, they will be provided by the Saskatchewan government through its department of adult education and audio-visual education, but I understand that the field men of the national film board in Saskatchewan will be reduced from twelve to three. If that is true, my point is that the salaries which would have been paid if the number of field men had remained the same be spent in the production of films to enable the province to carry out its programme.

Mr. McCANN: I am informed that my hon. friend's information is not correct and that the number of men in the field will be substantially the same as last year. In addition, there will be a large number in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BRYCE: I have received a petition from the Stonewall district in my constituency where the people have trouble in getting the national film board to include Stonewall in their circuit. Stonewall is only twenty miles from Winnipeg. The trouble seems to be that to show the national film board's films would infringe upon a franchise held by a commercial exhibitor. The national film board exhibits its films free of charge. They are of an educational nature, and I would ask the minister to see if the local women's clubs and other groups cannot be allowed to see these educational pictures which are not now shown in Stonewall. They are shown in Winnipeg, where there is any amount of commercial pictures, but apparently there is an agreement between the national film board and the film industry that the film board will not exhibit its films within ten miles of a commercial motion-picture house. I think our farm people have the right to see the film board's pictures in the local school house or the community hall, where there is no charge, because the film board renders that service to the community free. That should not be prevented by the whims of any commercial organization. It is the right of the people to have an opportunity to see these educational films, and they should not be deprived of that right.

Mr. McCANN: That matter is being canvassed, and the suggestion which the hon. member has made will be taken into consideration.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to pursue a little farther the question raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon City. I was not quite satisfied with the minister's answer, which was to the effect that during the war considerable visual education was carried on in war industries and that now it was not necessary to carry on that work to stimulate morale. I notice by the details that there is a decrease of $30,000, and it would appear that visual education given among the trades unions is to be discontinued entirely. At least there is no money shown here for that purpose. If that is so, I shall have a little more to say.

Mr. McCANN: I do not think that is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no mention of it here, and the minister has already stated that the showing of films in war industries was not being continued. I think that was one of the important features of your educational work, and that now, at this period, it is more important than it was during the war. Am I correct in assuming that you are discontinuing all their union education?

Mr. McCANN: No.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not correct? There is nothing in this vote for it.

Mr. McCANN: No. I am informed that we are developing a much more cooperative scheme with the trade union people than we have had.

Mr. GILLIS: If that is so, I am quite satisfied. I understand there is something in supplementary estimates.

Mr. McCANN: Yes. That is what I said.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

356. Departmental administration, $106,210.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to make a few remarks on this item, although I will try to condense them because of the other business which we wish to get done. What I have to say is in connection with the Doukhobors of Kootenay West.

I think most hon. members know that some time during 1898 and 1899 some 7,600 Doukhobors came to this country and settled in the prairie provinces, after negotiations between their representatives and representatives of the Canadian government. Commencing about 1902, a more extreme sect of the Doukhobors known as the Sons of Freedom commenced to give trouble not only to Peter Verigin, their leader, but some trouble in the district in which they were located, and about the fall of 1907 this culminated in somewhat less than 100 making a trek to Fort William and staying there doing casual jobs until the winter months, and then, on January 1, 1908, staging a nude parade in Fort William. There was some discussion of the matter between Peter Verigin, who disowned what he termed "these mad brothers", and the dominion government, and finally the dominion government returned these Sons of Freedom in two Canadian Pacific colonist cars to Yorkton. The Doukhobor community continued to grow, causing the authorities and Peter Verigin the first, some difficulties. They refused to register births, marriages or deaths and to comply with the Homestead Act of the Dominion of Canada. So Peter Verigin began to look for another district to take them to—the promised land—and came out to Kootenay West, surveyed the country, realized that it was one of the most beautiful districts in Canada, and decided that he would move some of his followers to Kootenay West. I might say that after a survey of the district Verigin reported as follows:

In British Columbia we will buy our land and own it so it will not be necessary to be subject to the English king, and keep our land. No schools are there. The air is very pure, like Switzerland. So we will live in good health in the Christian way with no government to bother us, no rheumatism and few mosquitoes. Slava Bohu.

Peter Verigin was a capable person, and realized that he had found a good country. His visit resulted in the spring of 1909 in some 800 persons arriving on a special train at Brilliant. In 1910 another contingent arrived, and in 1911 a further thousand settled in the Kootenay West and Grand Forks district. At that time they purchased 14,403 acres of land on an agreement of sale for $646,000. They were very industrious, and by 1912 they had reduced the amount owing on that agreement of sale to $325,000. The virgin forest gave way to orchards. They built a jam factory and sold jam in western Canada which became quite famous—the Kootenay Columbia brand of jam. They established an irrigation system and erected sawmills. At the end of 1912 in Kootenay West we had over 5,000 Doukhobors, and out of those 5,000, were over 700 children who had never set foot in a Canadian school.

What was then known as the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood continued to prosper. The industry of these people was, I remember very well, admired by the people of the surrounding districts and their neighbors; but because of the failure of these people to register births, marriages and deaths, protests were made to the provincial government, and the government of British Columbia was asked to take some action in this respect. I might say in regard to this matter vigorous protests were registered by the Doukhobors because of the gaoling of some of their people. Right at that point, about 1912, is when the first serious trouble commenced in Kootenay West. Trouble has continued over the years by a series of burnings of school houses, community halls and, in some cases other buildings. As a result of the protests of people in the district, in 1912 the provincial government established, on August 24, a royal commission, and Mr. William Blackmore was named commissioner to inquire into the organization, habits, customs and practices of the Doukhobors, and make recommendations. Very little was known about the Doukhobors, their habits, customs and practices, at that time, and the commissioner had no previous experience in this type of work. Really, the findings of the commissioner only resulted in causing the Doukhobors to lose confidence in our government institutions and our ideas of keeping an agreement, because the commissioner's major finding was that the order in council granting military exemption be cancelled. That caused considerable disturbance amongst the Doukhobor people. The difficulties in the districts surrounding their communities continued and schools continued to be burnt.

Then we come to 1914-18, war years, and there was considerable trouble at that time. The dominion government recognized the agreement of 1898 and they were exempted from military service, although there was some difficulty as between the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood and what were known at that time as the independent Doukhobors. On April 28, 1917, the Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood was incorporated with a capitalization of $1,000,000, although as a matter of fact at that time, I believe, their assets were worth three times that in value. On October 28, 1924, Peter Verigin was killed by an explosion while on the Kootenay express at Farrow. Usually we do not exaggerate things in Kootenay West, but I think the term "Kootenay express" is an overstatement.

In the fall of 1927 Peter Verigin II came to Canada after considerable consultation between the various groups in Canada and certain representatives of the Doukhobor community in the Soviet Union. While Peter Verigin II openly supported the government, there is no question about it that behind the scenes amongst the Doukhobor community and the Doukhobor factions he held the government up to ridicule. From the time of his assuming leadership the community got into financial difficulties and internal dissention developed. About that time the Sons of Freedom, who were becoming stronger, developed the nude strategy, and that is why over a period of years, on occasion, we have had parades of nude Doukhobors protesting against some difficulty within the community or some laws of the land.

In 1932 Peter Verigin II was sentenced to three years for perjury. This sentence and conditions arising out of the mismanagement of the community and the depression caused the Sons of Freedom to stage their first large-scale nude parade. As a result, hundreds were arrested in Kootenay West in the fall of 1932 and interned on Piers island; some of them were released during the summer of 1933, but some were not finally released until 1935.

Finally Peter Verigin II died on February 11, 1939, leaving the community in an extremely bad condition financially and rent with internal dissensions. The community was in debt and the Sun Life Insurance Company and the National Trust Company held large mortgages on their property and were threatening to evict the Doukhobors. Prior to the war and during the early part of the war the government of British Columbia, in order to avoid the social difficulties that would surround their eviction, bought the Sun Life and National Trust Company out, so that at the present time the Doukhobors in Kootenay West own no land or property as a community. These properties are now held by the land settlement board of British Columbia on behalf of the government of that province. Since that time, under the direction of the supervisor they have tried to sell back individual blocks to these people, but with little success. A few blocks have been sold, but the great part of the property remains in the hands of the land settlment board of British Columbia.

Just at this point I want to pay a particular tribute to Mr. Ralph MacIntosh, supervisor of the land settlement board, for his work in connection with the Doukhobors and provincial constable I. Deboiu. Both of these men have a thorough knowledge of the situation and have been most capable, painstaking and patient.

In 1939 the war came along and the government again recognized the agreement of 1898. From that time on there has been a change in the actual conditions in the communities as regards the attitude of a large number of these people toward Canadian institutions and the Canadian government. I might say that in this war some 130 of these people served in the armed forces and some in the Pacific coast militia rangers. Arrangements were made for contributions to the Red Cross on quite a generous scale, and many of them worked in war industries and in the lumber industries But during the war the cleavage between the different groups further developed. I might say that at the present time the former Christian community of the universal brotherhood is now known as the spiritual community of Christ. Then we have a large number of independents; and the faction who cause the trouble, the Sons of Freedom. There have been recent attempts by a core of these Sons of Freedom to terrorize the majority of the Doukhobors who wish to live as good Canadian citizens. In the last two or three months some fourteen homes have been burned down in Kootenay West; a cooperatively owned community hall has been burned, and a large irrigation system has been damaged. The people of the district of Kootenay West are anxious that something be done to stop this incessant lawlessness of a few people who bring disgrace upon a whole community and their race.

There are some factors which exist to-day, favourable factors which never existed before, in my opinion and in the opinion of many people of the district, which make it possible for us to do something to solve this question on a permanent and satisfactory basis. The first is the experience of these young Doukhobors who served in the recent war. These young men have returned to the communities and they are having a good influence amongst the people who remained at home. The second is the experience gained by men and women who worked in war industries. Large numbers of these people have worked in the industrial plants at Trail, with the Kootenay engineering company in the construction of the east dam on the Kootenay river, and in other projects throughout the district, and in the lumbering industry. To a greater extent than before they have associated with the people who work in industry generally.

Then we have their experience in trade unions. In recent years quite a number of these Doukhobors have joined trade unions, and have begun to understand trade union principles and to see the benefits which derive therefrom. Then, again, quite a number of them are joining cooperative societies, in which the majority of the members are people of another race. Here, again, they are learning to work with other people and are gaining experience. I might say that at the present time the great majority of the younger people are attending school. I find that, on account of the work in industry during the war and association with other Canadians in trade unions and cooperatives, many of the younger people have developed a much higher standard of living than existed prior to the war. These people have now had a taste of what the Canadian standard of living is for workingmen generally, and they want to maintain that standard of living. These young people do not want to return to the poverty and the destitution which they experienced for some years prior to the war.

In conversation with Doukhobor boys who have returned from the forces, men and women who have worked in trade unions and in the cooperative movement, and who have worked in industry in large numbers—and I know hundreds of them—I find a general desire to maintain the Canadian standard of living, accept Canadian institutions and live according to Canadian standards. Within all these groups there are large numbers of Doukhobor people who are anxious to cooperate with the government in an effort to solve this problem for the benefit of their own people and for the advantage of the community as a whole.

I have hastily sketched the situation, but I want to say that we consider this is a joint problem of the dominion and provincial governments. We believe that the time is opportune for action on behalf of the people of the district. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I urge that the Secretary of State bring this matter to the attention of the government. I know the Minister of Justice has some knowledge of it, and on behalf of the people I represent I urge a joint inquiry into the whole Doukhobor situation and problem in an effort to work out a solution which will be satisfactory to all. I think at this time that is possible under the most favourable circumstances that have existed since the community came to Canada. I suggest that inquiry be made into the lawlessness of the small minority and that action be taken to prevent it in the future. Second, I suggest the education of the children of those who refuse to obey Canadian law. There are still some children of the sons of freedom living particularly in the small village of Crestova, and at Gilpin, which is in the riding of the hon. member for Yale, who do not attend schools. I think that is a situation which has to be taken up and corrected. Then there is the question of the ownership of land and the possibilities of satisfactory settlement. While at the present time the land is held by the land settlement board of British Columbia and the Doukhobors have no legal title to it, during the years of mismanagement under Peter Verigin II many of these people paid hundreds of thousands of dollars into the community which was wasted by mismanagement. They feel that they have a moral right to the lands, and they resent being asked, as it were from their point of view, to pay twice for these properties. When we consider the amounts spent in other directions, I think it would be a good investment for British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada to make some arrangement to let these people have some of these lands at a reduced price. It would assist in the solution of the question. They feel keenly in this connection, and I suggest that the matter should be investigated and something done along these lines to meet the situation.

I come now particularly to that branch in which the Secretary of State is interested, especially since the passing of the Citizenship Act, and that is the question of instructions in the principles of citizenship. In that community the Secretary of State has a splendid opportunity, within one group and by cooperation of many within the group, to instruct these people in the principles of Canadian citizenship.

Then there is the question of the franchise. The Doukhobors were able at one time to vote in provincial elections in British Columbia, but this was changed by law, and then later in the federal field, the Conservative members, led by the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, argued that the British Columbia act should be extended to dominion elections. I am glad to say that at that time the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, said that he did not think it advisable to go back to Old Testament times and seek to visit the iniquity of the fathers upon their descendants unto the third and fourth generations; and the members of the C.C.F., including the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, made a strong protest against taking the franchise away from people in a wholesale manner. Legislation was passed and the Doukhobors were then prevented from exercising the franchise. I am not suggesting that all these people are capable of exercising the franchise at this time, but how can we build them up into Canadian citizens with such a law? What do we offer the hundreds of these people who have gone and purchased properties and are now living as Canadians? What do we offer them under this legislation now existing on the statute books if we continue to prevent them from exercising the franchise and, according to the law, prevent their descendants also from exercising that privilege for all time?

As a matter of fact, we have Doukhobors who served in the Canadian forces and who, by reason of that service, were given the right to exercise the franchise; but the wife, because of this legislation, has not that right. I emphasize again, I am not suggesting that all these people are capable of exercising the franchise at the present time, but I say that the present arrangements are not ethical and do not demonstrate common sense. I suggest that provision should be made whereby all those who wish to live according to Canadian law and by Canadian standards and in support of Canadian institutions, should, after qualifying for citizenship, be granted the franchise.

In conclusion, on behalf of my constituents I urge this government, in cooperation with the provincial government of British Columbia, to give immediate consideration to the wishes of the people I represent with a view to solving this long-standing social problem. I am certain that, if the problem is approached with determination and understanding, the result in the very near future will be satisfactory to the people I represent, the people of Kootenay West, and will cause the great majority of Doukhobors, who wish to live according to Canadian law and Canadian standards, to say in their usual way: Slava Bohu.

Patent and Copyright office—
364. Administration division, $35,630.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I wish to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that there is room for improvement in the patent office system at the present time. Hon. members know that the patent office is a revenue-producing department, but it should not be so, when that involves the risk of providing fewer facilities to the public. Patent applications have been lagging for a great number of years owing to understaffing and lack of facilities. I am not going to go into all the details. An investigation was made some years ago and a report was prepared by Mr. Ralston of Montreal in 1940. It is a very good one, and I suggest that it be implemented at this time. No doubt the reason it was not implemented was the fact that we were at war.

The first need of the patent office is, of course, proper housing facilities. The office is now distributed in three buildings, and that makes it difficult for coordination and also for those who practise before the patent office. The second difficulty is lack of staff. A great number of examiners have died and others are just about at the retiring age. In view of the fact that the Patent Act is a highly specialized act, the patent office should as soon as possible acquire a great number of assistant examiners, who should be trained for this work. I am afraid I am only repeating a complaint which has reached the patent office from time to time, that patent applications take too long to be examined.

Another thing I would bring to the attention of the Secretary of State in a few words is lack of facilities for those who practise before the patent office. We have not a decent search room; we have not a library containing patents of foreign countries readily available for inspection. Then, of course, above all that there is the question of obtaining prior Canadian patents. As hon. members no doubt know, Canadian patents are not printed. Various systems might be considered. They have all been found to be expensive, but this government will sooner or later have to realize that an initial capital expenditure must be made to create these facilities for the benefit of the public. I urge the Secretary of State, if at all possible, to appoint a committee at the next session to look into the Patent Act, both as to legislation and also as to facilities within the patent office. Now that the war is over, we shall no doubt have a greater number of inventions both from foreign countries and from people at home, and no doubt our patents will be only as good as the facilities of the office will permit.

As a suggestion, I would say that the income of the patent office could be increased by raising the fees. Our fees are at present low as compared with those of other countries, $15 for filing and $20 for the final fee. In most other countries the fee is over $30. If our fees were raised to that level the income of the patent office could be almost doubled and proper facilities provided and better patents obtained.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask a question about the item dealing with translations, as to why so large an amount is shown for temporary assistance, and whether it is really temporary or not? Is it an emergency situation which will disappear?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): The reason is that a large number of the male employees are temporary, and cannot be made permanent because of the veterans' preference provision.

We are now dealing with item 364. The hon. member for Ottawa East, who has given a great deal of thought to this matter and who, in the practice of his profession, is a patent solicitor, has made a number of suggestions which I feel have considerable merit. As he has said, there is much to be done by way of stream-lining the patent office at the present time. If there is some tardiness—and there is—in the disposition of applications, this is largely due to the fact that the applications are almost thirty-eight per cent more now than they were in the immediate year preceding the war. However, the closest study is being made of the problem, both with a view to trying to increase the staff of examiners and others, and to see if we cannot accommodate the great demand being made upon the patent office.

Not a little of our problem, as the hon. member has said, has to do with the fact that the patent division is handicapped by lack of space. The Minister of Public Works is engaged in trying to remedy that situation. I may say that every one of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Ottawa East, a number of which he has discussed with me privately over the last few months is, as he knows, being given serious consideration. And when I say that I mean that we hope, before parliament next meets, to be able to remedy many of the current inadequacies.

The type of questions he has placed before the committee to-night were put to me earlier in the evening by the hon. member for Peel, who had to leave the house and who asked me if I would let the item stand. Since I did not wish to accede to that request, it was suggested that he might leave the questions with me in writing, and that I would make replies forthwith.

His first question is: What is the lapse of time between the arrival of a patent application at the patent office and the issue of the official filing receipt? The answer is, about two years. This includes delays of replies by and to solicitors in answer to letters which have to do with patent applications. The statutory period for answering letters is six months. There is also a delay of six months in the payment of the final fee before the patent is issued. There are about 20,000 applications now before the patent office, and these are being actively prosecuted.

His second question is: How many applications now in the patent office have been there for (a) three years or (b) for four years or more? The answer is that there are over 10,000 applications at present in the patent office which are three years old. The proportion that have been in the patent office for four years is difficult to estimate, since all secret applications filed during the war could not be examined, for security reasons. These applications are only now being released from secrecy. There were between 4,000 and 5,000 secret applications filed, most of these emanating from Great Britain and the United States. The patent examining staff was reduced by twenty-five per cent during the war, on account of examiners being lent to other war departments, and because a number of the staff went on active service.

The third question is: How many applications have been in the patent office (a) for four years and (b) for five years or more? As I have already said, secret applications could not be examined during the war years. There are between 5,000 and 6,000 applications in the office for over four years. For over five years, these consist principally of secret applications, of which there are probably about 4,000. They are now being withdrawn from secrecy and being examined as quickly as possible.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not thoroughly familiar with this. There is reference to applications which have been there four or five years. Does that mean that probably some important business operations are being held up because of the delay in issuing patents?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: No, an effort is made to deal with the more important applications. But I am frank enough to say that there are delays; and these delays are due to the fact that the applications require very close atttention on the part of the examiners. When I point out that at the present time we have thirty-eight per cent more applications than we had in 1939, with our staff twenty-five per cent reduced, the hon. member will understand our present difficulty.

I am faced with the difficulty of trying to meet a legitimate request for economy in expenditures. One is torn between that very proper desire at this time and the necessity for meeting a growing demand. However, we shall have to increase the staff; there will be no alternative.

Steps have already been taken. The civil service commission is advertising for some special technicians who will serve as examiners, in an effort to meet this growing problem, one which, I may say, is not found only in this country, but is common to Great Britain and particularly the United States.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Did I not understand the hon. member for Ottawa East to say that the patent office is self-sustaining?

Mr. MARTIN: Up to $350,000 this year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It pays its way?

Mr. MARTIN: It is a revenue-producing department.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then surely the argument for economy is almost in reverse. However keen one may be for economy, one does not wish a profitable business to be held back.

Mr. MARTIN: I may say the hon. member's observations are most helpful.

Public Printing and Stationery—
270. Departmental administration, $10,490.

Mr. KNOWLES: Earlier in the session, on another item, I asked a number of questions of the Secretary of State respecting the work of the printing bureau. In a number of instances he said consideration was being given to the matters concerning which I had questioned him. Has anything come from the consideration being given to the use of the union label on government printing?

Mr. MARTIN: No; there is no change in that.

Mr. LENNARD: While I appreciate the fact that some statutes may demand that copies of divorce evidence be printed, I cannot see any use in having all these copies of evidence, simply to be thrown in our waste-paper baskets. It is a waste of paper and of valuable time in the printing office.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member realizes that assignments of that kind are not within the jurisdiction of the king's printer. He carries out the orders of the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is considerable opinion in the country to the effect that a wider reading of Hansard might be a good idea. Some members are not so sure of that; but there are those who feel it would be, and I am one of them. Has consideration been given to the possibility of reducing the subscription price from $3 to a lesser figure? This involves consideration of what it is costing for the extra copies which have to be printed to meet the subscription lists. Has this matter been considered?

Mr. MARTIN: It has been. One is faced with the same problem I mentioned a minute ago. We could give these things free, thereby adding to the cost of operation. However, the matter is now under serious consideration, not only with regard to Hansard, but in an effort to try to set up perhaps a more effective agency by which government publications generally might receive wider distribution.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can the Secretary of State say how many copies of Hansard are printed, and then break that number down into the number circulated and the number subscribed for at the $3 rate?

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to give details later on to my hon. friend, since I have nothing here except that it is around 9,000.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—Civil service commission—

484. Supply of personnel for demobilization and reconversion services, $658,508.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is this for?

Mr. MARTIN: This is to cover the expenses of civil service operations in connection with demobilization. The hon. member will note that the details are to be found on page 261 of the main estimates.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is rather odd that the same figure of $658,508 is arrived at, and the reason would seem to be that they have adjusted the amount for sundries. What kind of way is that to make up an item?

Mr. MARTIN: That is the total figure.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is arrived at by just putting in an amount for sundries. I do not want to be meticulous about the matter, but it looks rather silly. You have $658,508, which does not mean a thing because it is only arrived at by putting in a sundries figure which gives you that amount. I am not making heavy weather about it, but it is not a sensible way to make up an estimate.

Mr. MARTIN: If I could bring down the ledger which would be a much larger book than I have, I could give the hon. member the items for telephones, telegrams, travelling expenses and so on.

Item agreed to.

856. Canada Temperance Act, further amount required, $1,000.

Mr. LENNARD: What is this for?

Mr. MARTIN: It is the cost of enforcing the act in the county of Beauce.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do you not have to enforce it in other counties?

Mr. MARTIN: No; only the one.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion—Privy Council Office—

591. Canadian information service, $640,700.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is an item which did not appear in the estimates prior to the war. It has grown out of a service created during the war, the war information board. The amount asked for is $640,700. The item last year was for $796,000. The service has been modified from war days and is now known as the Canadian information service. The government is planning to continue in peace time a war-time organization. I do not propose to take up the time of the committee for more than a minute, because our position was made clear on a bill under this title—Canadian information service—which was introduced by the government. We think $640,700 is altogether too much money for a service which was not considered important enough to have prior to the war. I wish therefore, to move:

That the item be reduced from $640,700 to half that figure, or $320,350.

Our position with respect to this service has been made clear and we shall not take up any more of the time of the committee. I wish it to be recorded that we think the amount asked for is an unnecessarily large expenditure now that the war is over.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is hard to know how to vote on this amendment, because the mover, the leader of the opposition, has not given us any reason for reducing the amount, except that he considers it to be too large. In order that we may know whether it is too large or not, the committee should have some information as to what is done under this appropriation. If the leader of the opposition is opposed to the appropriation, that would be understandable, but simply to move that it be cut in half is not understandable without a clear understanding of what is required to be done under it. I am just as much in favour of eliminating useless expenditures as any hon. member, but I think we should have some logical basis on which to operate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: During the war from the same quarters we heard criticisms of the work of the wartime information board. People who criticized government expenditures of relatively few thousands of dollars in the field of information offered no objection whatever to very large expenditures in the field of production. They saw no objection to the government going into industry and paying a man $20,000 a year to do a particularly important job in the field of production, but they could not approve paying salaries to do an efficient job in the field of information. I think it was important during the war that we should give to our Canadian people information on the progress of our war effort in Canada, and, now that the war is over, I think it is important that Canada give information to other parts of the world on the work that is being done on the Canadian scene. The motion presented by the leader of the opposition asks us to reduce this item from $640,000 to $320,000. If he would state whether he was opposed to providing supplies for libraries abroad, printing and stationery or any other specific items listed we would be better able to judge what merit there was in his case, but unless we have more specific information from the official opposition of the items to which they object it will be difficult to support their motion.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I rise to support the motion of my leader. I think we should have a statement from the minister as to what this vote involves. A number of members on the other side of the house have said that we have been saying: Oh, this is an expenditure of only a quarter of a million dollars, or only $600,000, or only $500,000, or something like that, but I would point out that what we need in this country is a reduction in expenditure so that we may have a reduction in taxation. Every item of expenditure should be scrutinized to the last dollar by the ministry. They are the fellows who have to do the job, those on the treasury benches over there, although there are not many of them there just now. They are the ones who spend the taxpayers' money, and don't forget that it is the taxpayers' money because you cannot get money out of the air. It must all come out of the individual workers in this country and it is vital that we cut down our expenditures. Do we need this Canadian information service? Has anybody shown that we need it? I have not the figures here showing what it costs. I left them on my desk upstairs. Is it one of the luxuries of government, or is it absolutely necessary? I certainly support my leader's amendment. We must spend a certain amount for information purposes, and that is why he has not asked to reduce the vote to $1. His amendment would cut the expenditure in two. I think, before we vote on this amendment, we should have a statement from the government benches. What is the government doing generally to cut down expenditures in this country?

Amendment (Mr. Bracken) negatived.

Demobilization and Reconversion—Privy Council Office—

592. Rehabilitation information committee, $242,000.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister briefly outline the work that is being done by this committee, its nature and extent?

Mr. MARTIN: This is assistance rendered by C.I.S. to the Department of Veterans Affairs, the three defence departments and the Department of Labour in trying to bring home to men and women in the armed services the facilities and opportunities which veterans' legislation affords them. The number of inquiries from veterans is still considerable, and this service, as the hon. gentleman who has seen service with such distinction will know, is required particularly to give service men in addition to the other facilities put at their disposal an adequate opportunity of knowing what privileges and opportunities they may have in trying to rehabilitate themselves in civilian life. I am sure that the hon. member, knowing the problem as he does, particularly in the light of his cogent and, I think, penetrating remarks last night, appreciates the desirability of this service.

Mr. MASSEY: I notice that the vote has been reduced from $640,000 last year to $242,000, or by two-thirds roughly. Is the minister completely satisfied from his own investigation that this amount is adequate for this year?

Mr. MARTIN: The bulk of the work was undertaken last year and the operation is now a continuing one.

Mr. MASSEY: I presume it cost about $400,000 to set up this service and that $242,000 is the operation cost. There is no diminution in the work being done.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—Privy Council office—
593. Food information committee, $110,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: This is a new vote. Let us have an explanation.

Mr. MARTIN: As the hon. gentleman knows, this country undertook to assist countries of the world that required food assistance from Canada. This represents the assistance rendered by C.I.S. through the interdepartmental committee, so that the needs and the purposes which our commitments to other nations involve in the supplying of food might be more effectively achieved.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the purpose is to acquaint the producers of Canada with the necessity for supplying other nations with food in this critical time. Is that one of the objectives?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I happen to be a member of the cabinet committee that handles this work. It is my impression that there was much work done along the lines laid out by the Canadian information service, and if a substantial portion of it had been paid for it would have run into much more money than this item.

The churches, the social clubs, the many women's organizations rendered valuable assistance in the campaign which was launched and which was carried on for three or four months to induce the Canadian public to conserve food and to make as great supplies as possible available for shipment overseas. There had been movements started for the collection of food to be shipped by various church and social organizations, and it was felt that that was not the most effective way of making the best contribution to alleviate the shortage which existed in the stricken countries, but that if the Canadian public could be induced to take for itself as little as possible and leave the rest available for the agencies which were handling shipments in a big way, a more effective contribution would thus be made to the shortage that existed. I know, from the contacts I had, that great efforts were put forth by a large number of voluntary workers to that end. The hon. member has perhaps noticed from time to time in the papers charts showing the amount of meat coupons surrendered, meat coupons which had been issued to Canadian citizens and on which they were entitled to purchase a certain quantity, but which they surrendered, thus leaving larger quantities as apparent surpluses which could be shipped overseas. I must confess that when these amounts from meeting to meeting were brought forward as having to be expended, we all questioned the aggregates; but we scrutinized them pretty closely, and we got the impression, while the campaign was being carried on, that, if the campaign was a desirable one, there was not being expended any money which did not contribute to the result.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister's statement largely satisfies me within the limits of the government policy. But I suggest that the most effective way of feeding the nations of the world is to give the farmers in Canada a decent price for their product, so that they will produce.

Mr. BRACKEN: This item is in the privy council votes—the food information committee. We have listened to the minister's explanation of the purpose of it. I should like to ask what body had charge of the administration of this vote.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The cabinet committee entrusted the organization of that part of the campaign which was being paid for to the Canadian information service. But the accounts were brought regularly to the cabinet committee, and the amounts which were to be spent for radio or for other form of advertising were always passed by the government committee before the Canadian information service went ahead with any commitments.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: Before we go into the Department of Labour estimates there is a matter I should like to bring up. The page boys have been here since nine o'clock this morning, and perhaps they could go home now.

The CHAIRMAN: I will bring the matter to the attention of Mr. Speaker. I am sure he will be in complete accord, if it is possible to dispense with their service, that important service which they render from day to day.

Mr. GRAYDON: We do not know what we would do without them.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

109. Departmental administration, $755,967.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder whether the minister intends to make a statement.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On what?

Mr. MacINNIS: In regard to his department. I am not suggesting or asking that he should, but I am going to say something, and I would not as a matter of courtesy step in ahead of him.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have a statement prepared. I have not it here, but if my hon. friend will wait a couple of minutes I will get it. It will take forty minutes to read.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the two of you would arrange a saw-off.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; I have no objection, if my hon. friend wants me to read it.

Mr. MacINNIS: No. I only wanted to know if the minister had a statement to make; I did not want to butt in.

Mr. MITCHELL: I had a prepared statement, but I thought, in view of the pressure of business, I should not read it.

Mr. LENNARD: The minister has been making statements all session up to date.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not suggesting that the Minister of Labour should make a 40-minute speech, or that any minister when he introduces his estimates should make a long speech. But perhaps I may be permitted to take half a minute to say one thing. When ministers introduce their estimates they ought to give us information, at least in brief, outlining any substantial changes in policy that have been made, or any new matters of importance which have arisen and are being provided for. What we are doing now in this committee is voting away the taxpayers' money. The position we are in is that the government, through a minister, is asking for the right to spend the taxpayers' money. I am not objecting, under the circumstances, to the speed with which the estimates have gone through to-night; but I would suggest that the minister, without giving us a 40-minute speech, should say briefly what his estiamtes contain, how they compare with last year, what changes there have been, what new policies there are, if any, what branches, if any, have been omitted, if the estimates are larger, why, and so on. Such a brief and informative statement would at least give the committee a little idea of how the department is proposed to be carried on during the present year as compared with last year.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think you can do it in fifteen minutes if there are no interruptions.

Mr. KNOWLES: It all depends on what is in it.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right. This is a free country; the sky is the limit. Notwithstanding my hon. friend, I think I have the best department in the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Look who the minister is.

Mr. MITCHELL: They have brought me in the wrong statement, so I must do it by memory. I have a vivid recollection that the late Hon. W. R. Motherwell was accustomed to come into the House of Commons with no more than the book of estimates and to pilot his estimates through without the assistance of anyone in front of him, and he probably did a better job than those who had piles of books in front of them and made long speeches.

The Department of Labour, of course, has many divisions. First of all, there is the administration division. Then there is the division dealing with labour conciliation which, of course, takes into its ambit the war labour boards of the different provinces and also the national war labour board.

We have taken under our jurisdiction the training of soldiers from the Department of Veterans Affairs, which in itself is quite a large operation. Then we have jurisdiction over prisoners of war, which is drawing to its close, but which, during its administration, has assisted greatly the lumber interests of Canada and also the farmers, particularly the beet growing industries of Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario. May I say that its operation has brought a profit to the treasury in excess of $2,225,000. Then the Japanese come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour. They were required to move the Japanese from the protected areas in British Columbia during the dark days of the war. Annuities come under our jurisdiction. The sale of annuities to the public has increased tremendously in the last few years. The Vocational Training Act comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour. This act laid the foundation of the enormous expansion of training which made possible the development of the greatest industrial structure in the life of this nation. I think, in a broad concept, those are the functions of the department. Of course I should point out that the basic principle of the right of labour to organize under the labour code comes under the jurisdiction of the department.

I have a statement which I can read in about fifteen minutes and it will probably answer hon. members' questions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been asked for and I might as well read it.

Quite largely the estimates of the Department of Labour which are now before the committee illustrate the problems which we had to face once world war II ended—the training and reemployment of men and women demobilized from the armed forces and replacement of many thousands released by munitions plants. We have, too, the still important duty of doing our utmost to meet the labour demands for agriculture—a question of real emergency in view of the grave shortage of food in Europe as well as in Asia.

In spite of difficulties, I believe it may be stated that we are moving along very well benefited by the stabilization policy which was introduced the latter part of 1941. The first phase of our national industrial reconversion was passed in January last when all but one-sixth of war work in progress at V-J Day had been terminated. A total of 370,000 persons who had been employed in war plants were laid off after V-J day and sixty per cent of these were immediately or almost immediately reengaged for the production of civilian goods in the same plants. There were in all 860,000 persons employed in direct war work at the peak period October, 1943. Up to June 30 of this year there had been 883,006 discharged from the armed forces.

Through the veterans' placement division of the employment service positions were secured for 284,000 ex-servicemen and women during the twelve months ending March 31 last. From April 1 to August 1 there were placed an additional 103,000 ex-service personnel. A considerable number of those released from munitions plants were married women and they did not all become an employment problem because of a preference to devote all their time to home-keeping. In a measure that has been true of some women discharged from the armed forces. Many had been married or were married after release and they, too, were not interested in work outside their homes. Under the style "Home Aid Plan" our employment offices are making a special effort to place women and girls in household work provided, however, that pay and conditions of work are fair.

The peak of unemployment was reached in April last when we had 267,000 unplaced applicants, men and women, registered at our national employment service offices across Canada. This total included 72,000 former service personnel discharged during March. On August 15, we had 149,000 unplaced persons listed comprising 116,000 men and 33,000 women. It is of interest to note that on the same date there were 68,000 vacancies for males and 44,000 vacancies for females. We have, of course, been doing our utmost to find positions for veterans and former war plant workers. Naturally we are keenly desirous of doing everything in our power for those who served overseas not forgetting those who did such a fine job on the home front during the years of war.

There are regional supervisors of veterans' placement in Moncton, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Each local office has what is known as an armed forces registration unit to look after veterans in the first instance. Then at all rehabilitation centres training through the department's facilities. Affairs—the Department of Labour has veterans' employment advisors who are doing good work. Where no such centres exist the advisors are stationed in the local employment offices. There is also a special placements division in the Department of Labour giving attention to physically handicapped persons. Some of these are referred for training through the department's facilities.

In the year ending March 31,—this is important—jobs were found for the handicapped at the rate of 1,250 a month, 25 per cent of them veterans.

I think this is a forward advance in the placement facilities of the employment service for the placement of handicapped persons under our jurisdiction.

Twenty-two men and two women with double amputations were satisfactorily placed in positions. The training work of the department is getting preferential consideration because of the importance of adequately fitting men and women for new types of peacetime work and also to meet a shortage of skilled workers in different vocations.

With regard to veterans, a total of over 76,000 have been enrolled for training up to August 1 of this year with 38,000 undergoing training on that date—and approximately 5,000 others awaiting entry to training. We had 4,000 being trained in schools for the construction and building industries, and in addition more than 3,500 others working as apprentices. Over 10,000 other veterans were being trained for other occupations on the job in industry, that is besides those who have actually been employed in industry. The government subsidizes rates of pay during such training.

Rehabilitation of veterans training is carried on in cooperation with the provinces—the dominion bearing the operating costs. There are centres across Canada to meet area needs and every type of training desired is provided when it is believed that those so trained may speedily be absorbed in the employment stream. Recently I visited the centre at Brockville and I was much impressed by the eagerness of the students and the enthusiasm and ability of the instructors. Another phase of our work is the training of civilian workers released from gainful employment under joint dominion-provincial plans. Usually such trainees are referred to the centres by the employment offices of the department. Agreements covering this training are in effect with the provinces of Nova Scotia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. Supplementary to this is the vocational guidance which our employment offices give to young persons seeking their first jobs.

Agreements have been made with all the provinces for vocational education on the secondary school level. The dominion government pays $10,000 a year to each province plus a proportion of $1,915,000 distributed on the basis of the population 15 to 19 years of age. The latter amount is matched by the provinces. Additionally there is a dominion grant of $10,000,000 for capital expenditures, 25 per cent for equipment, to be matched dollar for dollar by the provinces and used by the end of March, 1948.

There are several factors to be considered in connection with employment after a war.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

We have the large number who were trained for war jobs whose skills are not in general demand for peace-time production. They must readjust themselves to the new work. High war-time earnings in comparison with normal peace-time rates of pay and the indisposition of persons to move from communities in which they have settled to other places where work is available, are other factors. It should be noted that upward adjustments of pay to compensate for changes in war-time "take-home pay" and reduced weekly hours of work have been put into effect in recent months by a number of industries following approval of war labour boards. Re-tooling and re-organization of industry was well advanced up to a few months ago but has lagged because of industrial troubles.

Our latest figures show there were 87,000 working in all branches of mining. Of the number, 26,000 were employed in coal mines where more skilled men could be used now. The base metal mines had 27,000 on their payrolls and the gold mines 22,000 men, a gain of forty per cent since the end of the war. It is expected gold mining will be giving employment to 30,000 men by next autumn and that in mining generally there will be 100,000 working. I would like to see a movement to the mining sections of Canada of persons in centres where there cannot be enough employment to take care of all.

Most of the prisoners of war whose labour was most useful in Canada for several years have been returned to the British isles. We had thousands of these men engaged in woods operations, largely pulp for paper making. Last winter ten per cent more men were employed in woods operations than the winter before. There is work for more men in this field now but a disinclination to take these jobs is apparent.

The war taught men and women new skills, more self-reliance and self-confidence. It is safe to forecast that new types of manufacture and thus new employment opportunities will come as time goes by.

To maintain the highest possible production of food to assist in relieving the famine areas of the world farm labour agreements again are in effect with the provinces.

In February the Department of Labour sent a letter to farmers urging them to submit their help requirements to the employment offices.

Wages and conditions are more attractive in farming now. There is new and better equipment. Every possible effort is being made to encourage idle industrial workers to take farm jobs.

There will be organized movements of labour for farm work from west to east and east to west. Already the movement to the eastern provinces is under way. An arrangement, previously in effect, is for exchange of workers and equipment with the United States for the harvesters of grain, potatoes and tobacco.

As already announced we are bringing 4,000 farmer Polish soldiers to Canada to work on farms.

Appreciating the importance of the sugar beet industry we were able to retain about 4,000 prisoners of war for this type of work until harvests are over. They are distributed in Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta.

Referring again to our employment service I would like to mention that in Moncton, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver we have branches to assist in the placement of persons with executive and professional abilities.

We have found positions for 4,599 in the past year. A considerable number were ex-service personnel.

Under the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, between August 1, 1945, and June 29, 1946, or a period of eleven months, 151,000 discharged from the armed forces had been reinstated by their former employers. A total of 46,000 eligible did not apply for reinstatement.

The wartime bureau of technical personnel continues to function as a branch of the department and the staff is rendering fine service in assisting technicians to find good positions as well as in advising firms of men and women available.

We still have the labour exit permit order in force but mainly it is to control the movement from Canada of these technicians as well as graduate nurses. There are shortages in these fields. Some hospitals, in fact, are much understaffed.

National selective service largely is a thing of the past. Remaining regulations require an employer to register a vacancy with local employment offices and to report when an employee has been hired, and the seven days' notice rule for employer and employee. The purpose of this is to have an up-to-date picture of the employment situation.

The government's price, salary and wage stabilization policy remains effective although modified and subject to further gradual changes. We are anxious to abandon controls as soon as feasible but not until the danger of ruinous inflation is past.

Amendments to P.C. 9384, the wartime wages control order, now make it possible for the national and regional war labour boards to approve applications for wage increases which are shown as "just and reasonable."

Wage control began on November 15, 1941. To the end of March this year the boards had dealt with 123,500 applications. Eighty-four per cent were granted in full, 10 per cent in part; only 7 per cent denied.

The wage rate index was 137·5 in 1944, compared with the basic figure of 100 for 1939. It was 140·3 in 1945, according to preliminary figures.

The industrial condition as affecting labour has not been good in the past seven months. In 1945, while the number of strikes did not increase over 1944, the number of workers involved did. There were 197 strikes and lock-outs. The majority were settled by conciliation within a few days. Fifty-eight lasted one day, 152 less than five days.

The strike of the Ford Motor Company employees at Windsor involved 10,000 workers and was the most serious in several years.

It lasted from September 12 to December 29, 1945, resulting in 900,000 man-days time loss and more than one million days if the sympathy strike which occurred in Windsor affecting other firms is included.

A total of 150,000 man-days were lost by a strike of coal miners in Alberta and British Columbia.

During the first seven months of the present year we have had 145 strikes involving a time loss of 2,544,581 man-days, of which the most serious were those affecting the British Columbia logging, great lakes shipping, and the rubber industries.

I must say, having in mind the strike of loggers in British Columbia, seamen engaged in great lakes shipping, rubber workers, steel workers and others, that all could have been avoided by the proper use of the existing conciliation and wage control machinery.

An uncompromising attitude on both sides has been responsible for many serious labour troubles leading to unnecessary loss of business to employers and wages to workers.

The wartime labour relations regulations provided by P.C. 1003, were enacted early in 1944 in order to stabilize industrial conditions. We did not know how long the war would last then.

I shall be having another meeting with the ministers of labour of the provinces to discuss future labour relations. Some provinces want a national code; others do not.

As members know, with certain exceptions, labour relations normally come under provincial jurisdiction.

Under the industrial production cooperation board there are 447 labour management production committees. The plants covered have more than 245,000 workers.

As of May 1, we had 10,867 men who were exempt from military service on conscientious grounds. Sixty-five per cent were employed in agriculture and on June 27 this year there were seventy-three in four alternative service work camps.

These conscientious objectors contributed more than $2,300,000 to Canadian Red Cross under arrangements by which part of their earnings were earmarked for Red Cross work.

Our Japanese administration work comes under two main headings—repatriation and relocation.

With respect to repatriation, the records show that 6,892 adults voluntarily signed requests for repatriation covering a total of 10,632 persons; while 4,527 adults have requested cancellation of their applications for repatriation, covering also their 1,786 minor children.

I would like to review the situation with respect to compulsory repatriation.

After the Prime Minister on December 17 last explained in this house the purpose and scope of the three orders in council dated December 15, 1945, providing for deportation and repatriation of Japanese, strong representations were received not only asking for a review of the programme but challenging the validity of the orders.

As a result, the government in January 1946, made a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for an opinion as to whether the orders in council were ultra vires in whole or in part.

The supreme court upheld the validity of the orders except as they affected the dependents of deportable persons.

The judgment of the court was not unanimous. At present an appeal to the privy council from the supreme court ruling is being taken by a committee on behalf of the Japanese. The government has accordingly considered it advisable to suspend deportation proceedings under the orders in the meantime, but is continuing arrangements for the repatriation of those who wish to go to Japan on a voluntary basis.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Including a sailing on August 2, 3,151 Japanese have left Canada for repatriation to Japan. Hundreds more have expressed a desire to go and they will be accommodated as soon as we can secure another vessel.

Now with respect to relocation, since the beginning of April more than 2,000 Japanese who desired to remain in Canada were moved east for resettlement and employment.

At present there are 21,100 Japanese in Canada, of whom a little less than fifty per cent remain in British Columbia, with the rest about equally divided between the prairies and eastern Canada.

All employable Japanese with few exceptions are in useful employment on a self-supporting basis at prevailing wages.

It is hoped that relocation will be substantially accelerated by the evidence of increased desire on the part of the Japanese to cooperate, and the growing appreciation by the public of the wisdom of the government's dispersal programme.

An effort is being made to resettle as many as possible in smaller communities and rural areas where they will help to increase production of badly needed farm and forest products, and where the shortage of housing accommodation is not so serious.

Our proposals for this year summarized are:

(1) To repatriate to Japan as soon as possible all those desiring to go voluntarily;

(2) To disperse and resettle across Canada in 1946 those who have proven their firm desire to remain in Canada, by giving them every assistance and encouragement possible, including the progressive relaxation of wartime restrictions;

(3) To delay compulsory deportation until a decision has been handed down by the privy council on the appeal, at which time government policy will be reviewed.

The Annuities Act is administered by the Department of Labour. As of March 31, 1946, there were 151,000 active contracts including 450 group plans.

Total premium payments since the act became operative in 1908 amount to $318,-781,000. In the last fiscal year, 25,500 new contracts were recorded and these with previously existing contracts brought in $46,-900,000.

Canada, as one of the eight states of chief industrial importance, has a permanent seat on the governing body of the I.L.O. This body last met in Montreal in May.

Machinery has been set up for the appointment of international standing committees for seven major industries. This is to enable the I.L.O. to give closer attention to the problem of such industries than is possible at annual general conferences.

Each of these committees is composed of two representatives for the government, two for the employers and two for the workers, from each of the countries interested in that particular industry.

In December last, Canada participated in meetings held in London of two of these industrial committees, those on coal mining and inland transport. In April and May we took part in meetings at Cleveland and Toledo, Ohio, of the committees on iron and steel production and the metal trades.

We shall be represented on the three remaining committees: the first two of which, the building, civil engineering and public works committee and the committee on textiles, will meet in Brussels in October and November next; and the petroleum production and refining committee, which will probably meet in Peru early next year.

Canada participated in a technical maritime meeting held in Copenhagen last November, in preparation for the 28th session of the international labour conference which met in Seattle from June 6 to 29 to consider the setting up of international minimum standards for the employment of seamen.

We sent a tripartite delegation to the third labour conference of American states members of the I.L.O. which was held in Mexico city last April.

In September Canada will be host to the 29th session of the international labour conference, the first of such conferences ever to be held in this country.

I now ask that the following statistical statements be reproduced in Hansard:

(1) Cases submitted to the national and regional war labour boards.

(2) Decisions rendered by the national and regional war labour boards.

(3) Wage trends.

1 From dominion bureau of statistics. The wage and salary figures do not include payments to the armed forces.

2 From Department of Labour. The figures include cost of living payments.

Note: The index numbers of wage rates apply to wage rates only, not salaries.

The changes shown by the index numbers of wage rates are not necessarily reflected in the total wages and salaries earned as total earnings are affected also by the changes in the size of the working force (employment index) and by the shift from "short time" in depression years to "overtime" in boom years.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to speak on behalf of, and, I believe, with the authority of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. So far as he is concerned, I believe he would support me in saying that we have no desire for a return of the Japanese to our province.

Perhaps I may be permitted to digress for a moment. I regret that Canada is to lose from its capital city a good friend, a friend of all Canada, in the person of Torchy Anderson who, I am pleased to say, is coming to British Columbia. He does not always take my advice, although I think he should. There have been occasions, however, when he has taken it, and when he has taken it he has never missed a bet. However, the Southam press is not losing a bet.

To return to my original subject, let me say that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has made a statement which every member from British Columbia will support—"No Japanese for British Columbia".

Mr. MacINNIS: It has been said that the Minister of Labour has one of the most difficult departments of government to administer. I have no doubt as to the difficulties of his department, but I regret that both at this session and at the last we have had to deal with estimates of the Department of Labour on the eve of prorogation. I recall the closing of the session last year, when his estimates were before us, and it was just such an occasion as this.

If the estimates of the Department of Labour had come before this committee at a time when we were not rushing to prorogue, there are enough information, criticism and suggestions to make to keep us going for several days. However, in view of the general desire to finish to-night or to-morrow, I shall be brief in what I have to say. As a matter of fact I shall deal with only one matter, and with it as fairly as I can.

For more than a month and a half, the attention of parliament and of the country has been focussed on the industrial situation which prevails because of labour-management disputes. The minister made reference to that in the statement he read to the committee. In the forefront of those disputes is the stoppage of work in the basic steel industry. That dispute has received attention in the house on several occasions, as well as having been aired for several weeks before the standing committee on industrial relations. However, the dispute is still in operation, with results which verge on the disastrous for the country.

In my opinion the government should do something about it as quickly as possible. Every day the strike continues, the country is losing much needed production; workers are losing income; merchants and others are losing business. What is perhaps the worst factor is that the public generally are losing faith in democratic institutions. Consequently I say with all the earnestness of which I am capable that, before parliament prorogues, we should have assurance from the government that this dispute will be settled as quickly as that can be done. As a basis for settlement I would urge the acceptance of the proposals made to the industrial relations committee by the representatives of the steel workers.

Since these stoppages of work began, I have said on many occasions that the disruption of production was far more detrimental to industry and to the country's economy—this is my opinion for what it is worth—and was far more inflationary than the increases asked for could possibly be. Slowly that idea or that point of view is getting over in the country. I could read editorial opinions which have appeared in newspapers and periodicals from one end of this country to the other in the past week or so. These are in support of the contention I have just made.

Mr. LENNARD: What papers?

Mr. MacINNIS: One of those good Conservative papers published in Ottawa.

Mr. McLURE: All Conservative papers are good.

Mr. LENNARD: Several in Ottawa.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, published in Ottawa. The following editorial appeared in the Ottawa Journal of August 29:

End this steel strike!

This prolonged steel strike, with sensational predictions of trouble (so far false) born of still more sensational reports about dominion police being flown from far parts to Hamilton, is doing grave harm to Canada. Not merely are we getting ourselves into the mood of war; we are shoving this country into a position of possibly irreparable harm.

Britain and the United States are going ahead; keeping their people at work, producing goods, getting export markets. Here in Canada our three basic steel industries are idle, other dependent industries are closing, our reconversion programme, including desperately needed housing, is bogged down. If this situation continues, we shall find ourselves in chaos.

Why? Simply because the government has drawn a wage line (exclusively in the case of steel) across a piece of paper and said that to cross that line will bring inflation. The thing doesn't seem to make sense.

Yesterday came a dispatch from Vancouver saying:

"The wheels of production speeded ahead today in vital British Columbia industry, strike threats removed with the granting of pay increases . . . to more than 5,000 workers . . . increases ranging from 13 to 20 cents an hour."

If my Conservative friends would read the Conservative press they would know that.

Mr. LENNARD: I just asked what papers the hon. member was referring to. I asked only for information.

Mr. MacINNIS: I took it in the way it was asked, and I do not think my hon. friend was asking for it in just the way he says. He thought I could not come through with the goods.

Mr. LENNARD: Not at all; I expected you would come through. I asked only for information.

Mr. MacINNIS: Along the lines of this editorial, I would urge the minister to take action. The Ottawa Journal of August 29 contained a dispatch from Vancouver relative to the approval of certain wage scales by the regional war labour board of British Columbia. This dispatch reads:

> Now the board has sanctioned increases for shipyard workers, steel workers, construction men, mechanics, printers, plumbers and dredge operators, who receive the top boost of 20 cents an hour. The board also approved a 40 hour week, instead of 48, for practically all workers.
> The largest group—2,000 men—comprises shipyard workers, in the wooden boat yards, who get a 15 cent an hour raise, and next come building trade workers — 1,400 — including plumbers, steamfitters, painters, bricklayers and shinglers, with a boost of 18 cents an hour.

Note that in all cases the increases are from thirteen to twenty cents an hour, and the reduction in hours is from forty-eight or forty-four to forty, perhaps not in all cases to become effective immediately, but as a part of the agreement. One of the Ottawa papers of a day or two ago contained an item from Cornwall, Ontario, reading:

> Increases in hourly rates for shift workers range from 13·7 to 27·5 cents an hour and for day workers from 13 to 21·5 cents. Rates for boys and girls are increased 10 cents. Time and a half is to be paid for work on Saturdays and double time on Sundays. Weekly hours of shift workers are reduced from 48 to 42 and for day workers from 48 to 44.

I mentioned that the proposals made to the industrial relations committee by the steel workers for the settlement of the steel strike should be accepted. I notice that press items dealing with the steel strike state continually that the steel workers demand a 40-hour week. That is not correct; in the proposals made to the industrial relations committee by their representatives they agreed to continue on a 48-hour week in order to get a settlement and in order to give the companies time to find the necessary personnel. I should like to read briefly from the submission made to the committee, as follows:

> The union is anxious to assist in increasing actual production during the coming months, as urged by Mr. Donald Gordon.
> The union firmly believes that shorter hours are needed now, that shorter hours would increase efficiency and that there would be no shortage of men for the steel industry if wages and working conditions were more attractive.
> We are as determined as we ever were to avoid the paradox of some men working long hours while others go unemployed.
> However, as previously stated, the union is willing to give the employers more time in which to find personnel and arrange new schedules.
> On the basis that we are still in a period of reconversion and readjustment, the union, with reluctance and with some misgivings, will yield to the companies' claims that the 40-hour week cannot be established immediately or in one step.
> It is important, however, that the principle of shorter hours be recognized.
> We therefore propose that a work-week of 44 hours be made effective as of April 1, 1947, with the usual penalty for overtime.

I am convinced that there are a great many people who talk about the steel strike who do not know about that concession.

In settling this dispute I would urge the government and the Department of Labour to be imaginative and generous. In the natural order of things this strike will leave an aftermath of bitterness particularly in Hamilton, perhaps altogether in Hamilton—more than usually the case of strikes. A number of the workers remained at work in the plant. While in the plant they received triple pay. After the dispute is settled, any gains in wages and improvements in working conditions won by the union men, who have made sacrifices in the loss of wages and suffered other inconveniences, will also go to the employees who cooperated with the steel company in opposing those high wages and better conditions. Under those circumstances, is it not understandable that there will be bitterness?

I received a copy of a brief that was sent to the chairman of the industrial relations committee from the Montreal chamber of commerce. First, they stated that during the past few years organized labour has made great gains in wages and improved conditions. Then they make most emphatically the point that they are opposed to forcing workers to become members of a labour union; in other words, opposed to any form of union security. In replying to their letter and the brief, I said that I would agree with them provided that they would agree with me that the conditions won by the union men went only to members of the union. That seems to me a reasonable proposition, because I do not believe that people who not only refuse to strive for better conditions, but oppose better conditions should have those advantages when other men have worked and sacrificed to gain them. I am sure that that was in Mr. Justice Rand's mind when he proposed the "Rand formula" in the Ford dispute last year. I would, therefore, urge upon the minister—and I say this without any thought of criticism in my mind, because I am sure he is just as anxious to have this strike settled as any person here can be—that he assure this committee that he will do everything within his power to settle the strike with as little delay as possible, and that no attempt will be made to try to prolong a settlement in the hope that the strike will break. When that is done I would make this proposal to him which I have made in the house on several occasions.

I believe it is fundamental, if we are to have peace in industry, that we must have cooperation between the parties who are responsible for operating industry. When the minister gets some sort of settlement and industrial stability throughout the country, I would urge that he solicit the aid of organized labour and of organized employers to cooperate in expanding production to the limit. So far as organized labour is concerned, I am satisfied that that cooperation will be forthcoming if the minister will do two things, and he will need to have the assistance of the employers in doing these things. First, let the workers be taken into the employer's confidence and let them know what the purpose of the production is. You cannot have intelligent men and women cooperating with you if you refuse to deal with them as intelligent men and women and treat them as mere cogs in a machine. Then, and in this he will have to have the support of the government as a whole, the minister will have to give assurance to organized labour that when they have expanded production to the point that supply has overcome demand and surpluses have begun to accumulate they will not find themselves in the ranks of the unemployed, living on the meagre subsistence provided by unemployment insurance or on civic and provincial relief. If the minister can do that I believe that we shall be in a fair way to eliminate much of our labour troubles.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it can be truthfully said that we have been reasonably successful in the last four or five years in fostering agreements between employers and employees. I have said before in this house that you cannot call a man a scoundrel to-day and expect him to sit down with you to-morrow and make an agreement, and that cuts both ways. I have always felt that wages should be just as high as the traffic can bear. It is the unit of production per individual that spells wealth or poverty to a nation, and that should be preached to everybody in the country whether he is in the agricultural structure or in the industrial structure. My hon. friend can rest assured of this, that anything I can do physically or mentally to bring this dispute to an end will be done.

Let me add this. I think the first duty of a person within the confines of this nation or any other democratic nation is cooperation within the state. I am convinced of this in the light of what my hon. friend has read this evening, that if these organizations had cooperated with the state and used the machinery of the respective boards they might have been just as fortunate as the people in Cornwall or in British Columbia or in other parts of this dominion. There is no substitution for that. I went through this after the last war. I have not much patience with those people in a trade union organization who will tell you, but privately, the fear they have of the communists within the organization. I think the responsibility of putting those people in their place belongs to the organization itself. I remember, as no doubt my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East does, the battles that took place and all we went through after the last war. In those days this element was called by a different name. They are a type of person that cannot get along with anybody.

In his own organization, may I say, the leadership given to the good solid core of street railwaymen of North America by Bill Mahone, in labour relations between the organization and the employers, would be well worth studying by some people who at the moment are leading youthful organizations in Canada. As I have often said, sooner or later employers and employees in the steel industry have to sleep together whether they like it or not. It happens sometimes with all great union organizations that they go off the rails, but in the main their policies are directed by people who have the vision and the common sense at least to try to see the other fellow's point of view, be he employer or employee, and in those organizations you will find relations of the nature which goes to the building up of our nation as we want it to be. I could quote as evidences of this spirit the record of the building trades, the clothing trades, the pulp and paper industry, and many other organizations of manufactures and men who in this day and age earnestly endeavour to cooperate with each other, and there is nothing they cannot do and will not do if they will only see the other fellow's point of view. Of that I am convinced.

The hon. member for Calgary West, or perhaps it was Mr. Brockington, said in the committee the other day that ten years from now Stelco will wish that they had had good relations with the steel workers' organization ten years previously. But these thing cannot be achieved overnight. There must be a willingness to cooperate, to see the other point of view, and to establish just conditions within the industry.

I assure my hon. friend that anything I can do I will do to bring about an end of the dispute in this particular industry as well as in any others in which difficulties arise.

Mr. GILLIS: There are just a few words I wish to say. I do not intend to go into the merits or demerits of any of the disputes which are in progress at the present time. The hon. member for Vancouver East has said, I think, all that it is necessary to say on that subject. But there is one aspect of that dispute on which I want to refresh the minister's memory and suggest that he might get it out of the way, as one of the sore spots at the present time. I refer to that differential of five cents in the Sydney plant. I do not look upon that particular question as a matter which comes within the scope of the present dispute, because that question has been before the national war labour board for the past three years, and it should have been settled a long time ago. To the best of my knowledge it is still before the national war labour board, and I think a decision on it is being held up because of the general dispute in steel. The board should handle that differential and render a decision on it as quickly as possible, apart from the general settlement in the steel strike.

The opinion has gone abroad that it is the policy of the government to maintain wage differentials as from province to province. As I pointed out in committee to the minister, a decision made within the past month by the national board practically confirms that. That was the decision in the Amherst case. I am not going into it, but I seriously suggest to the minister that he get in touch with the national war labour board in order to bring about a decision in that Sydney angle of the differential.

The minister's department tabled cost of living statistics with the industrial relations committee as between Sault Ste. Marie, Hamilton and Sydney, and the figures show that the cost of living in the city of Sydney for basic products is twenty per cent higher than it is either in Sault Ste. Marie or in Hamilton. Despite that, there is a differential of five cents an hour in wages as between Sault Ste. Marie, Hamilton and Sydney. The differential should be the other way if you are trying to even up the incomes of the steel workers.

That is all I am going to say on that. But I would earnestly suggest to the minister that he do something about that differential apart from the general settlement in steel, because it does not belong to the general question. It has been before the board for three years, and a decision should be made.

The matter of the steel workers' strike and all the other disputes is, the minister said, a matter between the state, the union and the companies. We have done all we can in this house; if talking would have cured the situation it would have been over long ago. All we can do at this stage of the game is to leave it to the good judgment of the people concerned to bring about a settlement in the best interests of all concerned.

On the minister's estimates from item to item there are a few questions I wish to ask him.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before this item carries, I should like to say a few words about a matter which I have raised in this house a number of times. I refer to the claim of certain employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and other Canadian Pacific companies for pension rights denied them because of participation in certain strikes back in 1918 and 1919. It is unnecessary for me to give the whole story behind this issue because I have already placed it on the record of this house on a number of occasions. The first time I raised it was on May 1, 1944, and I continued to bring the matter to the attention of the government in the hope that something might be done. At long last, on April 12, 1945, the Prime Minister gave me the assurance, in answer to a question on the orders of the day, that consideration would be given to a request made by certain unions, representing some of the men involved, for the setting up of a royal commission to go into this whole question. Shortly after the Prime Minister gave me that assurance in the house, I got in touch with him by letter, pressing for the immediate implementing of his promise, and a few days later received from him a letter under date of April 17 in which he again assured me that the request would be—and I quote—"carefully considered with a view to determining whether or not the appointment of a royal commission would in fact contribute to the solution of the problem". Following that promise made by the Prime Minister, the Department of Labour appointed Mr. H. S. Johnstone, a conciliation officer in the Department of Labour, as a special investigator to look into the matter so as to give the government the necessary information to enable them to determine whether or not a royal commission should be established.

Mr. Johnstone's direction to undertake this investigation appears to have been given to him by Mr. M. M. McLean, director of industrial relations, on April 24, 1945. He proceeded forthwith to make his inquiry, and in due course made a report to the Minister of Labour under date of December 7, 1945. I felt very strongly that since the whole matter arose out of a dispute between two parties, once that report had been made it should be presented to the parties concerned. However, at the beginning the Minister of Labour did not agree with me on that point. A copy of the report was sent by him to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to which after some months a reply was made, and that reply was tabled in the house. It was not until August 20 that the minister yielded to my request and tabled a copy of the report in the house. It is now known as sessional paper 238-A.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend should also say that we had copies mimeographed so that he could send them to his friends.

Mr. KNOWLES: As a matter of fact, I was going to get around to that. I am very glad to say that the minister was good enough to meet my request and have about sixty-five or seventy copies of this document mimeographed so that I could send them out, as he says, to my friends. Yes, they are my friends, but they are also persons deeply concerned in this issue.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry; perhaps I should have put it in that way.

Mr. KNOWLES: I might say to the minister that I am already receiving letters back from some of these individuals expressing gratitude for the report and saying that it is extremely encouraging to read this document which was prepared by Mr. Johnstone, and to note his comments and recommendations.

This issue is one with which the minister and I at least are familiar. It is one that involves a good many questions and a good deal of factual material. It is also a matter of deep human interest, one that concerns a great many workers who feel that they have been dealt with most unjustly. It is in essence a dispute between certain employees of the Canadian Pacific and the company. In my previous remarks in the house on this matter I have gone into the merits of the dispute between the employees and the company. What I have had to say makes it clear that, in my view, the case is all on the side of the men, but I rise at this time not to repeat the arguments that I have made in the past on behalf of the men with respect to their dispute with the company, but rather to deal with the issue that now faces the government.

The request which was made to the government in the spring of 1945 came from a number of unions, the brotherhood of railroad trainmen, the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, the international association of machinists, the brotherhood of express employees, and, I believe, the Canadian merchant service guild. That request was for the appointment of a royal commission. The reply of the government was that they would have to look into the matter to determine whether or not the royal commission should be established. That preliminary inquiry was made by Mr. Harris Johnstone of the Department of Labour. He has now made his report back to the Minister of Labour, and it is in this document to which I have referred, which the minister had mimeographed for me. It is a definite recommendation that such a royal commission should be established. I think I should read one or two paragraphs from the report to indicate how definite is the recommendation and also something of the tone of what Mr. Johnstone has found. In the first paragraph he indicates the nature of the task which was given to him, saying in part:

> I was told that you would like me to forward the results of that investigation with the recommendation so that with this information at hand you could determine whether or not to recommend the appointment of a royal commission.

That was the task given to Mr. Johnstone. At page 17 of his report, just before he signs his name, he measures up to the task which was given to him in this concluding paragraph:

> It is the opinion of the undersigned that the employees have established strong claims for consideration. The nature and extent for adjustments, if any, cannot be determined except by a more exhaustive analysis than was possible, or even contemplated in this preliminary investigation. I would therefore recommend that a royal commission be established to examine into the whole question to determine what, if any, consideration should be granted, and if so, then to whom and in what manner pension adjustments should be made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Twelve o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I hear hon. members calling attention to the time. I have a little more to add to this, but I am prepared to do so to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL: Go ahead and finish it.

Mr. GILLIS: Finish to-night while we are here.

Mr. WARREN: We will let you put it on the record.

Mr. KNOWLES: Those two paragraphs, being the first and last of Mr. Johnstone's report, indicate—and I want to get this clear, even at the risk of seeming to labour the point—that his job was to give complete information to the government and to give them his recommendation as to whether or not a royal commission should be established. He went into all phases of the question and made a specific recommendation that a royal commission should be established. In the course of his report he gave a summary of a number of the arguments and discussions which he had with those whom he interviewed. This is a typical paragraph which appears on page 15:

> Another argument has to do with the employees' equity in pensions. The employee organizations assert that during wage negotiations the company always pointed to the pension plan as one of the benefits accruing by reason of their employment with this particular concern. The company officials interviewed stated that they had never heard pensions being discussed in this manner during wage negotiations. The unanimity of the employees on this point makes it difficult to accept the company's statement. It is hard to imagine wage discussions occurring wherein the pension plan was not mentioned in this way. Any established plan of this nature, whether wholly company contributory or not, when maintained for a time becomes one of the established working conditions, and together with the actual wage paid they form the remuneration earned by the employee. The employee argument therefore that by each year of service he is building up deferred earnings in a pension is one which has considerable weight. To be deprived of past earnings by reason of absence on strike, or absence during a strike, does not seem to be equitable treatment, and all the more so when the decision is made by the party which will thereby save large sums of money as a result of rigid adherence to this rule.

That paragraph is taken from the body of Mr. Johnstone's 17-page report made just shortly before he gave his definite recommendation. Appended to the 17-page report are to be found another forty-nine pages of appendices in which Mr. Johnstone gives summaries of his discussions with all the parties he interviewed, and the interesting thing to note is that Mr. Johnstone did not interview just those on one side of the issue. He interviewed some eight or ten trade union organizations representing the men. He interviewed, on the other hand, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the former Dominion Express Company, now the Canadian Pacific Express Company, and, in addition to these parties on both sides of the dispute, he also interviewed representatives of the Canadian National Railways, the Manitoba government, the Manitoba telephone system and the Winnipeg municipal employees, including policemen and firemen. The reason for his interviews with these latter people is that those of us who have been speaking on this matter have pointed out time and again that these were employers whose employees were on strike in Winnipeg at the same time and who have treated their employees more generously or, as some of us think, fairly in the matter of pension rights. So that his report represents, as the minister will have to admit—he says he has one of the best departments of government and therefore he will have to stand by this report—an exhaustive study of the whole matter. In my view we have reached quite a point in this whole dispute, although it dates back to 1919, to have secured the preparation and public release of this document, which covers it so well. In the meantime, between last December, when the report was made, and August 20, when it was tabled, a copy of the report had been sent to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and a reply was received by the minister from Mr. W. Manson, the vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in charge of personnel. That reply was dated May 26, 1946, and a copy of it was laid on the table of the house, being sessional paper 238, on June 26 of this year. The significant paragraph in Mr. Manson's reply to Mr. Johnstone's report is this:

> I note that Mr. Johnstone recommends the appointment of a royal commission to examine into the questions dealt with in the report. Such a recommendation in the circumstances involves such fundamental and far-reaching consequences that it ought to be rejected by the government.

Mr. Manson goes on in about three pages of his own letter to set out his objections to Mr. Johnstone's recommendations, and then adds a memorandum, which I believe was prepared by someone in the legal department of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which attempts to answer the points in Mr. Johnstone's report.

Now here is the situation. This is a dispute between the employees on the one hand and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the other. The employees have asked for a royal commission. The company objects. I suppose, one might say that is a natural position for the two sides to the dispute to take, and so the government has stepped in with its impartial investigator, Mr. Harris Johnstone, who has made this exhaustive study and has come out with the definite recommendation that a royal commission should be set up. I wish to make it clear to the minister that I have deliberately refrained to-night from arguing the merits of the dispute between the men and the company because I do not want the minister in his reply to spend too much time on that. The issue now is whether or not the government is going to carry out the recommendation made by Mr. Johnstone. There it is. It comes from a conciliation officer in the Department of Labour. During the time when I was trying to get the minister to table that report, during the months when he was unwilling to do so, one of the arguments he used for refusing to table this document was that, in order to get civil servants such as Mr. Johnstone to prepare an authoritative and useful report and really give all the information that was desired, it was necessary to guarantee to such a civil servant that his report would be treated as confidential. Well, that cuts both ways. It means that since the minister did not want to table the report—

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend wants, I will answer that in a moment. He is treading on dangerous ground. I will give the answer in two minutes if he is not careful.

Mr. KNOWLES: Never mind the threats. I am simply trying to show the minister that on the basis of his own argument this report is an excellent one. It is one that was prepared under the most favourable circumstances for the preparation of a good report; and there it is, obviously complete in its survey, because the arguments are there from both sides. But the upshot of the whole investigation is a clear-cut recommendation that the commission should be established. Against that is the objection of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I submit that the objection of the Canadian Pacific is itself offset by the request of the men, and the impartial viewpoint of the whole matter is that of Mr. Johnstone in his recommendation to the minister. The question I now put to the minister, and the question which is coming to me from the unions of the men represented, is whether or not we may expect the government to carry out the recommendation which was made in Mr. Johnstone's report for establishing a royal commission with terms of reference such as those suggested in this official document.

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer to my hon. friend is contained in the following reply:

> The matter is being given consideration by the law officers of the crown and the decision has been reached that the appointment of a royal commission would serve no useful purpose.

That is the answer.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LENNARD: Surely we are not going to be here all night.

Mr. MAYBANK: No one is going to be here all night because of the very few minutes that I am going to take. This subject is one in which I have been interested for a number of years. I should like to have seen some further inquiry into it, and I have been working to that end for some time. Just before the Prime Minister left here for the peace conference, I had with him, I was going to say a rather lengthy interview, but an interview at all events, together with the vice-president of the brotherhood of railway trainmen, on this subject, with a view to asking his consideration of the matter on his return. There the matter at that time stood. I have often thought that much might be said on the subject, but on the other hand I felt that situations are sometimes not aided by too much speech. I think, however, it is only right that I should put on the record the fact of this interview and the sympathetic hearing given by the Prime Minister at that time. I know, of course, that when he comes back there will be the utmost further consideration given to it that can be given. I just wanted the committee to be made aware of those facts.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to confirm what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has just said about the sympathetic ear given by the Prime Minister to appeals in connection with this matter. The Prime Minister gave me an interview similar to the one referred to by the hon. member, and likewise made it clear that the door would not be closed in connection with this matter. I may also confirm what the hon. member has just said about the vice-president of his own organization, the brotherhood of railway trainmen. He told me of the sympathetic hearing that was given when he saw the Prime Minister just before the Prime Minister left for overseas. That is good, but the men concerned want more than sympathy; they want action; they want their pensions.

Mr. LENNARD: Mr. Chairman, we agreed to hear the hon. member out. We sat here and gave him a good hearing. But we do not want another 40-minute speech piled on top of that.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is immaterial to me whether it is done to-night or to-morrow morning.

Mr. LENNARD: You said you wanted a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will probably complete his remarks in a few minutes.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say to the Minister of Labour that I have all kinds of respect for the Department of Justice. But it seems to me that the opinion he has just expressed as coming from that department—"No useful purpose would be served"—if that was the wording of it, is a matter of opinion for the government to take, and is not a legal ruling. If he were quoting from the Department of Justice as to whether there was a constitutional right to set up a royal commission, then I could understand his quoting from that department. But when it comes to a simple opinion as to whether a useful purpose would be served, clearly that is a matter for the government itself to deal with. I would suggest that they have had the proper recommendation from the man who has really gone into the matter in the person of Mr. Johnstone.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say this, that when you break a contract, then that is the end of the contract.

Mr. KNOWLES: But—

Mr. MITCHELL: Now, you sit down. I have listened to you for forty minutes. I shall be through in a couple of minutes. I told my hon. friend I would say this. I have a vivid recollection of what took place in Winnipeg in 1919. I have, I think, an understanding of the pension system in the C.P.R. at that time. These men broke a contract. The money belonged to the C.P.R. I do not think that by an act of parliament—well, of course under our constitution, you can do anything by act of parliament—but it will be remembered that these people broke their contract. The money belongs to the C.P.R. It was a contributory pension system. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. KNOWLES: Far be it from me to help you out, but it was a non-contributory system.

Mr. MITCHELL: Non-contributory, I should say. The money was paid there, and was contributed by the C.P.R. I do not know how you can get a private organization to spend money arising out of a breach of contract. I am not a lawyer, but it is as clear as crystal to me that all the commissions in the world cannot, in my judgment, make that company pay something which arose out of a breach of contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. LENNARD: This has gone on long enough.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Mr. KNOWLES: I stayed away from arguing the merits of the dispute itself between the men and the company, just to avoid this kind of thing. But if the minister insists upon raising it, then I will simply point out that that is one of the questions in dispute. That is one of the reasons for having a royal commission, namely, to determine whether or not these men in fact have forfeited their right to their pensions.

The minister talks about its being the company's money. That is in dispute, too. The men insist that, since it was part of what they were working for, they had an equity and the money is really theirs. I agree thoroughly with the men.

I could go on, but the point is as to whether or not the government will set up this royal commission. If the most we can hope for is the sympathetic hearing we have had from the Prime Minister, then I hope that on his return the government will get together and give immediate consideration to Mr. Johnstone's report. I urge as strongly as I can that the commission be established without delay.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item carried?

Mr. BRACKEN: I would not suggest that this discussion be dropped, if it is the desire of the hon. member to continue it. But I suggest if it is to be continued it should not be continued to-night.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the particular matter has been concluded. May we carry vote 109 to-night?

Item agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 110.

Mr. BRACKEN: Oh, well, no.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 12.20 p.m.

Saturday, August 31, 1946

The house met at ten o'clock.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Government House, Ottawa
Office of the Secretary to the Governor General
August 31, 1946.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that The Honourable Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day, the thirty-first of August, at 4 o'clock, p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED ADJOURNMENT INSTEAD OF PROROGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the seriousness of present conditions and the possibility that it might be desirable to call parliament or some of its committees together, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether consideration has been given to the suggestion of not proroguing parliament but adjourning it, as was done during the war.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): No consideration has been given to the suggestion that parliament be adjourned instead of prorogued. I mentioned it to one or two, and there would be some rather serious objection to that course at this time. It was felt that if conditions required the meeting of parliament it could be brought together with sufficient dispatch to care for any situation that might arise.

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF OPENING OF NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Now that we know prorogation takes place to-day, will he inform us when the opening of the next session will take place?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): I can add nothing to what was said in the house by the Prime Minister on that subject.

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE

PRESS REPORTS OF YESTERDAY'S PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has anything to add to the statements which have appeared in the press this morning regarding a rather serious dispute between the Canadian and Russian delegates at the peace conference in one of its proceedings yesterday?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have nothing to add, and my experience would allow me to entertain the hope that if I had further information I might have something to subtract.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

110. Annuities Act, $448,006.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am in support of this act, and the activities carried on under it. However, I wish to ask a question relative to a change which has been made as the result of an item in a recent auditor general's report. As I understand it, until recently the annuities branch was issuing, among its various contracts, what is known as a last survivor contract, either until the death of both of the survivors, or for a guaranteed period of, we will say, ten or twenty years. Apparently the auditor general discovered that there was no authority for the guaranteed provision attached to a last survivor contract, and accordingly the annuities branch has discontinued issuing that kind of contract. I understand there is no question about the rejection of contracts issued prior to the matter being pointed out by the auditor general. These contracts were made by the government and signed, so they are valid. Such contracts however are not now being issued. I am not one to ask that the government do something for which there is no provision through parliamentary legislation, but I should like to know whether consideration has been given by the government to amending the act so as to provide for the kind of contract to which I have referred.

Mr. MITCHELL: The question as to the decision or the opinion expressed in the auditor general's report is under review between my department and the Department of Justice.

Mr. McLURE: Are these annuities sold by salaried men, or on commission? I notice that agents' commissions total about sixty per cent of the vote.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are sold on straight commission.

Item agreed to.

111. Fair wages, conciliation and industrial disputes investigations, $188,974.

Mr. KNOWLES: This item has to do with conciliation and I should like to speak briefly in connection with it. One matter of major interest to me, in addition to questions I have raised during the course of the session, is the typographical dispute. First I should like to make it clear that this dispute is between certain publishers and a union which is clearly a well-established trade union organization. The minister knows as well as I do that the international typographical union is one of the oldest on the North American continent. I was interested to learn a short time ago that at a banquet held by this union in Toronto in October, 1944, a message was received from the Prime Minister in which he expressed his regret at being unable to accept an invitation to attend. In part he said:

> I regret not being able to be present as at one time I wrote a short history of the international typographical union as a study in trade union methods. It was published in the Journal of Political Economy of the University of Chicago that year. The international typographical union is a model for others to follow.

I was interested in getting from the library a copy of volume 5 for 1896-97 of the Journal of Political Economy, and reading the article on the international typographical union which appears at page 458 and following, written by the present Prime Minister. I mention this only to make it clear that this is not some passing organization which is out to stir up trouble. It is one of the oldest unions on the North American continent, and has been recognized for some time by no less a person than the Prime Minister, as a model for others to follow.

As I understand it, the dispute arose in Winnipeg nearly a year ago when contracts then in existence between the union and the two daily newspapers there were about to expire and it was time to seek negotiation of a new contract. The union in seeking this new contract was desirous of improving its position in the matter of hours of work, take-home pay and certain other conditions—but mainly the first two items I have mentioned. The negotiations had not proceeded very far until something of an impasse was reached. But the publishers made an issue, not out of the things really at stake, namely hours and wages, but rather out of certain words in the contract as proposed by the union. The words were these:

> Provided however local union laws not affecting wages, hours and working conditions, and the general laws of the international typographical union, shall not be subject to arbitration.

The publishers picked out this clause and declared it to indicate in the main two things: (1) that the union was asking for something contrary to the law of Canada; and (2) that the local union in Winnipeg, of which I am a member, was being dictated to by the head office of the international union in Indianapolis. My understanding of the situation is that that was a wholly false position for the publishers to take. In the matter of the second claim, that there was dictation from the head office in Indianapolis, I am in a position to know that decisions all through this dispute have been taken in a democratic way by one of the most democratic trade unions in North America.

When local unions are part of an international union, the minister will know what I mean when I say that that is part of their strength. It is best for them not to be just a local group, but to be part of a nation-wide, and in this instance, a continent-wide organization. They draw from that fact all the strength they can in their struggle with their employers. But the basic decision whether certain conditions should be sought, and, if such conditions are not met, whether the workers should go out on strike, is made by the members of the local union themselves.

With respect to the other charge, that the union was seeking something contrary to the law of Canada, let me say that I take strong exception to it on several grounds. To begin with, there can be no objection to the expression "provided however local union laws"—and please note this part of it—"not affecting wages, hours and working conditions"—and I go on—"and the general laws of the international typographical union shall not be subject to arbitration". In that clause asking for the exception from arbitration of certain laws of the union, specific exception from the exception is made with reference to matters affecting wages, hours and working conditions. Those are, by definition in P.C. 1003, the essential items in a collective agreement so far as Canadian law is concerned. I contend that on the face of it the wording of the clause objected to cannot be called contrary to Canadian law. In addition, similar clauses have been in contracts between the international typographical union and a great many Canadian newspapers for a great number of years. That information is already on Hansard for June 26, where the minister gave answers to certain questions which I asked, to be found on pages 2848 and 2849. These were:

> 1. Have any contracts between the international typographical union and Canadian newspaper publishers prior to November, 1945, contained a clause providing in any way for the accepting of the union's laws, not relating to hours, wages and working conditions, from arbitration.

To that the minister replied "Yes."

My next question was:

If so, with what newspapers and dating back how long?

The answer to that question took about two pages, listing newspapers in many cities in most of the provinces of Canada which have had contracts with the typographical union including such a clause. More recently some new contracts have been signed with other papers where no disputes obtain, and there is on Hansard a specific answer with respect to one of those, namely, the Ottawa Journal, which since the other disputes began has signed a contract including such a clause as this, with one qualification to which I will refer in just a moment.

My contention in all of this is that that clause is not contrary to Canadian law. Furthermore, the proof is found in the many contracts of a similar nature which have existed down through the years. Since that was a point on which an impasse was reached, namely, the wording I have just quoted, an attempt was made—I am not going to discuss now which side took the initiative, or where it came from—to try to reach conciliation on that point. The result was a meeting with officials of the Department of Labour on January 30, 1946, at which were present not only officials of the Department of Labour but representatives of both parties to the dispute. When the meeting was over it was agreed all round that certain words should be added to that clause to which objection had been taken. The clause as amended, and as accepted by the international typographical union, reads:

Provided, however, local union laws not affecting wages, hours and working conditions and the general laws of the international typopraphical union shall not be subject to arbitration except in so far as such arbitration and the results thereof are compulsory under Canadian law.

The addition of those last sixteen words clears away any doubt as to the desire or thought of the international typographical union to do anything contrary to Canadian law. When I was speaking a moment ago about the Ottawa Journal I mentioned a certain qualification. I had reference to that last phrase which has been added to the wording of the Journal contract.

It seems to me that a mountain has been made out of a mole hill with respect to this clause which has been in dispute. There is no doubt in my mind that that is not the issue. The issue is wages and hours, and also the question whether or not the publishers concerned are as anxious as they might be to see unions in this country strong. At any rate, issue having been made on that point my quarrel with the Minister of Labour—I am going to be quite frank, because it is early in the morning and there is no reason for our losing tempers; on the other hand let us on both sides speak our minds about this; he is a member of this house and he can make his reply—is that throughout the piece he has helped to give credence and strength to the ideas that the publishers—

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us be fair about this; there is no quarrel between my hon. friend and me.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not sure of that.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, there is not. You are making the quarrel yourself.

Mr. GRAYDON: It takes two to make a fight.

Mr. MITCHELL: When the boys read that back home I do not want them to think that the galleries were filled when you and I had a quarrel. I am not going to quarrel with my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister and I could have a quarrel even if there was nobody else here at all. Apparently the minister does not like what I am saying.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not mind; this is a free country.

Mr. KNOWLES: Certainly it is a free country, and I want to keep it so. It seems to me that the duty of the Minister of Labour is to be impartial in matters of this kind. I would hope that once in a while he would really see the workers' side of these things. But despite the fact that from January 30 of this year it was agreed to add that other clause, despite the fact that it was recognized by all concerned, the publishers and printers and labour department officials, that it took care of the matter, the minister kept on saying in this house as late as June 4, as reported on page 2153 of Hansard, in answer to a question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that the basic issue was the desire of the union for something that was contrary to Canadian law. That is the idea the publishers have been spreading. The minister by making a similar statement—let us face up to this—has made it difficult for the union to establish its case in the eyes of the Canadian public as strongly as was warranted by the facts.

In the meantime certain commissions were appointed to look into this matter. First of all there was a commission headed by Mr.

Justice Major of the province of Manitoba. His report was much along the same line, that the trouble arose from the fact that the union wanted something contrary to Canadian law. I challenge that statement outright, whether it comes from the publishers, from Mr. Justice Major or from the Minister of Labour. The very wording of the clause in the contract does not substantiate that. Furthermore, the agreement made in the office of the Department of Labour on January 30, 1946, wiped out any question about it at all.

A little later another commission was established, this time under Mr. Card. In due course Mr. Card made a report in which he made the same claim, that the trouble arose out of the desire of the union for something that was contrary to Canadian law. He also tried to make the point that the trouble arose because the head office of the union in Indianapolis was dictating to the union in Winnipeg. If there was any truth in these charges one would not be so much annoyed about them, but when they are untrue and are handed out by the publishers, then by the commissioners that are appointed and then are concurred in by the kind of statement the Minister of Labour has made, it makes one wonder how much impartiality there is so far as labour disputes are concerned.

There has been one commission since then, the Lett commission. Brigadier Lett and others were appointed in British Columbia to inquire into the dispute out there between the Vancouver Province and the union. As hon. members know, the disputes in Vancouver, Edmonton, Hamilton and Ottawa were sympathetic disputes because the members of the same union in these other newspapers felt that their colleagues in Winnipeg have not been fairly dealt with.

The report of the Lett commission was definite, namely, that the federal Minister of Labour should take steps to bring together the principal parties to the dispute. That has been one of the claims of the union throughout the whole story—that it was not just a local matter to be referred to provincial authorities but a matter of concern to the federal Department of Labour because on the one hand you had a chain of newspapers and on the other a union that is nation-wide.

After the Lett commission report was tabled —I regret to say that the newspapers did not see fit to give it a great deal of publicity—a request was made in the house by the hon. member for Calgary West, and I frankly wonder why he made it, for the tabling of the Card report. That report was tabled by the minister, and although it was actually presented to the minister some months before the Lett commission report, it has been given all kinds of publicity by the newspapers, whereas the same newspapers have given very little publicity to the Lett report. I cannot blame the minister for that, because he does not control the newspapers—somebody may interject, thank goodness for that. The fact is that the impression has been created that the Card report is the last word because it is the most recent one tabled in the house and it is the one which has been given most publicity. That is not true; it is not the last word. And in fact it simply mouths the charges which the publishers have made right from the beginning, that the union was being dictated to from Indianapolis and was asking for something contrary to Canadian law. All of this adds up, as I said, to a distortion of the true picture and my quarrel with the minister—he says we have no quarrel, but we certainly have—is that his statements to us in the house right down to June 4—and his statements since have not been very helpful—have had the effect of giving credence to these charges made by the publishers and supported by the first two commissions established.

Latterly, as I began to put questions on the order paper to get the facts before us, we were able to get the information brought out in public that the union had agreed on January 30 last, to that additional phrase in the contentious clause. We were able to get the information about other newspapers having similar contracts and were able to get attention directed to the Lett commission report. The minister then appointed Mr. Justice Richards as an informal investigator into the whole matter.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Justice Richards is not an informal investigator.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will take whatever word the minister applies.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know where my hon. friend gets his language.

Mr. KNOWLES: What would you call him?

Mr. MITCHELL: He is an agent of my own.

Mr. KNOWLES: But he is not a commissioner.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have appointed three commissions already.

Mr. KNOWLES: Three?

Mr. MITCHELL: This would be the fourth.

Mr. KNOWLES: Let us get our arithmetic straight. How do you mean—three already? Two at Winnipeg, and one at Vancouver?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will settle for three.

Mr. KNOWLES: There have been three—

Mr. MITCHELL: And this is the fourth.

Mr. KNOWLES: It would be if it were a commission. No man who has taken part in industrial conciliation stands higher in repute in this country than Mr. Justice Richards. I made my enthusiasm vocal by shouting "Hear, hear" when the minister announced in the house that he had asked Mr. Justice Richards to look into this dispute. But again, Mr. Chairman, a report has recently been made public by the Minister of Labour which cannot help but annoy the members of the international typographical union, particularly in view of their past feeling that the whole picture has been distorted. Why does that report annoy them? Because it has been discovered and announced that Mr. Woodruff Randolph, president of the international typographical union, was not able a week or so ago to attend a meeting of the Southam people and Mr. Justice Richards. The reason for that is clear but was not indicated. Mr. Randolph has been at Miami for the 88th convention of the international typographical union, and it was obvious therefore that he could not meet with the publishers at that time. But the statement that has been released by the minister that Mr. Justice Richards is not able to get the parties together because Mr. Randolph cannot come gives the impression that the fault is on the workers' side. That is my quarrel with the minister. I hope some day when he retires and has time to look over his past that he will read his speeches—

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): That is unfair.

Mr. KNOWLES:—and see how many times he has made statements that have tried to put the workers in the wrong. He did it again last night when discussing the C.P.R. dispute. The only contribution the minister made was to say that the workers had broken a contract. I am not going to raise that question again this morning, but I will in due course. That is one of the points in dispute, for the men feel very strongly that the so-called contract was a one-sided arrangement made by the company.

Throughout this whole typographical dispute there has not been that impartiality which the minister claims he has shown, but there has been consistent support given to the position taken by the publishers. If the minister wants to be helpful in this dispute I suggest that he let it be known that he knows that the unions are not being dictated to by head office in Indianapolis. He is a trade unionist and know. how these things work. Let him also let it be known that the union is not asking for something contrary to Canadian law. The wording worked out in the office of the Department of Labour on January 30, and acceptable to all concerned makes it very clear that the union is not asking for anything that would require an exception to be made to the laws of this country.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going into this matter at any length because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has covered it fully. When I hear him speak I realize that he made a mistake in not studying for law instead of the ministry.

Mr. McCANN: Saving money instead of souls.

Mr. MacINNIS: There may be something in the remark made by the Minister of National Revenue. I would hate to be the lawyer opposing my hon. friend and I would dread to be the culprit he was prosecuting in the court.

Mr. GRAYDON: How would he do for a judge?

Mr. MacINNIS: He has made a very fair presentation of this case. I am interested in this dispute both as a trade unionist and because the Vancouver Province, a Southam newspaper, published in my own city, is involved in the dispute. I would urge the minister to do everything that can be done in the circumstances.

The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to dictation from the international head office is a most peculiar one for the Southam company to raise. There are several international unions in every printing shop. There is the typographical union, the pressmen's union, the stereotypers' union, the mailers' union. All of these are separate craft unions. The publishers in Vancouver who are accusing international headquarters of dictating to the typographical union appealed to the head office of the stereotypers and pressmen to order the men back to work. The Southams just cannot have it both ways. If it is wrong for the typographical union to dictate to its members, it is equally wrong for the pressmen's international officers to dictate to the pressmen and for the stereotypers' international office to dictate to the stereotypers. We must be reasonable in these matters. So I just add my voice to the excellent plea which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made, that the minister use all his influence, both as Minister of Labour and as trade unionist, to get a settlement of this dispute.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a long speech, and it occurred to me that I might, in reply, read this document into the record. Let me say to the hon. member for Vancouver East that I cannot understand why any employer would find fault with any man belonging to an international trade union. I imagine nobody finds fault with bankers having international affiliations, or with members of service clubs which have their headquarters in some other country. It has been my experience that the greatest stability prevails where you have a strong international organization, whether it be in labour or in any other field of endeavour. I think this can be truthfully said, that in contributions to good fellowship between Canada and the United States the labour organizations have done more than any other organization in existence. I cannot go along with those who would criticize any individual for belonging to an international trade union.

There is no question that this has been a difficult dispute, but I would remind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the Minister of Labour does not call people out on strike. That is not his function. His function is to endeavour to settle strikes once they occur. There is only one federal minister of labour in Canada, and I have been in the labour movement long enough to know that he is invariably the target for abuse from both sides. It does not matter how careful he may be in any expression of opinion he may give. To abuse him is the easiest thing imaginable; the practice is as old, I was going to say, as Methuselah, certainly since the inception of the Department of Labour in this country. I think I have appointed more commissioners in this dispute than in any dispute since I have been Minister of Labour. I have a long and close relationship with the typographical union. I grew up with them in the city of Hamilton; I carry a card in an international organization and attended their international conventions before my hon. friend, I suppose, ever carried a card in the organization.

It has been my steady policy as minister to endeavour to be impartial.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is all I ask.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I know; but I think that if in the Department of Labour the scales are ever tipped, they should incline towards the labour organization. We have done everything we humanly could to settle this dispute. We have appointed these commissioners, and that is why at the moment I am not going to say too much. Mr. Justice Richards is acting on my behalf in an endeavour to bring the top parties together in conformity with the recommendations of the Lett commission, which sat in Vancouver. I do not think I should go any further than that. I could read this record if my hon. friend wishes to hear it. It is a little different from his own, but it is factual. It was not drafted by myself, but by the officers of my department; but in view of the fact that parliament is proroguing to-day I do not think I shall read it.

It is not fair always to accuse the minister of being this or that. Let the case rest on its factual basis. It would be a change if once in a while they would blame somebody else. I should be happy to see the day when the Minister of Labour was right in even some people's point of view. But I believe when the record is read it will be found that this administration has settled more disputes than any previous administration in the history of the dominion. It is quite true that sometimes a dispute will go off the rails, but I am proud of our conciliation service, and I am proud, notwithstanding the opinions of some other persons, of the contributions which my department has made to industrial stability in the last five very difficult years.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not satisfied with the broad generalizations that the minister has made. He has not given any reply to the factual statements I have made about the basic issues in this dispute and the way in which the whole matter has been distorted. I make a strong appeal to him on behalf of his erstwhile friends in this union that he says he has had a long association with, to realize how deeply they feel about the matter. They believe that he should and I urge him to make a really serious attempt to bring the parties together and get this dispute settled.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940—

117. Governments' contribution to unemployment insurance fund, $12,500,000.

Mr. LENNARD: Yesterday I received a telegram from Hamilton which reads as follows:

On behalf of Hamilton striking war veterans of Stelco, Westinghouse and Firestone we are firmly convinced that section five, subsection (d) of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act affecting veterans involved in labour disputes is a gross discrimination under which veterans are deprived of their out of work benefits. We strongly urge that this clause be rescinded as these benefits were granted to veterans for service in the armed forces of their country and in no way should be invalidated by civilian qualifications. Urging an early reply.

Harold Keeton, chairman,
Hamilton Strikers Veterans Committee

It was my understanding as a member of the veterans affairs committee that this privilege was to give the veterans relief for a certain period until they got positions suitable to their requirements, and it ended there as far as any special privileges were concerned. I should like to know from the minister if that is a correct interpretation of the clause.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course there is the basic law, in the Unemployment Insurance Act, that when persons are on strike they cannot receive unemployment insurance benefits. It is not a question of benefits or anything like that; it is a question of the law as it is.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that the chairman of the unemployment insurance commission has resigned, and I should like to know if a chairman has been appointed in his place to complete the commission. Last year when we were discussing the minister's estimates we had a chairman but no commissioners. This year we have commissioners but no chairman.

Mr. GRAYDON: Time to get together.

Mr. MacINNIS: So I suppose when we get a chairman we shall be again without commissioners. Someone must be administering the Unemployment Insurance Act for whom in the act no provision is made. I would like to have a word from the minister as to how it is done.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a chairman of the unemployment insurance commission. He does not retire until September 30, and my hon. friend can rest assured that on the first day of October there will be a new chairman in his stead.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister in a position to indicate who the new chairman is? I understand the minister has the choice made and the situation is well in hand. He might tell parliament what the situation is.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am afraid I cannot do that. The announcement will be made in due course. I may say, however, that there have been more applications for that chairmanship than there have been for senatorships. If the hon. gentleman were on this side of the house he would realize the trials and tribulations that beset us here.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it the new chairman is not sitting far from the minister now.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

531. Dispersal, maintenance and removal of Japanese nationals and other persons of the Japanese race, $4,000,000.

Mr. REID: I do not rise to bring up any controversial question, but I would ask the minister to give us some information about the dispersal of Japanese at the present time throughout Canada. Apart from the differing views we have, I think all are agreed that a dispersal programme is desirable in each province. I should like to know what the figures are and whether representations have been received from any of the provincial governments protesting against Japanese remaining within its borders, or otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL: First of all, the policy has been to return to Japan those who have voluntarily agreed to go. The other basic policy is one of dispersal of all Japanese throughout Canada. The figures are these:

British Columbia, Department of Labour Settlement	3,080
Elsewhere in the province	5,572
		8,652
Alberta		4,172
Saskatchewan		454
Manitoba		1,290
Ontario		5,579
Quebec		1,017
Nova Scotia		1
New Brunswick		10
Newfoundland and Northwest Territories		30
Prince Edward Island		6

There have been repatriated to Japan 3,152. There are approximately only 600 who have so far asked to be returned to Japan, and we are awaiting available shipping to take them there. We have received a letter recently from the Minister of Labour of Saskatchewan, indicating that about 1,000 are being located in camp at Moose Jaw. We have never had that number in Saskatchewan. The number in Moose Jaw is between 300 and 400. He was alarmed at the possible impact of the unemployment situation upon the province by the location in that province of a large number such as he suggested to me in his letter.

Mr. MacINNIS: The matter of dispersal is an important one, and everyone who wishes to see this very difficult problem solved hopes that the dispersal policy, which is the considered policy of the government, will be carried out as expeditiously and as fairly as possible. There are several difficulties, one of them arises out of the restrictions on travel of persons of Japanese origin in areas in Canada other than the defence coast area. It is understandable that until dispersal is completed or, nearly completed, restriction on the return to the coast area should be in effect. But to have the same restrictions practically in effect in every other part of Canada is not understandable. Let me show the committee how these restrictions operate. A Canadian Japanese living in Saskatchewan had recently to go to Nova Scotia to be admitted to the bar of that province, but before he could move from Saskatchewan, where he is in a responsible position in the civil service, he had to get a permit from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Surely such restrictions do not make sense. Remember, this man is a Canadian. He tried his best to get into the Canadian army or into to some other branch of the armed service, but because of the prejudice against him he was unsuccessful. Now he is working as a trusted employee of a government of this country, and in order to be admitted to the bar of another province and to take whatever oath lawyers take he has to get a permit from the mounted police. This applies to every person of Japanese origin moving from one province to another. These restrictions should be completely removed except as regards the return of persons to Pacific defence area.

Then there is the question of disposal of the property which belonged to these people when they were evacuated in 1942, property which it took some of them a lifetime to build up. This is a parliament that believes in private property. The property was taken from these people and sold for a song. I could give a number of instances of what they received out of a lifetime's hard work. Something should be done about it. An application was made to the exchequer court in 1943. This is 1946, and that application has not yet been heard. During this session we have heard a lot about the rights guaranteed to us under magna charta. I understand that one of the assertions in that document is, that rights delayed are rights denied. The courts may be slow, but I suggest to this committee that the courts of Canada are not so slow that they cannot find time to deal with these cases over a period of three years. In August, 1943, the solicitors representing these evacuees made application to the exchequer court, and it is still there. Only God and the exchequer court know when it will be heard. I suggest to the committee that that is not justice to Canadians.

There are a number of other petty restrictions which should be removed at once. Up to a certain point the United States followed the same procedure with respect to the removal of Japanese from the coast area as we did, but they have appointed a commission to investigate the loss of property. Let me draw a parallel which is perhaps not a parallel in all respects. At the beginning of the war certain organizations were banned and classed as illegal organizations. Their property was confiscated. One of these organizations was the Farmer-Labour Temple Association. This association had property all across Canada. There was no question that at the time it was an illegal organization under the Defence of Canada Regulations. After Russia was invaded and came into the war on the side of the allies a cry went up for the restoration of this property to the former owners. A commission was appointed, and while I have not the actual facts before me at the moment, I believe that certain of these properties were bought back from the people to whom they were sold by the government at more than what was received for them and returned to these organizations. I am not objecting to the procedure followed, but I tell the committee that the sale of the property of Canadians of Japanese origin who were removed from British Columbia was far less justified than was what was done in the case of these organizations declared illegal at the beginning of the war. Therefore, I believe a commission should be appointed to see that justice is done in the matter. Advantage should not be taken of the fact that these people are of a different ethnic origin to ourselves, different colour of skin and so on. Let us deal with the matter as we would deal with any other Canadian, and I suggest it be done without the pressure which was provided in the case I have referred to.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will agree that when it comes to freedom of the individual I do not take second place to any man in the house or in the country. I refer to the basic principles of freedom in its broadest sense. In the administration of a dispersal policy of this kind you must have a controlled movement under which that policy is completed. What my department has endeavoured to do in the best interest of the Japanese themselves is to disperse them across the country, and, if humanly possible, to prevent a concentration of them in any particular locality. By about Christmas or not long afterwards we hope we shall have the whole situation pretty well stabilized.

With respect to the property, that does not come under my department; it comes under the Secretary of State, the custodian of enemy alien property.

Mr. MacINNIS: These people were not enemy aliens.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will agree with my hon. friend, but let him take his mind back to just after Pearl Harbor. I have a vivid recollection of having to go to British Columbia and arranging for the movement of these Japanese from the coastal area. At that time the United States, ourselves and Australia, and other parts of the orient, were in grave danger. It was decided, as it was decided in many other countries, that in the interests of the safety of the nation it would be necessary to move these people from the protected areas of British Columbia. When we look back at it in a broad way I think we acted with discretion; we acted in the good British way. We were humane. We moved these people with the least inconvenience to themselves and their families. I think that can be truthfully said. I have had some experience in Europe. I have seen the movement of people in one country or in some countries which some people look upon as their spiritual home, and I should not like to think that we would ever sink to the level to which they have sunk over there. I sincerely believe we have done a fair job with the dispersal and removal of the Japanese, and we have done it in their own interests.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to dispute that point at all. As a matter of fact I commended the minister on several occasions on the way in which the job was done, but what I do suggest is that we cannot justify our treatment of these people, having regard to the fairness with which we dealt with the matter when we were dealing with it as military precaution, and that is what it was at that time. I assure the minister that I appreciate the efficient and satisfactory way in which that job was carried out under the circumstances, but that does not answer the point I have made.

I put some questions on the order paper in regard to persons of Japanese origin who were taken from the mental hospital in British Columbia and sent to Japan on one or other of the ships which left British Columbia. I understand that some fifteen or sixteen were sent at their own request, and one was deported by the department of immigration. This matter was drawn to my attention in the first instance by a letter which I received in regard to one Kosho Matano, who served in the Canadian forces in the war 1914-18. This man had suffered shock on account of his war services, and had been admitted to a mental hospital in British Columbia in 1933. A friend of Mr. Matano had visited him in the spring of 1942, when persons of Japanese origin were being evacuated from the Pacific coast, and asked that this man be allowed to leave with the other evacuees at that time. He was told by the superintendent of the hospital that they could not let him out because he was an extremely dangerous person. I find in the questions answered by the minister that this "extremely dangerous person"—I assume he was a lunatic—made a request for repatriation to Japan, that that request was granted, and that he left.

Mr. REID: Was that before he was in the institution?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I understand he had been in the institution since 1933. I am just wondering how a person who is confined because of mental incapacity could make a valid application to do anything. It is the most amazing thing I have ever heard. How was the matter first brought to the attention of the authorities? It is said that fifteen made application to be sent, but that they did not make written application. The others who had made application did so on forms provided by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. These people, I understand, made application by word of mouth. To whom would such applications be made? What information was there on which to base such application? These are questions which should be looked into. In my opinion either the Department of Justice or some other department should investigate the matter, because it is serious. I should like to know if the captain of the ship on which these people were sent was advised that he had fiffteen or sixteen lunatics aboard. Was provision made for confining them while they were aboard so that they would not constitute a danger to other passengers?

I accept the minister's statement when he says he believes in democratic methods, but I submit that these are not the methods of democracy. These are totalitarian, autocratic methods—methods which have no regard for human values, human decencies or human lives. I suggest we should have a great deal more information as to how these mentally incapable people who were in a mental hospital made application to be sent anywhere. Surely if they could make application to be sent to Japan, they could make application to leave the hospital and be sent to Quebec, Ontario or anywhere else.

Mr. MITCHELL: The arrangements with respect to these people were made through the provincial authorities—not by my department. I might add that sometimes people in institutions are saner than those outside. Perhaps it would be wise to read this letter from the provincial mental hospital at Essondale, British Columbia. It is addressed to Mr. T. B. Pickersgill, commissioner for Japanese placement, in Vancouver, and states:

Referring further to our telephone conversation of this date I wish to advise you that fourteen Japanese patients of this hospital were repatriated to Japan and one Japanese patient was deported to Japan through the Canadian Immigration department.

The repatriation was entirely on a voluntary basis. The individuals were all certified mental patients of this hospital but their mental condition was such that they were able to comprehend the matter and able to express themselves. No coercion or persuasion was used. Each patient was individually interviewed by Mr. T. B. Pickersgill, Commission of Japanese Placement, together with an interpreter and in the presence of the medical superintendent of this hospital. Each patient voluntarily expressed his desire to be returned to Japan. At that time a signed statement was taken to this effect. The context of this signed statement was as follows:

"I hereby express my willingness and desire to return to Japan at the earliest possible date— Signed ..... Date."

The following is a list of patients of this hospital who were repatriated to Japan under the above circumstances:

Rosea Fugimato
Hirona Fujiyoshi
Sabara Kurishima
Kosho Matano
Matoru Motowaki
Tomoyuki Mukai
Jiro Nagayama
Fomikichi Ogawa
Tomichi Ozaki
Yoshikatsu Sawada
Buta Sakata
Kingo Tanitus
Unichi Kimura
Sukichi Kitagawa
Kuoje Tayi (Taiji) (Deported by Canadian immigration department)

Trusting that the above information will meet with your requirements, I am,

Yours truly,

A. M. Gee, M.D.,
Deputy Medical Superintendent.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not satisfied with that explanation. I believe that before any such decision was made another opinion should have been sought than that of Mr. Pickersgill, who is an employee of the government and who, as I see it, is very unsympathetic so far as these people are concerned.

The minister has said that sometimes there are saner people in mental hospitals than outside. After seeing what is done outside on occasions, I am in complete agreement with him on that point. But these people were in a mental condition which prevented their being allowed out, or at large; otherwise the superintendent of the mental hospital in British Columbia was not performing his duty in that he did not advise the authorities that there were people in the hospital who had sufficient mental capacity to fend for themselves outside, and that arrangements should be made for their removal from the hospital before they went to Japan. The statements made are just not good enough.

Unemployment insurance commission—

535. General labour transference to industries and agriculture, $650,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to refer to the out-of-work benefits applicable to service personnel who through no fault of their own find themselves engaged in an industrial dispute. I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs comes into this picture, and I have discussed the matter with him. In Ontario particularly, and also in other sections of Canada, there are hundreds of service personnel who have been granted certain rights and privileges under rehabilitation regulations. I refer particularly to the out-of-work benefits which are applicable up to eighteen months after the discharge of a service man. Many of these boys have taken employment in industry in which conditions and antagonisms which developed during the war have culminated in industrial disputes. Many of these men were employed only a month or two, or perhaps only a week or so, and then they found themselves out on strike and not able to take advantage of the benefits which ordinarily would be applicable to them had they not been engaged in a dispute through no fault of their own. I think the Minister of Labour has some responsibility in this matter, because the rehabilitation regulations were changed to conform with the Unemployment Insurance Act, and there must have been consultation between Veterans Affairs and Labour before that was done.

I appreciate the desire for uniformity in these matters, but the unemployment insurance is not comparable to the rehabilitation regulations. Many service personnel are suffering at this time through no fault of their own. I wonder if some consideration cannot be given by the Department of Labour in cooperation with the Department of Veterans Affairs to setting a deadline. If a service man is employed six or nine months before becoming involved in an industrial dispute, the unemployment insurance could be made to apply. Hundreds of these fellows normally would be entitled to come under the rehabilitation regulations, but they are losing those benefits because they have been brought into a new war through no fault of their own. Will the minister consult with the Minister of Veterans Affairs? I raised the question with that minister and he said it would be given serious consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: The next point I should like to raise has to do with vacations with pay.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I am a little ahead of my hon. friend on that. We have written to the minister of labour of Ontario.

Mr. GILLIS: Have you had any reply?

Mr. MITCHELL: Not yet, but I promise my hon. friend that I will send him a confidential copy as soon as I get one.

Item agreed to.

740. Departmental administration — further amount required, $21,216.

Mr. MacINNIS: There was one point I wanted to raise and I tell the minister that this is my last point. An international labour office conference on merchant seamen affairs was held in Seattle during the early summer. A number of conventions affecting seamen were passed at that conference. I have not the full report, but I imagine that many of the conditions affecting Canadian merchant seamen are better than those provided under the conventions. One convention had to do with a minimum wage, which was fixed at £16 per month. I believe that is below the minimum standard in many countries. Another had to do with the establishment of an eight hour day at sea. I do not know just how far that is the law of Canada, and I should like the minister to indicate, if he can, what action the dominion government intends to take, and whether or not these conventions will be ratified. I take it that ships of Canadian registry plying between this and other countries come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Another convention had to do with the training of ships' cooks, requiring the issuance of certificates of efficiency. This is a most important matter, because most of what the sailors call "beefing" on the ships arises from having to eat food prepared by cooks who do not know how to cook.

There was another proposal—I do not know whether this was in the form of an agreement—with regard to a 112 hour fortnight, or a 56 hour week on coastal ships. My understanding is that the representatives of the seamen fought vigorously for this, and I should like the minister to indicate briefly just what is the government's intention.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am merely the agent who appoints delegates to the I.L.O. The Canada Shipping Act comes under the Department of Transport. The matter of cooks would seem to be important from my hon. friend's point of view. We have already had conversations with the Department of Transport with the idea of setting up classes for these men. I suppose the question of the eight hour day will be given consideration when parliament prorogues. The hon. member knows that this meeting was held in Seattle only last June, and he can rest assured that the matters he has referred to will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to associate myself with the request of the hon. member for Cape Breton South that returned veterans who become involved in strikes such as those in progress at the Westinghouse and Firestone plants in Hamilton be given consideration. I received a telegram about this last night, and no doubt the minister also received a copy.

There is one other matter about which I dislike to bother the minister at the present time, but it does affect my constituency. I refer to the payment being made to prisoners of war working in the beet fields. How much are these prisoners of war paid per month for working in the beet fields in Lethbridge riding?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are paid 50 cents a day, in addition to the 25 cents a day provided for by the Geneva convention.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much do they actually get per day?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course that is not in cash; it is in kind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They receive tickets with which they can purchase goods; is that the idea?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is nothing that they can save? How much are the farmers required to pay?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have taken the position that under no circumstance shall prisoners of war be in unfair competition with normal civilian labour. We have laid down the policy that these men must be paid the going rates in the particular locality in which they are employed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The department takes all the difference?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have been able to return about $2,125,000 to the treasury arising out of the employment of prisoners of war.

Mr. JAQUES: Is it part of the Geneva convention that prisoners of war should remain prisoners of war twelve months or more after the end of the war?

Mr. MITCHELL: You would have had very little sugar in western Canada in the last two or three years if it had not been for prisoners of war. We are moving them out, and we expect all to leave Canada by November 2. Great Britain is still using prisoners of war, tens of thousands of them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think the Minister of Labour has no criticism coming to him because of what he has done with respect to these prisoners of war. If I were a prisoner I think I would feel a whole lot happier in Canada where I could get plenty to eat and be warm and well housed, and I would not be crowding the minister to rush me back home even after November 2. We have to face these things reasonably.

I should like to say a word or two about the treatment of the Japanese. I want to commend the minister for the way in which he conducted the evacuation of the Japanese from British Columbia. After the danger is all over and men do not smell the powder and are not afraid of the zooming of aeroplanes over their head at midnight, it is easy to look back and criticize. But what the minister did in those trying days was highly commendable; he deserves praise for it, and I want to give him praise.

Now a word or two with respect to the way in which he has disposed of the Japanese since, and I want this to go into the record because it is to the minister's credit. He has not been free to do the thing which in his judgment and the judgment of the government was the wise thing to do with these Japanese, because he has been interfered with by a whole lot of people passing resolutions and running up and down the country, the very people who would have been, to use a slang expression, "howling their heads off" when the trouble was on if anything different had been done and who are now shedding crocodile tears because we are not treating the Japanese as though we had never been at war with Japan. That arouses in me nothing but disgust and contempt. I deeply sympathize with the minister in his endeavour to deal with this problem. I deeply sympathize with him in his endeavour to deal with the labour problem all the way through. I say this for the record: I think the minister has done a good job; I doubt mightily that any other man in the dominion could have done any better, and perhaps no man could have been found who would have done as well as the Minister of Labour has done. I am not in favour of the way in which matters are being dealt with in some respects under the Department of Labour, but the Minister of Labour is not to blame for any deficiencies that appear. I wish to put that on the record so that it will stay to the minister's credit as long as Hansard will be read.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no objection to the compliment paid by my hon. friend to the efficiency of the Minister of Labour. In fact, in certain instances I would add something to it. But when he is making his comments so glowingly I do not think he should imply discredit to any other member of this house. I presume he was referring to the hon. member for Vancouver East as weeping crocodile tears over the Japanese people. If he was, he was expressing his ignorance of that hon. gentleman's attitude for many years and even before the war. Whatever may be the rights or wrongs of the affair it does appear to me that the hon. member for Vancouver East has stood firm on a clear course throughout the whole episode. I believe he is substantially right when he says that injustices were done to these Japanese, and perhaps we could hardly expect otherwise in view of the war psychology. While they have been treated as they have been treated in Canada it may be some consolation for us to know that they have been treated much worse in other countries, but on the other hand there is no question about the justice of the position which the hon. member for Vancouver East has always upheld in this house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad that the hon. member for Cariboo was honest enough to make his criticism in my presence so that I might have a chance to defend myself. Other people would have gone out and prattled all over the country. I prefaced my remarks with a statement that clearly showed that I had reference to groups of people in Canada who have taken it upon themselves to interfere with the Minister of Labour and the government by running up and down the country and passing resolutions on what they consider to be the wise way in which to deal with an exceedingly dangerous problem.

Mr. KNOWLES: Name the groups.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no need.

Mr. KNOWLES: The United Church?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I deliberately left the groups unnamed. I should not be surprised if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would rush in and place on Hansard the names of a whole lot of people

I did not specifically mention. That is a shameful thing to do and utterly contemptible. What I have said is sufficient.

Mr. PROBE: Why not be courageous?

Mr. KNOWLES: The Church of England? The United Church? The Presbyterian Church in Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: Why not be a man and name them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I prefer to use a little diplomacy and decency in dealing with this matter. I do not hesitate to name them from fear. I am not afraid of any man in Canada, or of any group of men, but I do not think it is fitting to name them. I do believe that a number of people have made themselves busy in connection with this problem when they should have been wise enough to remain in the background and leave the matter to those who had the responsibility to decide what was the wise thing to do. It was to them I was referring, not to the member for Vancouver East nor any member of the C.C.F. group. When I want to refer to them I will name them on the floor of the house and give them a chance to answer.

Mr. JAQUES: My previous question I suppose should not have been directed to the Minister of Labour, but it just cropped up. I am not criticizing the Minister of Labour at all over the fact that prisoners of war still remain here as prisoners of war after the war is over. I am also aware that their treatment in this country is humane. But it is the principle of the thing I do not like. I do not believe the end justifies the means. That is not a philosophy to which I subscribe. If we follow the practice of keeping prisoners of war here in Canada a year after the war is over, maybe two years for all I know, that sanctions the practice in other countries where prisoners of war are not humanely treated, where, in fact, they are being barbarously treated, and I intend to refer to that on another item in the Department of External Affairs. I do not want the minister to think that I attributed any criticism to him, because this matter is not really his responsibility.

Mr. KNOWLES: A week ago to-day I asked the Minister of Justice a question with regard to triple pay at Hamilton. The minister replied that the government had not been asked for an opinion on the matter, nor was any opinion given. A few days later I received a telegram from E. B. Jolliffe, counsel for the United Steelworkers of America, giving me the text of a telegram he had sent to the Minister of Justice, bringing his attention to the fact that on August 22, both by air mail and by telegram, the union had requested the Minister of Labour, under P.C. 9384, to give his permission to the union to prosecute the company for violations of the wage control order. The letter which Mr. Jolliffe sent to the Minister of Labour stated the name or names of an employee or employees who had received triple pay, and made the specific request required by the order in council for permission to prosecute. Mr. Jolliffe also expressed his view as to the "absurdity of the government countenancing the open and continuing violation of the wage control order by an employer while asking the employees to respect that order." The president of Stelco, he pointed out, "frankly informed the industrial relations committee, of which two ministers were members, that non-striking employees would be paid triple wages, which is clearly contrary to P.C. 9384." The Minister of Labour replied to Mr. Jolliffe's letter under date of August 23, acknowledging the letter but not even indicating in his communication what the matter was about. The letter simply stated that he was asking the advice of the minister of labour for Ontario as well as the advice of the regional board of Ontario before replying to this request. I should like to ask the minister—

Mr. MITCHELL: Will my hon. friend read the rest of the letter?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. I had better put the whole letter on record:

August 23, 1946

Dear Mr. Jolliffe:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 22, and before replying at length I am asking the advice of the Minister of Labour for Ontario, as well as the advice of the regional board of Ontario.

The steelworkers' request for an increase, as you are well aware, has not been before the regional board of Ontario in the form of an application. Nevertheless, the board's interest in the point you raise is obvious and I wish to have the benefit of the advice of the chairman as well as the advice of the Minister of Labour for Ontario because the dispute is basically one coming under the provincial jurisdiction, before replying to your letter.

Yours sincerely,
Humphrey Mitchell.

I am not commenting on the letter—it seems to me that it should be framed—but what I should like the minister to tell us, now that it is out in the open that this request has been made, is what the government's attitude is towards the company's violation of the wage control order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can only say this, that when I hear from the people I referred to in that letter I shall be glad to give the hon. member an answer, and not before.

Mr. STEPHENSON: There is just one question I wish to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He is asking what is the attitude of the minister with regard to the company paying overtime pay in this case. What is his attitude towards the union members striking against the government?

Mr. KNOWLES: The thing cuts both ways.

Mr. STEPHENSON: That is a fair question.

Mr. MASSEY: May I refer the minister to Hansard of August 26, page 5421. I have sent for a copy, but it has not arrived yet. In the course of the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of National Defence for Air I addressed a question to the minister for air in regard to the attachment of Royal Canadian Air Force officers to the national employment service in Toronto, and suggested to him and strongly urged upon him that that attachment continue. He replied as follows:

> That is not a matter which comes within the air force; that is under the Department of Labour, and anything like that would have to be arranged by that department.

Has the minister any knowledge which he can give the committee immediately of what the programme is in that regard?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think these officers are seconded—that is the term they use—from the air force to the Department of Labour in the city of Toronto, and we are at present in correspondence with the department with respect to the future activities of the men in question.

Item agreed to.

743. Labour Gazette and other publications authorized by Labour Department Act—further amount required, $4,526.

Mr. PROBE: I have not taken any time of the Minister of Labour or of this committee during any part of the discussion of the estimates on labour, but I wish at this time to associate myself completely with the other members of the C.C.F. group in the opinions which they have expressed, and I believe that fair-minded members of the House of Commons will feel that they are doing their proper duty with respect to labour.

With respect to this particular estimate for the Labour Gazette, I think the minister has in the Labour Gazette an outstanding publication. I always appreciate getting it, and I know that labour groups throughout the country look forward to it. There is a great deal of information, statistical, national and international, with respect to labour matters. I should like however to voice a suggestion which I am sure the minister will take in what he is pleased to call "a kindly way", and that is that the Gazette comes out just a little bit late. I know his difficulties in the matter of compiling the statistics which go into the Gazette, and assembling them, and so on. But it seems to me that statistics which require a longer time to prepare and verify could be included in a later edition of the Labour Gazette, so that information which can be compiled locally can be kept up to date instead of being a couple of months behind. I do not wish to take any more of the time of the committee, but I do feel that this department is giving a service to the country generally in that publication; I should like to see the service made even better, and for that reason I am offering this suggestion.

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to thank my hon. friend for the very kind things he has said about the Labour Gazette. We are having difficulties with paper and printing, but I shall be glad to look into the aspect of the matter he has just mentioned.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

41. Departmental administration, $767,480.

Mr. REID: Nothing comes before members of parliament that is more important than the estimates. They provide the one opportunity the ordinary member has to discuss these administrative matters. I suggest to the minister that at the beginning of the next session the estimates be brought down within a week after the opening of parliament, so as to give members a chance to deal with them. Throughout the whole session we should be discussing these estimates, not, as happens year after year, on the eve of our going away. I make that suggestion seriously, in order that we may have a proper opportunity for discussion.

Will the minister give consideration to the remarks which we made on the fisheries estimates, affecting the United States and Canada and the continental shelf?—because these matters are very important.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I assure the hon. gentleman that the matter will receive consideration, and I think the proper form for it is in the food and agriculture organization of the united nations. The constitution provides that that organization is set up for securing improvement in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all foods and agricultural products, and its functions are to deal with the conservation of natural resources and the adoption of improved methods of agricultural production. "Agriculture" is defined in the constitution to include fisheries. That is an organization that has been set up comprising some fifty-odd nations and the purpose of the constitution includes the conservation of food products and natural resources, including the fisheries. The proclamation made by the President of the United States and the President of Mexico is aimed at the conservation of the resources of the oceans, and would I think be one of the very interesting subjects to be dealt with on an international level. As the hon. member knows, Canadian representatives are taking an active part in the deliberations and representations of this food and agriculture organization, and he may be sure that the matter will not be lost sight of.

Mr. GRAYDON: I find myself at a disadvantage this morning in attempting at this stage of the session to discuss in any great detail matters relating to external affairs. The pressure of the session at this hour precludes that. I am sorry it is so—not that the committee will miss very much from any contribution that I might normally make, but that observation does apply to many other members who are interested and who have followed keenly external affairs in this and previous sessions.

I wonder if the committee will bear with me for a few minutes while I discuss one or two of the major points of interest to Canada from the point of view of external affairs.

I should like first of all to refer to the question of the standing committee. This standing committee on external affairs has had this session, for the first time, the consideration of estimates of a government department in full. In other words, the Department of External Affairs has been the guinea pig for a new experiment in the specialization of the efforts of members of this house. The setting up of the external affairs committee was undertaken in the first instance after considerable pressure and many suggestions by the opposition and members in other parts of the house as well. We had gone too long without a proper external affairs committee meeting regularly each session as a standing part of our procedure, and so when parliament met last September I welcomed the suggestion of the government to set up a committee which had been asked for on so many previous occasions. I also welcomed the opportunity of having the estimates of the department referred to that committee. No other estimates in full of an entire department had been so referred to a committee before, and I wish to make this observation, which I hope will be constructive.

I do not think we can any longer carry on without being made ridiculous in the eyes of the public generally under the system of parliamentary procedure which we follow in this house, having regard to the volume of business and the amount of money that is being expended by the dominion government. We should be bringing about some change in the consideration of departmental estimates. I agree with what the hon. member for New Westminster has said. I believe his views are shared by every member of this house who wishes to do a decent job for Canada, as I am sure every member does.

I do not think we can hope to retain public confidence if we continue to have the estimates dealt with as they have been during the past week. I am not blaming anyone for that. I do blame the whole parliamentary procedure, and I would blame parliament itself if we continued that system. We cannot afford to do so. My suggestion therefore is this. The external affairs committee has gone over the estimates of external affairs in detail, with great care, and over a considerable period, and I think it is time for parliament to make its decision and see to it that we bring under the same policy other departments of government. Then there will be no difficulty about last-minute consideration of estimates being rushed through in this way. If they are rushed through at least a committee will have previously dealt with them. But that is vastly different from the present practice of having item after item passed through, as we have witnessed this week, without the slightest attention being given to anything in detail. Indeed, many items have passed respecting which there has been very little knowledge on the part of any member outside the government or the head of the department concerned.

In this house we are not mobilizing the brains and energy that we possess. There are members who are not given an opportunity to play their proper part in the general discussion and examination of expenditures, and after all, that is one of the major parts of our business as members of parliament. But if we adopt the principle of having estimates referred to committees —we may not be able to do that with regard to all the estimates at the next session, but at least we can continue the experiment that has been initiated—we can specialize in the work and give every member of the house an opportunity of taking part and making his proper contribution as the session proceeds.

The utilization of the full time of every member of the house is the least that the public can ask of its members in the commons. The massive programme of legislation that parliament is now asked to deal with calls for specialized and modernized methods of consideration.

I should like now to make one or two brief observations on the committee's work. It was a good committee; it did a good job, and I wish to pay a tribute to the care and consideration which every member gave to the work, particularly the chairman of the committee, the member for Cochrane, who has presided over it since its inception. A good many sittings were held, and the deliberations did credit to the members of the committee and all those involved in the work. Its recommendations, while not voluminous, were such as, I believe, parliament may properly be asked to concur in. One suggestion was the recommendation for an international hour each week in parliament. What do we mean by an international hour? We spend hour after hour, day after day, discussing domestic questions. I should like hon. members to calculate from their Hansards just how much time is taken up in a discussion of external affairs and international matters. It is nothing short of a disgrace. I do not want to attribute that to anyone in particular, but to the whole house. I want to take my share of it, but I do not want to take my share of it much longer, and that is why I am making the suggestion.

Perhaps one of the most important parts of Canada's business is her international business. The whole question of peace and war —and is there anything more important to the Canadian people than peace?—the whole question of our international affairs has been by the pressure of things relegated to the background of parliamentary consideration. What is the reason? The reason is that we have not an hour or any special period set aside for dealing with external affairs on a regularized basis. The very fact that in the last day of the session we are dealing with external affairs for the first time in any big way is the best argument that I can bring forward to support my contention. I suggest to the committee, and I think parliament should concur in it and the government should take cognizance of it, that one hour a week be given to the discussion of external affairs. We could call one item under departmental administration or some other item which would give us an opportunity to discuss the matter. There should be a change in the rules so that at the next session at least one hour a week will be given over to this important matter. Look at what has happened. Almost every day since parliament assembled last March some kind of an international conference has been going on. What reports of these conferences did hon. members get? We always get them, eventually, but we are never brought up to date. We should be brought up to date, because actually there are legislative assemblies in which Canada is involved, and in which Canada is taking a part, which are just as important as, and sometimes more important than, our own House of Commons when it is dealing with domestic affairs. Therefore I say we cannot go on any longer without setting aside an hour for the discussion of international matters.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, but I shall not deal with it at any length to-day, namely, a better system of control of international expenditures which Canada is about to make. That is a matter of grave concern, a matter of serious moment to the people of Canada. In the domestic field we take great pains to make sure that there is a comptroller of the treasury who watches or at least is supposed to guard the expenditure of money. In the international field we are only in the embryo stage, but before we go any farther it is the committee's proposal, and I think it will meet with parliament's approval, that we should take care that this country should not attempt to keep up with any of the international Joneses, in any big way. Up to date Canada has not done that. I am cautioning the government and parliament so that we shall not attempt to change that policy, but that we shall see to it that the taxpayer's money, whether it goes into domestic affairs or international affairs, is cared for and that we shall get a dollar's value for a dollar spent.

I should like to deal with many other matters which were brought up in the committee, but I have not the time at my disposal this morning to do so. I do wish to make one or two references to our position generally in the external affairs department. I admit that last spring the government went part way in acceding to the suggestion which had been made so many times, and also may I say to the suggestion which had been appearing on the order paper in the form of a resolution. That was done when the bill was introduced. The government finally did come around at least to establishing the right of the government to appoint a separate full-time minister of external affairs. I regret exceedingly that when the bill was passed by parliament something was not done to implement the principle which had been adopted by parliament. I hope that we shall not continue any longer in Canada without a separate full-time minister of external affairs. Of course if the Prime Minister were here he would take umbrage at what I am saying and would say that I was reflecting on him. That is not a very good argument, particularly when no one intends to reflect upon him. I wish to say that the Prime Minister's position at the moment is the best argument that we could have for a minister of external affairs. He is finding the burden heavy; he has not been able to be in the House of Commons more than a small fraction of the time this session; and even at this moment, on the closing day of the session, he is unable to be with us. He ought to be the first one—and the government—to admit that if ever there was a need for a full-time minister of external affairs it is now. I hope the government will not try to face parliament any longer in another session without a full-time minister in that department.

May I also say by way of criticism that I do not think the Department of External Affairs or the minister of that department should carry all the information about external affairs in their vest pockets. The people of Canada and parliament have not been taken as fully into the confidence of the ministry on matters of external affairs as the country was entitled to. Let me give an example. We had a commonwealth conference of prime ministers. The Prime Minister went over and came back. There was no report to parliament and no chance for discussion. The whole matter is still standing over and parliament is proroguing. That is a pretty good argument for the fact that the Prime Minister did not have time. Of course he did not have time. The reason he did not have time is that there was not a full-time minister of external affairs to handle at least part of the work in connection with it. In addition to that, before the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs went to the peace conference no opportunity was given to parliament to discuss the whole problem of peace and Canada's possible participation in the conference, as was done prior to the San Francisco conference, which was of great value to the delegates who were in attendance. May I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that on these two occasions I think there was a flouting of parliament, because we should have known something both about the commonwealth conference and about the peace conference. In all fairness that information should have been given to the people's representatives.

We have another situation which calls for some remedy and much more severe criticism than I am going to give it. Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I say, I do not think we should go out of our way to attack the government, nor should we raise criticism unnecessarily in regard to external affairs. But I tell you, sir, that what I am saying to-day is much more restrained than what under ordinary circumstances the conditions call for.

In the matter of external affairs, as they affect this country, we must stick together, regardless of what our other difficulties may be. Canada must have a united voice in world councils if at all possible. But that must not be used as an excuse or a cover to stop normal criticism by parties in the house on those occasions when we believe that certain reforms are required. For instance, let us consider our position with respect to the United Kingdom. The right hon. Vincent Massey has been back in Canada since last May, and since that time there has not been the slightest hint of any appointment being made to fill his place in one of the major diplomatic posts created by Canada outside this country. In a delicate time like this, in this critical period of international affairs, there should be no such hiatus between one man's leaving a post and another taking his place. Yet no excuse or reasons are given. We are told simply that the position is open and that it has not been filled.

The same could be said with respect to Australia. Since last May no attempt has been made to fill that post. Yet we know that Hon. T. C. Davis left there last May. There is no suggestion of any appointment to fill his place.

With respect to South Africa the situation is even worse. No appointment has been made there since Mr. Burchell left, a year ago this month. We have had no permanent commissioner in South Africa in all that time.

Our position with respect to Eire is not quite so bad. Since Mr. Merchant Mahoney died last spring no appointment has been made. But that is not as serious as our position with respect to South Africa.

Chile is one of our major South American posts, but it has gone vacant since a year ago last July.

So far as India is concerned—well, I am tired of asking in the House of Commons when this country is going to accept India's invitation to exchange high commissioners. That invitation has been in the hands of the government for years. Yet we have no suggestion that an appointment will be made even in the near future.

In my opinion this constitutes a series of dangerous diplomatic defaults on the part of this country. I am sorry to see it taking place, and I should like to be sufficiently severe with the minister that he would see to it that the condition is remedied immediately, in the interests of Canada.

As to the department itself, let me say that without having a full-time minister we are following a dangerous course. In the department one finds public servants whose competence is unsurpassed by any others in the public service of Canada. I make no reflection upon them when I say that we cannot allow a department, even one with good men in it, to grow up like Topsy, without a full-time minister. Everyone knows what it means to have team-work between a full-time minister and those who serve under him. I suggest we cannot allow this default to continue, because a departmental reorganization is needed, one which would include a new minister of external affairs.

Canada is in a position where she should take a more forthright stand respecting her Arctic problems. Our failure to assert ourselves and to announce a clear and definite policy in Arctic matters may have a damaging effect upon Canadian-United States relations of the future. One of our greatest friends is the republic to the south of us. I hope that in the days which lie ahead Canada's position with respect to her Arctic relations may be defined and clarified.

I am hopeful that the bonds of unity which exist among the various units of the commonwealth will be strengthened as time passes. I believe I would not be transgressing my rights in the matter of speculation if I were to say that I look forward to the day—and I suggest we should be preparing for it—when Canada will be the centre, the heart, of the great British commonwealth of nations. I hope that day may come. It may not be in the near future, but, after all, there are some things concerning which we must take a long-range view.

My observations have been somewhat hurried, because of the reasons I set out earlier. But I must say in my closing remarks that this party, as well as the government, is interested in our position in international conferences. I cannot help thinking of the vital importance of some of these meetings. As I sat watching the atomic energy commission meeting in New York last June one of the things which struck me most forcibly was this: Sitting in the second row of the visitors' gallery, while atomic energy was being discussed and measures drawn up for its control, was a little eleven-year-old girl, with the customary pigtails and ribbons. She was there with her mother, and I suppose no one was taking less interest than she was in the discussions. But whether she had any interest in it or not, as I sat there I thought that there was no person around the council table or in the galleries that day who had a greater interest in decisions with respect to atomic energy than did that child in the audience. In this day and age, with a world so concentrated, when distance has been reduced to an almost irreducible minimum and the world instead of being a great globe has become a shrunken ball, a world in which science has placed its most destructive weapon, it takes no more than a layman like myself, and those who surround me in the house, to realize what this means in future world affairs.

It is all very well to talk about the stopping of military aggression. But an aggression just as important as military aggression is taking place to-day: ideological aggression must have defences placed against it. I say with every bit of conviction at my command—and indeed I would say more if it were not this late hour in the session—that this country has to give what lead it can in seeing to it that we do our share to meet that ideological aggression. Make no mistake about it; it is serious and vital. This country cannot afford either domestically or internationally to adopt anything which savours of reaction, no matter where one finds it. So far as this country is concerned, human values must come first—and I am not using the word "maybe" when I say that. I am sure I shall have support from all over the chamber when I make that statement. The cornerstone of peace must be based upon economic and social justice in this world. Without that we cannot have permanent peace, as I understand it, in the days that lie ahead. The little peoples of the world have to have a break. I believe their era is just around the corner and I would hope that it is here to-day. I want to conclude, and this is my last sentence.

Mr. MacINNIS: Your last conclusion.

Mr. GRAYDON: My last conclusion. I am getting more like some ministers of the gospel every day, but this is definitely my last conclusion. I am not an expert on external affairs, and there are not many of us who are, but there are some simple conclusions which laymen like myself can arrive at from considering the world picture. I refer particularly to the communistic doctrine which I regard as a pretty dangerous thing for this and other countries. There is abroad in the world to-day, as I have said, a struggle between two ideologies. Having that definitely in mind I think one of the difficulties we are facing with respect to those who embrace communism is this: I do not care if Russia wants communism; that is her business and I am not going to interfere nor do I think any one has the right to interfere. Let her have communism if she wants to—

Mr. McLURE: But we do not want it.

Mr. GRAYDON: There may be some places where it works, but it won't work here. I think it is our job and I think it is the job of every nation in the world to follow the system that is followed in many rural communities, the good neighbour policy. I think the rural good neighbour policy is one that the nations of the world will have to follow if we are going to have peace and permanent peace. It is a very simple one. The best neighbours we had on the farm were those who helped us when we were in trouble. When we needed extra help on the farm we "changed works" with our neighbours. An international exchange of works on the same basis as that on which the rural communities of Canada have changed works through all the years is what we need. But at the same time the best neighbours we had were the neighbours who did not try to run our household at home, who minded their own business in the process of being good neighbours. That is all I ask of the nations of the world to-day. There is a lot of international business to be minded. On the other hand, let us make sure that in doing so we do not try to reach our long hands into the internal political and economic set-up of other nations, and let us ask the other nations to do the same thing with us.

For that reason I think one of the best things, perhaps one of the best advances toward world peace, is for people and nations to respect the political set-up of other nations and not attempt through some means or another, devious, secret or otherwise, to upset the political set-up of another. That is where I say that so far as communism in Canada is concerned, we want none of it. We are not going to stand for it in Canada. But on the other hand let us not in the international field attempt to tell any nation how it should run its government. We have plenty of difficulty in finding a way to run our own. So I say to the members of this committee that we should in the interests of world peace apply the rural type of good neighbour policy. This should be applied to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, to the United States, to the United Kingdom, to Canada and all other nations of the world. It is a sensible policy, it is one by which no one will be running into danger.

The armed forces brought us victory in this war, and I think it is not too much to say that they and others in the world are looking to the statesmen of the world to keep the victory that they won. That challenge is ours.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that every one of the hon. members who have remained to the end of the session would welcome the opportunity of putting before the public his views on matters of international consequence. That is our right if we choose to do so, but we have to choose between one thing or another. If we want to continue here for more days, it is our right to do so, but I think we should determine which course we are going to follow. If we are going to adhere to the programme which has been laid out, I do not think it would be fair for me to take much time of the committee to put my views on record with respect to international affairs, and I suggest that other hon. members of the committee should take a like view of the situation unless we change our programme and decide that we are going to sit several days longer so that each one of us will have an opportunity of saying what he feels may be of some help in the settlement of the difficult international situation in which we find ourselves. I am quite prepared to abide by whatever may be the decision in that regard. If those of us who have stayed here to the end want to make that end some days later, I am quite prepared to take my share of the time, but if we determine to adhere to our programme I do not think I should take any more time now.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree fully with the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have to make up our minds and make them up quickly as to whether we are going to prorogue to-day or whether we are going to go on to next week. I pointed that out yesterday in the debate on the broadcasting corporation loan. Nevertheless I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Peel, who pointed out that it is rather too bad that we find ourselves in this position at this time.

Fairly early in the session I think it was that the Prime Minister made a statement that there was hardly an item of business coming before parliament which did not impinge in some way or another upon our relations with other countries. In that way he was emphasizing the importance of international affairs. As far as the estimates before us are concerned, they are in a position no other estimates are in. They were considered minutely by the committee on external affairs. Unless we follow the second suggestion of the minister and continue this discussion for several days I do not think there is anything more that one can say in the circumstances.

I should like to say a great deal but I shall end by making a reference to one of the closing points made by the hon. member for Peel. He said that he hoped that some day Canada would be the heart of the British empire. Perhaps that is a laudable desire, but if my hon. friend will examine it a little further he will find in that desire the root cause of much of the international trials and tribulations that have beset the world for so many years. That is nationalism. I do not care particularly whether Canada becomes the heart, the lungs or the liver of the new social order, but I do hope that Canada will take her full share in building that new social order, and that it will be based on peace and on the good neighbour policy.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, may I point out to the hon. member that we should have regard for the position of all hon. members. If there are to be speeches made I think we shall have to take the second course and continue to sit here so that all may have an equal opportunity. We shall either have to be forbearing, or go on and let each one have his opportunity to speak; because I do not think it would be fair to attempt to accommodate two or three or three or four members and then have the rest of us forgo what is the natural desire of each of us when opportunity offers to express his views upon these important matters. I do not want to close the discussion, but I think we should realize that if a few do insist on participating, they will have to share with us the responsibility of going on for some days next week.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, this puts me and puts the committee in a very awkward position. In the opinion of some of us the most important debate of the session should take place on these external affairs estimates, but as usual they are brought up at the very end of the session. I think this is the third or fourth occasion on which I have had to speak in the very last hour of the session on this question of external affairs. It is all right to say, as some have said, that we can leave it to next session. We tried very hard yesterday afternoon to get the radio question left over to next session, but the government would have carried on the house for another month rather than do that. I certainly do not want to delay the house more than is necessary, but what am I to do? How would it be if each group were allowed to leave it to one of its members to express their views? The Conservatives have spoken and the C.C.F., and if I might be permitted to speak for this group, and then perhaps the odd independent, we might get through. We could save an hour by not stopping for lunch.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. JAQUES: No, Mr. Chairman. I am asking whether my suggestion would meet with the approval of the house.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The acting leader of the C.C.F. has withdrawn.

Mr. JAQUES: The acting leader of the C.C.F. said what he wanted to say, I suppose.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): No, he did not.

Mr. JAQUES: Then let him speak so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is every member's right to speak, and each one will have to make his own decision in view of his responsibility both to his own conscience and to his fellow members of parliament.

Mr. JAQUES: If I have to decide between my own conscience and the conscience of others, I must consult my own, because that is the only one I am responsible to.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps it would meet with the approval of the committee if the representative of the Social Credit party spoke for not more than five minutes. A representative of the Progressive-Conservative has spoken, and a representative of the C.C.F. party spoke for not more than five minutes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that if a representative of the Social Credit party speaks, one of the independent members is going to speak. We know that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and myself take quite different views on foreign affairs. I suggest that we should be sporting in this matter. I intended to make a speech myself on foreign affairs, but at this stage I suggest we cooperate and that no one speak longer than three or four minutes.

Mr. JAQUES: It is not much use my attempting to say anything in five minutes. Unlike some other parties in this house, the Social Credit party has no facilities with the C.B.C. Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister might see to that, so that we can put our views before the people.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Your leader gets on the air periodically on free time.

Mr. JAQUES: I have only time to make a protest. With respect to the foreign policy of this country the people of Canada are committed to policies of which they know nothing and on which they are not consulted, and which this house never discusses. That is a fact, and it is an outrage and a scandal. At this moment a peace conference is sitting in Paris and this house has not had one minute to discuss Canada's policy at the peace conference. We know nothing and we are not allowed to know anything except what we are told by a lot of commentators and newspaper correspondents who use a brush dipped in red ink to colour the news.

I had prepared a statement which I believe would have been a valuable addition to the debates of this house and would have given valuable information to the people outside the house. I might ask why it is that this particular department, the Department of External Affairs, is always the last to come up, ever since I have been in the house I think, and always the excuse is made: You cannot speak now, there is no time because we want to close the house to-night. It is amazing. We talk about a new social order, about world government, that Canada is going to take its share in international affairs, and so forth; yet there is not one word of discussion in this house. I suppose under the circumstances I cannot say anything more, except to register the strongest possible protest at the way this department is and has usually been left to the end, so that no discussion is possible. I can only say that it is not by accident.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Just before the vote carries I want to register in support of the other speakers, a strong protest against this most important subject coming in the dying days of the session. I believe it is wrong policy in these very serious times, when the issue in Canada is not east against west, or whether we shall have, say, socialism now in Canada, but is world reestablishment and world peace. Will the Acting Prime Minister assure us that when the house meets next January it will have an opportunity to discuss foreign affairs early in the session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry to have to make any challenge against these protests of an arrangement having been made to bring these estimates on at this late date; but I have heard no one suggest what other matter that has been here dealt with should have been deferred in order to give consideration to these estimates. Hon. members must realize that parliament has been working pretty steadily, and I do not think there have been many things which hon. members would say should not have been dealt with, or should not have been dealt with when they were dealt with. I appreciate that hon. members would like an opportunity for a fuller debate. There can be that opportunity; if hon. members want to continue the session it can be done; but I do not wish to accept the suggestion that it is not by accident or by the ordinary happening and succession of events that we are in this position at this time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I accept fully what the Acting Prime Minister has said. Nevertheless I would ask him whether he will try to see that this unfortunate—I do not think the word is too strong —situation does not occur again. It seems to me, in spite of the truth of all he has said, it could easily have been avoided if estimates were not left, and particularly these estimates, to this point. I leave it there. I think he will agree with what is said, that it is unfortunate that this matter, which may be and probably will be overwhelmingly more important than most of the things we have discussed, cannot be adequately dealt with. I suggest that on a future occasion it should have some precedence, and not come, as it so often does, at this stage, when we are in the dying hours of the session and must be reasonable and, as he says, forbearing with each other.

Mr. BENTLEY: I can see the Acting Prime Minister's point of view to some extent. But I remember that in the early days of this session there was a government resolution to set up a committee to discuss and come to an agreement on a Canadian flag, and we spent three days talking about whether we should set up the committee or not, when we could have done so in five minutes, because we had the committee anyway. Who was responsible I do not know, but those three days would be very valuable right now.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am not getting up to take part in the controversy over the situation existing at the moment. I appreciate fully the position the Acting Prime Minister is in. In recent weeks he has been endeavouring to bring this parliament to a close without depriving anyone of the opportunity to speak.

I have been in consultation with him in recent days and I know what his plans have been; it has not been in his mind that anybody should be prevented from speaking. At the same time this is the parliament of Canada, and any hon. member has the right to speak at appropriate occasions, and he has that right now.

I wish to say only two things. At the beginning of this session I took the opportunity of making some suggestions with respect to the time allowed for the consideration of the business of parliament, namely the voting of the people's money for the carrying on of the affairs of government. I think that is at least as important as any other work we do, and perhaps as important as all the rest put together. And it gets the least consideration. What I did at that time was to make several suggestions for the consideration of the house and the government: Hansard, page 36. They were as follows:

1. That the estimates, as is now customary, should be tabled immediately after the speech from the throne is disposed of.

That is generally done.

2. That the budget should come down at the same time or closely following.

This has not been the rule, and was not the rule this year. We are asked to consider the expenditure of money before we are shown how the money is going to be raised.

3. That motions to go into supply should be made at least once weekly, on a day when such motion is debatable, so that members of parliament may not be denied the right to discuss matters they may regard as of pressing public importance.

That has not been the policy. We have considered from time to time some of these estimates, but most of them have come on in these latter days.

4. That much more time should be allowed for consideration of the estimates and that definite days from the beginning of the session should be set aside for this purpose.

And this concluding sentence:

I do not think we should be giving the major part of our time at the beginning of the session to the consideration of legislation with the temptation to do too much talking and then be crowded into pushing these appropriations through without due consideration. The unseemly and unbusinesslike rush in voting away the people's money at the end of each session is a procedure unworthy of a responsible parliament.

Speaking as leader of this party, I am not aware that any further time will be taken on any of these items in supply. I think the suggestions which have come from all sections of the house to-day, and the suggestions which I made and have now repeated, should receive the consideration of the government for another year.

I have just one question on external affairs estimates and then I will be through; and so far as I am aware, under the existing circumstances there will be no further time taken by members of this party on any of the other items. I am suggesting to no one here that he avoid speaking, but so far as I know there will not be much more time taken in this session. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the government of Canada had approved a wheat agreement in 1942. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was not sure; he said he did not think it had. I would like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs if he could answer that question. And then this other: if the government did agree to it, I should like an explanation of why a one-nation agreement was entered into with Britain, when it was already committed to the 1942 agreements.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Dealing with the matter last referred to by the leader of the opposition, may I say that the members of the wheat committee of the cabinet were aware of the negotiations that were going on, and they never requested the representatives of Canada to withdraw from the discussions, but the discussions never reached a point where the question arose as to whether they should be approved or not.

With respect to the time taken in the house, I think each one of us must beat his own breast and recognize his own part of the responsibility. I should like to remind the house that seven weeks of this session were taken by us in discussions of votes of no confidence, first on the address, then on the original motion to go into supply, and third, on the budget. I think that those three debates would have resulted in the same votes had they been very much shorter than they were. I am not casting blame on anyone; I am just pointing out that each one of us has his responsibility in that regard.

At this moment may I move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress and ask leave to sit again this day, so that I may have the privilege of moving that there be no intermission.

Progress reported.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved:

That the resolutions considered in committee of supply this day and reported be read the second time and concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR CONTINUOUS SITTING

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move that there be no intermission this day, notwithstanding standing order 6 or the terms of the resolution passed by the house on July 22, 1946, in relation thereto.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have no objection whatever to the motion, but most of us in this party will be unable to be here for the next hour.. However, we are leaving it in the hands of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and we shall be well represented. After the splendid address he gave this morning, I do not think he will occupy much more time.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand the motion is that there shall be no period for lunch or supper until we have finished? If that is what it means I do not think it is a good policy. While I am at lunch, perhaps some matter in which I am interested will be passed, and other members may be in the same position. I do not like the idea of not having a recess for lunch. I do not mind supper so much.

Mr. JAQUES: We still have a pretty heavy docket, and it is possible that even without any further discussion on this particular item the house will not finish to-day. On the other hand, we may get through earlier than we expect. In either event there would be an opportunity to discuss the particular item if the minister would consent to hold it over until, in one way or the other, it is settled. If the house adjourned to-night and carried on next week there would be no harm in discussing it then.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am in the hands of the house. I am prepared to stay here until Christmas and am ready to have any item stand at the request of any hon. member. If hon. members prefer to have External Affairs stand for the time being and deal with other items, that is agreeable to me. I am prepared to accept anything that will suit the convenience of hon. members.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I make a suggestion? The Acting Prime Minister has made a suggestion which I think the house might be disposed to accept. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin feels keenly on this subject and it is his right to speak if he wishes to do so. The Acting Prime Minister has suggested that we deal with other items and, if time remains, to give the item that stands further discussion, that can be done. Would that not be acceptable to the hon. member?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let item 41 stand. Item stands.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

LEGISLATION

House of Commons—

126. Estimates of the Sergeant-at-Arms, $346,107.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Who is responsible for these estimates?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: His Honour the Speaker.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How many temporary employees on the protective staff have been working on a full-time basis for more than three years?

Mr. SPEAKER: There are five who are temporary and will be kept on full time.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How many hours do the protective staff work; are they on eight-hour shifts?

Mr. SPEAKER: The protective staff works eight hours a day.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How long do they get off for lunch?

Mr. SPEAKER: They have an hour and a half.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): How long do the protective staff in the galleries work these days? Are they on from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night?

Mr. SPEAKER: My information is that they work for eight hours and from time to time they are allowed to leave the galleries for a rest.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): My information is that there are temporary members of the protective staff who are paid at the rate of $4 a day—I am excluding the cost of living bonus just now—and that they are on a temporary basis although they are employed the year round, which to my mind at least, unless there is a good reason for it, seems unfair. What is even more unfair, in my opinion, is the differential which exists between the rates of pay of the protective staff in the House of Commons and the protective staff in the Senate. What is the reason for that differential?

Mr. SPEAKER: There has been a little discussion about that matter in the house before. The hon. member will understand that I was appointed Speaker last September. We had a session which lasted until the middle of December, and we started again in March. As hon. members know, it is difficult for the Speaker to be on duty in the house from morning until night. I have not had much time to investigate and to see what improvements can be made in the house along that line. The House of Commons, in common with other departments, was obliged to take on temporary officers and employees to replace those who left the service of the house to join the forces. It has been the policy of the civil service commission not to appoint any new permanent employee; but the hon. member and the committee may be assured that the staff of the house are satisfied with their positions. Naturally they are nervous about their jobs because they are temporaries. That is only human. It is quite natural for them to wonder what is going to happen to them in the future. During the recess I hope that I shall have time, and I am sure I will, to look into these matters; we shall make recommendations to the civil service commission to make permanent those who should be permanent, and we shall find out if it is possible to give them an increase in salary.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I hope His Honour realizes that I am not criticizing or casting any reflection upon him in any way. I realize that he has scarcely had time yet to go into all these details. I am merely bringing these points to his attention so that, if there are any injustices, then these injustices can be rectified. It is unfair to have men who are employed all year round paid at the rate of $4 a day, even with the cost of living bonus. It is extraordinarily difficult for a man to bring up a family on that salary at the present time. We in this chamber should set a better example to the nation as a whole. I should like His Honour to consider putting on a permanent basis all these men who have been here for several years and who are still on a temporary basis, although employed the year round. I should like His Honour to consider increasing the salary of these men so that they would at least be paid the same as the officials of the Senate who work fewer hours. We get excellent service not only from the protective staff but from the messengers and from all others. I think we should pay more recognition to them. The most appropriate way for doing that is to ensure them that their living standards will be as high as possible.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): I have had an opportunity of bringing this matter to the attention of the Speaker from time to time. I am perfectly satisfied that he is working on the problem and that the staff of the house is being well treated and will be well treated in the future.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just add a word of agreement to what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. Perhaps it may be a help to His Honour to know that he has considerable backing of the House of Commons. I think His Honour will find that all through the house there is pretty general agreement that something should be done for these men because they are doing a magnificent job. We ought to support the representations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North in that connection, so that His Honour the Speaker will know he is not alone in his desire to see that these things are done.

Library of Parliament —
130. General administration, $88,391.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Has any progress been made in the matter of indexing the books in the library? Several hon. members have referred to the fact that it is difficult to find just what is contained in the library. We know it contains almost everything, but we do not know just what is available at any particular time or where it is. Has anything been done so far to implement a recommendation that an index be made of all the books in the library?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the remarks of the hon. member. He will understand that during the war the government decided that all money should be used for war purposes. Since the war is over, we have started to make some improvements in the library, such as lighting and so on. We hope that in the next few months many more improvements will be made. I approve the remarks which have been made during the session, and I shall be pleased if the government decides to give a national library to the country.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I make a suggestion to His Honour. If during the interim period he feels that he will perhaps have more time to deal with some of the urgent matters connected with his duties, may I suggest that he give consideration to the question of whether or not we have the best seating arrangement in the House of Commons from the point of view of carrying on our duties.

My second suggestion is that he watch carefully—and I caution him against this—the installation of loud speakers on each desk, because that would be about the worst thing that could happen in the House of Commons. In deciding on that, I trust His Honour will not overlook the fact that somehow or another there should be better acoustics. The press cannot hear what is going on. It may be a good thing for us perhaps that they do not always hear everything, but in any event the press particularly have a responsibility that is second to none in the country, because what they hear here they tell to millions of Canadians; therefore it is important that they hear what is going on in the house. Some acoustic change should be made, but we should not have more noise in the house which would come from loud speakers; we should have less noise, but that noise should be heard.

These two suggestions might properly be considered by His Honour. I think we are badly in need of reform in that direction.

The Senate—

746. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment to each member of the Senate who attended the first part of the present session which commenced on March 14, 1946, and ended on April 17, 1946, of an amount representing the actual transportation and living expenses of such member while on the journey between Ottawa and his place of residence, after the Easter adjournment of parliament on April 17, 1946, and on the return journey from his place of residence to Ottawa at the end of the recess which commenced on that date, or, in case any such member did not return to his place of residence during said recess, an amount equivalent to what would have been his travelling expenses if he had returned to his place of residence during the said recess, $5,000.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The language in which this item is expressed does not convey what was intended by treasury board when the estimate was prepared. This language was copied from a former statute. What was intended by treasury board was that the travelling expenses of members who returned to their constituencies during the Easter vacation would be reimbursed to them, or that if they did not return at that time, but did return on some other occasion, the expense of one trip would be reimbursed to them. The language as it stands at present appears to go beyond that.

I move:

That the explanation of item 746 in the estimates be amended by deleting all the words after the words "on that date" and substituting therefor the following, "at any other one time during the present session."

House of Commons—

750. To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment to each member of the House of Commons who attended the first part of the present session which commenced on March 14, 1946, and ended on April 17, 1946, of an amount representing the actual transportation and living expenses of such member while on the journey between Ottawa and his place of residence after the Easter adjournment of parliament on April 17, 1946, and on the return journey from his place of residence to Ottawa at the end of the recess which commenced on that date, or did not return to his place of residence during the said recess, an amount equivalent to what would have been his travelling expenses if he had returned to his place of residence during the said recess, $12,000.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The same amendment is required in this item. I move:

That the explanation of item 750 in the estimates be amended by deleting all the words after the words "on that date" and substituting therefor the following, "at any other one time during the present session."

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

934. Office of the special commissioner for defence projects in northwest Canada—further amount required, $1,673.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has this special commissioner anything to do with the arctic situation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: During the war there were United States forces located in Canada, carrying out some work in northwestern Canada. It was found necessary to ask them to comply with Canadian regulations. A special commissioner was appointed so that applications could be made to him instead of to Ottawa, for the purpose of saving time. He is still in control of joint operations in that part of Canada.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

803. Departmental administration—further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are the stamps to which I referred earlier to be sold, or will they be withdrawn? I wish I had studied them more closely before the matter was drawn to the attention of the minister on the earlier occasion because, not only is the plough a left-handed plough, but I find that the man driving the horse has undertaken to walk over the ploughed ground instead of over the sod.

Mr. McCANN: Although the hon. member may have travelled a great deal, perhaps this article from the Ottawa Journal of August 24 would be of interest to him:

Left-handed plows may be "strangers" to most of the members of the commons, but in at least one county in the United States they are 1,000 to one over right-handed plows.

Following the recent discussion in the house in which the appearance of a left-handed plow on the new Canadian issue of the eight-cent stamp was questioned, the philatelic division of the Post Office Department received a clipping from Missouri.

Dated O'Fallon, St. Charles County, Missouri, the letter declared that "out of 1,000 plows, not more than one is right-handed."

Mr. GRAYDON: I would say that we are still from Missouri.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administrative service—

693. Departmental administration—further amount required, $5,640.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the indulgence of the committee for about ten minutes; I promise I will not exceed that time. I want to refer to the sugar situation in Canada. On July 9 I made a speech on this matter; what I said at that time I should be quite willing to say again. I would point out to the committee and the country as a whole that all is not well as regards Canada's sugar supply. I urge my fellow Canadians not to be lulled into a false sense of security in respect to sugar. There have been things happening lately which have lulled people into a false sense of security and I urge Canadians to be on their guard.

On August 6 the Acting Minister of Finance made a statement to the house to the effect that conditions had improved in the sugar situation and it was possible to give the people an additional amount of sugar. He said, as reported on page 4346 of Hansard:

Although world sugar supplies remain below requirements, the worst appears to be over and a gradual improvement in the future is to be expected. The improvement to date has made it possible for the wartime prices and trade board to make an increase in rations to household consumers. . . .

I would point out to members of the committee that that statement requires to be considered in the light of figures which were issued two days later by the bureau of statistics. The figures of sugar on hand as of July 13 were as follows:

	Raw sugar	Refined sugar
	Pounds	Pounds	Total
1945 ...	144,806,728	94,667,906	239,474,634
1946 ...	115,047,793	119,467,906	234,515,699

As of July 13, 1946, we had 4,958,935 fewer pounds of sugar than we had in 1945. That is a serious comment on what the minister said and it is difficult to reconcile those figures with his remarks. What is the situation with respect to the world supply? It is quite as alarming. May I quote from an editorial by Wellington Jeffers, financial editor of the Globe and Mail, which appeared on July 18, 1946, as follows:

I mention the world at large because estimates for world output are that in 1946 production will be 7·3 million short tons less than in the average 1935-39 years, and 750,000 tons less than in 1945.

And again:

A million ton increase in the western hemisphere does not make up for the drop in wartorn Europe.

Figures to support Mr. Jeffers' remarks and what I have said are to be found in Lamborn Sugar Market Report, dispatch June 18, 1946, and in Willett and Gray's Weekly Statistical Sugar Trade Journal, dated after August 1. These two publications constitute the finest authority on the American continent, and they establish conclusively what I have said regarding the dangerous shortage which obtains in the world sugar situation. Beet sugar production in Canada is the lowest since 1923; I should like to quote again from what Mr. Jeffers said:

Sugar controllers this year, for beets at least, deserve a dunce's cap for permitting the lowest production since 1923.

The United States has done much to help her producers of beets and beet sugar; Canada, on the other hand has done much to hinder her producers of beets and beet sugar. There should be called immediately a conference of beet sugar producers and refiners. The whole matter should be talked over, and a group of incentives should be decided upon which would stimulate beet sugar production in Canada to the maximum capacity of the present plants; and also which would encourage the establishment of more beet sugar plants in Canada enough to make secure the sugar supply of Canada.

I am utterly amazed at the indifference which prevails in this house and in the Dominion of Canada with respect to the sugar supply. The way in which the sugar administrator in this country has been treating the sugar beet producers is absolutely extraordinary, as contrasted with the way in which such producers are treated in the United States and Great Britain.

Canadians are assuming that their sugar supply is safe. But we could have a dreadful emergency in which we could suffer painfully for the lack of sugar. I have done my best to bring to the attention of this house and of the people of Canada the genuinely dangerous position they are in with respect to sugar. I urge the government now to take such measures as will provide that such splendid factories as, for example, the two factories in Ontario, shall not be closed. One of them is closed, and the other one is in danger of closing. A few provisions by this government would remedy the situation. I urge, Mr. Chairman, that the government act before it is too late, before we shall have nothing left to do but groan about what we might have done with respect to the sugar supply of Canada.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

General—

739. To provide for expenses in connection with the royal commission investigating the disclosure of confidential information to agents of a foreign power, $37,000.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, the matter upon which I wish to speak is well worthy of discussion in this house for several days. I mention that to emphasize its importance inasmuch as what I have to say must now be said in five minutes or so.

I want to bring to the attention of the minister and of the committee a matter or two in connection with the royal commission known as the Taschereau-Kellock commission which I think affects directly the civil liberties of the Canadian people. I think we ought to know now, if we have not known before, whether that commission was appointed to inquire into the alleged espionage charges brought forward by Mr. Gouzenko, or whether it was a commission invested with the powers of a court to pass judgment. I need not waste the time of the committee by quoting the reference to the commission which I have here, but if hon. members will read it they will find no indication there that the commission had any powers to find judgments on the individuals whose comings and goings they might have found it necessary to investigate.

I find that in the case of Doctor Shugar—and in view of the limitation of time I am going to centre my attack particularly on this case—the commission practically did pass judgment before Doctor Shugar was even charged with any crime, and for some time Doctor Shugar was at a great disadvantage. He was discharged from his position, largely I believe on the report of that commission. That is one of the questions I should like the minister, if he can, to answer. Just what was the reason for the discharge of Doctor Shugar?

I have here a copy of a letter from the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare to Doctor Shugar, dated July 19, 1946, in which the deputy minister says:

> Your letter to Doctor Morrell of July 17, asking for reasons for the notice of termination of your employment with this department, has been referred to me for reply.
> This was considered necessary in view of the report of the royal commission, appointed under order in council P.C. 411, February 5, 1946.

Here is another letter that was addressed to Hon. Doctor McCann, Acting Minister of Health and Welfare, dated July 27, 1946, by the Ottawa branch of the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers:

> The executive of the Ottawa branch of the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers would like to bring to your attention the following statement concerning Doctor David Shugar, approved at a meeting of the branch on July 25:
>
> "The executive of the Ottawa branch of the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers condemns the dismissal of Doctor David Shugar by the Minister of Health and Welfare on the basis of the final report of the Taschereau-Kellock royal commission. Such a procedure is all the more remarkable since the commission's opinions concerning Doctor Shugar were not acceptable to the courts on a previous occasion; in fact, were insufficient even to warrant his committal for trial. This precedent constitutes a threat to the security of all civil servants.
> The executive does not presume to judge the innocence or guilt of Doctor Shugar, nor should the Minister. That is a matter for the courts to decide. Therefore, in view of the fact that no such decision has been made, the executive is of the opinion that the minister was not justified in taking action, and calls for the immediate reinstatement of Doctor Shugar."
> We trust that, since Doctor Shugar's dismissal becomes effective August 1, you will give this your immediate attention.

The Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare in reply uses the following words—I shall quote only the germane part of his letter:

> I may say that Doctor David Shugar was seconded to the Department of National Health and Welfare from the navy for a special assignment and, having completed that assignment, his services would have been dispensed with despite any other circumstances that have arisen in the meantime. I cannot see from this action that there is any threat to the security of any civil servant. I am not judging either the innocence or the guilt of Doctor Shugar any more than the executive of your association says they do not presume to do.

That is the point at issue. You will observe, Mr. Chairman, that there are two different reasons given for the dismissal of Doctor Shugar. I could go on and give the committee public statements which have been made, one made in this house by the minister of health, as well as statements reported in the news in the daily press dealing with Doctor Shugar's special work and that he was not really discharged because he had completed his job or because there was no more need for him, but that he was in fact discharged because of the report of the royal commission. It may be too late to do anything about the matter now in the case of Doctor Shugar and others who suffered, as they must have suffered, as a result of that report, especially when that report, when published, left the impression both on the public and on the court and jury that they were guilty. That was an injustice. The dismissal of a man even before he is charged cannot very well be justified. That is the protest in the interest of civil liberty which I desire to make. I want to add that this matter has outside and international implications which, had I the time, I should very much like to comment on.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Chairman,—

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BENTLEY: "Carried" will not help anybody, I can assure the hon. member although I intend to be brief. It was my intention to have made a statement at more length with reference to this matter, but in order to do so as other hon. members have done in this committee, I will forgo a great deal of what I had intended to say. But for a moment or two I want to take the opportunity to express my complete disapproval of the actions of the government, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Taschereau-Kellock commission for the way in which they have carried out these investigations. I am not the only one who feels that way. I had intended to read into the record three newspaper clippings expressing the opinions of three different people. The first is an article in the Ottawa Citizen of August 27, and is entitled, "Canada as the Cockpit." That in the main agrees with what I would have said to-day. The second one I would have read into the record is from the Citizen of August 24 of this year, and is a report of a meeting held at Geneva Park, Lake Couchiching, Ontario, on August 23, including a statement made by Mr. B. K. Sandwell, editor of Toronto Saturday Night, when he was addressing the Canadian Institute of Public Affairs. The third one is a long statement, which I would recommend anyone to read who can obtain it, and is taken from the Canadian Mining Reporter of August 23, 1946, and is headed, "Leslie Roberts Speaks His Mind." It is a cold-blooded and clear analysis of the performance which this commission, supported by the government and under government instructions, carried out during these spy trials.

I believe that a great deal of panic entered into the situation. The government's fear of communism or Soviet Russia or something else prompted it. But I submit that fear of anything is no excuse for the abrogation of the rights and fundamental liberties of individuals, and if we are to have the kind of country we would be pleased to have our new flag fly over, and be ready to stand up and face the rest of the world, as justly believing in our democratic institutions—which I do most emphatically and with great conviction and sincerity—we must prove to the people of this country and of other countries that our democracy provides those freedoms which we expect to have and to which we have a right.

I am going to give one quotation, the fourth I shall mention, from an article in the Reader's Digest, bearing on what I have just said and written by Mr. John Foster Dulles; it appears in the August issue, and the writer states this, on page 15, after dealing with a great many international affairs:

> No programme is fruitful if it is merely against someone or something. Successful programmes are those which are constructive and creative in their own right. What we need at this critical juncture is an affirmative demonstration that our society of freedom still has the qualities needed for survival. We must show that our free land is not spiritual lowland, easily submerged, but highland that, most of all, provides the spiritual, intellectual and economic conditions which all men want.

I commend that most sincerely to the perpetrators of this flagrant abuse of our Canadian customs and principles.

In conclusion—and this will be the final conclusion—I should like the government to give serious consideration to three matters which were mentioned by the hon. member for Cariboo. First, exonerate publicly those persons at present not acquitted by the commission's report but not formally charged in the courts; second, or properly charge them and give them the fundamental right to prove their innocence; and, third, take steps to see that those already tried and found guilty and at present undergoing punishment be treated in such a manner as to preserve their physical and mental health and maintain the pride of Canada in her democratic institutions and her claim to just treatment of all citizens.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Just one word. I do not want to provoke a debate at this time. I appreciate the views which have been expressed by the two hon. members. I shall merely repeat that in positions of responsibility there are frequently things which are very distasteful but which have to be done. All one can do is attempt to fulfil his duty and discharge the responsibility that is upon him, no matter how distasteful it may be.

The hon. member for Swift Current has said that there was apparently panic prompted by fear of communism or fear of Russia. There was no such panic and there was no fear of communism or fear of Russia, but there was fear of the apparent development in the public service of Canada of a loyalty to ideals other than Canadian ideals which would have been very detrimental to the national life of this country, and it was to search out that thing and rid the public service of Canada of it that the royal commission was established.

With respect to the quotation that nothing good comes from actions directed merely against something, I beg to differ, because I think much good will come from action directed against the spread of that mentality in the public service of our country.

Third, with reference to the recommendation of the hon. member that we consider exonerating those who have not been charged, or charge them, all those against whom there is in the report the suggestion that they have been guilty of conduct which would constitute offences will be charged before the courts and allowed a full opportunity to face the accusation and to disprove it if it is unfounded, unless it is found, by counsel selected by the department, that there are not sufficient grounds for even having a trial, and if that is found by counsel it will be published.

Mr. BENTLEY: Will they be exonerated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, if that does not imply as great exoneration as the report itself implies criticism, I do not know what other conclusion would be drawn from it. If the department, having employed counsel, gets the opinion from counsel that there is not enough to justify a trial, that advice is accepted by the department and its decision upon it made public, that should amount to an exoneration.

With respect to those who have been found guilty, hon. gentlemen may be assured that they are receiving the ordinary treatment that is accorded to all those who are unfortunately subject to detention in the penal institutions of the country. There should not be any impression that there is any animosity against individuals. There is detestation of what was revealed in the trials, but it is not directed against individuals; indeed, there is much sympathy felt for individuals because even the report shows that they were on a slippery path. I think one of the great advantages of the publicity given to the report has been to awaken the conscience of large multitudes in Canada to the realization that there are slippery paths which it is advisable to avoid.

I may say to the hon. member for Cariboo that at no time was Doctor Shugar a permanent employee. At one time the confidence of the minister responsible to this house for the conduct of the department was shaken, so far as Doctor Shugar was concerned, to the extent that he no longer wished to be responsible to parliament and did not wish to continue that person in his employ, and that is something which all of us have to face up to. I know of an interview between Doctor Shugar and the minister in which the attitude of Doctor Shugar was such that, even if there had been nothing else, his minister would probably not have considered retaining him in his employment. Doctor Shugar was perhaps convinced, because of the depth of his feeling in the matter, that what he was saying was so, but he stated there that the royal commissioners had deliberately falsified the evidence. I would not retain in the service of my department anyone who expressed to me the opinion that two of the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada had deliberately falsified evidence.

Mr. IRVINE: I must accept the minister's statement, but I would not leave the matter there if I had time, because there are other phases of the situation with which I should like to deal. I might say, however, that it could not but be prejudicial to the case of Doctor Shugar to have him discharged. However, we shall have to let that go now. As far as its international implications are concerned—and there are international implications—I would say that the evidence which we have against some of our own citizens, and which has sent some of them to gaol and may send others, was based upon the statements of a man who had been a traitor to his own country and whom we protected, and while protecting him we were endeavouring to punish people who were alleged to have committed similar offences in our own country. That is probably permissible in law, but it is not a very sound basis on which to build a case. I should like to get at some of the things that were quoted and were reported in the royal commission's report coming from the lips of Gouzenko, which not only had to do with individual cases but which have to do with Canada's international relationships, directly affecting ourselves and Russia. I can quote some of these, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee. However, may I ask the minister whether it would not be possible to have tabled the entire exchange between the Russian embassy here and the government with reference to this affair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All I can say is that the request will receive consideration. There will be no time to comply with it this session, but we shall have time to give it consideration before another session is convened.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

41. Departmental administration, $767,480.

Mr. JAQUES: It seems that we have disposed of the business that was before us a good deal more expeditiously than we had thought possible and it is not yet two o'clock. I should like to make this statement, and if I am not interrupted it will not take me very long.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member says that he wishes to make a statement, which he is about to read. I must remind him that under the rules he is not in order in reading from a written and previously prepared speech. Standing order 41, paragraph 293, forbids this, and I think the rule should be enforced.

Mr. JAQUES: Then I must say that, had that rule been complied with strictly, the house would have adjourned three or four months ago and perhaps sooner than that. The only reason I propose to stick to my notes closely is that I wish to expedite the business of the house. I can get through so much quicker; that is all. I find it an effort to speak anyway and, when I have to think as I go along, I am so much slower.

The CHAIRMAN: I recall distinctly Mr. Speaker directing the attention of hon. members on several occasions to the rule in this regard and I felt it my duty to remind the hon. gentleman of it.

Mr. JAQUES: I see the point, Mr. Chairman. I will merely stick closely to my notes. I speak as a member of this new committee on external affairs. When the committee started I was quite enthusiastic because I thought the opportunity would be seized to use the facilities of the committee in order that we might get first-hand information on the various international questions which are of so much importance at the present time. I thought we could call witnesses from both sides, and then, having heard both sides, we could make up our minds as to the truth. But that did not seem to meet with the approval of the committee until, toward the end of the proceedings, permission was requested by the zionists to bring witnesses before the committee to put their case about Palestine. That was agreed to, provided that the Arabs had a similar privilege afterwards. That was the only discussion we had during the sittings of the committee on external affairs, and since Palestine is the master key to an understanding of the international situation I should like to devote a few minutes to that subject, not so much to the actual conditions in Palestine itself as to the zionist-communist forces which seek world control. With regard to Palestine itself, of course there is a virtual state of war. There is also an insidious and persistent propaganda in favour of world government and a world police state. To-day speakers have apparently expressed approval of the present state of the people in the world, but I should like to quote from the oldest and perhaps the most respected Liberal paper of the old country, which is the weekly called Truth. This is what the editor has to say on world conditions at the present time:

> Over half the world to-day men are allowed to live only if their lives be deemed inoffensive to the gangs which have butchered their way to power. They are kept in complete slavery, fed on lies, their thoughts manipulated this way and that by puppet tyrants. Is this the reign of civilization, or is it the return to the barbarian, made terrible by his having learnt, down to the smallest detail, the meticulous organization of savagery as an instrument of power. Over most of the rest of the world, spread like a hideous gangrene, is an organized exploitation of human want, helplessness and misery so all embracing that entire nations are smothered by it, and entire bureaucracies and armies caught up by the opportunity of the times to oppress, plunder and defraud the scores of millions who have no defence and no rights.

This is a matter of vital importance to Canadians. Only this morning, since I have been sitting in the house, I received a pamphlet headed "Protest the British Terror in Palestine!" The article goes on to say:

> Palestine lies crushed under a regime of brutal terror for the last several weeks. Under the pretext of suppressing terrorism, the British labour government under the leadership of Attlee and Bevin have begun a campaign to wipe out the "Yishuv", in order to strengthen British imperialist domination over the peoples of Palestine and the near east. It is tragic to note, that since the crushing of Hitlerism, Great Britain, pretended friend of world Jewry, has been the first power to strike a heavy and shameful blow with the full force of her armed might against the Jewish people.
> The sudden raids of June 29, can only compare with the brutal anti-Jewish terror of the nazis in the various ghettos in Europe at the time of Hitler's domination.

I am not going to read any more of that, but the point I wish to make is that the pamphlet which my correspondent tells me is being circulated by the thousands in Montreal is issued by the Cartier council of the Labour Progressive party.

I do not want to be political; I am not speaking in a political sense and I do not wish to be taken as speaking in a political sense. I am speaking as a Canadian who wants to do what he can to preserve the freedoms which we possess at the present time. But I am bound to say this: The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) publicly has supported political zionism not only in Canada, but in the United States, thereby deliberately inflaming ill-formed American opinion against Great Britain. I have been in the United States during this session, and I have addressed meetings there. The propaganda inspired by zionism in the United States against the British is a terrible thing. Even after the David hotel outrage, the C.C.F. continue to denounce British policy in Palestine as anti-Semitic and elsewhere as imperialistic. Palestine threatens the peace of the world. If Great Britain resists zionist demands to seize control by force of arms, the Jews, the communists and fellow travellers will stir up anti-British feeling everywhere. On the other hand, unless Great Britain refuses further demands for unlimited Jewish entry into Palestine, the whole Moslem world may be driven within the orbit of Soviet Russia. That has been the aim of socialist-supported communist policy in Greece, Poland, Yugoslavia, Spain, Argentina, India, China; while everywhere the lying, blackmailing, smear-bund goes to work, labeling as anti-Semitic and fascist all opposition to this policy. And it all adds up, Teheran, Potsdam, Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks, in place of the Atlantic charter; Zionism, Palestine, Moscow, the Laskis, Baruchs and Morgenthaus, and the surrender of sovereignty; the spy ring, the smear-bund, the anti-defamation league, the Carlsons, Winchells, the Philpotts, Haltons, Dyson Carters, Raymond A. Davies and the rest of the red network. The communist Labour Progressive party, the C.C.F. and other fellow travellers all are—

Mr. MacINNIS: I hate to interrupt the hon. member in the enjoyment that he is now having in communing with himself, but when he refers to the C.C.F. as fellow travellers he has to withdraw the statement. Yesterday he said that the Liberal party was supported in the last election by the Labour Progressive party. If that is so, and I agree there are some grounds for it, and the Labour Progressive party did that in opposition to the C.C.F., how can the C.C.F. be a fellow traveller of the Labour Progressive party and at the same time be opposing the Labour Progressive party? The hon. gentleman should try to put a little sense in what he says.

Mr. JAQUES: At the beginning I said this was not political.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not the question.

Mr. JAQUES: I am stating only facts.

Mr. MacINNIS: When my hon. friend says he is stating only facts—

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. gentleman says that he is stating facts when he says I am a fellow traveller. As a member of the C.C.F. party I say to him that he is lying.

Mr. JAQUES: It depends on what you call a fellow traveller.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, of course.

Mr. JAQUES: My definition of a fellow traveller is this. When a man or a party continually supports the policy of another party, then I say that he or they are fellow travellers of that party.

Mr. MacINNIS: The C.C.F. has never at any time supported the communist party.

Mr. JAQUES: I will put it in this way: the communists and the C.C.F.'s support the same party.

Mr. MacINNIS: They do not.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, they do; they support the Liberal party.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member never said anything about the Progressive Conservative party.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Liberals and my hon. friend's party are in the same bed and cannot get out of it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. PROBE: He should be asked to withdraw.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are in the same bed.

Mr. JAQUES: Let me qualify my statement. Fellow travellers are not confined to the C.C.F.; they are over here; they are in the Conservative party, and I know we have some in our party. I am not including members of the house. Do not misunderstand me. I do not say that of members of the house. I emphasize that the communists have invaded every organization and every political party in this country and in every other country. If anybody doubts that, then I will say there were only twelve disciples and one of them was a Judas. However, all "fellow travellers" have consistently worked to undermine British prestige, authority and loyalty everywhere for the benefit of Wall street, Marx and Moscow.

But the truth is out.

An hon. MEMBER: Get on with the Jews.

Mr. JAQUES: And the less interruptions I have, the sooner I will get through. The truth is out. The white paper and note recently issued by the British government state that the zionist terrorist outrages leading up to the David hotel bombing were not the acts of a few fanatics, but the deliberate policy of the responsible Jewish agency. There I quote the British white paper. British opinion is turning.

Let me quote from News of the World, which claims to be a paper with the greatest circulation in the world, and it cannot be accused of being Tory, or anything of that kind. In its issue of July 28, it says this:

> The truth is out; the same truth that this paper has been printing for two years. A government white paper has demolished the popular editorial view that Zionist terrorism was the "misguided action of a few fanatics." It has proved the responsibility of a Zionist army, conscripted, trained and equipped by leaders of the Jewish agency.
> Their formal expression of regret after the outrage in Jerusalem was but a mockery of the men who were killed. The underlings are behind barbed wire; but, what of the bosses? . . .
> This paper can do no more than state once again the truth: Zionism is a political movement, and the leaders have as little compassion for the too-old-to-fight Jewish wrecks of Europe as concern for the Englishmen they kill. Their policy has had one—and only one—aim since Balfour was duped in 1917: the creation of a Palestinian Jewish state. No other country than Palestine was acceptable, for their state had to straddle the narrow bridge between east and west and be in a position to change at will the balance of power—in fact, to dominate the world.

A year ago the C.C.F. claimed that the victory of the British Labour party was a victory for the C.C.F. I am not denying that; I am not disputing that at all. But now they denounce the British foreign policy as anti-Semitic and imperialistic. Let me quote from the Montreal Gazette of July 24, 1946:

> Speaking to a large group of Montreal Jews recently Mr. Alistair Stewart, C.C.F. member for Winnipeg North said, "Many people think the British Labour party is allied with the C.C.F. party in Canada but that is not so. There may be some similarity as to certain points, but the C.C.F. could never ally itself with a government that had broken a promise such as that to the Jews in Palestine." Politics of this sort, he said, were not within the spirit of socialism.
> Urging the immediate entrance of 100,000 Jews into Palestine, Mr. Stewart ridiculed the idea that such immigration would lead to an Arab revolt.

Mr. McIVOR: I rise to a point of order. I can stand a lot of listening, for a long time. But I refuse now to listen to a speech that is being read. The hon. member must deliver his material without reading it.

Mr. JAQUES: I am reading a quotation from the Montreal Standard. But may I say this, that if members are willing to listen to one side of the story, why are they not willing to listen to the other side? We have heard the other side of this story, and it is about time this side was heard.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not mind if a man has something to say on a subject, and says it.

Mr. JAQUES: That is my job. That is up to me. The hon. member for Winnipeg North went on to say that he urged the immediate entry of 100,000 Jews into Palestine, and ridiculed the idea that such immigration could lead to an Arab revolt; the Arabs could never organize any resistance which could not be easily overcome.

But suppose the Arabs do revolt, and the revolt leads to a general uprising of the Moslem world, which it probably would do; what then? Will the hon. member for Winnipeg North, or will the C.C.F. leaders tell the Canadian people whom they would expect to put down the revolt? Would we expect Canadians to fight another war? If these zionists declare war on Great Britain, as they have threatened to do, will the C.C.F., or will the hon. member for Fort William, tell us whether Canada would support the zionists, or whether we would support the British? That is a nice question, and it is one which may have to be decided by the people of Canada before we are much older.

The real battle for the control of Palestine, the key to world control, will not be decided in the Holy land, but in the banks, presidential anti-rooms, and lobbies of parliament and congress. It is significant that two similar threats have been made against the British people by Wall street. The first threat was that, unless Bretton Woods proposals were accepted, there would be no United States loan. May I remind hon. members in the Conservative party that Viscount Bennett, as he is now known, voted against the Bretton Woods proposals when the vote was taken in the British House of Lords, and was supported by a number of Labour members.

The second threat was that, unless the gates of Palestine were opened wide in contravention of the Balfour declaration, there would be no United States loan. Both these threats come from the same source. Two great and friendly nations, the British and the American, are being goaded into friction over the recent financial arrangements, while the American people are being stirred up against the British people by zionist propaganda and hate. I am the personal witness of that propaganda in the United States. I am speaking to those people as much as I am to the people of Canada. That is the satanic intention of the hidden hand behind the scenes in all these arrangements. The essence of all international and financial policy is the centralization of power. Control of credit is the chosen instrument of the hidden hand for securing it. Such policy is the inversion of national and personal freedom.

Mussolini and Hitler are dead, and the war in Europe ended over a year ago. But the people of Europe are more hungry and more miserable than they were during the war. What is the reason? Famine can result from a lack of harvest or of transport; it can be imposed deliberately for political purposes. For political reasons German fertilizer plants which formerly supplied European farmers have been destroyed. No locomotives can be built in Germany until 1950. Stalin took the only food surplus area in Germany and now, as the socialist Daily Worker says, food is an international political weapon. You have only to see what has happened lately in connection with UNRRA.

Our political leaders have agreed to the uprooting of millions of peoples from their farms and homes who have been driven in midwinter like cattle across Europe to food importing areas. From Poland and other countries in eastern Europe millions of our former allies have been deported to Russia as slave labour. The orphaned children of these slaves, our wartime allies, are tubercular from starvation and hardship. We hear only of the sufferings of one people, the Jews. I am not saying for one moment that the Jews have not suffered; they have suffered, but millions of other people have suffered, and apparently we are not concerned with them in the least. They are suffering to-day as the result of policies agreed to at Potsdam and by other allied agreements.

We have told every individual in the industrial heart of Europe that for a generation, no matter how hard he works his standard of living cannot exceed the lowest in Europe. What incentive is there to work, to put their hearts into restoring their countries, when they are told it does not matter what they do, their standard of living cannot rise? It is something like our prisoners of war who are paid fifty cents a day. As I said this morning, I am not blaming the Minister of Labour, but is that an incentive to get work done? Do we want Europe to remain a ruin, or do we want to restore it as quickly as possible? Many people pride themselves upon being progressive, but it seems to me that the idea of many of them is to progress backward from the spirit of the New Testament to that of the Old Testament.

All the terrible convulsions and troubles and upheavals in the world are the result of aliens seeking to impose their atheistic, oriental collectivism upon national cultures of individualism. Their latest plan is to vest the exclusive monopoly of the atom bomb with a few men whose motives would remain hidden from the rest of mankind. These are to be known merely as the atomic development authority and would have the power to rule all nations and all peoples. According to the plan the basic proposal is the destruction of all atomic bombs, but what it really means is not the destruction but the disposal of the atomic bombs in accordance with the terms of some treaty yet to be concluded. ADA—atomic development authority—would use the bomb as its teeth. To me and to others this seems more dangerous than the atom bomb itself, more dangerous than either nazi Germany or communist Russia, because there would be no appeal from its decrees.

However, there are people who see through this latest threat of the hidden hand. There are those, and their numbers are growing—I might say that it seems to me that Field Marshal Montgomery is one of them, if I can judge from his remarks the other day—who think it would be far more terrible for only one power to control the bomb. They think the atom bomb should and will fit into the defence calculations and precautions as all other weapons have fitted. These people see more danger in the control of the bomb than in the bomb itself, and they believe that the greatest deterrent against the abuse of that atomic bomb control would be the knowledge that the intended victims also had the atomic bomb.

If we would win the peace, as we won the war, for freedom and justice; if we would escape the serfdom of an alien collectivism, we must do more than denounce its agents.

Do not make the mistake that the end of the spy ring is the end of this danger. That was merely a spot caused by the disease, and you cannot cure a disease by curing the spots.

If we value anything more than our freedom, we shall lose our freedom. Peace can be imposed, but it cannot be maintained by force. Christianity and communism or collectivism, or zionism if you like, cannot unite to form a world government. No man or group of men ever can possess the vitrue or the wisdom to govern the world. World government means world dictatorship. Only crooks demand and only the craven desire security at the price of freedom. Our only hope for peace with freedom must be based on Christian principles, in the words of the Atlantic charter, and these are the words of the late President Roosevelt and the then prime minister of Great Britain:

> That is no vision of a distant millennium. It is a definite basis for the kind of world attainable in our own time and generation. That kind of world is the antithesis of the order of tyranny which dictators seek to create. To that order of tyranny we oppose the greater conception—the moral order. Let our nations place their destiny in the hands and heads and hearts of millions of free men and women, and their faith in freedom under the guidance of God.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I want to take just one minute. All of us regret that greater opportunity could not be afforded for the discussion of international affairs. The subject was opened very ably by the hon. member for Peel. He made a speech which was creditable not only to himself but to this house and we would have liked to have followed him with our own views but opportunity does not permit. I regret that at this late hour when we cannot discuss the matter we should have had to finish with what I am going to call the dog's breakfast which we have just listened to. There is one point that I want to make in respect to that speech. The hon. gentleman regretted that the fertilizing factories in Germany had been shut down. That is a regrettable thing. I do not know whether I would be in order, sir, in making a motion that this parliament undertake to send the hon. gentleman's speech to Germany, where no doubt greater crops will come as a result.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I just wish to say a word as a result of the remarks of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. Like the other speakers, I appreciate very much the protests made by the hon. member for Peel, and I regret very much that we have not more time for this discussion of external affairs. I am firmly of the opinion that those who brand every progressive as communist and every innocent person with some old-fashioned ideas as fascist are not making any contribution to the development of this country or to the development of international peace.

Item agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Before I leave the chair, I want to take this opportunity of expressing my personal thanks to all the members of the house for the kindness and courtesy they have shown me while I have been presiding over this committee.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved:

> Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, the sums of $888,954,394.10, $142,644,296.99 and $2,000,000, respectively, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 393, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedule:

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the schedule I would ask my colleague to move the same amendments that were moved to resolutions 746 and 750. That is to delete ambiguous language and replace it by language providing that the expenses paid to an hon. member of either house would be for his journey to his residence at Easter or on any one other occasion.

Mr. HOWE: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these the only two amendments that were made from the beginning of the estimates to the end?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. I think the matter has been very carefully checked and the officials of the Department of Finance tell me that these are the only two amendments required to have the printed schedule conform with what has been agreed to by the house.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXPRESSION OF THANKS OF HOUSE LEADER TO MEMBERS, COMMITTEES AND STAFF

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the house until four o'clock I have to fulfil a promise I made to the leader of the house (Mr. Mackenzie) before he left last week, and that was to express his thanks and my own to all hon. members for the co-operation which has been extended to us in fulfilment of the generous declaration of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) before the Prime Minister left for his trip to Paris, that members would be disposed to be as helpful as possible in taking care of the business that would have to come before parliament. I do not think I can do better than communicate to the house the notes which the house leader left with me before he went away. He wished to say:

"With the indulgence of the house, always so courteously and generously given, I should like to make a few remarks before we prorogue.

"Outside the session of 1910, which was mainly engaged in acrimony"—I was not here then, so I take no part in that note—"this has been one of the longest sessions of the Commons of Canada." It has certainly been one of the most fruitful.

"I should like to utter a word of thanks in the first place to the leaders of the parties opposite, the leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the leader of the Social Credit group, for their spendid cooperation without any curtailment of their responsibilities of constructive criticism.

"I should like to thank the chief government whip, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), and his assistant, the hon. member for Compton, (Mr. Blanchette). Also the chief opposition whip, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman); the whip of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); and the whip of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). I should like also to thank the various provincial whips for their splendid cooperation.

"This year we have established a record in the number of committees of this house. There have been nine standing committees of the house, actively functioning. There have been six special committees of the house, who have all rendered great and devoted service. I should like to thank the chairman and the members of these committees for their assiduous and sustained attention to the work of parliament, and to congratulate them upon the results of their labours. I should like also to thank the staff of the Commons, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the messengers, and the boys who were so alert and aware in attending to our requests for papers and documents and the exchange of those friendly notes which make the work of parliament so pleasurable.

"Also, if I may, a word to these painstaking and patient and very efficient reporters of our debates, the staff of Hansard. I should like also to thank the clerks at the table for their unfailing courtesy.

"I should like at this time to say a word of thanks to Mr. Golding, the hon. member for Huron-Perth, for his devoted services as chairman of the committee of the whole, to which so much of his time has been devoted; and also, with the permission of the house, to thank the Deputy Speaker, whose benevolent neutrality has adorned his position.

"Last of all, Mr. Speaker",—I am reading from the leader's notes, but I know all hon. members would wish to be associated with it—"I should like to be permitted to convey to you, the thanks of this House of Commons for your gracious courtesy, for your splendid custody of the privileges of the house, and of the house itself, and for your unflagging industry in the high office which you adorn."

May I, without announcing any other business, now suggest that the sitting be suspended until 3.50 p.m. this day.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to join with the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his words of commendation of the officials of this house in their many different capacities. With respect to what he had to say concerning the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) who is not now with us, I might make one observation: we have appreciated the way in which he has carried on in the house, but if I might express a personal opinion I would say that when he is away and the Minister of Justice is leader of the house, we get along much better. That is not meant to be in any sense derogatory to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, but it is meant to be a compliment to the Minister of Justice.

I do not know that there is anything more that I can say now. The compliment I offered to the Acting Prime Minister was a sincere one. When the Prime Minister himself went away I undertook to do my best to keep the government in the straight and narrow path. In that we were only partly successful.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was straight, but not always narrow.

Mr. BRACKEN: We are going to keep on, and I am hopeful that the government will more and more continue to take our advice, and to the extent that they do we will still continue to try to keep them in office.

It has been a long session, and controversial in spots, but I would say that there is a better spirit between the members of our groups in the House of Commons to-day than there has been at any time since I have been a member. I am sure that this is a matter of gratification to all of us.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like on behalf of this group to associate myself with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has said. I doubt, however, his sincerity when he said he hoped that the government would always remain on the "straight and narrow", because even if he were sincere he is, I think, of the opinion that they won't, and that that will give him his chance some time.

I am glad that he mentioned the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who is Acting Prime Minister. I had it in mind to do that if he had not done so. The leading of this house is not an easy matter, and the Minister of Justice has discharged that function with so much ability, tact and fairness that I think he has impressed all of us; and that, particularly, as he is a relatively new man in the house. It takes years to understand Beauchesne's rules, and to have got such a good grasp in so short a time—

Mr. GRAYDON: It takes centuries.

Mr. MacINNIS: It takes centuries; I do not expect to live long enough to get beyond the first two or three pages, and those do not matter. I am glad to associate myself wholeheartedly on behalf of this group with what the leader of the opposition has said.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have noted on almost all occasions when words of felicitation are uttered in the house by the various groups that, by the time the government, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) have spoken, everything that can be said has been said and not much is left for this group to say on these matters. So all I will say at this time, Mr. Speaker, is that this group concurs most heartily in all the words of felicitation that have been spoken this afternoon.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, you and I have both been highly complimented. I presume you will allow me to say on your behalf as well as my own that we are both very grateful to the hon. members for the consideration they have shown us.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AIRCRAFTMAN LOWELL T. CAMPBELL—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED BY MR. BLACKMORE ON AUGUST 24

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, before you put the motion to adjourn may I table the answers to the questions which the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) addressed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) on August 24 last, concerning R.160165 Lowell T. Campbell, and appearing in Hansard of that date, pages 5321 to 5323 I have just obtained these answers and with the leave of the house I would like to have them put on Hansard without reading them. As the house will remember, the hon. member for Lethbridge addressed to the government thirty-one questions. The answers are quite extensive. By leave of the house I would like to table them and have them printed in Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. TUCKER: The questions were as follows:

1. Was Lowell T. Campbell, R160165, discharged from Shaughnessy hospital on August 6, 1946?

2. Was veteran Campbell's back in an iron brace to support an injured spine when he was discharged?

3. Had veteran Campbell been receiving $117 a month to support himself and five dependent children?

4. Had Lowell T. Campbell's wife been lost to him in February, 1945, leaving him under the necessity of placing his children in the homes of various relatives?

5. Would Lowell T. Campbell have been required to pay for each of those children, and was he required to pay $25 a month for board and lodgings and pay additional costs to cover clothing?

Hon. members will of course see the significance of question 5. We are trying to assess the adequacy of $117 which had been allowed Mr. Campbell.

6. Is each of these five children now between six and twelve years of age, therefore, requiring school supplies, in addition to the $25 per month for board and room, the cost of clothing, the cost of medical and dental care, et cetera?

7. Would the British Columbia welfare organization demand at least $30 a month per child, plus family allowances, if that organization were to assume charge of the children?

8. Would the cost of supporting his five children therefore constitute for veteran Campbell a monthly expense of at least $125 besides the family allowances?

9. Did the minister's department give effective thought to the question, how was veteran Campbell to get $125 a month out of $117 a month which the minister's department allowed him?

10. When veteran Campbell was discharged from Shaughnessy military hospital on August 6, was even the $117 a month cut off arbitrarily?

11. Was veteran Campbell discharged from Shaughnessy military hospital on August 6, with a cheque for approximately $20?

12. Would $16.70 of his cheque be apportioned to veteran Campbell's five children to support them and fit them up for school, leaving, of course, $3.30 to support veteran Campbell until with an iron brace on him to support an injured spine, he could take a job and receive his first pay cheque?

13. Did veteran Campbell on March 19, 1942, enlist as a member of the ground crew of the R.C.A.F.?

14. Was veteran Campbell at the time of his enlistment sound in physical health?

15. Was veteran Campbell sound economically on enlistment? That is, was he able to work at various jobs and support his family, and was he doing so—raising a family of young Canadians for future time?

16. Was veteran Campbell upon enlistment sound mentally and emotionally? I may say to the minister and to the committee that veteran Campbell has been lacerated because of certain remarks put on his file which would seem to reflect upon his intelligence and emotional stability. This has greatly aggravated the mental anguish under which this veteran now suffers, and that is the reason for the question.

17. Was veteran Campbell injured while on military duty?

18. Of the successive incidents which resulted in further development toward veteran Campbell's present state of partial physical incapacity were several the result of official decisions and actions taken by various men for whose official decisions and actions the government of Canada is directly responsible?

19. For example, was it a Canadian officer before whom veteran Campbell came on sick parade on the April morning following his injury?

20. Was it a Canadian officer who on May 5, 1942, told veteran Campbell that his back was normal, and that the injury was just a sprain, and that aircraftman Campbell could carry on with full duty?

21. Was it a Canadian officer who assigned aircraftman Campbell to work in hospital at No. 2 S.F.T.S., Uplands, Ottawa, where one of this aircraftman's duties was to wax floors?

22. Were they Canadian officers who, when aircraftman Campbell reported his condition to them, treated his reports lightly, asked him such questions as: "Where is the pain this morning?" in a partly flippant and ridiculing manner, and who treated him with physiotherapy by means of heat pads, while the aircraftman assured them that the pain was only intensified by the treatment?

23. Was it a Canadian officer who, after June 24, 1942, ordered that aircraftman Campbell be sent to Ottawa civic hospital where under the care of Doctor Young a body cast was applied to the aircraftman for four weeks, and later a body cast extending down the left leg to the ankle for eight weeks, and later more heat treatments were given?

24. Was it a Canadian officer upon whose orders aircraftman Campbell was then taken to the Daly building to Doctor J. P. S. Cathcart, psychiatrist, where he was questioned about his past life, his family and his father's family?

25. Was it through the remarks or hints of a Canadian officer that it was intimated to aircraftman Campbell by October 1, 1942 that the aircraftman would do well to seek his discharge?

26. Was it through orders of a Canadian officer that discharge papers were brought to aircraftman Campbell to sign, which papers the aircraftman refused to sign?

27. Was it through a Canadian officer's orders or hints that the padre, approximately the last of October, 1942, told aircraftman Campbell that he had been struck off strength, thereby causing aircraftman Campbell to ask for immediate discharge and to receive it on October 31, 1942?

28. Was it on order of a Canadian officer that aircraftman Campbell was transferred to Christie street hospital. from which aircraftman Campbell was discharged on December 21, 1942, and sent home to Alberta?

29. Was it on orders of a Canadian officer that Campbell was discharged from Belcher hospital, Calgary, on May 5, 1943? May I at this point observe, for the sake of hon. members who, I notice, are following my remarks closely, that it was clearly to be seen that the aircraftman was unable to do heavy physical work. And yet when he was discharged from Christie street hospital and sent home to Alberta he had no alternative but that of engaging in hard physical work such as ranching and other kinds of work he has been doing. The result was that, naturally, on account of his weakness, he became afflicted again and had to seek admission to Belcher Hospital. He was discharged from Belcher Hospital after a very few days. Of course by that hon. members can clearly see that someone representing the government needed to have his actions reviewed.

30. Was it on orders of a Canadian officer that Campbell, in his weakened condition, was denied allowances adequate to support himself and his family without going to work at heavy labour?

31. Was it through Canadian officers that Campbell was refused attention by Shaughnessy hospital when he applied for attention, (1) alone; (2) in company with the provincial president of the army and navy veterans in British Columbia, although later, after Campbell had consulted Doctor Frank Emmons, he was finally admitted to Shaughnessy hospital on January 16, 1945?

The answers are as follows:

1. Yes.
2. The Taylor Brace, which is the usual support worn for such back conditions as Mr. Campbell's, was supplied in February, 1946. Whether he was wearing this on his discharge from hospital is not known.
3. Immediately prior to discharge from hospital Mr. Campbell had been receiving hospital allowances in a total amount of $117 per month.
4. Statements by Mr. Campbell are available to the effect that his wife deserted him in December, 1942, and that a divorce was granted on February 5, 1945.
5. There is no official information but it appears that Mr. Campbell himself made arrangements to pay $25 a month for the care of each child and to supply necessary clothing.
6. The ages of Mr. Campbell's five children range from 5 to 12 years.
7. In a letter signed by Mr. Campbell dated January 29, 1946, the following appears: "I went to the Provincial Welfare and made enquiries about placing them in a foster home. I was told by Mr. Blanchard of the Provincial Welfare that it would cost $30 plus Family Allowance per child."
8. See answers to 5 and 7.
9. The maximum hospital allowances permissible under the regulations in Mr. Campbell's case are $117 as an in-patient or $132 as an out-patient.
10. Hospital allowances cease on discharge from treatment and consideration is given to the possible award of pension at once. See footnote.

11 and 12. On discharge from hospital, this veteran would have been paid part or all of the balance of hospital allowances standing to his credit at that time. A copy of the ledger sheet has been requested from the department's district office but has not yet been received.

13. Yes.
14. Yes, as far as may be determined from his own history and routine enlistment medical examination.
15. From information available on his R.C.A.F. documents there is nothing to indicate his economic state on enlistment. There is nothing in his interrogation or examination to show that he was unable to work at various jobs and support his family. He was supporting his family prior to enlistment by farming, according to his enlistment statement.
16. The question of being "sound mentally and emotionally" cannot be assessed, as a psychiatric record was not carried out at that time on entrance examinations.
17. Campbell was not injured on military duty in the sense of an accident. He states that, when doing physical training, he felt a "sudden snap" in his back.
18. The "successive incidents" referred to by Mr. Blackmore do not appear on R.C.A.F. files and are not understood.
19. Veteran Campbell reported in April at No. 1 Manning Depot, Toronto, to an R.C.A.F. Medical Officer.
20. There is no R.C.A.F. record that any Medical Officer told Campbell that his back was normal on May 5, 1942.
21. No record exists of Mr. Campbell being assigned to wax floors at No. 2 S.F.T.S. Hospital, Uplands, but, in accordance with common practice, patients in hospital, who are considered capable, are assigned to carry out certain duties. This is considered helpful to their recovery.
22. No record exists of any conversation between Mr. Campbell and the Medical Officer when on sick parade in 1942.
23. An R.C.A.F. Medical Officer had Campbell transferred from Uplands to the Ottawa Civic Hospital for further investigation and treatment June 25, 1942.
24. A Medical Officer of the Department of Pensions and National Health arranged this examination by Dr. Cathcart.
25. As consultations indicated that Mr. Campbell would not be of further service in the R.C.A.F., arrangements were made for a medical board in October with a view to discharge.
26. Mr. Campbell signed the usual form of medical board proceedings on October 19, 1942.
27. Following his medical board 19th October, 1942, a category of "unfit for further service" was approved. His discharge from the RCAF to the Department of Pensions and National Health was automatic following this.
28. He was transferred to Christie street hospital on instructions by a medical officer of the Department of Pensions and National Health.
29. He was discharged from Colonel Belcher hospital on instructions by a medical officer of the Department of Pensions and National Health.
30. Out-of-work allowances were paid following application by Mr. Campbell in January, 1943, and continued with the exception of a period of seventeen days until his re-admission to hospital in April, 1943.
31. Under the provisions of the order in council establishing the treatment regulations, Mr. Campbell was not eligible for further treatment under the Department of Veterans Affairs pending special authority by head office. Upon receipt of such authority he was promptly admitted to Shaughnessy hospital.

Note.—On February 9, 1945, the Canadian Pension Commission ruled that Mr. Campbell is entitled to pension for protruded intervertebral disc. Since the date of the ruling, Mr. Campbell has been continuously under treatment and in receipt of treatment allowances until August 6, 1946. On the day of his discharge from treatment, August 6, 1946, the district office forwarded a report for pension purposes indicating a disability of 100 per cent. The first pension cheque has already been issued.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house the sitting is suspended until ten minutes to four.

The house resumed at 3.50 p.m.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the second session of the twentieth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons:

A year has passed since hostilities ceased with the surrender of Japan. The world is but slowly emerging from the turmoil and ravages of war. The domestic problems of individual nations have become inseparably linked with the problems of all nations.

Of international problems, the world shortage of food has caused the greatest immediate concern. It is a source of gratification to the people of Canada to know that our country has provided over one-fifth of the supply of food to relieve the greatest famine in human history. The government has continued to give practical expression to the wholehearted desire of the Canadian people to relieve human suffering and to contribute to international tranquility.

My ministers are continuing their efforts to restore and expand peace-time markets for the surplus production of our country. In the period of transition, exports to our war-time allies have been financed in part by credits voted by parliament. In accordance with this policy, you have approved a financial agreement with the United Kingdom and made a further amendment to the Export Credit Insurance Act.

A bountiful crop, which will help in meeting the demand for food, now seems assured. An agreement has been made with the United Kingdom for the marketing of our wheat. The wheat agreement, with agreements for the marketing of other foodstuffs already in operation, will greatly assist the government in its policy of maintaining stable prices for agricultural products.

The demand, both at home and abroad, for Canadian manufactures has never been greater. Production at a high level is required both to meet this demand and to check inflationary pressure on prices.

The war-time battle against inflation has been continued with substantial success through the period of transition. Despite gradual measures of decontrol, and a shift to a selective price ceiling, the rise of prices has been held well in check. To this end, a most important step was the restoration of exchange parity with the United States dollar.

The conversion of our war industries to peace-time production has been achieved more smoothly and speedily and with less dislocation than might have been expected. Opportunities for employment have been maintained at a high level and the transfer to civilian occupations of displaced war workers and demobilized veterans is being accomplished swiftly and effectively.

In recent weeks essential production has been slowed down, and the dangers of inflation increased, by stoppages of work in certain key industries. My ministers endorse the view of the standing committee on industrial relations that continued price control is only possible with a reasonable measure of wage control. The government is firmly convinced that the exercise of moderation and restraint by all parties is essential to the satisfactory adjustment of labour disputes and the maintenance of the high level of production without which there cannot be ample opportunities for employment.

The repatriation of the armed forces is now virtually completed. It is anticipated that the wives and children of veterans will almost all have been brought to Canada by the close of the present year. The demobilization of the wartime army, navy and air force is likewise practically accomplished. Foundations have been laid for the permanent peace-time defence forces.

A series of measures relating to war veterans has been enacted, with the object of making provision for the veterans, and for the dependents of the fallen, worthy of the service and sacrifice of Canada's armed forces.

In Canada, as in other countries, the housing shortage has grown more acute since the end of the war, despite the provision of a large supply of new housing. In order to increase the efficiency of governmental action, the responsibility for housing has been largely concentrated in one minister of the crown. The National Housing Act has been amended to expand facilities for the provision of housing.

The British North America Act has been amended by the United Kingdom parliament in accordance with the request contained in a joint address adopted by both houses of parliament. The amendment will have the effect of maintaining more effectively the historic principle of representation by population, in the representation of the people in the House of Commons.

You have enacted a measure to clarify and define Canadian citizenship and to make it the distinctive status of the people of this country. The Immigration Act has also been amended to bring it into conformity with the revised definition of Canadian citizenship.

Other bills enacted include measures respecting the armed forces, the development and control of atomic energy, the National Research Council, the Department of External Affairs, the operation of crown companies, the Exchequer Court, the remuneration of judges, the investigation of combines, foreign exchange control, unemployment insurance, war crimes and the Federal District Commission.

The dominion-provincial conference resumed its meetings on April 25, and adjourned on May 3. The conference not having reached unanimous agreement, proposals in respect to taxation were subsequently made which could be accepted by the provinces individually. These proposals have been accepted in principle by three provincial governments. Preliminary discussions are under way with certain other provinces. It is hoped that ultimately general agreement embracing all the provinces may be concluded.

Your approval has been given to the membership of Canada in the world health organization and in the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization. Canada has continued to give the utmost support to the various agencies of the united nations.

Early in the session, the Prime Minister visited the United Kingdom to join in consultations on matters of common concern with the Prime Ministers or their representatives of other nations of the British commonwealth.

Canada is represented at the conference convoked to consider the treaties of peace with Italy and the axis satellites of southern and eastern Europe which opened its proceedings in Paris on July 29, by a delegation presided over, at the outset, by the Prime Minister.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for all essential services.

The further measures of relief from the wartime burden of taxation to be effected at the beginning of the new year will be cordially welcomed.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence bless your deliberations and guide the nations in the establishment of a just and durable peace.

This concluded the second session of the twentieth parliament.
