PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIN—WINNING OF GREY CUP BY OTTAWA ROUGH RIDERS

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege touching an event of national significance which took place over the weekend and had its beginnings in my constituency of Ottawa Centre.

The Grey Cup festivities continue to be the athletic event that contributes most to national unity. I should like the House to join with me in congratulating the players, the fans and the Ottawa Football Club upon the Rough Riders' victory Sunday afternoon in the Grey Cup classic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: To the fans in Edmonton I suggest that if the hon. member for Edmonton Centre was still playing for the Edmonton Eskimos the fortunes of that team might have been different.

I believe the House might also wish to extend congratulations to the hon. member for Halifax, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), upon the victory of St. Mary's University in Saturday afternoon's college bowl game.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the hon. member in extending congratulations to the Ottawa Rough Riders and I thank him for his reference to St. Mary's. I did not feel it necessary to rise to call attention to the victory of St. Mary's team because we maritimers take national victories for granted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LEADERSHIP OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO FORTHCOMING LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Walter Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to ask leave of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the leadership of the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference.

This conference will be of historic importance to Canada since it directly concerns our marine resources on our continental shelves and the protection of our marine ecology on our Atlantic, Pacific and Arctic coasts. It is essential to the national interest that Canada's negotiating team be led by a minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. He is now making a speech, an argument, in support of the proposed motion under Standing Order 43. I suggest we should not follow this procedure and I invite him to indicate to the House the terms of his motion.

Mr. Carter: I was about to do so, Mr. Speaker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House recommend that the head of the Canadian delegation to the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference be a minister other than the present appointee, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who, on his recent trip to the U.S.S.R., was criticized there for presuming to meddle in the domestic affairs of that nation.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether a motion put in those terms should be submitted to the House. It is not a motion, it is an argument, and in my view it is contrary to the spirit of Standing Order 43 as it has been observed in the House. In any event, I will put the motion pro forma. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LOGO FOR CANADIAN-OWNED CORPORATIONS

Question No. 2,177—Mr. Blenkarn:

1. In the light of letters received from the Office of the Prime Minister by Mr. Michael J. Houlton of Can-Ad Promotions Limited dated April 5, 1971, April 25, 1972 and April 5, 1973, is the government prepared to reconsider the answer to Question No. 1,891 on page 3563 of Hansard of May 9, 1973, that they have had no application for financial assistance from Mr. Michael J. Houlton of Can-Ad Promotions Limited to promote Canadian-owned companies?

2. Is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce prepared to acknowledge applications received from Mr. Michael J. Houlton of Can-Ad Promotions Limited for financial assistance in promoting Canadian-owned companies?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Prime Minister and Privy Council offices are concerned: 1. In early April of 1971, Mr. Michael J. Houlton delivered to the Prime Minister's office a proposal by Can-Ad Promotions Limited for a logo for Canadian-owned corporations. The proposal was acknowledged in writing on April 5, 1971, with advice to the effect that it was being forwarded to the Minister responsible for Information Canada. Mr. Houlton answered the acknowledgment on April 8, 1971, indicating his appreciation for the action taken. Mr. Houlton wrote again to the Prime Minister on April 15, 1972, seeking assistance for his proposal. That letter was answered by the Prime Minister's Office on April 25, suggesting to Mr. Houlton that he might wish to seek financial assistance from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Mr. Houlton wrote a further letter to the Prime Minister on March 26, 1973, seeking assistance for his proposal by way of a $50,000 loan from the federal government. The April 5 reply to his letter informed Mr. Houlton that the Prime Minister's office does not administer government programs and that any request for loans or grants should be directed to the appropriate department. Mr. Houlton addressed a communiqué to the Prime Minister on April 16, 1973, on behalf of the Governor General. The Administrative Assistant to the Governor General had written to Mr. Houlton earlier, on April 12, advising him that His Excellency had not given permission for such use of his name.

In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 2. No application has been received from Michael J. Houlton of Can-Ad Promotions Limited.

REGULATION FOR DISPLAYING PORTRAIT OF HER MAJESTY, THE QUEEN

Question No. 2,179—Mr. Dinsdale:

What is the regulation for displaying the portrait of Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada, in (a) federal courts (b) post offices (c) other federal buildings?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): The Department of the Secretary of State has no record of a regulation for displaying the portrait of Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada.

PRODUCTION OF MALTING BARLEY

Question No. 2,409—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. Do the malting barley producers contribute to the costs incurred by the Canadian Wheat Board in the same way as do the feed barley producers?

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

2. Does the government provide the malting barley producing farmer with incentives to ship his produce by modes of transportation other than rail shipment, for example, by truck?

3. What are the numbers of bushels of malting barley shipped per year?

4. Has the government considered the separate pooling of malting barley, for example, in the same way as is Durum wheat?

5. Has the government considered the possibility of creating effective incentives towards the establishment of malting facilities in the Western provinces where the product is produced?

6. If the government considers these incentives to be uneconomical, has it considered altering the present regulations and freight charges in order that the farmers producing malting barley not be penalized for their eastern shipments?

7. What is the present premium paid by the Canadian Wheat Board to the farmer who produces malting barley?

8. What level of malting barley production and what degree of competitive status does the government want the malting barley industry to achieve?

9. Is the present premium paid to the malting barley farmer by the Canadian Wheat Board an adequate level of incentive to attain this degree of production and competitiveness or does it believe that perhaps this should be increased to approximately 25 cents per bushel?

10. (a) How much No. 1 and No. 2 Feed Barley was eligible for malting (b) how many bushels of this barley were actually sold by the Canadian Wheat Board to the malting companies?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. Yes.

2. No. It should be noted that the malthouses located in the Canadian Wheat Board designated area do not have truck unloading facilities.

3. 39,380,526.5 bushels of barley were shipped during the 1972-73 crop year under selected barley permits issued by the Canadian Wheat Board. A relatively small percentage of this quantity would be for pot or pearling purposes.

4. The government has considered the concept of separate pooling for certain types of wheat, oats and barley, including malting barley. Durum forms part of the wheat pool account but because durum is a recognizable variety, it has its own grade structure enabling its market returns to be reflected in its final payments. The suitability of barley for malting is not a grading factor.

5. Incentives for the modernization, expansion or establishment of malting facilities in the western provinces are available under the Regional Development Incentives Act and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act. It should be noted that grants have been authorized under the regional development program for two such facilities.

6. Incentives referred to in 5 are authorized where it is felt they are needed to induce entrepreneurs to modernize, expand or establish viable facilities and in this way contribute to the economic development and social adjustment of the regions designated for assistance.

7. A premium of 15 cents per bushel is paid to the delivering producer.

8. The government supports the achievement by the malting industry of the maximum possible level of production and competitiveness.

9. The present premium of 15 cents per bushel would seem to be an adequate level of incentive for the grower as maltsters have been able to obtain their required supplies of malting barley at this level of premium.

10. (a) It is not known how many samples of barley, submitted by growers to maltsters, graded No. 1 and No. 2 Feed and were considered acceptable for malting or what quantities of on-farm barley these samples represented. (b) The Canadian Wheat Board's selected barley permit records are not maintained in a manner that would enable a quantity breakdown by grades.

*RIGHTS OF NATIVE PEOPLE TO FISH IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 3,039—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

What is the position of the government concerning the rights of native people to fish for food in British Columbia?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows. The government has not restricted the rights of status Indians to fish for food in British Columbia waters except as required for conservation. Escapement through the commercial fishery is calculated to permit adequate spawning returns and also to provide for the needs of the Indians that historically have fished the runs for food. Open periods for the food fishery are established as requested by the Indians wherever possible. In the case where Indians are commercial fishermen, food fishing is permitted with commercial gear during certain periods when the commercial fishery is closed.

PROVINCIAL EGG MARKETING BOARDS AND CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY

Question No. 3,078—Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra):

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No eggs have been destroyed. (Destroyed being interpreted as junked, put in garbage, etc., and lost for human consumption.)

2. (a) Provincial Egg Marketing Boards, (each of the 10 provinces has such a Board) had total control of egg marketing in their provinces prior to early June when the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency began to function in the area of surplus removal. The exception was British Columbia which withheld participation in the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency until October 29. Thus, the records requested for British Columbia, and for the other provinces from the period January to May inclusive, are held within the provincial board offices. (b) Records of Canadian Egg Marketing Agency operations, June to September inclusive, show that no eggs were sold from the provinces of Alberta, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland. Sales of surplus eggs to industrial users from Saskatchewan totalled 90,255 dozen and from Manitoba 4,833,810 dozen. Sales from Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia were respectively 3,965,065, 1,037,062 and 478,920 dozen. The prices of these sales varied over the months and depended on the grade of egg involved, whether small, medium, large or extra large size. The range in prices was from 29 to 65 cents per dozen.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning question No. 3026 which sought information about the number of professional athletes receiving unemployment insurance benefits and the amount of benefits paid. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, replied to the question recently, stating that the Unemployment Insurance Commission does not maintain statistics that would make it possible to answer the question.

That reply is not accurate. The question could have been answered wholly or at least in part. I do not want to say that the parliamentary secretary or the minister responsible was trying to mislead the House, but it appears that neither gentleman is familiar with the workings of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I am told that there is a separate code kept for professional athletes, the code number being 3373. I am further informed it would be simply a matter of writing up a program for the computer, feeding it to the computer and a print-out with the information would be made available.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister whether he would like to withdraw the previous answer and reconsider providing a correct answer, with unanimous consent, if that is necessary.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I too rise on a point of order. Again I should like to request that questions I put on the order paper on April 18, namely Nos. 1986, 1989, 1991 and 1993, be answered. As I pointed out before, these questions deal with the expenditure of public funds. I feel there is no reason for such a time delay as has taken place in answering these questions.

ENERGY

EAST COAST OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS RESOURCES—INCLUSION OF QUEBEC IN AGREEMENT BEING SOUGHT—APPLICATION TO OTHER PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of his remarks on energy last Thursday evening when he referred, to quote him, to "the question of an agreement with the Atlantic provinces on offshore development". His previous references have always included the province of Quebec as well as the Atlantic provinces. Was it simply an oversight that the Prime Minister did not include Quebec along with the Atlantic provinces in his remarks on Thursday when he referred to an agreement, or is an agreement now being sought separately with the Atlantic provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The agreement we would hope to reach would, of course, be applicable to all of Canada because all provinces except two do have some seacoast. It is a matter of knowing how we would reach such an agreement. In the last couple of years we have been working with the five easternmost provinces, Quebec plus the Atlantic provinces, and it would be our hope to continue to work in that direction. I certainly did not want to convey any contrary impression by my statement on Thursday. I think it may be known that one province, which is not Quebec, may not want to be part of the group of five, but I really should not be speaking for them. Our desire at the federal level is to reach an agreement with the entire five.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the obvious significance of offshore development of probable petroleum resources, can the Prime Minister give us an indication as to his timetable in respect of the resolution of this matter leading to an agreement on offshore mineral and petroleum rights?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, say what the timetable is because this involves the five provincial governments. Our desire would have been to solve this a year ago, and last summer I thought we had come very close to doing so when we reached agreement that we should not spend too much time arguing about the constitutional question of ownership but should address ourselves to the problems of administration and division of the proceeds. The discussions did proceed from a year and a half ago until a point last spring when we put before the provinces a scheme we thought would have their agreement for solving this difficult problem. However, I am told that one of the provinces did not want to go along with the others, and I think at this stage they are trying to work it out among themselves. I have had some correspondence in the last two months with some of the five easternmost provinces, and I have asked them quite bluntly: Do you want to negotiate as a group or do you want to go it alone, because we want to proceed with this thing? I am waiting for their answer.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the Prime Minister's answer to my first question that the government was seeking an agreement with virtually all the provinces, although discussions were active with the five eastern provinces, am I to assume that an agreement between the government of Canada and Quebec and the four Atlantic provinces would still involve further discussions with other provinces such as British Columbia before any settlement could be considered final?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, depending on the nature of the agreement we would reach, it might vary, but I think it would be fair to say that generally our position is that we will want to discuss this with all the provinces. The Leader of the Opposition will remember that in the fall of 1969 the position we put to all the provinces was that we wanted to reach a settlement out of court by political discussion and arrangement. That is still our desired position. When we found that our 1969 proposition was not making enough progress—some provinces had accepted it but certainly nothing like a majority—we accepted to deal with the five Atlantic provinces, the idea being that the case of British Columbia had already been settled in the courts. After that settlement, both Mr. Pearson and myself said that we were still prepared to seek a political arrangement and not just act on the Supreme Court decision. This is still our position, but we are certainly not giving a priority now to discussions with British Columbia as the courts have already settled the law in that case. Such is not the situation, of course, with the easternmost provinces.

Mr. Forrestall: What about the 50 per cent?

Mr. Trudeau: Do you have a problem?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At this point may I remind hon. members that we have only a 20-minute question period today pursuant to an order of the House. That being so, we should use the 20 minutes for questions and answers as much as possible. I will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain for a supplementary question, but we should try for the remaining time to have as few supplementary questions as possible.

OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS RESOURCES—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES—NECESSITY OF AMENDING CERTAIN PROVINCIAL BOUNDARIES ACTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Does the federal government offer to the provinces in these negotiations include an amendment to the Quebec Boundaries Act, the Ontario Boundaries Act and the Manitoba Boundaries Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. That aspect of the problem has been set aside. As I said a moment ago, we have agreed with the easternmost provinces to set aside the question of boundaries, jurisdiction and sovereignty over certain offshore areas of the country. We are now discussing the problem of administration and division of the proceeds.

HOUSING

MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION IN 1974—POSITION OF POLICY PLANNING DIVISION, CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the report made last Friday by the President of the Housing and Urban Development Association that housing starts will fall and prices rise further in 1974, can the minister tell us what his department is doing now to head off the anticipated housing crisis next year exceeding the one we have this year?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our predictions are still that we will exceed our medium term target for housing and that housing next year, 1974, will exceed 250,000 units per year. In addition, we are endeavouring and I am endeavouring to ensure that the provisions of the National Housing Act and the programs provided by it are used to the absolute maximum to provide social housing for those who are least able to afford housing.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact it is the 250,000 figure that is too low, in view of the anticipated demand, and in view specifically of the forecast increase in family formations next year, following the baby boom right through the cycle that began some 25 years ago, there is going to be a slack. There is going to be an absence of construction compared with the demand. My question relates also to the report last Friday that starts in apartment construction are going to fall off and we will see not only a drop in single family units—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Broadbent: It is important to get it clear for the minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of this slack, what does the minister plan to do now to increase production beyond the 250,000 unit level?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the National Housing Act is primarily concerned with social housing for those who can least afford housing. Thus we are pressing forward as hard as we can to ensure that those people who can benefit from the social housing programs under the National Housing Act have housing available to them. The rate of construction next year will certainly exceed the rate of family formations in this country, and has for some years.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the minister inform the House whether, following the dismissal recently of Mr. Rudnicki, CMHC has now followed this up by abolishing the policy planning division of CMHC, and can he also inform the House whether or not a senior planning officer concerned specifically with native peoples' housing has resigned as of last week?

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question is not correct. There is, as has been going on for some 18 months, a reorganization study within the organization and any reorganization that takes place will always maintain a strong policy planning concept development agency. As to the second part of the question, I have not been so informed.

SHIPBUILDING

SUBSIDIES TO DAVIE SHIPBUILDING, LAUZON TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the great number of lay-offs in the Lauzon shipyards, could the minister say to the House whether grants awarded by his department to that firm for shipbuilding which he mentioned in the House a couple of weeks ago, will allow additional jobs during the winter?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think that the shipbuilding program and the shipbuilding temporary assistance provisions are working very well and, indeed, have helped to put the Canadian shipbuilding industry on a world competitive basis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore. Order, please. This is becoming too confusing.

[Translation]

I think that the hon. member for Bellechasse who was waiting for the simultaneous translation of the minister's answer could ask a supplementary question, followed by the hon. member for South Shore who wishes to ask a supplementary question on this afternoon's first question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You have understood well my hesitation, for I was indeed waiting for the interpretation.

My supplementary question is the following. I understand that the department's policy has helped maintained Lauzon shipyards in operation, but I would ask the minister, when grants are given to this corporation, if certain conditions are imposed so that the company continues operating, mainly during periods in which the government goes all out to maintain employment at the highest level.

I would appreciate more details in this regard.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Perhaps I could clarify it by saying that assistance to the shipyards is not so much in the form of grants as it is in the form of a subsidy to the shipbuilding firms in seeking and getting foreign business as well as domestic business. That is one level, 17.5 per cent. The second assistance that the federal government provides is through the Export Development Corporation with respect to the financing of the purchase once it is made by a foreign buyer.

EAST COAST OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS RESOURCES—FEDERAL POSITION ON DIVISION OF ROYALTIES WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister's reply to my leader indicate that he is now dropping his claim to 50 per cent of the royalties on offshore gas and oil development which he has stated would accrue to the federal government and only 5 per cent would accrue to each province and, if so, what new formula is he now putting forward to which he now hopes the provinces of Atlantic Canada will agree?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations are proceeding in a way which we hope that the government of Canada, speaking for all the people of Canada, will get what we expect is a fair share of these proceeds in view of the fact the courts have held, at least on the west coast, that these offshore hypothetical products would be under Canadian federal jurisdiction. This is the position we are taking. As to the exact percentage, I think the House will understand if I do not reply to that aspect of the question. It is a matter of negotiation and I would not want to state any figure which would put the federal government in a worse position than it would otherwise be in bargaining.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary question, but there are less than five minutes before the end of the question period and we are still on the first question.

EAST COAST OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER'S REQUEST FOR FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN PIPELINE TO MOVE SABLE ISLAND OIL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, it is half past six according to the clock, and I recognize your difficulty. I wonder if I might direct a supplementary question past the distinguished member for Winnipeg North Centre to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is there a substantial foundation on which the premier of Nova Scotia is basing his call and plea to the federal authority for participation in the development of a pipeline from Sable Island to the mainland or to a collection point for the collection of oil for the purpose of distribution to refineries for processing and subsequent distribution?

● (1430)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, one of the options for further supply in the supply shortfall situation in eastern Canada had been to consider the early possibility of bringing the east coast fields into production. That has been studied by my department.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I remind the hon. member that my difficulty is not that it is six-thirty according to the clock but that we have a 20-minute question period today. That is not my difficulty but that of hon. members.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The province of Nova Scotia through its distinguished premier has indicated to the people of that province a real desire to involve the federal authority in a multimillion dollar project on the basis of information the federal minister is not prepared to discuss. My question of privilege is simply that either the premier of the province of Nova Scotia or the minister responsible for energy in this parliament is deliberately misleading the people of Atlantic Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Forrestall: Now, hold on. There is a section I can quote with respect to the right of a member to be heard in this chamber. I do not very often have recourse to that. Our hopes have been so raised by half information, half truths and partial stories that we can no longer, as residents of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick and P.E.I., continue to have this question unanswered. What I am asking the minister to do is to have some concern for these high hopes and expectations. If they are justified, let him say so. If they are not, I am asking him to caution our people not to raise their hopes when they cannot be realized. I am asking him to answer the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Forrestall: —does the premier of Nova Scotia—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES FOR DELIVERY OF ALBERTA COAL TO CENTRAL CANADA—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON STUDY

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. To ensure that there are no artificial obstacles to energy supply, has the minister sought from his colleague, the Minister of Transport, a report on the apparent substantial over charging by the railways on the delivery of Alberta coal to central Canadian markets? If he has received that report, can he tell the House what the facts are in that case?

Mr. Gillespie: Was that to me?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Whoever has an answer.

Oral Questions

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have been studying with the interested provinces the possibility of bringing Rocky Mountain coal to the consuming centres of central Canada. At the moment the figures on that are under careful study. We have also been studying other means of bringing it east, such as a coal slurry in crude oil.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO ASSIST CHILEAN REFUGEES WISHING TO COME TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps I might be permitted to preface it by saying I am glad to see him back in the House after his trip.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, a week ago last Friday the minister told the House that teams were being sent to Santiago, Panama and Honduras for the purpose of examining the question of Chilean and other refugees from Chile and their admission to Canada. Can the minister now tell the House what report he has received from these teams and what steps are being taken to carry out his undertaking, given then and previously, to deal with these refugees in the same humanitarian manner as refugees from Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Uganda were previously dealt with?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the team that went to Chile, Panama and Honduras has now made a preliminary report by cable. The team itself, or at least the head of the team, Mr. Geoff Pearson, is returning to Canada tonight, and the reports that they are making will be considered this week by the cabinet.

Mr. Brewin: Will the minister report to the House after he has received these messages from Mr. Pearson and the others?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

WILDLIFE

ACTION TO PRESERVE POLAR BEARS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, time is of the essence in connection with the question I am about to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It has to do with the survival of some of our most wonderful animals in the north. The United States Congress has given approval to do everything it can to assure survival of these animals which face extinction unless action is taken. I may say that this matter was raised earlier by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre but nothing complete came from the discussions regarding polar bears. From all over this nation members are receiving letters, and fears are being expressed concerning the future of these animals, the most wonderful animals of the north. Will the minister advise what action is being taken and, in particular whether any arrangements have been made with the armed forces to assure transportation of these animals into the far north whenever they come down into areas that are inhabited?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can assure hon. members that there is no danger for the polar bear in Canada. I am informed there are approximately 10,000 polar bears in the north and they are closely supervised by the Wildlife Service of Canada. The Wildlife Service permits the Eskimo people to kill a quota of about 400 polar bears per winter. Everything is under control. I am satisfied at this moment that there is absolutely no danger of extinction for that great animal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not the view of those who understand the problem thoroughly. Although, I do not belong to that group and I never, in all the hunting I have done, killed any Canadian animal.

Mr. Trudeau: Just fish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Except Grits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: They do not require protection, but we would under the game laws if they had the power to deny it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister to look further into this matter and put an end to trophy hunting of the white bear in the north, even though he is most optimistic that with only 400 a year being killed, and with 10,000 living there, there is no danger at all. The United States House of Representatives thought otherwise. Would the minister advise whether the government intends to close the season on these animals?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to close the season because it is not 4,000 polar bears, it is about 10,000 polar bears. The population is controlled by the Canadian Wildlife Service. I have confidence in these experts. I know the hon. member thinks he is an expert, but I have been in the north in the last six years and I have talked with the Eskimos. I am sure the Eskimos will co-operate with the government if there is a need to close the hunting. So far there is no such danger, and I want to retain for the Eskimos their traditional right to hunt polar bears.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw, following which I will call orders of the day.

NATIONAL REVENUE

OIL EXPORT TAX—NOTIFICATION TO COMPANIES OF DETAILS OF ASSESSMENT AND COLLECTION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister notified all relevant companies of the assessment, collection and other guidelines with regard to the export tax and, if so, what are the general terms of agreement?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if they have not been notified they will be very shortly. I do not think this is the appropriate time to outline what the notices are, but I will be glad to discuss the matter with the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING ACQUISITIONS OF CONTROL OF CANADIAN BUSINESS ENTERPRISES AND ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW BUSINESSES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gillespie that Bill C-132, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons and of the establishment of new businesses in Canada by certain persons, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, at the close of debate on Wednesday I was quoting from the Globe and Mail of November 20, 1973, the comments of Mr. Kniewasser made at a seminar at the University of Toronto Faculty of Administrative Studies. Some further comments were made by Mr. J. A. Perham, Chairman of Canadian Oxygen Limited, Toronto, a company that employs 1,000 Canadians, to the effect that at its inception that company could not have met the test of proving that it would provide a positive benefit to Canada.

I think this is an example of the difficulty that will be faced by the tribunal. This company, which is owned by British Oxygen Company, has made 17 acquisitions since it was formed. Some involved a few thousand dollars and one was for $8 million. The latter was the acquisition of a United States controlled company. I take it this is an indication this company feels that the acquisition of a U.S. controlled company is in our interests, particularly as its parent company is British.

The article in the Globe and Mail states that Mr. Perham noted that many of the small acquisitions might not have been approved under the new takeover legislation because they involved the purchase of small Canadian welding supply distributors. Yet, according to him, without these purchases they could not have taken over the largest acquisition, the American company. He went on to say that governments are overly concerned today about what they loosely call social justice and he felt they should be equally concerned about business justice so as not to inhibit the long-term economic growth of our country.

The president of Canadian Motorola Electronics Limited of Toronto had this to say:

> Many of government's doubts about multinational firms are based more on theory than fact.

He went on to say that no one can find fault with the legitimate concern that foreign investment should meet Canadian standards and objectives but that the problem is to define what these standards and objectives are because they have not been made plain.

The need to interpret vague words like "national industrial and economic policies" or "the effect of the acquisition of establishments on the level and nature of economic activities in Canada" makes it very difficult for business to make decisions. I suggest that it is going to be extremely difficult for this tribunal to interpret the words "of significant benefit to Canada".

I submit that virtually every small business will have to be sold once the owner retires or is deceased. The present level of income taxes, the federal government's capital gains tax, and the fact that all provinces except Alberta are inflicting estate taxes on their citizens mean very heavy tax payments when the owner of a business is deceased or a business is sold. Most businesses in Manitoba of over $300,000 capital are facing the problem of raising almost half that amount for capital gains tax and death duties should the owner die. This will mean that virtually every small business will have to be sold within the lifetime of the owner or at his death. I should think that this group of businesses, up to say the $5 million range, will be hard hit by this new tribunal. The tribunal will obviously have to disallow many sales of businesses on the basis of the requirement that they produce "significant benefit to Canada". Most often the business would be of significant benefit to a local area but would not be of benefit to other regions of the country, particularly when it introduces a new competitive firm in that part of the country. This is one of the complaints. Companies sold to Toronto-based firms and Montreal-based firms will probably be closed down and the plants moved to those cities. One cannot blame them for this, but the problem is very real.

The centralizing role of this tribunal is obvious. Sales of firms close to Ottawa, in Ontario and Quebec, will receive favourable consideration. Those in the periphery of Canada, in the Maritimes and in the west, are certainly not going to receive the same consideration. The levying of the oil tax and the discounting of barley and wheat to Canadian consumers by the federal government just recently are a case in point. These actions would never have been taken against the provinces of Ontario and Quebec just because they are too powerful and their voices are heard in Ottawa. The role of this tribunal will obviously be to discourage investment in western Canada and the Maritimes.

Finally, the fact that the ultimate decision is to be made by cabinet means that the guideline, "of significant benefit", will be disregarded and in the final analysis the decision will be absolutely a political one of the moment, not a very good thing on which build a foreign investment policy. The failure to introduce a means by which the provinces would have something to say about investment being made within their jurisdictions is a major weakness of this legislation. Until the provinces can have a role in deciding what is important in their areas this tribunal will not function adequately.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part in the debate on the motion before the House and at the outset indicate that it is my intention to support the legislation despite its many deficiencies. It is at least a step in the direction of controlling foreign takeovers. It is a sad commentary, indeed, that legislation such as this was not placed on the statute books years ago. It would have been far more effective 20 or 30 years ago than it will be today simply because at that time action could have been taken with regard to all the key corporations that over the years have passed to foreign control.

Last year the majority Liberal government introduced a foreign investment review bill in the House of Commons. It was a weak, indecisive piece of legislation. Fortunately, it died on the order paper when the election was called in the summer of 1972. The present bill, C-132, is a considerably improved piece of legislation. It deals not only with foreign takeovers but also with new businesses sought to be established by foreigners and expansion of existing corporations in unrelated areas.

The minister has accepted a number of changes from committee members, including suggestions from my NDP colleagues. The result is a stronger and vastly improved piece of legislation. It is an indication that minority government has had a beneficial effect on this legislation now being processed by parliament.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

At this time, however, I must make it crystal clear that the legislation now before us is only one of several measures that must be taken if we are to regain control of those key aspects of the Canadian economy that have come under foreign ownership. For example, the bill still does not deal effectively with the most important part of the problem in Canada, the expansion of existing foreign corporations within this country. If the legislation is policed effectively by the minister, the expansion of existing corporations in unrelated fields can be checked. However, this is only a part of the vast expansion of these foreign corporations which is taking place within the boundaries of our own country. Parliament must proceed with further legislative measures to control future foreign investment in the country and to ensure that control of those vital sectors of the economy which have already passed into the hands of foreign investors is returned to Canadians.

Liberal and Conservative speakers are constantly extolling the virtues of foreign investment in our resource industries and in other aspects of our economy. Canadians are told that we must have this investment or our economy will wither on the vine. To-day, as in the past, the policies of both the Liberals and the Conservatives have been directed toward encouraging foreign investment in practically every phase of our economy. Both Liberal and Conservative governments over the years have passed legislation and regulations which have given a host of concessions to foreign investors. These include ridiculous tax concessions, exemptions, low royalty rates on oil and gas, generous permit and lease arrangements for resource development, and so on. These policies have resulted in foreign control of our Canadian economy to an extent not seen in any other industrialized nation in the world. These policies have resulted in the massive export of Canadian raw materials with little or no processing taking place in our own country. This is one of the major reasons why a resource rich country like Canada has such a high unemployment rate.

The limiting of foreign ownership in our country is not an unreasonable proposal. I point out to hon. members that many other countries in the world have been forced to take legislative action against foreign investors from other countries. These countries have recognized that economic independence is fundamental to political and cultural independence. They took action to protect their own national interests and to ensure that the control and direction of their economies would be subject to decisions made in their own countries by themselves. They were able to foresee the tremendous pressures and influences that foreign-owned corporations would be able to exert on key sectors of their economies if these foreign corporations had control. Perhaps they have taken the lessons history has taught far more seriously than Canadians, for it has been demonstrated over and over again in many parts of the world that the political takeover of a country in one form or another has always followed economic takeover. It is a tragedy that this government and the Conservative party have not recognized these basic facts.

Among the many nations of the world that have taken action to limit foreign ownership is Japan. It is a good example because since World War II there has been very heavy United States investment in that country, just as there has been in Canada. A few years ago, however, the Japanese passed legislation limiting foreign control in general industry to 49 per cent. In certain key industries such as railways, steel and auto manufacturing the limit on foreign control was cut to 20 per cent, and in such essentials as radio, television, the press, the banks, etc., the Japanese government would allow no foreign ownership at all. Some adjustments have been made to foreign investment over the years, but we find that Japan still keeps a firm hand on the control of her economy.

In practically every country in Europe, including France, West Germany and the Scandinavian countries, we find legislation limiting foreign ownership. These countries are more acutely aware than Canadians have been of the inherent dangers and weaknesses that may result from loss of economic power when it is held in the hands of foreign corporations. These countries, however, have done something about the situation while Canadian governments, past and present, have refused to face up to the basic problem and to make those major basic changes that are required to protect Canadian industry and Canadian resources from complete domination by foreign corporations. Our very future is at stake and I am certain that Canadians will not tolerate much longer the Liberal and Conservative policies which in effect allow the control of our industry and resources to continue to pass to and remain under the control of foreign based corporations.

I would first like to show the extent of foreign control of the Canadian economy and then deal specifically with one of our major resources, oil and gas, which is almost completely dominated by foreign interests. The sellout of this key energy resource, federally and provincially, by the Liberals, the Conservatives and the Social Credit over the years is one of the tragedies of our time. Their past policies will come back to haunt them in the years ahead as Canadians realize their over-all interests have not been protected or planned for on any long-term basis.

It is very noticeable that foreign control of Canadian resources is more pronounced in those areas where governments have granted ridiculous tax concessions, exemptions of various kinds, low royalty rates, and so on. It is difficult to believe that any government could be so stupid as to allow many of our non-renewable resources to be gutted at fire sale prices. We find that the oil and gas resources industry is over 90 per cent foreign controlled. In the oil refining segment of the industry, the control is over 99 per cent. Foreign control in the mining industry has risen to over 70 per cent, while the smelting and refining industry is 85 per cent non-resident controlled. In the iron mining industry the rate is 86 per cent, while in the non-metal mining industry, which includes asbestos, potash, gypsum, etc, non-resident control has reached 85 per cent. In 1969 the figure for rubber products was 92.7 per cent, in the machinery section foreign control in 1969 amounted to 73.2 per cent, transportation equipment was 86.4 per cent, chemicals and chemical products were 80.4 per cent. Four years ago, in 1969, the printing and publishing sector rose to 20.4 per cent foreign control from 11.3 per cent in 1965. Many more figures could be given here, but the preceding examples indicate the serious situation facing many aspects of Canadian industry.

We should next look at the reasons for excessive foreign control in some sectors of the natural resource field. Canadians should be asking why foreign controlled oil companies and mining firms have moved into Canada on a vast scale. The answer lies in the major concessions which past governments have granted to these corporations. Perhaps the excellent table of tax rates on profits which was presented by Eric Kierans two years ago will give the reason and show how foolish government policy in this field has been over the years.

In the speech given by Eric Kierans to the Canadian Economic Association on June 3, 1971, he had this to say:

> Taxation allowances have been used so extensively in Canada since 1949 that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has been forced to issue two sets of financial figures, the one based on the annual reports of corporations to their shareholders, the other drawn from the reports filed with the Department of National Revenue for tax purposes by the same corporations. In 1968, for example, book profits reported to shareholders amounted to $8,350 million while taxable income reported to the Revenue Department amounted to $5,021 million.

These figures indicate that there was a difference of $3,329 million between the profits reported to shareholders and the taxable income reported to the Revenue Department. In other words, in 1968 only 60 per cent of the companies' book profits were classified as taxable income. Over the four-year period from 1965 to 1968 inclusive, of a total of just over $30 billion shown as company book profits, the taxable amount came to $17.3 billion. This means that over the four years between 1965 and 1968 about $12.7 billion of book profits were not classed as taxable income, as a result of which the average taxation rate for all corporations in that four year period came to about 57.6 per cent of the book profits.

These figures do not imply that all corporations were taxed to the same extent. So let us look at the second table which was supplied by Mr. Kierans two years ago. It shows the book profits made by selected industries, the taxable income of those industries and the percentage of book profits which was taxed. It is a most revealing document. This table shows that in the four years from 1965 to 1968, the book profits of companies dealing in mineral fuels, which include oil and gas, amounted to $795 million. The income on which taxes were levied amounted to only $45 million. As a result, the companies were taxed on only 5.7 per cent of their book profits. Is it any wonder, in these circumstances, that we have seen a concentration of foreign control in this industry?

In the metal mining industry, over the same period, book profits amounted to $1,707 million. Taxable income was $220 million which amounts to only 13 per cent of total book profits. In the category of "other mining", book profits over the period amounted to $374 million and the companies paid tax on only $120 million which works out to 32 per cent of book profits. In the manufacturing industry, companies paid taxes on 63 per cent of their book profits. The construction industry paid taxes on 65 per cent, and the wholesale trade on 87 per cent. But in the retail trade, which is almost entirely Canadian-controlled, we find the companies paying taxes on 90 per cent of their book profits.

The picture becomes crystal clear. Foreign corporations are concentrating in those areas where they can make the most money. This is natural. Mr. Kierans summed it up neatly in the following paragraph:

> If foreign ownership dominates the mining and petroleum industries, our tax system has clearly invited this concentration. We have not only extended a warm invitation to foreign capital, but we have told it where to go. If you invest in the service industries, we say, you will have to pay taxes on 87 per cent or 90 per cent of your profits. On the other hand, in metal mining you will only have to pay on 13 per cent and in petroleum on 5.7 per cent of your profits. The invitation says, in effect: Come and get us.

It has been the taxation system and the concessions by a series of governments over the years which have led to the overwhelming control by foreign investors in these two key sectors of our economy.

Some changes have been made in our taxation system since 1968 but the corporations involved in the petroleum and mineral field still maintain their privileged position. Over the years, the NDP has urged a succession of federal governments to initiate legislation of a type which would ensure Canadians exercising effective control over their economy for all time, and we call upon the government to move in this direction without further delay.

The present energy crisis in Canada, and the close relation it bears to our own supplies of oil and natural gas, should help bring the whole picture of foreign control, as well as our own failure to give adequate direction in this regard, home to the Canadian people. It is not only the problem of foreign control which we find disturbing at this time: it is the complete lack of a viable, national energy policy. As we drift from crisis to crisis, it becomes increasingly obvious that the present administration does not know in which direction to turn, simply because it has neglected to lay down any longterm policy for the nation. Conservative spokesmen have demonstrated time and again in this House that they are the mouthpieces of the multinational oil corporations which are firmly in the saddle as far as oil and natural gas supplies in this country are concerned.

We find the Province of Alberta, under a Conservative administration, planning to hand over to the multinational oil corporations for development one of the greatest oil deposits left in the world, the Athabasca oil sands. This valuable resource should be developed under public ownership, and in so doing Alberta should seek financial support not only from the federal government but from other provincial governments and from the Canadian public in general. It should be obvious to all Albertans that under the present plan to develop this rich resource, those who will make real profits out of the undertaking will not be the general public but the foreign-controlled oil corporations.

Since the spring of this year, the world has seen an unprecedented increase in the price of crude oil, natural gas and their by-products. There was an exceptionally sharp rise in the market price, especially in the United States which uses about 38 per cent of the world's total energy. There was really no need to import this inflationary trend in oil and gas from the United States to Canada. At the same time, it did not make sense to sell our oil and gas in the United States market at prices far below their going rate. The only way this could be done effectively, without importing more inflation to Canada, was to impose an export tax on both oil and gas. The government finally took this step a few months ago and imposed a 40-cents-a-barrel export tax on crude oil exports which, in effect, set up a two price system in Canada. It meant our domestic oil would be 40 cents lower that the going price in the United States.

This export tax is to be raised to $1.90 as of December 1, 1973 and will carry through to the end of January. This move has helped to check the severe inflation in the price of oil products which will be passed along to other spheres of economic activity unless the export tax remains.

It is interesting to see the tremendous opposition to this form of tax by the multinational oil corporations, the Conservative government of Alberta and members of the official opposition in this House. There has been a great deal of misinformation spread throughout Canada about the imposition of this export tax, so perhaps I could briefly examine the oil situation in Canada and the role played in it by the multinational oil corporations which primarily control it. The anguished cries of the Conservative party over the alleged mistreatment of the oil companies by the government should be a clear warning to the Canadian people of what we can expect from this group if they ever take over the reins of government in Canada.

Last year the oil companies in Canada had their best year profit-wise in history. This year their quarterly profits are up sharply over 1972. Over the past year there have been sharp increases in the prices of all oil products, including gasoline. This increase was not based on additional production costs in Canada but on the rising cost of oil in the international market.

On November 1, 1972 the price of western Canadian crude was increased by 10 cents a barrel. On May 1, 1973 another increase of 25 cents a barrel took place. This was followed by further increases of 20 cents a barrel on June 1 and 40 cents a barrel effective August 1, 1973. This means that over a nine-month period the price of western Canadian crude jumped a total of 95 cents a barrel. This was a 37 per cent increase in oil costs and would increase the annual revenue of the oil companies by $700 million over a full year.

These price increases forced the government to take action, and on September 4 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) called for a freeze on further price increases. He indicated that the 40 cents a barrel export tax would be levied as of October 1 on all crude oil leaving Canada. This export tax will be raised to $1.90 a barrel as of December 1, and will last until the end of January. I might add that our NDP group will oppose removal of this export tax at that time.

Let us now look at this export tax and the alternatives to it. An export tax of $1.90 means that Canadian oil will be sold in the United States market at going world prices. It also means that oil in the Canadian market will be sold at domestic prices, which will be $1.90 below the inflated prices in the United States. The federal government has guaranteed that the producing provinces will not lose one penny in royalty rates through the imposition of this tax.

This applies both to exported oil and to oil used domestically. The government has also indicated that it would be prepared to turn over any surplus money which accrues from this export tax to the producing provinces for oil development or research in those provinces. The surplus revenue, over and above the royalties which would be returned to the provinces, would amount to several hundred million dollars a year.

Now, let us look at the alternative that is favoured by the Conservatives in both Alberta and Ottawa. They would like to see price increases levied at the wellhead in progressive stages. What does this mean in terms of revenue to the general public in the producing provinces? Alberta now receives an average royalty of about 22 per cent for oil produced at the wellhead. The oil companies get the other 78 per cent. In the case of the $1.90 export tax, if this were to be the price added to the wellhead cost we would find Alberta would receive 42 cents and the oil companies would receive $1.48 of this additional $1.90 increase.

It has been interesting also to hear the complaints of our Conservative friends in the House about the export tax. As I understand it, there had been no increase to the oil companies in the price at the wellhead in Alberta at the time the tax was levied. If the export tax had not been levied by the federal government, it would have meant that the multinational oil corporations in the United States would have continued to buy Canadian crude at the initial low contract price and they would have reaped 100 per cent of the price increase of 40 cents a barrel when it reached the Chicago market. In my opinion, the Conservative position is a weak one and is certainly not in the best interests of Canadian consumers or in the interests of the citizens in those provinces where oil is produced.

We have heard from a number of speakers in this debate about the unhappy position of the oil companies in Canada. Our Conservative friends in particular talk about the need for increased revenues so that these companies can carry on exploration in various parts of Canada to ensure the future of energy sources in the oil and gas industry. According to the information which I have, these companies have always been able to write off their exploration costs, and more. This was ably explained by Eric Kierans when he showed that the oil companies in Canada paid taxes on 5.4 per cent of their book profits. This scandalous situation has existed for long enough and should be changed. All oil products, including gasoline, used by the Canadian consumer bear part of the cost of exploration carried on by these companies.

There is another very important and distressing aspect about the foreign control of our oil and gas resources by the multinational oil corporations. Most Canadians know that the vast majority of profits made by these corporations operating in Canada goes into the pockets of foreign investors. There is another aspect which we sometimes forget, and that is the increasing value of the resource as the world price increases. For example, big oil companies have the option on most of the oil remaining in Canada's conventional reserves. It is estimated that there is a little over 10 billion barrels of these conventional reserves left. At the present rate of exploitation these reserves will be exhausted in about 12 years. It is doubtful whether they could last that long unless severe export restrictions were put upon our oil exports.

The point I should like to make here, however, is that when the oil companies received a 95 cent increase per barrel over the period November 1972 to August 1, 1973, that increased the value of oil reserves on which they had options by over $9 billion. There will be relatively little increase in production costs from these conventional sources as the wells have been drilled and the distribution system is already installed, so the bulk of this huge increase will go to these firms and will not benefit the Canadian people or the general public in Alberta.

Since the companies were granted this 95 cents increase, the price of crude oil has increased again by at least $1.90, which is reflected in the export tax about which I have spoken. If this additional $1.90 is progressively phased in at the wellhead over the next few months, we will see an additional $19 billion added to the value of these conventional reserves which are controlled by the oil companies. This would make a total of almost $28 billion in additional revenues available to these companies as a result of oil price increases over the last year alone; but only a fraction will be returned to the people of Alberta under their present royalty set up.

There is no doubt that the world price of oil will be further increased, which again will increase the value of our oil and gas reserves. If these conventional reserves had been owned by the people of Alberta, they would have had sufficient revenues coming in over the years to have carried out public development of the Athabasca tar sands without seeking elsewhere for capital. Even now a major change in their royalty and assessment procedure would vastly increase the return to the public purse from what is presently being received.

During the debate on energy resources we have heard a number of Conservatives and Liberal speakers indicate the need for additional revenues for the oil companies so that further exploration could be carried out in various parts of Canada to ensure continuing supplies of oil and gas for both the domestic and export markets. This government and other governments, including the one under former Prime Minister Diefenbaker, have always given the multinational corporations unprecedented concessions, permit lease arrangements and tax exemptions.

The present Canada oil and gas land regulations which are the product of both Liberal and Conservative governments consist of a major sellout, at five sale prices, of our potential oil and gas industries in northern Canada. These regulations are in the process of review, but indications are that there has been relatively little change, and the multinational oil corporations still reap vast fortunes from our northern oil and gas resources once they are tapped. Perhaps a short review of the present situation north of the 60th parallel would make the members of this House more aware of what we must do if Canadians are to get a fair return from this particular resource.

Last March an interesting research paper was presented to the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee in Ottawa by Professor Andrew Thompson of the University of British Columbia. It is a slashing attack on the giveaway resource policies of the Canadian government, particularly in the field of petroleum resources. The report likens the oil and gas regulations to Canadian colonialism, and calls the regulations a resource giveaway unparalleled in any country in modern times. It points out that these giveaway regulations have sparked a powerful thrust into oil exploration and development in Canada, and brought into sharp and urgent focus a number of major national problems which require immediate attention and early solution. These problems include the environmental issues, the claims of native people, the questions about transportation systems and the implications that large-scale energy exports may hold for industrial strategy.

These oil and gas regulations govern petroleum exploration and production in all parts of Canada under federal jurisdiction. This includes the area of 60 degrees latitude and also the east and west coast offshore regions, including Hudson Bay. They include a permit lease system which allows the leasing company to hold vast areas into the next century at little cost, even without discovery of oil or gas, unless changes are now made in the regulations. It must be obvious what regulations of this type could do to the proper planning for national use of the energy resources that exist in our northern areas.

Perhaps the most glaring aspect of this giveaway policy in the north shows up in the royalty rates which the regulations have established for the federal areas. For the first three years there is a 5 per cent royalty rate which is unprecedented anywhere in the world. After the three year period, the royalty is increased to 10 per cent. Let us compare this maximum 10 per cent rate with the 16 ⅔ per cent charged in the United States offshore areas, a 20 per cent effective rate in Alaska, which is just as far north as northern Canada, and with the average 22 per cent in the province of Alberta.

The loss of revenue to the federal government from these extremely low royalty rates would be fantastically large if oil and gas finds in the north warranted the construction of a gas or oil pipeline. The paper by Professor Thompson gives two excellent examples of the revenue loss which could accrue to Canadians if these ridiculous royalty rates are allowed to stand. The first example is a gas pipeline from the Mackenzie Delta to southern Canada and the United States market with a throughput of 4.5 billion cubic feet of gas per day. It is presumed that this gas would be obtained in equal proportions from the Alaska north slope and from the Mackenzie Delta.

The price used was a wellhead value figure of 30 cents per thousand cubic feet in both places. The royalties payable to the Canadian government during the first three years of production would be approximately $36 million as compared with $144 million payable to the State of Alaska. After three years, the Canadian government would receive $24 million per year and the State of Alaska $48 million per year. Over a ten year period Canadian gas revenues would be $276 million less than those received by the State of Alaska.

From the example I have quoted one can see that weather conditions, drilling conditions, etc. are comparable, but the distance the gas must go from Alaska to United States markets is almost twice as far. Does it not seem rather foolish that a multinational oil corporation which controls a gas well in the Prudhoe Bay area and controls a similar gas field in the Mackenzie Delta area would be willing to pay $276 million more to the State of Alaska for the same amount of gas over a 10-year period than to Canada? This is just a sample of the colonial thinking of our federal government which has dared to set these unprecedented giveaway royalty rates for our non-renewable resources. In addition, all exploratory costs are deductible from income regardless of the cost.

The second example is an oil pipeline from the Mackenzie Delta to the same markets with a capacity of 1.5 million barrels per day. A wellhead value for the oil of $2 per barrel has been assumed, although it would be much higher at present day prices, and this would reflect much higher figures. Royalties payable to the Canadian government during the first three years of production would be $157.5 million. The same oil produced in northern Alberta would generate royalties of $787.5 million for the provincial government at a 25 per cent rate. After the first three years, the federal government would collect $105 million per year as compared with $262.5 million for the Alberta government. The 10-year difference in oil revenues would be $1,732,500,000 in favour of Alberta. This does not mean that Alberta is presently levying adequate royalty rates to return to the people of that province the just return they should receive from this valuable non-renewable resource. These figures show the callous disregard of the old line parties toward our national resources.

These figures indicate the need for Canadians to rethink the position of our country in relation to the whole field of energy and, in particular, to those oil and gas resources which come under federal jurisdiction. The potential of vast quantities of natural gas in the north alone would indicate that they should be brought under public ownership, planned and utilized to serve the long-term energy needs of Canada.

There are many other aspects of foreign control which have been touched upon by other members of our group, so I will not deal with them again. In closing, however, I would point out that we are in an emergency energy situation at the present time. It has not been brought about by the recent war in the Middle East. This merely brought it to a head a few months sooner than would otherwise have been the case. There is no national energy policy in Canada today because governments of the past have been afraid to formulate those policies. The trend of both Liberals and Tories over the years has been to gradually integrate the energy resources of this country with those of the United States. This integration is already well advanced. Even today we see recommendations before the National Energy Board for the province of Ontario to make a sharp increase in the export of their hydro electric power to that country. Once this power is exported and becomes integrated into the industrial complex of the United States, it will be almost impossible to stop future exports, no matter how adversely this might affect our economy.

Long-term commitment of our energy resources can seriously affect the future industrial development of Canada. This Parliament and this nation should first establish basic long-range planning for a national energy program before we further commit any of these precious non-renewable resources to another country. I am hopeful we will see some decisive planning by the present government along these lines within the next few months.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, once more we have just heard a magnificent lecture on the importance of public ownership and development of our natural resources.

While my hon. friend had the floor, I was thinking about what happened in Chile when Mr. Allende was president and had nationalized the copper mines of his country, three years ago, and said to the Americans: We are getting control over our own country, pick up your marbles and go home. The Americans left, and the American machinery in those copper mines happened to require some repair. Therefore, the Chileans asked the United States to provide them with spare parts to repair these machines. The latter answered: You threw us out, you no longer need us, we therefore refuse to sell you spare parts.

Then, Mr. Speaker, what did happen? The communist president of Chile happened to resort to the services of the Noranda Mines Limited of Rouyn-Noranda, to process 22,500 tons of copper ore for Chile. When private enterprise can be useful to these people, it is all right, but it is dangerous to respect it when it contributes to developing the country's natural resources. This is where we do not agree on public ownership, nationalization and government control on resources. What we want is a private enterprise system. We do not want any trusts or monopolies but a private enterprise system under which the individual may act according to his abilities, his skills, his will, with as little interference from the government as possible. That is what is called real democracy.

Mr. Speaker, as regards Bill C-132, relating to foreign investment, we can say that there are two kinds of investments: investments for private and public undertakings. In the private sector, if Germans, Americans or Frenchmen bring in with them capital to set up viable private concerns, if they come here with new techniques and new knowledge, we think that a logical government should not oppose such investments liable to increase the economic and social development of our country.

With regard to the public sector, we Créditistes have been maintaining for a long time that we do not need foreigners to tell us what to do in our public administration. For instance, last week, as this recurs about every two or three weeks, our "strong" Quebec premier, Mr. Bourassa, with 102 hon. members out of 110, floated a $50 million bond issue to finance Hydro-Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Wall to wall Liberals.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Right. It is about the equivalent of a carpet.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it means $50 million bearing interest at 10 per cent for 25 years, again for the partial hydroelectric development of the famous James Bay. That means a $125 million interest in 25 years. It is a good deal for the lenders, but an awfully bad one for the people of the province of Quebec. I am referring here to Quebec, but I could say the same of Manitoba. The New Democratic government of that province is so much against private enterprise, so much anti-American, that their Minister of Finance went again to the United States as recently as three months ago, to beg on his knees to borrow $50 million from private entrepreneurs.

Mr. Speaker, to say something here, and then to act otherwise outside, that is quite different.

We say the same thing everywhere. We suggest Premier Bourassa should come to Ottawa to meet the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to tell them both: We need $50 million guaranteed by the same resources, on the same Hydro-Quebec development. But instead of having the figures written in the United States, they should be written at the Bank of Canada. It is a question of figures, based upon the same resources.

If Mr. Bourassa and the other premiers of Canada exerted pressures on Ottawa, instead of going down on their knees in New York, it seems to me we would get better results. Therefore I say that the public segment of our economy should be financed directly by our financial institution, not by the one in New York, but by ours, the Bank of Canada, which is allowed to write down the figures. It is allowed to grant loans for six months and not for 25 years under section 13 and 20 of the Bank of Canada Act. Let those who do not believe me refer to this act. They will be able to read that the Bank is authorized to grant loans to provinces and even to municipalities but for periods not exceeding six months. What can Mr. Bourassa do within six months? He already finds it difficult to achieve something in three years so it is clear he cannot do anything in six months.

Therefore, let us say to Mr. Bourassa: Come over to Ottawa and exert your pressures where they should be exerted. Mr. Speaker, investments in the public field would also help private businesses. The manufacturers would be paid with money free from debt instead of being paid with debts and interest paid to foreigners. We would become the masters of our economy whereas we remain the true servants of a few money lenders for the development of our resources.

The Creditists will keep on fighting for the private sector not to be hindered by the governments and for the public sector to be financed by our national financial institution. I repeat that if Americans wish to settle down in Canada to develop our resources to the benefit of Canadians we will not oppose it. Earlier, I heard an NDP member state that such a company had made a 65 per cent profit, another 40 per cent, another 60 per cent and another 32 per cent. We are told only about those profits and not about the expenditures of those companies! This is what I would like to know: What has been spent?

Have the 65 per cent profits been hidden in the cellar of the house or have they been spent for expansion? Have they been spent for improvements to the industry or to buy personal effects?

When someone buys a Cadillac, Mr. Speaker, admittedly it provides jobs for those who help make it, for those who manufacture parts, for mechanics, for just about everyone. When a castle is built, carpenters are given jobs, building materials are sold, jobs are created. New Democrats do not speak of jobs, but of profits. Expenses do not count. Mr. Speaker, we believe that profits are expenses which are the backbone of the Canadian economy, which stimulate the circulation of goods and the manufacture of materials, and move products towards the consumers, whether they are wage earners or small businessmen, it does not matter much.

Mr. Speaker, far from me the desire to create or protect trusts, combines or monopolies. In this connection we say: There are some laws to control monopolies, combines and large multinational corporations trying to set prices. There is only one thing to do: Fine them. They laugh at us, because price increases enable them to double, triple and even quadruple their income to cover the payment of the fines. We merely have to jail the officials. I am sure that there is not one who wishes to go to jail; before they do so we will soon see the end of the combine.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few comments which I wanted to make on Bill C-132. We are in favour of investments for private enterprise as well as for public enterprise. We advocate the use of the Bank of Canada, so that we may all say together: We are masters at home, masters in our country, Canada, and masters of our economy.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on third reading of the bill, I should like to say that the crux of the problem confronting this House has been summed up in the editorial of the Toronto Star for November 14, 1973 entitled "Tories waver on foreign control". In this editorial, the Toronto Star assumes that whatever is good for Toronto is good for Canada and what is bad for Toronto is bad for Canada, no matter what the results are in areas remote from Toronto. The definition of Toronto should be expanded to include Montreal and Ottawa. It goes without saying that almost all foreign investment in parts remote from this triangle would be considered of no significant benefit to Canada. The effect of this bill would be to allow for the complete domination of the peripheral portions of the country by this centrally controlled Ottawa bureaucracy.

The failure of the government to accept these amendments, and to allow greater participation in the decision making process of this review board by the individual provinces, will really arouse suspicion in the west and in the Maritimes that the central government will not allow any investment that interferes with its predominance. Why is this problem of a serious nature? I suggest that it is serious because, along with the review process by the Ottawa bureaucrats—most of whom will have no knowledge of the rest of the country—is the fact that our investments pools which will have to operate if foreign buyers are to be prevented from buying Canadian investments, unless we move to shut them out altogether, are controlled by institutions that dominate the action. This is a situation which should be of considerable concern to governments.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

A serious problem facing the stock market is the fact that the small, individual investor is absent. Small investors were badly burned in 1969-1971, and they show no signs of returning. I suggest this fact is not taken into account in the bill. When institutions dominate the investment market, unlike the small and individual investor, they tend to put their faith in major corporations such as the elite 30 detailed in Fortune. The small and individual enterprising companies rely to a fairly heavy extent on the investment of the little guy. Now, unless these small investors can be wooed back into the marketplace, some disturbing trends will occur. The institutions, with their massive pool of funds, cause degrees of instability when they make major shifts in investments, while the individual investor tends to be a stabilizing factor as well as an excellent source of capital for smaller companies seeking much needed financing to carry out expansion programs that would be of general benefit to the community. Failure to create a climate that will lure back the individual investor will make a fundamental change in North America's investment patterns.

What has happened to the investment pool? It seems likely that the incentive for building the market has been greatly weakened through a combination of world economic trends resulting in recession and inflation, reducing the value of the player's return on investment, while at the same time capital gains taxes further cut into profits if any materialize. The little guy has come to the conclusion that, under the circumstances, he is better off salting his money away or, in the light of today's high interest rates, putting it in the safekeeping of his friendly banker or trust company. Why take the risk of being clobbered in a market which has been full of uncertainties in the last few years for gains that are becoming less attractive in comparison with what a dear old savings bond or bank can offer?

I think this trend is very pertinent to this bill because who will lend money to this $1 million feed lot operation or this small factory with 10 employees if it is not the small investor? But he cannot lend his money when he has it invested in government bonds or in the dear old bank vault. The big financial institutions cannot be bothered to lend money to a high risk blacksmith, especially one who is pounding out agricultural implements. Brokers refute this argument and maintain that if a well planned investment program is put on the market it is still attractive, but few people seem to agree. They are keeping their money in large pools instead of having it eaten up by inflation.

Further comments on this move to remove investment moneys out of the stock market where it would help to finance many of the companies that would be viable concerns in their communities is detailed in an article in the Ottawa Journal of September 4, written by Mr. Bruce Whitestone. He points out that small investors are increasingly reluctant to put money in common stock. He has suggested that inflation, and its persistence in a peacetime area, has been the main factor at work here. For most of the post-war period, the public was told that investing in common stock was a good hedge against inflation, but generally the stock market has proven to be a poor hedge for at least a decade. The public has been shifting its financial assets into bonds, bank accounts and real estate. An interest rate of 8 per cent took care of an inflation premium of 5 per cent, leaving the real cost of money at around 3 per cent a year.

I should like to quote from an article in the Globe and Mail of Friday, October 26, by Ronald Anderson, titled, "The Saving Habit," as follows:

Canada has traditionally been so heavily reliant on inflows of foreign capital that it is difficult for most Canadians to accept the thought that domestic savings might be, or could be, capable of financing an adequate level of capital investment.

By international standards, Canada is a nation of savers. National savings represent a higher proportion of gross national product here than in all but a few countries, notably Japan and some western European nations.

Capital requirements, though, also are unusually high. For reasons related to geography, climate, population and industrial structure, Canada has to invest more capital to achieve any given increase in output than most other countries.

The Provincial Bank of Canada calculates that from 1926 to 1972 Canada's gross national savings averaged 18.5 per cent of GNP, while capital spending averaged 19.2 per cent of the value of total output. "National savings have thus on the whole been inadequate and non-residents have had to fill a gap equivalent to 0.7 per cent of GNP."

There are a number of ways of measuring Canada's reliance on foreign capital, some of which show that non-resident savings are more important than is suggested by the GNP relationships.

The system of national accounts, for example, does not take account of the profits and depreciation allowances re-invested in Canada by the subsidiaries of foreign companies. These sums, while generated here, are not Canadian savings, strictly speaking.

The Provincial Bank says that, when these omissions have been corrected, the net use of foreign resources has fluctuated between 13 per cent and 27 per cent of gross capital formation during the past two decades. Using another approach, the "direct" foreign financing method used by Statistics Canada, foreign sources can be shown to have financed 29 per cent of gross domestic investment from 1946 to 1969.

These calculations, which take no account of Canadian investment and re-investment of earnings abroad, tend to over-state the national dependence on foreign savings. Nevertheless it is quite plain that Canada has not been able in the past to finance the whole of its investment programs. But the statistics also show that the degree of dependence on foreign financing has gradually diminished. Canada now is within shooting distance of a position of statistical self-sufficiency—that is, a position in which outflows come close to inflows of capital.

In 1970 and 1971, there was a net outflow of capital. The current account balance will be negative this year and probably in 1974. Even by 1980, the current account deficit, which is a measure of the new inflow of foreign capital, may run at about $1 billion a year.

The prospective deficit, though, will represent a steadily declining proportion of total output. Furthermore, if it were judged to be in the national interest, Canada could manage its affairs in a way that would eliminate the need for net capital inflows.

Critics of this line of reasoning contend that Canadians would pay for any reduction in capital inflows by a decline in the standard of living, or at least a slowing of economic growth.

But it is difficult to argue that Canada requires an exceptionally large amount of capital per unit of production without acknowledging, at the same time, that a moderate decline in the rate of investment would have a modest effect on the rate of economic growth.

Moreover, there could well be the possibility that Canada could reduce its use of capital by changing its industrial structure. One important reason for the extensive use made of capital in the past, as the Provincial Bank observes, is the dependence of economic growth on abundant natural resources. "Raw materials exploitation demands a particularly capital-intensive system of production."

This implies that capital could be conserved by increasing the degree of processing of raw materials in this country before the commodities are exported, instead of depending for growth on the export of enlarged quantities of relatively unprocessed materials.

It is not necessarily the case, in any event, that a reduction in capital inflows must be balanced by a fall in investment. An alternative might be to encourage a higher level of domestic savings. While Canadians already save relatively more than the residents of the United States and Britain, the Canadian rate of savings is exceeded in a number of other countries.

The Canadian and Quebec Pension Plans are mechanisms that result in forced savings. Private pension plans and registered retirement plans also increase individual savings. An instalment share accumulation plan, such as is proposed by the Canada Development Corporation, might well turn out to be a successful method of persuading small investors to save more. Profit-sharing plans, already adopted by a number of companies, could be used more widely by industry; savings would be increased if employees could be persuaded to take part of their future earnings gains in company shares rather than in cash.

Care must be taken in offering tax incentives to save. Such incentives tend to benefit the more well-to-do, and increase the gap between the rich and the poor. But government, industry, and financial institutions have not exhausted all the possibilities for persuading individuals to defer consumption. A relatively small increase in the rate of savings would narrow, or close, the gap between domestic savings and investment.

The objective should not be to isolate Canada from world financial markets or to turn away foreign direct investment that could benefit this country. However, self-sufficiency in savings, on a net basis, would improve Canada's ability to function as an efficient, independent economic unit.

Studies of the stock market in the 1960's showed that random investment portfolios yielded an average of 9 per cent. Unless one can improve on the long-term 30 year average it must be admitted that the interest rate on long-term bonds is a carefree way to equal the result that can be achieved on average common stock investments.

I have attempted to detail how investment money for the small industrialist and entrepreneur is being dried up. Institutions controlling investment pools, with their head offices in Toronto and Montreal, cannot be bothered and cannot practicably look after the peripheral areas of the country. Can any one imagine a workers' corporate pension plan, with its head office in Toronto, being able to offer financing to a business worth $250,000 in a small prairie or maritime town? Our registered retirement savings plans, our insurance savings plans and our mutual funds all operate to pool capital centrally. If a small manufacturing business in southern Ontario or Quebec is having difficulty finding a buyer, and if it does not get a buyer, the plant will close but the owner will receive sympathetic consideration from this investment tribunal here in Ottawa. And with the help of these large pools of capital in our large cities, such cases will be easily looked after. But should a similar situation arise in either the Maritimes or western Canada there is a much different scenario. The tribunal will have much less knowledge of the facts of the case. They will be less interested. If they make any contacts with the pools of capital in our financial centres, these in turn will be much less interested in investments in remote areas. I could well imagine the bureaucrats suggesting to Toronto investors that "There is a company for sale in Manitoba worth $5 million. The only buyers are foreigners. If you want to buy it, we can have it discounted for you at $3 million."

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker, if provinces had a say in the workings of this tribunal, they could prevent serious injury to the provinces. There are no provinces that can match the economic might of Ontario and Quebec. The Toronto Star knows that Ontario and Quebec can look after themselves. They are giants in their own right on the Canadian scene in a political way. As well as that, they have the investment capital available, not only of their own generation but of a good portion of the rest of the country as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT DELINEATING GOVERNMENT'S POWER IN DISPOSING OF PUBLIC LANDS

The House resumed, from Monday, November 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, when we left the National Parks Act the other night I was discussing the proposed interprovincial national park between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec in the Mattawa-Temiscaming area. I mentioned that we had had considerable co-operation from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), but that the proposal for the park was turned down by the province of Ontario. One of the reasons they gave for this was that there were too many parks in that particular area already. However, in this debate we have heard some hon. members mention the large urban areas which are growing in northern New York State and in Canada and that these people are going to require more and more park space as the years go by. This is quite true, and we should be laying plans now to meet the demand.

I also mentioned that parks of this nature have a tendency to develop the economy surrounding them. In the area to which I am referring, the economy does need a shot in the arm. I made mention that an industry in each of the towns of Mattawa and Temiscaming had closed, but since then things are beginning to look better in other fields of activity in the locality. This is a good thing for both these communities. However, there is no park in eastern Ontario and western Quebec better fitted to be an interprovincial national park than the one about which I am speaking. The Ottawa River would cross the middle of it and this would emphasize the need for cleaning up the river and making it navigable for small boats. With the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), and other hon. members from eastern Ontario and western Quebec, I have been working on the navigation study for small boat traffic on the Ottawa River. We have had excellent co-operation from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé). This park, Mr. Speaker, would be an added feature toward making the Ottawa River valley an extremely good tourist region with a wider appeal than the local interest portrayed by the highway signs in the area.

In recent years, there has been a general tendency to spend large amounts of money on massive highway schemes surrounding the large cities while the remote regions of the country have not received the treatment that they deserve. In order to get tourists into an area there must be decent roads. This could mean upgrading highway 17 between Montreal and the Mattawa area as well as the North Bay and northern Ontario area in general, for example. This concept is in keeping with our history if we consider the mode of traffic used in the early days. Champlain came up the Ottawa River and the Northwest Company and the Hudson Bay Company eventually worked out of Montreal in the fur trade, taking their routes up the Ottawa Valley and the Mattawa River through the area proposed for this national park. We would like to see plans for this park go ahead so that we may relate it to the past and build a new history with some meaning in that region.

An old CPR railway line runs through this park area. When we made an initial tour of the area with departmental officials and other working committees, we hired a CPR coach and attached it to the back of a freight train which travels that line. We had an excellent tour, stopping at certain sites along the way and it was a most educational experience for all concerned. There was a time when people thought that railways were going out of style but that is not the case today. Indeed, the future of railways in Canada looks brighter than it has for years, and the idea of having trains take people through this park is an added attraction. It is also a pollution free means of getting people from point A to point B.

There is nothing wrong with trying to promote more funds for roads to get people from the large urban areas to the parks, of course. We hear a great deal about rapid transit for the cities these days. There is a strong possibility that the large amounts of money that have been pumped into the cities to build roads and expand freeways in the past may not be needed in the future because of rapid transit. Perhaps these funds could be filtered through to the less developed areas to build decent recreation areas and roads for the mass of people who will live in our urban centres in the future.

As far as the interprovincial national park at Mattawa and Temiscaming is concerned, I am disappointed that the province of Ontario has turned it down. I wish to leave the gate open so they can come back to it at a future time. There is a real potential there. It is an excellent chance for the federal and provincial governments to work together on this consultative program. The other night the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) mentioned the fact that there should be more consultation between the federal government and the provinces concerned. In this case there was consultation between the federal government and the province, but it did not work out. It certainly was not the fault of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I appeal to the province of Ontario to re-assess the ideas of a national park in the upper Ottawa valley. I ask them to take a serious look at the proposal of the smaller land mass on the Ontario side for part of this park. I can see a great advantage in going into this hinterland which rests between northern and southern Ontario. Quite often we in this area find ourselves in the position of being not far enough north to become heavily involved in northern Ontario plans, but so far north that we are sometimes left out of southern Ontario plans. This is why, as time goes on, we will have to do more talking and promoting for our area.

We are the buffer zone between the north and the south and we can bring peace and harmony to both areas of Ontario. In this regard, I wish to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development not to give up this idea of a national park. I would like him to re-open negotiations with the province of Ontario. At the same time, I would like the province of Ontario to come to him with a constructive approach to this idea to see what can be worked out.

This proposal is not just for the establishment of an interprovincial national park, but would entail the uniting of two provinces. It would mean more facilities between the two provinces. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) and I have done a great deal of work on the future development of small boat traffic on the upper Ottawa river. This would complement a national park. It is another route to get into that area of the national park. If the Ontario government does not build highway 17 any faster than it has been building it for the past 30 years, it might be easier to get up the Ottawa river by the means used by Champlain rather than by travelling highway 17.

In conclusion, may I say the proposed park was an excellent idea. We are very disappointed it was not adopted. We would like the province and the federal government both to take another look at it and come up with the solution so that in the future the people of that area will be able to take advantage of the added road facilities, the added economic development around the park and the promotion of a rail line into the park, all of which will influence the general development of employment and business. At the same time, the park will be built in a community that will be known far and wide in the large urban areas of southern Ontario and the northern United States as being a place that is friendly, welcomes tourists and has all facilities. If the facilities are there, these people will want to come back.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke is one of the few members of parliament who has been privileged to travel to a location in Canada that is very vitally concerned with a large portion of this bill, 8,500 square miles, to put it in precise terms. It will probably be the largest national park to be established in Canada in the Kluane region of the Yukon.

Many members do not appreciate the fact of all the members of this chamber, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) and I come here in a triple capacity. This is because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is responsible for our municipal wellbeing. He is responsible for our territorial wellbeing in the sense that term is used in a provincial way. Of course, we are also here representing our constituents on the federal level. Having that responsibility under the terms of the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act, two federal statutes which set up these two separate territorial jurisdictions, whatever the minister does very vitally effects every level of government in both territories. Indeed, he is responsible and has the power to affect every level of government in both territories.

One of the themes I have been following since coming into this chamber is that the federal government has been remiss, and has sadly neglected, the two northern territories with respect to the establishment of national parks in those jurisdictions. I have also been saying repeatedly that the federal government should not simply embark on a frolic of its own, to unilaterally and arbitrarily carve out areas in these territories, without having any consultative process with the elected representatives of the people in the two territories. If the minister were here, he would say there has been this kind of process adopted in so far as the Yukon is concerned. I gainsay him on that. I do not believe that process has been followed.

One of the things I welcome is the fact we are now debating a stage in this bill which will result in it going to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development for consideration by that committee which is scheduled to travel to the Yukon Territory on December 10 for the whole week. While there, that committee will hold public meetings, three if necessary. One will be at Whitehorse, one at Dawson City, which was classified as an area of national historic interest, and a third at Haines Junction which will be the hub of the national park proposed to be set up by this statute.

Let me comment here that I am continually amazed by the utter gall of this government. They say they want parliament to approve a national park in the Yukon, a national park in the Northwest Territories in the Nahanni area and on Baffin Island. However, for the past two years the government has been spending the taxpayers' dollars from the consolidated revenue fund for the purpose of proceeding with the development of all these parks, certainly the one in the Yukon, without approval by parliament of the bill now before us. We are, in effect, being asked to rubber stamp something the government has already committed millions of dollars to develop. It amuses me when I see in the bill provisions with respect to consultation. For example, the provision in clause 2 of the bill stipulates, and I quote:

> The Governor in Council may, by proclamation, amend the schedule by adding to any park described therein lands described in the proclamation where the Governor in Council is satisfied that

(b) agreement has been reached with the province in which the lands are situated that the lands are suitable for addition to a National Park;

The government's idea of consultation is that it should make a unilateral decision and, having made that decision, go to the other government concerned and ask: What are your views? Sotto voce, they say: We do not really care, because we have made up our minds, but we must go through the process of consultation. It is the same when it comes to the so-called consultative process involving the Indian people. I wonder how many of the organizations the government funded so that they might be set up for the purpose of dialogue have been consulted concerning the establishment of national parks at Kluane, at Nahanni, or on Baffin Island. I should say precious little. They make up their minds and, having done so, they disclose their plans. Then, they hear views which they call input, but these views do not change their decision one iota.

There is a still more serious objection which we take in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories, if I may presume to speak for my colleague in the New Democratic Party. In the north, in the two territories, all lands, for the most part, are owned by the government over which this House of Commons purports to exercise a measure of control. Clause two stipulates that the government may add land to any park provided it can reach an agreement with the province in which the land is situated. Now, according to the Interpretation Act, a statute of this parliament, a province is defined as including both territories. One would, therefore, assume that the same kind of agreement must be reached with each of the territorial governments as must be reached with the provinces before any extension of park boundaries can come about.

But it is the minister himself who is the government of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories. So, when it comes to the implementation of this clause he puts on his hat as federal Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and says to the Yukon or the Northwest Territories: I am obliged by this legislation to secure your agreement, since certain lands are situated within the boundaries of your jurisdiction, that it is in order to extend the boundaries of a national park. Then, he takes off his hat as federal minister and puts on his hat as minister responsible for the government of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and says to himself: I agree with you that the boundaries should be extended. That is the situation, and shows how ridiculous this kind of provision for consultation is as far as the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are concerned.

The fact of the matter is that what the minister decides determines what will take place in those two northern territories. If he wants to extend the boundaries of the Kluane National Park from roughly 8,500 square miles to 207,031 square miles, indeed, the whole of the area of the Yukon Territory, and make it a people reserve, he can do just that. I am not arguing against the notion of a people reserve. Sometimes, when I have spent too long in these southern areas of Canada I think it would be a good idea to set up a people reserve, such as the Yukon is at the moment. But I do object to legislation such as this, supposedly intended to work throughout Canada for the benefit of all Canadians, being designed to cover only provincial requirements without regard for any meaningful consultation or any—if I might use a phrase which seems, now, to have been discarded—any provision for participatory democracy being contained in it whatsoever.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Throughout the debate on whether or not federal parks should be established in the north, I have maintained that what the government should be doing, particularly when the acquisition of such a vast area of land and such a vast amount of potentially resource-rich reserve is under consideration, is first of all to make a careful assessment of the commercial and resource potential of that land before unilaterally and arbitrarily establishing the area as a park. I do not think this is being done. I do not think I am being unfair to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and his predecessors or to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his predecessors, when I charge them with failing to act in accordance with this very reasonable and logical approach. No real assessment has been made of the potential. The consequence is that in the Yukon, at any rate—I am not as familiar with the situation in the Territories—two very decided and discernible bodies of opinion have arisen. On the one hand, there are the conservationists and the environmentalists who want the park boundaries not only to remain as described in this bill, but to be extended still further. On the other hand, there are those who insist just as strongly that the boundaries are too wide and that within the vast area they enclose, potential exists for mineral development which should not be frozen by the action the minister is taking.

The question could easily be solved had the government followed the suggestion which has repeatedly been made to it, namely, that a resources inventory be taken within the boundaries of the land proposed as a national park. The committee will be hearing these opinions when it goes to the Yukon on December 10. It will be hearing opinions from the Yukon Conservation Society, the Yukon Resource Council, the Yukon Chamber of Mines, the British Columbia and Yukon Chamber of Mines and many other interested individuals and organizations. These opinions will reflect both sides of the question. I see the minister present in the chamber, though not in his place. I know he will be most interested to hear what the committee has to say when it reports to the House.

There is another point I wish to mention. The minister—and I do not say this in a denigrating manner—came to the House after I did and he has made one or two statements, both here and in committee, which left the inference that I had in the past been opposed to the establishment of national parks in the Yukon and in the north generally and that I was now coming round to his way of thinking, particularly since the introduction of the bill before us. Nothing could be farther from the truth. If he is fair, after looking at past Hansards he will admit my position has been consistent throughout the 16 years I have sat here, namely that national parks are a requirement in this part of Canada as much as they are in the south. But for heaven's sake the logical approach should surely be to examine inventory resources and hold a public inquiry or hearing before their establishment.

This refuge was sought when I was saying to the government, of which the present minister was a member of the treasury benches, that there was no need to stall. I said the government could set up its national park in the Yukon now and that it did not have to wait. The minister's reply, and that of some of his officials was: "Well, we can't very well do that because there are now provisions in the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and in the Yukon Placer Mining Act which would permit mining activities to occur within park boundaries, because they, too, are federal statutes". And indeed they are.

I notice that in clause 11 of the bill the minister has very easily overcome the difficulty, as was suggested to him and his officials in committee, by inserting a subclause that would make the act establishing a park in the north operable notwithstanding any other act of parliament. This is in fact the recurring theme in clause 11. Subclause (2) states that the Governor in Council, which is the cabinet that is going to act on the recommendation of the minister, may after consultation with the council of the Yukon territory or the council of the Northwest Territories, as the case may be, by proclamation set aside as a national park of Canada, and so on, with publication in the Canada Gazette 90 days beforehand, etc.

Consultation in the sense that this bill contemplates consultation means simply nothing. The minister makes up his mind, and the decision having been taken, consultation is window dressing, at least as that word is used in the bill. The minister shakes his head but I have seen this happen so often with the Indian people. I do not know why he shakes his head. He knows full well that the cabinet comes to decisions, and these decisions are then communicated to the organizations concerned. In this case it would be to the Indian Brotherhood, or the Territorial Council, or what have you, and the government would ask: "What do you think of our decision? Isn't it a great thing?" Then, they listen either to kudos or to condemnation, but it does not change their mind one iota and the decision stands. This window dressing clause which says "after consultation" means nothing.

A few years ago when the minister was still in this portfolio but a little fresher than he is now, amendments came before the House to the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. They had a rough time in committee, even though the government enjoyed a very much greater majority in committees than it does today. We went through this whole process of consulting with the people in the north before making decisions. The government wrote into the amendments to the Yukon Act and Northwest Territories Act the phrase "after consultation with the councils of the respective territories". It was meaningless. Why cannot the government say the same as in clause 2, namely, that there must be agreement with the councils of both territories? Of what is the government afraid? The last referendum taken in the council of the Yukon showed unanimous support in favour of the establishment of a national park. Is the government afraid it might get a negative response if the people of the north were asked to voice a deciding opinion and to make the establishment of the extension of boundaries conditional upon the consent or agreement of the two northern territories, as is the case with the provinces?

What about the consultative process of the government in terms of the energy talks with Alberta? That has been about as effective and as meaningful as the consultation phrase as far as this government is concerned. There was no consultation with the province of Alberta about the energy crisis we are now experiencing. I draw these contrasts to the attention of the House because not too many members have been to the northern territories. Not too many realize that the residents of these areas have the same kind of aspirations as any other Canadians. Not too many of them realize that in the territorial councils, which the minister taunts as having all the powers of a provincial legislature, there is less power than the average municipality has in this country.

The people in the north want to be heard. They want to be a deciding factor in any decisions that are made governing their future. They do not object to setting up a national park in the Yukon, but they do object to the minister making a decision and saying: "Here it is; this is what you get, like it or lump it", without any hearings being held. This is why I welcome the fact that this bill has come before the House at this stage, on the eve of the visit of the standing committee to several of the communities in the Yukon that will be very vitally affected by this bill if it passes in its present form.

Mining interests and resource interests are going to present their views in regard to the boundaries, as are the environmentalists. Some of the problems the minister will have to explain and some of the questions that the committee will be unable to answer when they visit there are these: What is going to happen to the dozens of mining claims that have been staked inside the boundaries proposed in the schedules to this bill? Dozens of mining claims have been staked under the provisions of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act; similarly dozens of claims have been staked and leases obtained under the provisions of the Yukon Placer Mining Act. When the committee goes to the Yukon people will say to the members of the committee: "What is the government going to do with respect to reimbursing us for the dollars and time we have spent developing these claims over the years?"

Then, there are people who hold leases on land used for purposes other than mining which is within the boundaries of the proposed park as set out in this bill. Other citizens hold licences to occupy lands within the boundaries of the park as set out in this bill. This committee is a body set up by parliament which will be inviting representations from people in the Yukon. What are the members of the committee going to say to those people when they ask: "Is the government going to pay us? How much money is the government going to give us? Is it going to expropriate our rights? When are the hearings going to be held?" What are we going to answer in reply to inquiries of this kind, the most natural kind of inquiry by people owning interests within the proposed boundaries?

One matter I have not mentioned and of which I know the minister is aware, is the growing body of resource opinion regarding the hydroelectric potential of the Alsek River. Here, I am told, is a natural drainage area which could be developed into a producer of hydroelectric power in excess of that which is contemplated by the Aishihik project now under way in the Yukon. This was a project that was not even considered by the department when it made the decision to establish the boundaries of this park. Indeed, I am sure the project has only recently come to the minister's attention.

Members of the committee who visit the Yukon now would hear representations concerning such an approach. Having the view I have of the effectiveness of committees of this House as a whole, it is a little too much to hope that anything a committee does, anything it hears and anything it recommends as a result, would receive any worthwhile or meaningful consideration by the minister or this government. We have seen unanimous recommendations come out of committees, I might add not just with this minority government but in a previous majority situation, which have been sloughed aside by this minister and his Cabinet colleagues. Time after time during this session recommendations have come out of that committee, either unanimously or with a substantial majority, only to be ignored.

Mr. Woolliams: That sounds like me.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not the only example. We have just witnessed one of the greatest examples of this session in respect of the recommendations of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, also ignored by the government. Indeed, the minister thinks so much of this committee which passed a recommendation by a substantial majority, he decided to reverse that recommendation and nullify the effect of that committee's work. I ask you what the purpose is of committees. They waste hours, days and weeks of time, as well as hundreds of thousands of dollars in taxpayers' money, in a useless and meaningless exercise, bringing recommendations to the attention of this House which are ignored and shoved aside by an unfeeling government. That is what this government means by the beautiful phrase "after consultation with". I only wish that meant something.

Mr. Chrétien: I agree with you.

Mr. Nielsen: I also agree if it only meant something, but it means nothing. The minister knows it means nothing. If he really believed there should be consultation before coming to decisions, he would sit down with the representatives of the two councils concerned before any decision was made affecting the administration of affairs in the north. The minister cannot truthfully say he does that. He cannot truthfully say he makes these decisions concerning his responsibility for Indian affairs after consultation with the people most concerned, because he does not do that. This is on record and I could refer to many documents issued by his department which show that his department ignores this principle left, right and centre.

I am sure the minister sincerely wants to do a good job. He may even think he has achieved some success, and perhaps he is now thinking that if he can bring the James Bay situation out of the fire he will get a new portfolio that is a little less onerous but which provides a little more challenge.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Chrétien: There is none better than this one.

Mr. Nielsen: I agree with the minister on that, but he is not going to make a real success of things, such as Bill S-4 and his other responsibilities, until he takes more seriously the real desires of the people of the north who, after all, are not so much different from those people of his own province. Those people are fighting for an identity. Some of them in his province are fighting to get out of confederation, while we in the north are continuing to fight to get into confederation. We are always being put down, not only by the minister who is not 100 per cent to blame but by his officials and the bureaucrats. After all, if that structure disappeared so would his department. If the people of the north were given the same kind of decision-making power the minister is giving the provinces in Bill S-4, there would be no reason for the existence of the bureaucratic infrastructure of his department.

Mr. Chrétien: In 1969, I offered to cut my department in two but you refused.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says he offered to cut his department in two in 1969, but I do not recall that. I do not recall his ever having made such an offer to the Yukon Council or the Northwest Territories Council. I invite him to do so in order to see how quickly it would be snapped up. Let him make that offer to the people of the north, those of us who live there and those of us who are affected by these decisions. Let us make the decisions as they are made in the provinces. Make that offer to us and see how quickly we will snap it up. We think we are entitled to the same rights as the people of Biafra, Nigeria and other emerging nations of the world. Canada is one of the few nations of the world which still has a colonial government, and I refer to that government in the north.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member I should like to know if I heard him correctly. Is he calling for provincial status for the Yukon right now? I should like a simple answer, yes or no, as he asks of us once in a while. Are you asking for provincial status for the Yukon right now?

Mr. Nielsen: I will give the minister an answer like we never get from members of the government benches. The answer is yes, we are ready for it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: There is no pricetag on bureaucracy in the north and there is no population tag. We in the north are entitled to the same rights as other Canadians, and they are being kept from us by the minister. We on this side represent the only national party committed to that principle.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT DELINEATING GOVERNMENT'S POWER IN DISPOSING OF PUBLIC LANDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate as the matter of national parks is of such concern to the province of Saskatchewan. That province has at this time one national park, Prince Albert National Park. Since the early 1960's we have heard a number of proposals relating to a park in southern Saskatchewan to be called the Grassland National Park. This proposal has caused a great deal of confusion and a great deal of concern on the part of the farming and ranching people in that area of southern Saskatchewan. This concern relates to the implications of the establishment of a park in that area for cattle and farming generally. It has also caused concern to many of the so-called nationalists in southern Saskatchewan who for years have been concerned about the grassland areas around Kildeer and Val Marie. They are concerned about the possible destruction of this natural grassland area by the influx of tourists.

In the short time at my disposal, I should like to make several suggestions to the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). Let me make several positive proposals in respect of what might be done to develop a national park in the area without disturbing the lifestyle of the people who have lived there for generations. Mr. Speaker, when the Parliamentary Secretary addressed the House on the second reading of this bill, he made the following statement which I wish to pursue at this time. He stated:

In its broad concept, clause 2 provides a procedural simplification for dealing with park boundary adjustments. Let me assure you, however, that clause 2 does not authorize any deletions, however small, from parks. I should also like to emphasize that no new park can be established without the approval of Parliament.

I believe it to be absolutely fundamental that should this government or any government, be it Liberal, Conservative, New Democratic or Social Credit, on a federal level suggest the establishment of a new park within the Dominion of Canada it ought to be the right of any member of this House to stand up and speak up on the bill relating to the establishment of a park in his area. I am pleased to see, and I want to spell this out clearly for my constituents, that this legislation does not allow for the establishment of any park without parliamentary authority. Should any government present that kind of legislation, I will endeavour to stop such a bill with all the power I possess. It should be a fundamental rule that members have a right to express their opinion in respect of the establishment of any park, whether it is the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) or my colleague the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) or indeed members from southern Saskatchewan, where a proposed grassland national park has been mentioned on several occasions.

What are some of the historical developments related to the federal government's proposed grassland national park? Well, historically the events related to the establishment of the grassland national park began back at least in 1966. In 1966, under the Liberal Government of Saskatchewan, there was a suggestion to the federal government that that province was prepared to enter into the necessary land negotiations in order to establish the national park. In other words, the province was prepared to move in the direction of negotiating with the local farmers and ranchers in respect of the establishment of the grassland national park. This caused a great deal of concern to the people of southern Saskatchewan.

In 1967, the boundary proposed in the report prepared by the National Parks Service reduced the number of square miles for such a park from 640 square miles to 360 square miles. In 1967, the Deputy Premier of the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Davey Steuart, advised the federal government that, because of the ranching industry and the wildlife involved, there would be $2 million needed for land acquisition. Because of the cost involved in respect of such a park, Saskatchewan at that point in time was opposed to any further consideration of a grassland national park in Saskatchewan. However, in 1968 an economic impact study was undertaken in respect of this national park. It indicated that the benefits exceeded the cost. It was called the Kaplan report. For the minister's sake, I wish to deal with it in order to show that this report, which was put out by a group out of Montreal, was the most outrageous piece of nonsense that has ever been written under the guise of an economic impact study. This report probably did more to stop the development of any proposed park in that area than any other document that was prepared.

In 1969, the Premier of Saskatchewan, at that time Mr. Thatcher, advised that the province would be prepared to reopen discussions if the following points were met: mineral rights remain with Saskatchewan; 20-year phasing out for grazing—in other words the farmers and ranchers in the area were to have no future—and federal financial assistance in respect of land acquisition. From 1969 to 1970, negotiations and discussions continued between the two levels of Liberal government. In 1971, a meeting was held in Saskatchewan between the ranchers and the Minister of National Resources of the province to update the ranchers on where matters stood at that time. This meeting was held under the auspices of the new NDP government. In October 1971 the Minister of Mineral Resources of the province of Saskatchewan advised that there had been a change in policy, and that the government did not have the positive attitude towards the development of this park based on the proposals made in the Kaplan report as did the previous government.

In October 1971, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) suggested there be a meeting of federal and provincial officials to carry out the following proposals: identify a core area for each of the two-park components; minimize interruption of ranching and interruption of grazing which might be discontinued; identify outer boundaries of the ultimate park to be realized over a period of time with ranching to continue on the basis of the life tenancy of those ranchers not wishing to sell. It was suggested that if a park were established in the 360 square mile area, then the proposed legislation now before us would give the government the power through Order in Council to extend the boundaries without bringing the matter before parliament. This could have a detrimental effect on the area of southern Saskatchewan where the park is proposed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knight: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings now before the House. These proceedings will be resumed later this day. Pursuant to an order made on Friday, November 23, the House will now revert to motions.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON MEASURES TO CONSERVE SUPPLY

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in describing Canada's crude oil and products supply situation to this House on November 1, I said that the exact magnitude of the possible oil import curtailment which we might face was uncertain. Stock levels were in delicate balance across the country, with the possible exception of residual fuel oil in British Columbia. Any curtailment would pose problems of supplying some regions of the country and, therefore, I announced the steps the government was then taking to assess our ability to meet, and to lay plans for dealing with, any shortfalls.

While there are still some uncertainties with respect to the depth of shortfalls we shall suffer, we have, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced on Thursday evening, decided that the facts now warrant embarking upon a voluntary program of energy conservation immediately to be followed by a program of mandatory allocations to be in place early in the new year.

Eastern Canada is totally dependent on imported crude oil and products. British Columbia has historically relied upon some importation of heating oil and residual fuel from the United States. The Arab nations have, until recently provided eastern Canada with 30 per cent of its crude oil supplies. This has amounted to about 300,000 barrels per day. The direct impact of Arab production cutbacks of 25 per cent would, therefore, be 75,000 barrels a day or about 7.5 per cent of our needs in eastern Canada. The cutbacks of 25 per cent of Arab production, however, represent a fall of 20 per cent in total world supply. Canada will have to share, not only in the direct cutback from Arab sources but in the general world shortfall. We may, therefore, suffer a loss, if world shortfalls are shared equally, of up to 200,000 barrels a day. Further, the Arab states have stated their intention of further reductions at the rate of 5 per cent per month from December. Our ultimate shortfall will clearly depend on the speed with which Middle East problems are resolved, but could be in excess of 20 per cent or over 200,000 barrels a day. While it is true, I have said, that our stock positions were adequate and, indeed, held up to 45 days supply of oil products in inventory, even if the Arab nations resumed full production tomorrow at pre-war levels, it is the government's judgment that the situation warrants the actions which I am announcing tonight.

Before describing the nature of the voluntary and mandatory programs, I would like to list the actions we have been taking, some of which have been announced in this House and some of which were alluded to by the Prime Minister both to ease and manage supply shortfalls.

On November 1, I announced the formation of the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand under the chairmanship of the National Energy Board. This committee has been meeting weekly to examine supply and demand slates, to determine stock trends and to provide advice to the government with respect to the over-all supply situation. First, we have sought out and purchased, on government account, supplies of products in world markets. Second, shipments of western Canadian crude oil by Seaway from Sarnia to Montreal, which averaged 17,000 barrels a day in September, will average close to 100,000 barrels a day in November, and will continue at this rate until the Seaway closes. Third, we are organizing and co-ordinating a substantial movement of crude oil and products by rail and truck following the closing of the Seaway. Fourth, we are organizing the movement in excess of 50,000 barrels a day of western crude via the Trans Mountain Pipe Line to Vancouver and via ship through the Panama Canal to Montreal. Sixth, re-arrangements have been made in Trans-Northern product pipeline flows to augment product supplies in eastern Ontario. Capacity will be available for the movement of about one third of the heating oil requirements of the Ottawa area.

Despite these arrangements, we cannot guarantee that the oil that has been and will be lost in the Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic markets can be replaced. The impact of these shortages, particularly of heating oil, will begin to be felt immediately but will be particularly severe in late winter and early spring. I should also note that while we may not experience any immediate shortage of gasoline, the loss of crude oil, together with refiners' efforts to maximize the production of heating oil from available crude are both occurring in a period when stocks of gasoline would normally be refurbished. In the spring, this failure to replenish stocks may be felt in inadequate gasoline supplies.

At the same time that a shortage of international petroleum supplies has been developing, there has been a sharp increase in the price of crude oil coming to Canada from overseas. In his statement to the House of September 4, the Prime Minister indicated that eastern refiners would be permitted to pass on to consumers increased costs resulting from increase in international prices. I have been advised that the costs experienced by eastern refiners have increased again this month, and I have therefore acceded to requests for increases in product prices in that part of the market to be effective December 1. Increased costs vary from refiner to refiner but the average increase is anticipated to be between four cents and five cents a gallon for motor gasoline.

I would like to make one further observation before describing the program of voluntary conservation in which I would urge all Canadians to engage. Eastern Canada and, to a lesser extent, British Columbia, will feel the shortages most. We do not anticipate any shortage in the prairies, but Ontario will feel the effects of our efforts to distribute product supplies equitably. While the mandatory allocation program which I am announcing will deal only in those allocations and those areas where necessary and practical, I am urging all Canadians to embrace the program of voluntary restraint. Oil conserved in the Prairies, for instance, even if it may be transported to other regions only with some difficulty, may yet provide us some needed options in meeting our difficulties.

I would now like to talk about the voluntary program we propose. In my statement of November 1, I concluded by requesting Canadian consumers, municipalities, heavy industry and provincial governments to study means of reducing consumption of energy on a voluntary basis. Since that time, I have received numerous letters from industry indicating the measures they were implementing or planning to implement in order to increase the energy efficiency of their operations. Many provincial and municipal governments have already undertaken voluntary conservation measures, and indeed some governments and industries have gone further than this and launched campaigns to heighten individual awareness of the ways by which energy can be conserved and the savings that can result from voluntary co-operation. I am deeply appreciative of these actions.

Tonight I would like to detail for you some of the measures that the federal government is introducing to reduce its own energy consumption, and to speak more specifically about some of the ways in which other Canadians can voluntarily reduce their consumption of energy.

To heat its buildings, the federal government uses about 2 per cent of all the heating oil used in Canada. As a government, we are taking steps to reduce our fuel oil requirements. The Department of National Defence has already undertaken a program designed to achieve substantial cutbacks in fuel requirements, both at home and abroad.

The Department of Public Works has developed a detailed set of guidelines which it will apply to the buildings it administers, and these guidelines will be applied to other federal properties as well, with appropriate modifications in special circumstances. The guidelines recommend that, depending on the nature and the size of building, temperatures be maintained at a maximum of 68 degrees to 70 degrees between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. on weekdays and 63 degrees to 65 degrees between 6 p.m. and 5 a.m. on weekdays. These lower temperature settings would also prevail on weekends and holidays. As well, the guidelines include detailed suggestions to improve the operating efficiency of heating plants, and to reduce ventilation. At the end of my statement I should like to table a copy of these guidelines.

I should like to stress that these guidelines have been prepared in such a way that they will provide the maximum possible saving with the least amount of discomfort. Indeed, I suspect that many people will find their working conditions more comfortable. We expect that, on average, the actions we propose to take will result in a reduction in federal fuel oil requirements of 18 per cent. Action has already been taken to implement these guidelines and to support them with a co-ordinated reporting and monitoring system.

The savings that we expect in the federal government's own consumption of petroleum are large in percentage terms, but it must be remembered that the federal government's share in total petroleum consumption is fairly small. If we are to significantly reduce the impacts of the foreseen shortages by voluntary measures—as I believe every Canadian wishes to do—then we will require the help of all Canadians.

I am pleased to announce that I met with the energy ministers of the provinces last Friday and believe I have their co-operation in extending the federal guidelines to their own properties to the fullest extent possible.

Tonight, I would strongly urge commercial and industrial enterprises to examine the guidelines set by the Department of Public Works for temperature and ventilation control and to implement them, with modification where necessary, as soon as possible. I would like to stress again that the adoption of these guidelines will result in a minimal loss of comfort and may, in some cases, increase comfort. I know that many of us have experienced overly warm stores when shopping and this is particularly true in the pre-Christmas season when stores are very congested and customers warmly dressed. I would anticipate that reducing temperatures in these circumstances will increase the comfort of the customer, while not seriously inconveniencing sales personnel.

While I am appealing to commercial and industrial users of energy, I would like to make one further point. Industry is expected to observe the guidelines on comfort heating and to improve its efficiency wherever possible in the use of process energy. However, in anticipation of the serious implications which a reduction in industrial process energy could have on the economy as a whole, more particularly in terms of output and employment, industry is not being asked to reduce manufacturing output under this voluntary program.

Industrial and commercial users use almost 25 per cent of total heating oil in Canada, and if significant savings can result in these sectors, we will move a long way toward reducing the shortages that face us. However, Mr. Speaker, the largest single use of heating oil in Canada is for residential heating, and the success of any voluntary conservation program must ultimately rely on the co-operation of individual Canadians in reducing their own space heating requirements.

In the case of large buildings accommodating many people, maximum temperature settings are constrained by the diverse requirements of the many people using a building. Individuals in their residences are freer to adjust temperatures to their own preferences. I would urge that as a minimum individuals maintain temperatures no higher than 68-70 degrees during the day, and about 5 degrees lower at night or when the dwelling is unoccupied. At the same time, I hope that across the country we might achieve average temperature reductions of 5-7 degrees in residences.

I want to emphasize, too, to the Canadian consumer, that saving fuel is saving money. Estimates of savings vary, and depend on such factors as the heat retention capabilities of the building and furnace efficiency. To achieve maximum possible savings, I would again like to table a standard check list of the important steps that can be taken, and I would request each Canadian who is in any way responsible for space heating to put them into practice as soon as possible. It is generally agreed that for each degree drop in temperature fuel savings of 2 per cent to 3 per cent are likely to be achieved. If the target I have set tonight, a 5-7 degree drop in average temperatures, can be attained, Canadian consumers can realize fuel savings of 10 per cent to 15 per cent. There are many different ways of expressing savings of this magnitude.

One way is to tell you that over this winter it can amount to as much as 375 million gallons of heating oil, but I expect that most of you would not find that terribly meaningful. A better measure is perhaps to point out that in dollar terms this saving would amount to about $125 million. But perhaps the most meaningful information I can give you is to put it on an individual basis. An average Canadian household, achieving the targets set tonight, might reduce its winter fuel bill by some $35 to $50, and the oil saved might provide an extra three to four weeks of petroleum supply at the end of the winter season when we expect the impact of the shortages to be most severe.

Next to space heating, the second major area of energy conservation relates to motor gasoline. I have already referred to the gasoline supply position that confronts us this winter, and next spring and summer. At the same time you are all aware, from stories in the press, of what the response to gasoline shortage has been in the United States and some European countries.

We have discussed with the provinces the considerations involved in a mandatory reduction of highway speed limits. Such an action would involve considerable expense for provincial governments and we have concluded that it would not, at the moment, be justified. The question of curtailing driving on certain days or at certain times is a difficult one. On balance it seems to us more equitable, if shortages turn out to be critical enough to warrant it, to ration gasoline and let each motorist determine his own driving times, rather than arbitrarily to impose bans on driving which might fall unequally on some people.

The necessity to reconsider these decisions and to impose legislative restrictions on motor vehicle use will depend on the success of voluntary actions to conserve gasoline. It has been estimated that a reduction in speed from 70 mph to 50 mph will result in a gasoline saving between 20 per cent and 40 per cent. Although no legislation is being sought at this point I would urge Canadians, in the strongest possible terms, voluntarily to reduce highway driving speeds to 50 mph. As well, I would again like to table at the end of this statement a standard check list of some of the more important conservation measures motorists can take.

I also want to note that I am not tonight making any specific requests of the transportation sector of the economy. We would not at this time like to see any interruption or serious slowdown in the flow of goods. At the same time we believe these goods should be moved in the most energy efficient manner that is economically feasible, and I would ask the transportation industry to examine its use of energy and to make cutbacks where possible.

Government is initiating steps to ensure that the voluntary guidelines I have proposed will be applied to official vehicles, subject to operational limitations. In addition, actions have been undertaken by the Ministry of Transport to ensure that fuel is used efficiently in commercial air flights, and to assess the saving potential of increased railroad operations in urban areas in an attempt to reduce commuter traffic on the road.

Before leaving this subject I want to speak specifically about car pools, since they are potentially a tremendous source of savings. Calculations suggest that the formation of a four-man car pool and the elimination of three cars driving five miles to a work site could save two gallons of gasoline per day, 40 gallons of gasoline per month, and $6 per person per month. Between now and next summer the saving from one such car pool could be 240 gallons of gasoline and $40 per person for fuel alone. These savings are considerable and tonight I am urging employers, including all levels of government, to take whatever steps they can to assist the formation of car pools. Such actions might range from co-ordinating and organizing car pools, to giving parking spaces on a preferential basis and, if necessary, to examine the possibility of adjusting working hours and shifts. It has been estimated that the conscientious pursuit of conservation measures can yield savings in motor gasoline of anywhere from 15 per cent to 25 per cent over the next year. A 20 per cent saving would result in a saving to the nation of up to 3.75 million gallons of gasoline per day, and an annual saving to the average motorist of as much as $100.

I would like now to say a few words about electric power. In almost every household there are a number of appliances that are major consumers of electricity. In many homes electricity provides space heating as well as hot water. There is no question in my mind that in the longer run we must learn to use our energy resources, all of our energy resources, wisely and efficiently. In the context of the immediate dislocations facing us, however, the conservation of electricity poses special problems. In many parts of Canada, particularly in eastern Canada, electricity is generated by burning petroleum products. In these areas it is essential that conservation measures be actively pursued. In other regions of Canada where the generation of electricity does not depend on petroleum, supply appears to be more than adequate. In these areas it may appear to make sense to use electricity to economize on petroleum products, by such measures as using space heaters in homes. In fact, such actions might seriously strain the capacity of the system and result in service interruptions.

Because the situation is so complex, and because the large and inter-related power networks in Canada make it difficult for the average Canadian to know what the source of his electricity is, I have asked the Energy Minister of the provinces, through their electric utilities, to develop information programs to advise the Canadian consumer on what actions would be appropriate this winter in their regions. I would hope that in this process the utilities would bear in mind substitutions that might be implemented. For example, I am mindful of the security reasons for much of the commercial lighting we see at night. Nevertheless, if commercial lighting requirements would be kept to the minimum necessary, it might, where advisable, be possible for consumers to make more use of electrical space heaters and electric blankets without seriously straining the capacity of the electrical system.

One of the colourful aspects of the Canadian scene at this time of year is the outdoor lighting of homes and commercial establishments to mark the Christmas season. At the risk of being designated as "The Grich who stole Christmas," I would ask individual Canadians, and especially businessmen, to act with restraint this year. If full use of such lighting could be confined to the several days surrounding the festival, significant savings could be achieved.

The measures we are asking the Canadian people to adopt tonight are the result of an intensive evaluation process in which we have tried to isolate the most significant and least disruptive sources of energy saving. I want to emphasize that there are several possible measures that we are not asking for at this time. These include daylight saving time, legislated speed limit reductions, curtailment of Sunday driving, and some measures that other countries have adopted or are considering. Some of these we have avoided because the energy savings would not be that great; others because the potential gains, in our opinion, would be outweighed by the disruptions that would result in the lives of many Canadians.

I would be wrong, however, to conclude that because we have stopped short of what other countries have done the situation in Canada is not serious. It is indeed serious. It is important, in any serious situation, to maintain a sense of balance, to keep matters in a proper perspective. We hope that we can meet the challenge that faces us without imposing major hardships on any Canadian. But to succeed we must have the full support of all Canadians.

I wish I could give this House the assurance that, given our assessment of the oil supply situation, the saving which will flow from the voluntary conservation program would be sufficient to make a program of mandatory allocations at the wholesale level unnecessary. I can assure the House and all Canadians that a faithful pursuit of the conservation practices I have urged will substantially reduce both the magnitude and duration of the short fall we shall experience. Unfortunately, both our assessment of the probable degree of shortage and the growing inequities which begin to appear in any distribution system when products are in short supply, has convinced us that a mandatory program will be necessary.

I shall be introducing legislation to support the creation of mandatory authority and shall have an opportunity on that occasion to describe more fully the government's intent. I wish only to indicate tonight the major features of this legislation.

First, under the legislation, an Energy Supplies Allocation Board, at the direction and with the approval of the Governor in Council, will have the authority to make allocation directives to ensure equitable distribution of all petroleum products to wholesalers. The legislation will permit the Governor in Council to extend the board's authority to other energy products when and if this might be deemed necessary. Wholesalers will be expected to allocate products equitably to their customers, subject to priorities in allocation to be determined by the government.

Second, in establishing these priorities it will be the government's intention to strike an appropriate balance between the physical comfort and economic health of Canadians. The board will be composed of five people. Two will be representatives of provinces, one of consuming and one of producing provinces. One will represent industry and there will be two federal representatives, one of whom will be primarily concerned to represent the interests of Canadians as consumers.

Third, the board, upon its creation, will assume the direction of the government's efforts and will be responsible for completing the planning for the management of the allocation program as well as assuming the responsibility for the co-ordination of all voluntary efforts.

I have referred earlier to the possibility of gasoline rationing. I wish to emphasize that the mandatory allocation program I have described will not, at the present time, include rationing. The Energy Supplies Allocation Board will have the authority under the act to develop and implement rationing schemes that will apply at all levels including the retail level. The government will request the implementation of such rationing schemes only if the severity of shortages would appear to warrant it.

Finally, I would remind the House that the programs which I have described tonight are designed to deal with shortages brought about by cutbacks in Arab production and therefore, in world supplies. There will be a critical need for these programs until such time as, and only until such time as, world supplies return to normal levels and inventories are replenished. In the meantime, given Canada's relative wealth of energy resources, the government is taking and will continue to take every measure to reduce our vulnerability to foreign supply interruption.

I would suggest, however, that the voluntary conservation measures which I have urged tonight will not only help to alleviate our immediate problems, but have longer run application. We may, in retrospect, look upon the winter of 1973 as the time when each of us became conscious of what has been called the conservation ethic and the understanding that by a rearrangement of priorities and outlook, our life styles would not suffer any critical damage, but might, on the other hand, be substantially enhanced.

Mr. Speaker, I have the three lists, namely, Conservation of Energy in Federal Buildings, Conservation of Energy in the Home and Conservation of Energy in the use of Motor Vehicles. I should like now to table these and I would ask, if the House would give its consent in order that they be distributed, that they might be made an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister is suggesting that certain documents be appended to Hansard. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For text of documents referred to above see appendix A.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my comments in reply to the minister this evening must be, first of all, on the shocking revelation that the shortage we expected just a few weeks ago of 75,000 barrels a day or thereabouts as being equivalent to our share of the Arab cutback, now turns out to be 200,000 barrels a day. Even being more generous with the figures and allowing for 30 per cent of the 300,000 barrels a day we import from the Middle East, the maximum reduction we should have had to endure was 90,000 barrels a day. We could have looked after that with an all-out effort in this country. Now, we are given the information that we have to find and make up for two-thirds of the total amount of oil imported from the Middle East. I think a lot of questions have to be asked on this point, Mr. Speaker. Where did the 125,000 barrels a day shortage come from? Was it some concession that was made months ago with OECD that not only do we share our own shortages but some of the others as well. These are questions that I think the minister will have to answer, and I hope he stays in the House for the full 20 minute question period to answer them.

Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say about the voluntary part of the program. There is not much challenge to Canadians in this—no Churchillian phrases here. In fact, if the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) were in my place he would probably be describing the old-fashioned custom of his day of "bundling" which the minister and I are too young to appreciate.

I do not want to go through a long list of nitpicking suggestions that could be added to the program of voluntary proposals, Mr. Speaker, but in all seriousness I would suggest to the minister and to the government that they not forget the little proposal I made some weeks ago of having the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) immediately state that he would like to give the same sort of reduction and accelerated depreciation to fuel storage units in small towns in eastern Canada, as has been given to large companies. The shortage is going to be with us for some time and an announcement of this type could encourage some of these people to build up storage of heating oil in the summertime when it is not being used so that they would not have to reply on supplies from the big storage facilities in the cities during the winter.

Many years people all over the world have been putting forward ideas for getting more gasoline mileage from their motor vehicles by improving carburetion and so forth, but we have no way of knowing what happens to these ideas. The same thing happens with regard to furnaces and insulation in our homes. I know that there is more information over at the National Research Council on insulation than 90 per cent of the people of Canada know about. We have this practice in Canada of putting our research on the library shelves.

I should like to direct some remarks now to the question of the mandatory program. In answer to questions from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) a few weeks ago, the minister flatly stated at page 7547 of Hansard for Nov. 5:

> A mandatory program is now under preparation but it is not expected to be required.

That was 2½ weeks ago, Mr. Speaker. I should like the minister to listen to his reply when the Leader of the Opposition asked if this was based on consultation. As recorded at page 7548 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition, who has had his mouth open through most of my speech rather than his ears, that we are talking about a program which we do not expect will come into existence—

I ask all members of the House and all members of the Canadian public—whose eyes should be opened, whose ears should be opened and whose mouth should be shut?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): This government has consistently refused to face up to the possibility of supply shortages from the Middle East. I pointed out to the minister previously in this House that he can go back to questions asked in the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, and he can go back to questions asked in this House by members of this party and members of the New Democratic Party about the Montreal pipeline. He can find all sorts of questions about getting supplies from Venezuela, Nigeria and all the rest of it. Always the minister replied that these will not be necessary; there will be lots of supply. At the end of my remarks I will ask for permission to table a list of these questions and answers for the record, so that it will be in Hansard and the minister can easily find it in the future.

• (1730)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I mentioned the Montreal pipeline. I hope no one in this House believes for a moment that all we have to do is get through this winter. Montreal is in serious trouble. All of eastern Canada is in serious trouble, and will be for many years to come. On September 4, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned the decision to build the Montreal pipeline. It is now 2½ months later, November 26, and still there has been no action. We have the confusion raised by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) who pointed out there was not any steel to build a pipeline this year or next.

I suggest that the position taken by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is good. In 1961 this party issued a national oil policy which at that time was the right policy for Canada. It saved the western oil industry and gave Canada self-sufficiency today which has saved us from the fate our neighbours to the south are facing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In 1969, two years after the Arab-Israeli outbreak, our party met in conference at Niagara Falls. We put forward official resolutions of the party calling for a Montreal pipeline to transport 200,000 to 400,000 barrels a day to make sure people would not be cold in the winter. There was no reaction from the government until September 4, 1973. Thers was no reaction of a positive source from the media. All they have said is that westerners are trying to provide us with more oil in the east. I ask this simple question of all members of the House: Where was the Liberal Party when Montreal and Eastern Canada was endangered? We know where they were: they were interested in every other thing but the economics of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In 1969 our party asked for a change in the national oil policy of 1961. We still do not have an oil policy from this government. One of the very small parts of that oil policy, although an important part, is the Montreal pipeline. I say to the government, on behalf of this party and, I hope, on behalf of all Canadians: build the pipeline now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): My questions in the committee hearings of January and February were ignored. We had the statement by the Prime Minister on September 4. Two and a half months later, still no action. The government is discussing the financing with a private company, Interprovincial Pipe Line. I say, get out and arrange the finances even if the government itself has to build and pay for it. If the government can allocate power and ration gasoline, it can allocate the steel from our steel plants and we can get the project under way. Any government with a sense of urgency would have a pipeline built in 14 months, ready for the fall of 1974. Completion of this Montreal pipeline by 1974 would be timed perfectly for the looping of the Interprovincial Pipe Line west. We would have the capacity flowing through. Why should the people of Montreal and all of eastern Canada have to worry each winter for several years while this government dithers, procrastinates and does everything to pose—arrogant at one time; Uriah Heep the next? I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have said enough to make this country aware that it is about time we had a change of ministers on the government side of the House.

May I have the permission of the House to table this fundamental document.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rules of the House do not provide for the tabling of documents by private members.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether the House would consent to the list of questions and answers forming part of the speech of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Woolliams: They don't want the truth.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the House can do anything by consent—or just about anything. Obviously, though, the hon. member's suggestion, which would require unanimous consent, does not have unanimity.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, both the speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the nation last Thursday night, and the speech made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) to the House this afternoon, gave the impression of a government which had been taken by surprise in finding this country in the throes of an energy crisis. The fact is that this government has been made aware time and time again that we were heading for the present mess in which this country finds itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The problems the country faces with regard to a shortage of oil is the result of the failure of this government to formulate and implement an oil policy. Canada is now going to be required to eat the bitter fruits of this government's procrastination.

• (1740)

Mr. Douglas: One of the reasons we find ourselves in this difficult situation is that we have no delivery system to convey western crude to eastern Canada. Canada is one of the two nations in the world which is self-sufficient in oil and gas supplies, and successive governments have received adequate warning about the vulnerability of our position in the absence of a suitable system for conveying western crude to eastern Canada.

Energy Resources Policy

During the period I was associated with the government of Saskatchewan, my colleagues and I joined with the Independent Petroleum Producers Association in urging the Conservative government of that day to build a pipeline from Montreal. Since I came back to the House of Commons in 1962 I have made repeated representations to the government on this matter, to the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and to preceding ministers in charge of that department. The Independent Petroleum Producers have come before the government repeatedly, drawing attention to the necessity for making secure the oil supply to eastern Canada.

As late as June 28 last, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tabled the report on energy. On page 14 of that report we read—I suppose the report is speaking for the government—that the threat to security of supply is not sufficient to warrant building a pipeline to Montreal. Yet within a few weeks the Prime Minister, on September 4, announced that the government was in favour of building such a pipeline.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: When the Prime Minister talked, as he did the other night on the air, about planning ahead, one wonders where this planning is. We have been promised a national oil policy statement for several years. I know of nothing which has had a longer gestation period than the government's oil policy. They started out to put such a policy together four years ago. We have been promised it year after year. We are still waiting for it. The Prime Minister says now that there will be a national oil conference of first ministers in January. If he is correctly reported in the press, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says he expects nothing more concrete than a policy—and I quote—"evolving as a reality throughout 1974".

What we have seen as a substitute for an oil policy has been a series of ad hoc decisions responding to a series of crises. When some of us in this party warned the government that oil and gasoline were being sent out of the country because of a shortage in the United States, we were ignored and accused of scaremongering tactics. Finally, the government imposed export controls. We pointed out that rising prices in the United States were enabling the oil companies to realize windfall profits. The government finally woke up to the situation and on September 4 imposed a temporary price freeze and put on an export tax.

In recent months, almost every other day we have asked the minister to tell us which alternative sources of oil it is proposed to utilize in the event some of the OPEC countries, particularly the Arab states, refused to make supplies available to us. These questions were set aside with Pollyanna statements that all was well and there was no need to worry. Now we find ourselves in the position where none of the major decisions has been taken with respect to an oil policy.

The minister has not yet told us what the price structure is to be when the freeze is removed. He has not yet told us whether the government intends to set up a national energy corporation and, if so, what its functions and powers will be. He has not told us how he proposes to develop, in conjunction with the oil producing provinces, the oil sands and the shale deposits. We still do not know the position the government will take with regard to the development of these last great reservoirs of oil—a resource which Canada must develop if we are not to face an even more serious energy crisis in the future.

Let there be no doubt about the reason we face an oil shortage at the present time. It is because the government has failed to produce an oil and gas policy. And there is no immediate prospect of one being produced unless hon. gentlemen opposite decide to move much more quickly than they have done up to now.

I appeal to the Prime Minister not to wait until January to call—

Some hon. Members: An election.

Mr. Douglas:—a national energy conference. I see no reason why the first ministers could not meet some time in December. I see no reason why the government could not take an immediate decision with reference to the construction of a pipeline to Montreal so that work could begin next spring and we could look forward to its completion before the end of 1975.

The minister has put forward certain proposals, and I wish to comment on them briefly. He said he would establish an energy supplies allocation board which would be responsible for allocating oil supplies at the wholesale level. There is no doubt such a board will be needed, and that the government will have to intervene to make sure that supplies are allocated to areas where they are most required and to see they are distributed fairly. Members of this party would, of course, have preferred to see some type of marketing mechanism. If the government had taken the advice of the energy report that the minister placed before the cabinet last April, the suggestion made by the department that a national energy corporation be set up, we might not be in the situation in which we find ourselves today.

I hope that when the legislation is brought down, the minister will be prepared to tell us what plans the government has made with respect to allocating oil supplies so as to minimize the amount of unemployment which is bound to arise if industries are not able to get adequate supplies of energy. I hope the minister will also tell us, when the legislation comes down, what provision he intends to make to ensure that the independent wholesalers are able to get supplies.

The minister told us in his statement he will make sure that the wholesalers distribute the oil equitably. But will the allocation board ensure that the oil is distributed equally to the wholesalers? Everyone knows that the independent wholesalers depend on the independent oil companies for their oil and that they only get it when the major companies have a surplus. Many of these independent wholesalers service important sections of the Canadian public. We shall be anxious to secure from the minister an undertaking that the independent wholesalers will be able to get a fair share of the oil so that their customers will not suffer.

I note that the minister has acceded to the request that the price of gasoline in the eastern areas of Canada be raised between four and five cents a gallon. I want to point out that the burden of this increase will fall upon that part of Canada which can least afford to carry it. That is why we in this party have pleaded for a national petroleum corporation which would be the sole purchaser of imported and domestic oil, so as to pool all oil and equalize prices right across Canada.

When the minister brings down his legislation, I hope he will tell us how he proposes to deal with the particular problem faced by the province of British Columbia. In that province all of the refineries are geared to producing gasoline. The practice over the years has been to send Canadian oil which comes through the Trans Mountain Pipe Line, to the United States for refining and they sell back to British Columbia the diesel fuel, the middle distillates and the bunker fuel.

Recently it has become increasingly difficult to secure these petroleum products. In British Columbia they have gasoline running out of their ears, but they are having difficulty getting middle distillates, diesel fuel, home heating oil and bunker fuel. At this very moment, in my constituency, a ship with bunker oil is being unloaded. This oil is for one of the mills and is made from Canadian oil that has been processed in the United States, and they are paying $9 a barrel for this bunker oil. Surely this is a matter the minister will have to look into. Otherwise the people on Vancouver Island in particular will be cold this winter because they will not be able to get adequate supplies of home heating fuel.

I agree with the minister when he says we should try allocation of oil supplies at the wholesale level first before resorting to rationing. It is less cumbersome and administratively much easier. If it becomes necessary, of course, we can then look at the situation with respect to rationing. The other set of proposals that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made related to an appeal to the Canadian people to impose upon themselves voluntary restraints in the consumption of energy. I have no doubt at all that the Canadian people will respond as they always have to a challenge to work together to solve a problem, because it is in our common interest to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: While I criticize the government, as I have done repeatedly, for its lack of an oil policy, when we are in the situation in which we find ourselves today it is the duty of every good Canadian to co-operate with the government in trying to reduce discomfort and inconvenience to a minimum. However, the minister is going to have some difficulty telling the people of Ontario, for instance, that they should shut off their Christmas-tree lights when Ontario Hydro has asked for permits from the National Energy Board to increase its export of electricity to the United States by over one-third. What makes the situation even worse, Mr. Speaker, is that while the National Energy Board has approved the application and sent it to the government for ratification, the board in the meantime, I am told, has issued emergency permits. It will be very difficult to tell the Canadian people that they have to turn off their lights at the same time as we are increasing our electricity exports by more than one-third.

Mr. Sharp: What is wrong with selling electricity to the Americans?

Mr. Douglas: If I understood the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) correctly, he asked what was wrong with exporting power. I say that it is somewhat illogical to be increasing exports of power by more than one-third at the same time as you are asking the people of the country to turn down the lights. In addition, the minister recommended that we should take the sofa away from the walls and the windows, and also be might have suggested that when young people sit on the sofa they turn the lights out altogether!

It is also going to be difficult to explain to the people who live west of the Ottawa Valley why they should be curtailing their consumption of oil at the same time as we are exporting more than half of our supplies of oil and gas to the United States. I have never suggested that we should cut off our oil supplies to the United States.

Some hon. Members: Ah!

Mr. Douglas: But I want to remind the government that its stated policy is that we should only export oil that is surplus to our needs, and that the first demand upon Canadian resources is the needs of the Canadian people. I would further remind the government that until a few years ago our American friends restricted our exports of oil to the United States to 300,000 barrels a day. Now we are exporting over a million barrels a day. If we had not put on export controls, we would not have any oil left for ourselves.

I conclude by saying that I think much of the minister's statement today, like the statement of the Prime Minister last Thursday night, is an attempt to divert public attention from the fact that the government has procrastinated for so long that it has allowed this country to get into this very unfortunate situation. The minister says that when the Arab-Israeli war is over, we will return to normal. I want to remind him that the OPEC nations, and particularly the Arab states, have made it clear that even when the war is over they do not propose to go beyond the production figures they had prior to that time. I think the day may come when we will thank the Arab states for waking us up to the fact that we must develop a policy by which we can use our own resources for the benefit of the Canadian people; and the sooner we get busy and do that, the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am informed by reliable sources that it is approximately six o'clock. However, I am wondering whether it would be the sense of the House that the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) be allowed to make his statement at this time.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: This would require unanimous consent, and I am inquiring whether there is such.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

I very much regret to advise the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) that there is not unanimous consent. The House will by happy to hear him at eight o'clock.

It being six o'clock, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not allowed to make my comments after the other political leaders. I thank the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for his kindness, when he came to apologize for his colleague. Another member told me that it was normal for the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) to deny his consent, because he had to leave immediately before the closing time of the Liquor Board at 6.30 which enabled him to carry on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that his comments are out of order. I hope that he will immediately come to the matter now under consideration.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I was only reporting what a colleague of the hon. member for Crowfoot told me.

I now come to the subject matter we are considering tonight. I very carefully read the French translation of the English speech I heard last night on channel 7 of the American network in which President Nixon announced the restraints imposed upon the American people. The minister read this afternoon the French version of the speech delivered last night. I see him laugh and he knows that I tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker, in this—

An hon. Member: This is a delayed reaction.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, a delayed reaction.

Mr. Lewis: This is true and amusing at the same time.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I know it is true. Once more I can see, as all my colleagues in this House, that we are somewhat aping the Americans. If they decide something, you can hear the same thing repeated in Canada the following day. If the discount rate of American banks is increased by ½ or 1 per cent, "His Excellency" the Governor of the Bank of Canada does exactly the same the following day, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), responsible in a sovereign government, repeats what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe one single word of all the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said about the oil shortage. I heard the people from Alberta say that we had in that province enough petroleum products for the next hundred years. I heard as well Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec, about two weeks ago say that there would not be any shortage in the province of Quebec. He changed his mind when he met with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few days after his statement.

An hon. Member: After the election.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The Prime Minister of Canada made him change his mind.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a book just given us and written by the hon. Joey Smallwood, former Liberal Premier of Newfoundland for many years and who is surely not a Créditiste. He writes and I quote:

What else does Mr. Smallwood have to say? In Chapter 24, page 471, we may read the following:

[English]

This is in "I Chose Canada", the memoirs of the Hon. Joey Smallwood.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): En français.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is in eastern Canada, not in Alberta: "we are drowning in a sea of oil".

And the minister recommends that we tighten our belts. This reminds me of the years 1929 to 1939. Then, in the name of the world-wide economic crisis, both the Right hon. Mackenzie King and the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett told Canadians: Tighten your belts, this is a world-wide crisis and there is nothing that we can do about it. At the same time, mountains of wheat were burned in western Canada, potatoes were soaked in laundry bluing in New Brunswick, milk was thrown away, and the production was destroyed. This happened in 1934 and 1935.

Mr. Corbin: I was born in 1934.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is possible. The hon. member was not there at the time, so he did not need potatoes. But this does not explain why he has stayed in the potato fields all his life.

Mr. Speaker, in those days, people were told: Starve, even though you are sitting on mountains of wheat! This afternoon, in 1973, the minister told us: We have too much oil, you will freeze! We shall freeze because we have too much oil. The minister makes recommendations. He is an intelligent man, but I believe that those who wrote the speech which he gave this afternoon are not, far from it, and I wonder if it would not be better if some of them were in Saint-Jean-de-Dieu, in Montreal, rather than at the service of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker, how can one imagine the recommendations that we heard this afternoon concerning motor vehicles?

Buy slightly less than a full tank of gasoline. This will prevent wasteful overflow . . .

One should wait till it is full to fear an overflow. Further on it is said:

Remove bugs and foreign matter from your radiator to prevent overheating.

Mr. Speaker, the minister could not stop from laughing while reading these things.

Mr. Laprise: He had not read the declaration before making it to this House.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): There lies the fault, Mr. Speaker. He surely had not read the declaration before making it to this House, for he would never had said such things. I have talked of automobiles. Let us consider energy conservation in the home. Now there's a good one! I have read parts of it to the waitresses in the dining room a minute ago and they were all laughing. Here's one:

(a) Lock windows to achieve a better seal.

That is usually done in the winter. Moreover we are also asked to set thermostats at 68 to 63 degrees at night. I think that just about everyone does that. At night, the thermostat is set so that there is fresh air while sleeping. As for me, I set mine at 60 degrees. I advise the minister that I thus preserve energy.

● (2010)

However, in government offices, if we want to keep the temperature at 65 degrees in daytime, the minister will have to see that employees are provided with mitts. We will still be short of energy. And it is not all.

Mr. Speaker, I read the following:

c) Open and close doors only when essential

Let us take note of this, the civil servant thought of it.

. . . and for shortest possible time; use doors away from prevailing winds.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time in my 15 years in this House that I have so much fun reading a minister's statement, it is so foolish. And a little further:

d) Close drapes at night and leave them open on sunny days.

Mr. Laprise: Don't you invent a little?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): My colleague from Abitibi asks whether I am not imagining things. No, I am not, the minister read that this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, in a more serious vein, there is no doubt that there is not and there will not be an oil shortage in Canada. Nobody will convince me of the contrary. I heard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the leader of the New Democratic Party, say recently that the tar sands in northern Alberta contain the equivalent of 750 billion barrels of oil. That should be enough to meet the requirements for the next hundred years. Now the minister tells us to save energy. As I said on television and in the House, it was recently announced that a Greek tanker would sail from Vancouver to Portland, via the Panama Canal, to supply Montreal with oil and gas.

Mr. Speaker, I talked at that time about a merchant marine. We have been asking for a merchant marine for at least 15 years. If action had been taken 10 years ago we would have it now.

An hon. Member: In Lévis—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That was promised in Lévis just before election day. That was promised for 15 years but they forgot to follow up with it.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that it costs more to ship through Panama than with a pipeline. But did you hear the minister speak about a pipeline from the west to Montreal this afternoon? Not a word. There has been talk about it for six months, for a year. Why is that pipeline not being built now?

Mr. Speaker, there are other means of transport. CNR and CPR employees complain that jobs are being lost, that trains are less used. What is stopping this government from using both national railways to move oil from the west to the east? What prevents the use of aircraft? Why not build air tankers? Things are being moved by trucks to the Middle East, in Viet Nam, in short almost everywhere in the world. Why not use aircraft to move oil to eastern Canada?

An hon. Member: Feed grains.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): We are not dealing with feed grains but with oil. We shall settle the feed grain problem later on.

Mr. Speaker, if we took the necessary steps there would be no oil shortage presently in Canada. I say: I agree. They say: It is an international matter. It is the same argument as in 1929. I say that the oil question is used to cause an economic crisis in Canada, in the United States and in all western countries. This is what they are leading at. They will speak of energy shortage and what do you think will happen if we follow the government program? The closing of plants, restrictions for the producers and ration coupons. This is what we are threatened with. We already had the ration coupons. We have seen that during World War II. When I was first elected in 1946, we had the ration coupons. A family mother with ten children was entitled to ten ration booklets. in addition to hers and her husband's. To carry those booklets you needed a special bag. The ration coupons were not made to fit a stomach needs. No. They were printed and the stomach had to fit the size of the ration coupon. This is what we did during the war.

Did that prevent people from getting sugar? I know people in Val d'Or, a doctor among others, who bought ten pounds of sugar at a time. When the ration coupons were issued he had five 100-pound bags of sugar put aside. We bought butter 50 pounds at a time instead of two pounds. We had everything. It is so true that they had to destroy sugar in the Cuba area because there was too much of it everywhere and in spite of that we had ration coupons. I mentioned this in the restaurant of Parliament. Butter was rationed at home but at the restaurant of Parliament we did not need ration coupons and we could eat one pound of butter at a time. We, the members, were not rationed, so I said to the right hon. Prime Minister of the time: If we are not rationed, then we have no right to ration our constituents. It took three weeks, a month, but ration coupons were abandoned and people could obtain normal supplies. Oil ration coupons and the oil shortage are nothing but a hoax.

The one objective is to get the Canadian population panicky and telling it to freeze slowly in the name of the international oil crisis. Instead of coming out with ration plans, the Creditistes would develop our natural resources for the benefit of the Canadian population and reveal the abundance of Canadian production. This wealth should be developed by the minister who should stop talking of shortages, stop lying as he has been doing, not himself but through his department's officials.

Mr. Speaker, those were the comments that I wished to make on the oil crisis which is only a blind, because it does not exist in Canada. It would not prevent us from transacting with the United States or any other country. But please, let us be frank with the Canadian people and let us tell them why we are really talking about shortages when there is abundance everywhere.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding of the special order passed by the House on Friday last is that the House is to proceed now to the 20-minute question period relating to the minister's statement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL—AMOUNT OF OIL IMPORTS TO EASTERN CANADA FROM ARAB COUNTRIES—EFFECT OF CUTBACK

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, first of all for clarification. Can the minister tell me which is the correct statement, the one appearing in a publication, apparently from his office, dated November 9 in which it is said that 25 per cent of the oil supplies in eastern Canada are from Arab countries in the Middle East, or the statement in the minister's address of today which is that the Arab nations have until recently provided eastern Canada with 30 per cent of its crude oil supplies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the 25 per cent is for the second quarter and the 30 per cent is the third quarter estimate.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to get some information about the drop or the anticipated cutback of some 200,000 barrels of oil a day. I should like to ask the minister, what accounts for this cutback, assuming that the 25 per cent cutback in the oil we receive from Arab countries in eastern Canada accounts for 75,000 barrels a day? Is the additional cutback of 125,000 barrels made up from Arab sources of crude oil, or from other sources?

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It will depend, I gather, upon the prorating terms in the existing contracts with other sources. I am advised that the 200,000 barrels a day is really the worst estimate of the situation, but it could be the result of the prorating involved on the basis of force majeure provisions in existing contracts being exercised by each of the supplying companies to the Canadian companies.

Mr. Stanfield: But for reasons of clarification, can the minister say whether we are receiving a reduction of two-thirds in the oil from Arab countries, or a reduction of 75,000 barrels a day from Arab countries, or thereabouts; the other part of the 125,000 barrels a day being cutback from other sources such as Venezuela, Iran and African countries other than Arab countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The figure of 75,000 is the current estimate of the degree of interruption. The 200,000, including the 75,000 is the estimate of the down side, if you like, if force majeure provisions are exercised in the other supply contracts to Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: From other countries?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION IN ENFORCING ALLOCATION AS BETWEEN ESSENTIAL AND NON-ESSENTIAL INDUSTRIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister some other questions. With regard to his program of allocation, is it his intention to order or otherwise persuade eastern refineries to concentrate on the production of home heating oil for use this winter in the eastern part of Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In fact, that is the policy which has been followed by the refineries since midsummer. But we anticipate that as one of the powers that would be contained in the bill to reinforce what in effect has been the operating practice in any event.

Mr. Lewis: I would also ask the minister whether, instead of leaving it all for the time when he produces the bill, he could inform us if one of the criteria to be used for allocation to industrial users will be the question of jobs. Also, will there be any criteria to distinguish between essential and non-essential services including the matter of jobs.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The question of jobs will be foremost in the criteria, and naturally there will have to be some judgment exercised by the board—that is why it has been created—as to which criteria should be given priority, and which should not. Again, I will have to say that until the bill receives first reading I cannot respond very well.

CONTROL OVER WHOLESALERS TO ENSURE EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF SUPPLIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the minister one other question along the same lines. Would he inform the House whether one of the objectives of his legislation—I appreciate the fact that he cannot go into details—will be to make certain that wholesalers that are not part of the majors' integral organization will be served by the majors so that they can serve their customers, and whether there will be any control over what the wholesalers do to make certain that there is equitable distribution?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I can say to the hon. gentleman that one of the concerns we will have about this situation of short supply is that integrated companies not use the opportunity to the prejudice of independent dealers, whether at the wholesale or retail level. We regard this as an important level of the trade, both in home heating oil and gasoline, and the protection of this particular level will be one of the criteria that the board will follow.

MEETING OF MINISTER WITH PROVINCIAL COUNTERPARTS—POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING TAXES ON OIL PRODUCTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Following his meeting with his provincial counterparts, can he tell the House whether, in view of the shortage and especially of the high price of oil and heating fuel, they foresee any possibility of reducing taxes on heating products?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed discussed this issue. My provincial counterparts have not, however, taken such a decision or confirmed that such a decision had been taken by their provincial governments.

PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the urgent need for the construction of a pipeline to the port of Montreal, can the minister advise us whether or not an agreement, at least in principle, has been reached with that province for the construction of such a pipeline?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I anticipate meeting my Quebec counterpart in the very near future to continue the discussion which has gone on at the official level and which was interrupted by certain events.

Mr. Balfour: Is it the government's intention to construct such a pipeline with or without the agreement of the government of Quebec?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have already responded to that question. It would be our hope that we would be able to do so in a way that would be found acceptable to Quebec; but ultimately, undoubtedly, we will be held responsible for the security of supply to that market and we will have to continue with the decision taken at the outset.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH VENEZUELA TO SUPPLEMENT OIL LOST FROM ARAB COUNTRIES—EFFECT OF "FORCE MAJEURE"

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke of force majeure which would account for the potential reduction of 125,000 barrels a day which was not from Arab countries. Would the minister say who is going to call force majeure and where this oil might go to, if Canada will not continue receiving it? Would he say whether his negotiations with Venezuela for royalty oil might supplement and replace the oil we might lose by force majeure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The suggestion of the hon. gentleman could indeed be a response to that situation. My current information is that Venezuela has not decided at the moment to take its royalty in kind rather than in cash. The force majeure would be called in effect by the supplier companies which have the contracts to deliver oil to Canada. I understand this is a standard aspect of the delivery contracts. So far as I know, it has not been called yet. Presumably it would be prorated, I would imagine, to western European parties in particular who would otherwise have been cut off from supply.

An hon. Member: Would you agree with that?

QUANTITY OF OIL TO BE TRANSPORTED FROM WESTERN CANADA TO MONTREAL

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): I would like to ask the minister what volumes of oil he projects moving into the Montreal market from western Canada by truck and rail, in barrels per day, and whether he can see a continuity of 50,000 barrels a day travelling from the west coast into Montreal. And can he say whether this might not come very close, along with the volumes presently reaching Montreal, to meet the shortfall?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I believe there will be a continuity of this consignment through the winter of oil by tanker into Portland. My recollection is that the capability of the land transport system to deliver any substantial quantities of crude or petroleum products is not high, and I do not believe it should make up the difference.

Mr. Bawden: How big?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am sorry; I do not have the actual figures here. I could give them at a later date.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT'S SPECIAL EMISSARY NEGOTIATE WITH MIDDLE EAST COUNTRIES TO OBTAIN MORE FAVOURABLE OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of Canada's suffering a serious loss of oil supplies from Saudi Arabia and other Middle East states, would the minister consider sending a special emissary to meet with King Feisal and other heads of government in that area to clarify Canada's involvement in Arab cutoffs and, hopefully, to negotiate a more favourable supply?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had no information that Canada is going to be subjected to any boycott. We must assume, however, that we, like many others, will suffer from reductions in the production of oil by Saudi Arabia.

ENERGY

CONSTRUCTION OF A PIPELINE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): I would like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Since he maintained that security of supply is uppermost in his thoughts, is the government still considering the project to build a pipeline through northern Ontario and if so, would any urgent matter be contrary to this plan?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I said in the House that we had examined the suggestion made by the hon. member and by his colleague from Algoma (Mr. Foster). The main point is the length of time it would take to build an oil pipeline through northern Ontario, considering there is one between Sarnia and Montreal. That is one of the things to be weighed before taking any final decision in that matter.

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFINING OF CRUDE OIL BY PROVINCIAL COMPANIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question with respect to the refining of home heating fuel and bunker fuel in the province of British Columbia. As the minister knows, the refineries there are geared mainly to the production of gasoline, which involves about 100,000 barrels a day, but about 300,000 barrels of oil a day are shipped to the United States and we in turn buy back the refined petroleum products. Does the minister intend to have steps taken to persuade the refiners in British Columbia to refine petroleum products there, so that British Columbia will not face the possibility of being short of home heating fuel and bunker fuel this winter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be sure on a technical question like that, but my understanding is that the capacity does not exist in British Columbia to produce higher levels of middle distillates rather than motor gasoline. The question is one of making sure that we continue to receive the same supplies from United States refineries as we have received previously. That is what will be given priority. I cannot be sure that changing the refining mix will achieve an increase in production.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the minister that the technical people tell me it is possible to do this. I hope the minister will look into it; and also that he will remember that the price of the petroleum products, when they come back from the United States, is much higher than if they were refined in Canada. Also, has the minister received a telegram from the president of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario in which he says that diesel and gasoline fuel prices in the province of Ontario have risen by as much as 50 per cent in many cases, and that this is seriously affecting goods transportation in the province? I ask the minister if these facts are correct and, if so, how this comes about and what action the government proposes to take to remedy the situation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, such a telegram may have come in, but I have not seen it yet. I will certainly look for it because an increase in diesel and motor gasoline price, as opposed to home heating oil, except if it is done at the retail level, of course would be contrary to the restraint the companies intended to impose. If that is the case we would certainly refer back to the companies to see if this represents a breach of their undertaking and what they intend to do about it.

PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question, first of all arising out of what was said by the Prime Minister in this House on November 23 in reference to a Montreal pipeline, as recorded at page 8082 of Hansard. I listened very carefully to the minister's statement tonight. I listened to the three spokesmen for the opposition parties.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will ask the question. You wait. I listened very carefully to the three spokesmen for the opposition parties and I would like to put this question to the minister. Has the projected Montreal pipeline got off the tracing board, who is going to build it, is there enough steel to build it, and has it now gone from the idea and into the planning stage?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed in the planning stage. However, there are a number of fundamental questions to be settled as to the responsibility for its financing, and particularly whether or not the public treasury would bear some part of the cost of the additional capacity for security of supply.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North who is rising to ask a supplementary. All the questions asked this evening will be supplementaries, because the order of the House is that for the next six or seven minutes members will ask questions about the statement made by the minister. I will try to recognize as many members as possible. Perhaps we should now try to limit the number of supplementaries asked by each member.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister mind explaining to the country and to the House why the decision to go ahead was not made in 1969, when the industry met with the government and suggested that to guarantee security of supply of crude petroleum, particularly to the Montreal and eastern area, a pipeline should be built? I ask this question particularly in view of this government's knowledge of the national oil policy, which they like to point the finger at, dating back to 1961 but which they endorsed for ten years. Why are we waiting now, in the middle of a crisis, when there is no shortage of energy in Canada? Was it a matter of procrastination on the part of the government?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows very well, at that time, and really up until the beginning of this year, there was a very substantial price penalty for consumers if western crude came into the Montreal market—

Mr. Bawden: How big? How much?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That price penalty would have been paid if their suggestion had been taken.

SUBSIDIES BY SOCIAL WELFARE DEPARTMENT TO MULTINATIONAL OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I should like to know if he intends to recommend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare subsidizing multi-national oil corporations in view of the loss they are going to suffer?

[English]

OIL—USE BY CANADIAN FORCES ABROAD

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or to the Minister of National Defence. Throughout his statement this afternoon the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was alluding to oil import curtailments and to the oil supply situation in Canada, but at page 6 of his statement he said that "to achieve substantial cutbacks in fuel requirements" the Department of National Defence is going to cut back "both at home and abroad." I was curious as to the validity of cutting down abroad in order to get more fuel at home. I would like an assurance that some of Canada's short supply of oil is not going out to such places as the Middle East.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I can give that assurance, Mr. Speaker.

PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE—PURCHASES OF OIL BY CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, regarding the Montreal pipe line, has the government reached any decision, agreement or understanding with Interprovincial Pipe Line?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not as yet, Mr. Speaker, but as I have said there are a number of important questions being discussed at the moment, particularly with regard to financing.

Mr. Andre: As a further supplementary regarding the supply of crude oil through special purchases supposedly made by the government, to which the minister has alluded, how much oil has been purchased by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, at what prices, and when will it be delivered?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this falls under the responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services. My recollection is that a very substantial quantity has been purchased, to be paid for at the dates of delivery as determined over the period of the winter. I am afraid the hon. member would have to address himself to the minister for the details.

TRUCK TRANSPORTATION OF OIL IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. With regard to utilizing commercial traffic on our highways, does he intend to have some of his officials give consideration to the difficulties in Ontario respecting PCV licences, and the fact that all transports travelling out of northern Ontario are loaded and return empty? There could be a saving of about 100 per cent with most of our traffic in and out of northern Ontario.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the suggestion and I shall be glad to look into it.

MEASURES TO ENSURE OIL SUPPLIES TO YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister on behalf of the many thousands of Canadians who are perhaps a little more concerned with this matter than the average Canadian, and for a longer period of time. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories are in a different situation in regard to getting supplies of home heating and other fuels that are vital to survival in the north. What action is the government taking to ensure continued supplies at current prices and levels in these northern areas?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check in detail to respond to that question. It depends on what the hon. gentleman means by current prices. Certainly, any offshore purchases would be subject to the escalation to which I have referred.

PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—EFFECT ON PROPOSED ST. LAWRENCE SUPERPORT

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Can the minister advise whether the province of Quebec has agreed to a pipeline to Montreal. If agreement exists, does this mean that plans for the proposed oil superport in the St. Lawrence will be abandoned?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no agreement yet on this point, but the integration of a superport proposal is one of the matters for intense discussion.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question. Can the minister advise the House whether the delay from the time that the oil pipeline was announced until now is in whole or in part due to Quebec's objection to the abandonment plans for an oil superport?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the fact that there was a rather robust response against the proposal means it is one that we would naturally try to achieve agreement on with the province if we could, and that is subject to discussion.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—ACCESSIBILITY TO WESTERN CANADIAN OIL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question not only to the minister responsible for energy but to all Canadians, reminding them that eastern Canada does not necessarily include the Atlantic provinces. I ask the minister whether this constant suggestion of the construction of a pipeline through to Montreal embraces the concept that the St. Lawrence River is frozen for two or three months of the year and eastern Canada and the Atlantic provinces, particularly the maritime provinces, should enjoy accessibility to western Canadian oil rather than oil that comes through the Panama Canal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is talking about the longer time frame to which a pipeline to Montreal is related, he would have to consider the additional cost involved by the Atlantic provinces if they were dependent upon Alberta oil rather than offshore oil.

EXPORT TAX AND PRICE CONTROL ON OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION AS TO CONTINUANCE AFTER JANUARY 31, 1974—EXPORTS TO U.S.A.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in his statement the minister failed to refer to the export tax or price control on oil. Can he can tell the House tonight whether it is his intention to continue price controls after January 31, and whether the export tax will also continue?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I expect to have a further opportunity to discuss this question with the Alberta government, and I prefer to postpone further comment until that discussion has taken place.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since we still export more than we import, can the minister assure the House that if a serious shortage develops in eastern Canada or British Columbia, we will cut back exports of oil to the United States?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is in fact what has happened in the last two months of this year. There has been a reduction from earlier this year of about 175,000 barrels a day. The difficulty is the lack of physical transportation facilities rather than the supply, which means that more cannot be taken from western Canada into the Canadian markets which are short.

TRADE

ENERGY SHORTAGE—IMPACT ON CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. With predictions in the United States of zero growth in 1974, a 6 per cent reduction in industrial production and perhaps an unemployment rate of 6 per cent due to the energy crisis, has the minister's department made any study as to what may be the direct or indirect impact, economically, in Canada of the energy shortage?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are watching this very closely, as the hon. member may be aware. The recent investigation with respect to investment decisions indicate that Canadian businesses were planning to increase their investment in capital equipment and plant by over 20 per cent, and particularly heavily in the manufacturing industries. Obviously in light of the changes right now, reviews will be undertaken on a continuing basis.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have gone beyond the time allocated by the order of the House. The hon. member might ask a supplementary; then I would recognize the hon. member for Shefford and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the minister could confirm that he sees no slowdown in 1974 in the Canadian economy in, say, the auto industry, the trucking industry or the tourist industry?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I am a seer in the sense that the hon. member may wish me to be, but present indications are that we ought to have a very good year next year. In fact, we had a very good year this year.

ENERGY

SUGGESTION OF JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSTRUCTION OF PIPELINE FACILITIES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Has the federal government already submitted or prepared a cost-sharing pipeline building project to be presented to provincial representatives at their next meeting in January 1974?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I intend to have further consultation with my Quebec counterpart regarding the pipeline. I repeat it for the fourth time.

Mr. Rondeau: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the hon. minister tell us if he has presented or intends to submit a project to provincial representatives at their January meeting concerning the building of a Canadian pipeline?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we already submitted such a proposal to my Quebec counterpart.

[English]

APPLICATION OF "FORCE MAJEURE" BY OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is a very simple one. Can the minister inform the House on what approximate date he learned that companies might apply force majeure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is of fairly recent date; I would say the last week or ten days.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. According to the special order of the House, we shall return to the consideration of government orders.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It will not have escaped Your Honour's keen eye that there is active interest in this subject. I wonder, under the guise of a point of order, if the minister would advise the House whether he will in fact be appearing before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, as has been tentatively arranged, so that this interesting subject may be pursued further?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is Thursday afternoon next that I will appear before the committee.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT DELINEATING GOVERNMENT'S POWER IN DISPOSING OF PUBLIC LANDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill S-4, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern development.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the question of the establishment of national parks has been met in many parts of the country by a kind of complacent response like, "Yes, we all agree in principle with parks as long as in some ways they do not detrimentally affect our area". Like all others I suppose, I too have taken that line, namely, to agree in principle with national parks. They are nice things for people to visit. But the problem that arises when a national park is about to be established—as was the case in the last five years with the Grasslands national park in southern Saskatchewan—is lack of understanding of the general area and lack of communication with the people involved. There is not usually an in-depth study made about the practicalities of establishing that kind of park. That is what I am dealing with tonight, Mr. Speaker. It is what I was dealing with before my speech was interrupted by the non-statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald).

The question of the establishment of national parks is still covered by the National Parks Act. Even with this legislation, the establishment of a new national park will have to be undertaken by the Parliament of Canada.

I am pleased to see clause 2, which makes certain that individual members of parliament affected by a national park in their area will have the opportunity, and indeed the right, to express their views on the establishment of such a park. Since 1965 there have been agreements, disagreements, arguments and consultation between the federal and provincial governments. Earlier today I outlined the kind of partial agreements reached between the provincial Liberal governments and the Pearson and Trudeau governments. It pointed out there were some representations made such as in the Kaplan report, where a bunch of dudes from Montreal went to the Killdeer-Val Marie area for a few days. They then returned to Montreal. Maybe they were friends of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury).

On their return home they drew up a report. They compared it with Roosevelt park in the United States. They said it would attract the same number of people as Roosevelt park, which was fundamentally different from the one they were attempting to establish in southern Saskatchewan. It turned out to be a ridiculous report. It pointed out the stupidity of hiring these consultants for this kind of work. The report was so ridiculous that everyone in the area who read it could not believe it was written for any government, federal or provincial.

The possibility of establishing a Grasslands national park in southern Saskatchewan is in a stalemate position. I would like to outline the problems that have arisen and the objections to it. One problem is the cost of buying-out or relocating the ranchers and the farmers. Another problem is the loss of income to the provincial economy. One problem is of a social nature. It involves the social aspects of evicting ranchers, many of them pioneers, from land which they have homesteaded and/or leased for many years. In fact, some families have been there for generations. The lifestyle on a social basis is good in terms of its economic basis. It is a remote and very significant minority in this country. The aspect of that region, in terms of lifestyle, can be found in very few parks in the Dominion of Canada. It is a kind of lifestyle that contributes to the very great interest in that area: it is the great attraction.

There would be a loss of some of the better mule deer and antelope hunting areas, along with complaints from disgruntled hunters—something to which I do not attach as much significance as the province. The Kaplan report suggests building a fence to protect the game. That is contrary to what in fact would happen. A large barrier or fence would keep the animals out of the area to which they migrate for protection during the winter. This is in the high mountains and hills. It allows them to get at short grass in the winter instead of trying to survive in the plains where there are snowdrifts of six, seven or more feet.

There is another very real problem to those who live in the area. There is the danger of prairie fires created by automobiles, locomotives and other mechanical apparatus. The sparks from these could catch the grass on fire and destroy it. Last summer there were two or three major fires in the area; they were put out by local people. Another problem is related to the very narrow outlook of the national parks department and the minister in terms of coming to grips with the fact that this is a large cattle-grazing area. The Kaplan report recommended removing cattle from 360 or 640 square miles and replacing them with a few buffalo. I do not know all the expertise of the environmentalists, but I do know that it is necessary to keep the grass grazed. It would take an awful lot of bison to keep the grass at the grazing level to which it is now kept by cattle. For years the cattle have neither overgrazed nor undergrazed. There is always the odd exception of a producer not being careful. Generally, grazing has been at a proper level.

Another problem related to the establishment of this park is the possible economic loss to towns in the area, such as Mankota where at least one million cattle are sold in the auction ring in any year. Other objections have been raised to this proposal. I have already mentioned the necessary removal of cattle from the park under the national parks policy. However—and this is pointed out in the Kaplan report—cattle-grazing at the present level is not detrimental to habitat or wildlife. They point out that cattle serve an important function in several respects and, if removed, could probably be replaced only by bison. Cattle do not compete with wildlife presently inhabiting the area.

Constant grazing prevents the long growth of grass which is a potential fire hazard. Most damage was done when people thought they could cultivate this land and use it for wheat or barley production. The land was not good enough for that. This lesson was learned during the depression. Since that time most of the land has been turned back into grazing land. If there is a large influx of tourists, there is the problem of garbage and destruction to the very habitat we are trying to preserve for future generations.

Another area of significance is mineral wealth. Crown reserves in the general area, and the possibility of development of an oil field, do not make the provincial government very excited about establishing a national park which will take away the right of the province to have control over the mineral wealth that may possibly be in that area. I hope the minister and the federal government will avoid areas where there may be mineral development—coal, and so on.

It is difficult at a time when more than 60 per cent of Canadians are living in large urban areas for a member from a rural area blessed with some very beautiful scenery to come to a reconciliation with people whose children are growing up in a society where all they see are cement sidewalks, paved streets and lamposts, maybe concrete, in places like the riding of the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) or other areas of this country like Toronto or Montreal, Regina or Saskatoon. How do we reconcile this with the preservation of a lifestyle, the preservation of wide open spaces that is needed in an area so attractive to people who have not the opportunity to view and to respect the kind of beauty one finds in this Killdeer-Valmarie area.

I believe that if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) wishes to see development in this area there is much that he could accomplish. I, by the way, have respected many of the national parks he is attempting to set up and respected the moves made to preserve some of these areas for Canadians. I believe that if he took the opportunity of working with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) there is a possibility of tourist development in Southern Saskatchewan that is far more imaginative in terms of attracting people to viewing some parts of Saskatchewan I am sure they don't realize even exist. What I am suggesting is this. Saskatchewan was one of the first provinces, I believe, to co-operate in the development of No. 1 highway, which runs from the Manitoba border to the Alberta border and makes sure that people can get through Saskatchewan in a day and a half, if they really want to do so. Each summer, because of the high volume of traffic on that highway, increased by the traffic coming up from the United States and up through Estevan and Weyburn on to No. 1, conditions on that route are such that I never have, and never will travel that piece of highway during that July-August rush. As far as I am concerned, and it is probably true from one end of the country to the other, it is a suicide run.

What I propose the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion could do if he has a broad enough view of what is needed in regions of this country which have not had the development of the golden horseshoe, is to develop an alternative route off the No. 1 highway down to what is called Highway No. 13 which traverses the southern part of Saskatchewan. I believe that if you bring people off No. 1 down through what is called the Moose Mountain national park, which surrounds Carlyle Lake and Kenosee Lake, which offers plentiful woodland and attractive fishing, where there is a considerable amount of development already; if you bring them in their campers and cars down off No. 1 and across Highway 13, you can take them down through the area of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), where they can see the beauty of Moose Mountain national park, and run them across the southern part of the province to the area of Weyburn where they are developing the Soo Line Historical Museum Society and the Soo Line Historical Museum.

The people here could, I am sure, put on many pageants showing the early life of the pioneers, illustrating the kind of life we went through in the depression and the lifestyles we have developed since. Visitors could move from there to what is called the Big Muddy country which is in the Bengough area of the Assiniboia constituency. In that area, Mr. Speaker, we often go south to see a place called Deadwood. Americans have taken this old, dilapidated town and put in a saloon where they say Wild Bill Hickok was shot. They found a graveyard where they say he is buried and where they say Calamity Jane is buried, and they attract more tourists with those two showpieces than probably any place in the United States with the little they have to show. And what we can do in the Bengough area is show people, if people from large urban areas are interested—and there are many right in Saskatchewan who have not seen it—one of the most beautiful valleys running through the province of Saskatchewan; show them in fact one of the favourite hideouts of some of the most notorious outlaws that ever roamed through Montana and the Dakotas in the latter part of the nineteenth century.

Two or three thousand people took the opportunity to make a tour of this whole area this summer. It could be developed in such a way that many thousands of Canadians could view what I believe to be some of the most interesting and beautiful country in Canada without disrupting the local way of life while allowing visitors an opportunity to see life in a rural community. They can go from there up through an area called Rockglen-Willow Bunch, which is hilly country. Willow Bunch is a bilingual community where they have preserved the French language. Its founders were settlers who came from the province of Quebec almost at the same time as the Northwest Mounted Police. They have established one of the most interesting museums that can be seen off the No. 1. It is bilingual museum. It outlines the whole history of the area. Those in charge of the museum conduct tours of the entire collection in both official languages.

The whole town centres around the work that went into the building of this museum. In this museum is what they called the giant, who travelled in all the fairs in North America because of his immense size. There is a display of the kind of bed he used to sleep in, the kind of clothes he had to wear and the kind of very frustrating life he had to lead because of his abnormal size which was, believe it or not, over seven feet.

Mr. Speaker, you can go from there into the Assiniboia area where, with a little government assistance, a man has got together one of the best selections outside the western Canadian museum in Saskatoon of antique automobiles, farm machinery and all kinds of antiques. Many people thought he was a little odd because he was collecting these things for years, but now they are worth a fortune. He is prepared to see them all go into a museum in the neighbourhood. He doesn't want to see what has been happening along that border country—Americans coming up and buying all these things in bulk for a high price and taking them back to the States.

Right on Highway 13 between the town of Lafleche and the town of Gravelbourg there is a small park and regional area that can be developed. To the south is the Wood Mountain regional park which is right along the Killdeer-Valmarie area, adjacent to the very grassland park the minister has been speaking of.

Then there is highway 395 to be developed in such a way that people can view the grassland, where they can view the lifestyle of the area, where they can go straight through to Valmarie and participate in the local rodeos, the local fairs that go on all summer in that country. Some of the best rodeo riding in Canada is done at the Wood Mountain park and across at Radville and other places in the general area. Facilities could be expanded so that visitors could view this area without interrupting the lifestyles of the local people. It would give a tremendous boost to that area economically. They can go from that area to a private entrepreneur in the Kincaid area who has developed a restaurant made out of an old railroad station which was built around the turn of the century. He has turned it into an interesting cocktail lounge and dining-facility and he is thinking of expanding his operation because of the increasing traffic on this southern route.

If that kind of entrepreneur was encouraged to expand that kind of operation into a motel, a few places for people to camp, it would be of tremendous benefit in taking the pressure off No. 1 Highway across the province of Saskatchewan and giving the people a real opportunity to see a part of the province which a lot of people assume is nothing more than flat ground—which is not true—and barren ground at that. They can see the community of Gravelbourg which is a bilingual community housing the College Mathieu, one of the few bilingual colleges left in Canada. It has taken a lot of ingenuity and a lot of work on the part of the local population and their local representative to keep that college going.

Sitting on the prairies are the two communities of Gravelbourg and Ponteiux, both bilingual communities. These are communities in Saskatchewan where the cathedrals are higher than the elevators. If people who practice religion by attending church travel along No. 13 Highway through Assiniboia constituency, they will never be lost for a church to attend. In these two communities there is a kind of cultural development that is not often seen in other parts of the country. Their language and religion have been maintained and have survived, and these communities would attract a great deal of attention.

Once you leave this area you travel through some more beautiful country in the constituency of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), which extends to the Alberta border.

Mr. Fairweather: Are you going to send out 15,000 copies of this speech?

Mr. Knight: Then you can travel across the southern range and up through the provincial Cypress Hills park, a park long established by the provincial government. Parks are established by both levels of government. Furthermore, there are two major highways connecting the area to United States markets. The hon. member says I should send out a lot of copies. I hope that the Conservative member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek will join me in supporting the principle of park development, because southern Saskatchewan is a very interesting tourist route which in my view shows great promise.

I remember listening to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) speak about vision. If I may say so, this little project has been one of my personal visions. I do not care who carries out the work, but I do think it has a great deal of merit. I realize a lot of rumours have been circulating about the national government setting up a national park, and this was not all the minister's fault. A lot of political conniving was taking place—but I will not go into that. People were told they would lose their leases. They replied that the land had been in their family for five generations, that they had always preserved it in their own way, and now it was going to be taken over, and so on and so forth.

With the alternative method through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the whole of southern Saskatchewan can be developed and made attractive to the tourist trade. People who unfortunately are stuck with living in large urban areas, young people who have to look at the concrete world of Toronto and elsewhere, will come to realize there still is beauty in Saskatchewan and in many other areas of the country that have not yet been explored.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with others who have entered into this debate of a bill that has come to us from the Senate, Bill S-4, which purports to make some minor changes to the existing act. I want to make one or two observations that I trust will be national in scope, as well as some remarks at a later stage that will be directed to what is at the moment a somewhat tentative proposal.

It was only a very short time ago that the present government saw fit to introduce legislation to set up an independent authority which, had the bill passed instead of being withdrawn by the government after debate in the House, would have had the power to expand and contract lands which were believed to be held, for whatever purpose, in right of the Crown and in the person of the minister responsible.

It was with some pleasure that I recall we moved from that concept to yet another concept, which I gather the government supports, namely, the principle that the government believes it has jurisdiction to expand or contract public lands held by people in the right of Canada. I welcome this because it seems to me to be an advancement over the concept enunciated in this chamber a couple of years ago. The government does learn; there is no question of that. Unfortunately, it learns slowly and in most instances much too slowly. Nevertheless, it does learn, and hopefully the comments that will be made in the course of this debate will convince the government that it can learn something not only from the people in this chamber but from the people of Canada.

What I am suggesting is that if a government can move within the space of a couple of years from a concept that removes from political control the right to buy and sell, or to expand or contract parklands to a concept of the kind espoused in this bill, which provides that notice of intention to issue a proclamation shall be published in the Canada Gazette 90 days prior thereto, together with a description of the lands that it intends to buy or sell—because it is a two-way street—surely it should not be too hard to get the minister, honourable, distinguished Canadian that he is, to consult the people affected.

It does not matter whether the bill provides for 30 days, 60 days, 90 days, or even ten years' notice; let the minister talk to the people of Canada. They will not hurt him. He does not have to be afraid, because they will not bite him. If he feels he can convince them, let him also listen to what they have to say. But do not attempt to legislate control over their land.

As a responsible Canadian viewing national parks policy over recent years, it would be irresponsible of me to conclude other than that the provinces should retain unto themselves, leasing to the federal authority on a short or long term basis, lands for any national park. I suggest this simply because there has been no clear evidence in recent years on which Canadians generally can base their trust or confidence in the federal authority in which they have vested certain lands. These are lands held in trust and which they for legalistic reasons the federal authority takes unto itself to purchase or sell, which in itself, to say the least, is a little presumptuous. This is a magnificently arrogant and presumptuous analysis in the absence of a clearcut national parks policy.

I have just pointed out how the policy of this government moves from one direction in principle very quickly to another direction. I could elaborate in respect of a second reason Canadians do not with alacrity have confidence or trust in this government which has no substantive national parks policy. Let me refer to the method proceeded with in the establishment of the last five national parks in Canada. I have referred to the principle involved in the Gros Morne national park where the government negotiated a 99-year lease with certain riders attached. I will not go into detail, but I am sure hon. members know of the principle involved.

Let me refer to a statement in respect of the Gros Morne national park made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) at the joint signing of the agreement establishing this national park, dated August 13, 1973. That was just a few months ago. I quote from page 3 of that document:

Rights of inheritance are undisturbed. Residents who wish to relocate will have specially prepared options available.

Surely that is not compatible with the agreement negotiated by the province of Quebec for the 99-year lease. Somewhere along the line the federal authority has obviously decided that any agreement entered into by the province of Quebec in respect of a lease for 99 years is none of its business. I suggest that at some point in the future there will be difficulties as a result of this attitude. Let me repeat the very clear words of this statement:

Right of inheritance are undisturbed.

There is nothing like this in Nova Scotia; I suggest there is nothing remotely comparable in terms of national parks. There are three entirely different concepts involved. How can the people of Canada have confidence in the Government of Canada when it is not consistent in its decisions in respect of national parks? I am not denigrating for one moment the very sincere desire of the present minister to carry out his responsibilities in setting aside national lands for the future generations of Canada. I do not attack that concept.

What I am suggesting is that it is not fair and right for the Government of Canada to deal obliquely and vaguely with one province in relation to land for the purpose of developing national parks while at the same time not dealing with another province on the same basis. In the past it seems that one province has been dealt with ideally and equitably because of previous negotiation in respect of provincial rights, while another province is dealt with inequitably with little or no notice. This may be a very simple and minor point but it goes very much to the root of the unhappiness of concerned people in various provinces. People who pretend to lead Canadians must have respect for them, and where there is a demonstrated absence of respect there is a tangible concern on the part of the people involved. As a result, frustrations and indignations occur. People become angered by the actions of governments that have this lack of concern.

The proposed amendment to the act does nothing to change this situation but seems to perpetuate the direction in which this government is moving. This direction does not take into account the views of the people who are directly concerned with the development of national parks. I suggest this is bad government and the type of government that the people in this country have had for ten years too long. This is the type of government which does not foster good will among our residents. Whenever there is inequity on the part of the government, there is frustration on the part of the people. When there is inadequacy in terms of a national concept, there is frustration and distortion of meaningful national unity.

Without going into detail as to the background of our national parks policy, I should like to give an example of the direction in which this government is moving with particular reference to the development of national parks in Nova Scotia. I refer to a communiqué issued by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on August 25, 1972, in which it is stated:

Canada is to have a new national park in Nova Scotia according to an agreement signed today in Halifax by Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Benoit Comeau, Minister of Lands and Forests, province of Nova Scotia.

Prior to that date there was not one public meeting, not one public discussion, not one opportunity for anybody in that province to talk to this government about the establishment of this national park. I am referring to the fostering of distrust and the creation of anger in the minds of the people involved. This is something that should be brought to an end in this country, because it destroys confidence and leads to mistrust.

There are several ways we can approach this situation, but we do not approach it by threatening hundreds of people in a 125 square miles area without talking to them. We do not do this without holding public meetings. There have been two public meetings following this announcement, and during the second meeting the people appointed by the federal authority withdrew. That was over a year ago, and we have not heard one public word since about the government's intentions. Not one public meeting has been held or any contact made with the hundreds of people involved in Nova Scotia.

In spite of the lowest form of political opportunism by both the federal and provincial authorities in respect of parks, there has been not one word spoken nor one public forum held, or one response. Not one letter even has been forthcoming from a member of parliament in response to a simple request for basic information in which questions are asked, such as is the project going ahead and what is the form of it to be? When we do things which would intimately affect the lives of people and families, why do we not go to them and speak to them? Why can we not find the time to do this? Why can we not listen to them when they try to explain to us that although what is being done seems to be good, possibly it may affect them? Why do we withdraw and act in secrecy? Why do we do these things? Why do we not have a national parks policy? Why does the government not speak to these people?

The government has a moral responsibility to place in front of these people a clear and definitive statement about the course of action the government intends to follow. This should be done in the form of a written parks policy. I have been looking for a parks policy in Canada for eight or nine years. I tell you that is eight or nine years too long. This is simply inadequate. This is not the way to embrace what essentially is a very good concept on the part of this institution. I refer to the desire to make additional land available. It is a good concept in principle and philosophy, but the act which supports it is lousy and stupid, and the people who continue to support it without amendment and without bringing it up to date are equally stupid because they do a disservice not only to the people they are attempting to serve but also to the institution which the people believe serves them. The fishermen in my community do not blame the Liberals for what has been done; they blame the federal authority.

As one member of this chamber, I plead with hon. members opposite to be aware of this as we enter a most expansive phase in the development of the national parks of Canada. They must recognize that whatever is done, the people concerned have a right to be involved in the decision-making process. They have that right especially when what we are talking about is their home, their right to fish and their right to hunt. I am not speaking of a bamboo rod at the water's edge; I am speaking of the salt water fishermen and the inshore fishermen. I might tell hon. members opposite that if Canada had not had the wealth from these inshore fisheries between the years 1735 and 1860 in what is called central or Upper Canada, if we had kept this at home, the story of Canada's development might have been a little different. Eighty per cent of the development capital came from that region of Canada, the rural areas of Canada, in this period and up to about 1923 or 1924. It came out of rural Canada.

This is where the parks are built, apart from the abortive efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and his park in Toronto. All the national parks that are of value to Canada came out of the rural areas, the wilderness areas, wherein live Canadians of substance and concern who are willing to trust. I counsel them not to trust institutions which fail to keep abreast of changing times, the needs and the necessity to offer to one part of Canada exactly what is offered to another part of Canada.

I should like to ask the minister if he has browbeaten the province of Nova Scotia or whether he has let Jerry Regan browbeat him into anything in respect of Gros Morne. The minister does not answer. He looks blandly. Why should he not look blandly when Garnet Brown has not taken the time to tell the people in eastern Halifax county what is proposed to be done by the distinguished minister and himself? I hope that whatever is done, is done in parallel. I hope that whatever is done in respect of parks in Canada is done on a common base.

The distinguished Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is here. He knows about my love and affection for his end of Prince Edward Island. He knows of my love and affection for one of the most beautiful spots in the world, not to mention the tuna in the waters off that shore. He knows the difficulties there are when the people concerned are not told what is going on. I say to the minister he should make the decisions after consultation with the people concerned. He should not present them with a fait accompli. He should invite the people into his confidence. He should seek their counsel and guidance in respect of simple things such as amendments to the existing National Parks Act.

The policy in respect of the act should be the same in respect of all portions of Canada. He should not say to Halifax or to Nova Scotia that they can have things the way they want them, or say to Quebec it can have things the way it wants them, and say to Newfoundland it can have the world. One cannot live like that. This does not make good political sense. It does not do anything to encourage trust and confidence in the leadership of this institution. Hopefully, the minister will be able to do something about this, but whatever he does he should be very aware of the frustrations, doubts and concerns that are raised in the minds of people when he acts from four or five different pedestals.

The minister should not be afraid to call public meetings. As I mentioned earlier he called off some public meetings simply because someone had said to him that he should not go down there because all the people would do would be to scream and holler. Of course they would scream and holler because nothing has been said to them in which they could believe. Everything that had been said to them has been withdrawn. All they receive is little snippets in the press telling them that everything is fine, that there will be no deprivation and that no one will suffer the loss of his home. That may be good for one provincial politician, but unless and until the federal government, in the person of the minister responsible, gets up and says that not only is nothing planned but that he is determined to allow the people to participate in discussions, the minister will continue to do a disservice to the institution he pretends to serve.

When he does a disservice, he does it to the entire House, not only to his own colleagues on the treasury benches or his government supporters in the backbenches. He does it to the people in Assiniboia. He also does a disservice to the people in adjacent communities and ridings. He does a disservice to the people in Dartmouth-Halifax or in any other constituency in Canada where he might wish to establish a national park.

Amend your act by all means; there is nothing wrong with that. You are changing your mind every day, anyway. But this is not really important. What the Canadian people find to be important is the total inability of the government department to devise a national parks policy which is clear to one and clear to all. Until that is done, there will be confusion. Seeds of doubt and ad hoc approaches will remain in what is a vital and important aspect of Canadian life, that is, the preservation of wilderness and semi-wilderness areas, areas that are attached and adjacent to large and growing urban centres, the total concept of open space for people. There will be doubt and there will be no ready acceptance.

I suggest to the minister that rather than play around with ad hoc arrangements, he would be well advised to put on the order paper at the earliest possible opportunity in the next session some meaningful researches and a well thought-out new national parks policies. I appreciate the attention which hon. members have given me in this matter which is important to the people. I believe very sincerely, as I hope everyone in this chamber does, that governments exist to help people, not themselves.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to follow two distinguished speakers tonight, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), who spoke of the national parks policy and the way in which he feels it should be applied, particularly as it relates to his beautiful part of the country, and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) who took us on a travelogue through Saskatchewan and through beautiful parks, which we all appreciated. But we each speak from the context of the part of the country from which we come and about the needs of each part of the country and the people whom we represent.

I wish to present a different view, not one that is contradictory in any sense of the word because I think those views which have been expressed are valid. None of us here who has travelled to other provinces can deny the beauty that exists in this country from coast to coast right up to the Arctic ocean. I think all of us applaud the efforts of the minister in doing what he has done for national parks in this country. I think that could be said on all sides of the House, and we support him with enthusiasm. More progress has been made in his ministry than in all of our history. We can be grateful to him for that and for his foresight with respect to generations to come.

I represent an urban area, or the fringes of an urban area where recreation is needed, not necessarily tourism. I think that tourism is an important part of it, but we should think in terms of the leisure time that is becoming increasingly available to people. They all want recreation and recreational land so that people today can buy easily a waterfront lot without spending a great deal of money for a place in the country. Because we are a mobile society we have the opportunity to move to all parts of the country, but th person in the city appreciates the country in a different way and in some ways needs it even more than those who are brought up in rural areas. They are confined in the cities, and if we believe in the projections that are given to us, by the end of this century some 70 per cent to 90 per cent of our people will be in urban areas. I do not think that is necessarily a good trend but it may be an inevitable one. The fact is that if it occurs, the need for recreation outside the city will become much greater.

In the province of Ontario we have a range of provincial parks which are doing a most effective job but which cannot meet the demands placed on them. Any time I have a holiday in the summer I spend it way up in Georgian Bay where there is a major provincial park, Kilbare, which is a huge park but which is usually crowded by four or five o'clock on Friday afternoon and filled up for the weekend. A high percentage of the people who take advantage of these parks is made up of Canadians who are not born in this country, who are new to Canada. They appreciate our outdoors and the opportunity they have to enjoy it.

But the people in the cities will increase in number and will require greater chances to spend their leisure time. They will have less opportunity to acquire their own land, if indeed that is desirable, and they will have more opportunity to travel to different parts of the country. So in that sense I welcome the expansion of national parks, not for tourists from other countries but for the recreation and leisure time of present and future generations of Canadians.

When there are people in urban communities who do not have the opportunity or the wherewithal to travel very far in their desire to escape from the pressures of our major urban centres, I think it is necessary for us to create an increasing number of large urban parks or recreation areas, and I welcome and applaud the provision and preservation of a major part of the waterfront in Toronto for recreational purposes. That is one type of park and I think it is one of the most valuable things that has been done by a federal government, a new initiative that has been taken that has not even been thought of by previous governments or previous ministers.

The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) is here tonight and I applaud him for his initiative in this respect. However, we will also be in need of recreational lands on the periphery of our cities or within easy access to them, and I suggest that we have some unique opportunities here. However, here we are within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. I think this is an area for co-operation that we should not overlook. To make certain that there are sufficient lands provided is something that has the support of all people.

People today appreciate the need for such facilities. As a matter of fact, part of my constituency has been expropriated for the proposed new airport, and in speaking to the people about land use—some of them are very upset, as you know—and the need for parks, one finds that they say, "If we were expropriated for the purpose of creating a park, we could understand and appreciate it; but the pressures that are being put upon us by the technological society is something to which we object."

There are many areas where we can take initiatives, areas of environmental control where there are major works for the containment of shore erosion, for instance, for the cleaning up of ravines, which should not only be cleaned up and set aside for further development by the municipalities, in conjunction with the provinces and if necessary with the federal government, but should be held and preserved as parkland in these urban areas.

One of the classic examples of the value of an urban national park is the Gatineau national park on the doorstep of Ottawa-Hull. Those of us who spend a great deal of time here have learned a little about that park. On the odd weekend we have been able to go there with our families, and to get out during the winter and ski. We appreciate how great it is having something as beautiful as the Gatineau national park accessible to us.

When we think of airports let us think in terms of Mirabel, where there are about 80,000 acres involved. My guess is that something like 5,000 acres would be adequate for the actual airport facilities, with probably another 15,000 acres necessary for the surrounding noise area. These lands are coming within, or are already within public ownership. Here, again, in trying to preserve the land, because of the noise disruptive zone near an airport we have an opportunity to develop that surrounding area as an urban park for the greater Montreal region.

If we think about it in this way it may not be necessary to dislocate the people living there. There would be no urgency about moving them. There may be urgency to start the project. However, once we commit ourselves to it in this manner we can tell the people that they can stay there for a generation, or indeed that if their children want to stay there for another generation that would not be too bad, but that within a period of one or two generations all this land must revert to the use of the public, particularly for the use of those locked into the city.

If indeed the proposed airport at Pickering does go ahead, again we are talking of something in the area of 17,000 to 18,000 acres, of which only 5,000 or 6,000 acres would be used for the airport facilities. Further, of course, if it is not developed as a major airport but is simply used as a STOL airport, then it is only a matter of 1,000 acres that would be needed for the actual facilities. This would leave 16,000 or 17,000 acres available on the doorstep of Toronto to be used for parkland, for walkways, for trails, in the winter as a ski area, where streams could be cleaned up, dams and small lakes created, all providing magnificent facilities for a major metropolis that desperately needs them.

I can think, too, of our great hydroelectric projects, of the James Bay project and others. Here I am not making a judgment on the James Bay project, but if it were to go ahead, particularly on a limited scale, and if the amount of land it opened up were developed not only as a hydroelectric project site but as a park site, with great thought and care put into its development, its potential is tremendous.

There are other properties that belong to the Department of National Defence that could be developed in this way. Here I think of the Meaford range on Georgian Bay. It has been used as a tank firing range, an artillery firing range. We are told that the cost of clearing it and getting the unexploded bombs out of it is considered excessive. One of my hon. friends says prohibitive. I do not believe it is prohibitive. It may appear prohibitive at the present time, but I point out that the price of gasoline was considered excessive six months ago, yet today it is not considered prohibitive. This land would be invaluable as a park. The sooner we get on with the job of clearing it, the less expensive it will be. Perhaps we could commit ourselves to a ten-year program or a 20-year program to clean it up, and at the end of that time we will have a great facility available for the enjoyment of the people of southern Ontario.

Another area which we have to consider with respect to the development of park land near a city is in British Columbia, where Vancouver will become the third largest metropolis in Canada by 1980. I think without doubt it is the most beautiful city in Canada. I only hope my constituents will forgive me for saying that. But it is locked in by mountains, with beautiful homes still being built right up to the feet of those mountains. It may be inappropriate for a Torontonian to say that a degree of irresponsibility was shown in allowing such development to take place. It is unforgiveable, but now things are changing. As I say, the people of Vancouver are living in the midst of some of the greatest beauty in the world, but within a short few years they will not be able to enjoy it unless we go ahead with urban park planning.

I have spoken in this House on previous occasions about what I believe would be a worth-while program, a national youth service which could perform non-military service in areas such as parks. Think what such a group could do over a period of years. Young people devoting one year to the service of their country could help develop parks and youth hostels. The time thus occupied would be absolutely unlimited and young people would undertake this sort of thing with enthusiasm. It is the sort of thing that is attractive to them. They would realize the worth of it.

True, there are programs such as the Local Initiatives Program that can be used in this way. But I am thinking on a broader scale, with tens of thousands of young men and women committed to a year of service to their country. There are many things they could do, but one of the most important would involve them in the work of developing recreational areas and national parks. These we need desperately, I do not say to the exclusion of other projects, but urban recreational areas are equally needed with national parks. They must be within access of our major urban areas.

I could go on for quite some time on this subject, as could all hon. members. I conclude by saying the bill envisages a worth-while approach and I commend it to hon. members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Peters: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—REPORTED STATEMENT BY OFFICIAL THAT HEAD OFFICE WILL NOT BE LOCATED IN VANCOUVER

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, tonight I want to talk about the Canada Development Corporation. As you know, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the establishment of this corporation in this House he said it would have its head office in Vancouver, British Columbia. When the directors of the Canada Development Corporation were appointed, the federal government expressed the wish that this publicly-funded corporation should have its head office in Vancouver. This was, among other things, to be evidence of Ottawa's interest in western Canada and a determination that the financial importance of western Canada should be upgraded by the government. Now that the two-year deadline is approaching and the CDC claims to have complied with the letter of that undertaking, let us see how things really look.

Item 1. Anthony Hampson, president and chief executive of the CDC, is married. Mrs. Hampson has a good job in Toronto. She has children in school there. It is only natural that family ties might make it difficult for a senior executive to move where his job must take him. But that normally should be a problem for him, not for the city of Vancouver.

Item 2. A Vancouver executive seeking career advancement recently wrote to the CDC concerning employment in the new Vancouver head office. He was told that it was only going to be a small operation and that no staff was being hired.

Item 3. The square footage of the premises rented for the Vancouver head office can be imagined if you will step out into the street, looking both ways for traffic, and pace off a 14-step square. That is 1,700 square feet. Does that look like the head office of a billion dollar company?

Item 4. Hampson will be working out of the Toronto "operations office." As befits a subsidiary location, it has 6,000 square feet, a little under four times the space of the office in Vancouver. Maybe the extra space is to store the money they hope to make.

Item 5. Early in September, Vancouver was graced with its first CDC board meeting. Until scuppered by the western directors, there was a plan to start the meeting at 7 a.m. because that was a convenient ten o'clock in the time zone that the eastern directors were operating on. When it did start, the meeting was speeded up so that officers and directors could catch a 2 p.m. flight back to Toronto.

Item 6. The CDC for a time looked at a group of western investment opportunities which, for example, would have kept another 26 per cent of Bethlehem Copper Canadian and would have led to the investment of some Canadian money in Canada instead of simply buying out the U.S. shareholders of Texasgulf. They backed off, in part one suspects because the portfolio that would have shaped up would have made a real western head office inevitable. Texasgulf, on the other hand, has had its major asset conveniently located in Ontario which of course requires a Toronto listening post, close to the amenities of central Canada.

The officers of the CDC are leading us down the garden path. They take offices in Vancouver that are not big enough for the firm of "Wynken, Blynken and Nod" and pretend that it is a head office. They put up a smokescreen that it does not matter where they live—they will divide their time. There can be no question what they are up to. The president of the Bank of Montreal is from Toronto via Vancouver but his head office is in Montreal. The president of the Canadian Labour Congress is from Nova Scotia and the vice-président is from British Columbia, but they live, with their head offices, in Ottawa.

The head office of the Hudson's Bay Company used to be in Winnipeg—and still is in theory. But now the chief executive officer is in Toronto and that is where the real head office is by definition. When the head offices of Cominco and the Teck Corporation moved to Vancouver from Montreal and Toronto respectively, their chief executives came with them.

In this day of sophisticated communications, the CDC can do business with eastern interests from a Vancouver base. It can better serve western development potential from a western base. And we should remember that CDC is not selling, it is buying. People who want money will gladly come from all over the continent if the officers do not feel like travelling.

The sham "head office" ploy did not work and the ball is back with the government. The first step is to call an extraordinary shareholders meeting and fire Hampson as chief executive officer. The second step is for the government and the board of directors to find a truly outstanding Canadian to take over this job, move the head office to Vancouver as intended and get on with what has to be one of the most exciting challenges in Canada today. The CDC has had the opportunity to meet so many challenges for one two years, but we still have not seen anything at all in the way of selling shares.

I see my time is just about up, Mr. Speaker. Some hon. members on the Liberal side have been smiling. Maybe they think that I have been cruel to the government, but I should like to tell them that the speech I made tonight is just about a replica of one made by Gordon Gibson in Vancouver. He was with the Liberal government in recent years. He knows the people of Canada and, like them, he knows why this government has few seats in that part of the country and will have even less after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the intervention of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) with respect to the Canada Development Corporation was that the head office of that corporation would be located elsewhere than Vancouver. We know now that such is not the case but I would like to take this opportunity to inform the House about the developments that led to that decision by the government to set up the head office of that corporation in Vancouver.

The whole thing goes back to a statement made in the House of Commons on November 27, 1971, when the Board of Directors of the CDC held its first meeting. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced at that time in the House that the government had informed the Board of Directors of the CDC of its wish to see the head office transferred to Vancouver within two years. Section 10 of the CDC Act provides as follows and I quote:

> The head office of the company shall initially be at such place within Canada as may be designated by the Governor in Council and thereafter at such place in Canada as the Board of Directors may determine subject to section 21 of the Canada Corporations Act.

The Governor in Council had already decided that the head office would originally be located in the National Capital area. So the decision to later transfer the head office rested under the act with the Board of Directors of the CDC.

Although the time said by the Prime Minister in his statement on November 29, 1971, expired only at the end of 1973 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was in a position to announce in Calgary on July 26, 1973, at the Conference on Western Economic Opportunities that the CDC Board of Directors had decided at its meeting on July 24 to transfer the head office of the corporation to Vancouver. Surely, it was normal that a reasonable period of time be necessary to make such a transfer. The minister indicated that everything could be done in October.

On September 25, 1973, the CDC directors met in Vancouver for their regular meeting and the president was then in a position to announce officially the closing of the Ottawa office and the opening of the new headquarters in Vancouver, at Grandville Square. On that same occasion, the president announced also the opening of an office in Toronto. The senior officials of the corporation are expected to share their time between the headquarters in Vancouver and the Toronto office,

Unfortunately, the opening of the headquarters in Vancouver was somewhat delayed by strikes that affected the installation of elevators in the building where the CDC had rented its office space. However, Mr. Speaker, I note in conclusion that the headquarters of the CDC have in fact been transfered to Vancouver within the time limits announced by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Paproski: That was a political speech.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—DAMAGE TO HMCS "RESTIGOUCHE"—REASON FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF LEGAL INQUIRY FOLLOWING INITIAL INQUIRY REPORT—COST OF REPAIRS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, out of deference to the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), I will try to keep this speech non-political. A little better than three years ago, HMCS Restigouche, a destroyer escort in service with the Canadian armed forces, was sent in for its half-life refit, which put it out of service for about two years. When it was built about 15 years ago it cost in the neighbourhood of$26 million. The refit involved an expenditure of an additional $6 million to bring it up to current service requirements.

Just before going back into service, the normal sea trials were conducted by the Canadian armed forces to determine whether the refit had been carried out to their expectations and requirements. During those sea trials it was discovered, and I quote from issue No. 13 of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, page 51:

> A formal inquiry into corrosive damage to the propulsion system of HMCS Restigouche has revealed that the damage was caused by hydrochloric acid which produced general corrosion and pitting through much of the steam system resulting in the seizing some valves and turbines.

That damage resulted from taking the ship to sea. It resulted from the normal checks on the feed water system not being carried out before the ship went to sea. Hydrochloric acid very quickly damages propulsion systems in ships if it is found in feed water. There was a board of inquiry. The board produced a 400-page report of the reasons for the damage. That report has never been made public. Numerous attempts were made to obtain the information. On March 1, March 2, April 2 and May 9 I asked questions in the House and placed questions on the order paper to discover what happened and when we might expect a statement. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) asked questions. The sum total of our efforts is the following statement by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) which appears on page 46 of the same committee report:

> Restigouche had also been accepted from the contractor by DND on 12 May 1972 but before the ship was placed into operation, extensive corrosion was discovered in the main propulsion and auxiliary systems.
> It is normal practice, whenever significant damage to DND facilities or equipment occurs, for a board of inquiry to be convened, and this was done on 4 August, 1972. The board's purpose was to determine the most probable cause of the damage, to identify any administrative procedures which may have contributed to the damage, and to identify what repairs were necessary. Hearings of the board took place from 21 August to 14 September, 1972, and its report was delivered on 18 September. On 29 September 1972, the department made a press release . . .
> The Department of Supply and Services is assessing the legal aspects of any claim which the Crown may have for the recovery of compensation, resulting from the corrosion damage. The board's report is one of the documents being studied by DSS in this regard. Consequently, I will not go into detail on the report of the inquiry at this time.

We have heard nothing more. I have had this question slated for months for debate on the adjournment motion, but I was requested by the Department of Supply and Services to delay bringing the matter to the floor of the House because those concerned were expecting the report of the legal inquiry which, I understand, was designed to determine whether there was any legal liability and whether any action could be taken for the recovery of the cost of the damage which amounted to $750,000, plus the lengthy period which the ship was out of service. I was asked to delay until such time as the report had been received, and I agreed to do so.

I have waited six months, during which time I have not heard again from the department. I still do not know whether the legal inquiry has been completed, whether a report has been received by the minister or, should he have received it, what recommendations it contains. I do not know whether there is ground for legal action against the shipyard. It is certain that no action is to be taken against the navy, because I know that a court martial is not contemplated. I think it is time, considering the large amount of money involved, that the people of Canada, through this House, found out what happened and why. It is time we were told whether the government intends to take action against those responsible for the treasury incurring this additional expenditure of $750,000. I believe we should be given this information now.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In May, 1970, as a result of a competitive tender, Hawker Siddeley Canada Limited, Halifax shipyards division, was awarded a contract for the half-life conversion and refit of two Restigouche class escorts, HMCS Kootenay and HMCS Restigouche. The value of the contract for known work was $5,174,259. In addition, Treasury Board authorized an allowance of $1,505,790 for design changes, thereby creating a total authorized budget of $6,680,049 for both vessels.

After the contractor had completed performance trials, the Department of National Defence accepted Restigouche in January, 1972, and moved the vessel to the DND dockyard, Halifax, to undergo further planned alterations. During the course of the work, extensive corrosion was discovered in the turbo-driven, forced lubrication pumps as well as in the main engines, main boilers, superheater tubes and some auxiliary machinery. The preliminary investigation indicated the corrosion appeared to be related to the chemical cleaning of main boilers performed by Chemi-Solv, a sub-contractor of Halifax shipyards, during the conversion work.

Mr. Paproski: Where are you going to sell it after you have put another $12 million into it? China?

Mr. Breau: We are not going to sell it. In consultation with the Department of National Defence, the Department of Supply and Services determined that it would be both imperative and cost-effective to proceed immediately to arrest the persistent erosion and repair the known damage. A contract was negotiated and placed with Halifax Shipyards in October, 1972, at an estimated cost of $583,000.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Breau: The work was completed in May, 1973, at an approximate price of $400,000. In accordance with normal practice in cases of this nature, the Department of Supply and Services initiated a legal investigation by the Department of Justice to determine the responsibility and liability for rectifying the cost of corrosion damage to the Restigouche, and related costs. This investigation, which included an examination of the DND report of the board of inquiry convened in 1972, has now been completed as far as it is presently possible to do so and a provisional recommendation on the liability aspect has been made by the Department of Justice.

The recommendation was qualified to the extent that at no time has the corrosion damage or liability question been discussed with Halifax Shipyards or Chemi-Solv. It is always possible that the disclosure of additional facts from these sources would alter the recommendation, and thus it would be premature to reveal its nature at this time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Who wrote that stuff?

TRADE—PULP—DISCUSSION OF POSSIBLE PURCHASES BY CHINESE WITH PRIME MINISTER DURING VISIT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, some of the things that come out from the ministry are really rather humorous. I address you tonight in connection with a question I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on October 19 in regard to his trip to China, and particularly about the possibility of exporting pulp to that country. I raised the question with the Prime Minister because of a report I had from the media which suggested that one of the things we might export to China was wood pulp.

In his answer to me the Prime Minister suggested that there had been no definite commitment to export pulp, and that there would be an investigation of the forest industry when Chinese representatives came here to determine which forest industry products we might export to that country.

We have for too long exported from the forests of this country, from our mines and from our wells, job opportunities that belong to Canadians. We have for too long sold commodities that supply the industries of other countries. Pulp is one of those items, like zinc, copper and benzine, that we ship out of this country in vast amounts. With them we ship out our jobs, our future, our hopes and our aspirations.

I draw your attention to the fact that in the forest industries in the province of Ontario, prior to the coming into power of George Drew, we used to ship out pulp logs to Michigan and Ohio so they could make their own paper and paper-oriented products. Those exports were stopped. Then under Leslie Frost as premier we stopped the export of pulp. But we never seemed to learn in the rest of Canada. Going over the export figures for 1972, I note that we exported from Canada some 6,200,000 tons of pulp out of a total production of 19,100,000 tons, or close to one-third. The rest of our production was turned into paper or paper-oriented products, but none the less we still exported more pulp last year than the year before, and more the year before than the year before that.

We never seem to learn that you cannot do a thing with pulp. You cannot eat it, you cannot sleep in it, you cannot wear it, you cannot burn it. All you can make from it is paper-oriented products. You can make J-Cloths with it, you can make toilet tissue with it, you can make newspaper with it, and you can make other kinds of fibres that you can wear. But you cannot do a damn thing with pulp except process it further into other manufactures.

If a nation like China, which has no huge timber resources, needs wood fibres, surely it can buy from this country wood fibres manufactured to the highest degree possible. Any suggestion by this government or any other government that we should sell wood fibres in unprocessed form is a stupid suggestion. Indeed, what this government should do now is to lay out a new industrial policy for Canada. As far as wood fibres are concerned, it should say clearly that while last year we exported some 6,100,000 tons of pulp, next year we will export less, and the year after that even less, until we reach the stage where we no longer export pulp. We will retain this commodity for further manufacture in Canada.

I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that pulp in many cases is produced in areas of Canada that are short of work and work opportunities, areas where industry remains undeveloped. Because it may be convenient and profitable for a corporation to sell pulp rather than to set up industry to manufacture paper or paper-oriented products is no excuse for exporting economic growth and the development of economic enterprise. This government has had before it this possibility for a number of years, yet it has refused to take any positive action to cut down the export of the raw lifeblood of this nation.

At no time has this government said to any industry, "You will export no more of our raw products: You must export these products in the most highly-finished state." It is high time we had this kind of industrial policy and leadership in Canada. Canada should no longer be considered as hewers of wood. That is what we are asked to be and that is what we have become as a result of exporting pulp. I would ask the parliamentary secretary tonight to give a commitment to the people of Canada that this government will introduce legislation that will over a short period of time eliminate the export of wood pulp from this country.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canada is developing its trade in pulp and paper with China steadily. In 1970 no pulp was exported to that country by Canada. In the following year almost 23,000 metric tons were sent; and in 1972, 16,000 metric tons. During the first eight months of this year some 7,000 metric tons have been exported.

Naturally, Canada is interested in developing trade with the greatest possible Canadian value added. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated on October 19, there is to be a visiting delegation which will look at the total subject of the forest industries. At that time there will be an opportunity to make the Chinese aware of the vast range of paper grades available from Canada. It will also be possible to impress upon them the necessity, if they wish to develop export trade in world markets, of being able to provide adequate packaging for such goods. Canada will thus have an opportunity to foster trade with China, not only in papers rather than in pulp but also in our expertise in such fields as paper manufacture and packaging.

The Canadian government had already taken initiatives in developing trade with the People's Republic of China through the mechanism of the Peking Solo Fair which took place in August, 1972. At that time Canadian businessmen and Canadian government officials were afforded an opportunity to show to officials of the Chinese government and to discuss with them Canadian goods and Canada's capability as a supplier.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

APPENDIX "A"

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS GUIDELINES FOR THE CONSERVATION OF ENERGY IN FEDERAL BUILDINGS

Introduction

The Department has investigated possibilities for reducing the consumption of energy in its buildings on a short term basis. Typical buildings and their systems were simulated, taking into consideration design standards, a number of possible operating conditions and the pick-up capacity of plants and systems. Theoretically, recommended conditions could produce BTU savings of the order of 40%. Further savings can be achieved by improving plant efficiencies and power factors. Additional emphasis is to be placed on maintenance procedures which have a direct bearing on efficiency of energy usage. Subsequent paragraphs outline in more detail guidelines to be followed in reaching the objectives.

Plant Efficiency

Improved efficiency of fuel utilization is to be accomplished by tuning up all of the boilers in the Department's heating plants and/or boiler rooms.

Three main aspects are involved. These are:

(a) adjusting burners for the optimum fuel/air ratio;

(b) calibrating and adjusting combustion instrumentation and controls to maintain this ratio over the full firing range and

(c) cleaning heat transfer surfaces.

Load Reduction
General

For most office type buildings, the greatest energy requirements in descending order are for lights, ventilation (outside) air, heat loss through walls, roofs, windows, doors, etc., and the electrical requirements for the operation of mechanical systems and equipment. Conservation resolves itself around reducing requirements in these four areas. Generally, the major reductions in energy consumption can be obtained by shutting off all lights and electrical equipment when not required and only using that which is absolutely necessary; reducing the quantity of outside air brought into the building for ventilation purposes and only bringing this air into the building when the building is occupied; reducing the temperature inside the building to 68°F—70°F and lowering the temperature another 5°F during the time that the building is unoccupied. Each building has its own characteristics because of design, construction, location, and schedule of operation, consequently there may be limitations to the things that can be done immediately to reduce energy needs. For this reason the following guidelines have been developed defining the objectives to be reached wherever possible.

Larger Buildings (more than 25,000 square feet).

(a) Perimeter Areas: (outside wall office space)

Ventilation

—Set rate at 0.1 CFM/sq. ft. maximum between 8:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m. weekdays. (CFM—cubic feet of air per minute)

—Shut off outside air dampers completely from 5:00 p.m. to 8:00 weekdays and during weekends and holidays.

Thermostats

—Reduce thermostat setting to maintain a maximum of 70°F between 8:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m. weekdays.

—Set back the temperature to 65°F between 6:00 p.m. and 5:00 a.m. weekdays and during weekends and holidays.

Air systems

—Shut off all air systems from 6:00 p.m. to 7:00 a.m. weekdays except for air heating systems (dual duct type). Also shut off the primary air system of induction systems.

—Shut off all air systems including primary air of induction systems during weekends and holidays except for air heating systems (dual duct type) which have to remain in operation but set back thermostats to maintain 65°F as stated above.

(b) Core Areas: (interior office space)

Ventilation

—Operate same as the perimeter areas except where these areas are served by a separate system in which case outside air is to be allowed to meet cooling requirements as detailed below under air systems.

Thermostats

—No reduction is required in thermostat setting for these areas. Reheat coils should not be allowed to function by completely cutting off their energy source.

Air Systems

—Shut off air systems from 6:00 p.m. to 7:00 a.m. weekdays and during the weekends and holidays.

—Reset supply air temperature not lower than 68°F. This also applies to the cold deck of dual duct systems.

—Set return air and outside air dampers to maintain supply air at 68°F without using any additional heat. This also applies to the cold deck of dual duct systems serving core areas.

—Shut off all energy sources to all terminal reheat coils and central reheat coils except for the reheat coils of the hot deck in single fan dual duct systems where reheat should not exceed return air conditions.

Smaller Buildings

—Set thermostat to maintain 68°F—70°F between 8:00 and 5:00 p.m. weekdays in office type accommodation. For all other times, set back the temperature to 63°F—65°F.

—Clean humidifier and replace elements, if necessary. Maintain 30% relative humidity and reduce this to a level that will prevent excessive condensation from occurring on window surfaces as outside temperatures decrease.

—Ensure that furnace filters are serviced or replaced as required.

—Keep the furnace fan in warm air heated buildings "on" all the time, if possible, to distribute the internal and solar heat to all parts of the building.

—Check ceiling insulation under the roof and add more insulation and fill voids, if necessary (4″ is minimum but 6″ is better).

—Look for cracks where infiltration occurs and tape them.

—Install weather stripping at all outside doors and on all opening sash, and restrict door and window opening as much as practicable.

CONSERVATION OF ENERGY IN THE USE OF MOTOR VEHICLES

The successful application of voluntary conservation measures to motor gasoline could result in savings of anywhere from 15%-25%. A 20% saving would result in a saving to the nation of up to 3.75 million gallons of gasoline per day over the next year. For the individual motorist this might mean a saving of $100. I am including here a checklist of practices that motorists can observe to reduce gasoline consumption.

1. DRIVING TECHNIQUES

(a) Reduce highway driving speeds. Gasoline consumption increases significantly at speeds in excess of 50 mph. Reducing speeds from 70 mph to 50 mph will reduce gasoline consumption by 20%-40%.

(b) Drive smoothly, with gentle starts and stops. Press the accelerator down only as far as necessary to reach normal driving speeds and avoid pumping the accelerator or racing the engine when the car is not in motion.

(c) Prolonged idling wastes gasoline; if the motor idles for more than a minute it uses more gasoline than it would take to restart it.

2. MAINTENANCE

(a) Check your gasoline mileage regularly; a sudden drop in miles per gallon may indicate mechanical problems.

(b) Keep your car tuned to the specifications in the owner's manual.

(c) Use the proper grade of lubricants and the most economical grade of gasoline.

(d) Buy slightly less than a full tank of gasoline. This will prevent wasteful overflow and leave room for expansion in warm weather.

(e) Check tire pressures regularly; underinflated tires put a drag on the engine and require more fuel.

(f) Remove bugs and foreign matter from your radiator to prevent overheating.

(g) Use a block heater in winter; this minimizes idling time and can increase mileage for short distance urban trips by 2 to 4 miles per gallon.

3. CAR USE

(a) Try to curtail or consolidate the number of trips by:

—using public transportation where possible

—forming car pools

—planning your driving route to combine many short trips into one efficient trip.

(b) If you have more than one car in your family; use the one that is more energy efficient whenever possible.

(c) Eliminate unnecessary weight in the car; check your trunk and storage compartment.

(d) Remove unnecessary attachments which might increase wind resistance such as roof racks.

(e) Car pools are an important source of saving. Talk to your employer about setting up car pool bulletin boards or taking other steps to encourage the formation of car pools.

4. EMISSION CONTROL STANDARDS

Many 1973 and 1974 model cars contain emission control equipment that reduces the efficiency of gasoline use. Estimates of the fuel savings that deactivation of emission control equipment would provide, at the most, amount to no more than 2%. And this would be at the expense of environmental damage. The savings from the measures I have outlined above are much more significant, and consistent with environmental objectives, and I would urge that motorists do not consider deactivating emission control equipment.

CONSERVATION OF ENERGY IN THE HOME

In the text of my statement, I mentioned an estimate of 2-5% reduction in fuel requirements for each degree of temperature reduction in space heating. Maximum savings will result if steps are taken to increase the efficiency of heating equipment and to decrease the heat lost from buildings. There are a number of simple and relatively costless measures that consumers can take in this regard:

1. To increase the efficiency of heating equipment—

(a) Ensure that equipment is inspected and cleaned at least once a year by an expert.

(b) Remove dust from registers and ducts.

(c) Replace or clean filters regularly (at least once a month).

(d) Close registers in rooms that are not being used and close inside doors to these rooms to prevent heat leakage from the rest of the house.

(e) Insulate heating ducts that pass through areas of the dwelling where heat is not required.

If heating equipment is well maintained, a potential energy saving of 10% or more can be realized. A layer of one half millimeter of soot on the inside of an oil fired furnace can reduce efficiency by as much as 50%.

2. To reduce heat loss from buildings—

(a) Lock windows to achieve a better seal.

(b) Ensure that interior doors are closed if windows are open.

(c) Open and close doors only when essential and for shortest possible time; use doors away from prevailing winds.

(d) Close drapes at night and leave them open on sunny days.

(e) Add weatherstripping around loosely fitting strom windows and doors.

(f) Cover cracks in the fit of interior windows or in attic areas.

(g) Add storm windows and doors where necessary.

(h) Add insulation, especially in attic spaces and floors over unheated crawl spaces.

(i) Use kitchen exhaust fans as little as possible (one hour of running time is capable of removing all the air from an average sized home).

(j) Ensure that the fireplace damper is closed, and fits tightly, when the fireplace is not in use.

In many houses, as much as 30% of the fuel consumed for space heating is used to warm cold draughts that can be easily eliminated. Spots where cold air is leaking in may be located with the help of a candle flame, and should be covered. Storm windows or insulating glass will reduce heat lost through window areas by as much as 50%, while reducing or eliminating draughts and increasing comfort. It has been estimated that an investment in storm window will pay for itself in less than seven years and thereafter return an annual dividend of 13%-18% in terms of savings of fuel bills.

3. To increase comfort at lower temperatures investigate the possibility of:

(a) Moving chairs and sofas away from walls and windows.

(b) Making greater use of humidifiers; the same degree of comfort can be achieved with lower temperatures and higher humidity.

It is estimated that about 2.5 billion gallons of heating oil will be required in Canada this winter. If consumers can reduce their requirements by 15% we will save about 375 million gallons of heating oil. This might amount to a national saving of as much as $125 million and a saving to individual consumers of about $50 or four weeks supply of oil over this heating season.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

LOWERING OF TEMPERATURE TO CONSERVE FUEL

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members might want to allow me to refer quickly to the statement made yesterday by the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with reference particularly to the temperature in public buildings. It was felt that hon. members would want to comply with the suggestion made by the minister at the time, and agreed to by hon. members, that perhaps we might make our contribution by having the temperature in the building reduced. My understanding is that the temperature in the parliament buildings' offices and this chamber will be in the 68 to 70 degree range. I am informed it is now down to 70 and dropping. I am sure this temperature will assist hon. members to keep their tempers cool, as usual, and assist them with their cold logic.

PROPOSED BOXCAR CONTROLLER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to a motion, which is seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the serious situation created economically and to the export trade because wheat is not being moved as fairly and expeditiously as it should be, the railway companies preferring transport of more lucrative commodities and products and continuing to deny a fair and reasonable share of freight cars for wheat transport.

To secure action beneficial to the wheat farmer and to the Canadian economy, the government is urged to bring before the House at once legislation to provide for a boxcar controller with authority to allocate the needed boxcars for wheat, and to include therein substantial penalties for failure to provide such cars as shall be directed by the said controller.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that I recognize the actual motion but I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent to the motion proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

GARRISON WATER DIVERSION PROJECT, NORTH DAKOTA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Canada, through a diplomatic note to the United States, urgently requests the United States to establish a moratorium on all further construction on the North Dakota project known as the Garrison Diversion Unit until Ottawa is assured "that Canadian rights and interests have been fully protected" under the Boundary Waters Treaty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House of Commons approves and supports in principle the diplomatic note defending Canadian rights and interests under the Boundary Waters Treaty in order to avoid the needless polluting of two major Canadian river systems.

Mr. Speaker: This motion also requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether there were nays. I will inquire again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I think I heard some nays but they were faint. The Chair is placed in a difficult situation. I will inquire again, and if any member has a serious objection and wishes to so indicate I will recognize that hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I think there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STEPS TO MAKE REVIEW BOARD MORE EFFICIENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the recent price increases of 10 to 50 per cent on more than 700 food products and since this is obviously taking unfair advantage of consumers, especially low and medium income families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House request the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices to examine as soon as possible why the Food Prices Review Board is not more effective and to report to the House giving appropriate suggestions to control these increases more effectively.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR RETURN OF UNUSED PORTION OF GEORGE DERBY HOSPITAL SITE, BURNABY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the federal government expropriated approximately 200 acres of property belonging to the municipality of Burnaby during the second world war on the basis of wartime need, and in view of the fact the federal government has ignored the municipality of Burnaby throughout negotiations with the provincial government in respect of the transfer of the said property, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson):

That this House direct the Minister of Veterans Affairs to forthwith invite the municipality to full participation in negotiations with a view to returning the unused portion of the George Derby Hospital site to the municipality of Burnaby for the original purchase price.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

November 21, 1973—Mr. Horner (Crowfoot)—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am informed that the hon. member for Elgin has given notice of a bill also dealing with contributions and benefits payable to farmers and fishermen under the Canada Pension Plan. The Chair has reservations about some aspects of the bills, particularly in relation to the provisions of Standing Order 62. I have no intention of making a ruling at this point, but perhaps we might wait until both bills are before the House, at which time the hon. members might be given the opportunity to present their views on the procedural point, following which, again in due course, the Chair might give a ruling on the basis of the advice given by hon. members.

ENERGY

RIGHT OF FOREIGN COMPANIES SUPPLYING OIL TO CANADA TO REDUCE DELIVERIES UNDER "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who said last evening he had heard, for the first time about a week ago that companies supplying Canada with oil from sources other than Arab countries were invoking a force majeure clause which might reduce deliveries to Canada by some 125,000 barrels a day. Is the minister accepting the right of these companies to invoke this clause or is he registering any protest or disputing in any way the right of the companies concerned to invoke this clause and thus reduce contractual deliveries to Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman did not understand me. I was referring to the decision of the supplying company, which is not a company under Canadian jurisdiction, to invoke the force majeure clause. In other words, the Canadian company is entitled by contract to receive the supply of these quantities of oil but subject to the condition of the contract which has been invoked by the other contracting party that there would be a pro-rationing.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether the government of Canada is accepting that the supplying companies are acting within the terms of their contracts in so reducing the daily deliveries of oil to Canada? When the minister was asked a few weeks ago in the House if he was making any representations with regard to the multinational corporations, he then said he preferred to deal with the Canadian companies. I still ask the minister whether he accepts the position taken by the supplying companies and whether he intends to accept without dispute their right under these contracts to cut deliveries to Canada by 125,000 barrels a day?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we do not have any choice in this regard but to accept what is the contractual arrangement. We have a right to receive oil but this is subject to certain conditions. We find, unlike the situation several weeks ago, that the suppliers of the oil are now making reference to the force majeure. I am not sure whether they have done so specifically so far or merely indicated their intention to do so. In either event, this is a condition upon which we receive that oil, and I am not sure that we have any other choice but to accept it.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister or anybody else in the government of Canada making inquiries to satisfy themselves that this reduction in deliveries is valid or whether it is not? Is anybody making any examination to determine whether rights contracted to Canada are being lived up to or is the minister simply accepting somebody else's word that this is okay?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by my officials that this is the contractual basis and I have taken their advice.

JUSTIFICATION FOR INCREASES IN PRICES OF GASOLINE AND HOME HEATING OIL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question based on his statement last night in which he announced he had agreed to increases of four cents to five cents a gallon for motor gasoline in the eastern market as of December 1. Would the minister inform the House whether he was requested to agree to an increase in the price of home heating fuel as well and what the price situation in respect of home heating oil will be as of December 1?

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): My understanding is that because both products are manufactured from the same imported crude it would apply to both products and it would apply equally in terms of cost, that is to say, about the same increase.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister explain to the House, if the price increase was to apply to home fuel oil as well as to motor gasoline, what caused him to refer only to motor gasoline in his statement last night?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I gave that as an example of the increase.

Mr. Lewis: Can the minister also inform the House as to what the price increase in crude oil has been since mid-October on which this increase in motor gasoline and home fuel oil prices is justified since, as he announced on November 1, there has already been a two cents a gallon increase based on the increase on crude up to mid-October?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member will recall that not only was there an increase in the early fall but there was an increase in the Arab tax reference price of about 70 per cent and an increase in the Venezuelan price of about 56 per cent after the two cents increase to which he referred had taken place. The figures for each individual company vary, but in effect what is now being passed through is the cost increase related to the very substantial increases that occurred as the result of the 70 per cent and 56 per cent increases.

Mr. Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. member for York South for another supplementary, followed by the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he has examined the profits of the corporations concerned which increased between 40 per cent and 50 per cent during the first three quarters of 1973 over the same period in 1972 and whether, if he made such an examination, he asked the companies to absorb at least part of the increase in the price of crude oil before handing it on to the consumers of Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman will recall that the condition upon which we obtained the agreement for restraint in September was that identified international cost increases could be passed on. So we were carrying out our side of that particular undertaking.

POSSIBLE SALE OF OIL BY ARAB COUNTRIES TO PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

A few days ago an official of one Arab country whose name I have forgotten stated during a visit in Quebec that his country was ready to sell oil to Quebec after agreement with that province, but that it was not ready to negotiate with Ottawa. Is the minister aware of that visit in Quebec and would the federal government object if Quebec transacted with one of the Arab countries?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We do not approve such an arrangement between an Arab government and the Quebec government. Quebec does not really enjoy an international status, but it is quite possible that agreements could be negotiated between Quebec and Arab companies.

I will point out to the Quebec companies that such an arrangement with Arab countries is perhaps not so effective, given the experience of the past days.

NAMES OF FOREIGN COMPANIES SUPPLYING OIL TO CANADA INTENDING TO USE "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary follows the line taken by the Official Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, following the questions by the Leader of the Official Opposition—

An hon. Member: Which one?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): —would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources give parliament the name or names of the supplying companies that have threatened to apply force majeure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly have to check on that. I think that the suppliers of the Canadian companies are probably well known, for example, Creole in Venezuela and Aramco in Saudi Arabia.

ADVANCE DELIVERY TO PROVINCES OF STATEMENT MADE BY MINISTER

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a new question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that for reasons best known to itself the government entrusted to the Department of External Affairs the advance delivery to the provinces of last night's energy statement, can the minister explain why advance copies of that statement were not received by several provinces, including New Brunswick and Manitoba?

An hon. Member: They are not recognized.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether it is part of my responsibilities to deliver messages to the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Since this was the practice followed last night and it is apparently a new practice and therefore a new policy of the government of Canada, based on this precedent can the minister advise if the government, as a result of its various dealings with the provincial governments, now feels it is necessary to establish embassies in all the provinces?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REASON FOR USE OF "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS BY FOREIGN COMPANIES SUPPLYING OIL TO CANADA

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister say whether the force majeure which is being suggested by the oil supplying companies is as a result of their being cut off at the source by the producing countries and therefore they do not have the oil, or is it because the supplying companies have decided arbitrarily to deliver that oil to some other country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that it has been a decision of the supplying companies, and it may be related under the conditions of the contracts they have with other countries to other supply obligations.

QUANTITY OF OIL TO BE MOVED FROM ONTARIO INTO QUEBEC THIS WINTER—SUPPLIES PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): I suggest that the minister might look into that because I believe he will find he is incorrect. I have one further question. Has the minister now had an opportunity to determine what quantities of oil during this winter will be moving from Ontario into Quebec, and also what supplies have been purchased abroad so that he can try to determine from these areas what supplies will be available to overcome the deficiency?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to ask that the second part of the question be referred to the Minister of Supply and Services—

Mr. Bawden: Well, speak to him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —whose departmental responsibility it is to make acquisitions. With respect to the first part, I regret I cannot answer this afternoon. I will have to get the answer later.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary South will be recognized for a further supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. Bawden: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but these ministers keep playing pingpong. Would the Minister of Supply and Services tell us what quantities he has now purchased abroad, when these will be available to Canada, and perhaps say what the price is going to be?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the figures remain the same: we have bought 40 million gallons in the Caribbean and in Roumania. A first shipment has been unloaded in St. John's, Newfoundland, and a second will probably be unloaded at Quebec City into Caloil tanks. A third has also left on November 24. We have thus scheduled oil shipments from the Caribbean until the month of December. With regards to Roumanian oil, a first shipment is expected for early December. As for the price we paid, since we are still studying the markets, as I have said previously, and we intend to negotiate with all those who can supply us with extra oil, I would prefer not to reveal it.

AMOUNT OF FUEL TAKEN ON BY FOREIGN PLANES AT CANADIAN AIRPORTS—SUPPLY FOR CANADIAN CHARTER CARRIERS AT SOUTHERN DESTINATIONS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Are non-Canadian airlines taking on an abnormal amount of fuel at Canadian airports for trans-Atlantic and other international flights? Whether or not this is true, what action is the government taking to guarantee that Canadian charter flight activities this winter will have a suitable supply of fuel in Florida and other southern destinations so that this important industry, the small airlines and charter carriers, will not be eliminated?

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. What measures are being envisaged to protect northern television viewers from the numerous foul-ups and program repetitions which they have had to suffer since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation began to use the Anik satellite to transmit feed from Toronto to Vancouver using the north as a relay point instead of treating it as an audience?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has a very valid complaint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: It has been the subject of a petition received from people in the Northwest Territories. I only wish I could offer the hon. member a short or quick solution to the problem but I cannot. Maybe we might meet later and I will point out to the hon. member some of the difficulties.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister and I am sure that some southerners would be interested in it as well. When can the Northwest Territories expect to have its own television production centre?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halton.

Mr. O'Connor: Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who seems to have vacated the House temporarily.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED NORTH VANCOUVER SITE FOR NEW PACIFIC ENVIRONMENT CENTRE—IN-DEPTH REVIEW

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact that employees of the Atmospheric Environment Service at Vancouver have protested against the feasibility of moving that service to the proposed new Pacific Environment Centre in North Vancouver and because this site was chosen based on a proposed third crossing of Burrard Inlet which is now in doubt, can the minister advise when the new in-depth study, which was referred to in answers to questions on July 25 that appear in Hansard, will take place, reviewing the site selection?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is incorrect in assuming that the site in North Vancouver was chosen conditional upon the construction of another crossing over Vancouver Harbour. In answer to the second part of his question, we hope that the in-depth study will be made public in a month or so.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the minister assure the House that no final decision will be taken without hearing the views of the employees and municipal planning officials?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the views of the employees have already been sought.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED INCREASE IN EXPORTS OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS TO UNITED STATES THROUGH EASTERN CANADA CUSTOMS POINTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Have his officials informed him that petroleum products are going across customs points in eastern Canada into the United States at an unprecedented rate in the past few days and, if not, will the minister make an inquiry and report to the House immediately?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose the rate would be the problem. The problem would be whether or not there are export permits for the shipments being made. Customs officials have instructions, and have had for some time, to require permits for petroleum exports. I am not aware of any shipments crossing from Canada to the United States without such permits.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPAYMENT OF OVERPAYMENTS—POSSIBILITY OF CEILING ON AMOUNT IF ERROR MADE BY COMMISSION

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Owing to the fact that many unemployment insurance overpayments are the result of errors made by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and also due to the fact that these overpayments are often in excess of $1,000, is the minister considering putting a ceiling on the amount of the benefits a recipient must repay if the error is entirely the fault of the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, by far the bulk of the so-called overpayments are the result of control action taken after the payment, not as a result of error on the part of the commission. However, even in the case where there may have been a clerical error the act requires us to collect these overpayments. We try to arrange with the claimant subject to the repayment the most reasonable method of repayment spread over a period of time.

FINAL REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON BENEFIT CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister how long he has had the second report from the advisory committee to the Unemployment Insurance Commission and why it has not yet been tabled?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think I personnally received it last Tuesday or Wednesday. I met with the advisory committee yesterday and I tabled the report just a few minutes ago.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ASSISTANCE TO SMALL BUSINESSES—INDUSTRIAL DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since statistics show that small enterprises employ 60 per cent of wage earners in Canada, can the minister tell the House whether his department's policy will better favour small industry development by giving special consideration to the allocation of grants as well as to the industrial decentralization in order to bring closer together the small industry and the abundant manpower to be found in rural community?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, basically the hon. gentleman has outlined what I have said on several occasions is one of the objectives of the reorganization. I am still primarily concerned with manufacturing and processing and to that extent I hope to change the ground rules through which small business can participate. Whether we can extend that form of assistance to service industries is something that is still being discussed with the provinces.

AMOUNT OF INVESTMENT FOR COMPANIES TO QUALIFY FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister tell the House whether in the legislation he intends to introduce he is considering softening the rules and lowering the minimum amount to be invested before anyone may benefit from this legislation?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if in using the word "softening" it is meant that we would reduce, for instance, the amount of fixed capital costs that would be required for assistance, the answer is that this is precisely the course that is now being considered.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSION BY MINISTER WITH SOVIET GOVERNMENT OF ARAB OIL EMBARGO AGAINST NATIONS SUPPORTING ISRAEL—SHIPMENT OF ARMS TO ARAB NATIONS BY RUSSIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, normally I would not have to ask this question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs but yesterday, instead of giving a report to the House concerning his discussions with Gromyko, he simply tabled a communiqué. I would ask the minister whether, during his discussions with Gromyko, he had anything to say concerning the oil embargoes that were then threatened if not actually imposed by the Arab nations against those countries that show any affinity for Israel? Was that subject discussed and, if so, did the minister call upon the U.S.S.R., apparently the custodian of the thinking of the Arab nations, to have these nations refrain from this type of international blackmail?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did have some discussions with the representatives of the Soviet government when I was in Russia last week. At that time I repeated to the Soviet authorities the same argument that I had given here in the House of Commons and which I believe are supported on all sides, namely, that it is dangerous to use economic weapons as an instrument of political pressure.

● (1440)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, again I dislike to ask this question, but we should have had a report. What was the reaction of the representatives of the U.S.S.R. to whom he spoke, and did he at the same time point out the serious danger to peace in that the U.S.S.R. is shipping tremendous amounts of munitions to Egypt today, particularly increased since the ceasefire?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware whether or not the Soviet Union had been shipping armaments to the Arab nations or to any particular one of them since the ceasefire, so I was not in a position to raise this question. I did repeat to the Soviet authorities Canadian policy which is not to ship arms to any area of conflict.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the minister does not read the New York Times.

MOVEMENT OF OIL THROUGH PORTLAND-MONTREAL PIPELINE—STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS RESPECTING CUT-OFFS

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister resolve the discrepancies between statements made by several ministers with regard to shipment of oil via the Portland-Montreal pipeline inasmuch as two ministers have stated that there will be no oil cut-offs and another has stated that there will be a cut-off of refined oil shipments?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will give me the details of these statements I will look into them and ask the ministers if there was any conflict in fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Spadina.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Prime Minister reconcile the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a few days ago that Saudi Arabia and Abu Dhabi had said they were banning any shipments to Portland, to be transported by the pipeline to Canada, and the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday that to his knowledge no such ban existed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the distinction is that there is no boycott of the shipping of oil to Canada by any of those states, but two of them have chosen not to ship oil to Canada by way of landing it in the United States at Portland.

ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS OF EARTHQUAKE IN AZORES

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact an estimated 3,000 families were made homeless over the weekend by an earthquake in the Azores which levelled some 80 per cent of the houses on the island of Pico and on the north side of the island of Faial, and as the local authorities are removing people from the small villages of these two islands because of safety hazards, may I ask the minister what the government of Canada is doing to assist in this emergency affecting relatives of many Portuguese Canadians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this tragedy has been under consideration in the department and I can say that we will be making a decision within the next few days on a proper response in the way that I know the Canadian people would wish us to make it.

EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT ON SEPTEMBER 4

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last Friday, in the question period, I referred to the Prime Minister's statement on page 6184 of Hansard for September 4, which did not indicate that the Prime Minister had announced a decision to build a pipeline to Montreal. The Prime Minister said he would have to check what other words were used. Can the Prime Minister now inform us if he or his staff have located anything to substantiate his claim that he announced on September 4 the decision to build the pipeline?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, and I did not want to convey the impression that on that day I had suggested anything different from what was quoted by the hon. member. What I did indicate on September 4 was that we had indicated the direction in which our policy was to proceed. Subsequent statements by various ministers of the government and myself have put that September 4 statement in a much clearer context, which is one of a firm determination that the pipeline should proceed.

[Later:]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. It has to do with the decision-making process. Last night the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Regina East as recorded in Hansard, page 8149, that discussions with the province of Quebec have not reached an agreement in principle for the construction of the pipeline. Is it the government's decision to construct such a pipeline whether the government of Quebec agrees or not?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister did answer this question quite firmly, that we have a responsibility for assuring security of supply, but at this stage we have no doubt that the province of Quebec will see the validity of that position.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY ADJACENT TO BUILDING, JARVIS STREET, TORONTO—CITY'S REQUEST FOR LEASE ARRANGEMENT TO CONTINUE HOUSING UNTIL NEXT SEPTEMBER

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General or the Minister of Public Works, whichever is the more competent in the matter. It relates to the purchase by the Department of Public Works of property adjacent to the RCMP building on Jarvis Street, Toronto. As the property in question now provides housing for over 120 persons and as the City of Toronto has offered to arrange accommodation for these persons in that property until September 1, 1974, will the minister state whether his department intends to accede to the city's request for a lease arrangement to September 1, 1974?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of both ministers I will look into the matter and reply to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I should remind hon. members that we will be running short of time and we should try to limit supplementaries as much as possible. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Scarborough West on a last supplementary.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, while the ministers are looking into the matter, could I address a supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Considering that the minister has expended considerable effort to be in touch with the municipalities of Canada in a general way at tri-level conferences, and in view of the fact the Department of Public Works acquired the Jarvis Street—Shuter Street property in Toronto without prior consultation with the city or its planning agencies, will the minister undertake to urge his colleagues at least to inform the city or other Canadian cities as to what plans they have in store for properties in municipalities, and whether in this particular case the plan will involve use of the property for surface parking or a horse pasture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SURVEY OF PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS AND INDUSTRIES TO DETERMINE WHICH STILL RETAIN COAL BURNING CAPABILITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has he undertaken a comprehensive survey to determine what public institutions or industries in Canada still retain coal burning capability? If this has been done, can he state whether or not the government has any program for encouraging them to take the pressure off petroleum products by switching back to coal where that is practical?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I have not myself undertaken such a survey, but it is a useful suggestion by the hon. member.

POSSIBLE STEPS TO CURTAIL SALE OF OIL AND LUBRICANTS TO FOREIGN FISHING FLEETS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the energy crisis, is the government taking any steps to limit or prohibit the sale of oil and lubricants from Canadian sources to the foreign fishing fleet presently operating on Canada's continental shelf?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I recall, these products are not under National Energy Board control and I think the correct answer to that would be no.

CONSIDERATION OF SHORTAGE OF OIL IN ATLANTIC CANADA IN STUDY OF EFFECTS IF SALES TO FOREIGN FISHING FLEETS PROHIBITED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment. Will the shortage of oil in Atlantic Canada be taken into consideration by Dr. Weeks during his present studies of the over-all effects on industries in Atlantic Canada and the operations of foreign fishing fleets off our coasts if sales to these fleets are prohibited?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Definitely, Mr. Speaker.

ACTION TO ENSURE NEW ELECTRIC UTILITIES WILL USE NUCLEAR POWER SOURCES RATHER THAN OIL

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the shortages of petroleum products in eastern Canada and the adequate supplies of uranium, does the government plan to take any action to ensure that new electrical utilities coming on stream will use nuclear power sources rather than petroleum as a source of energy, so that we may avoid the situation such as that at the Lennox Generating Station of Ontario Hydro where, as I understand it, some consideration is now being given to converting this petroleum burning plant to coal even before it goes into production?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in general terms, yes, we do have a program such as that now in operation at Gentilly, Quebec, to encourage wider Canadian use of the CANDU reactor. We are pleased that Ontario Hydro, despite the Lennox decision, is going ahead with 8,000 megawatts of nuclear capacity in the next 15 years.

RESEARCH INTO TREATMENT OF DRUG ADDICTS BY ACUPUNCTURE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the great difficulties that arise in successfully treating drug addicts, and the success reported in the use of acupuncture in detoxifying drug addicts as well as in the treatment of drug addiction, is any similar work being carried on through research or otherwise in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that research is being carried out just now on this subject, but this is an area in which research should be done. Funds are available either through the Medical Research Council of Canada or through the Non-medical Use of Drugs Research Program for such research, provided suitable projects are submitted.

CLOSING OF CERTAIN REFINERIES BY IMPERIAL OIL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Having regard to the shortage of refining capacity in Canada and the intention of Imperial Oil to close its refinery in Regina and also, I believe, refineries in Calgary and Winnipeg, has the minister consulted with this company to urge it either not to close these refineries or to delay this action? Has he made a similar approach to any other companies which might have intentions of closing down existing refinery capacity?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. gentleman knows, the shortage of refining capacity really arises in the Great Lakes area, and it is in this area that refinery expansion is planned. At the moment it does not appear there would be much to be gained in terms of dealing with the shortage of supply in the east by opening or re-opening refineries in western Canada. My impression is that the time frame of those closings extends beyond the winter, but I shall be glad to check further to see whether the suggestion the hon. member has made could contribute in any way to alleviating the problem.

IMMIGRATION

OBTAINING OF DEPARTMENTAL DOCUMENTS CONCERNING JOHN MEIER BY UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, of which I gave him notice yesterday. In view of the fact internal government documents from the hon. gentleman's department concerning Mr. John Meier, who is a key witness before the Watergate hearings in the United States, have ended up in the hands of the United States Attorney's office, can the minister advise the House who transmitted these documents and what action has been taken?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Meier has made an application for landed immigrant status in Canada. In the course of investigating his application there was a confidential exchange of information between the United States internal revenue service and the Canadian immigration intelligence service, which is a fairly routine matter. The documents provided to the U.S. internal revenue service were clearly marked "not to be reproduced under any circumstances without the prior approval of the Canadian immigration intelligence service". However, they were passed in error by the internal revenue people to a lawyer acting for Mr. Meier. A written apology has been sent to us by the U.S. internal revenue service with an assurance that such a thing will not happen again.

Mr. Reynolds: Is the government, in co-operation with the Nixon administration, retaining the private investigation agency Intertel to keep tabs on Mr. Meier's movements in Canada?

Mr. Andras: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

INVOKING OF "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE BY VENEZUELAN COMPANIES SUPPLYING OIL TO CANADA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the force majeure clause invoked by companies supplying oil to Canada from Venezuela. In view of the serious consequences for Canada, particularly eastern Canada, can the minister tell us what steps he has taken to ascertain whether this action in cutting down Canadian supplies is justified? What action has he taken? I say to him in all fairness he has given the impression to the House this afternoon that he has done nothing, really, to inquire into this situation and to satisfy himself that this diversion of oil contracted for delivery to Canada is in fact justifiable under international law.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As I pointed out to the hon. gentleman, the contracts in this regard are made with the Canadian purchaser. We have been in continuous touch with the industry through a liaison committee with regard to supply interruption and the demand situation in Canada, as the hon. gentleman knows, and the action we have taken, through this close liaison, is to identify what the supply situation will be. Perhaps I could remind the hon. gentleman of the actual words I used last night: "We may, therefore, suffer a loss, if world shortfalls are shared equally, of up to 200,000 barrels a day." My understanding at the moment is that this redistribution has not taken place but the companies have indicated there is a prospective interruption under the force majeure provision of the supplying contracts. I repeat, our right to receive the oil is subject to contracts between a Canadian party and a foreign party, and I am advised that one of the terms of the contract is this force majeure provision which could result in a pro rata reduction of the deliveries of oil under contract. We, therefore, as a recipient of the oil, are subject to the conditions of that contract.

Mr. Stanfield: I apologize for pursuing this matter, Mr. Speaker, but it is one of vital importance. Is the minister doing anything to look after the interests of the people of this country or is he simply taking the view that a multinational oil company is invoking the force majeure clause and shipping the oil somewhere else? What is the minister doing to look after the interests of Canadians either with respect to cuts which have already taken place or cuts which he says are anticipated?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think we are governed by the law in this situation. The government, like an individual party, has to be governed by the law covering this particular transaction. It is on this basis we have been dealing with the Canadian recipients of this oil. This, as I understand it, is the international practice and one by which, because of the legal obligation, we are bound.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Peace River on a supplementary, although we have gone beyond the time allotted to the question period.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the minister, before he meekly accepts this interpretation of a contract by an international company in relation to its own subsidiary, whether he has examined the contract in question and determined whether that interpretation so conveniently made is in accord with Canadian or Venezuelan law, and will he take competent legal advice—I emphasize the word "competent"—as to the application of the conflict of laws principle to this contract?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have no hesitation in accepting the competence of my advisers on this particular question.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Danson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at the time of the adjournment last night I was speaking in the debate on Bill S-4 and I called it ten o'clock. I notice, looking at Hansard, that the hon. member for Timiskaming is recorded as calling it ten o'clock. Obviously the reporter did not hear me. I believe the hon. member for Timiskaming will appreciate the fact I was speaking at the time and had not completed my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's point is hypothetical since we are dealing with another order of business this afternoon.

Mr. Danson: I wanted to clear the record before that debate resumes.

Mr. Speaker: I have noted the hon. member's point and when we return to that item we shall take into account his suggestion that he had called it ten o'clock and would have a claim to the first call from the Chair.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed, from Friday, November 23, consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and Motion No. 3.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was interrupted on November 23, I was calling attention to the principle which in my view lay behind the amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I think it might be restated as follows: no person, no organization, no police force, no agency whether public or private, shall have the right, in the event of an emergency whether real or imagined, to interfere with the privacy of any citizen unless that interference is sanctioned by the courts and is conducted under the due process of law.

I think that is an extremely important and fundamental provision in British justice, one that no person in this House or indeed no member of the government ought to interfere with lightly. But the government has seen fit to bring before parliament a bill which, if it is passed, will be a giant step forward in that, for the first time in this country, it will legalize the right of a public body, the police forces of this country, to invade the privacy of individuals who, in accordance with our system of justice, are construed to be innocent until they are proven guilty.

This is an important principle that has been made necessary because it is recognized by the community that those forces that would tear down our institutions now have the technological skill in the field of wiretapping, bugging and use of electronic devices to achieve their ends. This is why it is felt—I believe everyone supports this view—that the police forces of this country should have that same power. Although that is true, that is not to say that Canadians ought to be placed in the position where this right can be used, even for a short period of time, in an untrammeled fashion, without control and without reason. I think it is a sound principle, if we are going to take this step, to ensure at the same time that if the evidence that is going to be gathered is to be used, then it ought to be used only when its use has been sanctioned by the courts, which are the ultimate protectors of the rights of all Canadians.

We have had to balance, and we will have to balance in this debate, the importance of the protection of society and the importance of operating our police forces in an efficient manner with the very important, fundamental, human rights that all of us regard as sacred. We are not just talking about the use of electronic devices as this use may apply to some third party; we sometimes forget that we are talking about use of these devices in many cases as they apply to each of us. I think all of us agree with the principle that our police forces should be given all legitimate help. But I do not believe that any reasonable member of the House or of any other place, and I dare to say any member of a police force in this country, would take the position that there ought not to be some recognition of those rights before evidence is used against a person in a courtroom.

I read with great interest the speech of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) who spoke on Friday afternoon. In the course of his speech he said it is immoral to wiretap. Then he outlined a number of other ways in which immorality could exist in police work—for example, the policeman who must hit someone, the policeman who must use a billy, as he put it. Then, in defending the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in this matter, he went on to say this, as reported at page 8099 of Hansard:

> —if our experience shows that attorneys general across the country report that this particular section is being abused, it will be a very simple matter to bring in an amendment to have the law changed.

I think that is exactly the same as advocating that we ought to change the burden of proof in the majority of criminal cases, that we ought to put the burden upon the accused person; that a person who is caught in the talons of the law ought to prove himself innocent. There would be an unfairness with respect to the shifting of the burden. I think there would be an unfairness with respect to the preservation of individual rights and the right to privacy of any citizen, which is a very fundamental right, indeed I would dare say an inalienable right, if we were to reverse the principle that is inherent in our legal system and not couple it with the amendment put forward by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

With great respect to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton, with whose judgment as a lawyer I agree most of the time, I think he has turned his principles around in an effort to support a Minister of Justice who seems determined to bull this bill through the House in its present form without those protections to which I have referred. I, for one, am not prepared to support a Minister of Justice who does not include those protections in the bill.

It is easy for us to think of examples. The minister gave some examples in his speech on Friday of situations where it would be useful, where it could be helpful, where it might be expedient in a particular case, to have access to the emergency provisions, access to that faceless agent in some particular case at some future time. I suppose I could think of other examples where these emergency provisions might be useful. But if we adopt the argument of the Minister of Justice and say that in all cases involving the prosecution of criminals, persons who are innocent until they are proven guilty, the ends will always justify the means, we are getting dangerously close to doing something we have always avoided under the criminal law of this country. With some few exceptions, the public has always been entitled to the protection of reasonable doubt. As far as this bill is concerned, the public ought to be entitled to the protection that would be built into the bill if the amendment of the right hon. member for Prince Albert were accepted. I urge the members of the House to accept the amendment for this reason.

A lot has been said during this debate about the maintenance of "law and order". One part of law and order is the protection offered by the courts. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) referred to the difficulties of prolongation, but as I understand it no such mechanism has received sanction as being part of our criminal processes. I think it will be a sad day for this country when we decide that in the name of so-called law and order we must deny the basic meaning of that very important phrase. However, in some of the speeches of the Minister of Justice, and I regret to say in some of the speeches of members who support him, we are coming very close to doing exactly that.

We are moving into a new area of deep, untested waters in terms of the administration of criminal justice in this country. When we take that kind of step it is my respectful submission to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to my colleagues in this House, that we ought to tread lightly, and ought not to move with the full force of the law until we see how this operates. We ought not to do, as the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton suggests: Try it and if we do not like it, get rid of it, because in the process of trying it there could be abuses that even that hon. member could not comprehend at this time.

I have had experience on both sides of the counsel table. I have worked with the police in the prosecution of cases, and I have also defended those who have been charged. I would rather our attitude be that the rights of citizens in our society be preserved as long as we can preserve them, while at the same time maintaining law and order. Surely, that is not unreasonable when, as the right hon. member for Prince Albert suggests, there are 600 judges in this country—actually there are 900—who could make that order authorizing a wiretap within the law. I cannot conceive of any emergency situation in which a police force acting reasonably and within the present laws would find its hands tied unless that police force intended to act improperly. I do not think we should demean the names of the police forces of this country by suggesting that they would act in such fashion. I also think we should preserve the principle that has run through our British law that an individual is innocent before the law until proven guilty. Merely because somebody is being investigated does not mean we should cast aside this principle which protects the individual even though he may be charged. We would be doing this in terms of invasion of privacy if the bill passes unamended.

We are being asked in this bill to take a great step in respect of investigation. By adopting this bill we are giving a licence to the police forces of this country to do what they could not do before while holding up their heads. We would be saying that which was once immoral is now moral and legal. When we take such a step I do not think it is unreasonable for us at the same time to ask these police forces, which I hold in high regard, to observe the very simple request that they protect our citizens by going to the courts, as the protectors of the public right in this matter, for permission to take that giant step in respect of investigation.

I do not think it is too much for this parliament to suggest to the government that without that kind of protection in the bill we will not support it, but with that protection we will support it. I do not think our efforts to protect society are opposed in any way or involve a lessening of the powers or the rights of the police to investigate. I do not believe that in order to maintain law and order we should consider society to the exclusion of individual rights. I believe these two concepts are intertwined. It is to the credit of this House of Commons that the dean of this House, who served in the courts of this country longer than many of us will live, and in the highest office here, was the one to bring forward this very good amendment which will make this new bill, adopting a new concept of investigation, palatable, reasonable and equitable.

Let me ask my friends, wherever they sit in this House in terms of the centre aisle, to support the principle that has so appropriately been brought forward by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. This principle is in essence the protection of the community from excesses and to ensure that when police forces in this country use the device this parliament is giving for the first time, they produce evidence which is admissible without question and not subject to the usual requirements of proof, and that such evidence will be produced under the sanction and the protection provided by the courts. That is our duty.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have always found the hon. member to be fair, and I do not object to the way in which he has presented his case, but I do take strong exception to one of his comments. I know that he did not intend offence when he suggested that in talking in favour of this bill I was abrogating my principles in order to support the minister. First of all, it is not appropriate to impute motives to an hon. member. I do not think he meant to do that. In the second place, and I know the right hon. gentleman would support me in this principle, I would not deviate from my principles in the interest of simply supporting a piece of legislation, and if I did so I would resign my seat tomorrow.

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, of all the 10 provinces, Quebec is the province that has seen a lot of disturbance, violence and unrest in the last 10 years. So, it will not come as a surprise to you when I say that we in the province of Quebec crave law and order. Were I to consult the population today on this government's proposal to permit wiretapping by the police in emergencies for up to 36 hours without a permit I would probably get an 85 per cent affirmative reply. Some of the people I have consulted have suggested that the police should not ask for permission at all.

Of course, there will be some people who are against this bill. Even in my own riding I would probably find some "godfathers", and you know the meaning I give to that phrase, some extremists, some criminals and others who have something to hide who would oppose this measure, but the great majority would not be in favour of removing from the police the only tool which enables them to detect and prevent 80 per cent of crime. Why should the police be put in an inferior position to criminals who have no qualms about using bugging devices of any kind? I hope the right hon. member for Prince Albert does not believe that if his amendment were to pass it would prevent any criminal from using wiretapping. Negative laws result in criminals adopting more astute ways of avoiding the law. The hon. member should read about what happened in Montreal two weeks ago to see how criminals react to the law. For instance, the underworld did not hesitate to eliminate three members of the same family and burn to death the one responsible for the three murders. I suggest that voting for the amendment of the right hon. member for Prince Albert would be voting for the removal from the police of a tool criminals would not hesitate to use.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned that wiretapping by police in emergency cases without a permit was "the essence of tyranny". It is very odd that the right hon. gentleman should react in such a manner, especially since he has as a colleague the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who, up until very recently, was the symbol of law and order in the province of Quebec. I need not remind the right hon. gentleman that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe once upon a time was a semi-god in our province. The different parties respected him, his colleagues listened to him, labour unions feared him and the general public hailed him as a public leader. That hon. member stood for law and order.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote some excerpts taken from that hon. member's speeches when he ran in the leadership campaign some years ago.

• (1520)

They say that I personify law and order.

[English]

I will translate this: "They say that I personify law and order and why not. I declare myself in favour of law and order. Please give us the tools to decide and act." A little later he said:

[Translation]

We have to establish a climate of stability by law and order.

[English]

Then, he condemned the work of the Quebec government because it prevented the work of the police corps. So, again was he in favour of tying the hands of the police? Not at all. Let me quote what the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe had to say before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on June 7:

I believe that it is a good thing to declare openly that revelations which nowadays are made by the Commission of Inquiry into organized crime in Montreal represent but a tiny portion of the whole set-up. What is unknown about the Mafia—

In Montreal.

—is much more considerable and is much more to fear.

This is the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe speaking. He continues:

I remember a case which I will give you as an example:—There was rivalry between the two groups in the east end of Montreal and, in the course of rivalry, one member of the opposite groups was violently beaten and injured. It was decided to gain revenge that they should kill the chief of the other group. They put a bomb in a car a few feet from the school. The bomb was supposed to explode at 8.30 a.m., at a time when we were told there would be more than 1,000 school children. Because of the wiretapping, we were able——to discover this project, to stop the individual and prevent not only the murder of the chief of the opposite group but also the killing of innocent children.

The police were able.

I shall relate another case which was told to me very recently. In Quebec City a woman bank manager was advised by the police that because of wiretapping they were aware that there would be a bank holdup in her bank. As a result they were able to deal with this attempted robbery of the bank and arrest the bank robbers. Again, through wiretapping they were able to prevent a bank robbery. The hon. member for Prince Albert is up in arms because the proposed bill jeopardizes the individual's right to privacy. I wonder whether the fact that school children's lives were saved because of wiretapping is not sufficient proof that public good should supersede the right of citizens. Mr. Justice Tremblay last week rendered a decision along this line when he said:

[Translation]

It is the public and general interest of the people of Quebec which is opposed to the interest of 2,000 of its inhabitants.

[English]

Should we not conclude from this very famous decision that where public safety and public good demands it, the right of the individual should be put aside, that is, that the police should have the right to wiretap when public safety demands it.

Again I refer to the minutes of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at page 14:22 where the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe is reported as having said:

. . . we worry and we say that this might go too far . . .

Then, he said that he feels the examples are very numerous which lead to the conclusion that it would be impossible to protect society adequately against professional criminals if the activities of the police were restricted.

Again I ask the hon. member for Prince Albert how he can qualify this bill as being the essence of tyranny when the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe says that we cannot protect society against professional criminals if we restrict the activities of the police. Police should be able to wiretap at all times and without any permit when the public good and public safety demand it. I doubt that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe thought any differently when he held the position of Attorney General of Quebec. We in the province of Quebec long for law and order. As I said, the reason the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe once upon a time was very popular is that he was for law and order.

We have seen a lot of unrest and disorder in our province, particularly during such riots as the student's march upon Parliament Hill to protest Bill 63, a march which was infiltrated by such radicals as Lemieux, Bourgault, Chartrand, Laliberté and Charbonneau, and again the St. John the Baptiste uprising in Montreal when police cars were overturned and set afire, when private property was ransacked and looted, when horses had their sides slashed because they were mounted by policemen and when rocks and Molotov cocktails were thrown at our Prime Minister while the Quebec leader and the Montreal mayor ran for shelter. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe sided with the police during this critical period and even condemned the acts of the Quebec government which sabotaged the police work. But the hon. member had no doubt at that time that the citizen's right had to be put aside for the public good.

It is impossible to protect a society against professional criminals if we restrict police activities, said the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. He said that if we were to restrict police activities it would be like removing the tools from the police; it would be like cutting off their arms and asking them to dig their own graves. This is the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe speaking. It appears now that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has changed his mind about wiretapping. It is not the first time he has flip-flopped. You know, the population of Saint-Hyacinthe may also change its mind in the next election.

An hon. Member: They will give him a bigger majority.

Mrs. Morin: I would be in favour of letting the police wiretap whenever necessary. Of course, Bill C-176 does not go that far unfortunately. It includes very stiff penalties for those who disobey the law. For instance, section 178.11 states that anyone who wilfully intercepts a private communication by means of an electromagnetic, accoustic or mechanical device, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years. This is quite a stiff penalty for the offence of listening to one's conversation compared to the penalty for armed robbery.

Section 178.18 states that anyone selling or purchasing any electromagnetic, accoustic or mechanical device for the interception of private communications is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. Compare that to other offences in respect of a person selling stolen goods. Section 178.20 states that anyone who uses or discloses such private communication in a way other than as stipulated by the bill is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years. Finally, section 178.21 stipulates punitive damages up to $5,000. This is a very stiff penalty. So there are restrictions or stipulations limiting or preventing excesses in wiretapping activity.

Many of the amendments introduced by hon. members across the Chamber would be more beneficial to the criminals than to society. What they do not seem to realize is that even if this bill tries to impose a certain control on electronic devices, it does not necessarily mean the use of such devices by criminals would be controlled. They would only find more astute ways to avoid the law. So, the two parties across the Chamber should not be surprised if they do not find any support in the province of Quebec. They do not stand for law and order. No one will deny that the crime rate is constantly increasing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Morin: Nobody can deny that the crime rate is constantly increasing. Criminals are becoming more and more specialized, and yet the methods used for fighting this increase in crime are constantly being eroded. Quebec has not hesitated to prove that it wants law and order. For instance, the October 29 election was a vote against separatism, but it was also a vote for law and order. René Lévesque himself admitted that a week or so ago when he stated publicly that the population still associated his party with the FLQ. It is true that the Parti Québécois is a political party and the FLQ is a subversive group, but the people who see such persons as Chartrand, Lemieux and Charbonneau within the Parti Québécois cannot be blamed for thinking as they do.

Another proof that Quebeckers want law and order was demonstrated during the common front crisis in 1972 when three labour union leaders were incarcerated. First of all, they defied the government. The population cheered when the union leaders were incarcerated. And again, after the last election—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Morin: Laugh all you want.

Mr. Atkey: No, I cry.

Mrs. Morin: Again, after the last election, when the same union leaders asked the population to bring down the Bourassa government, how did the population react? By an overwhelming majority, a sweep of 102 seats for the Liberals. So the NDP must not forget that the unions in our province have been a source of unrest, disorder and trouble. The NDP and the Conservative party should keep this in mind when this bill comes up for the vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken part in this debate until now for two reasons: First of all, because I was not a member of the committee which studied the provisions of the bill in detail, and second because I admit that like many members I am perturbed about the decisions which we as members of parliament are being asked to make. On the one hand, I am absolutely opposed to the invasion of privacy of any person in Canada by private individuals or by representatives of the government for any reason. On the other hand, I recognize the difficulties which exist in this country.

I cannot ignore the fact that in a recent case in Toronto some people who were very deeply involved in trafficking heroin—a very dangerous drug—were convicted and sentenced to life to a large extent on the basis of evidence obtained by wiretapping. So I find it difficult to join my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), in supporting laws which would totally prohibit wiretapping. I want to say to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) that the doubts which I have about voting against any kind of wiretapping are removed to a large extent when I hear the kind of impassioned bigotry which she exhibited in her speech during the last few moments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The position of our party on the question of federalism is clear to every person in Canada. We oppose separatism, we oppose violence under any circumstances. We oppose separatism even when it is put forward by people who may agree with us on certain other matters. I have no use politically or personally for a person like Michel Chartrand, but he has a right to express his point of view as much as I, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert or the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), as long as it is done in a legal way. I want to tell the hon. member for Louis-Hébert that it will be a sad day for this country when, because she or I or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) disagree with Mr. Chartrand, Mr. LaLiberté or Mr. Lévesque, somebody can begin to listen in to their private conversations.

I want to say to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert that the police are not always right. A few weeks ago I finished reading a couple of books dealing with certain incidents in Canadian history. They deal with the general strike which took place in Winnipeg in 1919, and in the course of dealing with that strike one of the books relates what the role of the police was. It was not a very good role for the simple reason that the police believed, as is obvious to anybody who looks at the history of the time and of the strike, that that was an attempt to create a revolution. The police were wrong and they did things which they should not have done. I also read a book which recounted the events surrounding the trek of the unemployed, which began in Vancouver, to Ottawa to make representations to the then Conservative government headed by R. B. Bennett. That book recounts the activities of the police and the RCMP. Again, things were done which should not have been done because the police and the government of the day believed that it was the beginning of a Communist revolution in Canada, which it was not.

Let us look at the province of Quebec. A few years ago there was a strike of the copper workers at Murdochville and the then provincial government of Quebec headed by Mr. Duplessis, who was also the attorney general, used the Quebec police to break that strike. The labour leaders, not just the Quebec labour leaders but the then president of the Canadian Labour Congress, participated in a protest march against the handling of that strike. Let me tell the hon. member for Louis-Hébert—and I wish she would listen for a few moments—that one of the people who participated in that march protesting the actions of the police was a professor at the University of Montreal law school whose name happened to be Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Mr. Trudeau was not saying at that time in the 1960's that because the government of Quebec had said that the strike at Murdochville was illegal, because the police of Quebec were taking violent action to break that strike—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The Asbestos strike.

Mr. Orlikow: That is a separate matter and I do not have the time to tell the hon. member for Louis-Hébert about the Asbestos strike and how the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) was involved in it.

Mrs. Morin: That was 25 years ago.

Mr. Orlikow: That interjection by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert indicates her views on this kind of matter, her view, I suppose, that because it happened 25 years ago it does not matter. Maybe she thinks that the Minister of Transport would not do in 1973 what he did 25 years ago when he was the leader of CNTU. Maybe she thinks that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) would not do in 1973 what he did at the time of the strike at Murdochville. I am not prepared to go along with the supposition of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert. If the Minister of Transport thinks what he did in Asbestos was wrong, and that the police should have had more right to bop him over the head, he ought to come in here and tell us so. And if the Prime Minister thinks that what he did at Murdochville was wrong, he ought to come in here and tell us.

● (1540)

Mr. Prud'homme: It was right then.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member says it was right then.

Mr. Prud'homme: And it is still the right thing today.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member does not have to tell me that. I agree that it was the right thing then, and it is the right thing now. But the hon. member ought to tell that to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert who said, and I tried to take it down exactly—I am sure she will correct me if I am wrong—that in her view whatever the police want to do in order to protect the public safety or in order to protect the public good is permissible. I want to say that I am not prepared to give anybody the right to do anything he or she wants. I am, however, prepared to let people, including the police, Crown prosecutors, the attorney general and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), do everything which the law permits them to do.

The hon. member for Louis-Hébert gave an account of crimes which have taken place in the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, crimes take place in other parts of Canada. Those crimes in Quebec took place when we had no wiretapping laws. Those crimes took place when the police were permitted to wiretap because there was no law. Evidence was presented to the committee that in one year the RCMP were involved in over 600 wiretaps. There is no question that the Quebec Provincial Police and the Ontario Provincial Police are involved in wiretapping. I know that the Ontario Provincial Police have published some figures showing how many times they have been involved in wiretapping. I have no doubt in my mind that municipal police forces, including the city of Montreal police, have been involved in wiretapping. If wiretapping without any kind of controls would prevent crimes, as the hon. member for Louis-Hébert seemed to argue and in fact did argue then why have we had all the crimes? Why have we had all the robberies, the murders and all the rest? If there is organized crime in Montreal, if there is organized murder in Montreal, if there is organized gambling in Montreal, and if wiretapping could have prevented it, why has it not been prevented?

I want to pose a question which the hon. member for Louis-Hébert should think about. Why is it that in Quebec, which has more wiretapping than any other province, where the courts are the toughest in the sentences which they impose on people who are found guilty of murder, bank robberies, and that kind of crime, there is more crime than in other provinces? The law enforcement agencies and the courts have been very tough in Quebec. I suggest to the hon. member that rather than come here and rant about the need for unlimited wiretapping she address herself to the very serious question of why these things are taking place in Quebec more than in other provinces.

Mrs. Morin: The criminals are better organized.

Mr. Orlikow: I suggest to the hon. member that if these things take place in Quebec more than in other provinces, it is not because criminals are better organized but because of the social conditions in Quebec, because of the poverty in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: This is not a criticism, it is a statement of fact. The poverty and social conditions in Quebec have led to that kind of atmosphere.

Mr. Prud'homme: It is because Montreal is a big centre. You cannot have much crime in the rural districts of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I am not raising this point because I am critical of the people of Quebec or the governments of Quebec. I am simply saying to the hon. member that if she is concerned, as she should be, about the matters which she has raised she ought not to bring forth what purports to be a solution but in fact is a red herring. She ought not to bring forth simplistic, and what I consider to be stupid arguments which can have only one effect, to dissuade members like myself, who are inclined to vote for the bill in respect of many of its provisions, from voting for it if we gave her exaggerated arguments the attention she would like us to give them.

Mrs. Morin: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly. Go Ahead.

Mrs. Morin: He just mentioned that there were exaggerations in my speech. I would like him to specify what those exaggerations were.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to know what those exaggerations were, I refer her to that part of her speech in which she inferred that the only people who are concerned about the possibility that the police will be given authority which they can misuse, or which they might misuse, are people who are somehow sympathetic to the desires of criminals, or separatists, or revolutionaries, and so on. I suggest to her that the hon. member for Matane (De Bané), and others on the government side who have expressed reservations about the bill, could take the same exception that I have taken to the hon. member's exaggerations.

I want to try to look at this question in a rational, objective way. I admit that for me it is difficult to be objective. As a person who has always been concerned about civil liberties, the easiest thing for me to do would be to vote against the bill because in principle I am opposed to permitting wiretapping in any circumstances. But I am trying to face up to a situation as it exists in the 1970's. I am trying to face up to the fact we do have increasing sale and distribution of hard drugs, with terrible consequences for young people. I am trying to face up to the fact that we do have organized crime which is involved not only in drug trafficking but in gambling and other serious offences. Although the claims with respect to the number of cases of subversion and espionage are exaggerated one hundredfold, I am trying to face up to the situation in that respect, to see how far I can go, if any distance at all, in voting for a bill which will give the police the right to wiretap under certain conditions because the needs of the people as a whole in certain cases are more important than the right to privacy of individuals.

If the speech by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert were the only one made on behalf of the bill I feel that under no circumstances could I vote for the bill. Yet I am prepared to vote for the bill under certain conditions. What are those conditions? They are that the police can only wiretap given the fact that they know or suspect that certain types of very serious offences are being committed or are likely to be committed. I believe that we have to specify because I think we have to take responsibility for the types of criminal offences on which we would permit wiretapping to take place. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the interjection of the hon. member just now, but if it had no more validity than her speech or earlier interjections I think I can quite legitimately ignore it.

I do not believe—and it is not because I have anything against the RCMP or the provincial police of Quebec or the city of Winnipeg police or any other police force—that we should give any person an unrestricted right to do anything he wants to do. If we are going to permit wiretapping, and I for one am prepared to accept that wiretapping under very limited conditions is necessary, then I want the police to be required to appear before somebody with responsibility in order to ask for permission. I am not sure whether there are 600 judges as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said or whether there are 800 as I think the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, but surely if there are between 600 and 800 judges in this country it ought not to be too difficult for the police in any area to get permission fairly quickly, on an emergency basis, from one of them. I do not think it is too much to ask of Canadian judges, through the passage of this bill, that maybe once a year one of them would be awakened in the middle of the night to deal with a request for permission from the police to proceed with wiretapping. I do not think that is too serious, Mr. Speaker. I am not enthused, and that is putting it mildly, by any suggestion that the power to grant this permission should be extended, however. I am not enthused with the suggestion that the Attorneys General should have this right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the 20 minutes allotted to him under the rules of the House have expired. However, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago I am not enthused by the idea that we give that right to the Attorneys General, even though there are now three provincial governments which are NDP and in which there are NDP Attorneys General. I am even less enthused that it be extended to an agent or agents. It seems to me that when we give such people the right to permit the police to wiretap without a hearing, that we are extending the right so broadly that in fact it vitiates the whole purpose of this bill.

I want to conclude by saying one word to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), Mr. Speaker. I want a bill which will prohibit wiretapping by people who are not government officials, that is, police or other Crown officials. I want a bill which will regulate the way in which the law enforcements agents can use wiretapping. I think it is a disgrace that up until now we have not had such a law. I want to tell the minister that I am not prepared to vote for a law which will permit the minister, the Liberal government and the Liberal Party, to tell the people who are concerned about civil liberties that we are fighting for a law which prohibits or regulates or limits wiretapping and, on the other hand, find that the bill has so many exemptions and exceptions that anybody who wants to wiretap can do it. If that is the choice, Mr. Speaker, I, for one, am not prepared to let the minister get the political credit for a bill which in fact does not control wiretapping.

● (1600)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-176 concerning wiretaping is very important and serious for all Canadians, whom we must protect in every way we can.

A few minutes ago, I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin); I congratulate her for such a frank explanation of the situation existing not only in Quebec but also in all other provinces. We know better the Quebec situation than the one in other provinces because Quebec is the province we live in. As to what the member for Louis-Hébert says about subversion in the province of Quebec, it is not partly true, it is perfectly true; besides, she dares calling a spade a spade.

Mr. Speaker, for some people wiretaping is a touchy issue. As for me, I say very frankly that I am not afraid at all of bugging devices. Besides, I think my Parliament office phone has already been bugged. It makes no difference to me that everybody should know that I never intended to overthrow established order or justice by violence or revolution.

Therefore Mr. Speaker, one is much less afraid of bugging devices if he has nothing to fear about his behaviour. That does not mean we recommend the use of bugging devices in all Canadian homes, no, but as far as suspects are concerned, people making divisive statements, wishing to overthrow all that exists in Canada and to break down the system—as we hear them say—I believe that for the protection of people, we should take the necessary action to know where those people are going. We do not want to intercept conversations of honest people, who live normally, but those who want to destroy society, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that we should not object to the use of bugging devices.

Reference was made a while ago to organized crime. It does exist. We have proof of that. It exists, not only in Montreal but in Toronto, in Winnipeg and in Vancouver. Yesterday or the day before, I was told that American criminals were already at work in Vancouver, they are firmly established there as the Mafia is in Montreal, or so they say. If some people push drugs, for instance, thus impairing the future of our young people, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is logical for the RCMP to take measures to expose those who want to destroy the foundations of society and family. They do not hesitate to destroy family.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Louis-Hébert mentioned union leaders Chartrand, Laberge, Charbonneau and Pépin. She was right. During the provincial election, where I did not vote Liberal, 102 ridings out of 110 voted for this party. Those people appealed to defeat Mr. Bourassa, to crush the government; they said they were talking on behalf of one million union members. I shall not talk against unions, but against union leaders who think that all union members will follow them in their revolutionary actions; they got a rather bitter answer on October 29 last in the province of Quebec. If they have not understood, and I think they have not yet, the answer will come later. However, those people try by all means to create disorder to serve their own ends.

For instance, Laberge from the FTQ, standing on a car in Montreal in 1971, said to all the people around him: beat policemen, get through the cordons of police, do not give a dam about the law. Can we call him a man who is respectful of authority? In his capacity as president of the FTQ, he wants to be respected, but let us look at the doings within the union. In the construction area in Montreal, for example, the Laberge boys, his organizers, the bouncers as they are called, received an order to go and break the faces of those who did not want to participate in a strike. What about the freedom for which they say they are fighting? Strikes are held in the name of freedom but those who question a strike are not entitled to that same freedom. Bouncers are hired to go and break their faces, to injure them, to break some of their bones and keep them away from work.

I saw Pepin's CNTU organization at work in the construction dispute in my own area of Rouyn-Noranda and Val d'Or where the guys did not want to participate in a construction strike and reported for work. Those union leaders sent three carloads with six bouncers in each of them from Montreal to Val d'Or and Rouyn to go and break the faces of workers in my area. I am not talking through my hat here. One would be frightened at hearing the members of those organizations.

Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Louis-Hébert talked about the presence of FLQ members within the organization of the Parti Québécois she did not say, nor did I, that René Lévesque was an FLQ member. No. I believe René Lévesque is a sensitive man, a man who wants reforms through law and order. But the fact remains that all revolutionnary elements in the province of Quebec were part of the organization of the Parti Québécois. That is not lying, that is telling the truth.

Today's paper talks about the arrival in this country of Mrs. Allende. I welcome her, she is a visitor. But let us look at who takes care of it. Let us look at this. I quote from an article by Louis Delorimier:

Big demonstration at the Forum

Who is going to be there? Let us listen:

At the Forum—

—It will be on December 1, I think—

—a public meeting to stress international solidarity and to be attended by the widow of the late president of Chile. In addition of the events in Chile it will be centered on the struggle of the grape pickers in California—

—They have grapes in California, we have cabbage-heads in the province of Quebec—

—represented by trade unionist César Chavez, the struggle of the Greek, of the coffee workers in Angola, and Africa, of the swindled immigrants, of the Portuguese and betrayed Palestinians.

—I should also mention the workers swindled by people like Laberge, Pépin, Chartrand and Charbonneau. They are a bunch of cheats. They lie to the workers, they order strikes because it serves their own interest. It is the workers that pay the price of strikes and not their labour leaders. Then after five or six months of strike they are asked to go back to work while the labour leaders did not lose a day's wage. Family men and women have been obliged to do without essentials to give a decent living to their children. Who cares?

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): What has that got to do with wiretapping?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): For the hon. member's information it has something to do with wiretapping because they use them to get information about the organization of those people. The hon. member certainly knows that because when he was a newsman he used to eavesdrop. He was a real walking bugging device.

[English]

Put it through your hat. The hon. member only has a hat holder; that's all he has.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): That is good.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I think it is good and moreover, it is true.

Mr. Speaker, let us see who will be in the Montreal Forum: Marcel Pépin from the CNTU, Louis Laberge from the QFL, Micheline Sicotte from the CEQ; all of them will take the opportunity to praise the merit of their own union. A number of strikers from Firestone Co. Ltd., from Canadian Gypsum Co. Ltd., from Price Brothers Co. Ltd. and from other places will be there. Passing through Ottawa on her way to Montreal, Mrs. Allende will meet the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and the Prime Minister of Canada, the right hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and in this order: first the leader of the New Democratic Party, second, the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to Mrs. Allende being welcomed courteously because Canadians are polite people. But why do Pépin, Charbonneau and the others not talk about people expropriated in Cuba by leftists and communists? Why is it that only communists are always right? When the leaders are communists, they talk about the revolution and when the leaders are from private industry, they talk about reactionary attitude and repression. Then, in the countries where people are fighting for their freedom, they call that a repression.

But, when a government takes over the whole country, they call that a popular revolution for liberation. Let us try to understand something. Let us have a look at the People's Republic of China to see what kind of freedom people have. Let us have a look at the USSR to see what kind of freedom they have. Even scientists are put in prison in Moscow because there is no freedom in that country. If Chartrand, Pépin and Laberge were to act in Cuba as they do in Montreal, they would be sent before the firing squad within 12 hours, everybody knows that. But in this country, they are free to talk. I have no objection to their voicing their opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, those people who call for freedom want to be free to take our freedom from us. You understand what I mean. This is the kind of freedom they want. Once we have lost our freedom, we will be unhappy.

We saw some years ago young students in Czechoslovakia, in Prague, ask for permission to write what they thought. The government said: No. The young people rebelled and they wanted to recover a part of the freedom their parents had abandoned some 30 years earlier. These are the sons of those who made the revolution who ask today for the freedom to write what they want in Czechoslovakia. What was done about it? Russian tanks were sent to crush those who talked about the conquest of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, why does the New Democratic Party always take the defence of communists, socialists, those who reduce the freedom of the worker, of the human being, of industries? We allow them to organize themselves, we have enabled unions to come into existence. Here in Canada, we still have a right to have a different opinion and to tell frankly, bluntly and even stupidly that we do not agree with someone. We have a right to fight. And we would lose this right? They would like to take it from us? If ever people like Messrs. Pépin, Laberge, Chartrand and Charbonneau have the power in a province like Quebec, we could give up our individual freedom as lost. We will no longer have the right to express ourselves freely as we have at present, this sacred right that we wish to preserve and maintain.

Mr. Speaker, once more I will be asked: What has this to do with wiretapping? This has a lot to do. I suggest that these people should be continuously watched. This is why we are surely going to support Bill C-176, because we are neither ashamed nor afraid of our acts, even less afraid to express our views. We will not prevent Mr. Chartrand and others from expressing their views but we will prevent them from organizing indictable offences, killings, like disputes between workmen who are doing the same job. Some people even said that organized crime has infiltrated the QFL. A few politicians said so, and I even think it was Mr. Jérôme Choquette.

Mr. Speaker, we must protect society and in order to trace criminals, even the New Democratic Party agrees that wiretapping must be used. But once they are traced, they are given too much freedom. Yesterday or the day before the Solicitor General was speaking to students at Vanier College. He was referring to the rights of inmates and he admitted that the latter had not enough freedom. Everyday a few of them escape. Two more escaped yesterday from a penitentiary. Others will do the same. He also referred to capital punishment for notorious criminals who are undoubtedly guilty, but who, he said, would not be hanged. The minister said that he blames first prison guards who are too strict. We should be more liberal, more human, more tolerant in other words, to enable inmates to escape. He is now referring to the death penalty. He says: "I have yet to sign the death warrant of a convict. If I had to as he confided to the Vanier College students, I wonder if I could continue as solicitor general. This means that he would resign if he had to sign a death warrant.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I stated my position on this question to the House of Commons, and I do not think the newspaper report correctly states what I said yesterday at Vanier College. If the hon. member wants to know my position on this matter I shall be pleased to convey it to him.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I take the minister's word. But this appeared in another newspaper this morning, Le Devoir. It says:

[Translation]

The restoration of a punitive system would be a backward step." This was stated by the solicitor general. Is it not true?

Mr. Allmand: True.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Is that right?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Fine, it is true. In the next column, the following can be read: "An increasing number of abortions are performed in Canada." On the same page, that is on page 7, it says in one column that we must be more lenient for gangsters and prisoners and in the next one: "An increasing number of abortions are performed in Canada." We are increasingly ready to approve that.

Mr. Speaker, this has not much to do with wiretapping, but still then we could probably—

Mr. Prud'homme: Such is not the government's policy.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Indeed no. The minister is entitled to his opinions, but I know that some of his Liberal colleagues entirely disagree with him, especially as far as the death penalty and criminals are concerned. In fact, we saw it when a vote was held on the matter.

However, Mr. Speaker, this is all to say that subversive activities exist and must be controlled. Unless one is a revolutionary, one has clearly nothing to fear from wiretapping, the police, or anything else. I have never been roughed up by the police, yet I have met some. If I made errors, went astray, broke the law, then I would be arrested like anybody else. But we live in a country where people are free, and as long as they respect law and order and justice, there is no reason to fear wiretaps. On the other hand, those that want to overthrow the government by force, by violence, with arms, with bloodshed, those people must be watched closely by the RCMP, by the provincial and municipal police, is short by all those whose duty is to maintain law, order, and peace.

[English]

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): I notice that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), in whose name this bill stands, was on this side of the House during most of the remarks made by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) and that during most of the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) he was out in the lobby. Frankly, with friends like that, I don't blame him one bit for getting out of his seat. The leader of the Creditiste party calls me a journalist who listens at doors. Certainly, I never listened at his door. I doubt very much whether anything of any value would emerge, judging from the remarks the hon. member made this afternoon.

I cannot recall having sat in one place and listened to as big and bubbling a pot of disconnected, irrelevant hysterical hyperbole in all my life since the heyday of Senator McCarthy—and I don't mean Eugene. We have heard speeches this afternoon which have been highly entertaining, I grant you, but they have all had one thing in common, and it is this: they had absolutely nothing to do with the motion before us. We heard from the hon. member for Louis-Hébert an indictment of union leaders and of union members, and of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) and more of the same from the leader of the Creditiste party. But we have really heard no argument addressed to the amendment which stands in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). No one advanced any reasons why it should not pass. I want to rise to support that amendment and to say that unless it becomes part of the bill I cannot support the bill.

I have profound reservations about this bill, and I am not at all sure that I like it even with the amendment proposed by the right hon. gentleman. I am not a lawyer and I am not qualified to speak on the legal ramifications of the bill, particularly as they apply to evidence in a court of law. But I do know one thing. The right of the individual to his or her privacy, the right of the individual in this society to be protected from the police—and I use those words advisedly—is the most important area in which we can legislate in this parliament. It is for that reason that I have decided to speak on this bill, and it is for that reason that I feel very strongly about the matter at hand.

For the very first time we are granting permission to people to transmit electronically, and to record, the private conversations of other people. In some cases we are going a step further and, for the first time, allowing proceedings thus transmitted and transcribed to be admitted as evidence in a court of law, and allowing secondary evidence that is obtained by virtue of that mechanical transmission to be used as evidence against an accused. That is a very serious step to take.

All of the remarks of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert notwithstanding, this is not a step that we should take lightly. I would prefer a simple one paragraph bill dealing with this whole matter which would provide that it shall be an indictable offence punishable by up to five years in prison for any person to transmit or to record the private conversations of another person or persons without their consent. I think that would be a fine bill, but I know it would not get support from a majority of members in this House. To suggest, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) has—and this is the heart of the matter that we are discussing here—that there should be a 36-hour more or less free fire zone during which the police, without any kind of authority from a judge, can bug someone's telephone or plant transmitting devices on their person, in their luggage or in their clothing, is to vacate a very important area of his responsibility.

Not only the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are involved in this matter, as we keep hearing. The minister seems to be intent on trying to persuade us that only the RCMP will be using these devices. I suggest to you that we should look at the kind of people who will be using these devices, and using them free from any kind of supervision of a judicial nature if this bill passes without amendment. Not only will there be the provincial police forces of Ontario and Quebec; not only will there be the notorious anti-subversive squad of the Montreal police force, whom I would not trust two feet never mind with a wiretapping device for 36 hours, as would be the case if the bill passes as the minister wants, but there will be a multiplicity of departmental agents who will be running around looking for bugging equipment and for permission to use it.

If history tells us one thing, Mr. Speaker, it is that if you give people a licence to do something they will go ahead and do it just as quickly as they can. We will have people from the income tax branch, the national revenue department, the labour department and all departments under whose jurisdiction lie statutes with any kind of sanctions in them at all in regard to offences wanting to wiretap and bug people's conversations in the interest of preserving the security of the state. I suggest to hon. members that we are embarking upon a very serious step if we allow such people to move one inch without the approval of the last bulwark that we have against the invasion of privacy of the individual, namely the judiciary.

I think it is nonsense to suggest that judges cannot be found. Judges have always been found to sign search warrants. It was not too long ago that a woman arrested for picketing the United States embassy was arraigned in her jail cell. A judge came down from the courts to No. 1 station in his robes and arraigned her right in the jail, and I will have more to say about that to the minister at another time. But judges are available. Judges have always been available and they are paid to be available. I do not believe for one moment that the minister can sell any reasonable person the argument that the police need 36 hours of untrammeled, free fire time to plant these bugs.

The minister says that we must help the police. I do not want to bind the hands of the police, but where do we draw the line when we help the police? It would help the police, I suppose, if you gave every policeman a lettre de cachet so that he could imprison anyone for any reason at all and keep them there for the rest of their lives. If the minister thinks that that is far fetched, let me refer him to an incident which happened well within his lifetime.

The minister says to us that we should trust the Attorneys General. Why should we? What mystical quality have Attorneys General that we should repose our confidence in them? Ten years ago or a little better an Attorney General in the legislature of Ontario seriously presented to that house a bill that would have allowed the police commission to imprison people for the rest of their natural lives if they refused to give evidence, without habeas corpus, without the right to counsel, without even the right to a phone call to their families.

An hon. Member: That was a Tory government.

Mr. Reilly: I do not care who it was, it was a wrong bill. This was an Attorney General and he had to resign. Of course, this "hat holder" here, as the leader of the Creditiste party calls me, had the honour of being able to expose that bill for the rampant invasion of civil liberties that it was. The bill was withdrawn and the Attorney General subsequently resigned, and frankly I am very proud to have had a part to play in that. But there is an Attorney General for you.

It was an Attorney General in the province of Newfoundland who, not too many years ago, wanted to bring in the RCMP as strikebreakers. It was an Attorney General and premier of the province of Quebec, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) told us, who brought in the infamous padlock law. Lastly, it was a minister of justice of that government, and a former minister of justice, now Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who suspended the civil liberties of every person in this country three years ago, a very unhappy period in our history. Hundreds of people were thrust into prison in Montreal without right to civil liberty, without the right to call a lawyer, without habeas corpus. They had no rights at all. No charges were laid, no charges were withdrawn. People were released from jail under a cloud, and there is no telling how many careers have been damaged or wrecked because of that careless act. So, we have no cause to trust Attorneys General, and I do not think we have any cause to give untrammeled license to police forces either.

Let me give the Minister of Justice another example of a case in which the RCMP almost ruined a man's career, doubtless with the aid of wiretapping. This was at a time when I was with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and was the volunteer and unpaid president of one of those "vile, disgusting international trade unions" that so offend the hon. member for Louis-Hébert and her spiritual colleague in the Creditiste party. One of my associates in the city of Montreal applied for a job to which he was entitled under the terms of the collective agreement but which the corporation refused to give him. Upon examination I was told in secret by a senior official of the CBC that the reason he was not going to get the job was that the RCMP had informed the CBC that he was a security risk. Moreover, if I even told him the real reason, then I would be prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act.

I am pleased to say that I did tell him. I went straight to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who was our lawyer. We went to arbitration and the arbitration board went to the then minister of justice, the Hon. Davie Fulton. He appointed a judicial inquiry which found that there was no colour of right at all for the RCMP to have branded this man a security risk. Yet unless this kind of vigorous action on his behalf had been taken, this man's career would have been frozen at a very junior level, and he was a married man with children. The RCMP, this famous agency that the minister wants to let loose with wiretapping equipment for 36 hours at a crack without judicial approval, this finest police force in Canada, made a grievous mistake that very nearly ruined the life of one man and his family, and I dare say this has been repeated many, many times. Certainly it has been repeated at other levels and by various police forces in this country. Certainly, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert and her spiritual leader are not the only ones who would move against organized crime. Many people have suggested how badly we need a policy in respect of wiretapping. As I have said before, what this represents is provision to police forces of a lettre de cachet. With this power the police force will not have to bug anyone. If they suspect someone they can put him in the clink until he confesses.

I have had some experience with organized crime. I lived in Montreal for a couple of years during which time I was employed by one of those international labour unions, and I happened to begin by organizing the wrong group of hacks. One night on the way home a long, high-powered, low-slung, black car pulled up alongside. Three men jumped out and beat me within an inch of my life. They told me before they left precisely why they had done it. My leader found out they were operating on a contract from a Mafia person in Montreal who is well-known to my grinning colleagues over there. If someone offered me the chance to have these men apprehended and sent to jail by means of an illegal or unauthorized wiretap, although I bear the scars of the encounter with me to this very day, I would still say "no". I would rather that these men go free, and I mean this, than to have the privacy of individual liberties in Canada interfered with by the police or anybody else.

Let me return to the subject matter at hand. We are discussing whether the bill should be amended to provide that at no time should the police or any other agency be able to interfere with, intercept, transmit or record the private conversation of an individual without the approval of a judge. I suggest to you that I have demonstrated here cases in which both the police and politicians, be they Attorneys General or not, have proven massively fallible, and we have one bulwark in this country against abuse by police power, and that is the judiciary. In my experience this is a fairly reliable bulwark. I think the voluntary giving to police forces a hunting licence to snoop and to pry into people's conversations, and later use that evidence in court, is to limit our civil liberties to an unacceptable extent. I urge all hon. members to vote for the amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Protection of Privacy

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House is one of essential and fundamental importance to all Canadians. It is one which has become associated, both symbolically and in actuality, with the freedom of each individual to be left alone. Privacy at the option of the individual must be protected, as it is one of the essential personal rights of a free and democratic society. This premise is recognized by most members of this House, with the one or two notable exceptions we have heard from this afternoon, and also by a large majority of Canadians. It is, therefore, astonishing to the general public to learn that it is only now, in 1973, decades after the capability to eavesdrop by electronic methods became possible, that we are finally taking steps to control its use. That the potential, and in some cases the actual abuse of such gadgetry, has been allowed to exist unchecked and uncontrolled for so long is a sad commentary on past parliaments and past ministers of justice.

One of the subjects under discussion in this bill which interests me the most is what has become known as "the indirect evidence principle". This concerns whether evidence resulting from an illegal wiretap as opposed to the tape or the transcript of the tape itself may be used in evidence against an accused at a trial. The minister, having had this right deleted by the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, has made vigorous efforts to persuade public opinion that indirect evidence should be admissible in spite of the illegality of the wiretap. The minister has been singularly unsuccessful in his attempts to change public opinion. A cursory examination of editorial and other comment, including letters to the editor and so forth, from across the country has been almost uniformly against such attempts. The minister has even been criticized for attempting to reverse the will of this committee which proposed the amendment unsatisfactorily to him.

I suggest it is somewhat unfair to criticize the minister at this stage of the proceedings. Surely, each of the parliamentary steps toward final enactment has a substantive purpose and can be used by any member of this House to make what changes he deems necessary. If any single stage is merely a rubberstamp of initial stages, then we are wasting our time and such a step should be eliminated. Nor can I agree with the somewhat alarmist view of the Montreal Gazette which headlined its lead editorial last Thursday with the words "Lang Must Be Stoped". I suggest the minister is not a mad scientist out to destroy the world with his amendment. I feel, rather, that he probably falls into the category of ministers described by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) on television last week when he referred to some ministers as being under the control of their senior officials.

As to the substantive aspects of his position in respect of this amendment, I suggest he is dead wrong. He will not have my support nor, I hope, the support of the majority of the members of this House. The assumption has generally been that the rule permitting indirect evidence would apply only to the police: That is, the police only may make use of the exceptions to the general prohibition in the statute against wiretapping. As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) pointed out, a closer examination of the wording of the statute would indicate this is not the case.

[Mr. Reilly.]

The bill permits applications for electronic surveillance permits to be made by peace officers and public officers. Under the Interpretation Act "public officer" includes:

—any person in the public service of Canada

(i) who is authorized by or under an enactment to do or enforce the doing of an act or thing or to exercise a power, or

(ii) upon whom a duty is imposed by or under an enactment;

By giving the very broad meaning enunciated by this Interpretation Act to the words "public officer" we can see that they could include customs and excise tax officers, enforcement people, income tax investigators, and even prison guards or game wardens. Those are all people who, under the broad definition of the section, should be included as "public officers". Thus, with this extremely wide variety of persons permitted under the statute to avail themselves of the permits, providing they make the appropriate application through an agent or the Attorney General, it is encumbent upon us to devise rules and strictures which are onerous and which provide every protection to the indivual from the abuse of the exemption allowed under this bill.

It has been said that in Canada we enjoy outstanding police forces which would be little inclined to disobey the law and that there would be little to fear from abuse of the indirect evidence privilege if the minister's amendment were to carry. Police forces and other public officers are, for the most part, no doubt well-intentioned public servants. Thus, I would suggest that if this is the case they would have no hesitation whatsoever in accepting an amendment which does nothing more than require them to follow a simple procedure designed to guarantee protection of the civil rights of each and every Canadian. This simple procedure involves making an application through one of the many agents, which the Attorney General or the Minister of Justice will be able to appoint, who in turn will sign the application so that it may be taken before a judge ex parte. Then, upon completion of a simple affidavit, the elements of which are clearly set out in the statute, the public officer or peace officer will be granted the permission to wiretap within the restrictions of the order set out by the court.

I suggest that this procedure could be carried out quickly with a minimum of red tape and a minimum of delay. The attitude and actions of the minister and others against the elimination of the provision permitting indirect evidence from an illegal tap makes me, and I believe many others, suspicious because we feel the incidence of illegal taps will be high. If this were not the case, they would see no substantial hindrance to justice in requiring this simple procedure to be followed. Proponents of the use of indirect evidence cite the recent Ansano case in Toronto where the electronic eavesdropping devices led to the conviction of a group of heroin importers. They cite this case as though it would not have been solved if the amendments before the House were, in fact the law. This is a lot of nonsense. The police had more than sufficient time to apply for the necessary authorization had this step been required by law. Having done so, the full evidence, both direct and indirect, resulting from the use of these bugs, would have been equally admissible had this bill with the indirect amendment been the law.

Why the great outcry at ensuring that police and others must obey the law? To leave the fine and/or jail sentence as the only deterrent is no assurance. Who will investigate and charge the police? The police? The same practice that has developed with statements will develop with electronic eavesdropping devices. As those of us who are lawyers involved in defence work will know, as often as not a statement is disallowed at the voir dire, but the accused is convicted nevertheless on evidence turned up by the police after the so-called confession has been extracted from him by one means or another. The argument has been made that to automatically exclude indirect evidence from an illegal wiretap would serve to hamper and handcuff police investigations of serious crimes, again as though there need be some trade-off between the protection of civil rights and the vigorous investigation and enforcement of the law by police agencies. I think this is a point that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert attempted to make. I think she missed the point entirely. I think her argument perhaps was well refuted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) when he referred to it as a red herring.

The exclusion of indirect evidence would not hamper any honest and hard working police officer or force acting in good faith. Such officers and forces would regularly adhere to the law in obtaining the necessary authorizations and permits prior to carrying out any electronic surveillance. The real benefit derived is the protection of each and every one of us from overzealous police officers and other public servants who would know that to obtain any information, other than with proper authority, would be a fruitless task. Clearly there does not necessarily exist a trade-off between civil rights and law enforcement, as the investigative powers of the law enforcement agencies can be maintained but under authority and with permission. The greater good to society would be to ensure the protection of the individual's right to privacy rather than open the door to abuse by allowing indirect evidence to be admissible. Members of this House and this parliament have the opportunity to substantially improve the quality of criminal justice in this country. This House should take this opportunity by rejecting the minister's indirect evidence amendment and by allowing the amendment that was passed by the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to stand as it is.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there have been some informal discussions and there might be agreement to stand motion No. 3, because some further discussions are taking place. Perhaps we could consider the group of amendments standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) with which we had begun to deal previously.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to agree on behalf of our party. Discussions are taking place and I hope we can arrange an accommodation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview on a point of order.

Mr. Gilbert: No, Mr. Speaker. I was about to participate in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Then, the Chair will call upon the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my comments in respect of this amendment will be very brief. I think the amendment was fully explained when it was presented by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was attacked by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). My comments are prompted because of the speech this afternoon by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin). The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) set forth our position in regards to this particular amendment on second reading. I happen to set forth the position of the New Democratic Party with regard to our support for the principle of this bill. I said we supported the bill in principle and that we would try to obtain amendments in committee that would further strengthen it. We did that. We are now at the report stage and the hon. member for Prince Albert is bringing forward another amendment which he thinks will further strengthen the bill. But even after having said we would support the bill, after hearing the speech of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert and the speech of the Leader of the Social Credit Party I am almost inclined to say that we will not support the principle of the bill.

Were it not for members such as the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) and the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) who gave some really accurate assessments of the principles of this bill, I would strongly recommend to my colleagues that we not support the bill. When I heard the hon. member for Louis-Hébert speak I thought she was announcing principles which would be applicable to a totalitarian country. When she attacked the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), she failed to mention that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe was present at those committee hearings. He heard Ramsey Clark speak, and I think he has changed his position. I am rather proud of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe for having changed his position. His change of position was brought about by the tremendous experience in Quebec, and especially the recent experience there.

One can never be proud of some of the activities of the metropolitan police in Montreal with regard to wiretaps. Most of the wiretaps that they have used would be illegal under the present bill. They would not only put wiretaps on a person who is about to commit an indictable offence but also in certain places. In other words, if a fellow with a criminal career frequents a place where criminals hang about, the police would seek permission to wiretap that place. In fact, it would be just a mere fishing expedition for evidence in which they would be participating. I was rather ashamed of the performance of the Montreal police when they gave their evidence.

The evidence of the RCMP was rather terrifying when you realize the number of wiretaps they use, the number of charges they lay and the number of convictions they obtain. Also, the record of the Toronto police is not a proud record. They were fishing and they were obtaining evidence against people in a way that should not have been allowed. When I heard the Leader of the Social Credit Party say, righteously and proudly, that he has been wiretapped and that it does not make any difference to him, my reaction was that if it does not make any difference to him it certainly makes a great deal of difference to me. To think that a member of parliament would be tapped and would be proud of it is just outrageous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: It strikes at the dignity of members of parliament. I am inclined to think that ever since he took that trip to Taiwan and spoke to Chiang Kai-Shek his thinking has been totally led astray. This puts him on a par with the hon. member for Louis-Hébert.

Mr. Prud'homme: She has not gone there yet.

Mr. Gilbert: I think the amendment set forth by the right hon. member for Prince Albert is one with which the majority of hon. members agree because of the experiences they have had with the police. I thought the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) put on the record examples of some of the actions of Attorneys General and the police of which we should all be reminded. We are put in the position of having to protect the freedom of the public. This amendment goes a long way toward protecting the freedom of the individual and his right to privacy. The Minister of Justice in his speech bore heavily on the question of fear, the possibility that certain nefarious conduct might take place on the weekend and that the police would be left without any tools or techniques with which to apprehend the individual.

Again, I would remind hon. members of the study of Mr. Schwartz on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Association which showed that in the last three years there had been one bugging device installed by federal police in connection with a kidnapping case, none for homicide or espionage, and that over 90 per cent of such devices had been used for gambling operations. That makes a big impression on me. I do not like the attitude of the minister who attempts to place fear in the hearts of members that they will not help law enforcement officers if they do not accept his line and reject the amendment of the right hon. member. I am inclined to think that what we need is a minister who has confidence in members of the House. When we bring forth amendments, I think he must treat them with the respect that they command. The basis for these amendments that have been brought forth is the experience that some of us have had in the practice of law and in other fields. Under no circumstances could I support the position of the minister when he appeals to the fear of members. Therefore, I repeat that the hon. member for New Westminster has set forth our position and we will support the amendment put forward by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we stand motion No. 3 and proceed to the five motions in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before calling on the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guay) to complete his remarks, may I point out that when he last had the floor motions Nos. 5 and others were being considered.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, once again I have the honour to resume the speech on the protection of privacy bill which I started a few days ago in this House and, as I said earlier, I believe like many others in this House that we should come to a conclusion as soon as possible concerning the bill and the amendments.

Today I listened to the speeches made by hon. members on both sides of the House. There is a lot of talk about the abuses that are, have been or will be committed. I would like to say before the House that if we want these abuses to end, we must pass legislation. I find it somewhat abnormal that for the third time in as many years we should be debating this bill on wiretapping.

In 1970, we were unable to continue the debate. In June 1972, when an election was announced, we were unable to go on. And now for about eight months, we have debated this bill which I think is essential if we want to give our police forces the tools that they require.

There is a lot of talk about privacy, but too often law and order are forgotten. When we see what is happening in today's society, we should realize that there is an urgent need for legislation which will allow us to live more peacefully. Too often, we hear that this legislation will allow police officers to use wiretapping devices. I would say this legislation does not allow policemen to wiretap, but rather it forbids any use of such devices except when police work is concerned and in clearly defined circumstances. In other words, the policeman or agent who will apply for a permit to wiretap will have to prove to a Superior Court judge that they have tried every other means at their disposal. They will also have to specify the type of offence they want to investigate through listening to other citizens, be they members of crime syndicates, drug dealers or ordinary criminals not associated with any organization. So I think this is really a way of giving Canada instruments which, of course, might not be perfect.

As I said several times already, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) and myself have discussed this point recently. It seems to me that everyone agrees on the principle that there is a need to pass such a legislation.

I am asking all hon. members today what they are waiting for to legislate on this matter and to enact rules and standards that will allow police officers to use wiretapping to insure the order we all want and need in our country. What do we want? We want a legislation strict enough, yet flexible enough to enable us to protect the privacy of the individual while insuring a minimum security for our society.

If I had to give a title to this bill, it might be a double title: Protection of Privacy and Canadian Security Requirements Act. After several committee meetings, the minister himself agreed to amend the bill in a sense because we said that we were living in a democratic society. We have put this bill forward without taking the very rigid position that we would not accept any amendment.

I think the bill before the House for discussion at the report stage is precisely a proof of co-operation on the part of the government and we would expect the same attitude from the three opposition parties. I see three former Attorneys General among the Progressive Conservatives. They remind us at every opportunity that they have been Attorney General or minister of justice in their province. I wonder what they are doing here. They always tell us they did so much in their province and settled so many problems.

I ask them what tax, law or penal reform they carried out when they were themselves attorney generals or ministers of justice. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe is always prepared to suggest major law reforms. I can well remember the time when he was minister of justice in Quebec. I am not asking him to answer for his mandate. What did he do to improve the legislation within his department? What did he do in the field of law or penal reform? This is what I am asking him. Today not only he has changed party but he has also changed his mind. I think he has too much on his mind today. All he can suggest when very important questions are being discussed in this House are inquiries.

Once again, during the oral question period this afternoon, inquiries have been suggested in the field of oil, justice and penal institutions. Inquiries are constantly being suggested. As for me, I do not want to live in the past. We know that we have been elected by the people. We were elected by responsible citizens and we should know their problems. It is up to us to tackle those problems together in order to solve them. We do not have to find out what went wrong in the past but to try to say what we shall do all together so that things will be better in the future, how to deal with the problems and what instrument should be given police officers to enable them to establish the order we need within society, whether at the municipal, provincial or national level.

Such is the electoral mandate we were given by the people. I cannot see why we have discussed such an important issue during three years when all members seem to agree at least on the principle of this bill. Should we have to give our opinion, let us do so in the House, let us put an end to long speeches and let us vote on those amendments because the people gave us a mandate. It is up to us to fulfil that obligation because we will have to account for it if we have not carried it out in the most efficient way so as to provide protection not only for the individual but for society as a whole.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) set forth his position with regard to the amendments we are now discussing. It is what is known in our caucus as the purist position, but I must say that his views are not shared by all members of the caucus. This does not mean that his views are wrong. It may be that they are too far advanced. I think I can set fourth the view of the majority of the members of our caucus. We feel that we need legislation making it illegal to wiretap, but that an exception or exceptions should be made. We set forth this view in our speeches on second reading, and we strove to make amendments to strengthen the bill in committee.

The majority of our members feel that because of prevailing conditions we should give police the authorization to wiretap in specific cases. As I understand the amendments of the hon. member for New Westminster, he would establish the simple principle that there shall be no wiretapping, and rest his case there. When I heard the views set forth by the former U.S. Attorney General, Mr. Ramsey Clark, I was almost persuaded to accept that position. He had a very strong case to make. Mr. Speaker, you will note that I am having difficulty choosing my words probably because philosophically I agree with the amendments, but from a practical standpoint I think it would be difficult to adopt that position at this time.

I would hope that after three to five years or maybe less, we could come back and make the amendments suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster. At this time I think we have to proceed with the principles set forth in the bill, hoping to strengthen them along the way. This means that I am almost accepting the right of the police to wiretap with regard to serious offences. Mr. Speaker, I must admit that probably this is the position I am taking at this stage but I would say that it is not a fixed position that will last for some time. I hope that we would get to the purist position as quickly as possible. I think that if we do adopt the principles of this bill, this will not give the police the opportunity to engage in massive or numerous wiretaps. I think that the police have within their power the techniques of combatting crime without the use of wiretaps and I would hope that such devices would be used only as a last resort.

The minister has pointed out that the basis for an authorization on an application to the judge is that other investigative measures have failed. When I think of the inefficiency of wiretapping, the possible corruption of wiretapping, the corrosiveness of wiretapping, I am very hesitant to give the police too much power. I would hope that we could have a police force within Canada which would use the ordinary techniques of investigation, which would be paid the highest possible salaries and which would perform with the highest possible efficiency. If they are going to rely on wiretapping as the main instrument for police investigative work, I have certain fears that those goals will not be achieved.

We in the New Democratic Party are prepared to accept the principle at this stage and to give the police the right to wiretap in certain circumstances but I am sure that we reserve the right in years to come to try to attain the position that the hon. member for New Westminster is asking for today. Therefore, speaking on behalf of the majority of members of our caucus, we will support the principle of the bill and reject the amendments set forth by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the group of amendments put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), may I say on behalf of our party that we, too, find ourselves unable to agree with the rather courageous and forward-looking approach which he is attempting to take. In the extensive evidence that was laid before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at the hearings throughout June and July, I was surprised at the way in which the various police forces of this country came forward and honestly and openly disclosed the extent to which they had in the past engaged in electronic surveillance of various sorts. I was particularly impressed with the candor shown by the RCMP, and with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), in revealing the extent of surveillance in both criminal opertions and security service operations which I believe heretofore had always remained a matter not for public consumption but a part of the internal intelligence or documentation of the Solicitor General's department.

I might say that I was also impressed with the open stance taken by the Montreal urban community police and their counsel, Mr. Jacques Dagenais, who did come forward and disclose the extent to which they relied on electronic surveillance and the methods used. While I certainly would not want to agree with some of their submissions on the form which the legislation before us should take, I think they are to be congratulated for their public spirit in coming forward and indicating what they had done and what they would like to do in the interests of law enforcement in the future.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

I was only disappointed that other police forces did not come forward in the standing committee of the previous parliament or of this parliament with the same sort of candor, forthrightness and openness that these two police forces did. In particular, I refer to the other large Canadian city, the police force of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. It did not see fit to come forward during the last parliament with the sort of candor for which one would hope. Indeed, it took some considerable effort on the part of the chairman, and other members of the committee in the last parliament, to extract from the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto the sort of information which committee members thought was necessary to reach the sort of decisions that they eventually reached.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I think there is enough evidence on record to show that the police forces of this country at all three levels, federal, municipal and provincial, require electronic surveillance as a means of law enforcement but under very controlled situations. Most of the argument in committee really concerned the nature, scope and extent of the control, but what has been termed the purist view, that we should not have any wiretapping at all legally authorized in this country, was clearly a minority position.

The position that I took, and my party took, in favouring controlled wiretapping by the police in certain circumstances was based not only on the evidence placed before us that this was indeed an effective means of law enforcement, but it was based on the practical realization that we legislators might set up a strict prohibition, a strict barrier to utilization of what otherwise might be seen as a necessary device in many ways. We may set up a system which would lead to flouting the law, bypassing the law, by those who, in the pursuit of their duties, may sometimes see a violation of the law as justifiable to achieve their ends; that is the apprehension and conviction of those engaged in criminal activity. It would be a sorry day in this country if we were to set up a law which might force law enforcement officers, and others in this country, to pursue a course of action which would in effect be a violation of the law.

Having said all that, Mr. Speaker, I do want to pay tribute to the courage of the hon. member for New Westminster who has put forward, so articulately, the purist view. I wish we lived in a society in which his view was the prevailing one. If we did, I might be one of the first to jump on board in support of his position. Indeed, if the situation which is contemplated in this legislation of controlled wiretapping by the police does not work out, if there are overzealous uses of wiretapping, overzealous authorizations by judges, overzealous applications granted by Attorneys General or their agents or Solicitors General and their agents and there is a compelling public outcry, which I think would ensue in this country which is always conscious of individual and fundamental freedom, then it may be that in five years time or eight years time we will move closer to the purer position advocated by the hon. member. In the event that there is the sort of abuse which I have suggested, which I hope will not occur, then I will be with him in support of the purer position.

I respectfully suggest, in view of evidence that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the RCMP and Montreal police have placed before us, there is need for controlled and limited wiretapping in this country. Therefore my party and I are in the position of having to oppose the grouping of amendments as put forward by the hon. member. That does not in any way detract from the position we have taken on other amendments before the House or on amendments which have yet to be debated. There are important principles relating to the nature, scope and extent of control which must be considered. I would not want my remarks today to be construed in any way as a diminution of or withdrawal from earlier positions taken, positions which were forcefully put by some colleagues.

Protection of Privacy

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved:

No. 7

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended by striking out:

(a) line 46 at page 4 and substituting the following:

"unlikely to succeed; and"

(b) line 5 at page 5 and substituting the following:

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a fairly simple amendment which has the effect, notwithstanding the language of the technical amendment, of removing subparagraph (d) of subsection (1) of section 178.13. Subparagraph (d) referred to is to be found between lines 6 and 8 inclusive on page 5 of the bill. It may not be desirable to repeat any aspect of the definition of offence as lawyers, in looking at the legislation later, may be misled into thinking that the definition of offence, as it will be in the bill proper, is somehow affected by this particular clause, or that the requirement in the application is somehow affected. I therefore ask hon. members for their support in removing this particular part of the clause.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St Paul's): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of my party, I say that we will accept this as a necessary amendment, as it clears up an ambiguity in the bill. The minister rightly pointed out that the definition of the word "offence" is the subject matter with which motion No. 2, which has been allowed to stand, is concerned. If both definitions were left in the bill, the result could be confusion.

When the committee considered the matter, it was felt that the term "offence" could be defined as any indictable offence. Since then we have moved to other ground. Therefore, speaking on behalf of my party, I can say that we accept the minister's amendment.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the remarks made by the previous speaker. This is a necessary tidying up amendment and I do not think it is necessary to speak on it at length.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 7 (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House wish to proceed with Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved:

No. 8.

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended in Clause 2 by deleting the words "or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of section 178.12 by the Solicitor General of Canada or the Attorney General, as the case may be" in lines 43 to 46 at page 5 and line 1 at page 6.

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would agree to moving two other motions standing in his name. They might be considered all at the same time, as the same principle is involved in each one.

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I could also move motions Nos. 17 and 18, which seem to make up the package. I wonder if, for purposes of debate, we could agree that these motions could be grouped as part of a package to be debated.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that motions Nos. 8, 17 and 18 will be grouped and put to the House for purposes of debate as one unit?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt moved:

No. 17

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, he amended in Clause 2 by deleting the words "and agents to be named in the report who were specially designated in writing by him for the purposes of section 178.2" in lines 5 to 9 at page 15 and the words "or by agents to be named in the report who were specially designated in writing by him for the purpose of that section," in lines 11 to 14 at page 15.

No. 18

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended in Clause 2 by deleting the words "or by agents specially designated in writing by him for the purposes of that section," in lines 30 to 32 at page 18.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify the purpose of the amendment I ought to read the clause as printed, and then refer to the proposed amendment. Clause 178.12 is concerned with the application to a judge for permission to wiretap. The first part of clause 178.12 reads:

An application for an authorization shall be made ex parte and in writing to a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, or a judge as defined in section 482 and shall be signed by the Attorney General of the Province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by . . .

Before the bill went to committee, the word "agent" alone was used. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) succeeded with an amendment which designated the agent and restricted to some extent the number of people in this country who would be authorized to permit this kind of invasion of privacy.

● (1730)

I am still not satisfied that the bill contains sufficient restrictions. Let me explain why. It is entirely feasible, under the present wording, that every sergeant of police in the country, every corporal, could be designated. In fact, it is possible to designate every peace officer as long as he is named, and the names are not hard to come by. It may be thought I am taking this to ridiculous limits, but let me remind hon. members that the purpose of the bill is to restrict unnecessary surveillance of the public by the police.

We still come back to the morality of wiretapping. The bill still provides that the Solicitor General or the Attorneys General of the provinces can designate anyone they care to choose as their agents and that these persons then have authority to commence the process of wiretapping; they have authority to issue permits without the approval of a court, under the emergency provisions. We have just been debating the question whether or not they should avoid the judicial process. If we recall the statistics quoted earlier, the evidence was that the RCMP initiated 663 wiretaps in the year 1972-73. Consider the number of conversations overheard on those wiretaps; they must have run into the hundreds of thousands. Now consider that under the bill as it stands there is no real restriction on the number of people who can initiate these kinds of proceedings. I suggest that by leaving in the bill the provision to which I have called attention, we invite the consequences that all of us fear, namely, that we shall move closer to a police state, as was ably advocated this afternoon by the hon. lady from Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin).

I do not think it is proper that we should pass legislation which places no limit upon the number of people who can initiate this kind of proceeding. While we may have confidence in the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General and in the various Attorneys General—after all, three of them are NDP Attorneys General—expanding the capacity to initiate wiretapping as is being done in this section simply opens the door to further abuse.

I said that theoretically every peace officer in the country could be specially designated. Indeed, the agent need not be a peace officer; he or she could be anyone an Attorney General might think to be an appropriate person. The other day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) suggested we should take another look at the bill before us because, he said, it was a very good bill and one which really did safeguard privacy. I did so, but I kept finding other provisions which suggest that rather than safeguarding privacy, it is basically an open cheque to the police to engage in as much surveillance as they deem necessary. In almost every circumstance mentioned in the bill one can think of ways in which the restrictions contained in it could be overcome.

Consider the information which must be supplied to a judge before authority is granted. Assume an agent, having been given authority, goes to a judge. If he knows who the person is, he must divulge this information. If he does not, he must divulge the place he intends to wiretap. If he does not know the place, then at least he has to tell the judge what means he intends to use in order to wiretap. This affords very little protection to the public since it is entirely feasible that the police might suspect that tenants in a certain apartment block were engaged, say, in drug trafficking, in which case they might tap or bug the whole apartment block.

I am bound to revert to the position I have already taken. When you open this door you have opened a Pandora's box, and it cannot be closed again despite all the tinkering that may be done, all the amendments that may be adopted. In our heart of hearts we know that wiretapping is an immoral act and, as such, it is an act in which we do not want the police to participate. As the hon. member for Louis-Hébert would have it, we should let the police do anything they like as long as they catch criminals. In those circumstances I suggest there would soon be many more criminals for the police to catch, because people would lose respect for the means by which the law is enforced. That kind of society is not one in which I think most of us in this House would wish to live. What the hon. lady said, really, was this: We have to fight fire with fire. If criminals have the means, then we must have the means. If criminals kill, then we had better kill.

Mr. Speaker, we have been trying to get out of the mire of that kind of criminal society for the last thousand years, and if we follow the logic of the hon. member we shall go back to that mire. It is the first rule of society that there be respect for law and order. But it must be the kind of law and the kind of order that merits respect: and when you get involved in wiretapping you are engaged in an immoral activity which none of us respect.

It is not good enough for a person to say, "I have nothing to hide and therefore I do not mind being under surveillance." That is straight from George Orwell's "1984". It reflects the madness that enters society when everyone's activity is constantly under surveillance and the privacy of the individual is lost. Freedom of speech is lost. It is lost because of self-censorship. It is lost because if you get on a telephone and think your words are being overheard, you will be less inclined to say what you think.

Consent to wiretapping is one of the most insidious things which can be foisted on a population. It is insidious because it grows imperceptibly. Surely we in this House should, above all, be concerned about respect for the individual and his rights within a free society. If all this is to be thrown away on the ground that we are protecting people from criminals, it will not really be worth living in society because all that will emerge is a totalitarian state.

Directing my attention, now, to the specific amendments which have been proposed, I think it is important to restrict the number of people who can initiate this wire tapping procedure. To do so is to say to the people of Canada, "We respect your privacy and we want you to enjoy the protection which we believe any civilized society should afford to its citizens." But that does not only mean protection from criminals; it means protection from government, or it might also mean protection from multinational corporations who wish to spy on their employees.

I know the hon. member for Louis-Hébert feels strongly about this. I hope she will look at the other side, because there is another side. I hope she will look at the other side in the way the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) did, who took time to examine all the evidence. On balance, I think she will rethink her position. I know she is not a person of such firm and fixed ideas that she is not interested in listening to others, because she spends so much time in the House.

I urge the House to endorse this package of amendments because I think it says something to the people of Canada. We do not wish to have any abuse of wiretapping law, and this is one of the ways we have of saying that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey).

Protection of Privacy

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I do not speak with the—

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice rises on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) I would like to point out that if the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe has changed his mind so often it might well be because of that. He should look at the climate that exists in the province of Quebec; he would realize that only two Tory members were elected there.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows as well as I do that this is not a point of order. The hon. member will be given a chance to participate in the debate and the Chair will give him an opportunity to make his speech after the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) has completed his.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for St. Paul's. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) is rising on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay).

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, on the particular point of order just raised, I think the hon. member should consider that if political consideration is his chief concern in the way he is treating this bill, then I can understand some of the speeches we are hearing from the other side of the House.

Mr. Paproski: Right on. Shame!

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the three amendments which have been proposed in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), I might say that this is one of the issues which before the standing committee did not have the vigorous and detailed debate which might have been useful to all hon. members, not only in the committee but in the House, in approaching the matter now before us. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), when dealing with motion No. 3, expressed considerable concern about the term "agent" and the use of that term with very few, if any, restrictions, particularly any use of the term that might allow emergency permits under section 178.15.

By restricting the application to the Solicitor General or the Attorney General, without permitting them to authorize any agents at all, would be virtually to paralyse the law enforcement agencies in their use of electronic surveillance as a legitimate means of law enforcement, except in large cities where the Attorney General or Solicitor General might reside or would be available.

This has caused me some concern, but I am also concerned by the lack of restriction and the lack of definition of the term "agent". It is for that reason that I moved a motion in committee, which was accepted, to the effect that the agents be specifically named in the annual reports of the Attorney General and Solicitor General. I appreciate that this is a minimal protection at best and it is protection that comes after the event; in other words, it comes after many applications for authorization have been sought.

Nevertheless, in speaking only for myself, my inclination is to let the sections stand as they are now, subject to any further comment that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) might have on the proposed amendments put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster. I think this is one area where the opposition at both federal and provincial levels, as well as the press in doing their duty, may scrutinize the annual reports of the Attorney General and Solicitor General to see that there are not abuses here, that there are not an undue number of agents named, or that there are not persons named as agents who lack the sort of competence, responsibility and quality that we would all agree should reside in a person exercising powers under this important but somewhat dangerous legislation.

So without wanting to be definitive or completely unequivocal on the matter, my inclination would be to let the legislation stand in its present form and to try out this "agent" provision, with a very strong injunction to the Attorney General and Solicitor General that they take great care and exercise caution in regard to the number and competence of the individuals they choose to name as agents.

Certainly I think there would have to be some regional considerations here. Again I refer to my home province of Ontario where I think it would be quite reasonable to suggest that there be an agent in western Ontario, certainly one in northern Ontario, one in eastern Ontario, and of course the Attorney General himself usually resides in Toronto which is the seat of the provincial government. I am sure that similar arrangements could be worked out for the other provinces.

I would be opposed to, and appalled by, any suggestion that all chiefs of police or all police officers, or indeed all justices of the peace, should be named agents. I think that would go beyond the spirit and the intendment of this particular piece of legislation in its present form. Again, I rest my case until I hear the comments of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the words of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) who has indicated the difficulties that would be involved with the amendments proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). Let me first of all say how much I share the view of the hon. member for St. Paul's. The responsibility of a Solicitor General or Attorney General should, in my view, certainly be exercised carefully in regard to the manner of designation, and the practices that are followed by the very best of police forces and police units ought to be followed and be generalized in the way in which very careful use is made of the power to designate.

As has been said by the hon. member, the bill does require very special designation of such persons by the Attorney General or Solicitor General. This is a requirement that gives that flexibility to the Attorney General or Solicitor General to appoint the person who is most likely capable of exercising judgment and also to be in place in order to carry out this function. The problem of leaving the matter to the Solicitor General or Attorney General is, or course, a very serious one in terms of this availability at a certain point in time or at a certain place, and therefore one to be avoided.

Everyone who looks at this act should recognize the very important protections that are built in, in an attempt to assure that the very best kind of conduct does accompany the use of this rather special device, one which is intended to be used only when other devices are not going to succeed in regard to persons involved in serious crime. The reporting provisions are of extreme importance. The reports generally required would include the names of the persons who have been authorized, so that there will be an opportunity to scrutinize the conduct of Attorneys General and Solicitors General in the appointing and designating of these persons.

The reports, in addition, are designed to be very complete in the information they give about the way in which an application was made, whether an application was granted, whether there were renewals and the number of persons identified in an authorization in respect of whom proceedings were commenced. This is the kind of information required in the reports which are to be made annually by the Solicitor General and by Attorneys General put before this House and made a matter of public record. Some of the Attorneys General of the provinces may feel there is a legitimate question as to whether parliament ought to impose upon them this kind of obligation to report in what is essentially a political way. I think it is essential and is the right of parliament to do this because, after all, it is this parliament that has the obligation to make laws which protect our citizens.

As a result of the Criminal Code and long tradition in this country, the provincial Attorney General is the officer charged with carrying out the law enacted by this parliament. It does seem to me, in looking at this power to obtain authorization to use an electronic device to intercept a communication, that we have quite properly looked at the question involving the kind of report to be made by provincial Attorneys General. In making those reports public and available to members of parliament, I think it follows that in order to do our job properly we must examine the reports.

The political processes of the provinces should aid us, as well, in that the members of the opposition there will ordinarily be zealous in pointing out any misuse or abuse in the manner in which the Attorney General of a province carries out his obligation. We, as the makers of law in this parliament, continue to have the right and the duty to examine these reports from the provincial Attorneys General. We also have the obligation to examine the reports so as to determine whether the Attorneys General properly carry out their function; and we should have the right to make changes if we find these officers are not operating in an appropriate manner. After all, that is our obligation and our function.

The reporting provision is one I rely upon as being very necessary in this statute. Here again, this is important as a controlling device in respect of naming the agents who can make application to an Attorney General. The Attorneys General will have to focus very carefully on this question, and I am sure the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Paul's was made in this vein. What he is suggesting is that this should be done. I am sure he has reference to the discretion which is commonly applied to these matters by the very best police forces. We on our part will be charged with the obligation of seeing that Attorneys General throughout this country do in fact apply the kind of standard which should be applied in respect of police units throughout this country. I refer to the high quality of standard that can be found among many police units now in existence in our country.

Therefore, I hope hon. members will oppose this amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster in order that the operational possibilities of using electronic intrusion when really needed in order to detect serious crime and enforce the law can, in fact, be a workable procedure.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), I should perhaps say by way of preface that I am not a lawyer and I have no experience in the administration of the law. I am inclined to feel that this matter should not be left exclusively to the advice of lawyers, so I want to add a layman's point of view.

My position is simply that, rather than starting off by permitting a fairly wide use of the principle of agency, it would seem to make more sense to be more cautious by starting off with a limitation as suggested by the hon. member's amendment. If after a period of time it becomes evident that the provisions set out in the hon. member's amendment are not sufficient to meet the problems toward which this act is directed, surely that is the time to broaden the use of the principle of agency.

I am perhaps not so sure as the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) that the spirit of the law will be observed if the letter of the law does not make the spirit explicit. Therefore, I believe there is good reason for arguing that the use of the principle of agency should be restricted to those persons designated in my colleague's amendment. If, after experience of a year or two, it seems clear that this is an unworkable restriction, then perhaps the doctrine of agency can be expanded further. Therefore, I believe that the spirit of the law as enunciated by the hon. member for St. Paul's should be made explicit in the letter of the law.

I should like to add one additional comment in respect of the argument put forward by the hon. member for New Westminster when he addressed himself to the principle of this legislation. I do not agree entirely with him that the use of wiretapping under certain circumstances is in itself immoral. I believe that the state has rights, just as an individual has rights, and there are certain circumstances under which the state may apply those rights. This bill sets forth one of those circumstances.

I suggest there is great merit in the suggestion that we should proceed cautiously and conservatively in respect of this matter of individual rights. I hope hon. members will forgive me as a member of the NDP for making the suggestion, in respect of privacy, that the state's rights can be expanded if necessary. Here I refer directly to the use of a number of agents. It is much easier to expand legislation which starts off by being narrow than it is to narrow legislation that starts off by being too wide.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of motion No. 8 submitted by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). In substance, the effect of the amendment would be to delete the words "or an agent specially designated in writing", referring to section 178.12 of Bill C-176.

I think the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey), the minister, and the mover of the motion, set forth the history of what has happened in respect of this particular section and these words in the original bill. The minister used the word "agent", and at the committee stage the hon. member for St. Paul's, in order to make it more precise and to impose greater responsibility on the minister, introduced an amendment so that it would read "an agent specially designated in writing". The minister this afternoon, in speaking in support of the hon. member for St. Paul's, indicated that the reporting provisions of the legislation gave all the protection that was required with regard to this section.

I disagree with the argument advanced by the minister. The reason my colleague from New Westminster moved the amendment was to impose the full responsibility on the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General or the Attorneys General of the provinces. This should not place any great restriction or any great additional burden on the job. When one reflects on what has happened in Canada with regard to wiretapping in the last few years, one wonders who gave the authority to wiretap. Certainly it could not have been the Attorney General, the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General. In all probability the authority came from the local police. We have seen the widespread use of wiretapping that has prevailed in the large Canadian cities, more especially Montreal and Toronto.

If we reflect for a moment and try to understand what has happened in the United States, it might be helpful to note that in the United States, in order for a wiretap to be permitted the authorization must be signed by the Attorney General. The reason is that in the final analysis the Attorney General must be held responsible for the issuance of the wiretap authorization. It is rather interesting to remember that J. Edgar Hoover would not act in respect of a wiretap unless the authorization was signed by an Attorney General, because he realized that ultimately the responsibility would have to fall on someone and if he signed the authorization for the wiretap he would be held primarily responsible. Therefore J. Edgar Hoover, being a very cautious person, imposed the final responsibility on the Attorney General.

I think that is where the responsibility lies. I cannot see how any burden is involved when an application is made for authorization to wiretap, if the minister is required to review the application which can then be set in motion for authorization by a judge. When I think of men like J. Edgar Hoover having wiretaps on men like Martin Luther King, I realize just how necessary it is to impose responsibility in this respect. Martin Luther King was wiretapped in the United States. Here we would have a situation, if we agree with the wording of the minister, as amended by the hon. member for St. Paul's, in which a person who is an agent specially designated in writing can act without the knowledge of the minister.

I can foresee the minister being placed in a position where it would be very awkward for him. He could raise the standard excuse that he did not know that an authorization had been given in the particular circumstances. We in this party would not want to see the minister placed in that position, because we feel he should have full responsibility in respect of the right to apply for authorization to wiretap.

This afternoon the minister was very vague about the type of person who would be specially designated in writing for the purpose of this section. Had he given a more complete explanation he would have said which persons could be designated. He might have said, for instance, that he would designate the deputy attorney general and leave it at that, because the deputy attorney general, the deputy minister of justice and the deputy solicitor general work very closely with the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, and so on. However, he did not say that. He left it very vague and did not answer the question. I have a fear that the persons he would designate would be persons such as the chiefs of police in Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, and so on—those in the big cities. As my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) says, it could even be a Crown prosecutor.

This takes away from the sense of responsibility which we think should rest with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) or the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). Therefore, the amendment presented by my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), makes sense. It gives protection to all Canadians and ensures that this provision with regard to the authorization of wiretapping will not be abused.

Again I repeat that the Minister of Justice should never place himself in a position where he can say, "I did not issue it. The person that I designated issued it, and possibly in the circumstances I would not have issued it". I think he should be placed in the same position as that of the attorneys general in the United States, that when an authorization for a wiretap is issued, the Attorney General takes the full blame.

I hope the hon. member for St. Paul's will see the wisdom of this amendment because even though he is trying to tighten the amendment by using the words "agents specially designated" he is really not getting to the crux of the matter. He thinks that the reporting requirement in the bill will solve his problems, and his anxieties will be answered—but that is not so.

We have seen various Ministers of Justice over the years. Since 1965 I have seen at least three or four. In Ontario I have seen various Ministers of Justice and Attorneys General; they have all had different attitudes with regard to problems like these. I, for one, am chary with regard to giving them too much power and at the same time an excuse with regard to this important section of the bill. Therefore, I urge the hon. member for St. Paul's and his colleagues to support this amendment which will strengthen the bill, avoid abuses that may take place, and make this far better legislation for the protection of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-176 and more specifically on amendments Nos. 8, 17 and 18 aimed at replacing the word "agent" in clause 178.12.

We all know that this clause deals with applications for authorization. While speaking recently on this legislation I have stated my concern, which is shared by many other hon. members, about the political pressures which might be exerted when a wire-tapping application is made.

While generally supporting this bill as well as the principle of wiretapping, since this is one way among others to fight organized crime, it remains that Parliament should ensure that the political power will not exert direct pressures for political purposes as far as wiretapping is concerned. This is how I conceive clause 178.12 since the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is ultimately responsible for empowering someone to authorize wiretapping.

I would like to make a few brief remarks. I will join the excellent remarks of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) who stated this afternoon that we should obviously give all possible facilities to our law enforcement officers to fight organized crime efficiently. Moreover, I am sure the hon. member for Louis-Hébert will also agree that this must not be done for the benefit of particular political interests but to protect society as a whole. Here is what concerns me; subclause (a) reads and I quote:

(a) the Solicitor General of Canada personally, if the offence under investigation is one in respect of which proceedings, if any, may be instituted at the instance of the Government of Canada and conducted by or on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, or an affidavit which may be sworn on the information and belief of a peace officer or public officer deposing to the following matters, namely:

Then it goes on describing circumstances requiring that it be accompanied by:

Mr. Speaker, what has me worried is the too direct intervention of the political power in the judiciary power. Perhaps some of my colleagues of the other parties will not share my point of view, but experience to date has shown that the judiciary and political powers are too often related. Finally, the population can rightfully ask what is the real distinction between the judiciary, legislative and executive powers.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that specific procedures must be found to enable the judiciary to act by itself so that it can be dissociated from the political power. This is why I welcome with interest the proposed amendments. I for one intend to support them since the bill offers no such assurances.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I circulated through the usual channels the proposal, on which I think there is general agreement, that we defer the vote on this motion to the time when votes are taken at a later date.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I understand that, but I still have to put the question.

Mr. Lang: It is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, if we can now agree that the debate on this matter is concluded and the question will be put at a later date which will be arranged by agreement. This will avoid having a division now.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Speaking for the official opposition, let me say that this is in accordance with my understanding of the arrangement, namely, that the vote will be deferred until a later time which is to be agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we do not mind this arrangement—in fact, under certain circumstances it would be welcome—but we would be willing to regard the debate on this motion as concluded. We could order the vote, but have it deferred.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): On behalf of the fourth party but not the least in importance, I wish to say that it is not against the proposal and we hope that this debate will end as soon as possible.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The question is on motions Nos. 8, 17 and 18. All those in favour will please say yea.

● (2020)

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred. I will now have to ask the minister where we go from here.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I suggest we go quickly to motion No. 11 standing in my name, and thereafter to motion No. 13 standing in my name.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved:

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended by striking out:

178.15 (1) Where the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada is satisfied that circumstances exist that would justify the giving of an authorization for the interception of private communications but the urgency of the situation requires that interceptions commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained, he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, give a permit for the interception of private communications between persons, at a place and in a manner designated by him in the permit.

(2) Where a permit for the interception of private communications is given under subsection (1), the person giving it shall, in every case, forthwith report thereon with full particulars to the Attorney General by whom he was designated for the purposes of this section or to the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, who shall thereupon

(a) direct that an application for an authorization to intercept private communications in the circumstances to which the permit relates be made,

(b) direct that an application for approval of the permit be made, or

(c) revoke the permit or confirm any prior revocation thereof by the person who gave the permit."

(b) lines 14 to 39 at page 8 and substituting the following:

(4) An application for approval of a permit for the interception of private communications shall be made ex parte and in writing to a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction or a judge as defined in section 482 and shall be signed by an agent who would have been entitled to apply for an authorization to intercept private communications in the circumstances to which the permit relates; and such approval may be given if the judge to whom the application is made is satisfied that, at the time the permit was given, circumstances existed that would have justified the giving of an authorization to intercept private communications in the circumstances to which the permit relates and that the urgency of the situation required that interceptions commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, have been obtained."

[English]

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is simply an amendment to correct the bill along the lines of the intention of the committee. The report came forward with a change which was not considered to be in accordance with the over-all approach and the report of the committee. This is a motion accordingly to correct it, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I wish to concur with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). We have examined this amending motion. We believe it to be necessitated by a clerical error in the reporting back of the bill from the committee. I think the amendment accurately reflects the intention of the committee, at least to the best of my recollection. Therefore, I would support it.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Mr. Leggatt: On a point of clarification, we are dealing with amendment No. 11 at this time?

Mr. Lang: Yes.

Mr. Leggatt: Since this party has moved to strike out the emergency permit clause, I would point out this is simply an attempt to amend that clause and there does not seem any point in supporting an amendment to a clause that we have moved to delete from the provisions of the bill. We can understand the minister wishing to amend in accordance with the proceedings of the committee, but nevertheless we cannot support the amendment on the basis that we cannot support the clause it seeks to amend.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, personally I am strongly opposed to amendment No. 11 before us and to amendment No. 13 for several reasons, including, as I said earlier, the intervention of the political power that can always intervene directly under several pretexts.

The reasons for being authorized to use wiretapping devices are as follows:

178.12 (c) the facts relied upon to justify the belief that an authorization should be given . . .

(d) the type of private communication proposed to be intercepted;

(e) the names and addresses, if known, of all persons, . . . whose private communications . . . are proposed to be intercepted . . .

(f) the period for which the authorization is requested; and

(g) whether other investigative procedures have been tried . . .

With respect to that under the procedure set out by the original bill the judge must be satisfied that there are no other means available. In making his decision the judge must emphasize the terms with which authorized persons must comply.

The bill also says elsewhere that renewals can be granted by a judge of a Superior Court within a period of 30 days. The same procedure as under clause (4) must be followed.

Mr. Speaker, I fail to find situations so urgent that one judge or another could not be contacted and I fail to see why any minister should have it within his power on the pretence of a so-called emergency to give an authorization to install bugging devices and use them for unknown purposes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is acceptable and I intend to support it to the extent that I am protected against the possible use by the political power. And I think that if the House agrees to that amendment that means that the House is going against the spirit of this bill which is to protect society and individuals while at the same time giving increased efficiency to justice. Thus it continues to do what has been done in the past, that is allowing the political power to intervene as it wishes according to circumstances in the administration of justice.

Mr. Speaker, in introducing this amendment the minister admits that on certain occasions it is impossible to contact a judge of the Superior Court or any other person. Then let him appoint more judges or take the necessary means so the judicial power can meet the demand, instead of himself giving that authorization on the pretence of an emergency.

On that point I would like to recall that at the time of the so-called emergency during the October crisis, never in this House did any party actually prove there was a state of emergency. We were told that the country was in great danger, but, Mr. Speaker, the government has played at politics as if it were a ping pong game, when under the cover of urgency, a minister or attorney general will grant a permit to use such devices, what powers will Parliament, which has the power to pass this act, have to ask the minister to explain this urgency? That is another weakness of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, and this is why I shall use all my strength to fight against it so that the judicial power instead of the political power be respected in the administration of justice.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, further to the remarks of my colleague from New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), may I simply point out that if motion No. 3 in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is carried, then of course amending motion No. 11 will be functus. But in the meantime we are opposed to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Atkey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and further to the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think it should be made perfectly clear that this in effect is simply a housekeeping amendment. As the minister well knows, many of us in this party are opposed to the clause and in fact are in favour of the amendment proposed by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). However, if that amendment fails we would prefer to be stuck with the draft now proposed by the minister, which is correcting a clerical error made in reporting back from the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. We will now deal with No. 13.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved:

Protection of Privacy

No. 13. That Bill C-176, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended by (a) adding immediately after line 29 at page 9 the following:

"Judge may rule evidence admissible

(2) Where in any proceedings the judge is of the opinion that any private communication or any other evidence that is inadmissible pursuant to subsection (1) is relevant and that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done in the matter to which the proceedings relate, he may notwithstanding subsection (1), admit such private communication or evidence as evidence in such proceedings."

(b) by striking out line 30 at page 9 and substituting the following:

"Application to Subsection (1)

(3) Subsection (1) applies to all"—

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment which I propose is designed to assure that if credible and relevant evidence is available in the case of a crime being tried in the courts, it can be brought before the courts and weighed by the courts in the determination of the result in that situation. In the course of deliberating upon the question of privacy, a committee of the House of Commons some years ago began examining the question of whether or not in any circumstances evidence ought to be excluded when it is associated with an invasion of privacy, which is being made illegal, essentially, in a criminal way for the first time by this bill. The question was therefore discussed in the committee at the initial stages when the subject matter was before it, in the committee of the last session and again in this session.

The government, in examining the report of the committee in 1969, agreed to go so far as to include the provision in the bill that the actual private communication itself, if intercepted, should not be used later as evidence in a proceeding if it had been intercepted in an unlawful manner. We did that with the view that we could in that way add emphasis to the impact to the importance of privacy, to the value we put upon protecting it. The committee in its deliberations most recently, and in the report which we have before us now, chose to consider and adopt an amendment which would go well beyond that and would exclude indirect evidence which might be obtained as a result of such unlawful interception.

There is no doubt about the good motives of the people involved in that type of proposition, just as there is not in the United States about the rule to exclude evidence obtained in an illegal manner, and generally where in the British tradition it does not exist. The origin of the rule is to add some additional sanction against illegal activity in regard to the evidence being adduced. Even in that regard the rules are unfortunate, because they raise the basic proposition that somehow the police are being rewarded or are profiting from the result of their activity, when it is illegal, if they can bring valid and important evidence before a court in a case which involves something quite different, a serious crime perhaps and someone who stands before the dock of justice accused of that crime. I do not take the view that we should consider it a reward to the police when evidence is adduced in that fashion. I do, however, share the view that the police ought not to engage in illegal activity in obtaining evidence, in the conduct of obtaining evidence on our behalf in law enforcement. That is why we have placed in this bill a very significant sanction indeed to discourage the police or anyone else from using electronic devices to intrude upon privacy.

The basic provision in the bill makes this a crime with a punishment of up to five years in prison—a punishment which might well be used against anyone who invades, without regard to the rights of an individual, his privacy. That is a significant penalty and the main bulwark of our safety, after this bill becomes law, that our privacy will not be invaded.

Why then, not add the additional sanction of keeping the evidence out? I would ask hon. members to turn their attention to the kind of situation in which we might find ourselves. Let us suppose a person is accused of murder and there is a murder weapon—the most relevant of evidence in relation to that crime—with ballistics matching the bullet which was found in the victim, with fingerprints on the weapon which matched the fingerprints of the accused in the dock. If the law were to stay as it has been reported from the committee, that murder weapon could not be admitted in evidence if it was found as a result of information which in any way came from the use of an illegal electronic intrusion or wiretap. That would be true whether the information which led to the finding of the gun was obtained by the police, which is unlikely, or by a private individual's illegal wiretapping.

We are asked, therefore, to see that a court is denied relevant evidence in a case that may be extremely important to law and order, to the cause of justice in our society, to the cause of deterrence of crime, because of something in the background which led to that evidence being adduced. I do not believe that any policeman will lightly use an electronic device without an authorization as provided by the bill when facing a potential five-year jail sentence which we provide for the illegal use of such devices in the legislation.

Do we want to see a court find a murderer not guilty because a key piece of evidence is kept from that court because of some rule relative to the admissibility of that evidence—not a rule that goes to the basic proposition that that evidence is needed in the court, but which we put in place for quite a different reason? I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I am looking particularly at evidence which may be obtained in an indirect fashion. Who knows what "indirect" means? How far "indirect" may we trace? Evidence may be obtained in an indirect fashion as a result of an illegal intrusion by someone in society at large, perhaps a criminal, and yet we would be deprived of that evidence in court because of the illegality of the intrusion which was part of the background facts which led to the finding of the evidence, evidence which is unassailable, which is clear—the gun itself.

I therefore urge hon. members to consider my amendment which proposes that a judge in such a situation may examine the evidence, notwithstanding the fact that there may be a taint of illegality in regard to its source; and when it is relevant and when he believes it is in the interests of justice to do so, he may admit that evidence in the proceedings before him when he is concerned that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done. Surely in those circumstances we ought to want him to be able to admit that evidence in the proceedings before him. Surely we would be doing damage to the whole approach to justice and the approach that people take to justice in our courts if we deprive the court of that evidence in such circumstances.

I have a further concern about a rule that provides for exclusion of evidence that is relevant, and that is the possibility of defence counsel making use of that rule to take a great deal of time in court to determine whether there is anything in the background which suggests that something associated with a taint of illegal wiretapping exists. I am talking about a case in which there is nothing before the court to indicate any wiretapping at all, and evidence is introduced. How will we stop defence counsel in such a case insisting on the right to cross-examine either the witnesses or police at hand, or other police summoned for the purpose to get a full scale of denials that there was any wiretapping in any way, at any time, anyhow, that had any effect on the case?

What if a judge in such a trial said to defense counsel, "I am not going to let you take our time to try to smoke out whether there was any wiretapping"? I am postulating a case in which there is no wiretapping evidence at all, yet the time of the court may be taken up hour after hour because of the insistence of the defence on the right to cross-examine endlessly, because of the rule that evidence, even if associated indirectly with wiretapping, cannot be admitted. Defence counsel would therefore be obligated to see whether there was even any indirect relationship between the evidence before the court and any wiretapping. If the trial judge were to stop him short in that cross-examination—as we know may happen at some time—a court of appeal could well reverse a verdict of guilty in such a case and send the case back on the ground that the trial judge had not allowed sufficient latitude in cross-examination.

In order to discourage illegal wiretapping we have introduced a five-year jail sentence in cases where wiretapping is undertaken illegally.

Mr. Atkey: The sentence will only apply if you catch the offenders.

Mr. Lang: I am sure hon. members do not underrate the ability of defence counsel to cross-examine in an attempt to ascertain if wiretapping was used, even in cases where there is no suggestion of wiretapping having been used. Those who oppose the amendment, I suggest, are showing no concern for the time of the court and the possibility of reversal in cases involving serious charges merely because the trial judge has not permitted counsel to pursue endlessly the quest for something that he has not yet found but which he thinks may be lurking in the background.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Lang: Not at this point, if the hon. member does not mind. In addition, I wish to suggest one other serious problem. I point out that relevant evidence ought to be before the court, ought to be admitted, and excluding it does violence to justice. I also point out the procedural problems which arise in connection with this matter as defence counsel will need to examine at length in order to ascertain if there was wiretapping before he can learn if it was done illegally or not.

Another problem was referred to by the committee in 1969. There is the distinct possibility that criminals will place evidence beyond the reach of the court by involving such evidence in an illegal wiretap. The spectre of such an event should cause us to pause, because the cause of justice would not be served and the person who had committed a serious crime might not be brought to justice. In this connection I wish simply to emphasize that there is included in the bill a five-year penalty for wiretapping.

How can anyone argue with the basic proposition put forward in the amendment, which reads:

> Where in any proceedings the judge is of the opinion that any private communication or any other evidence that is inadmissible pursuant to subsection (1) is relevant and that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done in the matter to which the proceedings relate, he may notwithstanding subsection (1), admit such private communication or evidence as evidence in such proceedings.

Ten provincial Attorneys General have joined in the plea that this rule of exclusion which the committee introduced should not be part of our law. Unanimously, the provincial Attorneys General asked that this not be made part of our law. The Attorney General for British Columbia raised in this letter the very question I was discussing a moment ago, to the consternation of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). He asked, how far must the Crown now prove in each case that none of its evidence was indirectly obtained following an illegal wiretap or, for that matter, how far must it go in every case involving evidence obtained by wiretap? Ten provincial Attorneys General recognize what would happen to the due process of law and to the procedure in our courts under our system of justice if we introduced this exclusion relating to indirect evidence into our jurisprudence at this time.

If I had in other circumstances sought to move forward a provision in our criminal law involving the administration of criminal justice which is in the hands of the provincial Attorneys General, against the wishes of those Attorneys General, without doubt hon. members opposite would have raised a tremendous shout of indignation because the federal government was ignoring the united voices of men charged with certain responsibilities in enforcing the criminal law across the country. Yet they do not do so with regard to the introduction into the Canadian system of law of a rule which has not been all that welcome in the American system.

I wish to refer hon. members to a few words written in the "California Law Review" by Professor D. Barrett of the University of California. He said in part:

> Law enforcement is not a game in which liberty triumphs whenever the policeman is defeated. Liberty demands that both official and private lawlessness shall be curbed. And in any specific instance it is hard to say that, put to the choice between permitting the consummation of the defendant's illegal scheme and the policeman's illegal scheme, the court must of necessity favour the defendant. So to say is to abandon any presumption of official regularity and to assume that the policeman's action always involves a greater social evil than the defendant's. It should be noted that the exclusion of the evidence usually results in the defendant's completely escaping punishment for his act, while the admission of the evidence does not constitute a judicial approval of the officer's conduct, and that officer is still, at least in theory, subject to some form of civil or criminal liability.

And it is more than theory here. The article refers to the obtaining of illegal evidence in the United States. I point out that this bill provides for a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment for the person convicted of illegal wiretapping. The defendant might frequently go free if the rule were to apply. Of course, it might apply rarely. But even in those two or three cases per year, do we really want to allow the person who has engaged in criminal activity, and who may be convicted of a serious crime on the strength of proper evidence put before the court, to go free because certain evidence is excluded?

Mr. Nielsen: But he may be innocent.

Mr. Lang: My hon. friend opposite says he may be innocent. In that case, all relevant evidence should be before the court and his innocence should not be decided on the basis of the absence of relevant evidence which ought to be before the court.

In practice and in fact we know that certain serious crimes are the special object of police electronic intrusion, the importation and handling of drugs being typical examples. Do we really want the person who has imported and trafficked in heroin to escape conviction because of the operation of a technical rule of evidence which is not related to the offence and not related to the issue of innocence or guilt which the court must decide? That is the wrong way to go about this business.

It is important for the courts to have before them relevant evidence. I therefore urge hon. members to forego what seems to be a hardening and partisan approach to what has been a relatively non-partisan analysis of the law. Let them look at the propositions I have put before the House, which have been put before the House and the community by persons more eloquent than me, in defence of the long-standing Canadian and British rule that relevant evidence ought to be before the court.

We ought not to risk a rule which might bog us down in procedural difficulties. We ought not to allow a rule which might keep from a court evidence which is relevant and whose absence might prevent justice from being done. Those are the words of my amendment, and I commend them to hon. members. I earnestly seek their support so that the bill might be the kind of proud thing it ought to be in introducing the prohibition of electronic intrusion, rather than an occasion of procedural difficulty and an occasion of the courts failing to do justice because evidence which should have been before them could not be considered.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Tonight we have the spectacle of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) coming into this House in an attempt to overthrow a vote of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which was carried by 11 to 5. This was a vote on an amendment, incorporated in the bill, which enjoyed support from members of all parties present at the committee proceedings, an amendment about which a number of members from all parties spoke eloquently and, I might say, with much more logic than the minister tonight.

All hon. members should be clear about one thing: if the police obey the law, if they follow the carefully defined procedures in this bill, there will be no problem. The evidence from the wiretap, both direct and indirect, is clearly admissible in any prosecution brought against any person involved in the case on which the Crown is proceeding. Indeed, I would suggest that rather than seeking to take rights away from the police, the bill may be granting them new rights because it can be implied that for the first time the tape itself, provided it is legally obtained, can be admitted directly and played to the court for the judge, and in some cases the jury, to hear. Instead of slowing down the process of justice, this might well expedite it and achieve the goal which all hon. members, including the minister, seek to achieve. I suggest the Minister of Justice is erecting a false and fallacious cloud—

An hon. Member: Why not a red herring?

Mr. Atkey: —when he raises the spectre of lengthy cross-examination of police and prosecution witnesses in an attempt to establish the connection of evidence with alleged wiretapping. What the minister forgot to tell the House is that the only connection in which a defence counsel would be interested is a connection with illegally obtained evidence. For some reason, the Minister of Justice forgot to use the word "illegal", and to my mind this is the word we are concerned about. It is illegally obtained evidence with which this entire debate on motion No. 13 is concerned. I suggest the minister might attempt to keep his logic on a shorter leash.

Mr. Lang: Yours is short enough.

Mr. Atkey: That is an injunction given by a gentleman of whom I am sure the minister is aware—Lon Fuller, the eminent professor of jurisprudence and philosophy at Harvard law school. The minister has suggested that the only sanction we need in order to contain illegal wiretapping, whether by police or private investigators, is the threat of prosecution and a fine or a maximum penalty of five years.

I do not belittle the usefulness of those provisions, but looking at the matter practically I doubt that they will be that useful. I say this, having talked to many people involved in law enforcement, including police officers. For if the police are to be engaged in illegal wiretapping—some have been in the past, and some may be in the future—who is going to catch them? If they have a system worked out within their respective forces, who is going to be there to discover their equipment and lay a charge? If they are caught, it will be by happenstance; and what I fear is that some of the police in this country, unless the bill remains in its present form, will ignore the carefully defined procedures for seeking an authorization. After all, is the risk worth it? If they can use the indirect evidence, albeit from an illegal tap, isn't that really the object of their exercise, particularly if the sanction of a penalty does not really deter as a practical measure?

If hon. members had listened to the evidence placed before the justice committee, and if they had read the evidence given before a committee of the previous parliament, they would be aware how little used those particular provisions will be. A number of arguments were produced before the standing committee to show why illegally obtained evidence, direct and indirect, should be excluded from any court proceedings. I thought one of the most eloquent expositions of that viewpoint was put forward by a Liberal government supporter, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who in my judgment presented the committee with the sort of argument that makes good common sense. He said:

> I would support the substance of what Mr. Atkey is trying to achieve and, subject to further consideration of his wording, I think probably the wording as well.
> In looking at the administration of justice we are not concerned only with what happens in a court, where the attempt to decide whether a particular person is guilty or not guilty of an offence with which he is charged is the prime consideration.

Mark these words. The hon. member went on to say:

> But the administration of justice is a broader thing than that. It involves courts but it also involves administration of the law in the narrower sense, that is, what happens with the police forces, what happens with the whole executive arm of governments on the side. Here it seems to me that we have a very important goal of honesty and good faith in the dealings of those who are administering the law.
> We are, I suppose, confronted with a fundamental question here. Which kind of failing do we think is worse? Do we think it is worse to let go a criminal who is guilty, or do we think it worse not to take sufficient sanctions against bad faith in the administration of justice? In this fundamental choice I am on the side of those who believe that the worst error a legal system can commit is to allow bad faith in the administration of justice. The one thing above all that the public must feel they can rely on is the good faith of those who administer the law.

Those are wise words. I only regret the hon. member has not been more successful in convincing some of his colleagues, particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) of the wisdom of the position he has stated and which I assume he will take in this House. Lest we concern ourselves too much with the more accidental cases of illegal wiretapping, let me refer to some comments made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which came to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs through the memorandum submitted by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) on June 18, 1973.

The Solicitor General, being very honest and forthright as to the nature of the operations of the RCMP, reviewed the criminal operations and the particular electronic surveillance installations which were in place over the past two years. He pointed out that had the provisions of the present bill before the House been in place in the year 1971-72, almost 30 per cent of the wiretap installations put in place by the government would have been illegal, would have been beyond the scope of this bill. In the subsequent year, of the 663 installations completed, 162 would not have come within the terms of the bill—close to 25 per cent of the government's installations. If that sort of pattern of installations were to continue, obviously we would have a pattern of illegal wiretaps.

The Minister of Justice indicated that the original bill which came forward represented some form of compromise in regard to the exclusionary rule in that it would have permitted direct evidence to be excluded if it were illegally obtained, but would have allowed indirect evidence. Again I would draw the minister's attention to some practical considerations. Any person who has ever been interested in and made a study of law enforcement knows that it is not the direct evidence that the police would seek to admit in any case; it is the indirect evidence, the leads, the fruits of the poisoned tree, that the police are really interested in. That is what they want, and if they have it, nothing else matters.

Let me draw the minister's attention to the evidence of the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto, speaking on behalf of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. This was evidence before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in the last parliament. The chief of police gave evidence to the effect that in the 155 cases of wiretapping leading to criminal prosecution in the courts in Toronto, in not one instance was the actual intercepted conversation used in prosecutions, only the indirect evidence that was obtained as a result of having received that conversation. So I suggest that without some exclusion of the indirect evidence, the entire evidentiary protection through some form of exclusionary rule is meaningless.

During the last parliament a number of submissions were made on behalf of various groups and individuals on this most important question. We all know that this bill has been before this parliament on three separate occasions. A great deal of evidence has been led and I think we should take great pains to consider the whole of the evidence and not only the most recent. One of the briefs presented to the last parliament was that of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, and I want to quote from their brief, which was submitted orally and in writing on June 6, 1972. The brief said this, in part:

> One of the encouraging aspects of Bill C-6 is the provision for ruling inadmissible all evidence obtained from unauthorized eavesdropping. Unfortunately, however, the prohibition applies only to the actual communication. Experience reveals that the police resort to electronic surveillance primarily for the leads that it produces. Samuel Dash, a noted U.S. commentator on electronic surveillance—

I note that that is the same Sam Dash who is now counsel to the Senate Watergate inquiry in the United States.

> —has pointed out that wiretapping "is done for the purpose of aiding investigation and never for the purpose of collecting evidence".

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I would refer to a passage in an article by Professor Stanley Beck of Osgoode Hall law school which appeared in the Canadian Bar Review about three years ago. I quote from that article:

> The police would be quite content to have the admission of wiretap ... evidence barred in court ... as long as they were free to use it for investigative purposes. This attitude of the police was confirmed to (the author) in conversations with officials of the metropolitan Toronto police force who described the investigative aspects of electronic surveillance as "something more than snooping and something less than a search for specific evidence under a search warrant".

Then the Civil Liberties Association concludes:

> Thus the mere exclusion of the taboo conversation will not constitute a sufficient deterrent to the practice of unauthorized surveillance. We know also that victimized citizens are generally reluctant to take action against improper police conduct. In order, therefore, to provide a more effective deterrent, we respectfully submit that the fruits of unlawful eavesdropping also be rendered inadmissible as evidence.

Finally I would refer to comments made again by a supporter of the Liberal government in the last session, Mr. Terrence Murphy, a person who is no longer a member of this House but who perhaps was one of the more enlightened members of that committee. I might add that he is an experienced trial lawyer and defence counsel and that he has also done some prosecution work in the city of Sault Ste. Marie. This is what he said:

> I am in complete agreement with your submissions in so far as they pertain to the admissibility of the fruits of an illegal tap. I do not think the fruits should be made available or made admissible in evidence at all if the tap itself was illegal.

That is the point on which the majority voted 11 to 5 in the committee on September 16 last, and I suggest is the position that should be taken by all members of this House. In committee the Minister of Justice, not content to leave the bill in a form where illegally obtained direct evidence would be inadmissible, went even one step further and wanted to have not only the indirect evidence admitted but the direct evidence also.

It is significant that the minister moved an amendment in the committee to allow the direct evidence to be admitted and that that amendment was resoundingly defeated. The minister based his rationale on the fact that the Law Reform Commission of Canada would be looking into the whole question. Of course, that is an excuse that is known to many politicians interested in the field of justice to be really an excuse for inaction, and is not acceptable and certainly was not acceptable to the members of the committee at that time.

The Minister of Justice has made reference to letters and telegrams received from provincial Attorneys General. He talked in terms of an unanimous verdict. I suggest that the minister went out and invited the sort of support he got. Indeed, I think it is clear from the record of the standing committee that the minister wrote a letter on October 30 to all the Attorneys General asking for their support. Indeed, I suggest he pleaded for their support. Let me quote from his letter. The minister said:

> The amendment would introduce into the Canadian criminal law system the complete doctrine of the suppression of evidence obtained directly or indirectly as a result of illegal conduct.

I pointed out at the time, as I point out again tonight, that this is a misstatement of the nature of the amendment which was passed by 11 to 5 in the committee. This was not the introduction of the complete doctrine of the suppression of evidence obtained directly or indirectly as a result of illegal conduct. It relates only to illegal wiretapping. Indeed, I would have reservations regarding any thought of introducing the complete doctrine of the suppression of evidence at this time. In his letter the minister went on to say this:

> It would be contrary to the interests of the administration of justice to introduce the suppression doctrine into Canadian law—

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I sat here with some patience while the hon. member, no doubt rather innocently but nevertheless erroneously, suggested I moved an amendment in the committee, which I did not do; but I really must object to his repeating, as he did in the committee, these words as though it were a statement that I was making to the Attorneys General. In the committee I pointed out his error to him when he made the very same statement. What he is reading from is a quotation that I was referring to from the Uniformity Commissioners' report of a year ago. Perhaps it is unnecessary to quote this point again at this time.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to refer to the Uniformity Commissioners' report, but perhaps I should first point out that the amendment in committee was not moved in the minister's name but was moved on his instructions as outlined in a memorandum sent out on his approval. Let me point out that in a letter directed to the Attorneys General the Minister of Justice suggested—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the honourable member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to suggest that I wish to move a subamendment to the amendment proposed by the minister in motion No. 13. Perhaps I might be permitted to continue for about five minutes in order to give the rationale for this subamendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. In view of the fact that the honourable member's time has expired, I must remind him that he can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the House give the honourable member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Atkey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To indicate the spirit of compromise that we on this side of the House have attempted to adopt in respect of this very difficult question, I should like to indicate our concern with some of the matters raised by the minister. These concerns are felt on all sides of the House and the minister has referred to them frequently. I intend to move a subamendment to motion No. 13. Before doing so I should like to refer to the rationale behind this proposed subamendment. I do not move it in any way to detract from the present form of the bill which proposes to render inadmissible evidence procured solely from an illegal wiretap.

It is recognized that in the administration of justice and the enforcement of the law it may happen under our complex procedures that an Attorney General or his agent, a Solicitor General or his agent, may accidentally make a mistake and inadvertently fail to comply with one of the many complex provisions involved in applying for an authorization. I think it would be quite acceptable to permit indirect evidence obtained as a result of such a situation.

[Mr. Lang.]

I think it would be quite acceptable to the opposition that when an honest attempt had been made to obtain authorization from a judge, and somehow or other there was a defect in form or an irregularity in procedure—not being a substantive defect or irregularity—in that case it would be justifiable to allow indirect or direct evidence providing it satisfied the requirements contained in the minister's motion No. 13 as to relevancy and justice. This would be acceptable provided the result did not mean that injustice was done.

In the hope that some of the concerns expressed by the minister and by honourable members of the committee in respect of a situation where the police had honestly attempted to comply with the procedures of this law will be met. I am proposing a subamendment. It will not cover situations where the police have deliberatly flouted these procedures or have ignored them; in those situations the price must be paid and the fruits of their efforts should be inadmissible whether it is direct or indirect evidence. I should therefore like to move an amendment to the minister's proposed amendment. I think this will cover some of the concerns expressed by a number of members of this House. I think we must look at wiretapping, which is illegal, as something not only illegal but immoral. I do not think we on this side of the House can sanction or reward efforts which are clearly illegal and which flout the law, or allow the fruits of such efforts to be introduced during a prosecution of an individual no matter how heinous the alleged crime that individual has committed. If the police of this country follow the procedures in the law in respect of wiretap evidence, there will be no problem.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How can it be seconded by an hon. member who is not here?

Mr. Atkey: I am sorry. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

> That motion No. 13 be amended by deleting therefrom the words "is relevant and that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done in the matter to which the proceedings relate," and substituting therefor the following:
> "(a) is relevant,
> (b) is inadmissible by reason only of a defect of form or an irregularity in procedure, not being a substantive defect or irregularity, in the application for or the giving of the authorization under which such private communication was intercepted or by means of which such evidence was obtained, and
> (c) that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done,"

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak specifically on the amendment proposed by the hon. member as I have an amendment I intend to move.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Unless the hon. member intends to speak on the acceptability of the proposed amendment, I shall put the amendment to the House at this time. I will then recognize the hon. member. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) has proposed the amendment which the House has just heard. I will now recognize the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan).

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to this proposed amendment. However, I see that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has indicated an intention to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Gilbert: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The motion was moved by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). The spokesman for the Conservative Party then spoke and introduced a subamendment. Surely the spokesman for the New Democratic Party should now have a turn to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please, I am sure the hon. member will have an opportunity to speak, but it is for the Chair to recognize hon. members. Whoever the Chair sees first is recognized. The hon. member sought the floor. It is up to hon. members to stand and indicate their intention to speak, and they will be recognized in turn. Two hon. members cannot be recognized at the same time.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to defer to the hon. member opposite, if this is agreeable to the House, provided I may rise after him.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the hon. member for his gracious deferral. I think he is a very fairminded and broadminded member. He may very well change his views on this matter after he hears what I have to say. For some time I had wished to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) when he brought forward the original bill because I thought for a while that we had a liberal and progressive Minister of Justice. This was my opinion at the time I first looked at Bill C-176 as originally printed and debated on second reading, because at that time the minister had the courage to bring forward what could have been one of the most important additions to Canadian jurisprudence, that is, to at least sneak in this principle of excluding from court evidence illegally obtained. Unfortunately, somewhere along the line his resolve crumbled as we came to the committee stage: he at least sponsored and supported a motion that would bring about the withdrawal of a very good provision that any indirect evidence obtained would be inadmissible.

I think it is significant that the English bar has had this particular principle under study for some time. It is my understanding that it will be given favourable consideration in that House in the not too distant future. It is an important principle in a special way. It says to the inhabitants of any country that the law is there for all persons and not just for the government so that it might be applied against them. The law must be equal for all of us. The amendment presented successfully by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) said that we want the law applicable to all.

In his remarks the minister suggested that this is not a case of rewarding the police for obtaining illegal evidence; but surely the minister must admit, and everyone in this House must admit, that you encourage the police to participate in illegal activity when you admit the fruits of that activity. There is no answer to that proposition. Therefore, when we talk about the rule of law and order and respect for the law, the way to have respect for the law is to have laws which are capable of respect. We must not have rules of evidence which would allow illegally obtained evidence to be brought in through the back door.

This is really not such a significant departure from the general rule, in any event. The minister seemed to indicate that somehow we are making a massive departure from principle. For a long time the courts of the British empire refused to admit confessions. Surely confessions are relevant. Surely we could have had a principle whereby we would let in the confession and allow the jury to decide whether they believed it. But a long time ago a very wise judge decided that where a confession was obtained by threat or promise, it should be excluded. If we apply the principle always used in respect of confessions, I do not see how anyone in this House with a legal background can fail to support the principle behind the hon. member's successful amendment that would exclude illegal and circumstantial evidence. There is no reason we cannot apply the same principle in this case.

Another point the Minister of Justice made was, what would happen if criminals deliberately engaged in some kind of conspiracy to use a wiretap and some smart defence lawyer came into court and said there was some kind of illegal evidence? There is an old principle of equity that one cannot come to court without clean hands. Anyone who engages in the activity of excluding evidence is obviously using subterfuge. I am surprised the minister would raise that kind of a red herring, because clearly it is a red herring. I am not surprised that at the urging of the minister the various Attorneys General of the country have decided to go along with his view on this suggestion to allow illegally obtained evidence into court.

I am not surprised, because they have a slightly different responsibility than we have in this House. They have a responsibility for the prosecution of those brought to trial. I do not blame them, I suppose, in this instance for trying to make life a little easier for themselves. They have that particular responsibility. We have a special responsibility to all of society to make sure that the laws we pass in this House are laws which are respected and not laws that lessen the respect of society for the rules that govern it. If we decided to accept the logic of the minister and to encourage the police to use illegal activities in order to obtain evidence, then we would be doing nothing to support the rule of law. If we think in terms of liberty and the rights of the individual and wish to have that kind of society, then we do not need laws which would allow illegal activity to be introduced into court. We do not need to encourage the police to conduct themselves in that way.

I should like to say a few words about the subamendment. I have had a few brief moments in which to look at it. I will have to be a little equivocal about it at this stage, but I am concerned about what is and what is not technical. What the hon. member for St. Paul's has introduced is an attempt to allow legally obtained evidence, which was rendered illegal because of some technicality, to be evidentiary. I am not sure, for example, when a defence attorney is successful in throwing out a charge because it is not a charge known to the law, basically, whether he is making a very technical argument: it is very obvious that it should be thrown out. Remember that the resources available to the Crown are immense. It is surrounded with support staff. The police are in a position to conduct in-depth research. However, most often in our courts the defendant is at a severe disadvantage.

The view of a trial which people see portrayed, of a highly paid defence lawyer using every trick in the book to get his client off, is certainly not typical at all in respect of trials in this country. It is nonsense. In the typical trial someone is brought before the bar of justice who may or not be represented by a lawyer. He is very insecure. He does not understand the procedure. The Crown has enough going for it, without giving it more.

I am not so sure that we need to support this subamendment, because there are many other things that one might call technicalities but which are really matters of substance. It has always been a general rule of our law that the Crown should dot its "i's" and cross its "t's" to ensure that the liberty of the subject is protected. I must say that I have no hesitation in opposing the amendment put forward by the minister. The amendment is clearly a device to overcome the lack of success that he had in the committee. In fact, I am surprised that he bothered proposing this kind of amendment. He could just as easily have proposed an amendment which would wipe out the clause completely, something which he attempted to do in the committee.

I cannot look into the minister's mind to understand why he used this procedure. In any event, the meaning would be that illegally obtained evidence would be admitted in almost every case, because if you look at the amendment proposed by the minister you will see that no objective standard is to be applied by a judge. Anything that a judge found relevant would clearly be admitted in spite of its being obtained in an illegal manner. We have to come back to the basic principle in which the hon. member for St. Paul's, myself and others in our party believe, namely, that wiretapping is immoral, wrong and something that should be severely restricted in this country. It is clear from the minister's remarks that he does not share this view. I am sorry that he does not, but that is the only thing we can read into his remarks. On that basis, I have no hesitation in opposing the minister's amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understood the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was going to speak. If he is not, I am prepared to speak and give him an opportunity to speak later.

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, keep the debate going.

Mr. Baldwin: The Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) should attend to his own business. He has enough problems trying to deal with that monstrosity. It was bad enough when he took it over but it is a lot worse since he has been dealing with it. He should spend more time looking after the Post Office and less making remarks about things he does not understand.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Mr. Alexander: Get the Christmas mail out.

Mr. Baldwin: If the Postmaster General could only keep quiet, we would not have these arguments. I was trying to go along peacefully, creating no difficulties at all. I want to oppose the amendment of the minister.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I am glad to hear the hon. member. It is the first time I have had a chance to hear him. I am glad to know he can speak. Even he would know better in his heart than to really support the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in his attempt to wipe out the good work that the standing committee did in this regard.

I am prepared to go along with the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). I suppose I must support it, since I seconded it. In spite of what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) said, I think there is a valid case to be made for the reason that sometimes the police—and I am speaking directly to the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's—in urgent cases may not have had an opportunity to have completed all of the technical requirements as conditions precedent to getting the judicial approval of a judge. I think that is the issue, and this is what we in this party rest our case on—that there must be judicial intervention.

If a judge does in fact give an order, even though it may be based on some technical error contained in the affidavit and which does not go to the substance of the application upon which the authorization is made, it would be most unfair and inequitable to deprive the authorities of their right to use the evidence. I am sure, as I said before, that a large body of jurisprudence will be built up in connection with this bill. I think that a judge charged with the responsibility, having cast upon himself the onus to which the hon. member for St. Paul's refers, will make quite certain—I am now talking about a judge at a trial at which there is an attempt to have evidence admitted which has been obtained following a private communication—not to allow that evidence until the Crown has sustained the burden which is suggested in the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's.

I would have thought that the very least the minister would have done—I might have given more thought to his proposal if he had done it—was to ensure that there be an onus cast upon the Crown, in introducing evidence which has been obtained as a result of an interception, to satisfy the court that there is no taint of illegality about it. If the minister had that in mind, he might have been entitled to a little more consideration of his proposal than otherwise would be the case. That is not much to ask for, that the Crown shall sustain the burden of proof that the evidence they are attempting to introduce with respect to matters following interception has been legally obtained. But it is obvious the minister is not interested in that. Therefore we have to oppose his amendment, and I hope there are hon. members on the other side of the House who will look at the matter in that light.

I heard the speech of the very attractive hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin). It was a good speech and I think she made as good a case as could be made. However, I think she made as good a case as could be made. However, I think there was a lot more emotion than fact in it. But this is the kind of subject in which emotion can be aroused.

Mrs. Morin: Why are you afraid of emotion?

Mr. Baldwin: I am not afraid of emotion, and I hope the hon. lady is not afraid of emotion either. I think the Minister of Justice would be a better minister if he showed more emotion once in a while. We will watch him when his amendment is defeated and see what emotion he shows then.

Mrs. Morin: You should have lived in the province of Quebec for ten years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Does the hon. lady suggest that the province of Quebec is not a province like other provinces because of the quantity of illegal action which takes place there? She is wrong in this regard. My friend, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), suggests that she meant that the province of Quebec is not a province like other provinces because more emotion is displayed there. However, that is another argument for another time, another place and other circumstances.

● (2140)

But it is a danger, if anybody wants to pursue this issue, to see the extent to which the government, any government—I don't care whether it is a Conservative government, Liberal government, Social Credit or even an NDP government—having once taken authority which it did not possess previously, will take steps to see that that authority grows and expends until it grows out of all recognition.

Hon. members may not be aware of the fact that the Income Tax Act was originally passed during the First World War as a temporary war tax. Look at the monstrosity that is being created now. Does anybody imagine that this bill, as the minister seeks to amend it, will stay in its present form? Another minister of justice, another government will seek to widen the ground that has been gained and to secure more and more authority.

I have here a book entitled "Private Lives and Public Surveillance," by James B. Rule. I have only just received it and I have not had time to find out his qualifications. I see he is a law professor. At the end of the book there is a chapter on "The Future of Surveillance." Anybody reading it will find out that the author takes an objective view point. He says there is ground for surveillance in certain cases, but he assesses the virtues, the strengths, the failings and the weaknesses. In his conclusions he makes some very categorical statements which hon. members should take to heart. I quote the following from page 350:

> I have taken pains to emphasize that the potential for repressive use of these systems is anything but identical with actual repression. On the contrary, discussion has made it plain that some surveillance systems are capable of putting up considerable resistance to "unauthorized" use of their facilities. Nevertheless, any over-all response to these systems must take into account not only their present impact, but also their future prospects. And this means accepting the possibility that, in the course of other political changes, the intent and political disposition of those who control these systems may change.

We have no assurance that another government ten years from now may not attempt to add to, to widen, to strengthen and to make more powerful these weapons which are now being placed at the disposition of the authorities, both federal and provincial, in this country. In my lifetime in the practice of law in the criminal courts, in some 30 to 35 years of practice defending some thousands of cases, I have seen that the court processes work very well indeed. In my opinion it was very seldom that guilty people were acquitted, and very seldom that innocent people were found guilty. This is due to the opportunities for cross-examination, to the demand that a person charged with a criminal offence shall face his accuser and shall have the right to give evidence.

It was not so many years ago that the right of an accused person to give evidence was first made available in the United Kingdom, and carried here. Now there is the right to have a trial held in the public purview, within sight of neighbours and friends, open to the people of the community, with the right of an accused to have a jury and with the onus of proof falling on the Crown. In such circumstances very seldom is there a miscarriage of justice. But with regard to this intrusion to obtain evidence as a result of an illegal wiretap, I ask, what kind of illegal wiretap? In what kind of case will it be used?

As I pointed out the other day, we are not just looking at criminal law. As I understand the interpretation section, this would be applicable to any civil action involving a federal statute. Just look at the possibilities with regard to criminal action. What is to prevent any police detachment in a major city from establishing an M squad, or whatever you want to call them, who are unknown to the remainder of the people on that police force, who are charged entirely with the responsibility of intercepting private communications, who are unknown to anybody but possibly one superior officer. Evidence they have obtained by any number of illegal interceptions could be passed to that superior officer who would then instruct that an investigation take place or that the character of an investigation presently taking place be altered by reason of this illegal evidence. And it need not be evidence intercepted just by a police officer or peace officer. Any private body or private agency could be engaged by a police detachment to obtain evidence and as a result of that evidence instructions could be given to an investigating officer, who in turn knows nothing about the antecedents of the evidence, about the way in which the interception was made, or in fact that there was any interception at all.

It is all very well for us to talk about these things and to say we are for law and order. Mr. Speaker, I am for law and order, but first I am for law. It seemed that the hon. member opposite who spoke this afternoon wanted order, not law. I point out to her that the two go together. We cannot have order unless there is proper and adequate law attached to make sure that the order that is to be preserved is preserved under the rule of law. That is a very important consideration. It would be wrong for this House, wrong for the government, wrong for this party, wrong for any hon. member to ignore that very salutary warning.

I go on to say that we are looking, then, at a set of circumstances which may arise where evidence gathered as the result of an illegal interception of a private communication may be used under circumstances for which it was never intended, not under circumstances in connection with the investigation as a result of which that information was made available but used in another case entirely. There is nothing in this bill to suggest that the interception made illegally in connection with one investigation, as a result of which evidence is obtained, must be taken to mean that that evidence can only be used in that same case. It could be used in any case at all, including a civil action involving an expropriation proceedings, or a quasi-civil action involving the Income Tax Act or the Competition Act, or any one of a thousand instances where a federal statute is involved.

Mr. Paproski: The Elections Act.

Mr. Baldwin: I think that if I used the Elections Act as an example it would make some of my hon. friends opposite shudder. I shall continue to read from the book "Private Lives and Public Surveillance" at page 351 as follows:

● (2150)

Caution in this regard is hardly without precedent in other contexts. Many societies limit access to dangerous drugs, poisons and armaments on the principle that these things are potentially too destructive. Thus even people of unquestioned character and goodwill may be forbidden to possess automatic weapons. Similarly, most governments are at least theoretically restricted in the application of police powers, for example, in the arrests of private persons. The implicit assumption is simply that unlimited power of arrest, for example without warrant or accountability, places dangerously excessive power in the hands of the state. The same sort of argument, it seems to me, is applicable to the use of mass surveillance and control. The "bureaucratic weaponry" represented by these systems is simply so formidable as to require limitation, even in the absence of obvious repressive inclination on the part of any specific regime.

I repeat that, Mr. Speaker, because it is the basis upon which my hon. friend moved his motion in committee and the basis on which he is opposing the motion now brought forward by the Minister of Justice. The last sentence reads, again:

The "bureaucratic weaponry" represented by these systems is simply so formidable as to require limitation, even in the absence of obvious repressive inclination on the part of any specific regime.

Some of my hon. friends, like me, have sat in this House for many years. We have seen slowly, stealthily taken away from members of this House the opportunities and weapons which they should be able to employ, representing the people as they do, to make that representation adequate. It did not come overnight when hon. members came here in 1957 and 1958 and found a system which was working. An hon. member of this House could make his potentially significant contribution in saying to a government, "You must stop". That power has virtually disappeared in certain aspects, particularly with regard to the estimates and granting of supply to this government or any government.

I say to hon. members opposite and all hon. members of this House that what is being suggested tonight by the amendment of the Minister of Justice is another milestone along that road. It should be opposed; it should be stopped.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

This government should be taught a lesson that it cannot and must not attempt, by amendments such as this offered by the minister, to further place restrictions upon the people of this country.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) has already read into the record so many of my views this evening that I am not sure it is necessary for me to say anything more. However, I should like to restate a few things as I see them at this time.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, justice is not to be so narrowly construed as to be confined to what takes place in the courtroom. Justice, rather, refers broadly to rectitude in the whole legal process, ranging from the time of apprehension and arrest, through trial and conviction to final release from parole. The general rectitude of the legal system includes the good faith of those who administer and enforce the law. Above all, the public must always be consciously assured of the good faith of those who enforce the law, especially of the police forces in our country. It is for this reason that I supported in committee the amended form of the bill, and that is still the direction in which I wish to see the final form of the law move.

However, as a result of the enlightenment which we have received from many quarters it is apparent, as indeed the amendment by the hon. member for St. Paul's recognizes, that there are some variant cases which ought to be taken care of. His amendment is an attempt to take care of one particular case where there has been some defect in the authorization which might subsequently prove embarrassing and there are cases of this kind where there ought to be some means of allowing evidence to be presented. I think the general disposition of the House will be to arrive at a more flexible form of prohibition than exists in the proposed bill as we presently have it before us.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—AVAILABILITY OF DRUG, ISOPRENALINE, WITHOUT PRESCRIPTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on November 13 last I directed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) with respect to the use of the drug Isoprenaline. This drug has long been regarded as a cause of death if not used properly. It has been demonstrated by competent medical authority that several deaths in Canada have resulted from heart irregularity and heart failure induced by the abuse of this drug which is used in treating asthmatic cases. The minister was rather reluctant to reply to my question at the time, and he said rather facetiously:

—I suggest that people suffering from asthma should abstain from this drug for a day.

We were trying to get the question before the House as a life and death issue at that time. Later he revised his answer; he had thought better of the reply he had given, and he said:

On July 19, 1973, manufacturers of the product were advised of our intent to recommend that it be available only on prescription. Steps in this connection are under way and I expect that regulations to this effect will be passed very soon.

I have been presenting this issue since 1969, Mr. Speaker. At page 6386 of Hansard for March 10, 1969, there is a reply to a question I asked as follows:

The Poison Control Unit, Food and Drug Directorate, Department of National Health and Welfare has no record of sudden deaths among asthmatic patients in Canada attributable to the misuse of aerosol inhalers.

This goes back over a period of four years, but actually the medical authorities in Canada have been pressing the issue and have been urging the Department of National Health and Welfare to take some action for the past seven years. More recently the Calgary Medical Society has been pressing for tighter control. In the absence of government action on the matter and the failure of the government to respond to these overtures, the Pharmaceutical Association has been urging its members to keep the drug out of the reach of the casual customer and make it available only to people who ask for it specifically. I think this has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that the drug Isoprenaline is now regarded by medical authorities, as well as pharmaceutical authorities, as a potentially dangerous drug. It has been available by prescription in Europe for only a few years. It was demonstrated, by close experiment in the U.K., for example, that the death of 3,500 asthmatics over a six-year period was attributable to abuse of this drug.

My reason for bringing forward the subject again tonight is that I want to inquire of the minister, or the parliamentary secretary who will be replying for the minister this evening, how soon it will be possible to have this drug placed under prescription. The minister's reply suggested that this was being studied and that regulations to this effect will be passed very soon. As the matter has been under review for some seven years, and as it has now been proved beyond question that deaths have been attributable to abuse of the drug, I trust that the parliamentary secretary tonight will be able to inform the House and the people of Canada that it has now been placed under regulation and that the danger to asthmatic patients is a thing of the past.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question raised by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) I should like to report that in the mid to late 1960s information appeared from other countries suggesting that the excessive use of aerosols containing sympathomimetic drugs may have accounted for an increased incidence in mortality in persons suffering from asthma.

A retrospective study in Great Britain covering the period 1961 to 1967, coupled with a decrease in the incidence of mortality following a change in that country of the prescription status of Isoproterenol, tended to offer a convincing explanation for the rise and fall of sudden deaths in asthma patients. The staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare examined this data, along with Canada's statistics. This country had not experienced a similar increase in asthma deaths.

However, since 1967 four deaths appear to have been associated with the excessive use of this product in Canada and we have received representations from physicians and professional groups who feel the problem may be greater in this country than the number of deaths would appear to indicate. Therefore, in an effort to ensure the proper use of Isoproterenol by asthma patients the department has recommended that this drug be added to schedule F of the food and drug regulations, which would make it available only on a doctor's prescription. Steps are being taken to have this legislation promulgated and it is anticipated that this will be completed within a few days. Until this occurs, the advice of the department to persons with asthma is to use the product within the limitations advised by their physicians.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—FAMINE IN ETHIOPIA—DIRECT ASSISTANCE BY CANADA

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 16, I raised a question in the House concerning Canada's participation in supplying relief for the famine-stricken regions of Ethiopia. The matter was first drawn to my attention by a national television program and by letters and telegrams from constituents. Since then several other hon. members have indicated concern on the part of their constituents. The minister's reply seemed inadequate and I therefore asked for this opportunity to debate the question.

Briefly, my understanding of the situation is this. Between 50,000 and 100,000 people have died of famine and drought, mainly in Wallo province, Ethiopia. This province is inhabited mainly by Moslem or Pagan tribes. The Ethiopian Christian Church, which is one of the major sources of information for the government, does not have effective communication with the province of Wallo. Moreover, the local governor suppressed the true nature of the emergency and is now either dismissed or imprisoned; it is not clear which. Other factors are suggested, including indifference on the part of the central government and the fierce pride of the people of Wallo.

It is also reported that some 17 students who were demonstrating against the cover-up of the facts surrounding the famine were killed at Dessye, the capital of Wallo province, following refusal of the acting governor general to discuss the famine with them. I have very little knowledge of the politics of that country, but have been told that there exists a situation in which a handful of absentee native nobility exact an exorbitant tribute from the population. However, I have no details. In any event, we do not ask about the politics of starving people.

This is a very brief background. No doubt the parliamentary secretary to the minister will have more accurate information in his possession. What concerns me is a report that the shocking extent of the famine became known to the central government of Ethiopia on March 26 of this year, at which time it met in emergency session and sent out urgent appeals to international donors. Yet in his reply to me the minister said it was only in comparatively recent days that the government of Ethiopia admitted the extent of the famine. If my information is correct, knowledge of the situation was available seven months ago.

Was the Department of External Affairs aware of the need in March or June of last year? Was an appeal for assistance received by Canada at that time or, more specifically, when was an appeal received? Further reports indicate that a request for the diversion to the area of two grain ships from the United States was denied by the U.S. government on the ground that justification for such diversion must first be shown. I am curious whether any provisos were attached to the Canadian reply. I should like to know, too, why Canadian aid earmarked for Ethiopia via the United Nations was not received.

In his reply to me, the minister indicated that limited direct assistance had recently been sent through the Red Cross. I should like to know the nature of that assistance and how limited it was. Is it possible that relief shipments can be landed at the port of Asab on the Red Sea for distribution in the capital city of Dessye and places en route? Is it possible for relief to be brought by air to otherwise inaccessible parts of the province, and is such an operation being considered or carried out by any agency or any member of the international community, including Canada? Finally, I should like to know what the minister means when he says that other measures are being considered. What are those other measures?

I have no wish to embarrass the minister since I recognize this is an emergency which concerns many other nations besides Canada. Nevertheless, I am concerned, as all Canadians must be, about the plight of those who are stricken by famine in any area and I ask for an accounting of what this country has done and what it intends to do and, particularly, why it has taken so long to provide adequate relief.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to congratulate the hon. member for having dealt with this issue. In my opinion, Canadians at large are not sufficiently concerned with those hunger and drought trials experienced in certain parts of the world and I feel that we should speak about them. This is why I congratulate the hon. member for having broached the question.

Canada has undertaken several years ago to contribute to the development of Ethiopia. At the present time, we are completing a geological survey of the Omo basin, in the southwestern part of the country. Moreover, we have just sent a team of veterinarians responsible for the control of the plague decimating the Ethiopian cattle.

The effect of the World Food Program is more directly related to the drought problem. Thus we have just shipped 10,000 tons of grain to Ethiopia. Canada has provided $34 million for 1973 and 1974 under this assistance programme.

Finally, our country has recently given $50,000 to the Red Cross for the relief program in Ethiopia. The Canadian International Development Agency has sent these funds through the Canadian Red Cross.

CIDA officials are now trying to determine the most appropriate means to contribute effectively, in the long and the short term, to the drought relief program in that country. We are also meeting with representatives from UN agencies already dealing with programs of this type in order to determine what kind of food is needed and how it can be delivered as soon as possible.

I should point out that the seriousness of the drought in Ethiopia was brought to our attention later than in the case of the western Sahara countries, to which Canada has already provided assistance amounting to $10 million.

Finally, Canada has included Ethiopia in its list of countries requiring emergency help and has suggested to other donating countries that they do likewise. In fact, I believe that we were among the first donating countries to realize the serious situation of the Ethiopian people as a result of this natural disaster.

Since governments speak in terms of their budget, I think that the annual 17 per cent increase voted by Parliament during the last four years for the CIDA budget, which amounts this year to about $560 million, shows how this government assumes its responsibilities towards developing countries and those hit by natural disasters.

Again I thank the hon. member for having raised this extremely important question.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. REYNOLDS—ANSWER BY IMMIGRATION MINISTER CONCERNING OBTAINING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING JOHN MEIER BY UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege involving answers given to me yesterday by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in the case of John Meier and documents concerning him that ended up in the hands of the United States Attorney's office. The minister stated that Meier's documents were given to the internal revenue people in the United States when in fact it has been made public knowledge since then by the minister's own department that these documents were passed directly to the U.S. Attorney's office. In his answer to my question yesterday the minister said this could not be possible, that the only reason documents were passed back and forth between the two governments on a normal basis was so that the man's application could be checked out by the internal revenue service.

It would seem to me there is a lot more involved in this whole story. If you agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that I have a question of privilege based on the minister's answer yesterday and the statement made by his staff since then, I would hope that this whole matter could be referred to a committee of the House for further investigation, because when personal documents concerning a resident of Canada are passed to a foreign government I think all Canadians deserve to know exactly what is happening in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has given the Chair the notice required by the Standing Order. I have given the matter some thought and I really do not think I can agree with the hon. member that a motion should be put to the House to send this grievance to a committee of the House. I would refer hon. members to Citation No. 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I will not read it at length, but I would refer particularly to one line which has been quoted on a number of occasions in the past:

> But a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

On this basis I do not think the Chair would be well advised or supported by precedents and the rules in allowing a motion to be put at this time.

ENERGY

REPORTED DIVERSION OF OIL SHIPMENTS DESTINED TO CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 which I think all hon. members can support. It arises from recent reports that several large foreign owned oil companies have diverted oil shipments contracted for the Canadian market. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

> That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources table a list of the companies which he knows to be involved in such diversions, an estimate of the total amount of oil involved, and any additional information which he has on these contracts.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RELATING TO COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,986—Mr. Stevens:

1. In the fiscal years ending March 31, 1971, 1972 and 1973, what was the total expenditure by the government in the private sector for (a) Computer hardware (b) Computer software (c) Data Processing Consulting Services?

2. Under each category, who were the five main suppliers to the government from the private sector and, in each case, what was the amount of governmental purchase and was the purchase a capital or rental purchase?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. Government expenditures in the private sector in the past three fiscal years for the Electronic Data Processing goods and services referred to in the question are reported as follows:

	Year Ending
	March 31, 1971 $	March 31, 1972 $	March 31, 1973 $
(a) Computer Hardware (i)	19,100,000	24,500,000	26,550,000
(b) Computer Software	Note (ii)	Note (ii)	240,000
(c) Data Processing Consulting	1,800,000	2,200,000	2,770,000

NOTES: (i) The sums shown for computer hardware are based on equivalent annual rental including maintenance.

(ii) The first year in which data on computer software acquisition has been centrally collected was fiscal year 1972-73.

2. Data regarding suppliers' market share has, in the past, been accumulated by periodic surveys which have not been conducted every year. In the year ending March 31, 1971, the five main suppliers of computer hardware to the government were, in descending dollar volume: IBM Canada Ltd., Burroughs Business Machines Ltd., Sperry Rand Canada Ltd., Xerox Data Systems Ltd., and Digital Equipment of Canada Ltd. In the year ending March 31, 1973, the five main suppliers to the government, again in descending dollar volume, were: IBM Canada Ltd., Sperry Rand Canada Ltd., Honeywell Information Systems Ltd., Burroughs Business Machines Ltd., and Xerox Data Systems Ltd. Exact dollar amounts are not known at this time. Data regarding suppliers' market share in respect of computer software and data processing consulting services is not available at this time. It should be noted that a consolidation of the acquisition of data processing goods and services within the Department of Supply and Services has been completed during this past year. This action coupled with the implementation of the electronic data processing policy approved by the Treasury Board in November, 1971, will serve to provide government with comprehensive financial and other management data on its use of data processing resources.

Question No. 3,137—Mr. Schellenberger:

Over the past 10 years, what was the total number of increases and decreases in federal support prices to cream producers in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Over the past 10 years the total number of increases and decreases in the federal support level for manufacturing milk (and cream on equivalent basis) was: Increases 5; Decreases Nil. In addition dairy products have been supported over the past 10 years by offers to purchase at specified prices.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the area served by the Quebec District Office:

(b)	204,861	567,760

(c) Where proceedings were taken the cost was added to the amount to be recovered.

PURCHASE OF URANIUM BY JAPAN

Question No. 3,161—Mr. Nesdoly:

Within the past 24 months, was there a Japanese trade mission to Canada wishing to purchase uranium oxide (U308) from the government stockpile or from the production of Eldorado nuclear mine at Uranium City and, if so, what were the results of the negotiations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): There have been several Japanese missions to Canada during the past 24 months but none was for the purpose of purchasing uranium. Such overtures are normally made by electric utilities through their sales agents.

2. By what method or methods is the money supply increased?

3. For each month in the past year, by how much has the money supply increased over each preceding month?

5. For each month in the past year, by how much has the purchasing value of the dollar decreased over each preceding month as a result of an increase in the money supply?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would refer the parliamentary secretary to questions Nos. 2398, 2941 to 2950 inclusive, and 2956 to 2965 inclusive, which request information of the amounts of money paid to lawyers hired by the Department of Justice during a certain period of time, and also information in respect of lawyers hired by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The first of these questions has been outstanding as far back as June 26, and I can see no valid reason whatsoever for the government taking five months to make such information available. The fact that these lawyers comprise a "who's who" in Liberal party circles would seem to be no reason for delay. Finally, I really believe it is time the government discontinued the practice of delaying answers to certain questions for the obvious reason that they may shed more light on its shabby record in governing this country.

Order Paper Questions

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to questions 2529 to 2538 which have been on the order paper since July 19. They are not complicated questions. They simply ask for statistical information. The failure of the government to provide the information indicates either gross incompetence on the one hand or a cover-up on the other.

This is not just a question of lack of courtesy on the part of the government. Something more fundamental is involved. The minister has already given the Canadian Association of Architects part of the information I have requested in these questions. In other words, he has taken the liberty to provide information to a private organization which he has refused to make available to parliament. Personally, I think this is a shameful situation and in fact is a breach of the privileges of the House. Is the minister satisfied that the opinion of the Association of Architects of Ontario is of more value to his deliberations than the opinion of parliament would be in respect of these matters?

The other day the Prime Minister told us we would do better if we gave notice of our questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member except for just a moment. He rose on a question of privilege. The hon. member has failed to give the Chair notice of his question of privilege. It is not about something that has risen in the last minute or so. He is referring to a situation which, according to his complaint, has existed for some time. Perhaps in those circumstances hon. members would be well advised to heed the Standing Order and give the required notice in order to facilitate matters. I assume the hon. member is rising on a point of order rather than on a question of privilege and he will be heard on that basis.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the other day the Prime Minister suggested that we give notice of our questions. I should like to repeat that when we do give notice, as in the case in point, no answers are given. When we do not give notice we receive shallow, superficial or misleading answers. We just cannot win.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Trinity may I say that in respect of most of the questions to which he referred answers have been approved by me. Those answers and the translation thereof are in the process somewhere and I presume will appear on Monday.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the point of order raised by the hon. member for Leeds. Until this government changed the format of the public accounts it was the practice that the names of all lawyers hired by the Department of Justice were shown and the amount each received was also shown in the public accounts. This government discontinued that practice and is now keeping that information secret. The hon. member for Leeds is entitled to that kind of information. It used to be public and should be made public again.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, on the question raised by the hon. member for Leeds, the matter of the people employed on the basis of a contract by CMHC is still under discussion because it has not been traditional to make available that information. CMHC is considered to be an independent corporation.

I also wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Yukon that up until today some 3,344 questions have been placed on the order paper and 2,755 have been answered or 82 per cent. I would point out that this is the greatest number of questions ever put to any government and there has been a greater percentage answered up to this date than ever before by any government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary mentioned the number of questions that have been answered by the government. The reason the government encounters so many questions on the order paper is that we are not getting answers in the oral question period or in committees. I draw attention to the fact that on the order paper there are questions going back to January 4—some of them from our friends on the left—January 18, February 28, March 9. Let the government answer those. The reason they do not is that for the most part the answers will prove to be politically embarrassing for them, and they are deliberately keeping public information secret.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to members of parliament rising on points of order relating to questions on the order paper.

An hon. Member: Thanks, Al.

Mr. MacEachen: But I do object to an experienced member like the hon. member for Trinity using a point of order or a question of privilege to make an attack on the government which he is incapable of making in a more effective way elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Also, I refuse to accept the practice whereby the hon. member for Yukon can suggest that there has been any cover-up in the response of the government to questions that had been put by members of the opposition. My parliamentary secretary has stated that in this session alone we have answered more than 2,700 questions. The right hon. member for Prince Albert, who is shaking his head, should go back to the record of his five sessions in office during the twenty-fourth parliament. We have answered more questions in this session than the government of the right hon. member did in the more than five years when he was prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is one point to be made, that hon. members who are genuinely interested in getting speedy answers to questions and who want to use some discretion in putting questions down can co-operate in that process. But what has happened, and it is obvious today, is that since the research establishments of the various parties have been funded they have been the main source of most of the questions on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: If we want to remove obstacles in the way of feeding information to the House, then I suggest that the principal obstacle can be removed by directing research staffs not to send in indiscriminate and useless questions, the answers to which can be found in the favourite document of the Official Opposition, the Canada Year Book.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Threat!

An hon. Member: Blackmail!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see seven or eight members to my left who wish to rise.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no objection to recognizing the right hon. gentleman. He has the same rights as others and will be recognized in due course. But I am wondering whether we will achieve very much by pursuing a debate such as this for a good part of the afternoon. Perhaps we should set aside a special period of time to discuss this important subject. I believe that for the moment the right hon. member for Prince Albert seeks the floor on a point of order raised originally by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the gratuitous remarks of the minister I would advise him that during my period of office there were so few Liberals in the House they were not able to ask the number of questions that are being asked now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It's going to be that way again.

● (1420)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we answered the questions and we answered them truthfully.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Withdraw!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that interruption came from a member who is not dry behind the ears yet. We did not follow the course being followed by this government of treating the House with contempt and refusing to answer questions or neglecting to do so when there might be any embarrassment in the answers given.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman stand and be recognized? I would also point out that so far as starred questions are concerned the ordinary practice is that they shall be answered within two to four days.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not by this government, that is true, but the practice is that they would be answered within that period.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You are still dreaming.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is happening today is that not only can we not get answers but when questions are asked the government decides, to apply the words of the hon. gentleman, that the questions are of such a nature as not to appeal to the sensibilities of the government. Mr. Speaker, we are not asking questions on the basis of pleasing them; we ask them for the information of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity rose on a point of order and a debate has followed, with views expressed by both sides of the House. I respectfully suggest to hon. members that the point has been made. The Chair has noted the representations and submissions made by hon. members who have taken part in this exchange on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Trinity, but I wonder whether we should not at this point proceed to the next item of business.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity has had the floor on the point of order and I really do not think there is much to be gained by pursuing the matter. The hon. member can speak only once to a point of order. He has already spoken. I would hope the hon. member would agree with me that not much can be gained by starting a new round of exchanges on the same point of order.

Mr. Hellyer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising from the intervention of the government House leader, I must say I was flattered by his attention, but I would have been more impressed if my questions had had the same attention two or three months ago.

I would also like to speak to the allegation that the questions asked by this side of the House are prepared by research officers paid for by the Crown.

Mr. MacEachen: Do you deny it?

Mr. Hellyer: I can tell the House leader through you, Mr. Speaker, that in the majority of cases of which I am aware this is not the case, and it is certainly not the case with respect to the questions I have put down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Much has been made of the statistics showing that the government has answered a high proportion of the large number of questions asked. Statistics can lie. Far more important than the percentage of questions that have been answered are the number of questions and the importance of the subject material which have been left unanswered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is restating the argument he made originally. That is not a new question of privilege.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order which was raised by the government House leader. While I hesitate to do so, I do it because I believe my integrity as a member of this House has been impugned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I think it is worth pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that since I first sat in the House on January 4 I have only put two questions on the order paper but it took three and a half months for these guys to answer the questions. I could not get answers through the regular mail because these ministers refuse to answer mail.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see nothing new in the point of order being raised by the hon. member. I wonder whether hon. members feel that we are achieving very much by a number of members rising one after another to make the same point. It seems to me that the point has been made and the hon. member is now repeating it. I wonder whether that achieves anything.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, surely when the government House leader and his parliamentary secretary impugn the integrity of people in this House they should be required to withdraw their statements—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): — and not attempt to abuse the rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Any allegation that it was the research office instead of myself that asked these questions to try to get information is completely wrong. In giving statistics with respect to the number and percentage of questions answered the minister and the parliamentary secretary were, of course, misleading the House, perhaps unintentionally, because they do not understand the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Notices of motions for the production of papers. Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for taking the time of the House but I feel this is a question of privilege and quite legitimate. A few moments ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) said in reference to certain questions I have on the order paper which have not been answered that it was traditional—those were his words, I believe—not to reply to such questions in regard to CMHC. I feel that is a reflection on the privilege and right of every member of the House to ask questions. Surely the right to ask questions and have them answered in this House is based on the right of the people of Canada to know. The people have a right to answers and information. I think it is a breach of privilege when we have to sit here and listen to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) offer a bunch of lame excuses covering up the inactivity of the government.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Notices of motions for the production of papers.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 258 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Under the conditions and reservations mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that motion No. 258 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF P.E.I. RESPECTING TRANSFER OF PROVINCE HOUSE

Motion No. 258—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island and/or other persons or agencies, with respect to the transfer of Province House in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island to the Government of Canada, together with the land on which such building stands and any additional land or buildings related to that transfer.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would tell us when he is going to get around to producing the documents asked for under motions Nos. 248 to 251 inclusive and what excuse he has for the delay?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, this is a problem that we have had with all motions because the terms of the Official Languages Act require that these documents be produced in the House in both official languages. We have had some difficulty in having the answers to motions for papers prepared for the House of Commons given special priority by departments. We have instituted a program now to contract out translation of these documents. I will look into the hon. gentleman's problem and see if I can accelerate the process of translation.

ENERGY

PROSPECTIVE SHORTFALL IN OIL DELIVERIES FROM EACH NON-ARAB COUNTRY IN FIRST QUARTER OF 1974 IF "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE INVOKED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has told the House that he anticipates a prospective shortfall of 125,000 barrels of oil a day from non-Arab countries as a result of the supplying companies invoking the force majeure clause. Can the minister give us, in respect of the first quarter of 1974, January, February and March, the prospective shortfall in the number of barrels per day with respect to each non-Arab country? In other words, will he break down that 125,000 barrels a day in terms of each non-Arab country?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the 125,000—well, the full 200,000 barrels a day is the expected worst figure on shortfall, and I would have to check how that was made up by the technical liaison committee. That is the source of the information.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I express my surprise that the minister should be unable to give the House this information on a matter of such importance as this which he has put before the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Can he give us the names of the Canadian companies who have been notified of any anticipated cuts in their deliveries of oil originating in non-Arab countries with respect to the first three months of next year, and the amount of the shortfall in respect of each Canadian company?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out in my remarks the other night and, indeed, pointed out to the hon. gentleman yesterday, this is an estimate of the maximum down-side that the Canadian companies could be faced with if, in fact, there was an allocation. There has not, in fact, been an allocation. What we are doing is, we are indicating—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The minister is irresponsible and incompetent.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might read to the House my remarks, as recorded on page 8179 of Hansard:

> My understanding at the moment is that this redistribution has not taken place but the companies have indicated there is a prospective interruption under the force majeure provision of the supplying contracts.

There has been no interruption. What we have asked the companies to do is to state to us the worst possible situation they think they would be in if there were interruptions this winter, and that figure is an aggregate. The companies, of course, are the eastern Canadian refiners.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the minister told us that a number of international companies had invoked the force majeure clause and that this accounted for the reduction in the prospective deliveries of oil to Canada. I want to ask the minister whether any international company has told any Canadian company that in fact the force majeure clause will be invoked. In view of the statement the minister put before the Canadian people that we could anticipate cuts of 125,000 barrels per day from non-Arab countries, creating grave concern particularly in eastern Canada by this statement, what justification did the minister have in fact for making that statement about the 125,000 barrels per day shortfall?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition rose on a point of order. Perhaps I could respond on one. I said in my statement the other night and I said yesterday that we had calculated the worst possible position Canadians could be in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): And, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should not try to twist the words I used.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether he has received word from any Canadian oil companies that they are faced with a prospective shortfall in the delivery of oil from non-Arab countries? If so, what companies are they? He must know them. He made the statement the other night. This is a very important question. What companies are they and what are the prospective cuts or shortfalls they are faced with? If the minister by any chance is so negligent in his office that he has not got this information at his fingertips, will he produce this information soon?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would go again to the words I used in the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: What are the names?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I protest the attempt by the Leader of the Opposition to twist in this way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The fact of the matter is that we took the House and the country into our confidence as to what the maximum exposure would be for Canadians if the force majeure clause were exercised. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will not try to mislead the House and the country in any other way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition, then the hon. member for York South, and then the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if the minister did not indicate to the House yesterday that some international oil companies had indicated to the government they were going to invoke the force majeure clause in their contracts and the minister's officials had advised him that they were apparently within their rights in doing this and he could do nothing about it, if he will tell me that he did not say yesterday that there was actual anticipation of the invocation of the force majeure clause in the contracts, I will certainly withdraw any questions I have asked him today.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think Hansard speaks for itself in this regard and I will rest on the words I used yesterday, not on those the hon. gentleman used.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister should resign.

Mr. Alexander: You have been destroyed, Don.

SOURCE OF ESTIMATE OF POSSIBLE SHORTFALL IN OIL DELIVERIES FROM NON-ARAB COUNTRIES—POSSIBILITY OF REALIZATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that Hansard does not answer the questions asked and that he cannot hide behind the words in Hansard. I want to ask the minister, following up what the Leader of the Opposition asked, whether the suggestion that there would be a 125,000 barrel a day shortfall from suppliers in countries other than Arab countries was a calculation made in the office of the advisory committee or in the office of his department, or was it an estimate based on inquiries made from Canadian companies under contract with the supplying companies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I will stand by the words in Hansard, which indicate what I just suggested. I also remind the hon. gentleman that I indicated the figures were arrived at by the technical liaison committee, which I have described several times in the House as made up of representatives of my department, of the National Energy Board and of the Canadian refining companies. This is the estimate arrived at by the technical experts on all sides.

Mr. Stanfield: I don't believe it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether, as one would expect a responsible minister to do, he asked for the details of these estimates made by this committee? Presumably he studied those details, because if he did not I cannot understand how he functions. Did he see the working papers on which those estimates were based and did the working papers contain any information as to the companies or amounts involved with respect to each of the companies?

● (1440)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, I would not examine the working papers of the committee. I think I am entitled to accept the judgment of my advisers in this regard who have been in liaison with the industry, and I do so.

Mr. Lewis: The minister is emphasizing that all he did was to give an estimate of the worst situation that could occur. Is he now able to inform the House and the people of Canada, particularly those east of the Ottawa valley, whether he has reason to expect that this worst estimate will be realized or even any part of it, or can he now say it will not happen because of the fact he has no knowledge of any reduction due to action under the force majeure clause in the contracts of the supplying companies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot respond to that because it depends on the extent to which the Arab embargo is continued, the extent to which it is applied to one or another of the other countries and the extent to which different suppliers to Canada might be affected by it. I cannot give that estimate. I repeat, the over-all estimate about the down-side is the figure I gave in my speech the other day.

Mr. Lewis: I think I understand a little about a force majeure clause. Has the minister looked at any of the clauses and is he suggesting to the House that the mere fact a supplying company may not have enough supplies to deal with all its customers entitles it under any such clause to breach a contract with a company in Canada? Is that what the minister is saying?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it depends very much on the clause entered into in this industry between suppliers and customers. I have not, of course, examined the force majeure clause—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —because the particular supply contracts are not documents in the possession of the government of Canada.

REFUSAL OF GOLDEN EAGLE CANADA LIMITED TO DELIVER FUEL OIL IN RIMOUSKI AND MONT-JOLI—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a while ago I wanted to speak about the point of order raised by the Leader of the Official Opposition. The hon. member for York South and the minister have just mentioned the force majeure clause. For about two weeks, we have been hearing that eastern Canada and especially Quebec have sufficient oil reserves for 52 days. Yesterday, I received telephone calls from the area of Mont-Joli and Rimouski in the lower Saint-Lawrence valley complaining that Golden Eagle Canada Limited heating fuel distributors were refusing to deliver fuel until next Monday because they were waiting for the price increase of December 1. Is the minister aware of this and will he take action to force Golden Eagle Canada Limited to deliver the required fuel to the people of Mont-Joli and Rimouski?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this situation, but I thank the hon. member for having brought it to my attention and I shall make the necessary investigations.

OIL EXPORT TAX—DISTRIBUTION AND USE OF PROCEEDS—MEASURES TO PROTECT CONSUMERS WHEN PRICE FREEZE EXPIRES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On November 14 last the minister was asked a question in committee with regard to the $1.90 per barrel export tax on crude petroleum. Did we understand him correctly to say that either directly or indirectly the entire tax will go back to the province where the resource is located or be used in the province where it originated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the position I took then and several times both inside and outside the House is that the proceeds of the export tax will go back in the first place to put the producing province in the position it would have been if its oil had been sold both for export and in on the domestic market at the higher price which they have been deprived of by the price restraint. At the same time, we indicated that the federal government would embark upon joint venture investments to further energy resources in the producing provinces with the balance of the proceeds.

Mr. Woolliams: So there will not be any understanding, did we understand the minister correctly that 40 to 50 per cent of that tax will go back to the treasury of the resource province and the remainder of the tax will be used for technological research and/or development within the province that produced the resource?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is right, Mr. Speaker. It will depend very much on the actual royalty position of each of the producing provinces. In effect, these funds will be going back. Those in federal hands will be going back in federal programs for the purpose of stimulating resources in those provinces.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not want there to be any misunderstanding because we get one answer one day and another the next. I even gave the minister notice of this question. Did the minister not say to the committee, and is this not what he intended to say, that 40 to 50 per cent of that tax would go back to the treasury of the province where the resource is developed and the remainder would be used for development within that province? Surely he can answer that question with a yes or no so we will understand him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is in effect what I said.

Mr. Woolliams: One further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are not making much headway. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North for a supplementary and then the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the minister make it very clear at this stage what mechanism or alternative measures will be suggested to replace the export tax when the price freeze goes off so that the consumers of Canada will be protected against the high cost of fuel and gasoline?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we will be bringing forward a draft bill to the House for first reading to deal with the export tax and the continuing system in this situation. With regard to the question of the economic rent to be yielded by an increase in the western part of the Canadian market, we have had discussions with several provincial governments on this question. This may indeed relate to the kind of royalty programs they are planning on instituting in the near future.

REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF ESTIMATES, CONTRACTS, AND OTHER DOCUMENTS RELATING TO SUPPLYING OF OFFSHORE OIL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to go back to the question of supply and force majeure. In light of the minister's appearance tomorrow night at 8 p.m. before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, can we have his assurance he will make available on that occasion copies of relevant estimates, contracts and other documents relating to the supply of oil to Canada from offshore sources, particularly a copy of the contract between Creole and the Canadian Refining Company?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I can bring information as produced in the technical liaison committee. I can give no assurance that I will be able to produce private documents that are in the hands of the contracting companies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Will the minister ask the Energy Board to secure such a copy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, the Energy Board secures a great deal of information on a confidential basis. I am not sure whether I would be at liberty, having obtained it on that basis, to make it public in a parliamentary committee.

OIL—EMBARGO LIST OF SAUDI ARABIA AND LIBYA—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said a few minutes ago there had been no interruption in supply of foreign crude oil to Canada. Will the minister say whether Canada is on the embargo list of Saudi Arabia and Libya?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the situation is that Canada is not on the embargo list in the same sense as the United States—

Mr. Woolliams: What sense?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —in the sense there will be shipments coming to Canada through Canadian ports, although subject to the 25 per cent reduction resulting from Arab production cutbacks. However, Saudi Arabia and Libya refuse to ship through Portland, Maine, in bond to Canada.

● (1450)

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, would the minister comment on the fact there has been no Saudi Arabian crude arrive at Portland for Canada since October 23, and will he say what efforts are being made to obtain oil and why he has been unable to explain to Saudi Arabia that this crude is actually bound for Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the fact that none has arrived seems to me to be consistent with the position that the Saudis have taken. We have had our diplomatic representative go to the capital of Saudi Arabia for the purpose of laying forth the Canadian position, but they have not been prepared to take what they regard as a risk in shipping to a United States port, which they feel might in some way advantage the United States.

SUGGESTED NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT WITH VENEZUELA AND OTHER COUNTRIES FOR DIRECT PURCHASE OF OIL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact we are now getting some idea of the power of these huge multinational companies with regard to shipping products from one area to another, can the minister say whether or not he has started negotiating with Venezuela or any other oil exporting country for the purchase of oil directly from these countries instead of going through the medium of multinational corporations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As we have said in relation to Venezuela, the information we have is that oil available to the Venezuelan national petroleum company is fully committed at this time. They have elected not to take additional oil in the form of crude oil instead of royalties, and at the moment they have no additional oil for export. Given the tightness of the international situation, there does not seem to be very much scope for the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary regarding the price of oil in this country. Can the minister say whether he is prepared to grant the energy supply allocation board power to control the price of oil domestically in this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the powers of the board will be contained in the bill which will be coming before parliament shortly.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the present serious crisis in the transportation of Alberta oil to eastern Canada, and since the extension of a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal is, I believe, an urgent matter, can the minister say if his department is now working on an agreement with Quebec on the installation and operation conditions of a pipeline joining Sarnia and Montreal? If so, when will a definite plan be submitted to the Quebec government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we are now concluding discussions on this subject. We shall be meeting this week with representatives of pipeline companies. Such a meeting shall be held also with my Quebec counterpart, perhaps next week, or at a date still to be set.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT OF THOMAS SERJEANT IN TANZANIA—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns an incident involving a Canadian citizen who has been imprisoned in Tanzania. On September 26 a young Canadian citizen, Thomas Serjeant, while flying to Cape Town, was forced to land in Tanzania where his plane was confiscated and he was imprisoned and has remained in prison without being charged. Can the minister tell the House when he first learned of this incident and what action he has taken to obtain this young Canadian's release and to ensure his safety while in prison?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we learned of the imprisonment of Mr. Serjeant in Tanzania on October 6. He was placed in detention on September 26. We made our first representations immediately; we have made them periodically since. Mr. Serjeant has not been charged. He is being held in detention under the authority of the President or the Prime Minister for matters involving state security.

Mr. Carter: In view of the fact this incident occurred on September 26 and that Canadian officials in that country learned of the incident one week later, can the minister tell the House why it has taken six weeks to inform the family of the whereabouts of this Canadian?

Mr. Sharp: As far as I understand, Mr. Speaker, our office got in touch with his family at the request of Mr. Serjeant immediately upon gaining access to his place of detention. I do not think the officials are at fault in this respect. We are doing what we can to get Mr. Serjeant released but, as I say, the Tanzanian authorities say this is a matter of state security and that the case is being handled on that basis. We are following up as best we can, and I do hope we will be able to get charges laid or obtain his release as soon as possible.

CAPABILITY OF LAND TRANSPORT TO MOVE OIL TO MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I believe he has received notice thereof. On Monday the minister told the House, as reported on page 8149 of Hansard, that the capability of the land transport system to deliver any substantial quantities of crude oil or petroleum products was not high and that he would give figures at a later date. Having regard to the Prime Minister's statement on November 22 and the minister's reference to overland oil movements on Monday, can the minister now tell the House what specific measures the government has taken to establish an overland oil supply system to Montreal, and how much oil is being handled per day by this system?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is no truck and rail movement, and as long as shipment is possible through the St. Lawrence Seaway it will not be necessary to resort to this higher cost system. The estimate we have at the moment is that a level of about 40,000 to 60,000 barrels per day might be obtained, but in order to meet this figure very substantial investment both in loading and in unloading facilities will be required in addition to the improvement of available tank cars used for this purpose. The ministry of transport at the moment is completing a survey with the two national railways in regard to this question and has also been in touch with major trucking firms, and I understand will be able to be more definitive on this point within a few days.

Mr. Jarvis: Can the minister give his assurance today that the overland oil supply system mentioned by him and the Prime Minister will be adequate to meet oil shortages in eastern Canada after the freeze-up of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we anticipate that, unless there is a dramatic improvement in the figures I have given, there will be a shortfall.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSITION OF MINISTER ON PROPOSED GUARANTEED INCOME POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare?

In view of the fact that last week, the minister, addressing the Canadian Tax Foundation announced, according to an Ottawa daily, his intention of setting aside his guaranteed annual income policy, I should like to ask him, in view of the circumstances, whether he intends to continue to apply the policy introduced some time ago or to give it up?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to state here, very clearly and categorically, that the government is maintaining the policy put forward in April of last year, namely, to guarantee an income to all persons who are unable to work or who are so considered, as well as a supplement to all other groups of persons.

LABOUR RELATIONS

HALIFAX-DARTMOUTH DOCKWORKERS' DISPUTE—PROSPECT OF EARLY SETTLEMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister now in a position to give us a progress report on the mediation taking place with respect to the dockworkers' dispute at Halifax and Dartmouth, and can he advise the House whether he is optimistic about an early settlement? If not, what plans is the government preparing?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I believe he will be relatively pleased to know, and certainly I and the government are, that a settlement has been arrived at today, we believe. A memorandum of agreement is being drawn up and we hope it will be signed today. However, I would advise him that it is, of course, subject to ratification.

Oral Questions

BENEFIT CONTROL—GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING FINAL REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the final report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission advisory committee which revealed very extensive abuse and harassment of claimants by benefit control officers, and in view of the pious denials of such practices by both the minister and his head office officials, can the minister inform the House what steps he intends to take to ensure that justice is accorded to those who were unjustly disentitled or disqualified under the conditions criticized in the final report of the advisory committee?

● (1500)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in my reply to the chairman of the advisory committee, which was tabled at the same time as the report, I indicated that a great number of steps had already been taken. The information on the activity of the committee was very valuable to us, but we did not await the publication of the final report to take suggestions which have been implemented long ago. These steps are outlined in that document and in the statement I made to the House two or three weeks ago.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized on a supplementary, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, what steps does the minister intend to take to make sure that those who were disentitled or disqualified unjustly over the last six months will now receive justice in respect of that disentitlement or disqualification?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the appeal system has been available to claimants who felt they were unjustly disentitled or disqualified. I think they were very few in number. The appeal system is working well.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order. I apologize to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi; he will be recognized in a moment.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the minister has just told the House that the people who were treated in that manner can go through the normal process of appeal. They have 30 days in which to file an appeal and some of these cases took place five months ago.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

EXPORT OF OIL PRODUCTS THROUGH EASTERN CANADA CUSTOMS POINTS—REASON FOR ISSUING PERMITS—COMPANIES TO WHICH "FORCE MAJEURE" MAY APPLY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the unprecedented quantity of petroleum products being directed from Canada to the United States through eastern Canadian customs points, I direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On what grounds has the National Energy Board issued this unprecedented number of export permits, what are the countries of origin of the crude oil involved, and are the products which are going through these border points at such an unprecedented rate being exported as surplus to Canadian requirements?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, one would have to know the time frame, but most of the oil products in this country are now covered by export control and no valid export can take place without a specific judgment by the National Energy Board that a particular shipment is surplus to Canadian requirements. If the hon. member would indicate the specific time frame and also the border points involved, I would be glad to get the details to answer his question.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question based on the following statement yesterday by the minister, to be found at page 8179 of Hansard:

> My understanding at the moment is that this redistribution has not taken place but the companies have indicated there is a prospective interruption under the force majeure provision of the supplying contracts.

Would the minister now inform the House exactly which companies he was referring to?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about eastern Canadian refineries. I would point out to the hon. member that this is a different situation from the one he referred to in the first part of his question. He referred to the exporting of products from Canada. This is covered by the National Energy Board. The companies in question would be the various eastern Canadian refineries. I would be glad to get a list of them and the locations, which are generally publicly available.

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS NOT USED TO DETRIMENT OF CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of his broadcast statement to the Canadian people that Canadian consumers will not be allowed to suffer, will he direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to ensure that those very doubtful contracts are not invoked to the detriment of consumers of petroleum products in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a suggestion by the hon. member that we intervene in the course of these private contracts. I will consider the suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

OIL—REQUEST FOR NAMES OF COMPANIES THAT MAY BE AFFECTED BY "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I refer him to page 8172 of Hansard, specifically to questions asked yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary South, who wanted the minister to tell us whether the force majeure which is being suggested by the oil supplying companies is as a result of their being cut off at the source by the producing countries, and therefore they do not have the oil, or whether it is because the supplying companies have decided arbitrarily to deliver the oil to some other country. The minister's answer was:

—my understanding is that it has been a decision of the supplying companies, and it may be related under the conditions of the contracts they have with other countries to other supply obligations.

A little earlier, in response to a question by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member should ask his question now.

Mr. Nielsen: A little earlier, when replying to a question by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain who asked for the names of the supplying companies, the minister's reponse was that he would check into it, presumably to inform the House. I ask the minister now whether he has checked into this matter and has the names of the companies and, if he has, will he please disclose them to the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I respond to the hon. member by pointing out that, as reported on page 8179 of Hansard, I stated:

My understanding at the moment is that this redistribution has not taken place but the companies have indicated there is a prospective interruption under the force majeure provision of the supplying contracts.

As to the supplying companies, there are, of course, inter-company contracts between affiliated firms, and there are many others as well. I will be glad to see if I can get a list of all of them.

An hon. Member: You'd better get it.

POSSIBLE DIVERSION OF CANADIAN OIL IMPORTS—MAGNITUDE OF INTERRUPTION OF SUPPLY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in respect of contracts between Canadian companies and supplying corporations. On October 25 he told the House, in relation to the possible diversion of oil for Canada by international corporations:

I think I might adopt what someone has said that such action would not be a crime but worse than a crime. It would be a gross blunder. I hope we have made that message very clear to the companies operating in Canada, and we hope it is understood by them.

I should like to ask the minister what he has been given to understand by the Canadian companies, whether he has received word from any Canadian company of a prospective interruption of supply, and how many barrels a day this would involve.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have, indeed, Mr. Speaker, and I have an undertaking on the part of companies that the government of Canada will be advised if there is to be any allocation of supplies otherwise than would be expected. My information is that there has been no reallocation at the present time and, as I have said several times already, we will let the House know exactly what the possible reason is in the event there is such an allocation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, has the minister received any specific word with regard to any prospective reallocation or interruption of supply? Has he received from a Canadian company any specific indication of a prospective reduction in supply?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker, but we did receive an indication from them of what the possible interruption could be if that situation came to pass.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta and then the hon. member for Assiniboia.

IMMIGRATION

OBTAINING OF DEPARTMENTAL DOCUMENTS CONCERNING JOHN MEIER BY UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Two days ago I gave him notice of a question which I asked yesterday. Since his answer yesterday, the minister's assistant has made it known publicly that the minister's answer was incorrect. Could the minister tell us today whether in fact the government did transmit documents to a foreign government, who authorized the transmission of those documents, and is it generally government practice to pass documents relating to citizens and residents of Canada to foreign governments?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe the only inaccuracy in the answer I gave was in respect of the recipient of the information that was transmitted. I thought at the time it went to Mr. Meier's lawyer. This practice is customary, and I think quite rightly so. We do have a reciprocal exchange of information between our people who are investigating applicants for landed immigrant status and officials of the countries from which they come. When we ask for such information from the agencies of other countries, we certainly must be prepared to reciprocate when they ask us for information. This is a routine matter. In view of the serious concern always existing in Canada about the possibility of criminals entering this country, I think this is only wise and, indeed, that we should be very thankful such an exchange of information is available to us.

Mr. Reynolds: Is it a fact that this information was sent to the United States Attorney's office for use in prosecuting a case, and was not a communication between the two governments for information?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that we had conveyed this information to the United States internal revenue service. They indicated to us that they had, inadvertently and in error, passed it along. They sent us a letter of apology indicating that such a mistake would not happen again.

ENERGY

PURCHASE OF PETROLEUM BY CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION—AVAILABILITY OF SUFFICIENT FUNDS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to earlier questions and is addressed to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the fact the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has instructed the Canadian Commercial Corporation, under the responsibility of the Minister of Supply and Services, to use the funds supplied for the defence contingency fund, under the authority of the Minister of National Defence, to purchase oil supplies around the world and in view of the fact it has already purchased 40 million gallons of petroleum, I should like to ask the minister whether in fact there are sufficient funds available and, if not, what action is proposed by the government to ensure that there are funds available to meet this contingency operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, there is an ample supply of funds, but there is a shortage of oil on the international market. If we can find oil and negotiate acceptable terms, to cope with present conditions in Canada, the government will then make available to my department the necessary funds for the purchases.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to advise hon. members that we have reached the end of the question period, or just about. Perhaps hon. members might allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue and the right hon. member for Prince Albert before calling orders of the day.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT APPLICATION OF LIONEL BERTRAND FOR PENSION INCREASE BE EXPEDITED

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question which concerns all the members of this House as well as the pensioners of the Department.

Recently, I drew the minister's attention to case No. SC-18023 involving a Mr. Lionel Bertrand who was requesting a pension adjustment. On September 26 last, the minister replied that it would take several months before the Commission would make a decision. Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister whether there actually is an energy shortage in his department since it takes that much time to take care of veterans who wish to adjust their pension.

[English]

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the hon. gentleman's request is no. We are pretty well supplied with energy in my department. We have 24 commissioners listed and 24 working. The Pension Act is being dealt with quite well. If the hon. member knows of any cases which he feels should have priority over and above what seems to be the case, I will be glad to get the information for him.

ENERGY

REQUEST THAT COMBINES INVESTIGATION BRANCH SECURE FROM OIL COMPANIES CONTRACTS CONTAINING "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Having listened during the last couple of days to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources explaining the difficulty in which he finds himself, it would appear that there is a serious morass of neglect of the Canadian people on the part of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the threat or potential threat of Canadian subsidiaries carrying out the wishes of their mother countries under agreements which allegedly contain the clause to which reference has been made over and over again, will the Prime Minister have the combines investigation branch get in touch with these companies and have them produce the contracts which allegedly have these provisions within them? I ask that this be done because if they are protecting themselves behind such arrangements, then they are indeed, in my estimation, committing offences contrary to the Combines Investigation Act. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will act so that we will know what is in these contracts. Surely the Canadian people should not be made subservient to a group of oil companies which apparently have no regard for Canada as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without conceding the premise of the question, I think the question itself raises a problem in that it seems to indicate a misunderstanding on the part of some hon. members of the answers given and the position taken by the government and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. If the right hon. gentleman will refer to the discussion that has taken place, I think he will understand that the purpose of the minister in giving the figure of 200,000 barrels a day was to indicate what the worst situation might be as a result of the force majeure clause being invoked, should it be invoked and applied. Obviously, the minister is making this point in order to indicate to Canadians that the situation might be serious. This is a different purpose altogether from the position of the government with regard to these corporations.

It should be quite clear from the government's actions in August, in September and in November that we will do everything within the power of the government of Canada to ensure that the Canadian public interest will be respected. We will use every means to ensure that Canadian control is established over any corporation operating within Canada. We cannot, of course, affect the operations of corporations outside of Canada. I think another example of the government's determination is in the bill which was given third reading just a few days ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I really was never good at solving hieroglyphics, but having listened to the right hon. gentleman I ask him this question. Will he get in touch with the combines investigation branch and have this matter looked into? He says that in August, September and November the government paid great attention to this matter. All I can say is that if that is all the government has done, it has not acted on behalf of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lafontaine is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I stood up several times today anxious to ask a supplementary, but I was unable to do so. I am not complaining nor do I blame those who have had a chance to ask their own questions, but I noticed that such supplementaries are sometimes asked as late as ten minutes after the main questions have had a reply. Would it be possible, Mr. Speaker, where supplementaries are concerned, that they be asked immediately after the main questions? I had one I wanted to address but I did not because it was five minutes after the minister had replied to the first question. But on the subject of supplementaries, whether they are asked by government or opposition members, it seems to me that they should be asked right after the reply is given to the main question. This could give each hon. member the opportunity to ask his question when he wishes to do so. I am raising this point, but with no intention of filing a complaint. I simply wonder whether, under the circumstances, a supplementary asked ten minutes after a reply has been given to the main question would really be a supplementary. Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that tomorrow I will want to address a supplementary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

● (1520)

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I am sure our members would agree to this question if it would help to clear up the oil problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is obvious that we have two points of order at the same time. The hon. member has made a representation which I am sure will be noted by all hon. members who ask supplementary questions.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that for the last two days, if not three, the clocks in this chamber have all shown different times. They are still wrong. I suggest that members of the House are entitled to better repair service than that.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 27, consideration of Bill 176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; motion No. 2 (Mr. Atkey), motion No. 3 (Mr. Diefenbaker), motion No. 13 (Mr. Lang) and the amendment thereto of Mr. Atkey.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last evening I had just had an opportunity of briefly stating my position on the use of evidence which is obtained illegally. I stated that my basic value judgment was that the public must, at all costs, be assured of the honesty and integrity of the police forces of this country, and that as between the very important value of protecting the public against the commission of crime by criminal elements and the protection of the public against the commission of crime by police, to the extent that it is necessary to make a choice we must make the choice in favour of protecting them against any illegal action by the police. The public must be assured that those who protect society are themselves beyond crime and suspicion of crime.

However, as it appears before us, I think the issue is somewhat narrower than that. I think there is a general disposition among members of the various parties to agree with the value position which I have enunciated, and the real question is to attempt to determine which of the positions that is or could be before the House through amendment is the one which is best adapted, not only to the assertion of this basic value judgment but also to the variant situations which may arise.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) has presented, through his amendment, one of those variant situations and I believe it is very useful to the House that he has done so. This is the amendment in which he proposes that evidence be not necessarily excluded if there was a mere irregularity in the obtaining of the authorization by the police. In a case where the police had proceeded on the basis of what they thought was a valid authorization, it would indeed be excessive to prevent evidence which is obtained in that way from being used subsequently.

However, there are several other situations in which I think a strong case can be made for admitting the evidence. One of those was raised by the New Democratic Attorney General for British Columbia, Mr. Macdonald, in the letter which he sent to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). He raised such questions, for example, as:

> Does the amendment barring evidence indirectly obtained, unless the interception is "lawful", bar evidence of an offence, e.g. murder, obtained during an interception lawfully authorized for an entirely different crime?

I will not go on to the larger problem which he raised as the second problem in his letter, but the first is an indication of another type of problem which can arise. There is a third type of variant situation where the interception which takes place might be by criminal elements themselves and yet the police might stumble across this evidence or obtain it in the course of another investigation. I am referring to the evidence which was obtained by wiretapping, not illegally by the police, but illegally by some third party. In such a case is it reasonable to penalize the police by preventing them from using this evidence?

What we are doing, in effect, in a provision which excludes tainted evidence from being used is saying to the police that if they do not follow the law there will be no percentage, no advantage for them in using such evidence. But in the case where illegal wiretapping has not been carried out by the police but by criminal elements in our society, it seems to me that such a penalty would not be appropriate.

I had suggested last night that I had in mind the presentation of an amendment which, if I were to present it, would take care of this last situation where interception has been by criminal elements. But I have decided not to present it, at least at this time, because I understand that the Minister of Justice would like to test the House on a broader subamendment to the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's which is before us, and as a procedural matter I would not want to stand in the way of the House expressing its opinion on that broader question.

While I may subsequently return to my amendment, I would not want to prevent the expression by the House on the broader and very important question which might be posed to us. Therefore, while expressing my concern about the intermediate situations, one of which is dealt with in the amendment placed before us by the hon. member for St. Paul's and while stressing the fact that there are other intermediate situations of which I think it would be useful to take account, I have decided not to present any amendment at this time.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey), is acceptable to the minister. We tried very hard to come up with a series of qualifications which would meet all the cases; for instance, that indirect evidence must be relevant, that it is not inadmissible by reason only of a defect in form or irregularity in procedure and, lastly, that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done. Surely these three tests should meet any alarms expressed by the minister and by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). I think we have had, in the last couple of days, some evidence of a more forthcoming attitude on the part of the minister toward some of the suggestions we have made to improve the bill. I hope very much that the House can accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's and that we can go on to discuss other sections of the bill.

I sense a straining on the part of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. Listening to him was rather like listening to somebody appearing in a court of law with a rather bad case. I think that if he were in another forum in which he has distinguished himself, such as law school or the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, he really would not promote this argument. I hope that the law reform committee, when it deals with the law of evidence, which in my humble opinion is one of the most outdated sections of our law—speaking personally, not for my party—will abolish the indirect evidence rule once and for all, not only in wiretapping but in any other form. I think that most lawyers, or at least the lawyers I am in contact with, would agree.

In the committee there was a more than two to one majority on this issue. I thought that we were sort of bellwethers in the wiretapping matter for a reform in the law that has been marked down for generations, Perhaps I am over simplifying the matter, because I think we lawyers of the British legal tradition have paid a great deal too much attention to what I consider an illiberal and outmoded concept of law, namely, that you can have the fruits of illegality. It is high time that Canada faced this issue.

I eagerly anticipate a decision of the crusading law reform commission on this subject, and I am sure this was the motive that appealed to the substantial majority made up—as the hon. member for St. Paul's said—of all parties who voted on this issue in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. So I hope very much that the majority that was present and made a deliberate and considered recommendation for a reform in the law will not be overturned by a backward attempt to reverse the decision that I thought was made in good faith by a committee where partisanship played a very small part, if indeed any part.

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I am rising to take part in the debate on the amendment to the amendment. I appreciate the continuing efforts of all members of the House to arrive at positions, on the protection of privacy bill, which will meet the needs of our society in assuring its security, with due regard for individual privacy, and at the same time allow a very carefully controlled minimum availability of electronic intrusion devices to the law enforcement officers.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) in my view would be extremely narrowing in the extent to which it would allow a judge to admit evidence in a case which came before him. It is clear that when evidence before a judge is relevant, and when he deems it necessary in the interests of justice to admit it, he would still have to exclude that evidence if we adopted the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's unless it also, in addition to this qualification, fell within the situation of having been kept out only by reason of a technical defect. In other words, it would be only in that very special situation that the amendment would play any part in allowing the judge to admit the evidence.

The logical counterpart of that is that when there was not a technical defect in the way in which an authorization was sought, notwithstanding that the evidence was relevant, notwithstanding that the judge felt that in the interests of justice the evidence ought to be admitted, there would not be admissibility. It is to cure that that I propose to move an amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Nielsen: An amendment to the amendment to the amendment!

Mr. Lang: I have emphasized that the law itself contains important sanctions to deal with the conduct of policemen who might be tempted to obtain evidence in an illegal fashion. Last night I referred to the fact that there is a penalty of up to five years in prison for anyone who engages in unlawful conduct in connection with a wiretapping. I think five years in prison is certainly a stiff penalty. In addition to that, there is provision in the bill for punitive damages of up to $5,000 which can be awarded against a person who engages in unlawful wiretapping, and which can be awarded at the discretion of the judge, in a fairly interesting and unusual way, to the person who has been the subject of or has suffered from the basic illegality of the wiretapping.

I do not want to repeat the arguments in favour of the introduction in court of evidence which is important to it. However, I would refer to the words of Mr. Justice Cardozo who, in looking at this question in the contest of the American rule, said, if it is evidence which is relevant:

> The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered . . . A room is searched against the law, and the body of a murdered man is found . . . The privacy of the home has been infringed, and the murderer goes free.

Mr. Nielsen: That is in connection with a search warrant.

Mr. Lang: For the benefit of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I am talking about a situation where a constable has blundered and the murderer has to go free. It is quite clear that this was in the context of a warrant rather than a wiretap; but the point and the principle are the same, that justice is denied in the court relating to the murder because of some other matter that has gone on. I quote another United States case, Irvine v. California, in 1954, where the court said this:

> Rejection of the evidence does nothing to punish the wrongdoing official, while it may, and likely will, release the wrongdoing defendant. It deprives society of its remedy against one lawbreaker because he has been pursued by another. It protects one against whom incriminating evidence is discovered, but does nothing to protect innocent persons who are the victims of illegal but fruitless searches.

That is really the gist of the argument to allow evidence that is relevant to come before the court when it is extremely important that it be admitted.

Mr. Fairweather: Could we have the citation?

Mr. Lang: The citation is 347 U.S. 128, 136 (1954). It was the judgment of the court. I can get the names of the judges for the hon. member later. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) quite rightly pointed out to me that my original motion had perhaps too broad a sweep in two respects. In the first place, it would allow even the private communication itself in certain circumstances, which our original bill would not have done. Secondly, the words in my original amendment would indicate the judge was to consider just the case before him, whereas it would be better if the view were taken that the honourable judge, in considering whether evidence should be admitted, looked both at the question of the case before him and the question of deterrence arising from the exclusion of evidence, to the extent that that is a deterrent.

It is really to meet those needs that I propose to move an amendment which would have the effect of allowing the judge to admit evidence, but not the private communication itself, in circumstances where there was a taint of illegality concerning the way in which the evidence was obtained, particularly through wiretapping. I do so particularly because I remain concerned about the problem for a court which is faced with cross-examination by defence counsel trying to assert that there may have been something illegal in the background of the evidence.

I emphasize to hon. members my great concern about this, that we might let ourselves fall into the dangers that exist in some of the jurisdictions where a court is faced with having to allow defence counsel to explore for a negative, that is, whether or not there is something in the background of the evidence. If we allow the judge to say in any case that this evidence is so necessary that it will be admitted, then he can eliminate the fishing expedition of defence counsel in those circumstances.

I propose, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to move the following amendment, seconded by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde):

> That the motion of November 27, 1973, by Mr. Atkey to amend motion No. 13, a motion to amend Bill C-176, be amended by
> (a) adding after paragraph (a) of the substituted text the word "and",

(b) striking the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) of the substituted text and substituting therefor the word "or", and

(c) adding immediately after the word "that" in paragraph (c) of the substituted text the following:

", in the case of evidence, other than the private communication itself,"

The effect of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, would be to allow the judge to admit evidence which is relevant and which is needed, in the interests of justice, in the case of a technical defect—very generally—and in the case of evidence other than where there was a technical defect in the application or authorization where he does, in the interests of justice, consider it necessary taking into consideration both the case before him and the value of the deterrence of not admitting the evidence and not ever the private communication, in those circumstances only the evidence that might have been obtained as a result of it. He would therefore be able to allow justice to be done in those circumstances and would be able to allow the evidence to go in when he felt it was essential that it be admitted.

I take it the thrust of the section, as it would then stand, would be a general rule of not admitting evidence that was related to an illegal wiretap, but with certain exceptions that the judge could focus on when he felt it necessary. I do not think the judge would ignore the fact that the primary rule was to keep it out unless it was needed in, and that we would have an important variation in the rule of evidence in this regard. I commend the amendment to the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have some reservations about the right of the minister to move what, in effect, is an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says no, but I do not treat the motion to amend that was originally advanced by the minister as other than an amemdment. Perhaps he does. The question before the House, before the minister's motion was placed before us, was whether or not the section should be accepted in its present form. The minister chose to move that that section be amended, and then the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) advanced an amendment to the amendment that was placed before us by the minister. There has to be a limit to amendments, and it would appear that Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, 1958, at page 169, citation 202(1), (2) and (3) confirms this. I shall read that citation for the record:

(1) To an amendment, when proposed from the Chair—

I suggest to the Chair that the amendment here described is that which was moved by the minister in the first instance.

—an amendment may be moved—

That phrase would refer to the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's.

—but only two amendments can be proposed at the same time to a question. Some limit is necessary, and the usage has grown into law that an amendment to an amendment is allowable, but that no motion to amend further can be entertained until one of the two amendments is disposed of. There is no limit, however, to the number of amendments to a question provided they come within this principle.

That is to say, if I read the rule correctly, that there is no reason why the minister cannot move his amendment; but he must wait, in my submission, for the disposition of the amendment that is before us made by the hon. member for St. Paul's. Paragraph (2) of that citation reads:

(2) As the proposal of an amendment to an amendment originates a fresh subject for consideration, the new question thus created must, to prevent confusion, be disposed of by itself. An amendment, when undergoing alteration, is therefore treated throughout, as if it were a substantive motion upon which an amendment has been moved. The original motion, accordingly, is laid aside; and the amendment becomes for the time a separate question to be dealt with, until its terms are settled.

I take it this is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was referring to. Paragraph (3) of that citation reads:

—the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

That, Sir, is what I suggest to the minister. I do not question his right to move the amendment which he seeks to move. I question his timing. In my submission, the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's must be disposed of before the minister can defend his amendment. That submission, of course, is based on the premise that the minister's original motion is in effect a motion to amend, the substantive question before the House being the clause in the bill itself. In those circumstances we would have before us three amendments, if the amendment now being proposed by the minister were to be accepted.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the appropriate moment one of my colleagues, or I might do it myself, will be indicating opposition to the substance of the minister's proposed subamendment; but at this point I should like to suggest, in the minister's defence, that he does have the right to move what seems to me to be a subamendment.

There are times, for example, when we have amending bills—but nevertheless a motion to pass an amending bill is a main motion. Standing Order 75(5) provides for putting down motions at the report stage. Third reading is not before us. The only thing that is before us at the report stage is a motion. I submit, therefore, that the rule that there cannot be more than two amendments does not apply in this case, because in practice what we do at the report stage is to deal with a motion. Of course, a motion can be amended and subamended. My interest is not only in defending the minister, but also the right of all members to move subamendments in cases like this.

Mr. Nielsen: I wonder if Your Honour would recognize me for a moment, in order that I may fill in a point that I neglected to make.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection to recognizing the hon. member. He has already spoken on a point of order, but realizing the importance of the matter perhaps he should be seen. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should recognize the hon. member and remind him that it is subject to allowing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the right of rebuttal, and so on and so forth.

Mr. Nielsen: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I neglected to anticipate the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). If we are to accept the principle that there can be such an amendment, and the principle that other hon. members may wish to make amendments of this nature, we could conceivably be confronted with a dozen subamendments on this question. I submit that the rule was never intended to be extended that far.

● (1550)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the only point I want to make is that the stricture the hon. member has made is correct. There cannot be more than two amendments,—that is, one amendment and one subamendment—before the House at the same time. If we have a dozen amendments, we will have to wait our turn. It seems to me that it is applying the rule beyond its limits to say that when there is before the House only one motion and one amendment, there is not the right to move at least one subamendment.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I think the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was correct in saying there must be a limit. I think that after this amendment has been moved we shall have reached that limit. That is where we are for the time being.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the citation in Beauchesne's referred to by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in supporting his case is beside the point. It begs the question, for it proceeded on the assumption that the motion which the minister moved is an amendment. That is the very question at issue.

Since the argument of the hon. member for Yukon is about form, I think I am right in saying that in form, whatever may be its effect, the minister has moved a motion, to which we are entitled to move an amendment and a subamendment. At that point we reach a limit, until the subamendment has been disposed of. With that in mind, I did not proceed with the subamendment I might have moved, in order to allow the minister to move his subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their advice, and I thank the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for raising this very important point of order which has worried the Chair for some time. I appreciate that there can be only one amendment and a subamendment before the House at the same time. If the subamendment is defeated, then a different subamendment can be brought forth for the purpose of amending the amendment. The question is whether we have before us now three amendments or only two.

I have always felt, in thinking about the possibility that this objection might be brought forward for the consideration of the House, that the interpretation of Standing Order 75(5) should be that this is a substantive motion with notice. That probably makes the difference, in that the Standing Order provides that we will have on the order paper a substantive motion with notice, which puts it in the category of a question subject to amendment and subamendment.

I must confess that I still have some doubts about the matter, and because I have these doubts I have been thinking about the problem for some time, wondering when it might arise. This is the first time the point has been raised. I would think hon. members might be entitled to the benefit of the doubt and that the Standing Order might be interpreted in this way, that what we have before us is a substantive motion subject to amendment and subamendment.

If I have any serious doubt about what is proposed by the minister, it stems from the fact that by the subamendment he is attempting, in a way, to amend his own motion. I think the subamendment ought to have been moved by another member of the House rather than by the minister himself. What has been done is, to me, very difficult to accept from a procedural standpoint. This is not an amendment which must be moved by the minister himself or seconded by another minister. I hope my suggestion will be taken into account and that the subamendment will be moved by another hon. member and seconded by another seconder. This having been said, I thank the hon. member for Yukon for raising the point. I think we should give the matter further thought.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, in order to help the consideration of this issue and to speed up discussion of this bill, I will be pleased to move the particular amendment referred to, seconded by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay).

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment to motion No. 13 (Mr. Lang) withdrawn.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That the motion of November 27, 1973, by Mr. Atkey to amend motion No. 13, a motion to amend Bill C-176, be amended by

a) adding after paragraph (a) of the substituted text the word "and",

b) striking the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) of the substituted text and substituting therefor the word "or", and

c) adding immediately after the word "that" in paragraph (c) of the substituted text the following: ", in the case of evidence, other than the private communication itself,"

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, for a minute I thought the minister would find difficulty on his own side of the House in getting support for the subamendment now before us. I can tell him that there is not much support for it on my side of the House. Indeed, having looked at it briefly it appears that the amendment moves the bill back to the position which it occupied before it went to committee after being read the second time. Hon. members will recall that when the bill was read the second time, in May, section 176.16 provided that direct evidence legally obtained would be excluded, but indirect evidence illegally obtained would be admitted in evidence at the subsequent trial. That is the effect of the minister's amendment.

When the bill was before the committee, the minister arranged for an amendment to be moved respecting legally obtained evidence. It was defeated resoundingly. That amendment had been proposed by a supporter of the minister's party and was based on the memorandum which the minister himself had prepared and circulated among members of the committee. Following that resounding defeat in committee, an amendment moved in my name carried by a vote of 5 to 11. It enjoyed the support of members of all parties present.

The minister, despite all our attempts to accommodate his difficulties with regard to motion No. 13—difficulties associated with defects in form and procedural irregularities—has come back to the House and, after all the fancy footwork he has done, has attempted to restore the bill to its original form. Indeed, without being technical, I suggest that the minister has gone back further; his position, as reflected in the bill, is further back than that reflected in the bill originally. I should like to explain myself. His position has receded with respect to direct evidence illegally obtained; in other words, with respect to the tape itself, the operation of which might be illegal. I gather that from reading the amendment. With regard to any direct evidence, the tape itself which is illegally obtained may be brought forward if the court, in the subsequent proceedings, finds it to be relevant. If the evidence was illegally obtained as a result of a technical defect or irregularity, then that direct evidence, although illegally obtained, can be brought into the subsequent trial.

Hon. members should realize that this provision was not in the original bill which the committee in its wisdom saw fit to amend. The minister, by fancy footwork—as I am sure hon. members realize—has amended an amendment of an amendment and has tried to do indirectly that which he was unable to achieve directly in committee. I am, therefore, most reluctant to support this attempt of the minister in trying to do that which he failed to do at an earlier time.

Mr. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I absolutely want to participate in this debate because of all the practical impacts which the motions of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) and of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) might have on the administration of justice and on detection and prevention of crime.

The bill we are dealing with today is naturally very important in many aspects and first because in our society, as demonstrated by recent events, no-one is safe from wiretapping. The bill clearly states by whom and under what circumstances wiretapping is possible. It is also important because it is an admission that at an age when crime has no frontiers and enjoys all technical facilities, it is essential that we allow to those whose foremost mission is to prevent crime and protect society the use of devices that will enable them to discharge their responsibilities efficiently and legally. Finally, this bill is important because it is an attempt to determine what has always been a problem in the field of criminal legislation—fair balance between the right of the individual not to have his privacy violated without justification and his right to be protected as he should be while not allowing crime to remain unpunished or allowing criminals to benefit from their destructive actions with impunity.

I would like to enlarge on this last aspect and speak on the amendment from the standpoint of admissibility or inadmissibility of illegally obtained evidence. Traditionnally our criminal law, derived in this connection from the British rules on evidence, recognized that evidence obtained illegally were not admissible for this reason alone, that the role of a court was to ferret out the truth, shed as much light as possible on truth so as to come to a conclusion with a full knowledge of the facts. In Canada, that has been the stand taken by the Supreme Court.

On the contrary, American jurisprudence puts forward the rule whereby evidence obtained by unlawful means is inadmissible. Such a rule, known as the rule of exclusion, was approved mainly because it was looked upon as a reliable deterrent against the use of unlawful means on the part of police forces: to recognize the admissibility of unlawfully obtained evidence is, in a way, to support a breach of the law by people who should be the first to have respect for it. That is what the American Supreme Court stated in the case Mapp v. Ohio, in 1961.

That American position, even though sternly criticized throughout the years, remained the same. I very humbly point out, Mr. Speaker, that the mistake here is precisely the wish to correct a situation that is deplorable, I admit it, by changing some rules concerning evidence. This bill already provides a penalty for the unlawful use of bugging devices, namely imprisonment or a $5,000 fine. There will never be any effective penalty against that offence. The Americans excluded the evidence, but the outcome was not the one they hoped for: to prevent unlawful evidence from being actually obtained. People acting in such a way should be punished. To have the underworld benefit from it, as was suggested by several members of the Progressive Conservative party, and which was indeed experienced by the Americans, is not a desirable thing, Mr. Speaker.

It was precisely in order to correct such a situation that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) moved an amendment allowing the judge to decide, considering all circumstances, whether unlawfully obtained evidence should nevertheless be admissible. For it must be recognized, the fact that evidence can be considered illegal can be the result of a simple technical error, and moreover, that is what the hon. member for St. Paul's has finally admitted last night.

The opposite would penalize society and put the courts in an extremely difficult position, in the case where, for example, a serious crime has been committed, the only available evidence, the interception of communication, would be inadmissible. What really matters, Mr. Speaker, is to throw the light on a case, to find the truth about what happened and to determine who is innocent and who is guilty. If a situation were created such that this prime duty of justice is impeded by various technicalities enabling a criminal to go scot-free, then justice would be unable to play its role.

With regard to electronic eavesdropping, I recognize that, in the past, too often it was practised without any restriction whatever and that, as a rule, to be accepted as proof, any communication should have been intercepted legally. The act states specifically in which circumstances electronic eavesdropping is allowed, and it is imperative that policemen respect the act. I would therefore ask all my colleagues to avoid creating a situation that would favour the criminals, as is the case in the U.S.A.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is imperative not to adopt the American rule whereby proofs obtained illegally are excluded but rather to allow the court, as suggested by the Minister of Justice, to decide on its admissibility because it is pertinent and thus allow justice to be done.

The Minister of Justice quoted a decision made by the distinguished Justice Cordozo about forty years ago. I believe that this quote should be repeated since it shows clearly what would be the result of passing even part of the exclusion rule implemented in the United States. Justice Cordozo said about this case:

[English]

The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered. . . . A room is searched against the law, and the body of a murdered man is found. . . . The privacy of the home has been infringed, and the murderer goes free.

[Translation]

The solution to the problem of illegal wiretapping should not benefit the criminal. The sanction should concern the person guilty of illegal wiretapping. This approach of the government is consistent with our traditions and we should maintain it because of the significant protection which this bill gives the citizens by defining specific conditions for wiretapping.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be fair to say that the members of the New Democratic Party oppose the motion of the minister, the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) and the subamendment of the minister. I have found in this debate—I have said this before—that although the minister is very competent, he is very rigid. He seems to think that if there is agreement, we are all acting impartially; but if there is disagreement with the minister, we are acting in a partisan way. That just is not so.

If you review what has happened with regard to this particular section of the bill, you will see that on second reading there was a clear indication by members of the Progressive Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party that we opposed this particular clause. The bill went to committee. There the hon. member for St. Paul's was instrumental in bringing forward an amendment which was accepted on a vote of 11 to 5. That does not seem to satisfy the minister. He is now attempting to do indirectly what he could not do directly in the committee. If he had had his way in the committee, all evidence, whether direct or indirect, legal or illegal, would be admissible in court.

We feel this is a question of principle. The amendment in committee was very clear and should be accepted. If we accept the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. Paul's in committee, we would be following the American law and we would probably be accepting the direction in which the English courts are going on this principle. I recall reading a publication by Professor Stanley Beck in regard to wiretapping. He said that one of the most salutary directions you can give the police is that any evidence, whether direct or indirect, obtained illegally shall not be admissible. I think this is the basic principle on which we should operate.

This was the thrust of the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's. It is rather unfortunate that the hon. member for St. Paul's brought forth an amendment to the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), because he has clouded the issue. However, I can appreciate the reason he did so; he is attempting to get certain members within his party to accept his amendment rather than accept the motion of the minister. What the hon. member is really doing is opening the door and confusing the issue. What the minister is doing in his subamendment is turning full circle and going right back to the original position that he took in the bill. The members of the New Democratic Party oppose this, and we oppose it very strenuously.

In his argument the minister said that one of the reasons he opposed the amendment that passed in the committee was that it would cause delays in the courts. Just from my own experience in court I would say I think the minister is probably proceeding on a wrong assumption. I think he is overstating the case in regard to delay. There are delays regarding confessions in court, because we have a voir dire to determine whether a statement will be admissible on a voluntary basis. If there is any evidence that the statement was obtained by force or threat or promise, then the statement is not admissible.

I do not see the same type of problem in regard to wiretaps. What I see happening is that Crown counsel will present the authorization for the wiretap at the commencement of the trial, and at that time defence counsel would have to raise any objection he had to its validity. Both from your own experience, Mr. Speaker, and from mine we know that once the authorization is tendered it is the same as tendering a by-law in a case or tendering a certificate of analysis in a narcotics case. I just do not see any real delay there.

I think we should be in the forefront in regard to protecting the liberties and privacy of all Canadians. I do not think we should get ourselves into any worse position than our friends in the States and the possible trend that will occur in England. As the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) said, and said very strongly and persuasively, administration of the law does not stop at the court door. It starts when a person is apprehended for the commission of an offence and ends when that person is reintegrated back into the community. We have to operate on the basis of faith and on the basis that the administration of justice will be fair at all times. This type of amendment will not lend itself to that approach; it will create ill-feeling between an accused and the Crown, between the police and the community, which is not the type of relationship that we want if the final solution is the reintegration of an accused back into society.

We have had some experience in the matter of search warrants. In many cases the police enter a house without a search warrant although they know they should have one. They take the law into their own hands and take their chances. I have the feeling that the same will happen in regard to wiretapping. Many policemen will be very zealous in the performance of their duties, will take the law into their own hands and act accordingly, and in many cases illegally.

Therefore, we in the New Democratic Party feel that all the safeguards that can be obtained should be obtained, and these should be set forth in the bill. We were rather proud of the amendment set forth by the hon. member for St. Paul's in the committee, which was very simple, very clear and very understandable in law, to the effect that any evidence, whether direct or indirect, obtained by illegal means shall not be admissible.

What the minister has done in his motion, what the hon. member for St. Paul's has unfortunately done in his amendment, and what the minister has done in his subamendment, will not help to make the law clear, precise and understandable. For this reason and for the other reasons I have stated, we in the New Democratic Party will oppose all three.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there was a time when my rising in my place in this chamber to raise the question of wiretapping was greeted with a good deal of scorn by hon. members opposite. I recall their scoffing, their jeering, when in 1963 and 1964 I attempted to alert the members of the House of Commons to the fact that certain members' telephones were being bugged or tapped. I was almost laughed out of this place. There was another member who was alert to the danger at the time, and he is still with us; I refer to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who also raised this matter at the same time as I did. Indeed, I think he raised it first.

Since that time I have periodically raised the matter in the House of Commons, and each time members opposite have jeered and made all sorts of attemps to belittle and to put down the danger that is inherent in electronic interception and electronic intrusion. Indeed, the venerable fourth estate is not free from criticism in this regard, because they too entertained quite a doubt as to the validity of the questions I was raising on those occasions.

Now all of a sudden, since the Watergate affair has arisen in the United States, the question becomes respectable. Now when any member stands in his place and discusses his fear of surreptitious bugging, it is a respectable subject—and I am grateful for that. It is even a respectable subject for the fourth estate to speak about now. No longer am I pictured as an alarmist. No longer are articles written asking me to come forward with proof that these things are happening. The fact that they are happening is now accepted, accepted by reason of events south of the border. So even out of that untidy mess down there some good has come, in that we are now seeing the serious fashion with which the members of the House are tackling this subject.

The fact is that a remote-controlled amplifier and microphone no larger than the head of a pin can capture a conversation and transmit it by wire for a distance of 25 miles. A parabolic microphone without wires or radio transmitter can catch the conversation of people in a boat in mid-lake and record it on shore. The switching of a single wire can convert any telephone in Canada into a live microphone conducting sound, even when the telephone is in its cradle. Cameras the size of a cigarette can photograph a room two blocks away by moonlight. Infrared light techniques permit a room to be watched and photographed from an adjoining room through apparently opaque walls, while wall microphones, of course, can hear and record anything said in such a room. Radio pills substituted for the subject's aspirins and lodged in his stomach can transform him into a living electronic beacon. The investigator's dream—making his subject a walking transmitter and enabling the investigator to hear everything the subject says to anybody else, or even what he mutters to himself—can be realized by the wiring of a person's clothing.

The electronic pill in the stomach of people is nothing new, although this must play havoc with the digestive operation of the subject. There are transmitters so small that they can be mounted as a tooth in a dental bridge.

The corollary to all this, as revealed in testimony before the House of Commons Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, is that our telephone can be tapped, our office bugged, our files photographed, our physical movements monitored, our communications recorded—all this without our knowing anything about it or having any right of recourse or any protection in law. The Orwellian society of 1984 may be here already. The open society has become the bugged society. The struggle for freedom is being mortgaged to the parabolic microphone. The zones of solitude are being occupied. There are no more sanctuaries. The erosion of privacy is the beginning of the end of freedom.

Those are not my words, Sir, they are the words of the minister of justice who preceded the minister who now holds that portfolio. They are the words of the now Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in a speech he made in September, 1969, to the Canadian Bar Association's annual meeting in Ottawa.

Mr. Peters: It sure isn't the present minister.

Mr. Nielsen: No, it certainly was not the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). If you will permit me to finish one additional quotation from the speech of the minister, he went on to say:

> But this is not all. The right to privacy goes not only to the core of our being as individuals, but to the core of our collective being as a society. John Stuart Mill wrote that "The worth of a state in the long run is the worth of the individuals composing it." A state that demeans its citizens demeans itself; a society that mocks the privacy of individuals mocks itself.

I could not endorse more that kind of approach. When I look at this bill and compare it with what that minister had to say on that occasion, I find very little resemblance to what is being attempted now and to the general philosophy that was stated, quite properly and so well, by the minister of justice in 1969.

The minister has made quite a case on the particular clause being considered by way of amendment, amendment and amendment; but I think that case is a weak one. I am not familiar with the minister's background and the extent to which he has actually practised law. He has disappointed me on previous occasions in this House in his capacity as Minister of Justice coming, as he does, from a law school which I know has turned out many noted barristers in the country. I well recall, for instance, his defence of payments illegally being withheld under wheat legislation and his attempt to build a case to support that illegality. He has sounded in this debate exactly the same as he sounded then.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister has a very weak case and he is trying desperately to shore it up, but as a former professor of law he should know he cannot succeed. He wanted, in the bill in its original form, the illegality that evidence be accepted in court if it met only two tests—one as to relevancy and one as to justice being done. I cannot bring myself to vote for a law which will come out of this place that will make legal that which is illegal. Let me put it in the converse: I cannot vote for something that sanctions illegality, and that is essentially the position being taken on this side of the House.

Mr. Fairweather: It not only sanctions it, it puts a premium on it.

Mr. Nielsen: As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) suggests, this involves not only the question of sanctioning an illegality but it puts a premium on that illegality, which is even worse. The minister feels that the police forces of the country will somehow be restricted or circumscribed in their investigatory process if we do not go along with sanctioning illegality. I cannot accept that. From my experience, the police would have no difficulty in operating under a law which required an order of a judge to permit this kind of electronic intrusion into the privacy of individuals. I cannot think of a single instance in which the police would be inconvenienced by being required to obtain an order of a judge in order to take advantage of the provisions permitting electronic activity by the police.

What is far more important, Sir, is the fact that there will be judicial control exercised in this whole area. The section as it was originally in the bill, and as it would have been restored—and then some—by the minister's motion to amend, would do away with the requirements of obtaining judicial sanction for this kind of activity. If that occurred it would be a foot in the door toward a police state, as far as I am concerned. I do not want any of my remarks taken in any way as suggesting there has been overzealous activity on the part of police forces in this country, or that I am somehow red-necked or bigoted about the functions of our police forces. That does not go with my background. My background has been very closely associated with police activity, starting with my father. However, I do say it is simply bad, in terms of philosophy, to permit uncontrolled police activity, and the best form of control we can exercise in instances such as this is control by the judiciary. After all, that is why the judiciary exists.

A great case has been attempted by the minister to the effect that sometimes there are urgent situations when a judge cannot be found in order to get the necessary order. I do not buy that. Contrary to some figures which have been stated in the House—and I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested there were 600 judges in the country—allow me to suggest that there are 600 judges in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec alone. For the whole of the country a more accurate figure might be closer to 900 judges who would be authorized under this legislation to grant the kind of order required.

Nor do I go along with those who advocate that all they should have to do is go to a judge, say they want an order and get it. In my view, in all instances where applications are made for wiretapping they should be supported by sworn assertions or applications complying with the requirements set forth in the legislation. That imposes no limitation and no restriction on police activities. In matters in which I have been associated with Crown prosecutions, search warrants have been obtained in the dead of night and in the early hours of the morning—but always supported by the sworn statement of the applicant that there was reasonable or probable ground to believe the crime would be committed, had been committed, and so on. That does not inconvenience the police force or the court one iota.

In my practice, which might be a little unusual having regard to the nature of the country I represent in this parliament, I have made a chambers' application before a judge who was out fishing 200 miles from nowhere. I have obtained injunctions over the telephone on applications properly supported by sworn affidavits. If these things are possible, and they are possible, there is no reason for opening the door as widely as the minister would wish, thereby creating the possibility of abuse. I say that every possibility of abuse exists, and therein lies the danger.

In my submission, we should make it reasonably easy for police officers and police forces in the country to obtain the kind of permission this bill would seek to give them; but at the same time we want some kind of control exercised over the granting of that facility. There has been a great deal of time devoted in this debate to the question of the admission of direct and indirect evidence in trials where that evidence has been obtained by a wiretap which has been installed without a judge's order. That, Sir, I cannot accept at all. I know there is the argument that this kind of evidence comes under the simple relevancy rule now, so that if a police officer or officers exercise powers without a search warrant, or under a search warrant that is deficient, notwithstanding that they have obtained evidence illegally that evidence is admissible at a trial at the present time. But we should not be extending that kind of principle. I disagree with the minister when he says that the principle is the same. We should not be extending that kind of principle to legislation such as this.

I have had personal experience where, for instance, officials of the Department of National Revenue have backed up a two-ton stake truck to the door of the office of a lawyer in my riding and have carted away all his files and his safe in order to examine them. Another example, which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) raised in this House as well as myself, was the case in which officials of the Department of National Defence together with the RCMP swooped down on a sleepy alpine village in northern British Columbia and invaded the privacy of well over 20 homes, all without a writ of assistance. With that kind of power there seems to be little need for electronic surveillance to be permitted in cases, for instance, under the Income Tax Act which would be permitted without the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey).

Yesterday the minister used a very interesting phrase. Perhaps it was a quotation he was using. He said that it is not a game where liberty triumphs when the police are defeated. I agree with that, but it seems to me to be a little inflammatory in a debate such as this, because that sort of a cliché can be reversed and be just as true. There is something else I wish to mention with regard to evidence illegally obtained. It has to do with the Crown's prerogative in the prosecution of all cases. It is in the interest of justice—this appears in all legal textbooks—that the Crown in prosecuting a criminal case should place all evidence before the court whether that evidence is for or against an accused person. However, in my experience, and I have been involved on both sides of the fence in the courts, the Crown does not follow that precept. What the Crown in fact does is to introduce the degree of evidence sufficient to obtain a conviction, and goes no further. Even if one could find the fairest of all Crown counsel, the experience on my part at any rate has been that the police, when they place a case before Crown counsel, often leave out evidence which they genuinely do not believe to be of importance in obtaining a conviction. So there is no guarantee that evidence obtained by wiretap will suffer any better fate.

The minister says that the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's is narrow. He compared the wiretapping situation with the search warrant situation. In my opinion they are not the same at all. The minister made a great pitch about the fishing expedition which could be embarked upon by defence counsel.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue his remarks with the consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I have just two more points to make, Mr. Speaker. The first has to do with the remarks of the minister concerning fishing expeditions by defence counsel. I agree with the member of the New Democratic Party who resumed his seat just before I rose: it is a very simple matter, and all counsel has to do is either object at the time the attempt is made to introduce this king of evidence by the Crown, and it is normally introduced at that portion of the trial in any event and would not be held over—

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Lang: Fishing with regard to any evidence.

Mr. Nielsen: Fine. The minister concedes the point I was about to make in respect of introducing the wiretap evidence at the Crown stage of the case. The minister referred to any evidence at all. Let me deal with that. Only one question need be asked once this bill becomes law and that is: Was the evidence or the conversation, whatever it might be, obtained pursuant to the provisions of this legislation? That is all that has to be asked and the police officer or whoever else it might be has to say either yes or no. If he says yes, it is all admissible. If he says no, then you embark upon a course of questioning to establish whether or not the evidence was obtained properly; and if it was not, it should not be admitted.

I see it as being that simple, at any rate. You would do this in the same way you would test a certificate of access either in a narcotics case, in a case of impaired driving or whatever. I see the minister shakes his head. However, that is my view of it. I have yet to be convinced by his arguments, as obviously he has yet to be convinced by mine. It is far better to let defence counsel go on fishing expeditions than have an unbridled licence to law enforcement agencies and others to go on fishing expeditions on the private telephone lines of citizens. That is what would happen, because we are not simply speaking here about police officers or about peace officers; we are speaking about the enforcement provisions in all sorts of other statutes.

The last point that I want to make is by way of a warning once again. I placed a series of questions on the parliamentary order paper some time before July. The one to which I shall refer is question No. 1849. Those questions were answered in Hansard of July 11, 1973. These were questions that I placed on the order paper with respect to the activities of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group which comes under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). Paragraph (d) of question No. 26 was as follows:

> (d) has the Security Advisory Committee considered or developed a scheme (under Defence Research Board Shirley's Bay) to utilize the central telephone system in Ottawa to keep under surveillance in Ottawa and, if so, was this done at the suggestion of Col. Dabros of the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group, formerly the Security Planning and Research Group.

I do not believe that establishment is any longer at Shirley's Bay, and only in that respect might the question be relevant. The simple answer to that question, if it was not being done, should have been a resounding and emphatic no. But the answer to it, at page 5501 of Hansard for that day, is:

> It is not considered in the public interest for reasons of national security to disclose the details of security and intelligence activities.

By that negative answer every Canadian, certainly in the Ottawa area, has cause to wonder whether the inference which is inherent in the question is in fact the case. If it is not being done, and if no such plan is ready to be set in motion, then there should be at once an immediate and emphatic denial by the government. That denial has not been forthcoming and in my view it should, otherwise no one in the Ottawa area can rest easy that his telephone is not being kept under surveillance.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the debate. I am particularly interested in the amendment and the subamendment, specifically in the amendment that was put forward in the committee and the decision that was made on that amendment. I was also interested in particular to watch the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) when the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) asked him whether he would not apply the normal criteria for admissible evidence.

I think the hon. member for Yukon used the analytic reports and the chemical analysis reports, one affecting drunken driving and the other affecting forensic medicine laboratory tests. The minister shook his head. I presume he has a new set of regulations that he will bring out to establish whether or not there is legality or illegality. I was surprised to hear the remarks he made on the amendment when he pointed out that if, for instance, it was a case of murder and by legal or illegal eavesdropping in the course of some other operation evidence was obtained without any justification under the law, it would be accepted. I gather from my reading of his interpretation of what is legal that he probably put security police in private agencies such as Pinkerton's in the same category.

I listened with interest also to the speech of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), which I think demonstrated the thinking of the Liberal Party with regard to law an order. There is a total and unique phobia in the province of Quebec, which results probably from their civil law and which was probably created by the Liberal Party that the police cannot be wrong, that everyone is guilty until proven innocent and that whatever the police may do, they are right. The thinking of the people in the province of Quebec in that respect is disastrous. They disregard their individual rights and freedoms and I am shocked by the way they are willing to give them up. Thank God the Anglo-Saxons in this country do not have the same qualms about standing up for their individual rights.

It was mentioned the other day, in an exposé which turned out very well for justice, that 137 policemen in their three ton trucks, with tarpaulin on top, arrived at the basement of a hotel. They included provincial and town cops—every cop they could pick up in the area—and they swore in the deputies as well. The indication is that they had made a number of arrests, supposedly on marijuana charges. Three of the ten people who were arrested there and who were found in the pub were charged with drinking under age, which of course leaves seven who perhaps were smoking pot and perhaps were not.

So there were seven innocent people sitting in the beer parlour, and 137 policemen raided the place. Good God, there must be something wrong with society and something wrong with intelligence and the sense of justice in this country. Does the judge give out so many warrants that policemen can raid a place on marijuana charges in that way? No wonder the minister thinks it is all right to obtain illegal evidence. He would be agreeable to anything.

I suggest that if after the next election the university board of directors considered the minister for the position of dean of the university from which he came, and listened to any of the remarks made by his peers, it is doubtful that he would even be considered for the position of janitor in that institution.

An hon. Member: What about a county court judge?

Mr. Peters: I suppose that politicians can always be appointed county court judges. There are probably 10,000 of them in Canada, and this is one of the problems. You can get a warrant for anything, from anybody, at any time. I suppose that even security branches that are not directly connected with the government can obtain warrants, if they wish, from some judges.

An interesting thing happened in Ottawa last Friday night, fairly close to home. It concerns what the police do, how they do it and whether or not they bother with the legality of wiretapping or whether they try to find, as the minister says, some evidence from their investigation that will warrant the use of wiretapping for which there is no legal justification. As you know, Mr. Speaker, a large percentage of the protective staff in this building are veterans. Most of them served overseas. If you look around this building you will see all of the protective staff wearing ribbons that set them apart from most Canadians.

Last week a member of the protective staff received a phone call from his wife. She was hysterical. A Mounted Policeman had walked into her bathroom while she was taking a bath, walked over to her, did not show her a warrant—warrants are not of too much importance to the Mounted Police—only showed her his badge and told her to get out of the tub. She told him to get the hell out of there, that she didn't have to get out of the tub. He ordered her out again, and then the RCMP searched through the apartment and dumped all the medicine pills out on the floor. She had a little bottle of black beans that she was going to plant, and they dumped them on the floor. They took the buttons out of the button bag. I went to the place later and looked through the apartment, Mr. Speaker. They had dumped all kinds of stuff into cooking utensils. They had cleaned out the refrigerator and shifted everything from its proper place.

When this lady protested to the officer, he kept insulting her and telling her to mind her own business. He asked her, "Where does your husband work?" She told him her husband was on the protective staff of the House of Commons. He then said he hadn't asked her what her husband did, only where he worked. I made inquiries from the narcotics squad and found out that that night there was a big raid going in Ottawa. I suppose that, like the traffic cops, they have to appear to be doing something. I should mention that the building containing the apartment is owned by Mr. Assaly, a very influential man in Ottawa. I am not aware whether or not Mr. Assaly runs the hashish operation in Ottawa, or whether the RCMP think Mr. Assaly runs the hashish operation, but they did have a warrant for one apartment in the building.

The warrant was not for the apartment in which this lady lives, nor for the other apartment in that building which is presently occupied. I might add that the building itself is going to be torn down very shortly. The warrant they had was for a basement apartment, and the RCMP broke into it. They also took their dog into the apartment, and it cleaned up on the cat's food. Of course they have the dog to smell around the place. It's a very nice dog. Since then I have met him. As I say, he's a nice dog, but hungry.

Mr. Speaker, this woman was insulted; she was assaulted. There was absolutely no justification and no excuse for that. In my opinion there was no excuse for that warrant to be issued. If they want to go after Mr. Assaly they should make out the warrant in his name, go to his home and go after him. As I say, maybe the police believe he runs the narcotics operation in Ottawa. They may even believe that one of our protective staff runs it. But, if they do, they should have got a warrant for his apartment.

The apartment in the basement which they broke into had had nobody living in it for two months. I presume they must not have been following the case that closely. To the Minister of Justice and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), if anything had been found in this lady's apartment, illegally or not, I suppose it would not make any difference. That would prove the case so far as they were concerned. But I suggest that is going to the extreme. I gather that the police were raiding throughout the Hull-Ottawa area that night. As a matter of fact, it was very hard for me to get hold of anybody in charge of the raid. I finally had to find them in Hull. Whether they drink coffee there, or whatever the arrangement is, I don't know. Anyway, it appeared to be a very big operation. Maybe they do this every week. But if the Minister of Justice is right in what he says, then every member of this House had better think about what the hon. member for the Yukon said a few moments ago when he asked if the total telephone structure of the city of Ottawa was being tapped, and the answer was, "We cannot tell you for security reasons."

I suggest that the police on their marijuana raids should start at the edge of the city and go through every house as they come to it. They could have a judge with them in a car and have him write out a search warrant after they have found something in a house. Better still, the Minister of Justice should be honest with this House and tell us that all he needs is a writ of assistance, instead of this legislation, that can be supplied to all his agents throughout the country so that raids can be made any time at all. If that were done, then I am as sure as I am that I am standing here that we would enforce law and order. In fact we would have a gestapo. We would have a nazi regime. This would be a fascist state. I am also sure there would be less crime and that criminals would be punished much more speedily. But, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that not one member of this House wants that to happen, yet every member of the House knows of instances where it does happen.

When this happens, what are people to do? Does this particular person have to go out and hire a criminal lawyer and lay charges of assault and maybe even of battery against the police? I may say that this was a fellow by the name of Kruger. Somebody asked me what I would have done. I said I would have had Constable Kruger immediately on his way to the Arctic, to Inuvik or somewhere like that, and stick him there. And I would see that he remained there, if I were his superior.

Certainly we can have law and order, Mr. Speaker. But some hon. members seem to believe that this simply means arresting a lot of people, convicting a lot of people and putting a lot of people in jail. We already have more people in jail in Canada than many civilized countries of the world.

Mr. Nielsen: And they are getting out quickly.

Mr. Peters: No, they are not getting out; they are escaping. They get on top of each other; they make a pyramid of themselves to reach the top of the prison wall, simply because the place is so crowded. When he is asked about escapes, all the Solicitor General does is tell us that we have bought another piece of land, that we are going to put up another prison building and that will solve the problem.

As I say, we can use law and order in this country. But if we abuse law and order there is always a response, and I suggest the time is coming shortly for that response. This particular gentleman whose wife was insulted and assaulted did not make any bones about it—that if he had been home he would have shot the guy. I suggested to him that he do it in self-defence, to make sure the guy was coming in when he shot, rather than going out, because it is a little easier to prove self-defence if the guy was hit in the front rather than in the back.

I still believe laws have to be obeyed, Mr. Speaker, but I do not believe any person can walk into your house and search it without a warrant. And I do not believe such a warrant should be easily obtained. If the police come to my house with a search warrant for marijuana, they don't have the right to go through the house, find an unregistered firearm and charge me with that offence. If they are looking for marijuana, they don't have to go through my refrigerator. I don't know much about marijuana these days—maybe that is where you keep marijuana—but the police certainly do not have to dump all kinds of medicine pills out on the floor and empty the aspirin bottle to see whether there is marijuana in it. Marijuana, so far as I know, is grass. It does not look like pills. At least this guy should have known what he was looking for, and I really do not know why he had to do a full examination of the lady. I do not believe he was providing any gratuitous medical information to her. This was an insult to the man and an insult to the people, and it is an insult to me, Mr. Speaker. It should be an insult to every Canadian unless you believe your police forces should be a gestapo. If you do, the rules can go out the window.

As I understand it, two or three people used to make all the decisions for the gestapo and there were no difficulties at all. The courts and justice were very quick. We do not think that way, yet the minister is suggesting in this instance that if you get illegal evidence and that illegal evidence is worth while, no matter how you came by it, then you have a case. He is saying that the end justifies the means. That is what justice was saying when they invaded the Assaly apartments in Ottawa, that the end justifies the means. Maybe that is a form of harassment and maybe the minister agrees that it is.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that any minister of justice who does not believe in justice, who believes that illegality warrants whatever action was taken in that illegality and that the fruits of that illegality are acceptable, is a disgrace to this country—an outright disgrace, and I am ashamed of him, I am ashamed of the actions of some of the police, I am ashamed of an area and I am ashamed of a newspaper like the Brantford Expositor that comments favourably on the fact that 137 men in uniform made a raid on a place that contained ten people, that ten arrests were made, seven of them kids under the age to be in that establishment for drinking purposes.

Mr. Speaker, some members of this House were very proud of the 400 arrests made in the province of Quebec. They said it should happen, and were very proud of the fact that they passed legislation that did not allow them the full benefit of the law, that did not allow most of them even to be charged. To my knowledge there were no convictions in any of those arrests. Only seven or eight charges were laid in 700 or so cases. The people of Quebec should look at this; I am thinking particularly of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert.

Mr. Stanfield: She is worth looking at.

Mr. Peters: Leaving aside all the other problems, if they think they have a problem they should look at the city of Toronto. Their problem was not really that startling. They should look at this, Mr. Speaker, because they agreed to it. They agreed that you waive the law, that the law does not apply to police, that the law does not apply to the state, the law does not become effective; the only thing that becomes effective is justice appearing to be done and that justice should appear to be done where you have proved the case, whether there was any case at all in the first place or whether or not it was even your intention to establish a case.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this subamendment fits into exactly that kind of feeling, where you allow not only the police but any agency to obtain illegal information and you allow a judge to look at that information and make the decision on whether it has any bearing on a conviction that may be obtained. Then it is said that not only will the evidence be available, but that we will accept the tape as material evidence. The minister does not put in any protection to say that the person who obtained that illegal evidence is not excused from having committed a crime, but that he will go to jail for a five-year period. He forgets about the illegality of the collection of the evidence and says that under certain circumstances this evidence will be accepted.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure other hon. members are, but not all of them are prepared to do something about it. The Liberal member representing the particular person that I spoke about when the problem was brought to his attention said, "Don't bother me about this; I am not interested." Mr. Speaker, some are not, but I am sure most members of parliament are interested in providing law and order for the Canadian people and in seeing not only that the people have law and order but that law and order is demonstrated in a way that appears to be just for all. This kind of amendment is a disgrace and a continuation of some of the practices of this government over a period of years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow my esteemed colleague, but I should like to say another word or two about the subamendment which is now before us. When this subamendment, now in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), was first proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) I defended its procedural admissibility. But I indicated then, as my colleague the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has indicated since, that we do not like it at all.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is one of those cases where amongst other things one has to look at the little two- and three-letter words, words like "or" and "and". As we have indicated, we do not approve at all of the effort of the Minister of Justice to re-establish the admissibility of indirect evidence or, as we prefer to call it, evidence illegally obtained. I recognize that the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) did try to improve the effort of the Minister of Justice by adding to the conditions under which such evidence might be admitted.

A significant thing about the amendment of the hon. member for St. Paul's is that he strings together his three conditions by the use of the word "and". In other words, such evidence can be admitted only if it meets all three of the conditions, namely, being relative, being inadmissible only for technical reasons and being the kind of evidence that if it is not to be admitted might seem to cause justice not to be done. All that the Minister of Justice has done, really, is to take out one of those "ands" and put in an "or". Just a little change.

Mr. Atkey: It changed the whole thing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A two-letter word instead of a three-letter word—but the result, if the minister's subamendment carries, is that this kind of evidence can be admitted if the first two conditions are met by themselves or if the third condition is met by itself. It seems to me that putting it that way, the minister is asking for the door to be opened wide. Therefore we are completely opposed to the subamendment moved by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to see the Hansard debates correct, and I am referring to the debates that occured on November 22, 1973, at page 8067. During the debate I had indicated that there was a report from Quebec that two more lawyers had been bugged and wiretapped. There was an interjection from the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) indicating to the House that this was not by the police. I think the record should show what is correct, because in today's Montreal Gazette the first page carries the headline "Police bugged lawyers' offices" and the article reads:

> Electronic bugs found in the offices of two Montreal lawyers last week were planted there by police officers, Justice Minister Jerome Choquette admitted yesterday.
> Choquette told the national assembly that members of Quebec's special organized crime squad had spied on the lawyers' offices for more than two weeks last February.

● (1710)

I think the record of the debate should be correct and should show that there has been extensive police wiretapping of lawyers' offices.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member should have risen and asked for permission to make a speech. I do not think he has raised a point of order. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The question is on the subamendment to motion No. 13 moved by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the wish of the House to defer the vote?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed amendment stands deferred.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I think it would be agreeable if we were to return to motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey), and motion No. 3, standing in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it agreed that we return to the consideration of motion No. 2, as suggested by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the parliamentary secretary rising to speak to motion No. 2?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I could use the extra $4,000 and would be prepared to work hard. Perhaps Your Honour knows something that I do not know.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

I am speaking to motion No. 2. I think it is fair to say that the definition section of the bill, particularly that part of the definition section relating to offences, has caused difficulties. It is fair to say that the minister and the department have experienced difficulty in arriving at an appropriate definition of "offence". The department originally suggested that "offence" as included in this bill should be limited to indictable offences. It was the intention of the minister and of the department, I am sure, to include the more serious offences in the definition section and that is why indictable offences were considered.

As has been explained to the House, it is not necessarily correct to say that wiretapping can be undertaken only where there is a serious indictable offence. For example, someone who has a grudge might seek permission to wiretap an individual that may have been charged with drunk driving or some other offence to be revenged on the accused and lead to his conviction.

Recognizing the catch-all provision, if you will, of the definition section in the bill, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) properly endeavoured, in the spirit in which the minister and the department were acting, to group by way of amendment the offences with respect to which wiretapping could be undertaken. The offences listed are the only offences for which wiretapping could be undertaken. They are the only offences which would be considered when an application is made. That is the kind of precision which is needed in any definition section.

Following the efforts of the hon. member for St. Paul's in this regard, I believe the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) indicated some of the difficulties which might arise in cataloguing very carefully each and every offence, inasmuch as one might leave some offences out. Further, in categorizing offences it is possible that offences might be included which should not in the view of the House be included.

Recognizing this, Mr. Speaker, members on both sides of the House have endeavoured to work out a compromise. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has more than once said that the strength of this chamber lies in its ability to solve problems which cross party lines. One of our strengths is that we can get together and work out a compromise which, although it may be criticized and may not be acceptable to everybody in the House, represents a sincere effort and good will on the part of members on all sides. In that way it is often possible to do that which seemed impossible at the outset. We do not run into a situation in which one can say some are all right and some are all wrong. We compromise. Our positions are not all black and not all white. An accommodation is reached by members on both sides of the House.

I thank the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) for being good enough to look over a proposed amendment and for making many recommendations for deletions and additions. It is on that basis that I will be moving an amendment to the motion proposed by the hon. member for St.

Paul's. In considering the matter, it is important for hon. members not to lose sight of the fact that despite all the exceptions this bill, basically, is a bill to prevent wiretapping. I think everyone in the House agrees with that. Heated debate has been generated by the exceptions that are included in the bill and about the conditions under which wiretapping should be carried out. Nevertheless, we should not in this debate lose sight of the fact that the main purpose of the bill is to prevent wiretapping.

On that basis, and not wishing to belabour the point, I move:

That motion No. 2 to amend Bill C-176, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended by deleting the quoted text therein and substituting the following:

"offence" means an offence contrary to or any conspiracy or attempt to commit or being accesssory after the fact in relation to sections 47, 51, 52, 58, 62, 76.1, 76.2, 76.3, 78, 79, 80, 108, 109, 110, 121, 178.11, 178.18, 218, 247, 281.1, 303, 305, 306, 312, 314, 325, 326, 331, 338, 339, 383, 389, 407, 408, 410, paragraph 186(1)(e) and paragraph 294(a); sections 4 and 5 of the Narcotic Control Act; sections 34 and 42 of the Food and Drugs Act; section 192 of the Customs Act; unlawful distillation, selling, offering to sell or purchasing of spirits contrary to section 158 and 163 of the Excise Act; or any other indictable offence in respect of which there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe that it forms a pattern of similar or related offences by two or more persons acting in concert, and that such pattern is part of the activities of organized crime.

Mr. Peters: You are trying to get rid of the bootleggers in your area.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I have copies of the motion, in both official languages, for the benefit of Hansard. I heard the comment about bootlegging in my riding. That has never been a problem, although I suggest in earlier days we were known in my area as great rum runners. That activity has been cleaned up owing to very effective and efficient police service.

An hon. Member: Did you drink any rum?

Mr. Cullen: I was not there at that time to drink any. All my drinks came out of a milk bottle.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member sits down, as it is very difficult to know what these offences are simply by referring to sections, could he say what they are? Those of us who were not participants in the discussion concerning this compromise have no idea what we are agreeing to.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I think the point of the right hon. gentleman is valid. I do not wish to labour it, but I did speak to two or three members of his party and also to members of other parties and we went over each and every section. I will be very happy to quickly run down these sections—maybe not all, because they are quite lengthy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Otherwise the record will not mean anything.

Mr. Cullen: The sections I have referred to deal with treason, intimidating parliament or a legislature, sabotage, forgery of or uttering a forged passport, sedition, hijacking of aircraft, endangering safety of aircraft in flight and rendering aircraft incapable of flight, taking offensive weapons and explosives on aircraft, breach of duty in relation to explosive substances, causing injury with intent by use of explosives, possessing explosives without lawful excuse, bribery of judicial officers, MPs or MLAs, bribery of peace officers, public officers, etc., frauds upon the government, perjury, unlawful electronic surveillance, unlawful possession of electronic eavesdropping equipment, bookmaking, murder, kidnapping, forcible confinement or abduction, advocating genocide, theft over $200, robbery, extortion, breaking and entering, having in possession property obtained by crime, theft from the mails, forgery, uttering forged documents, threatening letters and telephone calls, fraud and fraudulently affecting the public market price of stocks, using mails to defraud, corrupt secret commissions, arson, making counterfeit money, possession of counterfeit money and uttering counterfeit money. Those are the sections referred to in the Code.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What else is there?

Mr. Cullen: There are many more. This list, I might say, was gone over very thoroughly. There are quite a few others which we deleted as a result of representations made by the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) is quite correct in suggesting that this amendment has been arrived at in a spirit of compromise. Perhaps Your Honour will forgive me if I gloat a bit when I say that this amendment represents, at long last, an acceptance by this government of the principle that offences must be specifically listed in the act. Until this amendment was brought forward there was no indication from the government that there was any acceptance of that principle. I regard this as an important victory for the establishment of that principle.

A number of members were helpful in the debate on this particular motion in pointing out some technical and legal problems in the original list that was submitted in my motion No. 2. I confess that some of those legal and technical problems were quite justified. In particular, I single out the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who drew on his great experience as a criminal lawyer in the city of Calgary to point out some very real difficulties.

It was as a result of comments by that hon. member and other hon. members on both sides of the House that I suggested to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that he and the law officers of the Crown take a serious look at the list of offences and, within the confines of the principle I was attempting to put forward, come up with a list that might attempt to meet their needs and would be an acceptance of the principle. I can report that that was in fact done.

There were a number of offences which I thought should be excluded and the government has been helpful in listening to arguments about the necessity of excluding those offences. I mentioned in particular income tax evasion and those offences cut out of the amendment that were first suggested by law officers of the Crown as perhaps being an overreaching of the original intent of the bill. One other aspect of the amendment I was happy to see come forward for the first time was the acceptance of the principle that where there is a pattern of offences by persons acting in concert, and I am talking about indictable offences other than those in the list, the pattern of activities on the part of organized crime could be the subject of an application for authorization to wiretap.

The term "organized crime" is not a legal term. It is not in any of our formal jurisprudence. However, I feel confident that our judiciary, as they attempt to assess the applications that come before them for authorizations, and as they are met with arguments by Attorneys General and other agents on certain groups of minor offences which form part of a pattern of activities which are a part of organized crime, will provide the flesh and bones of that term and soon develop a jurisprudence unto itself. This will be useful. It will meet the needs of both freedom and the law enforcement officers as they carry out their duties.

In acknowledging that the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton is acceptable to me and I believe to my party, I wholeheartedly concur in his suggestion and his repeating of the fact that the primary emphasis of this bill is perhaps not that which has been the subject of discussion throughout much of this debate; it is to prohibit wiretapping; it is to prohibit the possession, purchase or sale of electronic eavesdropping devices and prohibit the disclosure of information obtained as a result of illegal wiretapping. Throughout all our dealings with this bill and this amendment we must never lose sight of the fact that these three prohibitions are the main object of the exercise in which we are engaged. The country needs these prohibitions, and needs them soon.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that we have now come to the point of expanding the amendment originally introduced by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). A very valid question was asked across the floor of the House as to what offences will be left after we have extended them to the list just quoted by the hon. member on the government side. I am reluctant to accept this new list. It seems we are extending it to every major offence.

I want to give some particulars of the offences that in my opinion obviously lead to abuse of this immoral activity of wiretapping. The amendment seeks to allow wiretapping for purposes of the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act in areas of trafficking, or being in possession for the purpose of trafficking. If we think back to the kind of scenario we could expect as soon as we have a police force seeking to obtain evidence against someone being in possession of drugs, not necessarily for the purpose of trafficking, obviously it is a fait accompli. They would have a prima facie case of wiretapping against anyone they suspected to be in possession. They probably would not know the amount of the drug, and they would not be able to say definitely whether it was there for mere possession and use or whether it was in possession for the purpose of trafficking.

Therefore, under this amendment you open the whole door to wiretapping for every kid who is smoking a marijuana cigarette. It is certainly common knowledge that the use of marijuana among the younger generation has reached epidemic proportions. We have evidence that over 50 per cent of high school children have used the drug. I do not condone the use of marijuana, but with something used as extensively as this I do not think we should be expanding this provision so as to wiretap every kid at high school who happens to have a marijuana cigarette. Yet under the terms of this amendment that would be the result, and this is why I cannot accept it.

I am pleased there have been some negotiations between the hon. member for St. Paul's and the justice minister which removes some of the proposals, but I must say I am concerned that within this list of offences we still have section 62 which deals with sedition. This allows the police to wiretap conversations to determine whether a private conversation between one person and another advocates the forceful overthrow of the government. This is a pretty serious and severe step in terms of freedom of speech. Therefore I would oppose the section on sedition being included in the particular amendment; and I might also say it was included within the original amendment to the bill of the hon. member for St. Paul's.

As I look at these offences I observe we have already dealt with trying to control bootlegging, the possession of alcoholic spirits and conversations that may or may not be seditious held between private persons. Certainly there are areas where one could suspect political eavesdropping. Any offence in connection with the operation of a public office could easily lend itself to political surveillance. The real lesson is that once you get into the issue of wiretapping you open a bottomless pit.

I should like to come back to the original point which we made in this House last week, and it is this. We can tamper with the bill all we want, we can try to amend it and then amend our amendments and go round in circles. But the trouble is that we are dealing with an immoral activity, and it is immoral activity on the part of the police. Amend the bill all you like, but you will still not make it a satisfactory bill. My party will oppose the subamendment presented to the House to amend the motion of the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. Joe Hueglin (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate which very largely has been entered into by members of the legal profession. As one who has had very little connection with the law except in so far as it has acted to protect me, I have been very interested in what has been transpiring during this debate. My intervention is to very greatly commend these members for the efforts and the time they have spent here. A balance is being developed and achieved in this bill, largely, I believe, as a result of the urgings of Conservative members. It is a fine example of our system in operation as between opposition parties and the government.

There are two important philosophies included within this bill. The first is that no unauthorized individual should be able to exercise electronic surveillance over any other citizen in this country. This is one of the most important things that has been done here to protect ourselves. What we have seen with Watergate and other different matters is very much on people's minds today. In addition, there should be stern penalties for such an invasion. Because a law without penalties is meaningless.

The second philosophy is that authorized representatives of the government, having obtained their authority from a judge of the land first of all, be empowered to use these modern devices, these things that have made our lives different from all other lives in the past, to fight against those who, by their acts, harm the well-being of innocent citizens. It is clear that individuals should be forbidden the right to invade the privacy of others. It is equally clear that those empowered to protect us all must be provided with the most up to date means of so doing.

This bill will empower the police to use these devices, not in a manner where they can be misused but, rather, in a manner that ensures that such surveillance is always regulated so there is no temptation for those few individuals who exist in every profession to abuse their power.

As a result of suggestions put forward by Conservative members, the original bill is being improved. It is being improved in that no law enforcement officer will be placed in the postion of having to take the risk that his evidence will be thrown out of court because he acted first and sought permission later, or because of some minor technicality that might develop. This is something that very often plays upon the mind of those outside the legal profession: a minor technicality can cause a case to be thrown out of court, and it seems to them that justice sometimes is not done as a result. Thus we are ensuring use of evidence that is needed to convict criminals.

Under the changes that I hope will be accepted, many of which are on their way to acceptance, there will be a roster system among judges so that permission may be obtained at any time, night or day, to meet a sudden emergency need for authorization. Secondly, the judges shall accept the evidence as long as permission has been granted in substance, whether or not the technical aspects of the granting have been met in every way. It is very important that our police and law enforcement officers be able to obtain quickly something that is needed for the public good.

This bill protects individuals from each other. It allows the police to use modern means to combat crime, and provides that they can obtain this authority at any time of need and not have to face the problem of seeing hard evidence thrown out because a "t" was not crossed and an "i" was not dotted. I welcome this bill in its amended form because it will be a step in two directions: it ensures the preservation of one individual from another, and it offers assistance to law enforcement officers in their actions to control the criminal elements in our society. These are steps that can be accepted by all who are concerned about liberty under the protection of the law and its agents.

Today the two principles of protection of individual liberty and protection and security of individuals from lawless elements are being extremely well put together in this bill. This is taking place, from what I have seen, as a result of give and take between government and opposition. As a result of the urgings of our members, the police will be allowed to have all necessary powers to fight lawless elements in areas in which they threaten the safety of both individuals and the state. The bill will clearly state the necessary steps that the police must take, and at the same time it will preserve the essential privacy of those who have done no wrong from unneeded invasion. This bill, if it proceeds along the path that seems likely today, may very well be remembered as one of the finest that this parliament has yet produced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to motion No. 2 moved by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

● (1740)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to agreement reached earlier, the division on the amendment will be deferred until a later stage. I gather it is the understanding of the House that we will now proceed to motion No. 3 standing in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Am I correct in that regard?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read very attentively the amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Because of the late hour, let me simply move an amendment which reads as follows:

That Motion No. 3 to amend Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended by

"lines 23 to 28 inclusive at page 11"

and substituting the following:

"lines 1 to 14 at page 10, the words "or a permit given under subsection 178.15(1)" in lines 27 and 28 at page 11 " ; " and

(b) adding to paragraph (b) the following:

"Applications to specially appointed judges

178.15 (1) Notwithstanding section 178.12, an application for an authorization may be made ex parte to a judge of a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, or a judge as defined in section 482, designated from time to time by the Chief Justice, by a peace officer specially designated in writing for the purposes of this section by

(a) the Solicitor General of Canada, if the offence is one in respect of which proceedings, if any, may be instituted by the Government of Canada and conducted by or on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, or if the urgency of the situation requires interception of private communications to commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained under section 178.13.

(b) the Attorney General of a province, in respect of any other offence in the province,

Authorizations in emergency

(2) Where the judge to whom an application is made pursuant to subsection (1) is satisfied that the urgency of the situation requires that interception of private communications commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained pursuant to section 178.13, he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, give an authorization in writing for a period of up to 36 hours.

Certain interceptions deemed not lawful

(3) For the purpose of section 178.16 only, an interception of a private communication in accordance with an authorization given pursuant to this section shall be deemed not to have been lawfully made unless the judge who gave the authorization or, if such judge is unable to act, a judge of the same jurisdiction, certifies that if the application for the authorization had been made to him pursuant to section 178.12 he would have given the authorization.

"Chief Justice" defined

(4) In this section, "Chief Justice" means

(a) in the Province of Ontario, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court,

(b) in the Province of Quebec, the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench (Crown side),

(c) in the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Alberta and Newfoundland respectively, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court,

(d) in the Province of British Columbia, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court,

(e) in the Provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan respectively, the Chief Justice of the Court of the Queen's Bench,

(f) in the Yukon Territory, the Chief Justice of the Territorial Court,

(g) in the Northwest Territories, the Chief Justice of the Territorial Court."

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to table, in both official languages, the amendments I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Caron) to Motion No. 3 moved by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Caron). If I read the motion again it would take us beyond six o'clock. I assume copies have been made available. The motion contains some technical aspects, but perhaps the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would wish to speak first on its acceptability.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, on May 8 I spoke in the House concerning this bill. That was before the bill came before the committee, where it was considered at great length. While I made various criticisms in general, I think I could epitomize my criticism by pointing out that the feeling was that, while I was opposed in general to wiretapping, I realized that circumstances would arise from time to time that could justify this course being followed, provided no open season was permissible for police officers, enforcement officers, Attorneys General or the Solicitor General to allow wiretapping to take place without judicial approval in advance.

The essence of proposed section 178.15 as originally placed before the House would have allowed the Attorney General of a province, the Solicitor General of Canada or an agent specially designated in writing for the purposes of the section by the Attorney General of a province or the Solicitor General of Canada, if he were satisfied that circumstances existed which would justify the granting of authorization for the interception of private communications, but the urgency of the situation required that interceptions should commence before an authorization could with reasonable diligence be obtained, on such terms and conditions if any as he considered advisable to grant a permit for the interception of private communications between persons, and that right would exist for a period of 36 hours. To me that constitutes the embodiment of a most dangerous provision whereby the right to privacy of Canadians would be subject to an invasion which after 36 hours could result in dangerous implications to the freedom of the individual.

I said that as far as the general principle was concerned, I was opposed to it. But realizing the expansion of crime which is taking place and the difficulty of assuring justice to the nation, while at the same time assuring the freedom of the individual against insidious attacks by those who would take shortcuts through our system of justice, perhaps this could be considered a proper course.

We argued very strongly. I do not wish to name all the hon. members who took part, but I would say a word of commendation not only in respect of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) but also the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), who in the amendment he offered to this House represented in essence what I have argued for and against. I think all of us will appreciate the fact that while strong words were expressed, because of the nature of this bill, essentially those words were based on the fact that only under a judicial system properly enforced can there be that freedom that gives equality to each and every one of us.

Crime is rampant. There is no question about that. Contempt is shown today for police officers to a degree that did not exist when I came into this House. While police officers always must be subject to the searchlight of public opinion, they have the right to ask that citizens stand behind them and support them when they are doing their duty. All of us who have the viewpoints I expressed on May 8 realize since that date, as was mentioned earlier this afternoon, the revelations of Watergate mean that parliament must be careful. It is difficult to understand what has happened in Washington and to realize that the finest principles of justice in the British tradition were swept aside by a coterie surrounding the President who placed the welfare of a political party above the needs and the welfare of the state.

Much has been made of the fact that there is international crime and that it is difficult to secure convictions. I was amazed to read in the report of the Mounted Police that in Canada, in one year beginning April 1, 1971, there were police reports and investigations concerning racketeering and organized gangsters in respect of 95 cases. That is a tremendous challenge to the law enforcement officers of our country and, above all, to the assurance that Canadians shall be protected against the invasion of those who find it advantageous, monetarily and otherwise, to establish themselves in Canada.

Because of this I again repeat a suggestion I have made on other occasions. It is, whatever may be the advantages of the legislation now before this House, the time has come for the establishment of a royal commission on crime, representative of federal and provincial governments, to look into this question which has become in our nation a multimillion dollar racket which requires, above everything else, the fullest investigation and the fullest knowledge of the subject.

The hour approaches six o'clock. If the House will permit, I will in a moment suggest our adjournment. Suffice it to say at this time that the amendment brought forward by the hon. gentleman is representative of an endeavour to ensure the preservation of the rule of the law under the judiciary. It removes many of the dangers, if not all the dangers, reflected in the section as it stood originally. While I will not go so far as to say it satisfies everyone, it represents an example of what parliament can do when in the face of criticism from the opposition, joined by members supporting the government, there is recognition that it is in this place that freedom is assured. I think that in this amendment, to which I will later make somewhat extended reference, there has been a give and take which has removed a major portion of the stigma in the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Despite the condition of our clocks, perhaps it could be recognized now as being six o'clock. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RETURN OF LAND TO MIDDLE RIVER BAND—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous concurrence of the House to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the continual delay in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in returning certain lands to a particular band of Indian people in Nova Scotia. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House authorize the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to inquire into the reasons why the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is not taking steps to have certain Indian reserve land which was improperly alienated returned to the domain and authority of the Middle River Indian Band in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

SOCIAL AND NATIVE HOUSING POLICIES—DISMISSAL OF WALTER RUDNICKI—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The matter of urgent and pressing necessity arises from events that took place this morning in the Supplementary Estimates Committee. At that committee a majority accepted a motion expressing the desire to request the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to inquire immediately into the operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as they relate to social housing policy, native housing policy and the dismissal of Mr. Walter Rudnicki. For procedural reasons the matter was not fully resolved in the committee this morning. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert):

That the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be instructed to inquire immediately into the above-mentioned matters and that such an inquiry request the appearance as a witness of Mr. Walter Rudnicki.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

POSSIBLE UNEMPLOYMENT CAUSED BY BUNKER OIL SHORTAGE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the very serious world-wide shortage of bunker oil for international merchant shipping and the threat this shortage poses to all Canadian industry, including merchant shipping, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House instruct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to table immediately in the House the contingency plans at his disposal to minimize the increase in unemployment which will surely result this winter in many parts of the country from the scarcity of this crucial energy resource.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

ENERGY

PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion of extremely urgent necessity.

Since the energy crisis entails serious problems, the government should give first consideration to the extension of the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. In addition, the House should specially examine the most efficient means to finance the project. Since it is a collective project, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin):

That this project be carried out.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DISENTITLEMENTS IMPOSED BY BENEFIT CONTROL OFFICERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the revelations by the Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee that overzealous activities on the part of benefit control officers resulted in large numbers of claimants being unjustly disqualified from benefits to which they were rightly entitled, and in view of the minister's admission to the House yesterday that he is aware of the occurrence of such excesses on the part of the benefit control officers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Neale):

That this House instruct the minister to undertake, with his department, a case by case review of all disentitlements and disqualifications imposed by benefit control officers between January 1, 1973 and November 1, 1973, with a view to ensuring that all improperly disqualified claimants receive their just entitlement.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON LEAKING OF CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the House on November 16 I expressed my concern on the matter of recent leaks of confidential government communications. I should like to stress that this is indeed an extremely serious matter. If allowed to continue, such practices could impair our relations with other countries and undermine the effective conduct of government business with foreign governments. Here in Ottawa, it would also interfere with exchanges of information essential to the conduct of business among government departments and agencies. It is therefore imperative that the matter be dealt with without delay.

What is involved, I suggest, is not our attitude toward this or that government of Chile. What is involved is also not a matter of whether we feel concern over the hardships or dangers for a good many people arising from the events in Chile. On this matter, I would have thought there would be little or no disagreement among most Canadians.

What is involved is simply a question of whether confidential communications are to be secure. On this matter, too, I would hope that most, if not all, Canadians would agree.

I am very much aware of the concern of this House on this matter. On November 16, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) inquired whether there had been an investigation with a view to a possible dismissal for the divulgence of classified documents from my department. At that time, I replied that an investigation was under way. This investigation has been a very thorough one and has necessarily taken a little time and a good deal of effort. As a result of these inquiries, I am confident that we have identified the person responsible for the leaks. That person is being informed. The long established procedures for dealing with such cases will now be followed.

I am hopeful that the action we are now taking will ensure that a breach of trust of this kind will not recur. I see no need to identify publicly the person responsible. Since there has been some suggestion that the telegrams may have come from someone in the Department of External Affairs and since that might give the worrying impression that those who are regularly handling the country's most sensitive diplomatic communications are not to be trusted with them, I should say immediately and categorically that these telegrams were not leaked by anyone in that department or at any of our missions abroad. It would not be in the public interest to go further regarding the source of the leak.

I should inform the House that one of the messages to which public reference has been made is not a genuine telegram. It is in fact a message specially prepared by the security services of my department to help in identifying the location of the leaks.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PROVISION FOR APPOINTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSION TO SETTLE STRIKES OR LOCKOUTS AGAINST NATIONAL OR PUBLIC INTEREST

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-234, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to amend the industrial relations part of the Canada Labour Code to provide that, where a strike or lockout is against the national or public interest, the government may appoint an Industrial Inquiry Commission to make a final and binding settlement subject to government variation and adoption. Forthwith upon the appointment of the commission the strike or lockout, apprehended or occurring in respect of such dispute or difference, is prohibited; no employee shall strike and no employer shall lock out his employees—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but we had a similar incident a few days ago when I thought a member went a little too far in giving the brief explanation that is allowed under the terms of Standing Order 68(2). I would hope hon. members would not depart from that well-established practice.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be unanimity. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Nelson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the motion was not seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Nelson).

An hon. Member: Thank God.

Mr. Speaker: By the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

ENERGY

OIL—INTENTION OF SUPPLYING COMPANIES REGARDING RESORT TO "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE RESPECTING DELIVERIES TO CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who said in the House on November 27, as found on page 8171 of Hansard, with regard to suppliers of oil who are now making reference to force majeure.

I am not sure whether they have done so specifically so far or merely indicated their intention to do so.

I ask the minister whether he has now had an opportunity to make inquiries as to what supplying companies have indicated an intention to resort to a force majeure clause with regard to the cutting back, or possible cutting back, of deliveries of oil to Canada from non-Arab countries?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will have seen a number of rather categorical statements by some of the Canadian refiners as to the present situation, although their remarks were also hedged with regard to the future. At the moment we do not have any definite indication, except perhaps an indication in the Globe and Mail, of a specific interruption for the future. But as I pointed out to the hon. gentleman several days ago, and repeated yesterday, we have through the technical liaison committee the indication that if the trend of international interruption continues this is a condition which may be invoked.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the minister every opportunity to tell the House what inquiries he has made this week since making his statement on Monday night to determine what supplying companies have indicated they may resort to invoking a force majeure clause with regard to deliveries to Canada, because this is a matter of the greatest importance and the minister has made a public statement as well as statements in the House. I am sure the House wants to give the minister every opportunity to indicate whether or not he had any basis in fact for the assertion he made.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, to repeat again, the basis was on the advice received from the industry through the technical liaison committee.

Mr. Stanfield: As the minister is the responsible minister with regard to this matter and as he has indicated to the Canadian people that they may be confronted by shortages, and particularly as certain major companies in Canada have indicated they know nothing about this, has he made any inquiries himself with regard to what companies in Canada might be affected by a force majeure clause and what companies supplying Canada from non-Arabian sources might be affected, or is the minister simply trying to hide behind some technical committee he has established, failing to get the information himself and refusing to indicate to the House whether in fact there is any substance to his statement?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can make what assertions he likes, but I would point out to him again, and to the House, that the express purpose of the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand is to provide that kind of liaison between agencies of government and the industry for the purpose of determining what the supply and demand situation is at the present time, and will be through this coming winter, with regard to petroleum. On that basis my officials have been meeting regularly with representatives of the companies. This is the vehicle in the first place for keeping in touch with the supply situation as it may be now and as it may be in the future, specifically the vehicle for the information we receive from the industry at a time when we wanted to determine the greatest possible exposure for Canadians in the winter to come to determine what the possible risk was—

● (1420)

An hon. Member: Why don't you answer the question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —and that is the figure I gave to the House. I am sure the hon. member would be the first member of the House to take exception if we had not made it clear what we thought the exposure was and at a later date it turned out to be much greater than anticipated.

Mr. Stanfield: After all his delays and his refusal to give the House information may I ask the minister whether, even at this date, he will make inquiries to ascertain what substance in fact there is to this allegation that supplying companies from non-Arab sources have indicated an intention to resort to a force majeure clause, and what this amounts to in fact in terms of barrels of oil per day? Will the minister now undertake these inquiries and give this information to the House?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake that we will continue to use the technical committee for the purpose of keeping in touch with the industry, and this, on any sensible basis, is the way to handle it, by continuing liaison with the industry.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. On this saga of the force majeure clause may I put the following question to the minister, and perhaps we can get a simple and straightforward answer.

An hon. Member: I doubt it.

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mr. Bell: It will be simple.

Mr. Lewis: Do his answers amount to this, Mr. Speaker, that he had no indication of any intention from any source to use the force majeure clause, that his attention was brought to the fact that such a clause existed in the contracts between Canadian companies and supplying companies and if it were invoked the result he indicated would be the result to come? Is that the kind of hypothetical position that he found it necessary to frighten the Canadian people with?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we sought to find out from the industry the kind of risk for the balance of this winter that Canadians could be exposed to. It was for that purpose that we made inquiries, and we received an indication that with a continuation of the deterioration of the international supply situation this interruption could take place, and on the basis of this interruption we made a calculation of what the drop in supply would be. That is the simple, straightforward situation.

Mr. Lewis: Do I also understand from the minister's answers over the days that this so-called information came to him through the industry members on the advisory committee? If so, has he gone back to those industry members since these questions have been asked beginning on Monday to inquire whether they have any harder information than the information on which he has spoken before or is the situation the same, that there is no actual intention expressed by any company to cut back?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, all indications are that there is no actual intention, certainly not as expressed by the companies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We are indeed keeping in continuing liaison through the committee, and this seems to be the most sensible administrative way to keep in touch with the industry on a continuing basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South for a last supplementary at this point, followed by the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Everyone will approve of the minister keeping in touch with the situation but a lot of us would not approve of frightening the Canadian people if it is not necessary to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, will the minister now undertake to the House that he will report on a regular basis on whether or not any direct intention has been expressed by any supplying company and the extent to which that might affect the supply of oil, and who these companies are, so that the Canadian people and members of the House can be informed on a regular, daily basis as to whether or not the fear he has created is justified?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, I am sure, would want me to make perfectly clear to Canadians the kind of risk we face. If the hon. gentleman will not accuse me of frightening Canadians each time a fresh development occurs of trying to create fear, I will do my best to keep him informed.

OIL—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE IN CONTRACTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the fact that, by invoking the force majeure clause which has been mentioned in the past few days, some countries seem not to want to live up to agreements previously signed with Canada and that this has provoked no reaction, does the Canadian government have to comply with the signed contracts and can this force majeure clause be invoked to protect our Canadian citizens?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that these contracts were the result of negotiations between foreign companies and Canadian refineries. If we had a different system in Canada, such as a national oil corporation, then the Canadian government could perhaps negotiate direct commitments from the exporting countries. However, we have had now for many years a system whereby crude oil deliveries are the result of transactions concluded between two companies. We depend on Canadian companies to keep us informed about developments on the crude oil market, and if there is a crisis, we keep them informed in order to minimize interruption of supplies to Canadians.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the hon. member for Yukon is rising on a question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for Yukon rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege having to do with the answers of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and affecting all members of the House. We all heard the minister say a moment ago he had received no indication from any of the supplying companies of an intention to invoke the force majeure clause. Yesterday, as recorded on page 8227 of Hansard, I questioned the minister on this score and quoted from page 8172 of Hansard his reply to a question put by the hon. member for Calgary South. The minister had given this answer:

—my understanding is that it has been a decision of the supplying companies, and it may be related under the conditions of the contracts they have with other countries to other supply obligations.

The language used today by the minister, as well as that on page 8172 which I have just quoted, was in both cases, in the past tense, leaving a clear indication that he had received an indication from supplying companies of an invention to invoke a force majeure clause. However, it got worse later. Yesterday, as recorded on page 8227 of Hansard, in response to my question the minister quoted his own words from page 8179 of Hansard, where he had said with respect to the application of force majeure.

My understanding at the moment is that this redistribution has not taken place but the companies have indicated there is a prospective interruption under the force majeure provision of the supplying contracts.

Mr. Speaker, one or the other is true. The minister is not entitled, especially in circumstances as serious as these, to mislead the House to the extent that he has done—not only this House, but all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1430)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege. I stated on Monday night and I have repeated at least half a dozen times, if not more, that we were talking about the prospective application of the force majeure clause during the course of the present winter. That is the clear context of my remarks. If he chooses to do so, the hon. member may take a sentence or two out of the rather extensive exchange that has occurred in this regard to allege something else. However, if taken in the whole context I think there can be no doubt about it. I just wonder why he seeks to keep twisting the words in this way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It appears to the Chair that the point raised by the hon. member for Yukon is a continuation of the debate which took place yesterday and earlier today during the question period. I really do not think it can be resolved by way of a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the minister has compounded the error and given rise to a further question of privilege on my part. He has accused me of taking his answer out of context.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Members can read what he said. I hear groans from members opposite. In an attempt to extricate himself from his difficulties the minister, not the Leader of the Opposition or the leader of the New Democratic Party, is the one twisting matters here. It is the minister. I quoted him precisely and wholly from answers he gave the day before yesterday, yesterday and today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, before asking a supplementary, I would like to rise on a question of privilege. I thank the hon. member for Yukon for his lack of courtesy. In fact, as I was going to ask a supplementary he rose on a question of privilege, something we from the Social Credit Party do not do when the hon. member's leader asks up to five questions in a row. I do not know if children are badly brought up in the Yukon, but the hon. member for Yukon is certainly uncouth to act in this fashion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know how that was translated, but in French I am not sure whether it was entirely parliamentary.

[Translation]

I ask for the co-operation of the hon. member for Témiscamingue as well as on all other hon. members to come back to the oral questions period and to forget for a moment about questions of privilege.

REFUSAL OF GOLDEN EAGLE CANADA LIMITED TO DELIVER FUEL OIL IN RIMOUSKI AND MONT-JOLI

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Yesterday I asked a question with regard to the Golden Eagle Canada Limited. I was advised once again this morning that this company has set quotas for retailers and that, since November 26, it has told gas and heating fuel retailers in Mont-Joli and Rimouski that it will be unable to deliver any heating fuel before the December 1 price increase. Has the minister looked into the matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. I had hoped to get an answer to his question this afternoon. As I have not received it, I shall inquire into it. It seems to me that, if such is the case, it is unfair and that steps should be taken to ensure that the company put a stop to that practice. I apologize once again and assure the hon. member that I shall look into the matter.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASES—MINISTER'S POSITION—INVESTIGATION UNDER COMBINES ACT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): As always, Mr. Speaker, I will try to pour oil on troubled waters. I direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In the minister's position of looking after matters of inflation in our country, did he agree to the increase of five cents a gallon for gasoline commencing December 1?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern about the matter the right hon. member has mentioned, not only with other members of the cabinet but hopefully with him and all other members of the House. I can only say that I take part in formulating and sharing decisions of cabinet like all other ministers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was the minister advised by his department that as far back as August increases in the price of gasoline were taking place that were difficult to explain on the basis of cost? Did he have any investigation made under the Combines Investigation Act with regard to those gasoline price increases before the difficulties began in the Middle East?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, parliament has given me authority to have increases in prices looked into only to the extent they may indicate possible breaches of the Combines Investigation Act. As has been reported to the House on several occasions, as a result of a complaint by six citizens, made public by them, a formal inquiry under the act has been under way for the past several months covering the whole range of activities of the petroleum industry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has it been brought to the minister's attention that the Mount Royal Liberal Association at the convention of the Liberal Party here in September brought forth a resolution calling on the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, under the Combines Investigation Act, to look into the operation of the increase in the cost of gasoline? Did he receive that resolution and did he act on it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it was a resolution of the Liberal Party of Canada from the Prime Minister's constituency. Surely that would receive the attention of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ENERGY

KIND OF POSSIBLE OIL SHORTAGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In his statement Monday night the minister said that "Eastern Canada and, to a lesser extent, British Columbia, will feel the shortages most." In view of information recently received from the B.C. Energy Commission that to the best of their knowledge there is no cause for concern and there will be sufficient gasoline and home heating oil in British Columbia this winter, can the minister advise what shortages he was referring to in British Columbia?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Anticipated shortages of middle distillate and residual oil, both of which come from the United States.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise upon what facts he bases his concern regarding possible shortages of other oils for industrial purposes and whether these facts have been communicated to the B.C. Energy Commission?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I could not be sure on the latter point. The source of the information would be the National Energy Board and my own officials.

OIL—INTENTION OF SUPPLYING COMPANIES REGARDING RESORT TO "FORCE MAJEURE" CLAUSE RESPECTING DELIVERIES TO CANADA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the statement made yesterday in a speech in Toronto by Mr. L. J. Bolger, general manager of Shell Canada, and I quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will appreciate that the question should be asked directly. If hon. members quote resolutions passed outside the House, speeches and reports in newspapers in support of questions, I think we get away from good practice. I would hope the hon. member would find a way to ask the question without referring specifically to a statement made outside the House.

Mr. Hees: Further to this statement that the minister's department was long ago made aware of the intention of these companies to invoke the force majeure clause, does the minister still claim he was given this information only a few days ago? If that is the case, will he undertake to make better use of information which was made available to his department a long time ago?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I thank the hon. member for his counsel.

Mr. Hees: Well, for heaven's sake, use it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO ASSIST CHILEAN REFUGEES WISHING TO COME TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although the Minister of Manpower and Immigration may wish to deal with it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs told the House on Monday that he had received, or was receiving, reports from the teams sent to Chile to look into the question of expediting the admission to Canada of refugees. He said he would report to the House. Has the cabinet looked into these recommendations and is the hon. gentleman prepared to report to the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): With the hon. member's indulgence, I should like to answer the question. The missions have returned from South America. We have been talking to them and I expect to make a statement on this matter in the House tomorrow.

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CABINET COMMITTEE TO DEAL WITH CRISIS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he appointed a cabinet committee to deal with the general subject of the energy crisis in all its phases and the effects it may have on the economy in a great number of ways if not properly met?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject is being discussed within the present structure of cabinet.

Mr. MacLean: Would the Prime Minister tell us briefly what are the guidelines drawn up for this committee within cabinet, if I understand him properly, and who is the minister in over-all charge of this responsibility?

Mr. Trudeau: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is mainly responsible for bringing documentation and proposals to cabinet, and the situation is being discussed by his colleagues.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERTILIZER AND CHEMICAL SUPPLY SITUATION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Will he make a detailed statement on motions concerning the Canadian supply situation with respect to fertilizer and agricultural chemicals, bearing in mind that any shortage could seriously affect production and bring about a drastic increase in food prices? I ask this question because of the minister's optimism when replying to questions in the House on the subject, an optimism which is not shared by his provincial counterparts.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I will certainly consider the hon. member's request. We are compiling all the facts. Reports are coming in from the fertilizer manufacturers and as soon as they are in suitable form I will give the hon. member's suggestion serious consideration.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT FINES IMPOSED ON CERTAIN PEOPLE BE REPAID

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that persons who receive unemployment insurance benefits sometimes make mistakes in their statements, they are penalized and often have to reimburse the benefits they received, can the minister tell the House what penalties will be imposed on the civil servants who are being zealous and misuse the rules; can he also tell us whether the fines unjustly imposed on persons who received benefits will be reimbursed with interest?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT OF THOMAS SERJEANT IN TANZANIA—REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADA

Mr. Walter Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday in the House, in reply to a question put to him with respect to the imprisonment in Tanzania of a Canadian citizen, Thomas Serjeant, the minister indicated that the Canadian consulate in that country was informed of the imprisonment on October 6 and that the family of the imprisoned man was notified shortly thereafter. In fact, however, the family of the imprisoned man was not informed until November 6. I am sure the minister did not intend to mislead the House, but perhaps he would wish to correct the record and, in doing so, explain the time lapse between the date the Canadian consulate knew about the imprisonment and the date when his family was informed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the events followed in this order. As the hon. member has said, Mr. Serjeant was placed in detention on September 26. On October 6 we were informed and applied immediately for consular access, which was obtained on October 15. At that time, at Mr. Serjeant's request, the embassy informed his brother in England of the incident and contacted a British lawyer.

Mr. Carter: I am sure the hon. gentleman is not trying to mislead the House, but obviously there is some conflict between the statement he has made and information I have received from the Serjeant family. I have a telegram here which I received this morning from the brother of the imprisoned man. It states: "Received first notice of brother's imprisonment on November 6, not October 15". This is a very serious matter and I think the minister should explain it.

Mr. Sharp: I regret if I have misled the House in any way, but this is the information I have obtained from my officials.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Has the ambassador of Tanzania been asked for an explanation of this extraordinary, extra-legal procedure which has been perpetrated against a citizen of this country?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The High Commissioner of Tanzania has been asked to call.

Mr. Fairweather: Has he been asked to call, or has he called? What is the explanation for this?

Mr. Sharp: The explanation, as I said to the House yesterday, is that Mr. Serjeant is being detained in connection with what are called matters of state security. Like the hon. member, I regret this kind of procedure. It is not the sort of thing to which we are accustomed in this country. We have made strong representations on a number of occasions directly in Tanzania and we are now asking the High Commissioner to call so as to reinforce those representations.

Mr. Fairweather: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I thought this question might come up so I gave notice to his office. In view of the fact that President Nyerere is head of a country which is a member of the Commonwealth, will the Prime Minister intervene personally following what, on the face of it, is a most illiberal and extra-legal action against a citizen of this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At this stage I wish to identify myself with the feelings expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Detaining people for a long period of time without laying charges is a procedure for which I have great distaste; it is one against which the government has been protesting assiduously. I am sure the exchanges of these past days, and of today, will be brought to the attention of the government of Tanzania.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for St. John's West, but hon. members will appreciate that there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period and that if we allow three or four supplementaries on each question, as we are doing in relation to this important matter, the number of members the Chair will be able to recognize will be limited.

Mr. Carter: I have a very short supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell the House when the High Commissioner for Tanzania was first called in by his department to discuss this very important matter?

● (1450)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we always consider it more effective to deal directly with the government concerned rather than with their representative here, but in order to reinforce the representations we have made directly in Dar es Salaam we are calling in the High Commissioner.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF NEW MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICIES TO PREVENT SERIOUS RECESSION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the particularly disappointing performance of the economy in the third quarter, as demonstrated by the recent GNP statistics, a performance which from the minister's statement he apparently did not expect, will he tell the House and the nation when the government is going to bring in new monetary and fiscal policies so the economy will not slide into a serious recession?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated when a similar question was asked about the fact that the gross domestic product was weak in the third quarter that that was a reflection of the loss in man-days because of strikes, particularly the railway strike. I also indicated that it reflected not a shortage in demand but a shortage in supply related particularly to unskilled labour, skilled labour and materials.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Statistics Canada indicates that we have now reached record levels of unfilled orders and there is a continuing strong demand by business for investment goods indicating the underlying strength of the economy.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the government that, when Canada has the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized country in the world and the third fastest rate of inflation, the economy is operating well?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have said, and I repeat, that the economy is operating at very close to capacity and that the problem on both the price side and the unemployment side reflects not a shortage of demand but a shortage of supply.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

DISMISSAL OF WALTER RUDNICKI—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER AND INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact a majority of the members of the miscellaneous estimates committee this morning requested a full investigation of the dismissal of Mr. Walter Rudnicki and the policy questions connected therewith, and in view of the minister's own assurance following the meeting that he was interested in having the matter aired, would he undertake to make a statement in the House tomorrow?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will not be in the House tomorrow. I will be in Regina and Edmonton talking to the ministers of housing in an attempt to further the implementation of Bill C-133. I was at the miscellaneous estimates committee meeting this morning with Mr. Teron—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I might be allowed to take exception both to the question and the answer being given by the minister in that they refer to a proceedings in a committee. I think the question can be asked directly without bringing in matters relating to the proceedings of a committee, which is out of order.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact the supplementary estimates of the minister's department were not voted upon this morning, would he make a request of the steering committee that one of the time periods still remaining for discussion of supplementary estimates be allocated to the estimates of his department in order that we can clear up this matter which, according to his expressed desire, he has an interest in doing?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as I am not on the committee or the steering committee I do not know what times are still available, but I would be happy to co-operate with the steering committee as much as possible.

AIR CANADA

REPORTED BREAKDOWN OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH AIRLINE EMPLOYEES ASSOCIATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the extra special need for a healthy passenger transportation system during the upcoming Christmas period, would the minister indicate whether he was informed that earlier this afternoon the Canadian Airline Employees Association broke off negotiations with Air Canada? Can he also indicate the core of the problem and whether he plans to do anything about it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): This is the first news I have had of this, Mr. Speaker. As usual, they get in touch with you before they get in touch with me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): However, I would suggest that you get in touch with the Minister of Labour who is in charge of labour relations in this government.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the Chairman of Air Canada is presently in the city of Ottawa, is it the minister's intention to consult with him and discuss this very important matter with the hope of averting a strike during the Christmas rush?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Chairman of Air Canada has been appearing before the committee for two days and I would think that the hon. member has had a good opportunity to ask him about this.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT NIGHTLY TELEVISION NEWS BROADCAST BE MOVED AHEAD TO 10 P.M. TO SAVE ENERGY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the critical energy shortage, would the minister consider having the CBC national news moved ahead one hour to 10 o'clock across the country? A great many people stay up to hear the news, and if this were done it would save a great deal of electricity, gas and oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very interesting suggestion.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF DEATH OF TWO LABORATORY TECHNICIANS AT SASKATOON UNIVERSITY HOSPITAL AND BLOOD IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will he conduct an inquiry, as requested by the Saskatoon University Hospital laboratory technicians, into the deaths of two fellow workers that have been linked with hepatitis due to infected American blood samples used for testing?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this matter falls under the purview of the Saskatchewan government since it deals with an incident which occurred in an hospital under provincial jurisdiction. Obviously, the department will be pleased to co-operate as much as possible in the inquiry which the Saskatchewan government will want to make in that connection.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: As requested earlier, will the minister conduct an inquiry into the export of blood from the United States used for testing in Canada that carries infectious hepatitis which has caused two deaths?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there is no need for a special inquiry in that connection. We have looked into this situation and taken the usual precautions regarding the importation of blood into Canada. It seems impossible right now to make a complete and thorough check in order to detect the presence of the problem raised by the hon. member before such blood enters Canada and before we had the time to make very elaborate tests.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

STUDY OF CANADA'S FUTURE URANIUM REQUIREMENTS IN LIGHT OF PROPOSED SALE BY DENISON MINES TO JAPAN

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the inaccurate predictions to date of Canada's energy reserves, has the minister's department conducted a thorough study to determine Canada's future needs for uranium, and will he reveal such details to the House in order to satisfy members that the $800 million sale of uranium to Japan by Denison Mines is surplus to Canada's future nuclear energy requirements?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, uranium reserves have been estimated by my department in connection with the preparation of phase one of the energy analysis. I might say in regard to the sale that it would require an application by the vendor to the Atomic Energy Control Board for permission to export the commodity. It is my intention to see what the terms of the application are and then consider what further action we might take with regard to it.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared, if necessary, to impose export and price controls on uranium so that Canadian energy interests are protected?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there are already those controls under the law.

THE ARTS

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MONTREAL SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and perhaps you will be indulgent enough to let me ask the supplementary question that I wanted to ask yesterday.

Can the Prime Minister say whether he has received a letter from the directors of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra stating that it will cease its activities as of December 20 if it is not helped by federal, provincial, or municipal governments? It is an extremely important matter for it is the oldest orchestra in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister would perhaps answer the question, after which I will recognize the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed received such a letter some time ago. I do think that it is a most important matter, especially for the future of this orchestra and of the cultural life of Montreal and of the province. I have answered and my answer is in the hands of the directors. I hope that we could somehow be of help under certain conditions. I think that it is up to them to determine their future directions.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we have gone beyond the time allotted to the question period. It expired a few minutes ago. Would the member resume his seat?

[Translation]

The hon. member will be allowed to ask his supplementary question and afterwards, as I said a moment ago, the Chair will recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, the supplementary question I wanted to ask yesterday relates to the statement of the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources . . .

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been recognized for one question, but it seems to me he could ask his other question tomorrow.

ENERGY

OIL—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT ON RIGHT OF COMPANIES TO REALLOCATE CANADIAN SUPPLIES FROM NON-ARAB SOURCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does he know of any occurrence which would justify any companies supplying Canada with petroleum from non-Arab sources cutting back unilaterally or reallocating Canadian supplies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if there is a general interruption of international supplies this would be the basis for cutting back.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking supplementaries on this subject. Obviously, we could go on for quite a while on the same subject. The Chair recognizes the Leader of the Opposition but when he is finished I will have to call orders of the day. The supplementaries could be asked tomorrow, including that of the hon. member for Lafontaine.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the position of his government that international companies supplying oil to Canada from non-Arab sources have the right to reallocate these supplies on the ground of sharing cutbacks on an equitable basis, or is it the position of the government that any such reallocation should be based upon the decisions of governments, including the government of Canada, rather than on decisions of international oil companies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, referring to the rights of those companies in legal terms, I expect this is a contractual matter; it would be a question of seeing whether such a right does exist in contractual law. But insofar as the question of whether they have a political or moral right to do so is concerned, I would refer the Leader of the Opposition to my answer yesterday in the House. I am glad to hear that his party would support our party if we had to use non-legal means to ensure security of supply to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. I believe the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster is rising on the usual point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the government House leader about the business for the next few days and as far into December as the minister is able to go.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with Bill C-176, the wiretapping bill, and when it is completed we will begin the second reading of Bill C-233, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and following that Bill C-191, the Parole Act, and Bill C-190, the Canada Pension Plan.

I should mention to hon. members that it is my hope to give notice of a bill affecting the oil situation which might be given first reading on Monday. If that should happen I would want to call it early in the week.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that two weeks ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that unless Bill C-211 was passed by the House by November 30 the cheques would not be available by January 1, why has this measure not been put before the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am keeping in close touch with my colleague and I should say to my hon. friend that the bill will be brought forward in time to meet the needs of the beneficiaries of the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the family allowances bill, which requires only third reading, I wonder whether the government House leader would consult with the opposition parties in the House to see whether there would be agreement to give that bill third reading without debate. My question implies that we would be willing to do so this afternoon. Would he also bring on the Canada Pension Plan Bill No. 2, for third reading since it also is supposed to come into effect in January?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to consult with the House leaders and, if possible, reach similar agreements on other measures of importance.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the President of the Privy Council would indicate when the matter of redistribution will be referred to the appropriate House committee?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have done research on this subject and I hope to have it brought forward and the subject matter sent to the committee on privileges and elections the moment its work is finished on the Election Expenses Act.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the proceedings I should like to restate that our party is prepared to move at once on Bill C-211 if the minister is prepared to do so.

Some hon. Members: Now!

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 28, consideration of Bill 176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; motion No. 3 (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the amendment thereto of Mr. Guay (Lévis).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. When the House adjourned yesterday we were considering motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I believe he still has the floor. I am not clear on whether or not his remarks were completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on a question of order. I am not now speaking to the motion. I understood that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) had decided on another amendment, and that that amendment would be brought forward now, so we would really start all over again. I do not know what he has to say about that. My information was that the amendment moved yesterday has been found lacking in certain particulars, and therefore the government would find it necessary to have a new amendment brought before the House.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there are some amendments of a technical nature which I would propose to bring forward if the amendment moved by my parliamentary secretary were indeed adopted by the House. There has been some discussion about the omission in the amendment which was put forward of subsection (5) which had been contained in the original section. I think it would be quite in order for an hon. member to move that that subsection be added in one form or another, and I think the hon. member for St. Paul's is prepared to do that in a moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With your leave, Sir, that amendment could be moved now so we deal with the problem instead of doing it section by section or in a series.

Mr. Lang: The specific words that would be required to be added to the amendment by the parliamentary secretary would be the deletion of the words in the original amendment of the right hon. gentleman in subparagraph (b) reading "lines 1 to 13 inclusive at page 9". If those words in the original motion were also deleted by the amendment, then if there were agreement to add those words to the amendment, it would complete the picture for the amendment now before the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask that the amendment be completed so that I would know what I was dealing with, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, I started on the original amendment to my motion, and now we have the additional amendment. In so far as the latter is concerned, it will be dealt with by the hon. member for St. Paul's who will also refer to certain further particulars that should be incorporated in the amendment to my motion. With that in mind, I will proceed to deal with this matter in a general way.

It will be recalled that last May—I think it was on May 8—I spoke on this matter and pointed out the serious danger to freedom within our country in view of the area that was covered in the motion in respect of emergencies. Indeed, the door was left wide open to taking two positions: one, that the House was abolishing wiretapping, was preventing anyone from dealing in wiretapping devices or being in possession thereof, and two, there was this wide open section whereby in an emergency there was no need to appeal for the support and authorization of a member of the judiciary. I took a strong stand against this.

The judiciary constitutes the only defence of our freedom within this country, and without the judiciary giving the authority to invade privacy, the idea of freedom of speech, of association, and all the other freedoms under the law would be meaningless. Indeed, I found a very interesting article only last evening while reading among the vital speeches of the day a speech made by the Hon. John N. Mitchell, Attorney General of the United States, delivered in Dallas, Taxas on August 13, 1969. It was in my file. It deals with wiretapping, and in the light of what has happened at Watergate it is particularly appropriate to make a reference to it. He said:

> As you know, the Attorney General is the President's lawyer and takes presidential guidance as to the type of America—the type of "ordered liberty under law" that this administration wants for our citizens.
> Thus, permit me to remind you of some of the principles enunciated by President Nixon in his inaugural address, and I quote.
> "The laws have caught up with our conscience. What remains is to give life to what is the law."

That was in 1969. Then, he deals with the problem of wiretapping and he says:

> Most recognized law enforcement experts have repeatedly stated that wiretapping is our most useful tool in obtaining information about this organized criminal syndicate.
> Because wiretapping is an invasion of privacy, a judgment must be made as to whether it is "reasonable" to wiretap in a particular case in order to obtain information that is necessary to combat organized crime.

Congress addressed itself to this issue in Title III of the Omnibus Crime bill of 1968. It authorized the Department of Justice to instal electronic eavesdropping devices on organized racketeers by application to a court and upon a showing of probable cause.

Up to that point the United States legislation is similar to the legislation that we have before us. Then he went on:

—I also insisted—and continue to insist—that each application and full supporting papers be personally presented to me for my evaluation.

So, the Attorney General of the United States in the pre-Watergate days believed that wiretapping was dangerous, and that not only should there be judicial approval by an authorization given but in addition there should be the careful perusal and consideration by the Attorney General of the U.S. to the end that injustice should not be permitted to be legalized.

When I raised this matter first, I met quite a reaction. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) is not here so I will not refer to him, although he did to me in my absence. But the argument advanced went across this country. People began to realize the danger and there was a flood of complaint and condemnation of this emergency section in every part of Canada, making due allowance for the hon. member who said that in one province it was regarded as necessary.

On Friday I spoke and reiterated the strongest objection, not based upon a desire to preserve and protect wrongdoers but to ensure that a law that applies to wrongdoers cannot be used against other Canadians who have committed no crime. That is what happened in the United States in connection with Watergate, where a coterie of individuals decided that they had a God given right by the propinquity they enjoyed to the president to destroy or endeavour to destroy those who did not see eye to eye politically with the President of the United States.

I will say this for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). He pressed this bill in its original form with all the power at his command, but he listened to argument. And while he brushed aside what I had to say last May, what was heresy in May has become orthodoxy for him in November. That is what happens. If the House of Commons discharges its responsibilities, if the minister is prepared to listen, then ultimately out of a concensus this institution can arrive at legislation beneficial to all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister had an amendment moved last evening. He had discussed it with me yesterday morning. He produced what he thought would meet the general tenor of my strong objections, which was that the judiciary shall not be bypassed, no matter what the emergency, in view of the hundreds of judges that we have. I thought we had only 600 judges. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Turner) raised the number, I think, to 900. In any event, within the purview of the definition of the judiciary I presume that number is very close to actuality. I pointed out this question: if you cannot find a judge how are you going to find your agent? How are you going to find the Attorney General of the province within which the offence allegedly has been committed? How are you going to find the Solicitor General?

The amendment that was suggested and moved last evening is one that actually meets in general the whole thrust of the argument I advanced. However, I would make a couple of suggestions.

Provision was made therein that:

Where the judge to whom an application is made pursuant to subsection (1) is satisfied that the urgency of the situation requires that interception of private communications commence before an authorization could, with reasonable diligence, be obtained—

That is pursuant to the judicial portion of the bill.

—he may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as he considers advisable, give an authorization—

I suggested, and the minister accepted the suggestion, that the authorization should not be one of these telephonic authorizations.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. gentleman for a moment, but I must remind him that his time has expired. I have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent to allow the right hon. member to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My thanks. As I was saying, it should not be one of these telephonic authorizations, nor of the type of the northern outdoor courts that were referred to by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who pointed out yesterday that he was able to get an ex parte order from a judge who was 200 miles away on a fishing trip. That kind of thing cannot be done if this amendment is accepted. There has to be an authorization from a judge, and it must be a written authorization. If there were action taken without a written authorization, action on the part of a police officer would be a nullity, ineffective, and unusable.

Then, there was no provision for a time limit in the draft that the minister brought to my attention, and I urged that the same period of 36 hours should be the limit under the amendment. Sir, I am not one who gloats over changes that are made. Parliament used to operate this way in the days of Mr. King, in the darkest days of war, but I do find that some hon. members do not operate this way, and I do not except the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who, in my absence the other day, chose to make a personal attack. That does not worry me one bit. He showed how right the original bill was. He gave it his approval. Anyone who might think anything to the contrary belonged outside the purview of those who regard law and order as important, not only in universities but in the law courts. He poured forth ridicule.

I am not going to read all he said because I will have another opportunity on third reading, if he chooses to get into the debate again. However, by the time the minister got through introducing this amendment yesterday, I may say I have never seen a rug pulled from under an hon. gentleman to the extent that one was pulled from under the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. If the hon. gentleman has any alibis I will be glad to hear them, but I simply point out to him that parliament is a place you have to get used to, and no member in this House, speaking with the authority he endeavoured to impart to his words, ever was figuratively so taken out to the woodshed as he was yesterday afternoon. I will say no more, unless the hon. gentleman makes another speech in my absence. Then, I will operate without anaesthetic.

This is a good amendment. There are shortcomings in it. There are alterations that can be made and that ought to be made. These will be pointed out. It is parliament at its best when we can disagree as strongly as we have on this bill, and yet the government finally recognizes that the opposition has produced views that are worthy of consideration in the interests of the freedom of Canadians.

When this matter originally came up in the committee on the thirteenth day of the sixth month of 1972, the minister explained that there was not any need to worry about it because, as he said, the committee should appreciate that what would very seriously narrow if not practically eliminate the emergency power would be the acceptance of anything along the line I have suggested. He said:

The emergency power is put in because there may be times when the circumstances require quick action and a judge is not available in the immediate period to give a warrant.

Then he was asked by a well known member of the bar, the hon. member of Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams):

How are you going to control police and peace officers from always considering everything as an emergency?

The minister replied:

Well, I think there are two controls essentially. One, of course, is the general political one, because the person using the power has to be specially designated by the Attorney General or the Solicitor General and, therefore, there is an immediate political responsibility. In addition, there is a requirement, in the normal course, to follow up with an application to a judge for any of the evidence that is involved to be made use of and that would certainly be an opportunity for judicial comment as well upon the use of the emergency power.

Now, look at what has been accepted by the minister. I presume it will even appeal to the finer sensibilities of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, who took on all the authority of a judge and a jury and who just obliterated anyone who dared to have a view contrary to the views he expressed. There is still hope for him, however, when he comes to vote on this measure on Tuesday, and on third reading, because I will be here to watch him. If he is prepared to get up and vote, I shall relish the dessert of crow of which he will be partaking. There is one thing about the House of Commons: never allow yourself, however attractive the temptation may be, to get out on the end of a limb and then come off that limb. The hon. member will learn with the passing years, that that is a good rule.

● (1530)

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, there is more joy in Heaven than a sinner who returns—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) cannot help me on that even though he is a member of the clergy!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I can tell the hon. member he is misquoting it.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: His memory is good! There is joy here in this House of Commons. Having advertently, I suppose, supported a course by a committee on this particular item, the government has learned as a result of the argument in this House that what it was about to have enacted would have been dangerous to freedom in our country. Indeed, the organization that was set up by the Department of the Solicitor General known as the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group, in the hands of those unknowns and unidentifieds, would have the power to destroy political opponents by Star Chamber operations. I am glad the government has decided that this was wrong. Indeed, if this measure had been passed in its original form, I feel sure that the Bill of Rights would have been resorted to, and with success.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the assurance of the right hon. gentleman that he expects me to be here enough years to acquire the experience which he thinks I need. I hesitated to interrupt the right hon. member while he was speaking with a point of privilege because I did not want to interrupt the flow of his oratory. I should like to say, however, that I did not speak in his absence the other day. As a matter of fact, I had hoped that he would be here and he was here when I began. He was sitting right behind the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) but when I first mentioned his name he left, voluntarily. Perhaps he did not hear me, but the fact is that I thought he was going to be here and I had hoped he would be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in accepting the hon. member's explanation. When he started off so blandly I expected he would continue in that vein.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I defer to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) as I believe he has other commitments.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner).

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and may I thank my colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) for this great courtesy. May I also say, Mr. Speaker, that it is always a privilege to speak immediately after the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It is a privilege and at the same time a challenge to follow such a statesman.

[Translation]

I do not think there is anywhere in Canada, today, a former prime minister or a prime minister in office who can hold a candle to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who is known as the father of the Canadian Bill of Rights and who has shown so much wisdom and statesmanship in the administration of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to be very brief because my colleagues and especially the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) have expounded at length the position of our party.

I am proud to support the amendments introduced by them and designed to make this legislation more meaningful and humane. I am all the more proud that this amended legislation is now in full agreement with the objectives of protecting society and the rights of the citizen.

I am glad I am in the same position as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) because, like him, I am often away from the House. I smile because whenever I am away my opponents are quick to divert the debates with personal attacks against the member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I am not surprised and even slightly amused. This shows the extent of their interest in me and also their anxiety but, of course, all depends on who throw those accusations.

I am proud today to be in a better company than the two hon. members who, on Tuesday afternoon, took pleasure in abusing me.

I know that it is perhaps a custom for some people, but it is a custom that will soon come to an end.

I read the comments of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), and I am sure it is useless to give her too much publicity, since the editor of Le Devoir took care of that this morning. I could perhaps quote part of Mr. Laplante's article which reads as follows:

> Even if Mr. Choquette had already been especially tolerant of police abuse, Mrs. Morin is second to none as regards fearing self-created illusions.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert has now deserved the fate of her predecessor and that she will soon be appointed consult in Louisiana, provided that she can learn to master every shade of the creole language a little more skilfully than the subtleties of law. It is therefore useless to repeat what the hon. member said in this House, but she seems to think that only the Liberal party respects law and order. Moreover, as reported at page 8182 of Hansard, she said:

> So, the two parties across the Chamber . . .

I suppose that she meant the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party.

> So, the two parties across the Chamber should not be surprised if they do not find any support in the province of Quebec. They do not stand for law and order.

Mr. Speaker, I am able to match my efforts to maintain social peace and law and order in Quebec against those of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert or any other member of this House.

Mrs. Morin: Before 1972.

Mr. Wagner: Before 1972, says the hon. member for Louis-Hébert, because the fact that I became a Conservative changes everything in her opinion. The principles remain the same, the man also, but the hon. member is attracted by the colour.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose that the hon. member would like me to say something like this:

[English]

Perhaps this lady would like me to say for instance, "yes, there is danger from within and without—we need law and order". Is that what the hon. member would like me to say?

[Translation]

Is that what you want?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. Wagner: Of course, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry.

I resume the quotation:

[English]

> Yes, without law and order our nation cannot survive . . . Elect us and we shall restore law and order.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Louis-Hébert is smiling and heartily accepts a quotation that is to her liking.

[English]

● (1540)

> We shall by law and order be respected among the nations of the world. Without law and order our republic shall fall . . .

[Translation]

And the lady from Louis-Hébert keeps on smiling. Those are the words she would like to hear—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether the hon. member is abiding a well-established parliamentary tradition when he refers to another member as the gentleman or the lady from Louis-Hébert. He may refer to another member, but not in that way.

Mr. Wagner: You are absolutely right, Mr. Speaker. Besides, when one reads the remarks of the member for Louis-Hébert, one wonders whether they are those of a lady or a man.

Mrs. Morin: I read the speeches you made before 1972.

Mr. Wagner: So the member for Louis-Hébert who is now interjecting is very satisfied with the words I have just quoted. I say to her, Mr. Speaker, that they come from an electoral speech made in Hamburg in 1932 by Adolf Hitler.

Mr. Speaker—

Mrs. Morin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) rises on a question of privilege.

Mrs. Morin: Would the hon. member tell us when he intends to deal with the bill before us?

Mr. Wagner: Right now, Mr. Speaker. I am in good company today with the Official Opposition, and I try to improve this legislation. Of course, I would be remiss if I did not mention the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guay). As a matter of fact, I heard a lot about him in Quebec City last Tuesday. They are quite anxious to have the next election called as soon as possible.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I find it very unfortunate that the hon. member for Lévis, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice,—of course he is just a parliamentary secretary and as you know, it is not the cowl that makes the monk— had the guts to rise in this House and say certain things. I quote, Mr. Speaker, from page 8193 of Hansard of November 27, 1973. The hon. member for Lévis says so many things! I quote:

I can well remember the time when he was minister of justice—

Because, obviously, he speaks about the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

—in Quebec. I am not asking him to answer for his mandate. What did he do to improve the legislation within his department? What did he do in the field of law or penal reform? This is what I am asking him.

The man asking me those questions is the one who in 1970, at the time of the Liberal party leadership convention in Quebec, travelled through various areas with me praising the Minister of Justice and saying how he could administer the province of Quebec and ensure social peace, how right he was in his interpretation of the Constitution of Canada when my opponent simply wanted to lie flat before the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is that very same member who asks today where is your record? As he will recall, the record started with the creation of a Department of Justice that did not exist in the province of Quebec. Then there was a judicial reform not only through action but through legislation and internal administration, the creation of a Justice Advisory Board in the province of Quebec, the creation of welfare courts in all ridings of the province, when there were just a few, the extension of legal aid all over the province. Finally and particularly there was the creation across the province of not only a better spirit and belief in a justice equal for all, but also the launching of an active fight against crime and not only inquiries that are witch hunts like those going on now in the province of Quebec. That is what the then Quebec Minister of Justice did.

But Mr. Speaker, the important thing is—

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lévis is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) involved me quite directly by saying that I had supported him at the leadership convention in 1970. I fully agree with him, but I want to point out that I supported him because he was talking about law and order in the province of Quebec. He is the one who has changed his mind. He is the turncoat, not me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. member of Saint-Hyacinthe who has the floor.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, respect for law and order is never an end in itself in a society. Law and order are a condition without which a given society cannot flourish. But those who would have law and order as an ideal, an end, a goal to achieve through any means, any compromise, those people err. In the province of Quebec, at least from 1964 to 1966, the law was respected, and all were equal before the law, to such an extent that, at one point, when two Liberal members sitting by my side in the legislature were found guilty of having accepted bribes, they were brought before courts, like any other citizen, because justice was the same for all. That is something to be proved by actions, not by speeches.

Today, Mr. Speaker, what is going on in Quebec? That is the very reason for the bill. Barely a few hours ago, the Quebec Bar Association, and I am proud of its action, published a news release which reads as follows:

. . . the Quebec Bar Association seriously censors the Quebec Minister of Justice, Mr. Choquette, for having approved the illegal actions of policemen who installed wiretaps in lawyers' offices in Montreal.

Permit me a digression. The hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) was saying a while back that the police was not involved in what happened in the lawyers' offices. On the other hand, Mr. Choquette said that it was indeed the work of the police. The press release continues:

The Bar finds it aberrant and inadmissible that the Quebec Minister of Justice would care so little for basic democratic principles, such as professional secrecy and the inviolability of offices and private residences.

The Bar is extremely worred about the invasion of privacy suggested by the minister's attitude and considers that, with the authorization of the Minister of Justice, the offices of judges, politicans and senior government officials can now be wiretapped, which is a direct menace to the relations between citizens and these professionals, that were usually protected by the seal of secrecy.

Mr. Speaker, I would rather be in the company of the official opposition, of hon. members from other parties and of members of the Montreal Bar than in the company of the hon. members for Louis-Hébert and for Lévis.

It is unfortunate that now, when we discuss this problem, we see in the province of Quebec that wiretapping applies first of course to the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste on the pretext that it is a hazard to national security. This has been done for six months. It is then applied to lawyers and it will soon be applied to judges or notaries, real estate brokers, federal politicians, on the pretext that government security is endangered.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to endanger the security of those who administer the government, of those who fail to do what the people want, who do not give them the great social justice, who cannot find the solutions to unemployment, to the rise in the cost of living—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope that the hon. member will now come to the motion before the House, namely the motion moved by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the amendment. I think the hon. member is straying a little from the subject.

Mr. Wagner: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker.

● (1550)

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Very rarely do I have occasion to disagree with anything Your Honour might say, but if the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) can spend most of her time castigating individuals in the House on certain matters, surely the hon. member who is now speaking should have an opportunity to reply. If the heat gets too great in the kitchen, to use the old cliché, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert knows what she can do. I think the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) should be allowed to follow that line.

Mr. Speaker: I do not disagree with the suggestion made by the hon. member. My understanding was that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe had completed that part of his remarks and had gone on to other subjects.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: I appreciate your advice, Mr. Speaker, and it is with pleasure that I shall pursue in a different vein, while pointing out the real danger existing now as regards the rights of the individual, especially in the province of Quebec, where I live and of which I am proud to be a representative. And it is because of the existence of such a danger that I wanted to contribute to this debate. I wanted to say publicly that police officers themselves expect the law to protect them. Besides they are unwilling to lend themselves to such wiretapping for partisan or political purposes. They want to be protected as regards be the inviolability of the citizens' homes and they said so to me themselves.

Last week, I had the opportunity of speaking to officers about an inquiry on organized crime in Montreal. They agreed that we should pass a law strict enough to provide for the protection of all citizens.

Unfortunately when I see in the province of Quebec that Minister of Justice who wears a revolver in a shoulder holster and who would like now to keep both hands on the wiretap, I say to myself: It is about time that members of the federal Parliament say something. And if the only way to improve a bill is by making it worthy of a civilized society, it is by doing what we are doing now, I believe, that we are discharging that duty.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to abuse the time of the House. I note with great pleasure that there is unanimity, not only on this side of the House, but among the members of the press and within the agencies that take a special interest in the political and social life in this country. That brings comfort to us and indicates that we are in the right direction.

Even with the amendments that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) or the parliament will approve we will not have yet attained perfection. Indeed, we will never attain perfection but at least we will have succeeded in reducing to a certain extent serious injustice that will happen if these amendments are not accepted.

I would urge all my colleagues in this House to go beyond that legislation and to become more concerned, in matters of justice for instance, that the decisions of courts be respected, that criminals be rehabilitated in a more realistic and planned way, that our prison guards be better paid and in the complete administration of justice that we have not the impression that the big ones are always winners and the small ones always losers.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we still have a long way to go before we could be proud to have perfect justice in our society; we have already started with my colleagues from Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) and Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and also thanks to others as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and others we will have gone through an important and historical stage in this House.

[English]

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, there are two motions on the order paper standing in my name, motions Nos. 4 and 12. With Your Honour's permission and the permission of the House, I should like leave to withdraw those motions. They both deal with the emergency permit section and are substantially similar to the one presented by the right hon. member. With the consent of the House, I would like to withdraw those and then make some remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) that motions Nos. 4 and 12 standing in his name be withdrawn. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to make this request?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motions are accordingly withdrawn.

Motions Nos. 4 and 12 withdrawn.

Mr. Leggatt: I wish to thank the House for its consideration. Dealing with the emergency permit clause we attempted to delete from the bill, I wish to say that although we are not delighted, the amendment does go a very long way toward meeting the objections of many of us on this side of the House. I cannot do too much more than echo some of the remarks of the right hon. member with regard to the amendments which have been presented. I am impressed that this parliament in this minority situation is working extremely well, efficiently and in favour of the citizens in terms of liberty of the people. That is good.

The amendment which has been presented substantially satisfied the objection we have, namely that we should use the judiciary and rely upon the rule of law in this country rather than avoid it. Someone once said that liberty is a very delicate flower. You can take a flower and make it wilt in imperceptible degrees. The emergency permit clause which was included in this bill would have gone in the direction of wilting a little bit more that very delicate flower which we in this country treasure so much. I am pleased we have had an accommodation in this matter. Our party will support the position taken by the right hon. member on this issue. When this amendment comes to a vote, we intend to vote with the right hon. member.

I am still somewhat concerned about a number of other clauses in the bill. I presume I would be out of order to deal with them at this point. However, I want to refer briefly to something I mentioned yesterday on a point of order. In spite of what the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) told the House, the Montreal Gazette reported yesterday that two police officers in Quebec had bugged two lawyers offices. People say this is a lawyers' debate. Lawyers are always involved in this kind of thing. However, the right of every single citizen in this country is involved, as well as the precious right of a lawyer and his client to consult in confidence. If that right is attacked and removed, then we will have witnessed one of the most serious attacks on principle that could take place in this country. The hon. member for Louis-Hebert can shrug her shoulders and say we have to have law and order. Such practices do not fall within the ambit of law and order in the civilized sense that most of with western traditions have been brought up to know and understand. That kind of thing cannot be permitted to continue.

I want to quote one of the more important remarks made by the Quebec Minister of Justice concerning a question he was asked in the House, as reported in the Montreal Gazette. When he was asked about bugging, his answer was—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Louis-Hébert is rising on a question of privilege.

• (1600)

Mrs. Morin: Mr. Speaker, according to the hon. member, I said in my speech that lawyers' offices in Montreal had been wiretapped by the police. I do not remember at all saying that in my speech and I would like the hon. member to withdraw his comments.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: It was made during an interjection, and not during a speech. I do not think it is any less valid to say that the information given to the House was quite incorrect. It is recorded in Hansard as the hon. member would see if she would check the remarks made during that day's debate. However, I would certainly accept the point she has made.

I should like to quote the minister of justice of Quebec in reference to the bugging of these law offices. This was his answer: "I cannot control all these systems; I cannot control every police investigation in Quebec, that would be impossible." Now, if the Minister of Justice cannot control the police, if he cannot control investigations in the Province of Quebec, we are in a sad state. This bill needs to be passed. It needs to be tight, because the statement I have just cited is one of the most damaging admissions which any minister of justice could make. I am not singling out Mr. Choquette because he happens to be the minister of justice in Quebec; the same statement could well be made by attorneys General in other provinces throughout the country, since the law is the same in the Province of Quebec as it is in any other province.

When the minister of justice says he cannot control every police investigation in the Province of Quebec it becomes even more pertinent that I remind hon. members of the presence on the order paper of an amendment which attempts to remove the use of the agency procedure for which provision is presently made in the bill. If we pass the bill in its present form so as to allow the use of designated, authorized agents, I submit that the same lack of control about which the minister of justice complained in the Province of Quebec will not be remedied, and on this and other grounds I urge support for that particular amendment.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): In the course of debate on this bill an important point was made by myself and by other members of the House, namely that the inclusion of a judge in the process provided an added degree of protection. In addition to the political responsibility of the Attorney General and the required designation of persons to exercise that responsibility on his behalf, additional protection would be afforded. This approach is, I think, made even more valid by the events of which we have lately learned and gives added reason for the inclusion of a judge in the process. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) does not seem to have been, on the whole, an ardent supporter of the arrangement of the inclusion of the judge, but no doubt he now appreciates that there was a good deal of wisdom in that proposal.

I am pleased indeed that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), my fellow member from Saskatchewan, finds that the amendment now before the House is acceptable. It is well known throughout the country that the right hon. gentleman is outstanding in a number of respects. I may say on the one hand, without hesitation, that he is recognized as one of the most eloquent spokesmen for the cause of civil liberty and freedom in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Without pretending to copy his style, may I say, he is well recognized, too, as one of the foremost tilters at windmills in Canadian history.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have had lots of opportunities, looking at the government. Tilting at windbags, also.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: In the political process it is sometimes difficult to know whether he is speaking eloquently for civil liberties or tilting at another windmill. I did make a suggestion earlier that the eloquence he used in the initial stages of this bill was more a tilting at windmills than a defence of liberty because of the protection included in the bill and because of the basic need on occasion to enable swift action to be taken. However, we have managed to bring together the cause of liberty and the attraction of the windmill, and we have been able to find a solution which includes the judge in the process in circumstances where electronic intrusion is required in an urgent situation in the cause of justice, and in the course of law enforcement and investigation.

I appreciate the attitude taken by hon. members in trying to find solutions of this sort in the course of the development of this law. The bill stands, I must say again, as an extremely important measure designed for the protection of privacy in our country. We are creating, for the first time, offences in respect of intrusion into that privacy while at the same time trying to keep a balance which allows for the proper use of electronic devices by law enforcement officers. I am pleased, indeed, that the House is agreeing to the amendment put forward by my parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Leggatt: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In his remarks the minister indicated I had somehow changed my views in the course of the study of this bill. I should like to point out that I introduced an amendment to remove the emergency clause from it. I voted in favour of an amendment to remove the emergency clause in committee, and I supported this position throughout the entire debate from the time the bill was first read. So, I think it is unfair to suggest there has been any inconsistency on my part.

Mr. Lang: On the same question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is really not a question of privilege, but since hon. members are trying to get their positions clearly on record perhaps I could be permitted to recognize the Minister of Justice on the same point.

Mr. Lang: I would just like to make it clear that I agree completely with the point the hon. member for New Westminster has made. My point was this: I thought he was beginning to see the value of including the judge in the process of granting permits and that this, perhaps, was an important change of heart. I did not claim I had his word on that, though.

Mr. Leggatt: On the same question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again, perhaps, with consent, the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Leggatt: On that point, with regard to the inclusion of a judge, during the first reading, the second reading and throughout the debates in committee I always voted in favour of including judicial approval in relation to all the clauses, including the emergency clause. Of course, we have now got to the point where the minister has brought back the judge. There has been no question, as far as I am concerned, that we should always have used the judicial process for the approval of wiretaps.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the minister who has seen the light.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, since I had the opportunity of speaking on the main motion I shall be very brief in my comments on the amendment standing in the name of the parliamentary secretary to the minister to the motion of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I direct my remarks to certain technical problems which the amendment appears to involve. I apologize for being absent from the chamber for a minute or two; perhaps I missed any comments the minister may have relating to some of these technical shortcomings which I understand he will be attempting to clarify or correct through an amendment of his own or in the name of one of his hon. friends on that side of the House.

As it now reads, the amendment does not require a peace officer or a judge who grants the authorization to comply with any reporting requirement pursuant to the annual report of the Attorneys General or the Solicitor General. This may be an oversight and the appropriate correction can be made, through cross-reference, in due course. Similarly, it may be unfortunate that the amendment should choose to use the term "peace officer". An earlier amendment used the term "agent" and this at least was consistent with the other language used in the bill. I say this bearing in mind that there are certain reporting requirements affecting agents, specifically the requirement that agents be named in the annual reports of the Attorneys General and the Solicitor General. I would hope that a housekeeping amendment might be brought in to provide for the naming of these peace officers who are to be granted this extraordinary power for an emergency operation by a judge for a period of 36 hours. Again, I think it is important for the protection of the citizens of Canada that ultimately there be some publicity as to the machinery to put this particular section into operation.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I think there has to be some built-in protection in this admittedly important emergency section to guard against its possible continual and repeated use. I think it was intended by the minister, and certainly by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that this be an extraordinary section used only in emergency situations when it is not possible to comply with the requirements of Sections 178.12 and 178.13. One of the methods suggested in the standing committee to guard against repeated and continual use of the emergency section to the exclusion of the regular section, was an amendment put forward in the name of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor). It was adopted in the bill as reported back from the committee as sub-section (5) to Section 178.15.

Of course, the original motion moved in the name of the right hon. gentleman quite rightly sought to delete the entire section which, of course, followed the intention of the motion in the name of the hon. member for Halton because that was the course of action sought at that particular time; that is, to get rid of Section 178.15 in its entirety. Now that we have the revised version of Section 178.15, which is apparently acceptable to all members of the House, somehow the additional protection against continual use was dropped. I would propose that the section be reinserted at the end of Section 178.15, and I propose to do this by way of a subamendment to the proposed amendment by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) to Motion No. 3. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

> That the proposed amendment of Mr. Guay (Lévis) to Motion No. 3 be amended by deleting the first three lines of paragraph (a) of the amendment and substituting the following:
> (a) striking out the following words and numbers appearing in lines 2 to 4 of paragraph (b): "lines 1 to 13 inclusive at page 9 and lines 23 to 28 inclusive at page 11".

In so moving the subamendment, Mr. Speaker, I believe I stay within the spirit of the amendment proposed in the name of the hon. member for Lévis, and certainly within the very strict spirit of the bill as reported back from the standing committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house has heard the proposed subamendment by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). Without going into all the niceties of it, I would presume it fits within the spirit of Mr. Speaker's ruling at approximately this time yesterday in respect of another proposed subamendment, but if anyone has a point of order to raise I will be pleased to reserve my decision.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it there is no question about the propriety of the subamendment?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In my haste to draft the motion before you I think I did make one minor error. Rather than coming back with a further sub-subamendment it might be in order for me to provide Your Honour with the correction at the present time. May I proceed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Atkey: The corrected subamendment would read as follows:

That the proposed amendment of Mr. Guay (Lévis) to Motion No. 3 be amended by deleting the first three lines of paragraph (a) of the amendment and substituting the following:

(a) striking out the following words and numbers appearing in lines 1 to 13 inclusive—

With respect, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member suggested, I think I am going to have to eat some crow. I think my original version is correct.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I read the hon. member's writing that is right. The last lines refer to lines 1 to 13 inclusive at page 9 and lines 23 to 28 inclusive at page 11. I do not know that there are copies available to other members, but I was going to ask whether hon. members wished this matter reserved in order that the amendment could be typed out and circulated. I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this matter and we are agreeable to proceeding with the proposed subamendment. We are agreeable to the change.

Mr. Leggatt: Likewise, Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this proposal with the hon. member and we are happy to support the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House then ready for the question on the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Subamendment (Mr. Atkey) agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question now is on the amendment proposed by Mr. Guay (Lévis). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment as just amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Guay, Lévis) agreed to.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now move to the main motion standing in the name of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt that motion as amended within the last few minutes?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Diefenbaker) as amended agreed to.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the indulgence of the House in respect of a total of six procedural matters. First of all, I would seek the consent of the House to the withdrawal of motion No. 11 which deals with this same section. It was designed to correct a typographical error and is clearly no longer necessary. That motion went to division and was, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) quite properly described it, footless or functus.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): "Functus" was the word I used.

Mr. Lang: I would ask for the consent of the House to the withdrawal of motion No. 11 standing in my name.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that motion No. 11 be withdrawn. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 11 (Mr. Lang) withdrawn.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have four amendments of a consequential nature designed to change those portions of the act which deal with "permit". They ought to refer to "authorizations" under Section 178.15(2). With your leave, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might move all four motions.

• (1620)

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro):

That Bill C-176 be amended by striking out line 12 on page one and substituting the following:

'given under section 178.13 or subsection 178.15(2);'

Second, I move:

That Bill C-176 be amended by striking out line 38 on page two and substituting the following:

'with any such authorization;'

Third, I move:

That Bill C-176 be amended by striking out

(a) lines 10 to 14 on page 15 and substituting the following:

'(b) authorizations given under section 178.15 for which peace officers to be named in the report who were specially designated by him for the purposes of that section made application,' and

(b) lines 29 to 32 on page 18 and substituting the following:

'(b) authorizations given under section 178.15 for which peace officers specially designated by him for the purposes of that section made application,'

Fourth, I move:

That Bill C-176 be amended by striking out line 37 and 38 on page 17 and substituting:

'tion referred to in subsection (2), set forth'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motions of the Minister of Justice, seconded by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) in respect of four amendments, as a consequence of earlier proceedings this afternoon. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the four motions as presented by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to the next items, which I take it would be Nos. 19 and 20, I should like to indicate that there has been discussion and seems to be general agreement—and if that should be so I would appreciate it being made an order of the House—that the divisions which may be standing, and which may stand after the report stage debate is completed, be voted upon when orders of the day are called on Tuesday next and, if it is thought desirable by the House leaders, that third reading might proceed following that voting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure about that. So far as the voting is concerned sometime on Tuesday is all right, but there should be no denial of the right of discussion on third reading.

Mr. Lang: There was no intention to indicate that there would be any denial of the right of discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister said that immediately after the orders of the day a vote would be taken.

Mr. Lang: The vote would be taken, then third reading would be called and there could be debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I see no need to defer the votes until Tuesday, but if that is agreed to we will go along with it and also join in the necessary unanimous consent so that the third reading motion may be called, and debated if desirable, on the same day the report stage divisions take place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the Minister of Justice that the divisions at the report stage on Bill C-176 take place after the routine proceedings and the question period on Tuesday next, to be followed after the divisions by the motion for third reading and any debate which arises from that motion. Is this agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. Paul's rising on a point of order?

Mr. Atkey: No, Mr. Speaker. I am rising to speak to the next motion to be called which I believe is motion No. 19.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With regard to motions Nos. 19 and 20 it is the feeling of the Chair, perhaps hopefully shared by the hon. member, that they might be grouped for the purpose of the debate and that an affirmative vote on motion No. 19 would also dispose of motion No. 20. Does any point of order arise from this?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What would a negative vote do?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. Paul's rising on the point of order raised by the Chair?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I anticipated the suggestion made by the Chair, but I should point out to Your Honour and to hon. members that motion No. 19 really is a housekeeping type of motion made, I think, with the agreement of the majority of the members of the committee. It relates to cleaning up an amendment which had been passed prior to the subsequent adoption of further amendments which made necessary the motion standing in my name. I think it would facilitate discussion on the main issue, as brought to the floor by motion No. 20 in the name of the Minister of Justice, if we would first deal with motion No. 19 and get it out of the way. Then, we would have a clear run on motion No. 20.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with that. Essentially, I have no argument whatever with the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Paul's, assuming that section remains in the bill. I think, so long as it does not interfere with the right to have a full debate on the section remaining in the bill, we would find the change proposed by the hon. member for St. Paul's agreeable and then we could have debate on the main question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that it is the wish that the House proceed to the consideration of motion No. 19.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's) moved:

No. 19

That Bill C-176 to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended in clause 2 by deleting lines 8 to 12 inclusive at page 19 and substituting therefor:

'in the case of a warrant issued under section 16(2) of the Official Secrets Act.'

Motion (Mr. Atkey) agreed to.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved:

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of putting this motion before the House is to have the House consider once again the question of the utility, on the one hand, of requiring notice such as this to be given and, on the other hand, of examining the problems which may be created by requiring that notice and considering, therefore, the balance of convenience which is involved. The section refers strictly to those cases where authorizations have been obtained. Therefore, it should be obvious to hon. members that we are dealing with an area wherein investigation is going on by law enforcement officers, where they have presented a case to a judge and obtained the necessary authorization to use an electronic device and that that use of the electronic device has served its purpose. It is at that point the question arises whether notice should be given to the person who was the subject of that particular kind of investigation.

I really ask what great value is served by that. I can only see one negative aspect, that if you do not get a notice at some point in time, you know there are no legal authorizations of electronic devices against you so you can rest easy that for the three previous months you have not been the subject of this kind of investigation. We are talking about the area of legal authorization, and there is no question of giving notice and then taking advantage of other sections of the law to pursue an illegal use of these devices. In the case of the illegal use of these devices, there is no question of notice being required under the section because it clearly deals with authorization. The section itself has a number of problems, including the fact that notice is required to be given to the subject of surveillance, and in some cases there is a great difficulty in knowing exactly who the subject of surveillance is in relation to a particular electronic intrusion. The person whose conversation may have been under investigation or whose activities are under investigation may not have ended up at the place where the electronic intrusion is placed.

That is the kind of possibility that exists, and yet he would presumably have to receive notice. The major problem is that investigations by the police into the most serious levels of crime are sometimes extremely long and difficult matters. They can last a number of years, not just a number of days, weeks or months, and it may well be that an electronic intrusion is required at a certain stage in the procedure of such an investigation. The very last thing that justice would require is that the person under a continuing investigation be advised by the police that that investigation is going on. In some cases this could completely destroy the whole effort and process of our law enforcement officers to bring to justice the person whose conduct they are investigating. In some cases it is known that police in their investigation could get to the point where they could lay a charge in regard to some lesser offence but will none the less take the proper decision to continue the investigation and not lay the charge because laying the charge would have revealed that the investigation was underway. This indicates how important it is that there be no such indication of an investigation taking place.

It should be noted also that we do not require the police to give notice to citizens of other forms of investigation which they are undertaking or of investigations which they have undertaken and discontinued. One could make an argument regarding why such a procedure is not desirable, but especially in regard to investigations made in these circumstances where there was sufficient concern about the possible committing of an offence by the person in question that authorization was granted and he is now to be given notice of the fact that authorization has taken place. As indicated, these investigations in some cases go on for several years. In the section as it is presently worded, the only thing that can be done is for the judge within 90 days to either require the notice or extend the determined period of time. It is doubtful whether he would be able to extend it long enough to cover the situation where an investigation has continued a long time. In addition, it means going back to the courts. When no useful purpose is served, I wonder whether we should go back to the courts in this manner and take up more of their time in this process.

There is the case of the smuggling of heroin into Canada where an investigation had gone on for two years or so. After several years, the police were able to move in and obtain first hand evidence of drug trafficking on the part of particular criminals, who subsequently received long sentences. In this case, the police officers employed electronic devices at some early stage in the investigation which took two years to come to its culmination. If a report had had to be given, a notification to the suspects of the fact that they were under investigation and the police therefore were on to them, this would certainly have been adequate warning to them. The possibility of detection would have ended, not only of them in the commission of the serious offence of trafficking and possession of heroin, but in addition an adequate warning would have been given to them so that they could have disposed of the drug in other ways and got it successfully into Canada. In that case, this was prevented because of the long and careful investigation which involved an electronic intrusion at an early stage of the case.

I ask hon. members to consider that kind of problem. There could be many such cases. I ask them most earnestly to consider this matter and weigh it against the advantage they see in a report going to the person who is under surveillance. Therefore, I ask the support of hon. members, some of whom may or may not have been in the committee, in looking at the difficulty which has been caused in the investigative processes if this kind of notice is required. I ask hon. members to support the conclusion at which I arrived which led me to move the deletion of this section because the harm to the cause of law enforcement far outweighs any advantage that can be read into the reporting provisions. Accordingly, I ask hon. members to support this amendment in my name.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, this is yet another attempt by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) to overturn an amendment adopted by a majority vote in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The vote that he is seeking to overturn this time was carried in that committee by ten votes to eight. I am afraid that the minister has missed the point of the amendment. I thought this may have happened in the committee, but having heard the minister this afternoon, I am convinced that he missed the point.

The main purpose of the notice requirement is to keep the whole system honest, to keep the system forthright, to cause the Attorney General or his agents or the Solicitor General or his agents to think twice before proceeding with an application under section 178.12 or the emergency section 178.15. It is yet another important check of the use of the dangerous device of electronic surveillance. Far from attempting to put an unnecessary roadblock in the way of law enforcement, it is an important device by which the machinery of justice in its use of electronic surveillance can be brought out into the open after the event, and with certain adequate safeguards that meet virtually all of the objections which have been raised by the minister.

There is a second reason for this amendment. It is an amendment which applies to authorization which has been legally obtained, in that the reporting requirement makes the offence and damage sections of the bill much more meaningful. It will assist an individual Canadian, in the first instance, to know whether he has been the victim of a legal wiretap. Indeed if a Canadian discovers electronic surveillance equipment, and in due course does not receive the adequate notice to which he would be entitled under this amendment, then obviously he has good reason to suspect that he may have been the victim of an illegal tap. In that case, he has the very meaningful damage section open to him whereby he can proceed against the perpetrator of that illegal surveillance for punitive damages to the extent of $5,000, and he can seek to have that individual prosecuted in the criminal courts where the individual can face a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment.

But without the notice section, who is ever going to know? Certainly, the evidence placed before a judge on an application for authorization is not going to be a matter of public record. Certainly, the hearing at which an authorization is obtained is not a public hearing. It is an ex parte hearing in secret, and I think it is clear from the evidence of the police or law enforcement officials, put before the Justice Committee at various proceedings in this and the last parliament, that the police or law enforcement officials themselves are not going to make available the evidence that was used to obtain the authorization. Obviously, that is going to be secret documentation. At some point there has to be accountability, and unless we have this notice section, which the majority of the Justice Committee saw fit to include, we will not have the openness and public accountability which any system of legal electronic surveillance really requires in a free and democratic society.

The original motion which I placed before the standing committee was not spun out of thin air. It was not spun out of my imagination, or the imagination of any individual member of the committee. Indeed, it was the product of the standing committee of the last parliament, a committee which was dominated by a majority of Liberal government supporters, a committee which presented a very excellent report to the House on March 11, 1970. I would like to quote at length from that committee report, because I think the rationale for the amendment which we are debating today was very clearly put forth in it.

> The Committee recommends that every order authorizing the interception of communications specify that the responsible Minister must notify the person who was the object of the surveillance, in writing, within 90 days of the termination of the interception; and that the fact of notification be certified by the responsible Minister to the Court issuing the authorization order. An exception to this rule should be made in the case of an interception involving espionage or sabotage on behalf of a foreign power, or where the responsible Minister certifies to the judge granting the authorization, prior to the expiration of the 90-day period that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted.

It is really pursuant to that majority committee report—I repeat a committee dominated by Liberal government supporters—that the amendment was put forward in the standing committee of this parliament, and it carried.

Again, to illustrate that the committee itself was not spinning its ideas out of thin air, and indeed had subsequent confirmation of some of the rationale behind the suggestion of a notice rule, let me refer to some submissions made by the Canadian Civil Liberties Association when it reported to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on June 6, 1972. I am now going to quote from the brief of the Civil Liberties Association of Canada presented that day.

> But not all electronic bugs will culminate in public hearings. Thus, their victims may never learn of the intrusions they have sustained. In order to minimize the surreptitious character of the process, we believe that the bill should contain a provision requiring notification to the victim within a reasonable period after the termination of the surveillance. Such notification would enable the innocent victim to seek redress where the surveillance might have been improper. Moreover, the requirement of notice would create another political deterrent to widespread and needless bugging. Telling the victim is the perfect complement to disclosing the statistics. The prospect of more angry people might serve to restrain much needless bugging.
> We note that such a provision was included in the U.S. statute, Professor Blakey's proposals and the recommendations of this Committee. It is regrettable that the government did not see fit to include it in Bill C-6. We submit, therefore, that you should try again.

Those words of the Civil Liberties Association tell it all. The majority of the standing committee in the previous parliament recommended a section like this but, for reasons which were not clearly explained, the government chose not to adopt the recommendation. And again, the Civil Liberties Association, making reference to U.S. authorities, to the very excellent evidence of Robert Blakey, professor of law at Notre Dame law school in the United States, and indeed to other statements made in the public domain at that time, came forward and said to the committee, "Have a try again; have another go." The committee in this enlightened parliament did, and we were successful. This is the amendment which the minister now seeks to remove.

I was interested in the minister's comment that one of the particular problems with the wording of the clause before us was that it was very difficult to determine who would be the object of surveillance. I find that strange when it was the minister himself, in committee, who suggested the use of those particular words. The amendment, in the form in which it was originally put, contained the words "any person whose private communication has been intercepted." Those words are obviously much wider than the words which are now in the present bill. Indeed, it was in order to accommodate some of the minister's concerns in committee that the words "those who were the object of the interception" were adopted in the amendment which is now part of the bill.

If I may draw an analogy to show why we need a notice section such as this, I may say it is similar to the situation involving credit reporting agencies where information that potentially invades the privacy of the individual is kept by a commercial concern, and is capable of being passed on by computer and other records to virtually anyone willing to pay for that information. In a number of the provinces legislation is being developed, a principal provision of which is to require disclosure to the individual citizen, so that he has an opportunity to see his file and to correct it. I think that is a wise provision. Similarly, I would suggest that a notice provision here is a wise provision. If there is some hanky-panky, if there is a possibility of illegality in the wiretap against an individual, indeed if there is anything wrong with the process, the requirement that after 90 days the person who was the victim of the tap be notified is going to bring it all out into the open and provide some additional protection.

To answer some of the concerns of the minister that important criminal investigations may well be hampered by this sort of provision, particularly those sorts of investigations which go on for several years, quite clearly subclause (2)(b) provides for the sort of exemptions that the police can obtain from the original granting judge to cover those situations. Certainly, it was never my intent to hamper that type of important investigation, and I have already stated in this House that electronic eavesdropping can be a valuable tool of law enforcement, particularly in the fight against organized crime.

If one examines the wording of section 178.23(2)(b), Mr. Speaker, one sees that it is possible to get an exemption:

> Where the Attorney General of the province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, certifies within the said 90 days in a manner prescribed by regulations to the judge who granted the authorization that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted, in which case the judge may grant a determinate reasonable delay.

The minister suggests that some investigations by their very nature may take one, two or three years. He referred to the very important case involving the smuggling of heroin into Canada. I think that was a case for the proper use of wiretaps, Mr. Speaker. I would have seen nothing wrong in that situation with the police going to the Attorney General and having him, through his counsel, go back to the original judge, and say, "It is going to take not six, 12 or 18 months but two years to crack this case. Can you give us an exemption from the notice requirement?" I think any reasonable judge would grant an exemption, Mr. Speaker. If he were satisfied of the necessity for it, I think he would grant a determinate exemption of two years. So, I think that everything the minister seeks to achieve is possible in the words of this bill.

Finally, to answer an additional concern of the minister, he points out that in other forms of investigation the police and the law enforcement officers are not required to give the sort of notice which this section contemplates. I agree with that and I think that statement really indicates the minister's lack of understanding of what is being attempted with this particular amendment.

There are many in this House, I suspect the majority, who find that law enforcement and investigation through the use of a wiretap is a much different device or bag of tricks than all the other types of investigation and law enforcement devices in use. There is a certain immorality involved with electronic surveillance that is not involved with other types of police investigation. I think it is quite justifiable, as part of the philosophy of myself and others, that wiretapping and electronic surveillance be treated as a special type of situation. That, as contemplated here, is the requirement of notice.

[Mr. Atkey.]

I want to refer to comments made by hon. members in committee, and in particular and with apologies to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who is in his seat. I should like to refer to one statement that he made in committee which I think is particularly compelling in view of his experience politically, legally and judicially. I should like to quote from the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for November 8, 1973 at page 28:20 where the hon. member said:

> I have no hesitation in repeating what I think about electronic espionage. And now, as a legislator, and no longer as an Attorney General only concerned with the enforcement of laws, but as a legislator who is mainly concerned with the rights of citizens who are affected by the enforcement of this act, I question the advisability of broadening the act to allow police or federal or provincial ministries of justice to engage in wiretapping without the strict control that would result from this amendment which ensures that persons exposed to this are notified; and I say this because it seems to me that an in-depth study of this amendment will enable us to point to the abuses that might be brought if the act goes through without this amendment. Without this amendment, wiretapping would become a crutch for the administrators of justice, who would be implicitly admitting their inability to deal with the rising crime rate.

The hon. gentleman concluded by saying:

> —let me say that the use of wiretapping must be limited to precise circumstances, and must be made known at the appropriate time to all those involved.

That statement was put so well that I could not improve upon it, Mr. Speaker, and so I saw the necessity of reading it at this time.

The last point that I would raise, Mr. Speaker, is the other type of exemption that exists from the notice requirement in the form in which it is now drafted. As the section was amended by motion No. 19, there is an exception for situations where there is electronic surveillance involving espionage, sabotage, or other types of subversive activity, sections which were provided for under amendments in this bill to the Official Secrets Act.

I think virtually all members of this House agree that that is a special type of situation in which it would be quite unreasonable to require any form of notice to be given to the persons who are the object of that type of interception. I commend the RCMP security service, and through them and for them the Solicitor General who were so honest and forthright in coming before our committee and indicating the sort of installations and operations that were in use in this country and the necessity for them. I also commend the Solicitor General for arranging for an in camera briefing for members of the committee to indicate the nature of existing operations. It improved my understanding of the nature of that particular process and, accordingly, I have no hesitation in providing an exemption for the notice requirement for all operations under that section of the act.

There is an important protection for Canadians in terms of public knowledge of security service installations by virtue of the reporting requirement on the Solicitor General to table in this House on an annual basis, the number of such security service wiretaps and the extent to which they have been successful, as well as a general assessment of the whole process. That was an amendment brought about by the minister in committee. It is to his credit that he listened to the speeches of hon. members on second reading and in committee.

May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by reiterating the position I took initially in my remarks today. We are concerned here with requiring the police and Attorneys General to give a second look to situations where they are asked to put on electronic surveillance. This provision is not going to hamper them unduly; it is merely going to make them a little more careful and cautious. I think such a provision is in the interests of the liberty and freedom of all Canadians and should be adopted. The bill should be maintained in the form in which it was reported back from committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for New Westminster at eight o'clock.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Canadian Economy—Increase in cost of food—possible programs to supply food to those on low incomes; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Welfare—Method for fulfilling Prime Minister's promise of fuel cost assistance to needy; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Immigration—Indians—Rejection of Jay Treaty by government.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; motion No. 3 (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the amendment thereto of (Mr. Guay (Lévis).

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker . . .

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, it is just that upon reading subsection (1) of section 178.16 in Bill C-176, line 21 on page 9, I noticed that there was a translation mistake. What reads "it unless" in English has been translated by "ou la". It should be "à moins".

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has noted the point made by the hon. parliamentary secretary about the spelling correction in the French version of the bill we have just been considering. Is it agreed that this correction be made?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding private members' hour. There has been discussion and I think there would be agreement that the first five or six minutes of this hour be devoted to order No. 164 standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier) on Bill C-232. We would then proceed with the order standing in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier), No. 96.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are the suggested proceedings for private members' hour agreeable? The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley).

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, we would agree to this arrangement with the stipulation that the first item could take a few more than five or six minutes, but a very few more.

● (1700)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we agree that the limit must be not more than ten minutes from now, in other words, 5.13 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call on the hon. member for Ottawa East, I wish to make something clear. I gather that it is the wish of hon. members that we proceed with all stages of Bill C-232. If that is so, the unanimous consent of the House will be required for the bill to be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that I make this amendment to the motion, in putting the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM OTTAWA EAST TO OTTAWA-VANIER

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East) moved that Bill C-232, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to my colleagues and I thank you.

The purpose of this bill is to change the name of my electoral district to Ottawa-Vanier. This change is in order to identify better the geographic and democraphic facts of my riding.

Bounded by the city of Ottawa, Vanier is included in my electoral district. The name Ottawa-Vanier will reflect more adequately the geographic fact of my riding wherein lie the two cities.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, within the stricture of the time limit laid down by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I suggest that this bill has the complete support of members of my side of the House. We have always wanted riding names to be associated as closely as possible with the ridings for which they stand. In my case, in view of redistribution, I have great sympathy for that principle. I hope, if it becomes necessary for me to bring in a bill or motion with regard to my riding, that I can count on the support of the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier) if he happens to be here.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the time limit which has been established, may I, too, simply say that we are happy to agree to this bill. We accept the underlying principle and we join with all members in saying how pleased we are to see the name of our late, distinguished Governor General Vanier included in the name of an Ottawa riding.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boulanger in the chair.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise and report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR COPY OF PROGRAM FORECAST BY TREASURY BOARD INCLUDING BUDGETS A,B,X

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a complete copy (including budgets A, B, X) of the Program Forecast (Program Review) by the Treasury Board for the latest year for which Parliament approved departmental expenditures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions I have advanced arguments in support of motions very similar to the one we are now considering. So far, it appears that these arguments have not found favour with government members. I want to summarize some of them quickly and introduce new evidence which I think will lend further weight to the basic proposition which underlies this motion and its companion motions. Very simply it is this: that more information must be made available to members of parliament so that they may the better discharge their fundamental responsibilities of approving government spending programs and government legislative initiatives. I contend that information provided to members of parliament—and I know this is true for members of provincial legislatures as well—by the government for the purpose of scrutinizing activities of government is very slim indeed.

In my judgment, Canadian governments have an obsessive tendency to secrecy, and operate on the principle that unless documents prepared somewhere in the bowels of the huge administration are specifically labelled as public, those documents must be regarded as being confidential. I am challenging the implicit conclusion that what parliament shall have the right to know shall be that which the government agrees to reveal. I believe it is important in a democracy like ours for the public, and for members who are representatives of the public, to be given access to more information relating to the creation of government policy, the options which were open to the government as it chose that policy and the rationale which lies behind it.

I am not arguing against all secrecy; I am not taking an extreme position. I readily concede that there are certain kinds of documents and information which it would not be in the public interest or national interest, as distinct from the government's partisan interest, to reveal. I am not suggesting, therefore, that no document should ever be withheld; however, I suggest that there are very real limits to the sacrosanctity of government material. It is quite proper and fitting that the government should recognize that members of parliament have a right to some of the information and some of the material which is compiled and accumulated at such vast expense in the public service.

I suggest that a lack of information seriously impedes the ability of parliament to do its job properly, its most ancient job of expressing grievance in voting supply. I have argued that in the past. I will not repeat the argument fully. In the absence of hard information, members of parliament too easily fall into a reflex partisan position and say yea or nay, depending on the colour of their political uniform rather than on the basis of evidence which might be made available to them.

Members of our party, including myself, have presented motions in this House calling for evaluation reports. There are many motions standing in my name similar to the one before us this afternoon. It is by no accident that in this motion I have called for the program forecast, including budgets A, B, X, in this case of Treasury Board and in other cases of other departments. I was interested in discovering how few members of parliament know what budgets A, B, X are, including some members on the government side who participated in similar debates in earlier weeks in opposition to my motion. One had the grace to admit he really did not know what he was opposing.

Budgets A, B, X is a document which contains three forms of calculations. Each department submits its budget to Treasury Board in the course of preparation of the main estimates. Budget A contains a forecast of the cost of continuing the current programs of that department for another year. Budget B contains a list of cost estimates of new programs which that department would like to introduce and for which it would like to receive permission. Budget X indicates those programs the government would be prepared to scrap or abandon if it were necessary to do so in order to clear the funds for the project outlined in Budget B. In those three straight forward calculations there lies a very interesting and informative story about the kinds of priorities and considerations that have gone into the preparation of the government's program. That kind of document symbolizes the sort of information I have in mind when I talk about parliament's need and right to know.

We need more than the estimates in the massive blue book. We need more information than is usually divulged by ministers and their officials at committee meetings. I have only been a member of this House for a year, but my experience has been that ministers are reluctant to divulge any more information than they possibly have to, and much of the committee meeting consists of dragging from a minister information that it would have been much more sensible for him to have volunteered at the beginning. Some ministers act as though they are on trial at these committee hearings. They say as little as they can. Frankly, the committees are not as informative as I would have thought.

I contrast that reality with the prospect of a committee hearing at which the members of the committee have previously been given much more background information concerning the government's decision to proceed in a particular direction. I thought the questioning would at least touch on the substance rather than the shadow of the issue and in that way, the public interest would be served. I can see that may be a forelorn and naïve viewpoint. I may lose that illusion quickly, but I think it would be a pity if that illusion were shattered.

A couple of years ago the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) raised a very similar matter. At that time he challenged the government's policy which requires that documents be confidential unless otherwise designated. He suggested that policy should be reversed and that government documents should be public unless otherwise designated. I read the speech the hon. member made at that time and the rather unconvincing reply with which it was greeted. I want to summarize two or three points which he made that are worth repeating. He said, and I quote:

—there is an increasing desire on the part of the public to participate more directly in the making of the decisions which inevitably affect them.

He went on to say his challenge to the government policy arose, and I quote:

—out of the belief that the power of the legislature to control the cabinet has been diminishing and ought to be increased.

Speaking for the last parliament, that certainly would have been a valid proposition.

In our society information is power.

If democracy in this country is to be served, there is much to be said for a balance of power between the legislature and the executive.

The hon. member for Selkirk made a point which I want to reiterate, develop slightly and leave as my final thought. He said:

To permit access to government documents as a natural right would not destroy our democratic system but, rather, would enhance it. We would not be the first country to adopt such a law. For over 200 years Sweden has provided open access to official documents and provided full information to any citizen about administrative activities.

I did a little checking on that reference. Indeed, I find that the Swedish government in making a proposition, which is a reasoned argument for legislation, before the Swedish Riksdag, must provide certain information, and I quote from a text entitled "The Parliament of Sweden":

A proposition concerning a law or an important item of expenditure must provide all the necessary information about the facts; similarly it must contain the statements of opinion from administrative agencies and organizations which the government is obliged by the Instrument of Government to consult before arriving at its own attitude towards the measure.

In other words, in presenting a legislative proposal to the Swedish parliament, the government appends the working documents and evaluations which led to the creation of that proposal. I hasten to add for those members who may suspect I am promoting the socialist cause by quoting the Swedish precedent that this particular requirement or instrument of government long antedates the administration of the social democratic regime in Sweden. It is one which has been operative for many years in Sweden. The procedure is followed by the government in nearly all cases when legislation is presented, with the main exception, as hon. members might guess, of measures which involve national security.

I hope very much that those who are speaking on this motion from the government side today will address themselves to the substance of the argument I am making in favour of greater provision of information to members of parliament. This is the central element in the motion and others like it. I trust we shall not have recourse to debate such as has taken place in the past on similar motions when government members have been satisfied merely to recite the somewhat dubious accomplishments of the departments in which they are interested. I hope we can deal with the central issue which characterizes this motion.

Mr. Breau: Would the hon. member permit a question? If it is so important in a political democracy that all position papers and evaluations within parties—and, after all, the government is a party—should be disclosed, does he accept the proposition that position papers prepared for his own party by his own party's research staff should be made public before a decision has been taken on them?

Mr. Grier: I notice the hon. member finds some difficulty in distinguishing between a party and the government. That is, perhaps, a tendency peculiar to his own party. I am sure, though, he must recognize that there is a world of difference between documents belonging to a government, which, incidentally, is not a party, and those belonging to his own party. I am not interested in asking for the documents of the Liberal caucus, nor am I interested in revealing the documents of the NDP caucus. Neither of us has any obligation but to our own members. The government, on the other hand, has an obligation to the country and to parliament, and it is to this obligation I am addressing myself.

Mr. Breau: I appreciate the distinction the hon. member has made, but the example I used was merely by way of illustration. I was asking whether the NDP would agree to give up its sources of information before it had made up its mind on policy.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): I take great pleasure in rising to speak on this measure, and I hope my contribution will assist in setting out the position because I think the issue is indeed an important one and one which deserves considerable attention. It goes to the root of the whole principle of parliamentary democracy.

I was not informed of the situation in Sweden. I should like the hon. member, if he has no objection, to provide me with the document he has cited so that I could perhaps pursue the matter further on my own. I did take strong exception to the remark he made to the effect that those contributing to the debate from this side of the House had contented themselves by reciting departmental accomplishments. I have read the speeches and I did not find this to be the case at all. I found that the position he took was very clear but that the arguments presented by liberal members were equally clear.

There is one consideration which pervades the whole issue. It is that the NDP, for obvious reasons, are most interested in finding out how government works since they have not had any experience of government at the federal level. The Liberal Party, on the other hand, has held the reins of power in this country for a considerable time—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): For far too long.

Mr. Blais: —and gained considerable experience while doing so. Surely, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would be the first to agree that his contributions to the legislation presented to this House has been substantial. He has done this in the context of our parliamentary procedure.

Looking at the tradition of Canadian and, indeed, British parliamentary development we find that initially there was regency, or monarchy. The decision-making process resided in one person. Subsequently, as government became more complex, the regent sought the advice of advisers who surrounded him and a cabinet system developed. In England, popular pressure demanded a constitution, and a constitutional monarchy was formed. The people secured power through the creation of a parliament and it was determined that the advisers to the Crown, the government, should be chosen from the members of this parliament and would be responsible to parliament for decisions taken. So, the members of the government are deemed to be the monarch's advisers. Because of the complexity of government in a modern age, they, in turn, have secured the assistance of advisers who are called civil servants.

I am taking some time trying to explain this because I am under the impression that some of my constituents really do not know how government works. This debate might provide clarification of the process. To a considerable extent, the Crown's advisers depend upon the civil service. We have developed, in addition, a tradition that whatever intercourse there may be between the Crown's advisors and those civil servants is a matter which is kept within strict limits of confidentiality. This follows from the fact that the government is not held responsible to parliament until a political decision has been made, that is until advice has been given to the Crown. Perhaps it is a fiction nowadays, but this is the way in which government and parliament have developed. So, government has kept confidential the documents which assisted in arriving at decisions because its responsibility to parliament and the people is to answer only after decisions have been taken. They have preserved the prerogative of keeping whatever advice they have received confidential. Over the years, the system has functioned very well. I might add that under the committee system, after decisions have been made, opportunities are available to members of parliament to demand explanations and ask for reasons why certain things have been done.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) wishes to take this matter one step further. He wants to push it so that parliament has the power over decision-making, prior to decisions being made, by reviewing administrative documents submitted to the cabinet by individual ministers. On reading his motion, he seeks to have produced not only budgets A, B and X but also the program forecasts. He wants the whole kit and caboodle; and he wants it all produced to individual members of parliament before the decisions are made. What is even worse, after decisions are made by the government, he wants to have the power of hindsight in respect of all those documents so he can review the decision-making process and try to pick holes in it.

Surely at this time, when the whole country finds that perhaps the parliamentary process is not as fast as it ought to be, when the executive arm of the government is not as powerful as it ought to be—indeed with this parliament—decisions are difficult to make, particularly in a time of crisis, because of the parliamentary set-up. The hon. member, by demanding the production of these documents made available to ministers or to the Treasury Board, or budgets prepared prior to the drafting of the estimates, would be delaying the whole parliamentary process. I am sure he does not want to do that, but I suggest that would be the result of his request. He would be hamstringing the whole executive decision-making process of government. Indeed, this would be most harmful to the process of government in Canada.

When the hon. member spoke on May 24, and I read his speech with great attention, he admitted that when presenting a motion like this he felt, with his lay brain—I mean in the sense of his uninformed brain, because he is not an accountant and neither am I—there would be great difficulty sorting through all this mass of information covering 1,200 pages which, when translated, amounts to almost twice as many pages. Perhaps I should read what he said as it appears at page 4068 of Hansard for May 24:

> At the moment members of parliament basically have available to them information contained in the blue book of estimates, which is a veritable sea of figures. Perhaps a member who has been here for a generation or longer may be able to find his way through them, but most of us have not been here for that long.

Perhaps he had in mind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

An hon. Member: He has been here for three generations.

Mr. Blais: Perhaps you are right; maybe even longer. In that statement the hon. member is mouthing words which I have thought. If we have trouble going through the estimates in the blue book, then think of the tremendous difficulty and the insurmountable chore we would have in reviewing the entire background of the long-winded programs which civil servants prepare and submit to their ministers. Think of all the mass of figures put down by those little accountants, with their little pencils in their little offices in respect of their little programs, in order to persuade their ministers of the value of their ideas. It is almost impossible to imagine the difficulty we might incur.

If we could devise a system whereby we could really analyse and completely digest all the information provided by civil servants so that someone like myself could come to a reasonable conclusion about a given program, then I would agree with the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore that we should look at such exposition or analysis. This is something I could understand. Perhaps I could then understand the principle being followed.

When we look at the whole process of government and the way ideas are fed into the system, we can see how impossible it becomes to expect that all this information leading to government policy could be analysed, classified and fed to someone who has trouble with the blue book. Perhaps it is understandable that he cannot fathom the blue book. I, too, have ideas and being on the government side I have greater hopes that my ideas might receive favour than does the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore who may be sitting in the opposition for some time. I may be less frustrated and, therefore, not as sympathetic as the hon. member and his colleagues toward the idea of seeing the inner workings of government.

In any event, when I submit an idea, an opinion, a view or a program it goes into the pipeline at the party caucus. If a minister thinks there is some merit in the idea and that it might receive a sympathetic view from his departmental officials, he will feed it through the department pipeline. If his officials then decide the idea is good, it will be resubmitted to the cabinet. One can easily understand why there is such a tremendous amount of information and why this procedure takes such a long time.

After this whole procedure, the minister may incorporate the idea into one of his programs and submit it to the Treasury Board. He might then say, "Mr. President of the Treasury Board, these are the programs that will advance civilization through eon, eon and eon." He might suggest that they are programs that would assist in advancing Canadianism. Then when the President of the Treasury Board or the members themselves have considered the program, someone might say, "It is a very good idea perhaps 20 years from now, but today it does not have a chance because the Tories across the way are yapping again about the size of the budget." There is a lot of feedback of this type in respect of government involvement.

In any event, there is this kind of interplay. The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore would like to grab the whole works, the whole kit and caboodle. He suggested it is difficult to understand budgets A, B and X, and I would suggest that he could not possibly understand all the information that goes into decision-making. I would urge the hon. member to consult civil servants he may know. I understand that lately hon. members over there have a good relationship with civil servants, particularly those in the foreign affairs department. Perhaps he could gain access to information in that way.

At the risk of being a little facetious, I would suggest to the hon. member that the blue book is a very complete document. I agree that there may be ways of ameliorating the difficulties of sorting through all the information in this book in order that members can ask relevant questions in respect of the direction the government is taking. It is also my suggestion that hon. members are apt to refer to items in the blue book which will attract the public's attention, perhaps because of some political vulnerability. Those are the items which receive the attention of hon. members in the opposition benches. It is the right of hon. members to refer to small items that may be of embarrassment to the government. Perhaps they see this as a way of discharging their responsibility.

Let me suggest to hon. members opposite that if they did not waste time in the miscellaneous estimates committee and in the public accounts committee by raising points of order and all sorts of unnecessary balderdash, but really concentrated on the estimates, a reasonable analysis could be made and relevant questions could be asked. Perhaps in this way the system might work much better. But that is not the fault of the government; it is the fault of the opposition. It is all well and good to say we want to be nice guys, but sure as hang—

Mr. Baker: You will go to confession, won't you, tomorrow?

Mr. Blais: If the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who made that comment had cleanliness and was himself pure in respect of many of the things of which I accuse the opposition benches, I would kneel here and confess before this whole body.

Mr. Baker: We will suspend debate and allow you to do so.

Mr. Blais: But because I lead not only a very active but a very chaste and honest life, I would take up very little time of the House and I am afraid it would be boring fare indeed. Perhaps at this time I might simply wish hon. members opposite all the luck in the world in attempting to ameliorate the system. However, I suggest there are methods and means available to them should they use the wisdom God has given them and employ it in the proper way.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) will take my advice to attend confession. I suppose that is his choice. Failing that, I suppose with regard to the last five minutes of his speech he could wash out his mouth with soap and that might satisfy most of us.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) has raised a very important matter, which the hon. member for Nipissing commented upon and referred to as delaying tactics in respect of the operations of our committees. I confess to hon. members of the House who have been here longer than me that my opportunity to observe the operations of the committees has not been as extentive as theirs. But if it is the purpose of committees to permit members of parliament to examine the estimates and get behind the estimates, then I think the committee system in this House is failing. The results of the failure are exhibited in the frustrations which must be apparent when one reads the record of many of the committees which examine estimates.

This morning we were considering estimates in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. There are matters which affect a particular body, namely, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that transcend in importance—the enemies of this point of view might call this political—the issues in the estimates. Those, unfortunately, are the only times when dealing with estimates that members of parliament have an opportunity to speak to the bureaucrats—in the case of CMHC this morning—or the minister in order to examine an issue which is current. So I think members of the opposition can be forgiven, when they suspect something is wrong or have information that something is wrong, if they use that one occasion to get at the information.

So far as estimates are concerned, this parliament imposed closure in any event, and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) knows it. Even when the estimates are considered, as in the case of Supplementary Estimates A, those estimates will at least be reported automatically by the committee on December 10 no matter what parliament may do. That shows another aspect of the futility of the system. That is the only occasion—using the example of this morning—when members of parliament can examine an issue of the day. I am the first to admit that perhaps in dealing with estimates this might not be the best place to do it. Of course not. But it is the only place.

The next thing with which we might deal is the question period in this House of Commons when members of parliament ask for information. I suppose that if members opposite would remove from their hearts all their political prejudices, they would have to agree with me that the performance of the government in respect of the question period, so far as being candid is concerned, has been lamentable in the past few days. The deeper this government gets into trouble, the more meaningless the answers are to the questions put to it. We represent the public who want to receive answers to questions.

Another aspect of this question is the order paper. There have been discussions in this House about the slowness of the government in answering questions. It seems to me that questions are answered and information provided on the basis of what is politically embarrassing. If it is not politically embarrassing, then of course answers come forth in due course. But if it is politically embarrassing, the members of the opposition have to raise points of order to obtain answers. Lastly, I want to say that it may well be that members who support the government can go to caucus, or straight to ministers as colleagues, and within the secrecy of the caucus obtain the answers they want. That may be the situation, but I am not so sure it is with this government. But the opposition does not have that opportunity. I suppose the purpose behind the motion proposed by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore is that the members of this House of Commons, who represent all the people of Canada, should be provided the same opportunity.

It seems to me that we are creating, because of the way in which this government has chosen to operate within the parliamentary system, an elite. The parliamentary system was never meant to be operated on the basis that only a few could use the instruments of power in their hands without at least accounting for their actions before the Parliament of Canada. This accounting can be done in many ways. It can be done all together by way of votes.

Another matter raised by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore was that information is power. As the public service grows, as government involvement in the community and business and in other spheres of our country grows, so does the power of the government grow. If that is to be the way in which we are to proceed in this country and it is acceptable to the people of this country, then who am I to say that it is not right? On the other side of the equation, there should be a similar growth in the parliamentary body to examine, to scrutinize, to analyse and to submit to cross-examination members of the government who supply the background material from which that decision was made. I say this because the parliamentary equation is getting somewhat out of balance. If there is any evidence of that, it is the operation of the question period, the committee system as it relates to estimates—and I relate it only to estimates, not to legislation—the operation of the order paper, and other matters.

The hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore has suggested that governments, when presenting a bill to the House or presenting an estimate, have to produce what he has called the working papers. I think that is perhaps a reasonable suggestion and one this government should consider. But I think the government should consider something else. I think that at the beginning of each parliamentary session a special parliamentary committee should be established, one that would be called the parliamentary committee on program review, to which the documents, namely the program forecast and program review, could be referred. It would be made up of members of this House, and their sole duty would be, not just to examine estimates in the very shallow way they are examined now but to examine the working papers. The members of the public service and of the government would not appear at the committee sitting next to the chairman, but would appear there as witnesses subject to cross-examination, not merely to the polite inquiries which are addressed to them now.

I think we could go one step further and perhaps consider the advisability of bringing back into the committee of the whole House the estimates of the departments. It may be that some are so complex that we could not have them all before the House for all the departments during a session, but perhaps the opposition could be given the choice of departments with which they wanted to deal in a particular year. Those estimates would be brought into this chamber under the light of publicity, and they would be examined in such a way that partisan chairmen—as is the case in some committees—could not exercise their will as I have seen them do.

I think it is important to consider this, and I would ask the government to consider it because there must be a diminution of power in the sense of the government gathering information unto itself and for itself. Otherwise, our system will not function. As the backbenchers of the government party have become the ciphers of power over there, we find ourselves becoming ciphers of lack of knowledge because of the system which has proved itself to be inadequate. Our country would be stronger, our people wiser and our parliament better if some suggestion such as the one of the hon. member were adopted.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to intervene for just a moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are not the one who was supposed to do so.

Mr. Jerome: I wanted to take exception to one remark made in the speech of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). He suggested that after all the work we have done to set up the committee system under the new rules, and to send to the committees automatically all the estimates in order that a small group of members who want to take the trouble to inform themselves and who are energetic enough to develop some expertise in the area, who have the will and the desire to make that effort, have the opportunity to get not just one minister at a time, as is the case in the House, but several ministers and indeed officials from several departments who are concerned with the subject matter under review and in this way ensure that the round of questioning gives every questioner several opportunities to run a point into the ground.

The hon. member would rather have the estimates back here in the House, where he has a much larger crowd of people lining up to ask questions and much more difficulty in pinning down a minister and keeping him here until he has come up with a satisfactory answer. What has happened is that the present system has given to energetic members in the ranks opposite an unprecedented opportunity to place a minister in this position before the committee and to question him until they are satisfied. The shocking fact about it is that in almost every instance insufficient work is done by members opposite, despite the extensive research facilities provided to them. This failing in the opposition may be overlooked. What cannot be overlooked is their temerity and gall in trying to lay the blame at the feet of chairmen of committees and accusing them of not being impartial and objective, which adds insult to injury and caused me to rise to my feet in this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. We have a clock problem. As hon. members can see, the clock to my right shows 6.50, but the clock facing me shows six o'clock. It is now six o'clock.

[Translation]

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m. At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and motion No. 20 (Mr. Lang).

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of tonight's proceedings with a view to indicating that it is my intention to withdraw motion No. 1, which is to provide a change in the title of the bill. I do this at this time to facilitate the business of the House and to indicate to hon. members the nature of the balance of our work here tonight. I may say, in the course of withdrawing this motion, that I do not in any way withdraw from remarks made in pursuance of this amending motion in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where I clearly indicated that its purpose was to draw to the attention of the government and the people of Canada the fact that with the protection of privacy—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. We should do this in a more orderly way. If the hon. member plans to say a few words on motion No. 1 while he is withdrawing it, I would suggest that for the moment at least we stand motion No. 20, which is before the House, and return to it afterwards. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Atkey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank hon. members for allowing me a moment or two to explain the reason for the withdrawal. There is much yet to be done in the protection of privacy. This bill, which attempts to provide protection for Canadians against bugging, wiretapping and other forms of electronic eavesdropping is a start but, as I have indicated, in many cases it is only the tip of the iceberg.

To its credit, the government has recognized that there is much to be done in the field of the protection of privacy through the commissioning of a task force report entitled "Privacy and Computers." All Canadians should be alerted to the dangers which this excellent report, brought forward in December, 1972, outlines in detail. I refer only to the dangers of medical data banks, computer credit data banks, police computers and other forms of computer data banks in this country and in the country to the south of us. We see from this that there is virtually no law in existence now to provide any protection for Canadians on such questions as access, security of information—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, but I assure the hon. member that it is a friendly point of order. We have no objection to his request to withdraw motion No. 1, but if in the process he is permitted to say a few words about it, one of my colleagues would like to do the same thing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is well taken. Actually, at this time there is no question before the House. The Chair has the option of putting motion No. 1 to the House if the hon. member wants to speak to it. If he does, then of course the Chair will have to allow other hon. members to speak to the motion.

I think it is an unfair practice under our normal procedures to take advantage of a motion being put and being the sole person to speak to it and then to withdraw it. That is not being fair to hon. members. Therefore I would ask the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) to make the choice. If the reason for withdrawing the motion at this time has to be explained in the House, then the Chair will have to allow other hon. members to comment on it.

• (2010)

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the motion. As hon. members appreciate, those of us in the opposition have perhaps extracted our pound of flesh, and I felt that it was not desirable or in the interests of the swift passage of this bill to proceed any further with the motion. With your permission and the permission of hon. members, I would request leave to withdraw motion No. 1.

[Mr. Atkey.]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we certainly would be agreeable to that. I think the withdrawal is far more sensible than the original motion.

Mr. Leggatt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we are also agreeable to that, but we certainly do not agree with the comment of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that the suggested title of the bill was put in facetiously. In fact, I am somewhat disappointed it was withdrawn, because it probably more accurately describes the bill that we are going to be faced with on Tuesday than the present title.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the hon. member for St. Paul's. Does the House give unanimous consent that motion No. 1 standing in his name be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Atkey) withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House will now revert to motion No. 20 standing in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang).

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in dealing with the motion now before us. If I could summarize what he said, it would be in these few words—what real value is there in the notification section? The mere fact that the minister asked that question indicates a great deal to this House.

Mr. Lang: I also showed the cost.

Mr. Leggatt: We know the minister is concerned with cost. I am sure we all are, but many of us are very concerned with rights. I can understand the minister's approach to this subject, Mr. Speaker, when he asked the question, what value has notification, because anyone who asks that does not really understand what the right to privacy means. The right to privacy is a substantive right, and when the government or the Crown or the police take away that right from an innocent citizen, surely the very least that could be done is to notify the citizen that his rights have been attacked and taken away. That is what the committee said and said very wisely.

It is interesting that there was some concern within the NDP caucus some time ago about the bugging on a Wednesday of a private caucus meeting of our party. In that case the CTV at least had the decency to notify us that they had illegally intercepted our deliberations.

Mr. Lang: When they were caught.

Mr. Leggatt: Not when they were caught, Mr. Speaker: I think they notified us out of a sheer question of the morality of the issue. I am surprised that the minister takes the position he does with regard to this particular amendment, because it is the simple, moral and decent thing to do to notify a private citizen whose conversations have been intercepted, and intercepted legally under the bill. I have heard from the minister about the famous heroin case for about four days. I refer to the famous heroin case that was brought about through the use of wiretaps. I fail to see how this particular section to which the minister objects would have in any way impeded the success of that investigation, because section 178.23(2)(b) clearly provides:

where the Attorney General of the province in which the application is made or the Solicitor General of Canada, as the case may be, certifies within the said 90 days in a manner prescribed by regulations to the judge who granted the authorization that the investigation is continuing and the judge is of the opinion that the interests of justice require that a delay of a determinate reasonable length be granted, in which case the judge may grant a determinate reasonable delay.

It is very clear, Mr. Speaker, that the case the minister has presented to the House is that this section would have created difficulty. It would have created no difficulty at all. The real issue is that the minister does not want to go to the judge. It is an inconvenience, it is a nuisance to go to the judge. We on this side of the House do not consider it a nuisance or an inconvenience, and we have confidence in the judiciary of this country to exercise its rights fairly and properly for the protection of the citizens of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I do not have too much to add. Certainly we in this party vigorously oppose the attempt to destroy the good work of the committee. I fail to see the logic of the minister's argument on this. This is a rather vital section for those of us who believe that privacy is a substantive right and the Crown, the government or anybody can only take that right away under very special and extreme circumstances. This is not, obviously, the view that the minister takes. It is interesting that in the 1400s it was an offence in England to eavesdrop. They were very wise then. This is the right that we should all protect, Mr. Speaker, and we in this party certainly hope this motion fails when it comes to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the minister takes such a callous attitude toward this particular section. He and his officials had ample warning that the committee was very likely to move in the way it did on the matter of notice. The committee studying the bill this time recommended notice, and the committee studying the bill the last time around recommended that notice be given. During second reading many hon. members begged the minister to consider this recommendation. I did so at the time because I knew that the draftsmen at the minister's disposal would put the matter of notice in accurate language to cover the sense of the former committee's recommendation and also what many of us felt should be incorporated into the law.

When the minister appeared before the committee, many of us again urged upon him the need to provide legislative language to cover this notice provision. It should not be any surprise at all to the minister that the committee decided, or redecided if you like, that some notice of this invasion of a substantive right had to be given if the thrust of the act, which the minister claims is a great advance in the law, was to be given effect.

There have been many allusions to Watergate over the past few weeks. I am not going to delay proceedings very much by recounting all the shabbiness of that event. But I think the attention of hon. members should be drawn, if they have not seen it already, to an article by Morton Halperin, who is known to some people in this capital and who was a consultant to the U.S. Secretary of State, Dr. Henry Kissinger.

In the New York Times of May 31, Morton and Ina Halperin wrote an article entitled "The outrage of wiretaps". The article speaks of the wiretap placed on their telephone. Actually, the wiretap was continued even after Mr. Halperin had left the employ of the government of the United States. The wiretap first went on when he was an adviser to the presidential candidate, George McGovern. It is a poignant article, a sad article, a miserable article, because it tells the grubby story of people who have no respect for privacy.

We all, of course, give credit where it is due in the famous heroin case. But for every heroin case there are many Halperins in this world. In the case of the Halperins, the grandmother was ill. Those who were listening heard the request for medical assistance; heard the chatter of the Halperin children as they called back and forth to their friends; heard the conversation of husband and wife as they asked each other to do chores that all of us are asked to do in the ordinary family context.

It is because of such outrages that we need the notice provision. Other members may be bothered by other aspects of this bill. What has bothered me is this: the citizen who has been subject to a wiretap should have some notice of it if no prosecution results. This is the fourth time that we have asked for this notice provision to be included. The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs asked for this notice. I was very reassured by the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and I hope that once again the majority of members of this House will, when the deferred vote on this matter comes up next Tuesday, support the considered decision taken by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in 1973, and taken a couple of years ago when the matter was before us then.

In this case, as in other cases when the minister has been willing to make accommodation, I hope we can come to an accommodation on the urgent, important and serious matter of giving notice to one who has been subject to intrusion, subject to outrage, but who has not been prosecuted as a result of that outrage. I am urging hon. members to stand firm on this provision, as the committee did. I am glad to say that members of my party and of the NDP were supported on this issue by other liberal Liberals.

The minister likes to talk across the floor about my being in an ivory tower, and so on. I have long since ceased being bothered by epithets. Perhaps once in a while I am in an ivory tower. Perhaps once in a while it is time for an ordinary member of parliament who is not carrying a brief for any particular group in society but is carrying it, hopefully, for all society, to bring forward amendments to a statute like this in the manner I have suggested, because if the bill were left in its original form it would not be a good piece of legislation but would be legislation which the minister and the government would live to regret.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, an hon. member speaking on another motion suggested that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) is competent but rigid. The more I see him in operation, the more I think that statement is true. A standing committee in a previous parliament made a recommendation which the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs saw fit to incorporate in this legislation. However, the Minister of Justice has got his deputy ministers busy again in trying to undo the work of the committee. That makes me very sad and underlines the minister's rigidity.

It was the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) who gave the thrust and strength to the particular amendment we are considering. I recall well that in early meetings it was he who saw the injustice of certain provisions that were included in the bill when it went to committee. The Minister of Justice, I think, called the hon. member for Fundy-Royal a man in an ivory tower and an impractical ideologist.

Mr. Lang: I did not do that.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I prefer the ivory tower, impractical idealist for Fundy-Royal at any time to the Minister of Justice who has such rigid attitudes. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal senses the true meaning of this bill and he wants to give full protection to all Canadians. I know the Minister of Justice has often spoken about the famous heroin case. I suggest that he told students about this when he was dean of the law school out west.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He may be out there again next year.

Mr. Gilbert: He tries to use his experiences with the heroin case, or with rape cases or what have you, to terrify members and put fear into their hearts. That is not worthy of the Minister of Justice.

I now wish to refer the words of a learned judge, Mr. Justice Louis Brandeis of the United States, who said on this point that experience should teach us to be most on our guard to protect liberty when the government's purposes are beneficent. Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel the invasion of their liberty by evil-minded movers. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in the insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding. Those are appropriate words of a very learned judge.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party may I say that we are very proud to see someone of the stature and experience of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal serving as a member of this House and, more especially, as a member of the committee. He certainly gave the committee leadership. He is concerned about the protection of the public and he has pointed to the direction in which we should go. The minister may say the hon. member lives in an ivory tower. I suggest it would be better if the minister were to take a less rigid stance, as I think his present attitude detracts from his strength. I have always considered the minister as a person who could give moral leadership. In this instance he has fallen short of his potential. Fortunately, there are members like the hon. member for Fundy-Royal who can give us leadership.

We of the NDP will strongly oppose the motion moved by the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister should withdraw.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise and support the position taken by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). Too often in the annals of this country, not only in parliament but in society generally, all too few people will take a strong philosophical view. Perhaps the minister will say "ideological" or he may refer to an ivory tower. I suggest the minister lives in an ivory tower. I point my hand to where the ivory is.

● (2030)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Morgan: As we progress in this nation we must hold true the rights of the individual. We must not let them be sacrificed and suffer because it is easier to do something else, because it is easier to just ignore the little man. We have a responsibility to the average citizen to make sure he sees that justice is done. Surely it is the obligation of any government with any commonweal or brotherhood with the citizens of this country to know what is in the best interests of the people. They have the resources at their command. They have a bureaucracy which has grown beyond all sense of reality. We talk about that reality, and they talk about the hon. member for Fundy-Royal being nothing more than a pure idealist. I wish the two could be put together and they could be a little more idealistic in the way they run the affairs of this country. It is only right and natural that the position taken by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal should be adopted by this House. If we do not do that, we disregard the people for whom we act.

We talk about law and order. That is supposed to be the hue and cry which is put up by this government to try to jam down the throats of the members of this House the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). That law is not meant for the average individual. How do you expect to have order unless the government assumes a proper stature which inspires order? What the minister is doing is inviting a situation which decries the law and order which is so necessary in this country. If you adopt the position taken by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, you will initiate this essential feeling in the average man, inspiring him to respect the law. Through respect for the law, you generate order. This is the only way it can possibly be done.

There are many fundamental issues involved in this matter. I do not intend to talk about them tonight. In dealing with legislation like this we must take a fundamental approach to what is required if we are to build up what we believe to be a democratic process, a rule of law. That is what is necessary. Sometimes this government forgets they should be operating under the rule of law. No democratic system can work without it. If they start to ignore that principle, which they do, and decry the position taken by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, they forget about the rule of law. That is the fastest way to destroy this democratic institution of which we all should be proud.

If the position taken by the hon. member to whom I previously referred is ignored, we start to chip away at the principles which we here spend hours to protect. Thousands and thousands of lives have been lost to obtain these rights. You do not deal with this matter lightly. You do not say that is idealism or ivory tower stuff. You do not do it that loosely or that easily. Surely we have learned something; hopefully we have. We begin to wonder, when amendments to this legislation are placed before us by the Minister of Justice. They do not do anything to enhance the rule of law, the democratic process or the stature of the Parliament of Canada. All they do is create a situation in which we have derision in the country. If you cannot protect the little people, you are entitled to suspect there will be derision for this parliament. We should all be proud of what we are here to do. The minister has to take a backward step, reconsider the matter and accept the position of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. Perhaps this is what is required. It will take a big man to withdraw.

Before entering this chamber I held the minister in high esteem. However, after seeing what has happened to this legislation in the hands of this minister, perhaps I should take a second look at the esteem in which I hold this minister. I feel rather badly. I suggest the minister can be a big man. He can prove that to this House. If the words of the last two speakers have any meaning to the minister, I suggest he must withdraw. I hope he will do so, not only out of respect for parliament but for the people of this country for whom he is the Minister of Justice. If justice is to be done, this is the position he should take.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on motion No. 20. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the recorded division on this motion stands deferred until Tuesday next.

• (2040)

The House will now proceed to motion No. 22 standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster) moved:

No. 22.

That Bill C-176, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be amended in clause 6 by adding immediately after line 10 at page 25 the following:

"(6) No warrant shall be issued by the Solicitor General of Canada under this section unless an authorization to intercept is obtained in the manner provided under Part 1V.1 of the Criminal Code."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment will, I hope, commend itself to the House. It relates to the provision having to do with the Official Secrets Act. In the case of Criminal Code offences, provision was made in the bill for referral to the judiciary before authorization for wiretapping is given, except in the emergency clause. I am pleased that the minister has seen the light and presented the House with an amendment to ensure that even in the circumstances of this clause reference to a judge is necessary before wiretapping is authorized.

The amendment I am now proposing would require that all wiretapping, not merely wiretapping created as an offence under the Criminal Code, should require judicial approval. I believe the arguments in favour of such an amendment are very persuasive. I have practised law for some 16 years. All of us who have appeared before the courts have lost and won, but I have never felt I was unfairly dealt with in terms of the consideration shown me. I think all of us have the greatest respect for the courts and for the judiciary.

Why is it, then, that we lose confidence in our judges all of a sudden and say that when questions of security and the Official Secrets Act are concerned, this is too sensitive an area for them to be involved in? We all have friends and acquaintances in the judiciary, and in all my years in practice I have never met a member of the bench to whom I would not entrust the kind of confidential information which would need to be disclosed before an authorization would be issued.

As we have proceeded in our consideration of this bill, each time the judiciary has been eliminated from the process it has been brought back again. The judiciary is a great bulwark of civil liberties in this country and I see no necessity of bypassing the judges in matters connected with the Official Secrets Act. Under the notification provision we have arranged for special reference to the judiciary. Under the emergency provision the same applies; and, of course, there has always been provision for reference to the judiciary in the main authorization clause. I hope the House will now take this final step and make the necessary improvement to the bill so that the rule of law may prevail throughout. Surely if we want the rule of law to prevail we rely on the judiciary to enforce the law.

We in this party have been critical of the bill before us. If there are to be abuses, then mark my words those abuses will arise through invocation of the Official Secrets Act because its terms are indefinite—the definition of "subversion" is fluid. A tremendous amount of discretion is left in the hands of the minister. In fact, far more discretion is left in the hands of the Solicitor General under the Official Secrets Act than rests in the hands of the Attorneys General under the Criminal Code. Thus, this is one of the most dangerous areas in terms of invasion of privacy that can be found in the legislation. Yet up to this point the House has not seen fit to rely on the judiciary.

Why should we not wish to protect innocent victims of wiretapping carried out under the cloak of the Official Secrets Act? The argument that this is a special area is based on one premise—the judiciary cannot be trusted to deal with applications under this clause. This attitude is, in my view, an insult to the judiciary. We should be placing our confidence in the discretion of the judges and their ability to protect the liberty of the subject. I urge the House to amend this clause by providing the same protection to the citizen in the area of the Official Secrets Act as has been in respect of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I thought members on the government benches, which are bursting with ministers signing their mail and backbenchers reading the papers, would probably wish to take part in a serious discussion on this important issue. But if they want us to go on—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are listening.

Mr. Fairweather: Perhaps it is time for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to listen.

Mr. Lalonde: There are only two Tories in the House. Where are the rest?

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, when the time comes to account for actions taken in this House, the one I am most ashamed of is the vote on second reading in favour of the War Measures Act. I will always be glad that I changed my mind on third reading because I found there was no possibility of the government providing any adequate appeal procedures. I think that was one of the saddest chapters in our history.

Mr. Bell: They were after votes then.

Mr. Fairweather: That is why I think we are dealing now with an important clause. An interesting study has just been completed in the United Kingdom, on the subject of the Official Secrets Act, under the distinguished chairmanship of Lord Franks. The trouble is, when I ordered a copy from Information Canada they did not know for some time whether it would be possible to give me a copy of the report because they were not sure whether or not it was secret.

We in Canada caused a study to be made of the Official Secrets Act. It was disappointing failure. It produced a report which made no substantial recommendations for reform in this, one of the most outmoded sections of the law. In Britain they are moving toward a fundamental revision of the Official Secrets Act. As far as I can see, this whole matter of the government wanting secrecy had its origin late in the seventeenth century or the early part of the eighteenth century when governments thought it very important that advice they were getting both on the home front and from abroad should be a matter of secrecy.

Just a year ago when I was in New York at a seminar on the matter of secrecy, a person in the United States government said that there were some 4.5 billion pieces of paper in a facility somewhere near Washington which were secret and classified documents. It seems to me, as a simple layman, that this mass of documentation in itself, if sought for the purposes of research by scholars and other interested persons, would be practically impossible to obtain.

I hope this government will soon convene another study group to take a very searching look at the Official Secrets Act of Canada with the expectation that it will be able to follow some of the advice on this matter given by the Franks commission in Britain. I share in a personal way the view of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), that it is not a bad idea for government—I say this although I have the greatest amount of respect for professional and political people—should take a second look at emergency situations. I think the people to whom I refer let Canada down in an unfortunate way. We had a major reaction, very much overblown, and I am still very sad about the vote I cast.

That is why I would prefer, personally, to leave this matter to judicial scrutiny, because I think there can be involved in government programs people who would not be prepared, or not able, to place before judicial officers sufficient support for their points of view in order to sustain a judicial order. The situation to which I referred exposed as a very sad part of contemporary Canadian history an unfortunate reaction on the part of governments which sought to avoid the judicial process. This has happened on one or two other occasions. I cannot remove the scar of the War Measures Act from my conscience.

Mrs. Morin: You should have been the prime minister of the province of Quebec; then you would have thought differently.

Mr. Fairweather: I have had a lot of compliments tonight, but I think the hon. member's colleagues said that even though my French is not very good, at least I had a bilingual mind, which would qualify me for the prime ministership of Quebec.

An hon. Member: If you lived in Quebec.

Mr. Fairweather: Had I been the prime minister of Quebec I do not think I would have invoked the War Measures Act; and had I been the prime minister of Canada I hope I would not have invoked the provisions of that act. Be that as it may, I think this is a time for soul-searching.

An hon. Member: I would hope that you do.

Mr. Fairweather: I hope the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin) will give us another example tonight of the type of speech she made on another occasion. Speaking quite frankly, what she said caused a cold chill to run down my spine, and I know as a personal matter that it embarrassed a good many of her colleagues. I suggest that she exemplified a reaction of anti-unionism and many other things that, if I were not an old-fashioned gentleman from New Brunswick, I might accuse her of because I thought it was one of the most reactionary speeches I have heard in this House. If she wants to give us another example, I will listen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fairweather: Hon. members may laugh, but many of the hon. member's colleagues were not very happy about the example of Liberalism we were treated to the other night. If the minister has a question, I will be glad to defer to him.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member how, in view of his reference to the remarks of the hon. member, he gets along with some of the members of his own caucus?

Mr. Bell: How do you get along with the NDP at your caucus?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fairweather: I do not get along with every member of my caucus, and I think it would be a very unusual and boring caucus if I did. I had not thought a caucus was the place for a love fest. I find a caucus very challenging in trying to persuade people I do not happen to agree with, and it is one of the most stimulating activities that one takes part in here. Apparently the hon. member does not have any trouble with the members of his caucus. If he could get along with Beryl Plumptre as well as he gets along with his own caucus, God bless him for that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And God help us.

Mr. Baker: And God help the country.

An hon. Member: Are there any more questions?

Mr. Baker: What is the next question?

Mr. Fairweather: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, I will be glad to listen to him.

An hon. Member: At least we had music during the question period.

Mr. Lang: Would you like more violins?

Mr. Fairweather: It is a good thing I have a check-rein on my emotions. I hope the minister will reply to my remarks because I would be delighted to have my position challenged.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I waited with interest to hear what the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr.Fairweather) would say. Having heard the kind of remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), I knew the hon. member would have to make some reply. He was pressed, pressed and pressed by that hon. member in this House. I was not completely sure whether he was supporting the motion moved in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I found this interesting in one respect because a couple of his colleagues suggested that it is a terrible insult to come into this House and move an amendment to restore a position which had been taken by the committee. This was a position taken in the committee which friends of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal felt was important.

It has been suggested that what was involved here is a matter to be treated in this country in a very careful way. If that is what is involved in this particular section of the act, then I suggest there may be an inadvertent attempt to destroy one of the very foundations of this country and that attempt could well be avoided. It is my feeling that this section was carefully written to ensure that the responsibilities of the Solicitor General in connection with any attempts to obtain evidence are observed. It was also written in recognition of the fact that it is important to the state that these side efforts to destroy the state should not be allowed to continue.

I know I have said this before, but the remarks I make in response to what has been said by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal existing in an ivory tower were made because I have had the same kind of thing said about me. So I thought I would put it forward to him and some of his colleagues, although some of his colleagues clearly qualify.

The fact is that we must look at the practical situation we are in. Here is a case where if the security of the state itself is threatened, we must expect to take appropriate action with regard to it. The hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey), recognized this in a section with which we were dealing earlier by carefully treating specially and separately each proceeding that is carried out under cover of the Official Secrets Act. There was there at least a recognition of the fact that where there is espionage, sabotage or subversive activities, or where there is a most organized attempt to destroy the basis of the state, sometimes very special measures are needed.

The thing that disturbs me about the attitude of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal is his willingness to share in a doubt about the importance of the integrity of people in elected political office, as though our political process could survive unless we could bring forth elected people in our political process who could have that confidence placed in them. He is making a terrible mistake when he turns to any other country or any other example and says it does not work there, and therefore we must do something differently here. I think the hon. member has shown a lack of confidence, in this way, in the political process. We did, in the committee, make an important change in this area. We had an attitude which is now being characterized as rigid. We put forward, at the request of hon. members in the committee, changes which redefined the words "espionage", "sabotage" and other specific or subversive activities.

It was the hon. member for Fundy-Royal who indicated that basically he saw the need of this kind of section but he wanted those words more precisely defined. We did so in the committee, and that now is being characterized as some form of rigidity. We know that is the kind of political remark that is made by members of the opposition when they have nothing to say. They accuse ministers of being rigid, arrogant or overzealous; and when they find a minister who is not arrogant, rigid, or overzealous they call him weak-kneed, feeble and otherwise unable to stand firm in the face of adversity. Those are the different possibilities they find. Let us see that clearly and understand that they are political remarks, and not put them down to something else.

After all the violins for the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, I regret that he found it necessary to drop to that level tonight and resorted to that kind of tactic once again. The hon. member for St. Paul's was in the committee. We not only made the move in respect of the definition of "subversive" activity in this context and in the context of a section where we saw the special need to protect the state and have the Solicitor General take the responsibility for it, but we added a further section, a section which I placed before the committee and asked to be moved and approved which called for the Solicitor General to make a detailed report on the activity under this part which had not previously been included in the bill and which had not been suggested originally by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. We now, once again, have the responsibility and undertaking of the Solicitor General for the warrant, in the first place, and the responsibility to report in detail on the activities under this section.

With the political responsibility that is involved, that should have been recognized by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal as being adequate to better protect our country and our freedoms. However, with the sound of violins playing in his ears, he failed to appreciate that. I hope other members have seen it and will fail to support the motion of the hon. member for New Westminster and will, instead, support the basic need in this country to have at certain times certain measures to take care of the very existence of the state and the very freedoms and liberties which we all defend.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the presence in the gallery of a great Canadian athlete—a man who had a tremendous hockey career in Toronto, Detroit, and now in Montreal, and whom we honoured last night in Montreal. I refer to Frank Mahovlich.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) is assisted by every member of this House on his point of order.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, he scores a good deal more often than any member of the government. I never cease to be amazed at the gall of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) in purporting to rise, as he did a minute ago, to object to the way in which we have berated ministers on the treasury benches for their shortcomings. He is an expert at that. He has proven it time and time again in his two portfolios. I am glad to see his predecessor is here tonight, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I commend the speech he made in 1969. I fully endorse everything he said at that time.

[Mr. Lang.]

It is a pity the Minister of Justice did not follow the precepts set forth by the minister of justice of that day. I doubt whether he even read the speech, otherwise we would not be seeing such terrible legislation before us as there is in this bill. I see the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has left his seat—although his seat gives every appearance of being ready to be occupied again. I hope he comes back because I want to say something about responsibilities under his jurisdiction.

However, before doing so let me say I am opposed to this section in its entirety and not only to the amendment that has been advanced. I do not think any great improvement has been brought about by the amendment made in committee, which has attempted to confine the operation of the section to so-called matters of national security. The section as it stands gives the Solicitor General absolute power to issue a warrant or intercept communications when those communications effect a subversive activity or the gathering of foreign intelligence essential to the security of Canada. Subsection (3) of this section attempts to set forth a definition of subversive activity. It includes espionage or sabotage and foreign intelligence activities directed toward gathering intelligence information relating to Canada, and activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force, violence or any criminal means. The word "elsewhere" concerns me a good deal in a piece of Canadian legislation.

The next part deals with activities directed to an actual or potential attack or activity against Canada. No one can quarrel with that. The last part has to do with activities of a foreign terrorist group directed toward the commission of terrorist acts in or against Canada. That is a very broad definition that could include all sorts of so-called organizations in Canada which have as their objective precisely that. But let me backtrack for a moment to subclause (c) which includes in the definition of subversive activities, activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means.

In effect, the section is authorizing the Solicitor General to issue a warrant for the purpose of intruding on the conversations or in the mail of anyone in or out of government if this is all that is required, if they have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that someone is conducting activities directed toward accomplishing government change anywhere in the world. This seems to me to be a breathtaking power to be giving to the Solicitor General. All that is necessary, for instance, for the invocation of this clause and the granting of a warrant is the request by the CIA or by any other intelligence service in the country to the Canadian Solicitor General to intrude upon the communications emanating from any Canadian citizen because they have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that some activity is being conducted by that Canadian citizen, government employee or otherwise, which might have the effect of causing a governmental change within the country. It could happen in the case of Chile, it could happen in the case of the United States or of China—indeed, any country in the world. That kind of unbridled power in the hands of the Solicitor General in completely unacceptable in my view.

When I placed on the order paper some months ago the series of questions with respect to the Police and the Security Planning and Analysis Group falling within the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General, a great number of eyebrows were raised on the other side as to the inferential information which was contained in the questions themselves. I stated last night that one can only wonder at the reason for the government not denying immediately and with emphasis the possibility of the existence through the Defence Research Board of surveillance capabilities at Shirley's Bay of the whole of the Ottawa telephone system. But they got around that.

I see the Minister of Justice smiling. It is permitted to speak of these things now. But I ask the Minister of Justice this: If there is no such plan and no such capability, why does the government seek refuge in reply to that question by saying that it is not in the interests of national security to discuss these matters? They should have set everyone at ease immediately by saying that it does not exist. But the inference in the reply is that it does exist, and I maintain it exists, perhaps not in that location any longer but it is there. Now we want to give the Solicitor General the power, without any control whatsoever except for the requirement to report after the fact, to implement the whole system. I, for one Canadian, resent the extent to which that would intrude upon not only my privacy but my freedom.

We heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) say today that an investigation has been conducted into leaks with respect to certain communications between a Canadian official in Chile and the public. They have conducted that investigation and they think they have zeroed in on the person who was responsible for the leak. Under this clause in the bill, the Solicitor General could issue a warrant which would authorize the interception of communications on the telephone of every single employee in the Department of External Affairs or, indeed, in any government department, in order to determine where that leak originated. Indeed, they could go further than that and if there was the slightest reasonable "ground to believe" that perhaps it might be some civil servant who has left the service and is now in civilian life once again, they could intercept his communications, and on and on it could go. No citizen would be free from the intrusion of this kind of power without any judicial control.

In 1969 the minister spoke of controls. He spoke of the necessity to balance the need for giving the law enforcement agencies in this country effective means to cope with lawbreakers. That is balanced against the law and order concept and the right of the individual to privacy and freedom without intrusion into his private affairs. I ask him now whether this clause in particular, and this bill as a whole, would provide that kind of guarantee to the Canadian citizen that there will be no intervention in his private affairs to the extent which this bill seeks.

Again, on April 3, 1973, I put a series of questions on the order paper. The government in their answers hid behind the following phrase:

> It is not considered in the public interest for reasons of national security to disclose the details of security and intelligence activities.

If that kind of question can be answered in that manner, what kind of report, I ask, are we to expect from the Solicitor General under the clause in this bill? We will get the kind of report, should this clause pass in its present form, that will hide all relevant reasons for the application in the first place and all relevant reasons for the granting of any warrant. The phrase that will be used, if we from the opposition inquire about it if we ask why, when, how, or who was involved is that the information requested is not returnable by the government for reasons of national security. That is the answer we will get.

I join my friend, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), in his view with respect to the October crisis. I, too, voted in favour of the implementation of the War Measures Act, but in my 16 years here that is the most shameful vote I ever cast. We were assured by the now Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and by the now Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), as well as by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that full disclosure would be made of the basis upon which the War Measures Act was invoked. Much to the credit of the Minister of Finance, he was the one, I understand, who prevented that act from continuing in force after the date of its expiration. I congratulate him for that, in spades.

Mrs. Morin: You do not understand.

Mr. Nielsen: I only understand the concept of retaining the freedom of the citizen. I cannot give the precise figures now, but at one time a few months ago I had them down to the unit. Of the hundreds of arrests that were made after the invocation of that measure, precious few—in fact, only seven—were brought to trial out of some 400 or 500 arrests and detentions of people kept incommunicado and without benefit of counsel. And of those seven I do not think there was a single conviction.

• (2120)

Mrs. Morin: Did you witness the event?

Mr. Nielsen: Now the government wants to give the Solicitor General the same kind of power.

Mrs. Morin: Again you don't understand.

Mr. Nielsen: Again there was no justification whatsoever for that intrusion on freedom, for which I speak on your behalf as well. Mr. Speaker, I did that which the Prime Minister did not do, although he could have, and that was to spend ten years, four of them on active service, fighting to preserve the very freedom I am speaking about tonight. Maybe it is he who does not understand what motivated people to go to Europe in the last war and fight for these very things. Just maybe, perhaps it is he who does not understand.

Mr. Lang: You should have worn a helmet.

Mr. Nielsen: And what is more, the real reason—

Mr. Crouse: Erik, he says you should have worn a helmet.

Mr. Nielsen: That is very true. I did not wear a helmet, if the minister means it in the classical sense of a metal helmet. But I did wear a helmet in the aircraft I flew. I certainly did not wear the kind of helmet the Prime Minister was wearing, riding around on a motorcycle in Montreal, advocating that people not go to Europe to fight for freedom in this country. I can say, further, that I added a year to my age to get into the forces; I did not lose two of them to stay out.

The only purpose for the invocation of that measure, and its only accomplishment, was to seize—

Mr. Olivier: You are a stranger in the night.

Mr. Nielsen: I cannot hear the member.

Mr. Olivier: I say you are a stranger in the night.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member says I am a stranger in the night. The hon. member for Louis-Hébert says I don't understand. When those two members over there can say they have lived in every province and territory in this country, as I have, then they can criticize me for not understanding. But until then let them be silent.

An hon. Member: New Brunswick got rid of you.

Mr. Nielsen: I am afraid I did not originate in New Brunswick.

Mr. Lang: Who got rid of you first?

Mr. Nielsen: The only purpose the invocation of that measure served was to gather reams and reams of paper and documentation. I must say it succeeded admirably in that. I must say it is to the advantage of the nation to have that kind of documentation of subversive activity; but it was a hell of a way to go about getting it—to invade the privacy of homes in the middle of the night and arrest and detain people under that kind of measure. But that was the purpose of it. And we have never had any explanation, on any basis, for its invocation since then. Hon. members opposite know that, because even the media have come around to criticizing themselves for supporting it.

Mrs. Morin: You must know why they did that.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps the hon. member will explain when she addresses herself to this subject. I would like to learn.

Mrs. Morin: Don't tell me you blame the media.

Mr. Nielsen: I would be the last one to blame or criticize the media, but I have occasional observations to make with respect to its accuracy. It is a night for true confessions. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has confessed his, I have confessed mine, and several members of the media have confessed with respect to the position they took at that time.

I see the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) grinning in his seat. He was the minister who followed the senator who preceded him, who is now in the other place. I say this about that hon. gentleman, that as long as he was solicitor general he resisted the setting up of the security planning and analysis group. He did not permit it to happen, because he knew of the dangers inherent in that kind of secret police force in this country. Then he was shunted aside. He sat on the front benches for a while, not on the treasury benches, and then was lateralled into that place where all party faithful eventually are lateralled—the other place. After that, the Minister of Supply and Services became the solicitor general, and it was with the greatest alacrity that the security planning and analysis group came into being because he knew he had to go along with the ideas of the Prime Minister on this, and with that small cadre of people who surrounded him, with respect to the philosophy of the establishment of this group.

Mr. Goyer: What about your own réseau of information?

Mr. Nielsen: I did not hear the question, so I cannot reply. But I will say that that group would never have been established under a Conservative government; and I still say there is no need for such a police force in this country. The Minister of Supply and Services and the Solicitor General can try until they are blue in the face to assure me, others on this side of the House and other Canadians outside it, that this group does not perform police work, when in fact it does. They take refuge behind the explanation that it is not an operations group, that it conducts no investigations. But, Mr. Speaker, all they need do is lift the telephone to the RCMP and say, "Look here, old Joe Blow down there in the reserve in Saskatchewan is giving a little trouble and we think it may be aimed at subverting the government of Canada." And bang! He has an intercept on him right away under this provision in the bill.

The minister shakes his head as though this is not true. I have a memo here, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to cite the date or the author. But I will cite the recipient of it, W. J. Davbos—Lieutenant-Colonel Davbos. It is entitled "Social defence and the Indian." It is quite a lengthy memo, of several pages. There is outlined in it the threat to Canadian security that is being offered—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but his 20 minutes have expired. He may, however, continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: You don't want to hear it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert).

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I am really disappointed at the members of the Liberal Party not permitting the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to proceed with his speech. I always believed the Liberal Party was thought of as the great reform party. Now I am beginning to think of it as the great reactionary party. After hearing the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), who have been the two main Liberal spokesmen at the report stage of this bill, I can only come to the conclusion that the party's name has been changed to that of the great reactionary party.

I recall hearing the story one night of a young Jewish rabbi, just graduated from the seminary, who went to the old rabbi and asked, "Would you give me some advice?" The old rabbi replied, "You go down in the market place of life for a while. That is the best advice I can give you." When I look at the Minister of Justice I realize that his training and experience have been in law school. When I compare him with a former minister of justice, I note the difference. That former minister not only had the academic experience but the practical experience.

If I had anything to do with the training of law professors I would make it a requirement that they go into the marketplace of life before becoming professors. And I would pass that suggestion on to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) also. If people like that want to become fully fledged professors, there should be a requirement that they go into the practice of law for at least five or six years to get the real touch of things.

It may be that we in this party and our friends in the Conservative Party would not be calling future ministers of justice arrogant, overzealous, rigid, inflexible, and so forth. That may be the result, Mr. Speaker, and I think it would be an excellent result because every measure that has been brought forth, every motion to improve the bill, has met with tremendous resistence from the Minister of Justice. There has almost been an apology from the hon. member from Windsor-Walkerville who has hopped from one side of the House to the other with his compromise amendments to the motions. It has been a rather disappointing display on the part of government members.

I think the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has set forth some of the dangers. I might add that I am very happy that we made sure that any authorization under the bill will be by way of an application to a judge. When the former minister of justice had conduct of a bill similar to this, it was his attitude that there should be political accountability and that the application should be made to the attorney general. I went along with that and saw the wisdom of it. After the experience we have had in the debate on second reading and the debate in committee, I think it is protection to people that the application for an authorization has to be made to the judge. This is the conclusion I have come to after our experience in committee, with the resistance and the inflexible attitude of the Minister of Justice in regard to this matter.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon set forth the dangers. If we can make it a requirement that the police must get judicial authorization for an indictable offence, and we now know the list of offences that they have to apply or which gives them the authority to apply, I see no reason why the same should not apply with regard to national security. I appreciate the strong point that the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) made with regard to the War Measures Act. One of the things that has had the strongest impact on my life was the action taken by the Liberal government in the days of Mackenzie King when it passed legislation to deport Japanese Canadians. As my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says, it was an order in council. If there is anything that made me a socialist, it was that particular action by the Liberal government.

I recall, as well, the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, having to tell the RCMP to lay off university students on the campuses. This was because of the overzealous attitude of the RCMP with regard to subversive matters. In this instance, the first minister of the Crown had to tell the RCMP to stop their harassment of university students.

I see nothing wrong in having the Solicitor General make an application to a judge for an order with regard to national security—nothing wrong whatsoever. The minister says that this is a very sensitive area, and I agree. But the sensitiveness of the area can be taken care of quite easily in the affidavit that would be submitted. Mr. Speaker, the application is ex parte and the content of the affidavit can be taken care of quite easily. There should not be any difficulty whatsoever. This would be a protection and would add to the prestige of the Solicitor General.

We have found the present Solicitor General to be very fair-minded, co-operative and understanding. I think it would add to his prestige and the security and protection of Canadians if he were to agree that whenever an application is made for an authorization, it should be by way of a judge rather than by way of the RCMP. It would impose a great responsibility on the Solicitor General—far too great a responsibility because there is a political element attached to national security measures. I would think it wise to accept the motion of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) that the application for authorization must be made to the judge. It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that we give full endorsement to the motion of the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on this matter for a few moments. I listened while the former dean of a law school took his academic podium and lectured a former attorney general of a province, who also has some experience in the law as well as experience in this House, about his attitude with respect to ministers of the Crown. Although I have not taken much part in this debate, having consulted with those in this party who have taken part in it, and having sat through most of it in the House, I want to say that in the last few days we have been dealing with a bill that affects every Canadian. We have had from the Attorney General of this country perhaps one of the worst examples of rigidity, arrogance and overzealousness, and as a result of holding for too long positions which were untenable in the interests of justice this Attorney General has been made to capitulate. I think the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) was right when he suggested that he is not like the former attorney general, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who, while I have some doubts about his capabilities as Minister of Finance, I have absolutely none with respect to his abilities as Minister of Justice. There is as much difference between that last mentioned gentleman and the present Attorney General as there is between night and day.

I was not in this House during the "October crisis", as it is called, but I was a very concerned and observant Canadian. I accepted at the time, on representations made by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), that there was indeed an insurrection, that there was indeed a possibility of a toppling of the instruments of government, a real threat to government and a real threat to our way of life. As time went on it became apparent that people were being held in custody incommunicado, without counsel, without the usual things that protect all Canadians, and without charges being laid. Doubts began to appear in the newspapers and doubts began to arise in my mind about whether the government had used in a proper manner the power which it has in the statute books of this country.

As time went on, people were released, some with their lives ruined, some with their businesses ruined, and only a few were ever brought to trial. Then the press of this country said that they, too, doubted the veracity of the government in the earlier assertions that were made and I began to wonder what had happened to our community. As a member of the Bar of the province of Ontario, I am going to say that if the Law Society of this province and other provinces had been as zealous with respect to the protection of civil liberties as they were in arguing about the right of a person to blow into a breathalyzer, perhaps some different complexion might have been put on this matter.

Doubts on these questions have lingered in my mind and, I am satisfied, in the mind of a former attorney general in this country. He, unlike the Minister of Justice, was a practising member of the Bar before he came to this place. For a time he practised while he was a member. He has seen in the courtroom and in other places the tremendous power of the state used in the apprehension and prosecution of criminals, and the relative difficulties experienced by people caught in the toils of the law. When bills seek to confer emergency powers without recourse or redress, any member of parliament with any sense of justice must be concerned about the attitude of the government which is to administer the law. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) can be forgiven for looking with suspicion at certain sections of the act. He can be forgiven for his doubts about the validity of certain sections when he looks across the aisle and sees those who would administer the law.

The present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) at one time was responsible for a different portfolio. He would counsel the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) with regard to any decision which would need to be taken with respect to the section we are considering. For that reason I am prepared to suggest that we should distinguish between ordinary crimes committed and those crimes which may be detrimental to the state. Of course, I am talking about offences which honestly, truly and obviously involve the security of Canada.

There should be differences with regard to the apprehension of ordinary criminals and those who would plot against the state. The government's record in making judgments of that sort is not good; actually, it is dreadful. So we can all be forgiven if we do not trust the government in the use of this section. We cannot be certain this government will not panic. We cannot trust the government not to use certain powers conferred but this bill for its own purposes. We have seen this government acting in desperation not just in the 1970 incident, to which I am alluding but in other circumstances. It has reacted irrationally in other ways.

As the section we are considering would confer great power to deal with the freedom of individuals, but would not provide for any of the normal safeguards, we can be forgiven for being skeptical. Such tremendous power carries great responsibility. The degree of responsibility must be as great as the power which is being conferred. We do not trust the government with this power, and I am sure I speak for many members.

Of course, when the government apprehends a real attack, as opposed to a suspected attack, or the possibility of a real attack involving the security of the state then without doubt, as most members of this House would agree, the government ought to have at its disposal extraordinary powers for dealing with the situation. I suppose this particular section is designed to meet such conditions. But what worries me is this: the wording in the reporting provision of the bill is not strong enough. As the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) suggested, the whole truth will not be set out in reports which under this bill must be made from time to time. In this regard the relevant section to do with reporting speaks of "a general description". That refers to methods of interception. You can bet your bottom dollar that the emphasis will be on the general rather than on the specific description. Even if there is an opportunity to make specific disclosure, the government will avoid that opportunity like the plague.

Why do I guess that? I have heard government members avoiding answering even the simplest questions during the question period. Those questions do not even involve national security, although they do involve our economic health. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), when asked simple questions, to do with inflation in this country, food prices, etc. has referred to that lightning-rod of Canadian politics, Beryl Plumptre, and suggested she will answer. Of course, she is not here in the House to answer.

Today I listened to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) waffling, if I may use that expression, in committee with respect to certain events which have occurred within Central Mortgage and Housing. There, again, we saw a member of the government evading the truth in committee. He was aided and abetted by partisan members of the committee who were afraid that the truth would be uncovered. That is what we face. That is the kind of thing which raises doubts as to how this part of the bill will be used once it becomes law.

Speaking for myself—I do not know if I speak for all—if I could choose the member of the treasury benches who would administer this bill without rigidity, without arrogance, but with understanding of the dreadful power contained in the bill, I would choose my neighbour, the former minister of justice who now is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). If the statement of the former minister of justice referred to at length by the hon. member for Yukon in the debate on November 28, represented that minister's position on the place of government in our society and the use of power, he is at least reasonably fit for the position which he held and which many in this country wish he held now.

Unfortunately, he is now responsible for another portfolio to do with monetary and fiscal affairs. He left his previous portfolio in which his strain of Irish goodness was able to show itself from time to time, and assumed responsibility for the portfolio in which a parsimonious attitude on behalf of the government must be exhibited. If he still occupied that portfolio, I suggest he would show a grasp of this problem much greather than his grasp of the problems to do with his present portfolio which have to do with economic, monetary and fiscal matters. I think the country suffered a bit because he left justice. It has certainly suffered because he went into finance.

● (2150)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: None the less, he is my neighbour. Sometimes there is very little in my heart with which I can praise, but on that occasion in 1969 there was a great deal. I should reiterate this in the most neighbourly fashion I can muster.

As we consider this bill we should consider that it is a giant step forward in providing the police and public agencies for the first time with the right to legally and usefully use a system of detection which the law never before permitted. That in itself imposes a great responsibility on them. In order to control that responsibility, parliament has decided the judiciary has a place. That was a wise decision. When historians look back at this parliament they will agree that if we were going to give that power it was a wise move indeed to provide that kind of protection, a protection which I must say, to my regret, the Minister of Justice fought against until he was dragged away kicking and screaming. The courts indeed have a part to play in this new form of police power.

None of us wants to see the public authorities hampered in any way. We do not want to see the Attorney General hampered in any way with respect to the functions of his office. We do not want to see the police of this country put in any worse position technologically than the lowest criminal or, indeed, the highest of the order of criminals, if there is such an order. Every one of us wants to see the police armed to protect society against the works of those who would seek to bring it down.

At the same time as we are giving the police this power we are giving a responsibility to the courts to protect society. We are giving the law officers a certain power, in this clause, in extraordinary circumstances when the country is actually facing the possibility of destruction in terms of its political interests, with its enormous power which this parliament has seen fit to convey and confer upon the Solicitor General, the Attorney General and others involved in the decision-making process. With that power there is a heavy responsibility not to use it in a political way to destroy or divert those who are perhaps the enemies of the government of the day, but to use it properly, wisely, judiciously and honestly to track down only those who would destroy the government of our country rather than those who would merely question it.

I am prepared to recognize that under certain circumstances there is a difference between the common criminal and those who would destroy the state. I do that on the understanding that whatever power is given to any government of this country is not a licence to misuse that power for its own sake. When I heard the hon. member for Louis-Hébert the other day, my blood ran cold. If I had the honour of defending the Minister of Finance I would not even recommend her for his jury because I feel so badly about her speech. I read and reread that speech.

Mrs. Morin: Oh, it impressed you, did it?

Mr. Baker: I wonder how one of such a gentle exterior can have dripping in her veins the ice that was apparent and will leak forever from the pages of Hansard.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. If the House wishes, I will put the question on the motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not agreed. It has been called ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe this is the last of the report stage amendments. I wonder whether we could extend the time three or four minutes and complete this part of the work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is correct that this is the last of the motions to be considered at the report stage. The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear "No."

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, there are other members of our party who have indicated a desire to speak.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order No. 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN ECONOMY—INCREASE IN COST OF FOOD—POSSIBLE PROGRAMS TO SUPPLY FOOD TO THOSE ON LOW INCOMES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, nutritional experts are taking a cautious view of the first findings of the Nutrition Canada survey. As one critic observed, it raises more questions than it provides answers and health experts do not know what to make of some of its findings. Its main point is that Canadians on the whole are badly nourished, regardless of their income level. To take this conclusion at its face value, particularly the latter part, would be a great mistake. There are too many qualifications which must be taken into account. For one thing, the survey does not seem to have made an in-depth study of the very poor, including many of the aged. For another, it has not to date included studies of the native Indian and Inuit peoples. For still another, it appears to overlook completely the findings of bodies such as the Montreal Catholic School Commission, 1972, and the National Council of Welfare, 1973, which found a close correlation between low income and malnutrition.

In its report "One child, one chance", the latter points out that while nutritional ignorance is common to rich and poor alike, those with an adequate income, often through overeating, are able to establish margins of nutritional safety. Those on low income are up against a situation where rising living costs force them to first meet fixed expenses such as rent, utilities and transportation. Food becomes the flexible item in the poor family's budget. What is left over from fixed expenses can be spent on food, a precarious approach to good nutrition.

It was the consideration of this fact that caused the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices to include in its first report to the House of Commons on April 2 of this year the following recommendation:

> That the federal government, in co-operation with the various provincial governments, consider the feasibility of co-sponsored programs to get proper food on the tables of people with low income.

To my knowledge, the government has taken no action whatever on this recommendation. To our many inquiries it replied that the Canada Assistance Plan stands ready to fund 50 per cent of any such program proposed by any provincial government. That is not good enough. The members of the food prices committee were well aware of the Canada Assistance Plan when drafting that recommendation. We were well aware, also, that some of the provinces simply cannot afford to find 50 per cent of the costs of such programs to supply the nutritional needs of their people.

What we intended to press for, and what we still press for, is leadership from Ottawa and a greater share of the funding—up to 75 per cent or 100 per cent. The need is great. Many hon. members have by their questions lately drawn special attention to the heavy extra burden being placed on low income people by the rising cost of heating oil and motor fuel. These are costs which must be met but which cut into the amount left for buying food. And look what is happening to food prices. To give one single example, a letter from Saskatchewan today encloses the tops of two boxes of Creamettes macaroni. The boxes are identical—the two-pound family size. One was bought on August 24 and cost 45 cents; the other was bought on November 23 and the price had gone up to 65 cents, representing an increase of almost 45 per cent in just three months. Both were bought in the same O.K. Economy Store, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Loblaws.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

Yes, I know about the increased cost of durum wheat, but I also know that macaroni is one of the food staples of the poor, a budget-stretcher, a substitute for the meat they cannot afford. Small comfort for these people to be faced by the confident image of the Loblaw manager who explains, "More than the price is right. But, by gosh, the price is right!"

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): It may be right for Loblaws, but it is wrong for the poor and it is wrong for the government which has the duty to protect their living standards. I am glad to see the minister in his place tonight. I want to ask him again: What is the government going to do about the recommendation of the food prices committee concerning the nutrition of people on low incomes?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member. I know that she was there when I was called before the standing committee of this House which deals with the matter of food prices. I then said that those who wrote the report on nutrition in Canada had reached some conclusions, but that we were taking those conclusions further and examining in detail certain elements worthy of further study, including in particular the situation of low income groups.

Moreover, the hon. member mentioned that there had been no studies concerning the native Indian and Inuit peoples. On the contrary, a study has indeed been made on Indians and Inuits and the relative report contains some recommendations. We plan to publish a complete study on this subject next spring.

When the hon. member suggests that certain provinces cannot afford to pay 50 per cent of social welfare costs, I would like to remind her that these provinces receive substantial amounts in the form of equalization payments which have been considerably increased again this year, to reach close to $100 million more than last year. I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is in the House tonight, for he was the one who suggested this measure in the budget speech. Such a measure would help greatly low incomes provinces.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Exactly.

Mr. Lalonde: With regards to the case mentionned by the hon. member relative to the increase in heating costs, I would remind her again that in most provinces the real heating costs are absorbed by public welfare programs, and as a result, there is no reason for which low income people in these provinces have to cut down their food budget to pay their heating costs. I personally communicated with my colleagues in other provinces to urge then to take special steps for that purpose.

Finally, as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I can hardly believe that such a province, with its present revenues, is unable to pay 50 per cent of the additional cost of food and if the small wage earners of that province are unable to feed themselves properly it is the responsibility of that provincial government which is free to adjust the public welfare payments and we will be pleased to contribute up to 50 per cent.

The position of this gouvernment on the food issue is that basically we must provide people with an additional income and they will then make a more sensible choice of food, if they are given more information and education.

WELFARE—METHOD FOR FULFILLING PRIME MINISTER'S PROMISE OF FUEL COST ASSISTANCE TO NEEDY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on November 23 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) what measures he proposed for the implementation of his television assurance that needy Canadians would have enough money to pay for higher priced winter fuels. I asked whether it would be by new legislation, greater federal generosity under the Canada Assistance Plan, or how. The Prime minister, in a scarcely startling reply, indicated that his statement was the direction agreed on between the Minister of National Health and Welfare(Mr. Lalonde) and himself. Later the minister indicated that telegrams were being sent that very morning to provincial ministers. The announcement of care and concern and largesse was seemingly purely a federal one. This seems to be prime ministerial largesse at its most fulsome; but the execution and implementation of the gesture was to be shared with the provinces.

As with many prime ministerial grand announcements—and I think of the one of last August—the difference between the appearance and reality is vast indeed. The federal government, which in mishandling of the energy question must take primary blame among the 11 governments in this country, is not taking the heavy portion of the burden being placed upon the consumers of this country resulting from such mishandling. This is as clear as is the fact that the announcement of federal aid for fuel is not any great new breakthrough in Ottawa-based compassion. It is unfair and misleading to suggest that the announcement is a new and improved approach to assistance to needy Canadians. The Canada Assistance Plan already provides for 50-50 sharing in respect of these matters. At page 7 of the 1970-71 report of the CAP we read:

> The major costs of assistance for which contributions are made under the plan are for basic requirements which are defined in the legislation as food, shelter, clothing, fuel, utilities, etc.

It declares, further:

> For other budgetary items such as shelter, fuel and utilities actual costs to the recipient are generally used . . . The plan is designed to support the provision of assistance to any person in need whatever the cause of his need.

In many other places in the report the word "fuel" is used. It is a deplorable misrepresentation to proclaim to the Canadian citizenry that the government of Canada was accepting new responsibilities, giving new leadership or showing new concern for the plight of the needy in this country. Many months ago I suggested that in the face of soaring living costs and resultant heavier burdens for the poor, the federal government should do more under the Canada Assistance Plan. I suggested that it should increase its portion to 75 per cent from 50 per cent. This was a sound suggestion before the fuel crisis fell upon us. It is all the more necessary now. Nor can I imagine that there is any province not willing or anxious to accept such a change in the structure of the Canada Assistance Plan. I would like to hear the minister's statement in this regard.

The mismanagement of the national economy by the present government has caused the twin demons of inflation and unemployment to have full play in Canada. The federal government should take its share of the efforts to mitigate the effects of inflation and unemployment upon the host of poor people in this country. It is very easy to send telegrams to the provincial governments and to restate the obvious, for example, that the CAP can be used to help the needy pay higher fuel costs. Much more meaningful and appropriate would be a new division of the financial burden. The increased fuel costs will be most hurtful in the five eastern provinces. These are the very provinces which will find it hardest to put up their 50 per cent of the cost of the Canada Assistance Plan. To ease their burden, to give more equality across the land, we need a new look and a new willingness to help. In short, we need a new formula. Telegrams and T.V. programs may seem impressive, but of themselves they will do little to help hundreds of thousands of Canadians for whom the prospects of the coming winter are bleak indeed.

I repeat my claim of months ago, a claim made by other members of this House in respect of the present emergency—that this government has put the people into it. The policies of this government should be reconsidered and should be strengthened. If the minister replies, perhaps he will give us the assurance that the delayed Bill C-211 will be brought forward immediately.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. member which was an exercise just as phony as his demonstration of crocodile tears about the action the government has taken in respect of the poor in this country. His whole argument had nothing to do with the fate of the poor but, rather, the giving of more money to certain provincial governments for the running of their social assistance plans.

I can only repeat that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his last budget gave $200 million in equalization payments to the provinces in need in this country. I should like to know, rather than see these crocodile tears, what the hon. member knows about what has actually happened. He might be interested to learn that, in respect of the province of Prince Edward Island, I have just received a telegram from the minister responsible indicating that this province, which the hon. member claims cannot do anything to improve the fate of the poor, has increased by 10 per cent across the board in October the social assistance payments, and that the rates are also being reviewed for further adjustment in January.

When the hon. member claims that the province cannot afford to meet its duties and responsibilities, I think he is seriously underestimating the real situation and what is happening in respect of this whole issue which he raised again in a phony way.

Mr. Paproski: What you say is phony.

Mr. Lalonde: Listening to you is something like that. So far as the question of fuel costs is concerned, most provinces are paying the actual cost of whatever the increases may be. They are being covered completely by the Canada Assistance Plan. The hon. member has no reason to cry in his phony way over the fate of some of the people in need in this country.

IMMIGRATION—INDIANS—REJECTION OF JAY TREATY BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the high-handed action of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in unilaterally exercising his power as minister of that department in respect of the members of the Iroquois confederacy was first brought to the attention of this House on October 29 by my colleague the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the matter has been dealt with already on one occasion in this hour by my colleague from Brant.

I am rising at this time because on that occasion I addressed a supplementary question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Unfortunately, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is leaving the House and it becomes obvious that only the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacGuigan) is here to reply. I say at once that if he intends to rise in that capacity and give me a repeat answer to the one he gave the hon. member for Brant, it will be completely unsatisfactory. This is in no way a personal reflection on his ability to reply. However, if he is here in some capacity representing the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) I shall await with interest what he may have to add to this discussion.

I addressed my supplementary to the Prime Minister on that occasion because it was evident to me that one department of government had unilaterally taken action in respect of something which had been accepted in other departments of government in relation to the Indians in Canada and the United States—in North America—over a long period of years. As the Minister of Manpower and Immigration indicated on October 29, it was something which went beyond the ambit of his department in the perspective in which it was raised, because he did say that he thought perhaps the question might more properly be addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). Obviously, my question requires a response from the Prime Minister inasmuch as by the admission of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration himself the ramifications of this action go beyond a single department.

It is all very well for the government through its spokesman, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, to outline all the niceties of the history of what is commonly referred to as the Jay treaty, and to suggest to us that it is not in effect because of certain action taken by the Supreme Court and because of lack of action on the part of the government of Canada, parallel in the legislative field to that taken in 1928 by the United States. Be that as it may, the fact remains that not only in respect of the Iroquois people in the area represented by the hon. member for Brant, but across Canada from one boundary to another in relation to crossing into and out of the United States, the government of Canada has tacitly accepted a procedure which in effect recognized the existence of the Jay treaty.

[Mr. Paproski.]

I know that this has been applied in relation to the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the state of Washington since before the days of confederation wherever the Indian people, many of whom belong to the same language and blood groups, moved across that boundary. I know that it has been recognized in great measure in respect of the people of the St. Regis community, for example, where the community is divided three ways, some of it in the United States, some in the province of Ontario and some in the province of Quebec.

For the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, without notice, without discussion or debate in the House, to suddenly, out of the blue sky, cancel an arrangement which had been in existence since before confederation, and then to hide behind the fact that the government has not taken legislative action to initiate the Jay treaty, makes a mockery of the whole professed interest at the present time on the part of the government in the question of aboriginal rights. It flies in the face of some of the statements made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and indeed of some of the reluctant admissions by the Prime Minister that the Indians had in fact more rights than he had realized until recently.

So this is a much broader issue than the one which was responded to by the parliamentary secretary to the minister when he replied to the hon. member for Brant on November 20 in the "late show". I would suggest that not only is this a question of aboriginal rights and the reality involved therein, but there is the whole question of what I think is the constitutional mockery that the government makes of this whole matter of the application of treaties. The Crown has asserted that it has not handed to parliament the treaty-making prerogative. We have heard that expressed in the House many times. It has also been recognized that, constitutionally, Canada inherited the treaties that were made on our behalf by the United Kingdom government prior to the Statute of Westminster in 1931.

So to suggest that the Jay treaty no longer has a valid application in Canada, if tested constitutionally, would be bound to be as incorrect as the assertion made until recently about the royal proclamation of 1763 on aboriginal rights. The government cannot have it both ways. If that treaty is not applicable because of lack of initiative in the past to introduce legislation, in effect the government is saying that the question of whether treaties have valid application should be in the hands of parliament. I suggest the best way the government could do this is to refer appropriate legislation to this parliament, so that we would have companion legislation to that which the United States in its wisdom saw fit to place on its statute books dealing with aboriginal rights.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a repeat question deserves a repeat answer. The fact is that in 1956 the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the Jay treaty had no application in Canada since it had not been implemented by Canadian legislation. In fact, Mr. Speaker, neither Canada nor the Indians were a party to this treaty because it was a treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

At the non-constitutional or non-treaty level, as I related in my reply on November 20 as recorded at page 7991 of Hansard, several steps were recently taken. The most important of them in this context is that at a meeting with a group of Indian leaders, including the president of the Iroquois and Allied Indian Association, at which the matter was discussed, the Indian leaders were urged to submit their suggestions to the task force reviewing current immigration legislation. It seems to me that this clearly indicates the willingness of the government to consider any proposals that may be made, at a concrete level, by Indian leaders.

The other details of the question are answered in the earlier reference in Hansard.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO ASSIST CHILEAN REFUGEES WISHING TO COME TO CANADA

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, since the coup in Chile, the Canadian government has been following closely developments in that country. From the outset, one of our prime concerns has been the need to assist those people who either have recently left Chile or who now feel obliged to make a new life in another country.

Canada has had a lengthy and admirable record in contributing to the relief of international refugees and related movements. This has been a positive and humane approach designed to permit those persons displaced to make a new life for themselves in our country through immigration. However, each of these movements has had its own particular problems and requirements. In the case of Chile, many of the people caught up in the situation have not been seeking new homes to which to immigrate but rather a temporary safe haven in another country. From the outset, we have tried to assist those persons who want to make their homes in Canada. We are accordingly extending our refugee program to people to whom humanitarian considerations apply.

Within hours of the September 11 coup d'état, one of our officers was on hand in Santiago to keep us abreast of developments and take such immediate action as was called for. Contact was also made with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees who took responsibility for co-ordinating the means by which assistance could be provided to those in Chile who felt themselves in danger, including identifying those who wished to settle in Canada.

Because the situation has been changing rapidly, a total of four special teams have been sent to Chile and third countries where evacuees have located to report on the situation and ensure that facilities were available to assist those who wished to immigrate to Canada.

Most recently a senior officer from the Department of External Affairs and a senior officer from the Department of Manpower and Immigration went to Panama and Honduras where they met with the groups of evacuees from Chile and the local authorities in order to determine the requirements for special procedures and assistance. Simultaneously, senior officers from the same two departments visited refugee camps and also appraised the demand coming from Chileans. Both teams compared views with our ambassadors accredited to those countries, and their findings have been considered by the government together with the data already provided by our representatives on the spot.

A figure of 13,000 refugees in Chile has been mentioned. This is not accurate. The figure of 13,000 refers to the estimated number of non-nationals living in Chile at the time of the coup, most of whom have given no indication of any desire to come to Canada. Two thousand persons have registered with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees and our teams have talked with many of these people in the camps where they are located. In addition, application forms for admission to Canada have been made available to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees for distribution to these refugees and to date the response has been slight. It is well known to them that Canada is receptive to refugee applications. This may stimulate increased interest in Canada and, in anticipation of this, an additional immigration officer and a medical officer have been sent to Santiago. Outside the UN centres there is an increasing interest on the part of Chileans in coming to Canada, and we are in a position to deal with these applicants.

All of these teams, as well as the United Nations personnel on the spot, have confirmed the fact that until recently relatively few people had expressed interest in immigration to Canada. This is true for those in Chile as well as for those located in Panama, Honduras and Argentina, many of whom have been contacted by our special teams.

For those people who wish to settle in Canada as a result of the coup, the provisions of Canada's ongoing refugee program will be applied. These include: relaxed selection criteria, although medical and background checks will still be carried out; accelerated immigration processing; language training and job placement services; assistance to cover transportation costs; financial assistance to provide for accommodation, winter clothing and other such special support necessary to facilitate early establishment. This is comparable with the approach taken to past special movements to Canada.

To date 20 people have arrived in Canada, 50 more have received their visas, and the applications of approximately 125 other people are being dealt with as quickly as possible.

Other countries have also been accepting people anxious to leave Chile, although they have primarily been granting entry to those seeking temporary haven. Our current understanding, according to UNHCR information, is that ten European countries have agreed to accept numbers ranging from 50 to, in one case, 600. In addition, four Latin American countries have evacuated a total of 1,000 people who were seeking asylum.

The situation in Chile is still changing and we will continue to monitor it, for future events will determine the number of people who, in the final analysis, may decide that the best course for them is to settle in our country. However, we expect that in total some hundreds of people will immigrate to Canada as a result of this situation, which will mean that Canada's contribution will compare favourably with that of other concerned countries.

In the past, individuals and groups have always rallied to provide local support and assistance in welcoming displaced people to their new communities and helping them to become established quickly. For these efforts many thousands of Canadians deserve special praise. In the case of Chile, large numbers of Canadians in church groups and other organizations have expressed their genuine concern in the welfare of those affected by the events in that country. We hope that again interested groups and individuals will join with the government in the provision of special assistance for these people by contacting their nearest Canada Immigration Centre or Canada Manpower Centre. Many of the individuals now coming forward are young, well educated and adaptable people who, with a little help, can be expected to add their contribution to the richness and variety of Canada.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to welcome the minister's statement with respect to the Chilean refugees. The matter has been in the public eye for some time and clarification was not only needed but was highly necessary. On that basis I welcome the minister's statement today.

Canada has a long standing history of accepting refugees, people who have had to leave their countries for political or economic reasons. This Canadian tradition has been based on two criteria, as mentioned by the minister in his statement. One has been the humanitarian consideration and the other, compassionate grounds. As Canadians we have taken the attitude that individually we have a responsibility to our fellow men and as a country we have a collective responsibility to help those who are less fortunate than we are. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's international reputation in this respect is well founded and established.

I remind the House that many of us are descendants of refugees who had to leave their homelands at one time or another for various reasons. It was Canada that welcomed our forefathers and gave them the same opportunities that were afforded to those living in Canada, and so they were able to become part of the traditions we all hold dear.

With respect to the minister's statement in regard to the entrance of Chilean refugees, on behalf of my party I submit that the same principles of humanitarianism and compassion should be applied and must be brought to bear in this case.

As I stated in my opening comments, there are certain questions that must be answered but unfortunately they have not been answered in the minister's statement. One question in the minds of many Canadians today concerns the nationality of the refugees who are applying to come to Canada. Are they primarily Chileans or are there also citizens of Latin American countries other than Chile? We would also like to have assurances from the minister that all precautions have been taken and that checks have been made in every instance where refugees have been allowed into Canada.

I find it rather disturbing that in his statement the minister left open the question of the number of refugees coming to Canada. While it may be rather hard to determine the number at this time, I suggest that the minister must have a projection. Another question remains, to which the minister only alluded, and that is the number of refugees who want to come to Canada on a permanent basis and become part of Canadian society and the number who are looking to Canada only as a temporary haven. These questions should be answered by the minister, Mr. Speaker.

I suggest that every effort should be made by Manpower officials to prepare the refugees for employment in Canada. The services of the minister's department should be made available to them in the same way as they were offered so successfully in the Ugandan experience recently. Canadians welcome genuine refugees. I accept the minister's assurance that the government is satisfied these are people whom Canada can readily accept and who are willing to make a positive contribution to Canadian society.

I remind hon. members that as Canadians we are responding to a plea for help from one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations. I am sure all hon. members join with me in seeking a world in which the international refugee organization will have a constantly diminishing responsibility and role and ultimately will not be needed at all. Surely a refugee problem such as the one facing us today again points out that freedoms cannot be taken for granted but can only survive as long as constant vigilance is maintained and a desire for the preservation of individual freedom is the goal of all mankind.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, for a long time we have been urging the government to treat the matter of refugees from Chile with a greater sense of urgency than has been apparent to date. We naturally welcome this indication that the government is now treating this matter with the proper degree of seriousness warranted by the humanitarian implications and the human tragedies involved. I cannot forbear saying, however, that up until the last few weeks when the minister sent the teams referred to in his statement there was a marked contrast between the complacency with which the government was addressing the subject and the facts reported to us from perfectly reliable sources. I refer, for instance, to the article by Ian Adams in the Globe and Mail just a few days ago.

Many people have come back from Chile stating that there was a continuing reign of terror, that there was an urgent humanitarian need and that Canadian action had been quite inadequate up to that time. I cannot forbear saying that the credit for the change of attitude lies with a large section of the Canadian people. I refer particularly to people in Quebec and people in the churches who communicated with the government—many, I must say, have communicated with me as well—indicating their deep concern about this matter. I regard this belated—I say "belated" advisedly—recognition that something had to be done as a credit to the working of our humanitarian democracy in Canada.

It is suggested in the statement that very few people want to come to Canada. I do not understand that to be the case. I offered to send to the minister a list I had several weeks ago of 60 people in Panama alone who had made application to come to Canada, but it is not until recently that their cases are being dealt with.

An hon. Member: Where were they from?

Mr. Brewin: They were from various parts of South America, some from Chile, some from Brazil and some no doubt from other countries. I do not personally think, when one is dealing with a humanitarian problem, that the nationality of the people concerned is of very great concern.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: I want to make one or two points with regard to the details of the statement. I am glad to see that there are to be relaxed selection criteria, although I do not exactly know what that means. I hope it means there will not be an insistence on the production of documents which the people concerned cannot possibly produce, such as passports and other travel documents. I hope this requirement will be waived as it was in the case of the Hungarian and Czechoslovakian refugees. The statement says that background checks will be carried out. Of course they have to be carried out. Our Immigration Act requires that we do not admit people with criminal records. Of course this must be looked into. But I hope these background checks will not result in long delays. I hope that a generous attitude will be taken and that political grounds will not be advanced as a reason for keeping these refugees out of Canada. It is all very well to call a person a Marxist and condemn him for that reason, but we are dealing with people whose lives are in danger and I hope political judgments will not be used to keep people out.

The statement speaks for assistance to cover transportation costs. I hope we will do what I believe the West Germans and Swedes have done, provide an airlift. If you have a sense of urgency, why not provide transportation directly? I hope the government is considering doing that.

The fact is also mentioned that one European country, Sweden, I believe, has agreed to accept up to 600 refugees. That is their target. I point out that Sweden is farther from Chile than Canada is. I suggest that we should take a leaf from that country's book and set a target at least as high as that which a smaller country like Sweden has been able to set in this regard.

I wish to finish by saying that, if I have been critical of the government, I now welcome the apparent change of heart. I say again that it is the aroused conscience of the Canadian people which has been responsible for this and I pay particular tribute to them this morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in his statement the minister mentioned the humanitarian reasons for accepting Chilean refugees. I think that we all agree with these reasons, except that we should not necessarily call those people refugees, but immigrants whom we should accept for those same humanitarian reasons.

I also believe that we should urge the minister to be careful in accepting those immigrants, to prevent Canada from becoming a refuge for all the riff-raff from all parts of the world.

For several years, Montreal has experienced difficulties with men from a certain country who defy even the government with their organization.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people from Chile should be accepted as immigrants rather than as temporary refugees and be taken in only if they meet the requirements of Canada for immigrants. Moreover, these immigrants should accept our political system and democracy as we live it. In short, they must accept to live in Canada as we do ourselves.

When seen under this light, the minister's decision is acceptable and desirable and we will support it. Again, however, care must be exercised, not because of the fact that these people come from Chile and of the experience they had to endure over there. It can be applied to just any situation in any country of the world.

I think then that care must always be exercised in situations like these as for any other.

ORAL QUESTIONS

[English]

ENERGY

OIL—REQUEST THAT MINISTER HAVE TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE CHECK FIGURES OF POSSIBLE SUPPLY CUTBACK IN CASE OF WORLD SHORTFALL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of public statements made by representatives of three oil companies which serve on the minister's technical advisory committee, will the minister consider asking this committee to meet immediately so that he can at first hand check the figures on the amount of cutback of oil supplies Canada would have to endure if we have to share, as the minister says, in a general world shortfall, and will the minister then report back to the House?

● (1130)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. gentleman says, the companies in question are all represented on the committee which is liaising with government, and the figures I cited earlier this week were the result of discussions between the government and company representatives. I will consider the suggestion to see whether it might be useful to call a fresh meeting at this time, but it does not appear to me that any new facts have been brought forward that would cause us to have any doubt about the figures I suggested in the committee, which, as the hon. member knows, reflect the kind of risk that might be anticipated if the worst came to pass this winter.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The minister's answer is the very reason I asked the question. I now have to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that, in light of public statements made by companies represented on the committee, which differ from what the minister is telling us, the credibility of the minister is at stake?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): According to my information, there is no discrepancy between the statements.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If there is such a discrepancy I would be more inclined to think it was the credibility of the other parties rather than the minister's credibility which was at stake.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF MINISTER—POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTMENT OF TEMPORARY RECEIVERS OF IMPORTED OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Regretful as I am to differ from the right hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —I should like to ask him whether, in light of the fact the minister has undoubtedly lost the confidence of the Canadian public and lost his credibility with this House, the public generally and the petroleum industry, he will appoint, if possible, a minister who can restore credibility and confidence so that the public may have some trust in any allocation the government may make of imported energy this coming winter?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Because the preamble to the question was so erroneous and so prejudiced, I lost interest in it after the preamble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: It is obvious the Prime Minister lost interest in this whole subject a long time ago. I should now like to ask him a very important question. Is the government giving any consideration to the appointment of temporary receivers of imported oil supplies in case of an emergency this winter in order that, if necessary, it may assert government jurisdiction over these energy supplies?

Mr. Trudeau: I would have to consult with the minister to know whether this is a worth-while suggestion.

JUSTIFICATION FOR INCREASE IN PRICES OF GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL AS OF DECEMBER 1

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he is satisfied there is evidence to justify the four to five cent increase in the prices of gasoline and fuel oil tomorrow? Has he studied the additional cost of a barrel of crude oil since October 15 and related it to the increase that has been demanded by the oil corporations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not expert in costing practices in the oil industry but the counsel I have received is that with the dramatic increase in overseas prices resulting from decisions made by supplying states over a month ago the cost of feed stock landed in Canada has, indeed increased and that these increases are within the terms of the exception mentioned by the Prime Minister last September.

Mr. Lewis: Everyone knows that the price of crude oil imported at Montreal and elsewhere has increased. Can the minister tell the House what was the average increase in the price of a barrel of crude oil? I have information that it might justify an increase of a cent or two but that by no means would it justify an increase as high as five cents a gallon.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the increase is, in effect, a multiple produced by multiplying 35 times four or five, I would have to confirm in the case of individual companies, but in general terms the conclusion my officials have reached is that the cost increase is reflected in terms of the crude price and that it should therefore be passed on in terms of the price of the commodity.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, this is so important to people east of the Ottawa Valley that it seems to me the minister ought to give us a clearer answer. Is it a fact that all the minister did was to accept the increases requested by the oil corporations which have already made immense profits?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Sir. That is not true at all. My officials have scrutinized very closely the costs involved, taking the advantage of comparing one refinery with another in order to find the basis for the claim of one or the other. After very close scrutiny and on the strength of this advice from our officials we have concluded that, indeed, these costs have been realized.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister inform the House whether the price increase to which he did agree was different from the price increase sought by the oil corporations? Did he lower the price increase they asked for or did he study the facts they submitted and decide that what they wanted was O.K.?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The applications for increases varied from refiner to refiner. As to whether there was an adjustment in a particular case, I could not be sure offhand, but certainly these applications were very closely scrutinized by my officials who discussed the figures fully with each of the companies involved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE TO OTHER CANADIAN POLICE FORCES OF INTERPOL REPORTS ON CERTAIN CITIZENS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Could he tell the House whether his department or the RCMP still receive from Interpol reports on political, military, racial or religious groups and whether these reports are distributed on request to other police forces in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): The mounted police do receive reports from Interpol on criminal matters, but I doubt whether they receive reports on the matters referred to by the hon. member. I will check and report further to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

If the minister does find out that such reports have been distributed in Canada, can he undertake right now to return these reports to Interpol and to refrain from taking part in such an activity of that body?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: I should like to examine that entire question after I have checked with the authorities.

ENERGY

OIL—SHARING BY CANADA IN POSSIBLE WORLD SHORTFALL OF SUPPLIES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister has stated that Canada has to be a good international citizen in terms of sharing equally the shortfall in world petroleum supplies. What actual net petroleum shortage in Canada would satisfy the minister's definition of good international citizenship under these conditions?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I think that would have to depend on the circumstances of the case, but I hope the general proposition I have put forward would be accepted even by the Official Opposition. It is that, in certain circumstances, as an international citizen we should assume responsibility within the community to assist countries which experience a greater shortfall than ourselves.

Mr. Balfour: Does it fall within the minister's definition of good international citizenship to be taking options for spot purchases of oil products throughout the world in competition with countries whose fuel shortage situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that is debate or argument, certainly not a legitimate question.

OIL EXPORT TAX—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE NEXT JANUARY—APPLICATION TO SYNCRUDE TAR SANDS DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Minister of Finance. Today notice was tabled of a ways and means motion in reference to the oil surtax. It is now rumoured and believed that the surtax of $1.90 per barrel will be increased perhaps in January. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would care to speak to that?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision yet with regard to the month of January in terms of taxation or otherwise. The hon. gentleman may know that there have been discussions with Alberta ministers in regard to this question and those discussions will continue.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary which follows along the line of the question of the hon. member for York South regarding the cost to the consumer. I notice that the notice of ways and means motion indicates that mixtures of hydrocarbons will also be subject to the tax, which would include the tar sands. In light of the fact that supply has a lot to do with price, is it the minister's intention that the tax will apply to the Syncrude development, that any such measures—we do not know because we cannot get from the government what it is going to do—will apply to oil produced from the tar sands in the same way as to other oil, which will, of course, curtail our supplies?

[Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix).]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the law is of general application. I might remind the hon. gentleman that the Syncrude project, if I am correct, will come into operation in 1977 and whatever the tax may be at that time I would think it would, on the whole, be subject to the general law with regard to taxation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North when the minister has completed his reply. I thought the minister had completed his reply and I apologize to him, but I would hope we might try to limit the number of supplementaries for each member.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To complete it, Mr. Speaker, in December, 1973, the impact of the export tax will not, of course, relate to the Syncrude project because it is many years from realization.

PROPOSED OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION RESPECTING APPLICATION TO BUILD

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In light of the fact that an application has been made, I believe, by Interprovincial Pipe Line Company with reference to the Montreal pipeline, would the minister assure the House that before any decision is made the facts will be bared before the House, including the amount of the anticipated cost, who is going to put up the money, if we have the quantity of steel required, which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says we have not, so that everything will be laid before parliament and the Canadian people will know that the government is not bluffing on a project it has announced three or four times?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might be aware that for the construction of pipelines in Canada parliament has established a procedure before the National Energy Board which will involve a public hearing. I might add that all aspects of the pipeline will be dealt with. Regarding the question of steel, I am advised that steel will be available for the pipeline to go ahead.

CONSIDERATION OF DEVELOPMENT OF FUTURE ENERGY UNDER PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has he given serious consideration, in conjunction with the producing provinces, to developing all future energy in this country as a public utility under public ownership?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Ressources): No, Sir.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister say whether or not he has given any consideration to approaching one or more of the producing provinces bilaterally with a view to co-operating in developing their energy resources under public ownership?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we have had conversations with more than one province, particularly with regard to federal sharing of the proceeds of the export tax. We indicated that on a joint venture basis we would be prepared to co-operate with the province's priorities in energy development. In that sense we have had discussion of this type.

MEASURES TO ENSURE DELIVERY TO EASTERN CANADIAN PORTS OF OIL NORMALLY MOVED THROUGH PORTLAND-MONTREAL PIPELINE

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport.

Can he tell me whether further arrangements have been made in our eastern ports to take delivery of the oil that some countries are unwilling to ship via Portland?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if we can get oil from a source other than the Portland pipeline, there is no doubt that we will be ready to take delivery of it.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister whether winter navigation on the St. Lawrence up to Montreal will be included in those further arrangements?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE MEETING WITH NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER CONCERNING INCREASE IN PRICE OF FUEL OIL

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Colchester-Cumberland North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell me whether he has had any communication with the premier of Nova Scotia regarding a meeting in relation to the increase in the price of fuel oil in Nova Scotia that will take effect tomorrow?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coates: May I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the premier has requested a meeting with him immediately regarding the increase in the price of fuel oil in Nova Scotia that will take effect tomorrow?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to confirm that with my office. I am not aware of it but perhaps such a request has been made.

OIL—STATEMENTS BY MINISTER CONCERNING POSSIBLE WORLD SUPPLY SHORTFALL AND MEETING CANADIAN NEEDS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated publicly that Canada, as a good international citizen, must share equally in any shortfall of world petroleum supplies. The minister has also stated that Canada's needs will be served first by Canadian crude oil, even if this means cutting off exports to countries that might be in short supply. Can the Prime Minister reconcile these conflicting statements and indicate to the House just what the government's policy is?

Some hon. Members: Answer!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that to ask a minister to reconcile one statement with another is debate and that a question in those terms is not in order.

GRAIN

FEED GRAIN MARKETING POLICY—POSITION OF SASKATCHEWAN WHEAT POOL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with the marketing of feed grains. Has the Minister of Justice been made aware of the fact that, despite his pilgrimage to western Canada to convince the farmers to the contrary, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has made it clear that it cannot accept the system now decided upon by the government for 1974 and 1975?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have received a document from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that indicates some further conclusions by them on the feed grain issue. I was pleased to see that they accepted the basic principle of equitable pricing across Canada and other very important features in the plan. In that spirit of reasonable discussion for which they are well known they have put forward a possible alternative way of accomplishing that objective, and we will be discussing this alternative with them further in the days ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, apparently the minister did not read what the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool said. He has picked out one item. Did not the Wheat Pool say that the Wheat Board must be retained as sole marketing agent, and is that not contrary to what the government wants to do? Second, did not the board of directors of the pool say that they want an equitable system of pricing and, in particular, an adequate level of floor price protection? In view of those facts, instead of quibbling with words is the minister now prepared to back from the position the government took which is not acceptable to the pools of western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Pool did focus on the very specific aspect of the Wheat Board remaining the selling agent for the rest of the country, and in effect proposed that the kind of system we adopted this year for formula pricing be continued for another year into the future, along with some of the other steps we have proposed. The right hon. gentleman's reference to floor prices is, of course, a direct reference to a part of what is in our policy in terms of minimum price guarantees. They also endorse the storage program which is a part of our policy. That is why I say there is certainly a distinct hope that we can in this further period discuss the advantages of our proposal, which would have left the board very much in control of the export market and most of the domestic market but would have allowed a market pricing technique to operate, as against the advantages there are with a more artificial technique. I am certainly openminded on the question, as always.

● (1150)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no doubt the minister is openminded, but the fact remains that what has been stated by the Wheat Pool supporting the policy of the government is not. Is it not true, that it is unacceptable?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I must ask for an answer, not an equivocation and alibi. Is it not a fact that the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool says it will not accept the government's plan?

Mr. Lang: The fact is that it has indicated its acceptance of the principles which are obviously fundamental to what we are accomplishing. They indicated one variation on the manner of accomplishing what we wanted, but the most important thing is that they have accepted the principle of one country and one grain market throughout that country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

SURVEY OF COMPANIES ON CONSEQUENCES OF POSSIBLE SHORTFALL IN ENERGY SUPPLY—INCLUSION OF AUTOMOBILE FIRMS—EFFECT ON MODELS PRODUCED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the survey done last week of 1,000 companies on the consequences of a shortfall in energy supply. Could the minister inform the House in a general way what questions were put to the companies and, second, when the departmental committee expects to finish its analysis of the results of that survey?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to answer the question. This survey was undertaken by my department. It is part of the contingency planning in respect of the announcement the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made last week concerning the energy supplies allocation board. This survey was aimed at determining the possible effects on various industries in various parts of the country of shortages of various fuels—diesel fuel, heating oil, and heavy fuel oils—from the point of view of contingency planning. We are doing our homework, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell the House when he expects the committee will complete its analysis of the results of the survey? I understand the survey is completed. When will the analysis be completed, and will he assure the House he will make the results of that analysis and any subsequent action the government intends to take known to the public?

Mr. Gillespie: This is a continuing analysis, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Continue your homework.

Mr. Gillespie: If you would like to wait for the answer, I will give it to you. I know some hon. members opposite regard this as a serious question.

Mr. Hees: Treat it seriously and stop joking about your homework.

Mr. Gillespie: Perhaps some of them will realize why it is necessary to set up an energy supplies allocation board. Perhaps, then, they will understand that when it is necessary to go that far it is also necessary to get some facts upon which allocations will be made.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the minister. Can the minister inform the House whether or not the automotive industry was included in this survey and, more specifically, whether his department is finding out what models of cars in terms of size are being produced in Canada since 60 per cent of that production goes to the United States and there could be a fall-off in employment if their sales go down considerably? Was an effort made to determine what kind of models are being produced and what the consequences might be in that industry in light of the energy shortage?

Mr. Gillespie: We have been in touch with the manufacturing companies and their presidents within the last 24 hours in respect of precisely that kind of question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for South Shore.

ENERGY

STEPS TO ASSURE ADEQUATE TRANSPORT OF BUNKER OIL TO CANADIAN PORTS AND DISTRIBUTION TO SHIP OWNERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The shortage of bunker oil supplies at Canadian ports threatens to become even more severe in December and the world shortage may cause Canadian ships, especially our large fishing fleet, to curtail operations due to a lack of fuel. Is the minister taking any steps to ensure that adequate transportation of bunker oil is provided to Canadian ports and that it is adequately distributed to Canadian ship owners?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the principal effort we will make to have adequate distribution will be dealt with by the legislation which we hope will receive first reading next week to make sure there is equitable allocation of supplies to Canadians. With regard to fuel supplies generally, the hon. member may know we have established with the cooperation of industry a substantial movement of oil from western Canada through the Panama Canal to eastern Canadian ports and we hope we will be able to sustain this volume through the winter. I appreciate the confirmation that this is a serious situation and one requiring parliamentary action.

SHORTAGE OF PETROLEUM BY-PRODUCTS

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Is he aware of the alleged growing artificial shortage of petroleum products and byproducts such as paint, plastic articles and cosmetics? It seems that several citizens fear a shortage of those products in some areas of Canada.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is another aspect of the problem created by the shortage of petroleum products. That is why we propose to take the steps, among others, I have just enumerated in answer to another hon. member.

Mr. Boisvert: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Does the minister have the power to prevent those companies from stocking their merchandise with the view to increasing prices after having created a shortage?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, not at the present time, but it is one of those we intend to be given through the bill I alluded to.

LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES OF HALL LAMP COMPANY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and is in line with the one asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby concerning the difficulties industries are having. Is the minister aware that 350 employees have been laid off at Hall Lamp Company of Canada at Huron Park because of financial problems caused by a shortage of raw materials related to energy, and has he had his officials contact this company to see if anything can be done which would be helpful so that these 350 jobs will not be lost to the area?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think this reflects the seriousness of the situation to which I referred a moment ago. We were in touch with the firm as recently as this morning and discussed the problem. It is related, I believe, to a temporary shortage of certain materials. Officials of the company tell us they expect to resume production in the near future.

FERTILIZER—DETERMINATION OF AMOUNT GOING TO UNITED STATES—POSSIBLE PRICE INCREASE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to ask him whether, in view of the fact there seems to be genuine concern by the consumers of Canada about foodstuffs, a monitoring system has been set up to indicate the amount of fertilizers that are going to the United States at the expense of Canadians and which would normally help produce a greater supply of food in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, last spring I met with the fertilizer manufacturers and I did the same thing this fall. Even last spring I seemed to be more concerned than most people about food production in Canada. Knowing full well what they could do to help, I had meetings with these people again and they did what they said they would do last fall. We know how much fertilizer is planned for domestic consumption. I made the statement that I will do everything and recommend everything to the government to make sure that there is sufficient fertilizer for domestic consumption. We are getting the figures and we will be in a position to tell the hon. member just how much fertilizer there will be for farmers in Canada and how much will be available for export.

Mr. Korchinski: After all that from the minister, may I ask him whether he anticipates an increase in the price of fertilizer to Canadians after the Americans have got it at a lower price?

Mr. Whelan: We already know in some areas of manufacture that there is increased cost because the rock phosphate that is brought from other countries has tripled and in some cases quadrupled in price, so this will be added to the cost of fertilizers and there is only one place from which it can be obtained. Also, in the province of British Columbia the government has seen fit to raise the price of natural gas by 81 per cent and it is going to cost more to produce fertilizer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the proposed $200 million plus SOAP project requires a fourth partner in addition to Polysan, Dupont and Union Carbide, has the minister received any indication that such a fourth party has in fact been found?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have received unofficial word this morning that a fourth party is being added to the group. I welcome this news because from my point of view the whole project is very worth while and I hope it will go forward shortly.

Mr. Cullen: In view of the importance of this project to the petrochemical industry in Canada, will the minister agree to meet with officials of this project to determine what further assistance might be necessary from the federal government?

Mr. Gillespie: I would be pleased to meet with them on an early occasion.

SUSPENSION OF JOCELYN LOVELL BY CANADIAN CYCLING ASSOCIATION—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE TO SECURE REINSTATEMENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I have sent him notice of it. In view of the fact that Mr. Jocelyn Lovell, an outstanding Canadian cyclist, has been suspended by the Canadian Cycling Association as a disciplinary measure and that this suspension will last until after the Pan-American Games to be held in Australia in February, and in view of the fact the government has invested approximately $30,000 in his achievements to date, would the minister take steps through his office to have this athlete reinstated in time for the Pan-American Games so that the taxpayers' money will not have been spent in vain?

[Mr. Korchinski.]

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will make sure to inquire about further developments of this situation, but it is not for my department to give directives to sports organizations; they have their own disciplinary measures and their own rules to comply with.

SUGGESTED ACTION TO ENSURE TAXPAYERS' MONEY NOT WASTED BY SUSPENSION OF ATHLETES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): I have a supplementary question for the same minister. In view of the fact his department is responsible for grants that go to Sports Canada and to the athletes of this country, can the minister advise the House whether he will take steps to ensure that other disciplinary measures that are taken will not result in such a waste of money to the taxpayers?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly contact this organization, but I repeat that such organizations do not live exclusively on government subsidies. Besides, I think sport associations to be essential to the well-being of sports in Canada and that on the contrary we must encourage discipline in these organizations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED LACK OF MEDICAL SERVICES FOR CANADIAN CONTINGENT IN MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister advise the House why it took the government nearly a month before it sent adequate medical services to back up our peacekeeping force in Egypt and these services are being sent today only because of the resignation of a senior medical officer in disgust at the inadequacies of the services that had been provided?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first of all that some of the unfortunate remarks that have been circulated on this matter are related to a local hospital and not to the Canadian medical services. I would also like to assure the House, and particularly the families of our personnel in the United Nations Emergency Force, that our participation was carefully and soundly planned and particularly well planned in relation to medical services.

Mr. Baldwin: Like the energy crisis.

Mr. Richardson: When our contingent first left on November 10 they had complete medical facilities for a group of 400. In addition, arrangements were made with two civilian hospitals in Cairo, and we also planned, as you have indicated, and have sent a full Canadian 20-bed hospital complete with surgical equipment. We have taken every possible care of Canadian personnel in this force.

REASON FOR DELAY IN TREATMENT OF TWO INJURED SOLDIERS AND RESIGNATION OF SENIOR MEDICAL OFFICER

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): If this planning was so perfect as the minister claims, why was it necessary for these two men who were hurt to wait six hours before receiving treatment in Egypt, and why is it that the senior medical officer resigned in disgust at the inadequacies of these co-called wonderful services that the minister says were planned? Answer that one.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): The answer is that Corporal Weir and Corporal Berry, who were in an unfortunate automobile accident, were in downtown Cairo and were first treated in a local hospital. That is what I indicated in my first answer. The criticism was not related to the Canadian medical services but to the initial treatment of the two soldiers. They were then moved by a Canadian medical officer to a U.N. approved hospital where they received full and adequate treatment. But the Canadian medical services were not involved in this incident.

Mr. Hees: You still have not answered why that medical officer resigned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COST OF EYEGLASSES—POSSIBLE ENCOURAGEMENT OF COMPETITION FROM CHINA TO REDUCE COST

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the finding of the Saskatchewan government that Canadian consumers are paying two to three times as much as they need to for eyeglasses, the cost of which runs as high as $38, and in view of the fact China has quoted a price on eyeglasses with standard plastic frames of less than $10 a pair, will the minister look into ways and means of encouraging Chinese competition as a means of protecting the Canadian consumer?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to do so.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, owing to the noise in the House I did not hear the response of the minister, but I will ask alternatively, will he look into and consider ways and means of dissuading Canadian eyeglasses frame makers from their present policy of costly built-in obsolescence?

Mr. Gray: I will be happy to examine what can be done in that regard.

IMPRISONMENT OF THOMAS SERJEANT IN TANZANIA—DATE OF NOTIFICATION TO MEMBERS OF FAMILY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West asked me a question about the time when the brother of Mr. Serjeant was notified. He said at the end of his supplementary question to me that this is a very serious matter and he thought the minister should explain it. In fact, Mr. Serjeant has two brothers. Our High Commissioner in Dar-es-Salaam was specifically asked to contact the brother who lives in England, which we did by telegram on October 19 and in person on October 22. However, since Mr. Serjeant expressly omitted any reference to the other members of his family, we did not call them until some time later. This is our usual practice since in some cases a general alert could lead to unnecessary embarrassment.

[Later:]

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in connection with the statement made a few moments ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the reason the Serjeant family was not advised of the imprisonment of Thomas Serjeant. It is obvious that the record should be put straight because the minister's officials are telling him one thing and they have told the Serjeant family something else. The reason given the mother when she inquired why she was not informed was that they were unable to ascertain the correct spelling of her name.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that Mr. Serjeant's brother was contacted by telegram and in person on the dates I mentioned, so that the family was notified as requested by Mr. Serjeant himself.

ASSURANCE OF SUPPLY OF ETHYLENE FOR PLASTICS AND RESINS—GOVERNMENT ACTION—POSSIBLE CONSTRUCTION OF ADDITIONAL PLANTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the extreme shortage of supplies of ethylene in Canada, which were drawn to the attention of the department many months ago, and in view of the greater shortages now going to occur in the supply of plastics and resins in Canada, could the minister advise the House what steps his department is taking in order to assure Canadian users of these chemicals that they will have an adequate supply? Will he advise the House what steps he is taking with his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the National Energy Board to get going with the ethylene plants that have been proposed in addition to the one to which he referred this morning?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a very general question. Perhaps I could say on the generality of the question that, first of all, we have taken a number of steps with the corporations and discussed with them their plans for petrochemical production in Canada. This is why I welcomed the announcement earlier today with respect to the SOAP project. We have also been discussing similar projects with interested parties in and around the Edmonton area. As the hon. member knows, Canada is a net importer of petrochemicals, and this is why we are bending every effort to ensure supplies for plastics users in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REASON FOR DELAY IN PROVIDING FIELD HOSPITAL FOR CANADIAN CONTINGENT IN MIDDLE EAST PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings of the Minister of National Defence. In the statement explaining the incident to which the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings referred the department notes, much to my surprise, that it took approximately six weeks from the time it was first indicated that Canadian troops would be involved in this force until the field hospital arrived in Egypt, despite the fact that we are supposed to have a quickly reactive, highly mobile force. Can the minister explain that?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that the first contingent did have complete medical facilities with them for a unit of that size, 400 men. The hospital was planned at the start of the operation, and it takes a little longer to move a 20-bed hospital with surgical equipment than it does to move troops.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have reached the end of the question period. The hon. member may ask a supplementary and then I will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I do not find that explanation satisfactory. Troops normally need hospitals. Will the minister discuss with the government House leader the feasibility of having this question of the possible inadequacy of Canadian medical facilities in the Middle East referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for examination and report, so that the matter may be cleared up?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased, so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, to appear before the committee because I think the medical services that have been supplied are adequate and have been carefully planned. However, I would have to talk to the House leader before such arrangements could be made.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 29, consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and motion No. 22 (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has to do with the report of an interchange between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and myself yesterday at page 8266 of Hansard. The minister, after referring to me in rather generous words, mentioned something about tilting at windmills. I took the identification of the windmills to be ministers of the Crown in the present government. The minister said about me:

> Without pretending to copy his style, may I say, he is well recognized, too, as one of the foremost tilters at windmills—

And I replied:

> I have had lots of opportunities, looking at the government.

However, there is an additional sentence in Hansard which reads:

> Tilting at windbags, also.

I never said that. I know the hon. member who did, and I just want it to be clear that that portion of the record did not come from me. The windmills referred to by the minister were identified by me as the ministers surrounding him.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, clause 6 of the bill, which the hon. member for New Westminster seeks to amend, was very thoroughly discussed in the committee. It would be hard to say if any other clause received more consideration. If you take a look at the bill as reported from the committee you will see that almost every part of clause 6 was amended. Espionage and sabotage activities by the agents of foreign countries within our nation, or similar activities by those who may not be employed by foreign countries, nevertheless are designed to destroy the democratic system in Canada, and need serious consideration.

When I spoke on second reading of the bill my feelings were very much those of the hon. member who proposed amending motion No. 22. This is an important bill, and essentially is designed to prevent people from snooping into the affairs of others. At that time I commended the minister for introducing the bill, and I commend him again for the work he has done, as well as the committee for the work it did on the bill. It is an essential bill. It is essential that individuals in this country not be allowed to pry by electronic means or otherwise into the affairs of other individuals, into the sanctity of their living rooms, their offices, whether through their telephone conversations or through many of the highly sophisticated devices that are being marketed throughout the country. It is essential that serious penalties be imposed for this offence. Perhaps even the penalties in this bill are not sufficient for those who pry and use electronic methods of surveillance of the private activities of individuals in Canada.

At the same time, we have to look at the rights of law enforcement agencies. I commend to you the position presented to the House by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That gentleman has had the obligations of the highest office of this nation; he has had the concerns of running a government and he is a member of this House who has had a wide experience in the courts of this country. If there was ever a member of the House who has fought hard for the rights and privileges of individuals it is he. None the less there is some necessity for those involved in public order to have the right to find out what is going on in the country. It is even more essential that those involved in protecting our nation from people who would destroy it, whether they be from foreign countries or not, be kept in line. Certainly it is essential that the government know what is going on within the country.

Before getting into that subject, Mr. Speaker, I must make one thing clear. Other members have mentioned it, but I wish to make it clear also. This bill does give to the police and those in charge of law enforcement a power that they really never had before, and that is the right to introduce into a court information obtained by electronic means to be used as evidence. This is a new right; the right to introduce something that is not oral evidence which would be subject to cross-examination, but evidence obtained through some recording device. Listening to the playback from a recording device is not necessarily the same as listening to something said orally. I could very easily read a passage which could be recorded but when played back it would not sound the same as if I had said it on a witness stand and you had seen my expressions.

This whole matter of the use of tapes is an extension of the power of law enforcement agencies, and presumably of the government of this country to control espionage, sabotage and the rest, and of the right to introduce the resultant information as evidence. This is not the same as introducing a witness on the witness stand in a courtroom but is introducing a machine on the witness stand in a courtroom to repeat what that machine heard. Unfortunately, what is on a tape can sound differently to different people. A judge in a courtroom has the ability not only to listen but to see the witness, to watch his demeanour and to judge the veracity of the evidence. But when he hears the playback of a tape he does not hear or see the witness nor the witness's expression. In the privacy of my living room, I suppose I could say that it would be a good idea to get rid of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and perhaps we could do it by putting strychnine in his coffee. If you heard me say that on the witness stand, you might deduce from my demeanour that I was just joking, but if you heard it as a result of playing back a tape you might take it seriously.

It is with a great deal of difficulty that I arrive at the decision. I cannot consent to this kind of thing, especially when the only protection is authorization by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). I understand why it is necessary, and I think this House must understand and the people must understand, that we live in a sophisticated age with sophisticated crime and so it is necessary, especially in crimes involving damage and danger to the state, that there be something more than the direct evidence of witnesses on the witness stand. It is necessary that the Crown, in a prosecution to convict persons of this type of activity, have the right to introduce evidence that will indicate a conspiracy against the state.

It is with difficulty that I accept this use of taped evidence. I only accept it because there is a prior requirement on us, not just the requirement to protect individual liberty. I respect the opinion of the hon. member for New Westminster in that respect, but the necessity is for us to respect the integrity of our way of life. Without our system of government, without protection of our cherished freedoms, we will not have a way of life. So, we have a conflict with human freedom on the one hand, freedom of self-expression, freedom of privacy of expression and the absolute necessity to maintain the system so that we can indeed have that freedom of expression.

I suppose one of the things that is bothering hon. members, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of government we have had, especially since this parliament resumed last January. When you look at the Solicitor General you wonder whether he is not an "over the wall" Solicitor General. There have been so many leaks with the prison system that you begin to wonder whether he is the right man to be involved in authorizing warrants to allow someone to do some snooping. Be that as it may, I know he will not be the Solicitor General long and perhaps we will get a better one. I suppose it is necessary to have some minister appointed to give these authorizations. I am sure the minister has fairly competent people in his department. The administration of the department leaves a great deal to be desired.

The clause we are considering draws a fine line. It distinguishes between questions having to do with the protection of individual freedoms and questions having to do with the security of the state. In the past, there has been real as well as apparent danger to Canada. I refer hon. members to the incident which took place immediately after World War II involving Gouzenko. As I recall it, a member of this House was involved in an espionage matter.

Without doubt, some foreign governments do not pay much attention to our ideas of freedom of expression and freedom of thought and are prepared to use all kinds of devices in order to learn what is going on in Canada. They are prepared, perhaps, to break down our economic system and our system of democracy. Although our political system of democracy may not be perfect, it is the best system we have and we do not want to jeopardize it. So, we must be eternally vigilant in monitoring the activities of foreign powers operating within our country. It is necessary for someone in authority in the government to keep a very close eye on the activities of foreign powers, including our neighbour to the south, a great power, and the power of the other side of the Arctic circle. It is imperative that we know what their representatives are doing in Canada. If, therefore, it is necessary for us to undertake electronic snooping or counter-intelligence work, that work must be done.

The bill goes further than that. It provides for monitoring activities to be undertaken in order to prevent a change of government in Canada or elsewhere through the use of violence, force, or other criminal means. We are aware of the activities of the FLQ, which thought it better to bomb mail boxes than speed up the delivery of mail. Any government which is responsible for the security of Canada must keep track of these people and others who might be described as mental cases.

Some nations keep track of certain undesirables by putting them behind barbed wire or in cages. We cannot authorize that. If the rights of all, including those of minorities, are to be protected in Canada, the government must know what is going on in the country. It must be aware of the activities of those persons whose whole aim is to destroy our society and attain their ends by revolution. We can change our government through the use of a ballot. We put a simple X opposite the name of the candidate of our choice. We must not allow those who would destroy, with guns, bombs and fire, the very basis of our society to carry out their aims. They would create disruption for the sake of disrupting and destroy our system and all our freedoms. Clearly, it is necessary for the activities of such people to be monitored.

The bill, as amended by the committee, is specific with respect to controlling the use of warrants authorized by the Solicitor General. I am referring to the possible infringement of individual rights which might be occasioned by monitoring. Unfortunately, the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) goes a little too far. I understand his attitude. I suggest that the amendment, if passed, would control the activities of the Solicitor General more tightly than necessary. Although I do not have a great deal of confidence in our Solicitor General—as I said earlier, we shall see a new solicitor general shortly—I submit that the amendment is not really necessary and is not really in the interests of this country. As this matter had been fully explored in committee, I am surprised that the hon. member should have brought it before the House at this time. For those reasons I, personally, will not be supporting the amendment.

Sir, in view of what has been happening in the world in terms of hijacking of aircraft, bombings of department stores and shooting of innocent children in other countries of the world, I submit that it is essential for the government to keep itself informed and know what is going on in this country.

If the government had known what was going on in the country prior to 1970, perhaps it might not have been necessary to invoke the War Measures Act. Indeed, it became clear after the War Measures Act had been invoked that that action was not necessary. Nobody was convicted under the act; nobody was even accused under it. Certain people were charged under the regular provisions of the Criminal Code. If the Solicitor General and police forces of this country had kept a proper eye on what was going on, I submit it would have been possible for us to arrest and charge certain persons who were engaged in notorious activities in the province of Quebec, and there would have been no need to invoke the War Measures Act. The government and the police did not know what was going on. The government was frightened to heck and invoked the War Measures Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member, whose time has expired. He may continue, of course, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Two minutes.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I had just about wound up.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has received conditional approval to continue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member has been wound up for years.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their courtesy in allowing me more time. I was suggesting that if the authorities had kept track properly of the actions of the revolutionaries in this country prior to 1970, there would have been no need for the War Measures Act to be invoked. Evidence would have been available for charging certain persons with sedition, treason and other offences. There would have been no need to put the whole country under house arrest, so to speak, inasmuch as people could be picked up without being charged and held in jail. That situation could have been avoided if the government had known what was going on and, probably, Mr. Laporte would not have been murdered.

I have suggested what the government should do. It should be aware of the activities of revolutionaries in this country. In other words, our nation must be prepared. I recommend to this House the boy scout motto: Be Prepared. If we are prepared we will not encounter the problems we encountered in the past, problems which other nations have encountered and are encountering today.

● (1240)

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on motion No. 22. Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion will stand deferred. According to the order made on Thursday, November 29, 1973, the ulterior proceedings at the report stage of Bill C-176 stand deferred until Tuesday next.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; following consultation it was agreed that rather than send Bill C-233 to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs after second reading, the bill would be considered in committee of the whole. We will follow that procedure and hopefully deal with the bill today. I would be quite prepared to move that as an amendment. However, the Chair may feel that being a government motion, this should be done by a minister of the Crown. In any event, everyone has been consulted and this is agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been such consultations and we agree to the change being made in whatever way Your Honour sees fit.

Mr. Speaker: The simplest way would be to put the motion as suggested, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING EQUALIZATION FORMULA, ELIGIBILITY FOR PAYMENT, POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-233, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, that is not bad for a Friday morning. The purpose of the bill now before the House is to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1972, and to effect amendments to the Federal-Provincial Revision Act 1964 and the Income Tax Act. It is intended to further improve and update certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces and particularly our system of equalization grants. As hon. members will know, our system now enjoys an international reputation for its effectiveness in dealing with fiscal problems in a federal state. I am hopeful this bill will improve that even further.

I might briefly summarize the content of the bill before commenting in detail on its provisions. If Your Honour will allow me some liberty with the rules, without going into a clause-by-clause analysis, I might make some comments at this stage which might save time in committee of the whole.

Four changes are embodied in the amendments. The first broadens the equalization formula to include, in the revenue to be equalized, local government taxes raised for school purposes. The second extends the existing arrangements for federal financing of post-secondary education for an additional three years. The third reduces from five years to one year the period of ineligibility, for revenue guarantee payments, of any province which failed to adopt the converted tax rates specified in the present legislation when it was enacted last year. The fourth change is simply a technical adjustment. It extends the abatement of three points of federal income tax in Quebec, associated with the Youth Allowance Act, which has been part of the Quebec income tax structure for the past decade. I will deal with each amendment in turn.

[Translation]

Hon. members are no doubt familiar with our system of equalization grants. This program provides for a payment of unconditional grants to those provinces which are below average in their capacity to raise revenues. Payments compensate a province in full for any shortfall in revenues which they experience as a result of being below average in capacity to raise revenues. The program thus insures that each province is in a position to provide its residents with reasonable standards of public services without having to resort to levels of taxation which are above the national average. In the current fiscal year, equalization payments to the seven provinces receiving these payments—that is, all provinces except Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta—will reach about $1.3 billion.

[English]

On February 19, 1973, I announced in my budget address that the government intended to broaden the equalization formula to include, in the revenue to be equalized, local government taxes for school purposes. My concern at the time was that the seven lower-income provinces, because of their lower tax capacity, were not in a position to benefit to the same extent as the higher-income provinces from the stimulating effect of the tax cuts introduced at that time. I felt that some additional assistance to these slower-growth and lower-income provinces was justified. The present bill fulfils that undertaking.

Specifically, the amendment I am proposing provides for the inclusion among the revenues to be equalized those that are raised by local government for school purposes. By extending in this manner the kinds of revenues to which equalization applies, I estimate the total value of grants paid to the recipient provinces will increase by about $175 million in the current fiscal year. I might indicate the way in which this amount will be distributed among the recipient provinces: Newfoundland, $24.1 million; Prince Edward Island, $4.6 million; Nova Scotia, $22.4 million; New Brunswick, $20.5 million; Quebec, $72.2 million; Manitoba, $10 million and Saskatchewan, $20.9 million.

The grants are unconditional and the provinces are, therefore, free to use them as they see fit. In my budget address I expressed the hope that this additional income to the provinces would be used to ease the burden on property taxpayers and tenants. I am pleased to see that several provinces have found it possible to provide relief to their taxpayers in various ways, including tax reductions and reductions in budgetary deficits.

This increase in grants will bring the total amount paid in equalization to about $1.5 billion. On a per capita basis the amount to be distributed to each of the seven receiving provinces in 1973-74 will be approximately as follows: Newfoundland, $311 per capita; Prince Edward Island, $299 per capita; New Brunswick, $230 per capita; Nova Scotia, $217 per capita; Saskatchewan, $128 per capita; Quebec, $117 per capita and Manitoba, $96 per capita. The lowest income provinces, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, will receive the highest per capita payments. Quebec and Manitoba, which are only slightly below the national average in revenue raising capacity, will receive the lowest per capita payments. I believe all members will agree that this is as it should be.

[Translation]

We are now reaching a position in Canada where our assistance to the provinces through the equalization program permits the lower-income provinces to achieve levels of expenditures on public services provided by provincial and local governments almost equal to the national average, on a per capita basis.

For fiscal year 1972-73 the national average expenditure per capita on provincial and local government services was about $1,092. In the seven lower-income provinces receiving equalization payments the per capita expenditure was about $1,079. With the higher equalization payments I am now proposing, the average for the seven recipient provinces should approach the national average even more closely. I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that this result is being achieved as well because of the efforts of recipient provinces themselves. If the relative tax burden imposed on individual taxpayers in each of the provinces is compared it can be seen, for the most part, that taxpayers in the lower-income provinces carry a relatively greater tax load. Thus it is both through our program of equalization grants as well as through their own efforts that the lower-income provinces are approaching levels of expenditures on public services equal to the national average. Our expanded equalization program will clearly be a more powerful weapon in combatting the effects of regional disparities in income and represents a further significant move toward the achievement of a regionally balanced fiscal policy.

[English]

Hon. members may ask why the federal government does not go all the way and equalize all local government revenues, those for general municipal purposes as well as school purposes. There are several reasons for this. First, as I noted above, the gap in per capita expenditures between the higher and lower income provinces has now been largely closed. Second, local government expenditures for non-school purposes tend to be related to the degree of urbanization. In provinces where the degree of urbanization is greatest costs tend to be higher. I need only mention such costs as those associated with public transportation and environmental protection. To this extent the need to equalize expenditures is not as relevant. Third, where financial problems associated with urban development do arise it seems to me it would be preferable to deal with them through selective and specifically designed programs which would be available to all the urbanized parts of Canada. The equalization program would not lend itself to solving problems associated with urbanization because the three higher income provinces, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, where about 60 per cent of our total metropolitan population lives, would not benefit.

I want to turn, now, to a second change embodied in the amendments before the House, the extension of the current arrangements for financing post secondary education. Perhaps I might recall the background to this proposal. Part IV of the Fiscal Arrangements Act provides for federal contributions to the provinces for post secondary education for the fiscal years 1972-3 and 1973-4. Under these arrangements the federal government, for all provinces but Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, bears one half of the provinces' post secondary education operative costs. For the three Atlantic provinces the federal contribution, which was originally based on a $15 per capita grant, is escalated by the year over year growth in the post secondary education operating costs of all provinces. For these provinces the per capita grant is more favourable than the 50 per cent sharing.

Total federal contributions for post secondary education, which are subject to a ceiling of a 15 per cent annual increase, take the form of a combination of tax and cash transfers. The tax component takes the form of transferring to the provinces 4.357 personal income tax points plus one corporate income tax point, both equalized to the national average. These tax points are now built into the income tax systems as provincial revenues. The difference between the amount of the provincial entitlement and the value of the tax points is made up in cash. In the current fiscal year, federal contributions to the provinces for post secondary education amount to more than one billion dollars, $608 million in tax points and $459 million in cash.

Last spring the federal government proposed a set of alternative financing arrangements to the provinces designed to meet provincial criticisms of existing arrangements. The provinces claimed that the federal program was intruding upon provincial administration of post secondary education and distorting provincial priorities. Generally, they argued, that they lacked the freedom and flexibility they needed to develop their own programs as they saw fit. In response to these criticisms, the federal government proposed a new system of determining federal contributions which dissociated the federal payments from the costs actually incurred. Payments were to be determined by a formula based on the growth rate of the population between 18 and 24 years of age and an escalation factor, which together would result in an overall growth rate in federal contributions roughly equal to the expected growth in the gross national product.

Under this proposed system, the basis for the alleged federal interference in provincial post secondary education programs would be removed. However, the proposal was not accepted by the provinces and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) informed them that the federal government would be prepared to extend the existing arrangements for an additional three years. The present amendment extends the term of the existing arrangements to March 31, 1977. These arrangements will, therefore, expire at the same time as other programs under the Fiscal Arrangements Act. Further thought will be given to the appropriate role for the federal government in this area in the period beyond 1977. I might note that with the passage of time, as the dollar value of both the personal and the corporate income tax points rises, the amount of the federal contribution paid in the form of cash will diminish and eventually disappear. The tax points will then finance the entire federal contribution.

Perhaps I might call it one o'clock and deal with the third and fourth changes after the break.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before we broke for lunch I was describing the four changes embodied in this bill. The third relates to Part IV of the fiscal arrangements act. This part assures that provinces conforming to our income tax legislation will obtain at least as much revenue from the combined yields of the personal and corporate income taxes, including associated equalization, for the five year period 1972 to 1976 as they would have obtained were the pre-tax reform structure still in effect. The purpose of this revenue guarantee provision was to encourage the provinces to keep their income tax legislation in harmony with the reformed federal income tax law.

In order to discourage provinces from creating possible confusion by raising their income tax rates at January 1, 1972, above the specified "break-even" rates associated with tax reform, the fiscal arrangements act provided that any province doing so would be ineligible for revenue guarantee payments for the full five year duration of the guarantee. The province of Nova Scotia, at the time the fiscal arrangements act was passed in 1972, raised its personal income tax rates above that specified in the legislation. It accepted full responsibility for this step, and has continued to harmonize its income tax legislation with that of the federal government. However, because of the provisions of the act it rendered itself ineligible for the revenue guarantee.

In the light of subsequent developments, a five-year forfeiture of eligibility for revenue guarantee payments now seems unwarranted. The provinces could not have foreseen, at the end of 1971, the federal budgetary measures in effect for 1972 and 1973 which have a significant effect on provincial revenues. I propose, therefore, that the existing five year ineligibility period be reduced to one year.

[Translation]

The fourth and final change embodied in the bill is a technical adjustment to the Income Tax Act and the Federal Provincial Fiscal Revision Act which will permit the continuation of the tax point abatement in Quebec as part of its fiscal system which has been in operation for about 10 years. A special abatement of three points of personal income tax was accorded to Quebec taxpayers in 1964 when the federal Youth Allowances program was introduced.

At that time Quebec already had a similar program in operation for its 16 and 17 year olds. In order to meet this situation, the federal government provided that if a province had a similar program in operation before the commencement of the federal program, that province could continue the provincial program and be "prescribed" under the act as a province qualifying for special contributions towards the cost of its own program through the Income Tax Act. The Income Tax Act was amended to allow taxpayers in a "prescribed" province to deduct 3 per cent from the basic federal tax. Quebec took advantage of this provision and was prescribed. This permitted the Quebec government to raise the provincial tax by an equivalent amount without increasing the net burden on Quebec taxpayers. In addition, the Fiscal Revision Act provided for an adjusting payment or recovery to ensure that the total federal contribution of such a province would equal the federal saving arising from not having the federal program operative in the province. The end result of these arrangements left Quebec in exactly the same financial position as all other provinces. The so-called 3 point tax abatement for Quebec taxpayers commenced with the 1965 taxation year and continues to the present day.

As hon. members know we are now moving toward an integrated national system of family allowance which will apply to Quebec residents as to residents of all other provinces. As a result it will be necessary to adjust the present basis on which the abatement and recovery are made in order to avoid a serious disruption in the Quebec income tax system and continue to leave the province of Quebec in the same net financial position as the other provinces.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House will agree with the basic purposes of this bill. To summarize; the amendments proposed will increase the equalization grants paid to the seven lower-income provinces; it will extend the existing arrangements for federal assistance to provincial post-secondary education costs; it will moderate the harshness of the provisions respecting ineligibility for the revenue guarantee; and it will permit the continuation of long-standing financial arrangements with Quebec in the light of the new family allowances legislation program. I trust that the bill will receive the support of the House, and when we go into Committee of the Whole House I will be prepared to answer questions in more detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat amused at the, shall we say, Friday claque the minister seems to have gathered about him to make that much noise. I have no idea of the purpose behind that move in dealing with a bill such as this, but it must be an "in" secret that the Liberals have. Possibly it is just that members on the government side contribute so little to the bill they have to let off some energy somehow, so they pound their desks. They have little else to cheer about.

The bill before us of course carries out changes that were forecast by the minister in the budget of last February 19. To that extent, since it arose out of a consensus coming out of the minister's meeting with provincial financial ministers the month previous, it certainly received the general approval of the House. As I recall it, during the whole of the budget debate there was no particular criticism of this proposal. If one goes back to the debates of March 1972 when Bill C-8 of that era, which is the legislation we are amending today, was debated we can see that, while this legislation has to go through, we can perhaps make some comments.

Certainly I know my colleague the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) will have a good deal to say about the financing of post-secondary education. Although others may have a few words to say about some of the other things which are being brought in, I do not think this bill will arouse much controversy. At the time of the debate on Bill C-8, I remember the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in discussing one feature which concerns us a good deal this afternoon, that is the period of time relating to post-secondary education, said, and I think he was right—although the minister has not said anything about it yet I hope he will do so—that a two-year period as specified in the legislation at that time provided a very unstable base for any provincial government in planning for post-secondary education.

I should like to know this: by reason of this three-year extension, has there been a new arrangement reached or did I interpret the minister correctly when he said that at his last meeting with the financial ministers of the provinces the federal government made a proposal which was turned down by the provinces and that, therefore, the position effectively is still back at square one. I must say I find this a little difficult because, after all, we do know that the criticism aimed at Bill C-8 in March of 1972 was because there had been no consultation. The federal government had disclosed its plan only on the eve of the presentation of the legislation, and therefore it was impossible to get any agreement. A two-year period was put into the bill in order to provide an opportunity for negotiation, but again on the eve, so to speak, of the meeting, which would be the last meeting that could practically be held prior to the expiry of the date in Bill C-8, the government came forward with another formula which the provinces could not see themselves clear to accept. I hope that in further discussing this clause the minister will indicate what progress, if any, has been made and what are his anticipations. Is it to be another drifting along for three years and then at 15 minutes to midnight in 1977 there will be a hurry-hurry proposal and a conference to deal with this very important subject? I would certainly hope that is not so.

I want to emphasize again, and I think this is an area that has particular reference to these relationships with the provinces, that we have just gone through a period of some two months of action by confrontation between the federal government and the provinces, particularly the province of Alberta where there should have been consultation and where there has been no consultation except perhaps in the last few days. I do not know on what day that was done. Although there is the one area in which there has been consultation, even if only by reason of the title of the legislation, the "Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act", there should be much more meaningful consultation in the future than there has been in the past. The provinces have always been convened for a conference as close as possible to the expiry date of the agreements. The federal government then makes a proposal to be presented to the provinces. This has happened time and time again on a take it or leave it basis. It seems to me that this procedure is totally wrong. I do not know whether this situation arises because their professional advisors have the idea that what they say is best for everybody, a sort of big brother attitude or an attitude of, why do the provinces not just agree that what the federal government is doing for them is the best in the best of all possible worlds. Of course, we know that there is discrimination. We have seen conferences in the past where premiers have left in a huff and taken unilateral action.

This has happened not only in the case of one province but of several provinces. I think that is something to be guarded against.

We see that one of the purposes of the bill is to broaden the base of the revenue sources which are used in the computations for arriving at equalization of revenues. I recall also that in March of 1972, the Leader of the Opposition had spoken at some length about the need to incorporate some element of municipal revenues in the revenue base for arriving at this equalization. I think it is laudable, although if it could have gone further to include municipal revenues, the provinces could have done more to alleviate the already high but also rapidly rising municipal taxes. This will allow the municipalities in the appropriate cases to make rebates to taxpayers paying municipal school taxes.

So, I can say that so far as we are concerned, this is perfectly fine. It must be remembered that in the over-all picture equalization grants paid across the country in 1970-71, which are the last revised figures as of February 1973 put out by the government of Canada, indicated that the provinces across Canada received some $899,227,000 in equalization grants. For the total of both unconditional and conditional grants paid by the government to the provinces, we have the sum of $2,539,904,000, which is a tremendous sum. It is rather remarkable to see what is the distribution and how under the various headings the various provinces share.

In any event, dealing with post secondary education, we see a total of $388,269,000. The lowest sum is, strangely enough, for the province of Nova Scotia. It only received $1,341,000. Perhaps the minister could look at his tables and explain the payments for the benefit of provincial institutions under post secondary education. This is in the table headed, Summary of Federal Contributions to the Provinces and certain Payments to Institutions in the Provinces, and is put together by the government. As I said, Nova Scotia received the sum of $1,341,000, and the highest amount is paid to the province of Ontario which received $143,409,000. Quebec received $114,115,000 and so on down the line.

Mr. Paproski: What did Alberta get?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Alberta has the third largest amount, $54,000,000, and the province of British Columbia received $15,464,000.

Mr. Paproski: We do not mind helping your cause, John.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The other cause stated by the minister, beyond broadening the revenue base and also extending the post secondary education financing arrangements to 1977, is consequential upon the approval of Bill C-211 dealing with the increase in Family Allowances. Therefore, because of the fact that the province of Quebec had three points of personal income tax in lieu of the payments to it by the government of Canada under the Youth Allowances Act which was part of their opting out arrangement, the government of Canada will now recover three points of personal income tax.

I looked at the bill most carefully but there was one point which I could not find, that is the guarantee with respect to Nova Scotia. I wonder under which clause it is to be found, because the minister made reference to it, but I have not been able to find it and there are no notes to that extent. My colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal will speak on post secondary education, and I think we can carry on from here into clause by clause debate.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks may I point out, on a question of privilege, that while it may appear to be a much longer period of time, today marks the 31st year since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was first sent to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Morin: It is time to go to the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am very happy that the hon. member who has just spoken has made reference to this anniversary. I am one of the members in this House who represents a constituency in which many members of the House reside while they are in Ottawa, and in fact in Grenville-Carleton many members of parliament make their home. One of the most distinguished of those members is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He brings great distinction to the street on which I live—he lives right across the street from me—and I watch him every morning leave the house, so that he can never get ahead of me.

● (1430)

I would like to add my congratulations on this occasion to my hon. friend and neighbour. I do not want anything unusual to be taken out of this, but may I just close by saying that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I have a mutual interest in a snowblower. It is a different kind of organic union from the one we have heard of in this House. Again through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend the congratulations of our party to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. While I appreciate the remarks being made and the event being commemorated, unless we revert to motions or find some other procedure, I do not think we should pursue such comments, although I cannot prevent anybody from speaking.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken we are celebrating today a birthday which concerns the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who has just spoken has referred to the fact that several hon. members are living in his riding. As far as I am concerned, I must say that I am living in this part of Ottawa which is so competently represented in this House by no one else but the Minister of Finance himself (Mr. Turner).

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, since my colleague brought me happily into the situation I want to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), although he does not have the good fortune to live in my constituency. By the accident of circumstance he finds himself in the constituency of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who is also his neighbour. I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that a neighbourhood may well be an accident of life, and of course everyone has his cross to bear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: He also had a choice.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And it might contribute to the political process if he decided to run in that constituency in the next election. I have known the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre ever since I came to this House, and I know the younger members have always appreciated the courtesy he has shown them. A few weeks ago I had the unique experience of being best man at a wedding which the hon. member celebrated in his moonlighting capacity, and I got to know him even better then. Might I say that, despite the hon. gentleman's lack of political judgment, he has made a great contribution to the parliamentary process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, about the same point of order, I wish to join the other hon. members who expressed their admiration to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is with pleasure that we also express our admiration and we are also convinced that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a great parliamentarian, a great citizen who has rendered distinguished services to the House of Commons as well as to many citizens and, I would like to add, to almost all hon. members.

I would therefore reiterate our admiration and I wish he will remain in this House for a long time because we are glad to have in our midst such a devoted gentleman who truly understands the economic and political situation. We thank him for all he has done and wish him many returns of the day.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with you that these proceedings are entirely out of order. I think that it might have been better to wait another nine years, and perhaps when I have been here 40 years such comments as have been made would be very nice to hear. But may I just say in passing that it was 31 years ago today that I was first elected in a by-election in Winnipeg North Centre to succeed the late J. S. Woodsworth. The time has gone awfully fast, but I am very grateful for the kind things that have been said today by my friends in all parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Corbin.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I wonder if hon. members would expect me to render a decision on the point of order? The only decision I could render at this time would be to say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been causing disorder for the last few minutes, but I am glad to join with hon. members in offering my personal congratulations to him and perseverance for many years.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, might I just point out that, although you recognized me for the purpose of speaking on the bill before us, I did rise on a question of privilege, and I did so because in spite of my very great respect and admiration for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I did not wish to have that time deducted from the time available to me today.

Mr. Barnett: You mean to say he isn't worth five minutes of your time?

Mr. Saltsman: He is worth far more than that, but I am not sure that we should be doing this on this particular bill, and so I agree with you, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to raise some questions about shared-cost programs. I agree substantially with the provision that would include school taxes in raising the base, but I think that there are probably some misconceptions about equalization payments. The word equalization itself has the connotation that you are taking from some and giving to others. There is a certain element of that in this equalization program, but equalization does not take away from any province, regardless of its wealth, and redistribute that wealth to another province. Rather, the increase in wealth of a particular province creates a responsibility for the federal government to see that the provinces that have not gone up so quickly in their wealth are compensated for that.

The net effect of including the school taxes in the equalization formula is that the costs to the federal treasury will be increased. I am having some real doubts about federal financing, and how the government intends to find the money to provide for this equalization. The federal government has indexed most of its welfare programs and transfer programs in order to compensate for the increase in the cost of living. My colleagues and I fully agree that that sort of provision should exist in old age security, the Canada Pension Plan and other programs that are the responsibility of the federal government.

But at the same time as it took that very sage move it also took a foolish move. It indexed the income tax. The effect of having those two side by side is that, while the responsibilities of the government will escalate with the increase in the cost of living, which is a pretty permanent feature, its revenues will not escalate at the same rate, and it will have to come to parliament to get increased tax rates to compensate for this. This points out the difficulty which the government has in deciding on the advice it should follow. In the first instance when it indexed social security payments it followed the advice of the NDP, something which was very intelligent. In the second case, indexing the income tax itself, it followed the advice of the Conservative party, which seems to me to be less than wise. There was a very mild reaction from my friends on the right.

I said earlier that equalization is a kind of formidable word, and perhaps in order to really understand the consequences of equalization it is necessary to take an example and try to follow what happens when a province increases its revenue, then sees how this affects the rest of the country. I think the conclusion will be that we really must have a much better formula for equalizing revenues and incomes across the country. In many ways the history of taxation tells the history of civilization, and the degree of caring in a civilization. The broader you make the base for tax and the more inclusive you make the base of tax, the greater is that society's indication that it cares about everybody. In any kind of society or civilization there are obviously going to be disparities, perhaps because of environment or geography or many other reasons. The way a country indicates concern for all its citizens is by broadening the base of taxation and taking all revenues into account when the allocation of transfer payments is decided upon.

Let us relate the equalization formula to what has been happening recently in the energy field and the export tax on oil that the government has imposed. A conflict has obviously arisen between the federal government and the province of Alberta. The province of Alberta feels that the federal government is acting outside its jurisdiction and, at the very least, in a high-handed manner in imposing this tax on what Alberta sees as essentially a provincial resource. The government of Canada has been taking the position that the price of crude oil has been increasing, not because the cost of production has been increasing, or that profits for the oil industry have declined, but rather that the oil industry is taking advantage of an international shortage and political machinations around the world to artificially raise the price of crude oil. The argument is that this is the going price in the United States and, therefore, despite our own cost and supply position we should be paid everything that the market will bear. They not only propose to do it in connection with external markets but they are proposing to do it with all Canadians. The government seems to have taken the position that it makes no difference whether you are American, Canadian or some other nationality, there will be extracted from you whatever the market will bear. Perhaps because I am not an Albertan, it seems to me that this is a rather self-centred position for one province to take vis-à-vis other provinces or for one industry to take vis-à-vis other industries in a country.

Presumably the federal government intends to rebate the export tax to the province under certain conditions. In my view that will be preferable to letting the oil companies take the very large surplus that would accrue from an increase in price. But it also seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the price should remain frozen in Canada; the export tax, to the extent that oil is sold outside Canada, should be rebated to the province. Of course, that is not going to help the other provinces. There is a sort of mistaken assumption that if the revenues of Alberta increase in contrast to the revenues of the corporations, then the rest of Canada shares.

In some ways, from the point of view of the federal government, it would be better to have the oil company profits increase rather than have to return the revenues to Alberta. While we do not get much revenue from the oil companies, at least if their profits were that high the federal government would get some return from them. But if all the money is rebated directly to the province, then the province keeps it. There is no sharing from that province to another province under the equalization formula but rather there is a charge on the federal government to start raising the level of incomes in the other provinces to match the newfound richness, in this particular case, of the province of Alberta.

If you couple that with what I think has been a rather bad tax arrangement in terms of indexing the income tax system, it is difficult to know how the federal government will raise revenues for this purpose. Presumably they will have to increase the income and corporation taxes of those who are paying them. This means not only that Canadians will have to pay higher prices for their oil, but also they will have to pay increased taxes in order to compensate for the higher price of the oil and the revenues accruing to the province of Alberta. If I were Lewis Carroll I could probably write a book called "Alice in Wonderland" based on this outlandish approach to sharing in a country that calls itself "one nation, one country".

That is why it seems to me that we have to go away beyond anything we have ever contemplated in the equalization program. I feel that the equalization formula we now have does have advantages. Over the years we have included in the tax base new things for the purpose of seeing that one province does not fall very much behind the other provinces. We might in fact take a lesson from the fact that we have been honouring the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre today and listen to what he says about increasing the old age pensions, not only to keep up with the increase in the cost of living but to keep up with the increase in the standard of living. If we were to follow the equalization formula and apply it on a personal basis to the old age pension, then we would have a formula which provides that to the extent the rich have improved their position, the federal government has an obligation to increase the old age pension to those less well off. However, asking governments to be logical is perhaps too much.

Let me return to what I said earlier about the need to change the equalization formula itself. There are many grievances in different parts of this country, and I want to deal with a particular grievance of the western provinces of Canada. They have had grievances about the tariff that they feel has benefitted Ontario for years, in fact since the national policy of Macdonald. They have felt that they have had to buy in a protected market and sell on a free market. The farmer in particular has been very vociferous about what the market position has been on a given day. I think there is some resentment against protectionist policies in Canada, although they are not any worse than or perhaps not as bad as those of many other countries. Nevertheless, there is a lot of truth in the argument that many goods cost more in Canada in order to assist the development of Ontario industry. The tariff structure was designed to assist industry, and even after the reduction resulting from the Kennedy Round, that situation persists.

We have a situation where the west resents the east, but it is not so much a question of geography as an occupational resentment. The west is resource oriented, agriculture oriented, and the east is manufacturing oriented, so there is a clash between these interests. Every time we try to make some adjustment in the corporate tax system the question arises, to what extent are we favouring resource industries and manufacturing industries? The most recent change that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) brought in on corporate taxation related directly to the manufacturing industry and excluded the resource industries, although it should not have done this. Historically, our resource industries have been the favoured children of our tax system, even though we have derived very little by way of taxation from those industries. The government's deliberate industrial strategy, if one can call it that, was aimed at this. There have been some changes. We are moving away from an industrial strategy favouring resource industries and moving toward an industrial strategy favouring manufacturing industries.

So long as the bulk of tax income received from manufacturing industries accrues to the provinces in which those industries are located there will be conflicts and clashes between one part of Canada and another. This is true whether you speak of resource industries such as logging, mining or fishing—although the fishing industry has never generated much income—or of other industries in a province. There have always been divisions over how our tax system should be organized. If the present system is to continue, there will always be a need for some kind of jerry-built equalization system, under which we can compensate one part of the country for what is happening in another part.

This is what happens in the whole country. However, the same sort of thing happens in each province. Different municipalities within provinces compete to attract industry. Municipalities want industries to underwrite their tax base, to help in underwriting certain costs associated with residential housing and to help with educational costs. Municipalities in one province fight among themselves. If you want to take an analogy to ridiculous lengths, you could suppose a situation in which each street within the municipality is fighting every other street in an effort to attract industry. That is taking the argument to ridiculous lengths. Yet the present situation is not far removed from the ridiculous situation my analogy would illustrate.

One street does not vie with another street in attempting to attract industry. Different regions in Ontario, however, are competing with one another for industry. Presumably, we will need to transfer the benefits obtained from industry to less fortunate areas by using an equalized tax rate structure across the province. We need to do that sort of thing right across Canada. We need an equalization program which says that no matter where the wealth is created, all Canadians will share in it. That means that the wealth created in Ontario in times of industrial boom will be shared by all Canadians. All Canadians will benefit. That wealth should be taken into consideration in the budget and should be incorporated in the tax base. If another province enjoys an oil boom, the benefits of that boom should be spread across the entire nation. If we are to build a nation and if we want people to live in all parts of it, we should settle for nothing less. It could be done.

If we could do that, many of the deep felt grievances in this country would disappear. Actually, people would not want industries near them. People living in many small, beautiful communities would want to keep industries out. Who would want them? If you can get the benefit of industry without the pollution and other problems associated with industrial development, why would you opt to have any industry near you? Why would municipalities chase after industry?

We say that industries should go to those areas best suited to them, where services exist and where the possibilities of pollution are minimized. Municipalities, instead of fighting to reduce certain standards in order to attract industry, would raise standards of pollution control and corporate behaviour. It would be to the advantage of municipalities to make sure that industries which locate close to them behave properly and show decent respect for the culture of the area and its environment. We can only do this sort of thing if we consider separately the location of an industry and the tax benefits to be derived from that industry. All the public should benefit from the operation of an industry, no matter where it is located. If we are to obtain all the benefits of an egalitarian society in which people share responsibilities and obligations, we must make sure that industries locate in those places best suited for their purposes.

We have heard about program after program which is designed to twist, distort and alter our industrial system. We have heard about DREE grants. We do not know to what extent they are effective, if at all. We are urging industries to go to small communities, without worrying about what happens to those small communities. Under the present system we do not go to picturesque places in Ontario and say, "Why do you want an industry?" We do not go to small towns in the Maritimes and say, "Why do you want industry? This is such a beautiful place. Why do you want to build a refinery here?"

Under our present system, these smaller communities need the tax base which is derived from industry. Their inhabitants need the jobs. It is not fair to say to those people, "How dare you let a foreign corporation come here and build a plant?". You run into this situation right across Canada. I know we want to do something about foreign ownership. There is lots of industry in my riding, so that I can be excused for being critical of foreign ownership. Such criticism will not hurt. However, you can go to certain areas of Canada where the people are desperate for employment; they do not care about the ownership of the industry; they cannot allow themselves the luxury of not wanting an industry, foreign-owned or otherwise. They cannot afford the luxury of saying, "We do not want a plant in our area." Those people need the revenue generated by an industry, so that they can build the schools they need, the hospitals, and all the other necessary amenities.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker. One could elaborate this argument to a much greater extent than I have attempted to do. As we were discussing changes that might be made in our system of equalization payments, I wanted to show that we really must go beyond the sort of puny adjustments we have been making in our system. We must go far beyond measures proposed by the provinces in their meetings with the federal government. I know it will not be easy to change the system; I have no illusions about that. People with wealth are not happy to give it up in favour of those who do not have any wealth. However, it should be the objective of our society, and the objective of parliament, to see to it that there is an absolute equalization of wealth across Canada and that wealth created in any province, no matter in what form, should be equally shared by all citizens of this country.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on this important bill. I think that we should take all the time required and all appropriate measures to find a way of alleviating the taxpayer's burden instead of taxing him increasingly.

The bill's recommendation reads as follows, and I quote:

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements, 1972 to broaden the equalization formula to include school purpose taxes in the revenue to be equlized and to extend to March 31, 1977 the post-secondary education financing arrangements as contained in Part VI of the Act; and a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 and the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker, finally we realize that this represents a 3 per cent increase in taxes. Canadians are now up against unprecendented increases in every sector. If we pass this bill, we will create new problems for the taxpayer by reducing his purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, there are serious problems between the provinces and I know that the equalization payments are one of the means used to restore the balance between the various regions of our country. Every possible effort is made in an attempt to restore it, and this is one of the principal means the governments have used in order to enable the poorer provinces to share in the goodies paid for by the rich.

Mr. Speaker, our country has enough resources to give to the poorer provinces without depriving the richer.

Mr. Speaker, all we need do is look at the situation squarely to realize our economy is unbalanced.

We note, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of post-secondary school or university buildings is prohibitive and that the federal government levies a tax on building materials. We also know that the interests on capital for the financing of those buildings are prohibitive.

It is the responsibility of the government and the House to look into that problem in order to determine what steps should be taken to reduce income tax. The Canadian institutions should be financed with credits on the administration costs by our financial institutions and instead of going up by 3 per cent, that tax should be reduced by 3 per cent and maybe more.

Mr. Speaker, the government will have to step in one day, otherwise have provinces will become have-not provinces, as middle income people who are more heavily taxed than others will become poor people. We will no longer have a middle class, nor an upper class, but only a class of poor and poverty will exist throughout this country yet bursting with resources.

Surely, when we have a country bursting with resources, Mr. Speaker, we do not have the right to allow poverty to exist in one of the richest countries where there is an increasing number of poor people.

Unless this bill is amended it will be difficult to support it because it increases the taxpayers' contributions. I know the have-not provinces want more at the expense of the richer provinces and these are on the verge of saying no, Mr. Speaker. The more fortunate provinces do not have more than what they need and I know that, under the equalization formula, it hurts different provinces to give part of their revenues to poorer provinces and not see the day when those other provinces will come out of the red.

So, Mr. Speaker, tax increases through the equalization formula are not welcomed by the richer provinces. For the time being they decided to contribute but I am sure they will get tired of it. Governments will have to find other formulas—I have already referred to this—namely by reducing interest rates, by financing all those institutions, particularly the new ones through new interest-free loans. This way, Mr. Speaker, we would save the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. Indeed we could certainly reduce taxes.

Mr. Speaker, the same applies to family allowances. They have gone up, but at the same time, taxes have been increased. Supplementary estimates of one billion dollars are brought forward to pay those further increases in family allowances, old age security and other pensions. Mr. Speaker, the people always give more than they receive. This situation cannot last forever.

Some day, extensive social, economic and political reforms will have to be implemented so that we may run our country effectively and alleviate the burden of taxpayers instead of increasing it constantly as we are now doing.

[English]

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take too much time of the House but I do wish to make a few comments at this stage of the legislative process relating to this bill. What we are witnessing here today came about as a result of meetings held between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and provincial treasurers and ministers of finance last January. The first thing that comes to my mind when considering the legislation before us is whether the same agreement would be made if the meeting of last January were held at this time, because quite a bit of water has gone under the bridge in the meantime.

The legislation deals with how the proceeds of the "have" provinces will be divided among the have-not provinces. Some consideration should be given to how provinces get into the "have" position and are able to share their wealth under a constitutional system with their partners in confederation who do not have the same apparent good fortune.

As an Albertan, it is obvious to me that Alberta is able to share its wealth with seven of its partners in confederation because it has had very happy experience in managing its natural resources. Alberta used to be a have-not province. With the development of our mineral resources in the late 1940s, through the 1950s and the 1960s, the situation changed dramatically and the province is now in a happy financial situation. We would like to be in the even happier position of having more funds available to send to our less fortunate brothers and sisters in Canada in the future. In that connection we hope there will be a development of our oil sands. A lot depends, of course, on what decision the Minister of Finance makes regarding the treatment of the profits from that project; whether or not the 50 per cent share of the people of Alberta will be treated as a royalty. Presumably there is some question within the Department of Finance as to whether this should be allowed. When we are considering the effects of the proper harvesting of the natural resources of a province this is a question the minister should bear in mind. I hope he will be reasonable and allow this project in the province of Alberta to proceed.

● (1510)

I wonder whether more thought should be given to the definition of a have-not province. Today many systems are being rethought. I refer specifically to the royalty system in Alberta in relation to oil and gas. The province appears to be moving away from a royalty system and adopting an indexing or reference system so that the return to the people of the province will be based on the real value of the product. I wonder whether the federal government ought to initiate discussions with the provinces to determine whether they are making the best use of natural resources, because if they are not they may be in an artificial have-not position, wasting their resources, so to speak, at the expense of other members of the confederation. Some consideration should be given to this aspect. I notice that the federal government seems to have moved in this direction to a certain extent, though in a way which I do not particularly appreciate.

It has been said that one reason for the imposition of the export tax was a feeling that the producing provinces had not set an adequate royalty on their products; that they were leaving Canada at too low a price. To my mind this is not the correct way in which the federal government should behave. But the principle is there and I suggest that if it is applicable in one area, the federal government should apply it in others.

The bill before us brings school taxation into the revenue base when decisions are made concerning who pays what, to whom, under our fiscal arrangements. This brings me to another point which bears consideration in these changing times. I have always been of the opinion that education and school taxation should be provincial matters, although the federal government has for so long been acting in a contrary way that I wonder whether I am correct in my point of view. I do know that many people contact me about the desirability of establishing a common educational curriculum across the country. I think it is worth noting that the federal government has increasingly intruded into this area.

The cost of education is one of the reasons have-not provinces require the assistance they do under this type of legislation, because education is an expensive process. I believe the minister told us that instead of $1.3 billion in equalization payments to the various provinces, the amount will now rise to $1.5 billion. I suggest that perhaps the time has come for the government of Canada to involve itself in the educational process more directly than it has done to date. Several hundred million dollars, if not billions of dollars, are spent by the federal government on the educational process by way of grants to universities, the vast educational training program in the armed forces, by assisting in other post-secondary educational activities, and so on.

I think the time has come when we might consider taking the principle which was applied to medicare and applying it to education. There must be some provincial input, but I believe that in this area the concern of the provinces, which has traditionally been expressed most strongly and most eloquently by the province of Quebec, is probably not as great as it was. Historically, education is a strictly provincial responsibility because, especially in Quebec, it was thought necessary to perfect language and the cultural heritage. But today the federal government has taken it upon itself to preserve the language of Quebec through its legislation on bilingualism. Hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent to this end.

I should like to echo the words of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) in this regard when he said the solution to the problem of linguistic protection lies in education. A great deal of money would be required; this is why I believe further attention should be paid to this area by the federal government. We should be doing directly more than we are now doing indirectly. I should like to be told, as this bill progresses through its various stages, how the provinces which are to receive extra money under this legislation propose to deal with these additional funds; whether they will use them in the way the minister hoped. Provision has been made for an additional $200 million or so which is supposed to assist local property owners. I should appreciate being told, possibly during the committee stage, what the various provinces have done in this connection.

● (1520)

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have every reason to be proud of the bill brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the most significant result of which will be to hand over more money to the provinces whose revenue per capita, and consequently public expenditures, are below the national average. I simply want to deal with two matters that are of great concern to me.

The first has to do with the teaching of the second language in schools and universities. In this respect, I find it unthinkable, Mr. Speaker, that we, in the federal government, spend huge sums of money to teach a second language to middle-aged people, while universities and secondary schools, particularly in the English provinces, neglect more and more to teach the second official language in this country, that is French. In my view, it is an aberration, and as the official languages commissioner pointed out in his report, we will never stress enough the responsibility of the education ministers of the English provinces for their failure to teach the second language to our young people.

I would also like to deal with the distribution of doctors throughout Canada. The policy of the federal government is aimed at ensuring that all regions are well served. This is done by means of a bill such as this one on equalization and by means of grants to the industries of the various "have-not" regions. In my opinion, it is time that we should be concerned with the problem of the distribution of doctors.

When we adopted the hospital insurance act and a few years later, the Medicare scheme we said that the right to a good health is a basic right in this country and now realize that most doctors are located in a small number of large centres and that many "have-not" regions do not have any doctors.

This is unacceptable. Doubtless, the question of jurisdiction is important. We must ponder over this. As recorded on page 8691 of Hansard the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) who is also a doctor stated on October 14, 1966:

> Health as well as education is a basic right, and the government must do everything in its power so that all citizens may be in good health.

We see that after the revolution in the realm of education, primary and secondary schools were built in all areas, even in remote communities, but that nothing much has been accomplished in providing our people with hospitals medical services.

The hon. member for Hull who, I repeat, is a doctor, stated on February 7, 1967, and I quote:

> —and of all medical school structures, which are also outdated. These organizations have become encrusted in a dangerous but regular routine and have accumulated more dust than prestige over the years. They have become much like stagnant waters and are even now in need of purification. Their only significant accomplishment boils down to resolution passing committees, whose powers are whittled down from year to year.

In my opinion, these remarks are abusive. However, the problem is a basic one. According to statistics published by Opérations Dignité, in my area, that is the Gaspé Peninsula, which accounts for 6 per cent of the population of the province of Quebec, we have a mere 2 per cent of the hospital beds and a mere 2 per cent of the physicians in the province. And I could describe a similar situation in Abitibi and elsewhere.

I think that all the hon. members agree that the life of a Canadian citizen is something precious, whether he lives in a big city or anywhere else. At least in this respect, I think that all hon. members are convinced of the equality of all citizens. I therefore ask my colleagues to ponder over this issue and consider the solutions that we could provide to this problem as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am in a better mood today, you will be glad to know, because we are on a subject of great interest, one that involves the transfer of a substantial amount of money to the provinces, which as near as may be is an equalization payment to provinces which do not have the advantages of the richer elements of our society that were once found in the central parts of the country but are now slowing spreading westward, it seems.

The minister suggested to me privately that the speech I am going to make has undoubtedly been written by our mutual friend Dr. Colin Mackay, executive director of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, formerly president of the University of New Brunswick. I can assure the minister that my speech was not written by Dr. Mackay, a distinguished Canadian whose name I am glad to mention in this House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): A friend of both of us.

Mr. Fairweather: I said "mutual" friend and I thought that is what the word meant. I am glad to have it underlined by the minister. Interest in this subject was first sparked by Dr. Mackay during his years as president of the University of New Brunswick, and then by other Canadians who have thought about this particular issue. I think of the distinguished former senator, Norman Mackenzie who had a very great interest in Canadian constitutional arrangements. I think of Dr. J. A. Cory, former principal of Queen's University, who understood that the constitution, on matters of post-secondary education, had been much too narrowly interpreted through the years. Other names, of course, could be added but I do not want to bore the House on a Friday afternoon with a long catalogue of those who resisted this narrow interpretation of our constitution.

The truth is that there has been federal involvement in the field of education since confederation when the first military academy was opened with federal funds. We then went through various constitutional minutes, if I can put it that way, bowing to constitutional prohibition on federal involvement. We also had aid to veterinary colleges.

The speech of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) was right on the point I want to make. For a long time there has been federal involvement in the medical schools of this country. By a very curious accident of history—I think someone should do a little research on this—it was back in the days of Sir Charles Tupper that we took the very progressive step of holding the Dominion Council examination for doctors in this country. Presumably the fact that he himself was a medical man had something to do with the fact that, from the point of view of the medical fraternity, narrow constitutional interpretations were resisted. That is a very poor and complicated way of trying to say what I am thinking, but I do not have any notes, Mr. Speaker.

The point I am trying to make is that the Dominion Council examinations were a national imperative to the practise of medicine, and this has been a very happy arrangement. I agree with the hon. member for Matane that the massive involvement of the federal government in terms of aid to medical schools across the country gives the national government—if hon. members do not like the word "jurisdiction", perhaps I can say "responsibility" to see to it that there is a fair and adequate distribution of medical men across the country.

Do I see a waving across the way? Am I being greeted? I have only been here 11 years. Does the hon. member wish to ask me a question? No, it was just a friendly greeting, and that is very nice. I am glad that my speech has elicited this response.

● (1530)

The point I am trying to make, about which I think the hon. member for Matane reminded us very well, is that really it is nonsense to say that the national government has no responsibility in the educational field. One of the most important papers I have seen on this subject was given by Dr. Cory. It was an interpretation of the constitution, supporting the involvement of Canada as a country in the whole field of post-secondary education.

Although I am speaking personally, I might say I intend to support the minister's bill. However, I am disappointed about clause 3 which has to do with continuation of the present formula. Although I do not blame the minister, I think really that governments have copped out. I do not know whether the federal government is responsible. I shall wait for the minister to tell me; I have always found him to be very forthright. But we are really postponing until 1977 some pretty basic decisions. We are really taking the easy way out by extending the present formula, as pointed out in the bill, until the end of March 1977.

Many of us have an interest in this legislation. In the previous parliament this matter was discussed in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. We heard the AUCC brief, and so on. I would like to see the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) here today. This is very much in his area of responsibility. I, for one, hope that we will have some message from the Secretary of State concerning who is responsible now.

In the administration of Lester Pearson we had in the prime minister's own office, I think, a former deputy minister of finance. If my memory is correct, it was Dr. Young, but I could be wrong because that was some time ago. He had the responsibility, as I recall it, of trying to rationalize the federal position in the whole field of post-secondary education. Then the responsibility was shifted from the prime minister's office to that of the secretary of state. What is happening? Who is in charge? Who has taken the place of David Munro of McGill University who had responsibility in this area? There are questions we will want to have answered. Dr. Carrothers, I think, is to head the federal—what has it been called?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The think-tank.

Mr. Fairweather: He is to head the federal think-tank; and I believe it is about time they had one. In any event, in his speech to the Association of Universities and Colleges given on October 31 this year, on "The role of the university in post-secondary education", Dr. A. W. R. Carrothers said:

> I think it is now generally recognized that "research is more a national and international commodity than a provincial one", to quote from a policy statement of one provincial minister. Research is a component of university activity that earns for the institution the name of "university"—

My only constraint now is time. I do not want to read all of this into the record, but I have suggested that Dr. Carrothers' speech be sent to senators and members because it is a very important statement on university concerns in this part of the 1970s. Dr. Carrothers also said:

> —it is my considered view that we must maintain a shared federal presence in Canadian universities as a major national asset. The parochialization of our universities is a risk which in the 1970s we can ill-afford to take and on which we as a nation need not gamble.

I hope most members of all parties support this view. I think there was a mood a couple of years ago within the councils of the federal government just to transfer tax points and thus end the national responsibility. I am sure this would have been resisted by backbenchers on the government side. I know it certainly was by this party, because it would have been a much more serious thing than a postponement of the decision. It would have been a surrendering or abdication of a constitutional responsibility that this nation has had since the founding of our country.

If I do nothing else in my time here, I want to ensure that in respect of the federal role in post-secondary education we get rid of the constitutional bickering about it and enhance and promote it, because I think parochialization is serious enough in this country in so many other areas of our life. For anyone seriously to put forward a proposal that the federal government should end its responsibility by merely transferring two or three tax points would be, I think, a turning back of a record of which many administrations have reason to be proud.

The minister, I know, is anxious. He is always anxious; that is one of his most attractive qualities. He is anxious about this legislation, so I suppose I should not read the position taken by the Association of Atlantic Universities on the role of the federal government. But of all the universities in this country which would be adversely affected by a mere transfer of tax points, the Atlantic universities would be most seriously affected. This point has been made. They have submitted briefs.

I hope that some time before the passage of this bill we will have a forthright statement by the Secretary of State assuring us that a tax points transfer is not in the wind now or in 1977. It will not be in 1977, because there will be a different administration and certainly my party would resist, with everything it has, any such cop-out. Mr. Speaker, this matter is serious. I think there has been a sort of postponement. I tried this word the other night: I think it is really an avoidance in confession. What we are doing really is having a convenient postponement by changing a couple of figures in a clause. But the issue is far more important than is set out in clause 3.

I want to know what the Secretary of State is doing, I want to know who within that department is doing it, and I want to be reassured that the government really has an action group working on a better formula. We postponed the decision for a couple of years before, and I had hoped that by now we would have had something in legislative form much more positive than a mere extension.

● (1540)

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, as is the case with all members, I stand to speak briefly on this bill. We all have the sense of the passage of time and the pressure there is on us in the House to get the legislation through. The bill has to do with a great amount of money, indeed billions of dollars, and the least I want to do by standing up as we see these billions of dollars go away is to wave them goodbye somehow.

I share the concern of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) about clause 3 of the bill which refers to section 22 of the act that is being amended. Here again we are dealing with a considerable amount of money, and also with policies tied to that money which have a great effect not only on post-secondary education in our provinces but on education as a whole. In a few moments I would like to address myself to that particular clause.

[Translation]

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a few words of warning to the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané), who quoted some figures to the House. He said that his constituency, which accounts for 6 per cent of the population of Quebec, had only 2 per cent of all the physicians in the province. He should know that there are some narrow-minded people, not here but elsewhere, who could answer that in that part of the country, the air is healthy and people do no need doctors. It is like saying that the kids from the poorer sections of our cities just about never wear glasses and have excellent teeth because they are seldom seen at the dentist's.

But I must admit I have understood the point he wanted to make. The real issue is that of equalization. And that is more than a mere question of money; it has to do with problems Canadians have to face in connection with health, public services and, most of all, with education.

[English]

As a general remark, before going on to clause 3, I would like to point out that we have before us a rather marvellous shell-game. When I call it a shell-game I do not want to suggest it is crooked; I just want to suggest it is complicated. It is complicated for the ordinary citizen of this country to try to understand what we are doing today. If I refer back to the definition section in the act, particularly the definition of "revenue sources," I find many types of revenue sources listed from (a) to (s). By the time the average citizen of this country has discovered, by reading this list, how many times and in how many ways he is being taxed and what happens to the tax when it is transferred from one jurisdiction to another, he will be very confused.

I wish that some day we could work out a taxation system which would be less complicated than this one. Of course, by then we would not need competent ministers of finance; we would all know what was going on. However, I would recommend to all hon. members that they read this list of revenue sources. It is striking in the extreme. One thing about it, of course, is that it is fairly honest and comprehensive. It does admit that such things as hospital and medicare insurance premiums are taxes. Many people argue the other way, but it is evident to people who drafted the act that a premium which everyone has to pay is a tax, no matter which way you cut it.

In regard to the way that taxes are shifted in this country, I would like to raise the fact that we, as one part of the public realm, wind up very often taxing other parts of the public realm. For example, today there is great concern over the conservation of energy. Many people who address themselves to this problem tell us that a large consumer of petroleum resources in this country is the automobile. If you want to reduce the use of the automobile and therefore the consumption of gasoline, you have to stress public transit, encourage public transportation. It is a fact that the federal government will tax publicly-owned transit corporations on the materials and the rollingstock they have to buy.

My figures might not be completely accurate, but I see that in the city of Toronto last year the Toronto Transit Corporation had to pay some $700,000 in federal sales taxes. How do they pay this sales tax? From grants they receive from the province, in part. The province in turn will pay for these grants from the taxes they have taken out of the pockets of the citizens of Ontario. Furthermore, they will pay for these taxes to the federal government from grants and subsidies they receive from the municipal government. Where does the municipal government get the money? From taxes that the municipal government gets from the residents of Toronto.

Here we have a rather complicated, duplicated, multiplicative system of taxation which does not stand up to close scrutiny. Would it not be better to say to the city of Toronto and the Toronto Transit Corporation, "Since you are a publicly-owned corporation we, another public entity in this country, will not go to the bother of taxing you, because in order for you to pay those taxes you will have to turn to the taxpayer in yet another way"?

One is certainly allowed to ask, in all these infinite transactions that we perform with our taxes, if a considerable number of them do not stick in the bureaucratic machinery. People have to be hired to handle these taxes and transfers and to negotiate them, and we are suddenly left with an Alice in Wonderland world, as the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) suggested. We find ourselves running all the faster to keep ourselves in the same place.

As I suggested earlier, the part of this bill which concerns me the most at present is clause 3 which has to do with the extension of the federal-provincial agreement providing for the financing of post-secondary education. Here I would like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) and those of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal to the effect that education is indeed a matter of national responsibility. Just as the hon. member for Fundy-Royal said that education has always been a matter of concern for confederation, I would like to support that point by adducing some historical evidence. For example, at the time of confederation, one of the major reasons Newfoundland chose not to join the other provinces was that the people of Newfoundland, or at least the people in power in Newfoundland at the time, did not want to accept the notion which was just developing in Canada, that education was to be supported through taxes on property.

In the 1830s and 1840s in the United States, the idea that general education should be supported by a general tax on property had been initiated and this idea was in a large way accepted by the then provinces and parts of Canada. There was an element which was essential to confederation and it had to do with education. Newfoundland, for reasons of its own, seeing that this element was contained in confederation, chose not to join. We have had federal-provincial cost-sharing programs in education all through the years, as one hon. member preceding me said, probably for a long time.

● (1550)

I might remind members on the government benches of one of their illustrious antecedents, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, who around 1910—my date may be wrong—initiated an qpprenticeship training program when he was then involved in labour. In the twenties there was a federal-provincial cost-sharing program developed and executed to encourage and assist technical education across Canada. And so we go on through the years. The evidence is very clear in the actions we have taken as a country in the past, that education has been seen to be a national responsibility.

If it is not a national responsibility, why is there section 93.1 in the BNA Act which lays down definitely and clearly the rights of certain classes of Canadians with regard to education? If it is not a matter of national responsibility, why did the Manitoba school question cause such a ruckus at the turn of the century? Certainly it is a matter of national responsibility. It is in the national interest to have national concern exercised over what goes on in our universities and schools, and that concern must be exercised here in this parliament.

Just as we worry about equality of opportunity in other realms, we have to worry about it in the realm of education. Just as we concern ourselves with the notion of national standards when it comes to social services, social welfare and social insurance, so we concern ourselves, quite properly, with the question of national standards in education. That is why we have in the act that is being amended section 22 and subsequent sections providing for payments to the provinces in support of post-secondary education. As the minister stated this morning, these payments involve a considerable sum of money. But relating to the point raised by the hon. member for Matane, I would like to present some figures to the House.

It is a very simple fact that we have exercised a great deal of concern in this House and elsewhere over the notion of bilingualism in this country. We have, quite appropriately and properly, supported and modified acts and resolutions of this House having to do with our official languages in the federal public service and we as members of parliament have voted very large sums of money in the past so that through the Secretary of State we could encourage instruction in the two official languages in the schools of this country. Yet it is a very simple and sad fact that when it comes to the crunch, to the very part in our deliberations where we could do something about it in the federal-provincial agreements that have to do with the support of post-secondary education, we fade out: we don't talk about it. The sad fact is that although we are, I hope, improving the use of the two official languages in the federal public service, in the country at large there is less and less bilingualism.

I would like to cite, for the interest of hon. members, some statistics from a Statistics Canada bulletin catalogued as 81-001. This bulletin points out to us that as the years go by fewer and fewer students in our secondary schools are studying the other official language. In Ontario, for example, in 1970-71, 47.5 per cent of our students were studying French; in 1971-72 this had gone down to 44.5 per cent, and in 1972-73 it went down to 39.4 per cent. That is not a drop; it is a sudden fall. If it can go down some 6 per cent in two years, you can imagine what the picture will be a few years from now.

Why is this happening? I can give one of the reasons. It is because the universities of Canada have copped out. In the middle of the 1960s one university after another in English Canada dropped the second language entrance requirement. In competition for student enrolments, or whatever the reason was, they said, "we no longer require that students coming to our halls for higher education need to know a second language, let alone need to know the other official language of this nation."

That is why I raise this matter here today: I think it is a matter of national interest. And as the universities dropped their entrance requirements, of course the high schools changed their regulations to the point where now, in my province, a student can go to high school and he can effectively be told, "You don't need to study a second language at all, let alone the other official language of this country."

Perhaps my language is strong, Mr. Speaker, but I have been in this battle a long time. I was once a member of the senate of a university and I remember fighting this battle then. My colleagues at the time could not undertake this sense of national responsibility. They thought only in terms of their disciplines and how they were to prepare their students to succeed in their disciplines. I say that if the responsibility cannot be taken by the universities, then it has to be taken by this House.

What I would like to know from the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner)—hope he will be here when we go to clause by clause study of the bill—is whether these concerns are advanced at all in the federal-provincial negotiations that go on? I want to know that before I, as a member of this House, vote for a continuation of the same for another three years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps this is a convenient place to call it four o'clock. If it is, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper.

Mr. Reid: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There has been consultation through the usual channels, as well as with the hon. member who was supposed to move a bill today during private members' hour, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and he has graciously consented, if the House wishes to continue with this bill, to allow this on the understanding that he will be able to proceed with his bill next week.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the condition is this: as long as it is very clear that time will be found next week to proceed with my very important bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, speaking as one of the elements of the entity euphemistically referred to as the "usual channels", may I say we also agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard from the "usual channels" the suggestion regarding the business for the last hour of this week. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: On a point of order. Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gaspé on a point of order.

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it was pointed out in this House that today marks the 31st year of parliamentary life of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

That, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, this House give a one-hour break to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) allowing him to leave this House, and grant him permission to leave Parliament Hill.

This break would be well deserved.

• (1600)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suspect there may not be unanimous consent, but I will hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you anticipated what I was about to say. I believe a motion like that would require unanimous consent. You do not have it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will continue with Bill C-233. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Boisvert).

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hope it is for real this time.

I should also like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), as well as the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney). As an English-speaking member, he could teach many a lesson to a lot of people from outside Quebec with regard to his understanding, in particular, of bilingualism. What he says is true; we see it happen every day and so much so that often one wonders whether here, in Ottawa, one does not get answers in French just out of charity.

The bill we have considered stems from an agreement between the provinces.

I say that perhaps we would not have to consider such a legislation if the federal government, taking advantage of the war, had not encroached upon the provincial rights at a certain time and if it had not kept them rather egoistically afterwards. Still I am pleased to see that there has been an agreement. For once Quebec will have obtained satisfaction, a rare occurrence indeed.

This bill which particularly deals with the educational field tackles however another matter which, in my opinion, comes under provincial jurisdiction. The previous speakers did not often mention that. I would have preferred if clause 7 had some provisions concerning school tax exemptions, especially for small owners.

With all due respect, we seldom see a bill introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to give money to taxpayers. We are usually poorer when we leave the House. I have the impression that this will happen this afternoon.

As for the 3 per cent referred to in clause 7, I wonder if this is not a sanction as well as a confirmation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is enough to pay taxes without having to pay taxes on taxes. On the purchase of building materials the 11 per cent are included in the sale price: there is an 8 per cent provincial tax on the 11 per cent federal tax. It might be time, while considering this bill, to reflect a little on that: there is always a class of people who are forever paying. I am talking about the average citizen who are always the most penalized. Through this bill the federal government will interfere in the sphere of provincial jurisdiction and again taxes will go up.

Last week when I spoke on the constitution review, I emphasized the fact that the provinces should submit their needs to the federal government. When they were here the provinces agreed on this point with the federal government. But, in clause 5 there is a provision that says that the amount to be awarded to provinces will be determined by the federal government. I find that rather arbitrary and in case of interpretation of disputes, provinces would not have so much at liberty to assert their claims.

I think that at the committee stage, it will be possible to ask questions and try to elucidate some points.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Revenue from school purpose taxes.

• (1610)

[Translation]

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I support Bill C-133. I believe the bill will enable us to reach a higher level of achievement in intergovernmental fiscal relations.

Upon reading the bill we must remind ourselves that the solid foundation on which it lies is none other than the very foundation of Canadian federalism. I refer to the 1972 Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act and the previous statutes, in particular those of 1967 and 1957. I do not intend to linger on previous legislation. Allow me to review briefly the bill presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). It is essentially an extensive system of federal support through equalization payments to disadvantaged provinces. The bill also provides for yearly stabilization of the total revenues of each province, be it rich or poor. It also allows for close co-operation between federal and provincial systems as regards income tax, even in a period of great change. Furthermore, it provides for unconditional federal participation to the tune of 50 per cent of provincial costs for post-secondary education. Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a remarkable series of provisions aimed at improving the cost sharing of provincial programs, thus sustaining provincial revenues.

I refer more particularly to the support made available to lower income provinces by this fiscal arrangements legislation through equalization. In this program all sources of provincial revenue will be subject to equalization. What does equalization mean? It means that the federal government makes up for the losses of any province in a comprehensive way. Those losses arise from a lesser capacity than the national average to increase their revenues through their own efforts and resources. The payments made under this program are substantial. For the first time in 1972-73, they exceeded $1 billion. For 1973-74, the forecasts made for the current year provided for payments of roughly $1.168 billion. It so happens that that estimate turned out to be lower due for a large part to unforeseen tax performances in upper income provinces. As hon. members know, that led to the inclusion in the budget estimates now before parliament of $143,300,000 under the Fiscal Arrangements Act. Of that amount $106,-300,000 are for equalization payments, including some $75,600,000 for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, it is now proposed, as provided in this bill, to improve somewhat the superstructure of our fiscal arrangements. As a matter of fact, this will lead to a broadening of the equalization formula beyond the provincial revenues, to include school purpose taxes levied by local governments. In voting for this bill, hon. members will vote for an equalization increase of about $175 million. It is surely a large amount and those funds will, I am sure, improve the provinces' position.

I should now like to call the attention of the hon. members to the benefits that this bill will bring to my own province. Thus, this bill will increase by $72 million the equalization payments to the province of Quebec for the present taxation year. That amount will bring to $710 million the total amount paid to that province and it represents 19 per cent of the total revenues of the province of Quebec, according to the revenue estimates in the budget for the 1973-74 taxation year.

Mr. Chairman, equalization payments now rank third among Quebec's sources of revenue. They are exceeded only by personal income tax and retail sales taxes. Thus, on the basis of a $710 million payment, Quebec would get more from equalization than the combined revenues from the gasoline tax, the sale of automobile licences, the tobacco tax as well as the profits of the Société des alcools du Québec. A last example, Quebec revenues under the equalization formula are about the same as a 7 per cent general sales tax, namely a little less than the present sales tax of 8 per cent.

Hon. members will appreciate the fact that this bill contains other benefits for Quebec. I am referring particularly to the extension of the federal unconditional post-secondary education contributions for the next three years. The federal contributions to Quebec in 1973-74 for post-secondary education amount to $326.8 million of which $150.6 million are under the form of tax points incorporated in the Quebec income tax system.

Mr. Chairman, I could give several other examples of benefits received by my province, by lower income provinces in general, as well as by all the provinces which benefit from those fiscal arrangements. Besides, I think I have shown that those benefits are indeed substantial and that those arrangements are still getting the full attention of this government. I urge all members to support this very important bill.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I have waited until we went into committee of the whole before speaking so as not to delay passage of the bill.

I want to make some very brief comments today on Bill C-233 concerning federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. In particular, I will deal, for the moment, with the integration of school taxes in the equalization formula. I of course welcome this liberal measure and I congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) for it. But I always have some reservations when I read in bills expressions like unconditional grants to provinces. It seems to me that the federal government is giving with both eyes closed. This may be a good thing for federal-provincial relations and it may be some compromise that we must accept in order to keep the country peaceful and preserve Confederation. Still it makes me shudder. I say this because the grant is effective only to the extent where certain objectives are achieved.

● (1620)

If we incorporate school taxes in the present equalization formula, the average citizen in New Brunswick, for instance, will expect his land taxes to be lowered in fact, and the educational institutions improved. In fact, however, the provincial politicians do not always take advantage of the formula to improve them or to give proper credit to the federal government; often, they pour this additional income from the federal government into their general funds so that the average citizen does not know where in fact the money was spent.

That is why the expression "unconditional grant" sometimes scares me. The formula is good to the extent where we have competent and responsible provincial administrations. I know whereof I speak because I am personally well acquainted with the present Minister of Finance of New Brunswick who represents part of my federal riding in Fredericton. For example, for almost two and a half years we have paid some special grants, through the Secretary of State, to teach the language of the official minority of this country. Those grants are directly paid to provincial governments. Up to now the funds have been ploughed into the general revenue fund of the provinces where they disappear.

Fortunately, thanks to several of my interventions supported by my Liberal colleagues in the House, the Secretary of State has succeeded in obtaining a commitment from the New Brunswick premier to the effect that there will be an accounting to the central government of the expenditure of this money so important to the official language minority in New Brunswick.

There should also be, in my opinion, similar commitments from other provinces also receiving a share of the federal grants to teach the official language of the minority, as Ontario, for example, where it has been suggested that the grant has been used for some paving job. This broadening of the equalization formula is of course favourable to the provinces, consequently to New Brunswick, as far as I am concerned, and this is a lower income province, a depreciating term that I am not very proud of.

Though I might contradict the minister, I must tell him that I am not quite willing to admit that this broadening will put the poor provinces, as he said in French, almost on the same footing as higher income provinces. And if I consider the discrepancy between Alberta, which is number one on the list with $1,192, and New Brunswick, which is last with $965, I see that this difference of $227 shows a margin of more than 19.04 per cent, which is, however, quite a substantial one, before equalization.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the measure now before us assists in filling the gap, in bringing both sides closer to each other, but further progress will have to be made. I heartily congratulate the minister for it and I urge him to reduce even more, in the years to come, in co-operation with provincial ministers of finance, the discrepancy between rich and poor provinces in these equalization measures.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, and I will conclude on this point, the provinces to report to us and tell us where this money will be spent because provincial ministers of finance do not always praise or commend these excellent measures. I will not act as a judge as regards the efficiency of provincial policies. The constituents of each of the provinces are able to do so, in as much as they have at their disposal all relevant information relating to the way this federal money is spent by provincial governments.

Mr. Chairman, in order not to delay our business, I reserve the right to rise on the matter of universities a little later.

On clause 3—Post-secondary education adjustments payments

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think I owe it to the committee to respond to some of the questions that were put to me on second reading relating to post-secondary education. The hon. member for Edmonton South—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Edmonton West.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and the hon. member for Waterloo South.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Waterloo-Cambridge.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Everybody is doing his own little thing by changing the riding connotations these days. I certainly want to congratulate my colleague for his initiative in changing the name of his constituency from Ottawa East to Ottawa-Vanier. It is a great improvement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal also have an interest in this subject. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has had this interest not only since his election to the House of Commons but also while he was attorney general of the sovereign province of New Brunswick.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal capsulized the questions. I will deal with them. He wanted to know whether the federal government, through the Department of the Secretary of State and the new ministry of research, retained its commitment to participation in an active way in post-secondary education across the country, and whether we were contemplating any withdrawal from that position.

The Secretary of State was here earlier today and was called away on pressing business. He apologizes to the committee and to the hon. member. However, on his behalf I can say quite categorically that we are committed within the limits of our constitutional responsibility and jurisdiction to co-operating with the provinces to the advancement of post-secondary education in Canada. This is for a number of reasons, such as maintaining national standards, as the hon. member for Scarborough West indicated, and promoting research as a leading edge in education. As a matter of fact, we have compounded that with the establishment of a separate cabinet post. My colleagues, the Secretary of State and the Minister of State for Science and Technology, intend to remain involved because of the linkage between research education and employment, the mobility of population, the equality of opportunity in education across the country, and the cultural aspects of national unity.

Several hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, asked why we were only able to achieve an extension of the present agreement which will last until the full scope of the 1972 Fiscal Arrangements Act expires. They asked why we were only able to achieve an extension of the present agreement, rather than a new contract with the provinces that would have received legislative confirmation here in parliament. I might say that over a period of two or three years the Secretary of State and his predecessor advanced several proposals which had as their purpose to rationalize the post-secondary educational system in this country.

The Secretary of State advanced proposals which intended to disassociate federal payments from actual provincial expenditures of post-secondary education, tying them instead to the base year costs with two escalation factors; first, a flat 7 per cent and, second, an escalation feature geared against the growth of educational population which was taken as the population aged between 18 and 24 in the particular province.

The Secretary of State, and indeed the government, felt that this proposition would remove the present discrimination against provinces which for any reason have low per capita expenditures for post-secondary education, and would remove the present bonusing to provinces which for any reason have high per capita expenditures. It would also give the provinces greater incentives to cut costs. It would simplify the administration of the transfer of payments programs and would give the provinces greater certainty of revenues for the purpose of long-term planning. From the provincial point of view, it would have gotten us out of their hair and given them flexibility in their programs. For reasons of their own, the provinces could not agree on that formula or on any counter-formula.

At a meeting held jointly with the federal Minister of Finance, provincial Ministers of Finance, the federal Secretary of State, provincial Ministers of Education, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare, and provincial Ministers of Health, we tried to work out not only the new formula for the financing of post-secondary education, but a new formula for health cost financing. We had to refer the subject of post-secondary education to the first ministers. At the meeting of first ministers, seeing there was no chance of achieving consensus on this new formula proposal, the Prime Minister recommended to the provincial premiers that they accept a three-year extension of the present agreement so we could go at it again. The provincial premiers accepted that proposition.

What is happening now? The hon. member for Fundy-Royal wants to know who is in charge. First, it is the Secretary of State. Under him is the undersecretary of state, Jean Boucher, then Peter Roberts, the assistant undersecretary of state who reports directly on this particular subject, then Robert Lachapelle who is sitting next to me on the floor of the House, the director of educational support, and with him a well knit group of 32 men and women who have as their particular purpose the objective of negotiating a new federal-provincial post-secondary agreement in anticipation of the expiry of the present arrangement, if parliament so deems this afternoon and in the other place.

The Secretary of State and I are consulting on a number of levels. We are consulting with the Association of Canadian Universities at the institutional level. We have had consultations with the Association of Canadian Professors and the Canadian Union of Students, or whatever organization currently has the mandate from the students in this country.

As a matter of fact, a week or so ago I was at a university in my constituency, Carleton University. The students asked me whether they had any right to participate in these negotiations. I repeated to them what I said to the National Students Organization earlier, namely, that the Secretary of State of Canada welcomes their participation in these negotiations, and not only should they approach their own provincial governments wherein those universities reside, but they should also feel free to approach the federal government.

At all of these levels, provincial, institutional, students and professorial these negotiations are being carried on on an urgent basis. I think perhaps I will limit myself to that. There may be further questions from hon. members in the committee.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

CONTINUATION OF SURTAX ON IMPORTS OF FRESH BEEF AND LIVE CATTLE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Hon. members will recall that in announcing the imposition of a surtax on imports of fresh beef and live cattle on November 2, the government undertook to review the market situation and the need for the surtax within 30 days.

This review has now been completed and it has been decided that the surtax will remain in place, subject to a continuing review. The surtax has as its purpose the bringing of a greater degree of stability to the Canadian market, permitting movement toward the resumption of more normal marketing of Canadian cattle. We still anticipate that North American trade in beef and cattle will return to traditional levels in the near future, and it is for this reason the government intends to keep the surtax under continuing review.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the parliamentary secretary on a point of order, I gather there is no wish by hon. members to comment on the announcement which has just been made.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, since we are well into private members' hour, and since the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has agreed to proceed next week, I wonder if we could call it five o'clock.

Surtax on imports of beef

Some hon. Members: Happy birthday, Stanley!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear no dissenting voices. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until two o'clock on Monday next.

At 4.37 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONSUMER SERVICE BRANCH—BOX 99

Question No. 2,244—Mr. MacKay:

1. For what reasons have so many people been handling Box 99 auto complaints, what were their problems in handling such complaints and will a specific auto complaint section be established within Box 99?

2. (a) What percentage of Box 99 motorist complaints have been investigated since 1969 (b) what percentage have been settled to the consumer's satisfaction?

3. What percentage of Box 99 staff are (a) French (b) English (c) bilingual?

4. What are the names of the staff of Box 99 and what is the background, qualifications, training and experience of each?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The Branch Director responsible for the operation of Box 99 assigns staff to handle automobile complaints and inquiries as required by the volume of work in this area. The problems presented are concerned with quality; guarantees and warranties; goods, services, or money not received; repairs and servicing; alleged unethical practices; prices; safety; advertising; standardization; labelling; and packaging. The Consumer Services Branch, which operates Box 99, was recently reorganized. There now is a Travel and Transportation Unit, which encompasses automobile complaints and inquiries. There will be five officers in the unit.

2. All complaints which were received by Box 99 have been investigated either through referral to another government agency with specific jurisdiction in the area of complaint, or through direct mediation of the dispute by the department. It is impossible to assess what percentage has "been settled to the consumer's satisfaction".

3. It is assumed that parts (a) and (b) refer to mother tongue. The appropriate figures for the present Box 99 staff are: (a) English, 78 per cent; (b) French, 22 per cent; (c) Bilingual capacity, 33 per cent.

4. As a matter of principle, information in personnel files has been regarded as not returnable by the government.

CONSUMER CAR COMPLAINTS

Question No. 2,247—Mr. MacKay:

1. For what reason does the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs refuse to handle consumer car complaints referred to it by the Automobile Protection Association, a national consumer auto protection service group?

2. How are patterns discerned from the complaints received by Box 99 and how are the larger issues dealt with?

3. Would the Minister give the percentage breakdown on each car model of the auto complaints received last year?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has not refused to handle complaints referred to it by the Automobile Protection Association.

2. Monthly complaint statistics are collected through Box 99, which provide some indication as to the areas of changing consumer concern. In submitting proposals for changes in regulations and/or legislation under federal jurisdiction, and in proposing possible consumer information programs, these areas of changing concern are taken into consideration.

3. It is the general policy of the department not to release statistics concerning specific companies or products.

AUTO CONSUMER PROTECTION

Question No. 2,248—Mr. MacKay:

What policies does the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have on auto consumer protection?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): For all types of consumer complaints it is the policy of the department to review all complaints from consumers, all referrals from other government agencies and from private consumer groups where that group has been unable to resolve a given complaint. Where a specific problem may not be resolved through existing legislation the department uses its mediation efforts to try to resolve a given complaint. It is the policy of the department to attempt to reach fair and equitable settlements which are satisfactory to both parties to a dispute, given the circumstances surrounding each individual complaint. Where legislation exists which would resolve a given consumer complaint, the department makes use of it if it is legislation that it administers, and if it is not, it refers the complaint to the appropriate government agency. The department functions as a mediator in attempting to resolve the specific problems of individual automobile owners. It also watches trends in consumer complaints concerning automobiles, to determine whether a given manufacturer should be approached on behalf of all owners of a particular vehicle.

AUTOMOBILE WARRANTIES

Question No. 2,250—Mr. MacKay:

In light of the Ontario Law Reform Commission report on warranties and the Federal Trade Commission in the United States report on automobile warranties, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs prepared to initiate, with consumer involvement and provincial representation, a national study of automobile warranties?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Generally speaking, purchasers' rights under warranties and guarantees such as automobile warranties fall within the area of provincial jurisdiction. However, certain provisions in Bill C-227 to amend the Combines Investigation Act are intended to control deception in the use of warranties and guarantees and to ensure that if they limit in any way the rights that would otherwise be available to sellers under provincial law the limitation is clearly stated.

PRICE OF AUTOMOBILES

Question No. 2,252—Mr. MacKay:

Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs initiated any action in connection with lowering the price Canadian consumers have to pay for automobiles?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has no statutory authority to control retail prices of automobiles. In so far as the federal government has present means of influencing prices of automobiles such means are in the hands of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and have been employed by him.

DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—AUTO COMPLAINTS SECTION

Question No. 2,400—Mr. Mather:

2. What were the names of the companies involved?

3. What percentage of such cases were concluded to the satisfaction of the complainant?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. The records of the Consumer Services Branch show the following statistics for recorded complaints on motor vehicles and accessories, from 1968 to the present. This classification includes petroleum products for use in motor vehicles. For comparative purposes, the total number of complaints received for all categories in each year is also listed:

	Motor Vehicles and Accessories (and associated petroleum products)	Total complaints
1968	238	3,109
1969	622	6,683
1970	1,235	13,558

1973 to September 30, 1973	2,221	15,193
Total to September 30, 1973	7,929	70,204

2. It is the policy of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not to reveal the names of consumers lodging complaints with Box 99, nor the names of specific companies or products complained against.

3. There is no strict definition of "satisfaction" which would allow the department to answer this question.

1. (a) What rates are paid, per square foot, by retail outlets for (i) main floor space (ii) second floor space in the area (800 Block Granville and Robson) of the Information Canada Building in Vancouver (b) what rate is paid by the government for the entire main and second floors of the Information Canada Building (c) is this rate competitive with those rates paid by other retail outlets in that area and, if not (i) for what reason (ii) what is the estimated overpayment in rental fees for the next five years?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. (a) (i) Main floor space, $2.60 to $12.00 per square foot. The $2.60 rate is a lease negotiated 10 years ago. Several leases are in the $4-$8 range and include a percentage of gross sales in addition to the square foot rental. (ii) Second floor space, $3 to $8 per square foot. Several buildings in the lower range $3 to $5, are either walk-up or with old elevators, poorly maintained and without air conditioning. (b) The rate is $11.11 per square foot per annum. Four of the more recently negotiated leases (1970-73) reveal basic rental rates between $10 and $12 per square foot, with adjustments for additional revenue based on a percentage of gross annual sales.

The rates paid in nearby centres, such as Pacific Centre (700 Block Georgia) and Royal Centre (1000 Block West Georgia) vary from $14 to $22 per square foot per annum. (ii) There is no overpayment of rental fees to be estimated. The rate paid is competitive in consideration of the location, size, traffic flow and similar criteria.

2. (a) The market value of the property is estimated to be in the range of $1,000,000 to $1,300,000. (b) At the time preliminary investigations were being made to locate possible locations for the Information Canada facility, the owner of the subject building indicated the property was not for sale. Furthermore, future Crown construction would provide space for this operation.

Has a decision been taken to refuse to award the Indo-China Medal and the Viet Nam Medal to civilians, both men and women, who were assigned to duties in those theatres at one time or another from 1954 to 1973 and, if so, on what grounds was it decided to favour the military components and exclude the civilians?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The government of Canada has decided to approve acceptance of the International Commission of Control and Supervision (ICCS) Medal for Armed Forces Personnel only. Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On October 15 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) gave his version of answers to some of my questions on the order paper on the subject of lawyers receiving business from the government. Specifically, I refer to his answer to question No. 2279 in which the minister gave what he said were names and addresses of lawyers given business by his department in the province of Nova Scotia during the last fiscal year. Included in this list was the name of Mr. A. D. McInnis of Antigonish, who subsequently advised me by letter dated October 17 that he had in reality not received any such business from the Department of Justice, that he found the inclusion of his name by the minister annoying, and that he desired clarification of the matter.

• (1410)

May I draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary starred question No. 3028 placed on the order paper on October 22 in order to clarify the situation as requested. That was 42 days ago, Mr. Speaker. I can see no reason whatsoever that would justify such a long delay in furnishing what should be a very simple answer.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, such delays can only make one suspect the accuracy of the minister's entire list, and surely the minister in fairness to Mr. McInnis—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Oral questions.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF FURTHER INCREASE IN VENEZUELAN CRUDE OIL PRICE ON PRICE TO CONSUMERS EAST OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE—IMPACT OF PREVIOUS INCREASES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the news of a further increase in the tax reference price of Venezuelan crude oil. Can the minister inform the House what this will mean in terms of increased product prices to Canadian consumers east of the Ottawa Valley line and when it might be expected to have any such effect upon consumers there?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we cannot be sure it will necessarily result in an immediate price increase. I would think it would be a matter of some weeks at least before a price increase would be felt in the crude feedstock supply to eastern Canadian refiners. At that time I think the government will have to look at the cost situation and see, in light of recent increases, whether any further increase would be justified.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister tell the House whether the increases in product prices he has already approved, the most recent of which went into effect a couple of days ago, have now taken into account all previous offshore crude price increases, that is, previous to the most recent announcement by Venezuela, or are there still more price rises to be anticipated as a result of previous increases in offshore crude prices without even taking into account the most recent increase in Venezuelan posted prices?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the two most recent increases take into account increases that occurred during the autumn, specifically from the end of September to early October and the one between the middle and the end of October which resulted from substantial increases in both Arab and Venezuelan prices. I believe there was an increase in the late summer, in August, which was not covered at the time the restraint went on. That has not been recovered, but I am not anticipating that it will be the subject matter of an application for a price increase. At the moment I am not anticipating any further applications.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. In view of the close contact the minister has established with the government of Venezuela as a result of his visit there, is he in a position to tell the House whether we should anticipate any further increases in the posted price of Venezuelan crude in the near future?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that in the course of our discussions with Venezuela they never made any commitment with regard to price; it was really on the question of supply that they expressed interest in a possible accord. As to whether additional increases will take place, I think this may depend on the international supply situation, and it may very well be that the Venezuelan government will find a basis for further increases in its tax reference price as the months go on.

INTENTION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF GOVERNMENT AGENCY TO PURCHASE OIL FROM VENEZUELAN GOVERNMENT AND LIFTING OF PRICE FREEZE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Has the government given any further thought to setting up a government agency to purchase oil on a government to government basis? As I understood his answer a moment ago, Venezuela has not yet decided to take its royalties in kind rather than in money. May I ask the minister whether further discussions have taken place so that the Venezuelan government may be encouraged to take them in kind on the basis that Canada will have a government purchasing agency to deal with the Venezuelan government?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a correct description of our position that we have not attempted to persuade Venezuela to follow this practice, although we have indicated to the Venezuelan government that we would be interested in discussion with them if they took the decision to take royalties in kind.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or the Prime Minister, whichever wants to answer, whether it is not a fact that the Venezuelan decision to take royalties in kind might well depend on whether a customer like Canada had a government agency to deal with them? If that is the case, can the government take faster steps to set up the necessary agency?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think the decision whether to take in kind or not would depend on factors other than the presence of an agency. I would agree that over the longer run the possibility of effecting that kind of supply agreement would certainly be assisted by the existence of such a corporation in Canada. I hope to be able to announce to the House in a relatively short period of time the government's decision in the latter regard.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister or the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, although he is absent, whether it is still the government's intention to abandon the price freeze on January 31 and to allow prices across Canada to increase as of February 1 and, if so, to what level?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the government of Alberta has commenced a legislative session today involving certain amendments to its legislation with regard to the taxation of oil royalties in that province arising, in part, from price increases. At the moment we are having discussions, and I expect to have them again this week, with the government of Alberta on this matter in which the question of the price from February 1 onward is intimately involved. At the moment I cannot be more precise than that.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PEOPLE OF NEWFOUNDLAND ON LOW AND FIXED INCOMES TO MEET INCREASED FUEL OIL COST

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the price of fuel oil in Newfoundland has doubled in three years and is now substantially higher than in the rest of the country, and as per capita consumption is four times the national average, may I ask the minister, especially in light of the high unemployment rate in that province, if he has had any talks with the government of Newfoundland, or with the Atlantic provinces for that matter, with a view to providing some direct means of federal assistance for those people on middle, lower and fixed incomes who are hardest hit by the fuel price increase?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I told the House before, I sent a telegram last week to my colleagues. I have not had an answer from my colleague in Newfoundland but I have received one from my colleague in Prince Edward Island. It seems that the provincial ministers concerned are taking appropriate steps at the present time to make sure that those in need are not going to be caught short of the money necessary to meet their needs with regard to fuel.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot.

SURVEY OF COMPANIES ON CONSEQUENCES OF ENERGY CRISIS—PUBLICATION OF FINDINGS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Friday I asked the minister whether he was going to make public the analysis of the survey his department is doing among 1,000 corporations in Canada on the consequences of the energy crisis. At that time the minister did not indicate clearly whether the government would or would not do so. I therefore ask the minister now, does he intend during the present week, for example, to inform the House of his findings from that survey?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think, at this stage of the analysis, it is still too premature to make any announcement of that kind.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OVERLAND OIL MOVEMENT WILL BE IN OPERATION WHEN SEAWAY CLOSES—SURVEY OF FACILITIES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Having regard to the fact the Montreal-Lake Ontario section of the seaway will close two weeks from today on December 16, can the minister give any assurance that overland oil movement will be in operation at that time when the St. Lawrence movement is curtailed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give assurances in the kind of figures with which I responded to the hon. gentleman last week. As I mentioned at that time, there will be considerable investment required in both loading and unloading facilities and also in the repair of existing rolling stock. We certainly hope that some part of this will be available. We are actively considering additional measures that the government of Canada can take in order to enhance overland oil movement.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. On November 28 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the Minister of Transport was completing a survey with regard to the overland system from Sarnia. Has the minister completed this survey and, specifically, has he been in touch with the appropriate trucking firms?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Excuse me, but I did not hear the first part of the question. Could the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. On November 28 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the Minister of Transport was completing a survey with regard to the overland supply system from Sarnia. Has the minister completed the survey and, specifically, has he been in touch with the appropriate trucking firms?

• (1420)

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are in touch with the trucking firms as we are in touch with the railways to see what can be done next winter if we have to transport oil from Sarnia to Montreal.

Mr. Jarvis: Will the minister tell the House what specific steps he is taking to ensure that overland oil supply will be in operation before the St. Lawrence freeze-up?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if that is a wise thing to do. The first thing we have to do is find the rail cars and trucks that will be in a position to move the oil as soon as it is necessary to move it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN VISITORS TO UNITED STATES AGAINST BEING STRANDED IF GAS RATIONING INTRODUCED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from the possibility of gasoline rationing in the United States. Has the minister consulted with his American counterparts to get an agreement from the Americans to ensure that the interests of Canadians abroad will be protected so they will not be stranded there if gasoline rationing is introduced in that country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would not think that Canadians who wish to travel in the United States would be exempted from those kinds of measures. I should think they would want to comply.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): What specific measures will the minister be taking on behalf of the Canadian government to protect the interests of Canadian nationals travelling abroad who find themselves trapped there? Is the minister not concerned about the interests of Canadians?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are concerned. I think we can look after the interests of Canadians in this regard. However, I do not think we should create the impression that we should be free when Americans are subject to rationing.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROPOSED RUNWAY RELOCATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister reached any decision or can he report on the request for runway relocation at the Winnipeg airport in order to reduce air pollution, noise and for safety reasons?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker. We are still discussing this with the municipality.

Mr. McKenzie: Will the government be taking immediate steps to acquire land in preparation for runway relocation?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): As soon as a decision is reached.

OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—STARTING OF CONSTRUCTION, FINANCING, OWNERSHIP

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister give any more information on the extension of the pipeline to Montreal as to when he expects the construction of the pipeline to start, whether financing has been lined up and whether or not it will be publicly owned?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot report very much more since my meeting on Friday with the representatives of the pipeline company. I hope to be able to do so within a relatively short period.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister assure us there will be adequate steel to construct the pipeline and have it completed by 1975?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): My information is there will be, Mr. Speaker.

OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—AVAILABILITY OF STEEL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister or his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, been in touch with the steel companies of Canada in order to obtain advice whether in fact there will be steel available to commence the pipeline at this time? My information reveals that this will not be possible before March, 1975.

[Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin Waterloo).]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I met with the presidents of all the steel companies of Canada on Thursday of last week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Now that the minister has advised he met with the presidents of the steel companies, will he take us into his confidence, answer my question and let the House and the people of Canada know whether in fact there will be sufficient steel in order to carry on with this pipeline?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, just 15 seconds ago my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in answer to another question indicated there will be no problem and that sufficient steel can be made available to build the pipeline. I did not feel it necessary to repeat the undertaking that had already been given.

Mr. Alexander: Can the minister advise us as to the date he indicated to the steel companies when the government wishes to start construction of the line? Can he give us some indication so we may know what time we are talking about and the completion date?

Mr. Gillespie: My colleague has already stated that an announcement will be made in due course.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INVITATION TO SAUDI ARABIAN AND ALGERIAN OIL MINISTERS TO VISIT CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact Canada has no resident ambassador in Riyadh and bearing in mind the importance of obtaining fuller knowledge of Arab oil policies affecting Canada, will the minister consider having an invitation extended to Sheik Yamani, Saudi Arabian oil minister, and his Algerian counterpart, to visit this country after the conclusion of their visits to western Europe and the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take this suggestion under consideration.

Mr. Macquarrie: In the same process, would the minister consult with the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence with a view to having these gentlemen invited before that committee so that we might enlarge our limited knowledge of the relations between their part of the world and our part of the world?

ENERGY

OIL PIPELINE EXTENSION TO MONTREAL—NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO AND QUEBEC ON LOCATION—COMPLETION DATE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the right hon. gentleman tell the House what negotiations have taken place with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec with regard to the location of the pipeline extension to which he referred in his statement a week ago Thursday night? Can he also advise the House whether he is satisfied with the information given to him by his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that he can guarantee the line will be completed by 1975?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to the first part of the question, the answer is that I have not been personally involved in this discussion of location. As to the second part of the question, the answer is yes.

FINANCE

PROPOSED NEW REFERENCE LIBRARY, TORONTO—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SEEK DEFERMENT UNTIL CONSULTATIONS HELD WITH COMMUNITY GROUPS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been addressed to the Minister of Finance but in his absence I direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact the federal government is putting up some $3 million under the winter works program for the building of a new $32 million metropolitan Toronto reference library, and in view of the fact a number of local community planning groups have expressed strong opposition to this project, particularly because of lack of consultation with them, will the federal government seek to have the proposal deferred until it can be looked into further and appropriate consultation undertaken with the community?

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I took due note of the hon. member's question and the Minister of Finance will reply to him as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Will the parliamentary secretary, when speaking to the minister, call his attention to the fact that renovation of the present building and the provision of additional parking space might well enable the needs of the library to be met adequately with a saving of more than $20 million?

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ASCERTAIN FROM PRESIDENT REASON FOR DENIAL OF SERVICE PENSION TO MINER

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Now that the minister will be meeting face to face with the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I don't know what the hell is so funny about it.

An hon. Member: It came from your own side.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): —will the minister ascertain from the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation why a miner with 45 years service has been denied and is being denied a service pension on the basis that he is receiving a compensation pension?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice. I have already had three hours of face-to-face conversation with the gentleman in question and I shall be continuing these discussions tomorrow. The matter the hon. member has raised is one I propose to bring up with him, and I hope to have some answers for the hon. gentleman shortly.

• (1430)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Am I to understand from the minister that the letter he wrote several weeks ago to the president has not yet been replied to?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the purport of that question escapes me. I am not at all certain what is meant by it.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Then let me ask a supplementary by way of explanation. Did the minister not inform me that he had written to Tom Kent to inquire as to the status of the compensation payments which were being used to subsidize pensions, and did he not receive a reply long since to the letter he sent to Tom Kent?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my meetings with the president of the company is to discuss these matters. I am expecting to get an oral reply from him and will discuss the matter in detail, just as soon as I know what he says.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Would the minister take me up on my request to be at the meeting along with himself and Mr. Kent when these matters are being discussed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if I were absolutely certain that such a meeting would be simply face to face, I would comply.

GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—SUGGESTION THAT MINISTER ASK PROVINCES TO REDUCE TAXES

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As the sales tax on gas is 25 cents a gallon in Newfoundland and New Brunswick and 7 per cent on heating oil in British Columbia, has the minister pointed out to his provincial colleagues that a reduction in the sales tax would be greatly appreciated by consumers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, such a suggestion was made at the last federal-provincial conference of energy ministers in Toronto and my provincial counterparts replied in the negative.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF POSSIBLE PRIVATE FINANCING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of persistent reports that the private sector is withdrawing its original interest in financing a Mackenzie Valley natural gas pipeline, has the government an alternative plan for getting this vitally needed outlet for natural gas built if private financing is not forthcoming?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of the question. I have had an opportunity at a very recent date to discuss their proposals with the Canadian Arctic gas study group. They have indicated their intention in the relatively near future, within a matter of several months, to make application to the appropriate regulatory authorities both in Canada and in the United States for a pipeline. The gentlemen were kind enough to indicate that the emergence of the El Paso alternative proposal in Alaska was a matter of concern to them, and also that they were concerned about the situation in Canada vis-à-vis native rights in the Mackenzie valley. Subject to these concerns, I believe they will be going ahead at an early date to seek regulatory approval.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY NATURAL GAS PIPELINE—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF NON-DEVELOPMENT CORRIDOR PENDING SETTLEMENT OF NATIVES' CLAIMS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he written a letter, or has anyone in his department written a letter, to the Northwest Territories Indian Brotherhood or the Fort Wrigley people informing them that the government is establishing a corridor eight miles wide, four on either side of the Mackenzie River, within which no development will take place until such time as native claims in the Northwest Territories have been negotiated to a settlement?

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not know precisely which letter the hon. member is referring to since I and my officers have written often to the Indians of the Territories, but I shall investigate and report to the House. Of course, all required measures will be taken to protect the interests of the Indians, for certain indications have perhaps been so interpreted by the hon. member.

METHOD OF RETURNING VESSEL, "GREENPEACE III", FROM TAHITI—ACTION TO OBTAIN COMPENSATION FROM FRANCE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has to do with the Greenpeace III vessel. Since the government of France has released the Greenpeace III in Tahiti some 7,000 miles from Vancouver, I should like to inquire whether the government of Canada is insisting that the ship be delivered, or is the government planning alternatively to assist David McTaggart financially in its return?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government is considering the alternative, which is to help Mr. McTaggart bring the vessel back to Canada.

Mr. Rose: I wonder whether the minister would be a little more explicit. Since McTaggart is under medical orders to stay within 12 hours of a hospital because of an eye injury suffered during the French boarding of this vessel on the high seas, is Canada demanding reparations or compensation from France and, if so, what is France's attitude to these demands?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the first question related to bringing the ship back to Canada and the answer I gave was that we were considering assisting Mr. McTaggart financially to bring his ship back. The second question related to the damage that he claimed he suffered at the hands of the French navy. We have been pressing this case with the French government, so far without success.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT ACCESS OF INDIANS TO DISTRICT OFFICES NOT BE INHIBITED

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since the recent situation at Kenora indicates that native people are having to resort to sit-ins to get attention given to their problems, will the minister assure the House that he will not extend to his district offices the practice of putting up steel walls to keep the Indians out, and will he accede to the request by petition of his departmental employees to remove the steel obstacles to Indians entering the department's head office in Ottawa?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to reply to the hon. member who once more is late with his news. If he goes to the building he will see there is no more steel wall since last week, when I gave orders to take it away.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): May I have the assurance that the practice of putting up obstacles to keep out native people will not be extended to district offices, as I asked in my original question?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will take all the necessary steps to make sure these people have access to my officials and my department, but I will never put up with people who want to use violence in order to make their point.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister assure the House that in the meantime he has not taken official action to rename the headquarters building of his department "Fort Chrétien"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CAPITAL INVESTMENT FORECAST FOR 1974—EFFECT OF ENERGY CRISIS

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Does the crash survey now being taken by his department indicate that the minister has changed his mind about the prediction he made on November 26 that next year will be a very good year?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. I think next year will be a very good year.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give the House an estimate of the effect on capital expenditure in 1974 resulting from the energy crisis?

Mr. Gillespie: The last analysis we did on this clearly indicated that the business community expects to increase its capital investment very substantially, by over 20 per cent. I have had no reason yet to modify those figures.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the minister is still giving information based on the pre-energy crisis situation. Can he give us more up to date information? In particular, can he give us an estimate of the effects on Canadian industry of the energy induced slowdown in the United States economy, especially in so far as it affects dollar volume and the number of jobs?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the current situation is too indefinite at the moment to make any forecast.

UNWARRANTED INTERFERENCE WITH CIVILIANS BY MILITIA UNIT AT TOLSTOI, MANITOBA

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence but in his absence perhaps his parliamentary secretary could answer it. The question relates to an incident at Tolstoi, Manitoba, this past week in which a number of civilians were terrorized by a militia unit on exercise. Does the parliamentary secretary have some explanation for the incident, and would he indicate to the House whether any disciplinary action is being taken against those who perpetrated the incident?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this was an unfortunate incident that should never have occurred and steps are being taken to see that it does not occur again.

PROPOSED BARRIE-TORONTO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER EXPEDITE DECISION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the Canadian Transport Commission held lengthy hearings at Barrie last July 10 to 13, when over 40 briefs were presented in favour of the establishment of a rail passenger service between Barrie and Toronto, with weekend extensions to Collingwood and Meaford, and taking into consideration the ever-increasing highway congestion and the energy shortage, will the minister take the necessary steps to expedite a favourable decision in this matter as soon as possible?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I received this report this morning and I will be happy to look into the matter and make a decision.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF URANIUM STOCKPILING PROGRAM IN LIGHT OF OVER-ALL SHORTAGE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the over-all energy shortage, has the minister considered the possibility of a uranium stockpiling program? I am particularly interested, of course, in that part of north Hastings where there are four uranium mines sitting idle.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have not specifically considered new stockpiling. We anticipate that with an improvement in the international price for uranium there will be a greater incentive to some of our existing Canadian mines to bring capacity back into production again. I would expect a bright future for the north part of Hastings County in particular.

WHEAT—REASON FOR DELAY IN PAYMENTS TO ONTARIO PRODUCERS UNDER TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture regarding payments to Ontario wheat producers under the two-price system. A few weeks ago we were informed by the grains division of his department that a formula would be worked out and payments made before too long. I understand that the formula has not been worked out and nothing has been done. What is the reason for the delay and when will things be straightened out?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the $8.3 million are to be paid out to Ontario wheat producers under an agreement we have with the Ontario Winter Wheat Marketing Board. As soon as we receive information from that board, these payments will be made. We are awaiting that information at the present time.

COMMUNICATIONS

INTENTION RESPECTING LEGISLATION TO MERGE REGULATORY FUNCTIONS OF RADIO-TELEVISION AND TRANSPORT COMMISSIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. In view of the rather inconclusive result of the communications conference last week, does the minister intend to proceed with legislation to merge the regulatory functions of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission with the communications committee of the Canadian Transport Commission?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker. However, we have taken no final decision on this because of the legislative requirements of the government program.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the desire stated by the minister at the conference to negotiate, discuss and consult with the provinces, will the federal-provincial officials committee that is supposed to meet early next year have any legislative input?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the legislation as a whole, we promised the provinces we would discuss it anew with them before introducing it. But I warned at the federal-provincial conference, and the hon. member must be acquainted with my statement, that concerning the first part which deals primarily with the federal government's straightening out its own affairs, that we would consider ourselves free to legislate without any further consultation with the provinces, especially because the latter seem in no rush to hold another conference.

PARTICIPATION BY REPRESENTATIVES OF YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES IN FUTURE CONFERENCES WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Before any further conferences are held on the very important subject of communications, which is rather vital north of the 60th parallel, will the minister ensure that there will be representation at future conferences from the Yukon and Northwest Territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the provinces' proposal goes even further: it suggests that the next conference be held in the Northwest Territories.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Good.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMPOSITION OF GROUP TO STUDY CONTROLLED THERMONUCLEAR FUSION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the government's proposal for a detailed study of a Canadian program on controlled thermonuclear fusion and the setting up of a management committee comprised of a group centred primarily in the province of Quebec, I should like to ask the minister if requests for inclusion in the proposed study have come from universities in the western provinces which are engaged in similar research studies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, such surveys are not usually made public because of the representative character of the researchers entrusted with them. This feasibility study will make a complete inventory of the situation, including, I trust, the excellent studies performed in Edmonton.

[English]

Mr. Harding: Would the minister consider enlarging the present five-group, management committee which has been set up for this proposed study, to include other research groups interested in thermonuclear fusion or, alternatively, that when a draft proposal is prepared a representative group from across Canada will meet to examine that draft and come up with proposals to be submitted to the government?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, when I have the report of this research group, I will be able to provide for participation by the Edmonton group. This is a feasibility study project and we have not yet decided whether we shall launch a thermonuclear fusion research program.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INTENTION RESPECTING PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he advise the House whether the cabinet has reached a decision on increasing the allocation of funds for the LIP program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that decision has not been taken yet.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the lateness of the season and the widespread disappointment in respect of many thousands of applications, is the minister able to indicate whether there is hope for these applicants and will he make an official announcement, hopefully, before Christmas?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, until such a decision has been made I do not think there should be any inference drawn as to when this will happen. When such a decision is made it will be announced.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN BENEFITS PAID PRERETIRED MINERS IN LIGHT OF COST OF LIVING

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the minister presently giving active consideration to an across the board raise in benefits paid to preretired Devco miners and their dependants to compensate them for the greatly increased cost of living with which they are faced?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, there was such an across the board increase a few months ago. I am speaking from memory, but if it is not now linked to the cost of living escalation I believe that is the intention. Therefore there would be something of this nature for the workers concerned. I will be glad to look into the matter and get an answer as to exactly how the program works.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

STEPS TO INCREASE SUPPLY OF QUARTERS AND DIMES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the continuing decline in the supply of quarters and dimes by the Royal Canadian Mint, in view of the problem of retailers in having enough change available, and as conditions will worsen between now and Christmas, what steps is the minister taking to increase the supply of silver coins in order that this problem can be overcome?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we are now minting coins at full capacity, and this is even causing problems with our personnel. However, we are negotiating with our personnel representatives in order to minimize the coin shortage.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Would the minister take into consideration a cutback in production for export in this connection?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, in fact we do not wish to destroy the markets that we have developed outside Canada, but we have certainly reduced our activities in these markets to meet the demand within the country.

ENERGY

DATE OF COMMENCEMENT OF OPERATIONS OF SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is he able to say now when the energy conservation board which he announced on television will be getting under way?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe notice of this procedure was given and it is probably on the order paper now.

● (1450)

Mr. Bell: Even if legislation is necessary, will the Prime Minister give the assurance that he will have a minister other than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be responsible for this important task in the coming months this winter?

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER GIVE PRIORITY TO SECURING AGREEMENT WITH ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of Premier Regan's statement that an agreement between the Atlantic provinces and Ottawa on offshore mineral rights can be secured as soon as we can get federal officials to find time for a meeting to complete the negotiations, will the Prime Minister give priority to such a meeting so that the development of our energy resources in Atlantic Canada will not be further delayed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am certain that the delay cannot be attributed to us. I missed the first words of the question and therefore I do not know to whom the words are to be ascribed.

Mr. Fairweather: To Premier Regan.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand they are Premier Regan's. I can only say that I wrote Premier Regan and the other Atlantic premiers and, indeed, the premier of Quebec, a very short while ago indicating to them our desire to proceed with this. Until now they have been proceeding as a group of five provinces. But recent development indicated they were no longer a group. I wrote them saying we wanted to continue the discussions with either all five or a smaller number, but would they let us know as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition and then call orders of the day.

OIL PRODUCTS PRICES—NATURE OF GOVERNMENT UNDERTAKING TO COMPANIES ON PRICE INCREASES BASED ON INCREASE IN IMPORTED CRUDE COST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A number of days ago he indicated that, in exchange for the voluntary agreement by the companies to freeze product prices, he had agreed that increased cost of imported crude could be passed on by way of product price increases. Could the minister indicate very briefly just what the nature of his or the government's undertaking was to the companies with respect to increased prices based upon increased costs of imported crude and how long this undertaking given by the government is to remain in effect?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the undertaking is essentially in the form described by the Prime Minister in his statement of September 4 and as expressed subsequently, that identified increases in costs of eastern refiners related to increases in the price of their offshore feedstock could, upon satisfaction to the department and to myself, be passed on in higher prices. This would, of course, be for the period that the prices are under restraint as they are at present.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I gather from an answer given earlier today that the minister is reviewing this position?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Reviewing the position with regard to eastern refiners?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At the moment I have had no indication of additional cost increases, but since the cost increase involved in the Venezuelan decision is at a very much lower percentage than the previous one, I would require further satisfaction that indeed there would be any kind of penalty to the refiners from absorbing this cost increase rather than seeking to pass it on.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order with respect to the order of business that has just been called. I think it could be said that there have been some discussions about the order of business this afternoon, and that there are a few difficulties because of the absence thus far of certain members. With respect to Bill C-191, there are a couple of report stage amendments to it in the name of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who will not be here for an hour or so. It was suggested that we might move on to Bill C-190, order No. 43, but I am told that the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), who has put down amendments to that bill, will not be here for an hour either. It was suggested also that we might deal with the residential mortgages bill, but the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) is not here. I suppose all this adds up to the fact that it would be a good day to deal with family allowances and the Canada Pension Plan—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —except that since we are prepared to give third reading to those two bills without debate, they would not take much time. In any case, we could do those bills a little later.

In the light of all this, I think there has been an understanding that I would be permitted to move the first of the amendments in the name of the hon. member for Skeena on his behalf, on the understanding that if he arrives while the debate is still in progress, he will be permitted to speak at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I am wondering also whether hon. members would not feel that motions Nos. 1 and 2 might be moved for debate together but voted on separately. They seem to deal with substantially the same matter. It would be a little difficult to contrive two debates on these separate motions. If this is agreed, I will put both motions to the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I suggest that this could be agreed to, and also, in view of the circumstances to which I have already alluded, perhaps the debate might be permitted to deal generally with the question of enlarging the Parole Board. I understand that there are a number of members who want to speak in those terms. But that fits in with your suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) (for Mr. Howard) moved:

That Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, be amended in clause 1 by inserting the following as subsection 4.1(2) immediately after line 13:

(2) Two of the ad hoc members shall be persons of Native Indian origin.

And by renumbering the subsequent subsections accordingly.

That Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, be amended in clause 1 by inserting the following as subsection 4.1(3) immediately after line 17:

(3) Two of the ad hoc members shall be persons who have served a period of time in a penitentiary under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada whether or not such persons, at the time of their appointment, have been granted a parole.

And by renumbering the subsequent subsections accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose at this point to speak to motion No. 1 and to speak briefly. It seems to me that the motion, in fact, speaks for itself. The proposal is that at least two of the ten ad hoc members who are being added to the Parole Board by Bill C-191 should be persons of native Indian origin. We are all sadly aware of the fact that a disproportionate number of those in our penitentiaries are of native Indian origin. This raises a social problem and a matter of social concern to which we should be giving thought in many ways.

It does seem a crime, if I may use that word in this context, that proportionately so many more of our Indian and native people find their way into our penitentiaries than is the case with those of other racial backgrounds or origins. It is the feeling of these people, and I am sure that others like myself have had ideas along this line, that greater sympathy, a greater understanding of the plight of the native people in penitentiaries, would be accorded if there were some members of the Parole Board actually of native Indian origin. As a matter of fact, there are good arguments for putting persons of native Indian origin in other positions of authority in our correctional system, and representations to that effect have been made by organizations representing our Indian and native people.

● (1500)

I recognize there is always a question raised when it is proposed that any board or body should be constituted on a quota basis. We run into this situation on the question of giving equal representation to women on various boards. We run into it in the case of English and French speaking Canadians, and so on. Yet there are times when, in order to get a principle established, it does seem necessary to make a proposal such as this. Therefore, I suggest that my colleague from Skeena has made a proposal which ought to be considered. I trust that in the discussion of this proposed amendment, ideas will be forthcoming as to what we might do to show more concern for and more helpfulness to our native Indian population. At this moment, however, I urge the House to give its support to this amendment calling for at least two of the ten ad hoc members of the Parole Board to be persons of native Indian origin.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a few words on behalf of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) with regard to these motions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Isn't he here, either?

Mr. Lalonde: First, I wish to say that the Solicitor General is in Victoria today to discuss with the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia the agenda of the forthcoming federal-provincial conference on corrections to be held in Ottawa between December 12 and December 14.

The essence, and the intent, of Bill C-191 have been fully outlined by the Solicitor General in previous debates, and also in his appearance before the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. It would seem that the only outstanding matters to be considered relate to the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). As pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the two amendments suggest that two of the proposed ad hoc members of the Parole Board be native people, and that two others be former inmates. While the Solicitor General fully appreciates the intent of the hon. member's amendments he did make it clear, I believe during second reading, that he would use the expansion of the Parole Board as an opportunity to broaden the base of the board in a significant way. However, I submit that it would be unwise to require, by law, the appointment of any individuals according to race.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indeed recognized this difficulty in other cases, saying it would be quite inappropriate to start spelling out in all our bills relating to various boards detailed compositions based on linguistic representation, regional representation and sex representation. If the hon. member for Skeena were here, I could tell him that some hon. members sitting behind me would be saying a few words to him for not making any mention of female representation on the board. If one can make a case for former inmates and native people, then one could make a very strong case for adequate representation of women on that board. In actual fact, there are a number of women who are inmates, and who are subject to parole at various times.

I would like to assure the hon. member for Skeena, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the list of names currently being considered by the Solicitor General for appointment as ad hoc members of the Parole Board reflects the necessity of bringing broader participation of all parts of the community to the board's deliberations. The concerns expressed in the hon. member's amendments are very much in the mind of the Solicitor General, and he would like to take them into account when considering appointments to this board. But once more, Mr. Speaker, in terms of a general principle governing the constitution of government boards, it would not be quite appropriate, and not really in the best interests of the operations of those boards to start specifying all kinds of requirements with regard to representation and composition. We believe there is more to be said for allowing greater flexibility, leaving it to the various groups in the community to make sure that the government of the day takes into account the various clientele which a board like this is called upon to serve, and letting the minister be answerable in the House as to the quality of the candidates he would choose for recommendation to the Governor in Council for appointment to a board.

Once more I say that the government is sympathetic to the principle of representation put forward in the amendments. It is, indeed, the intention of the Solicitor General to take those concerns into account when appointing ad hoc members; but we suggest it would be preferable to leave it to the Solicitor General to make sure there would be adequate representation of the various sectors of the community. I repeat that if we continue along this line, we could end up requiring regional representation, linguistic representation and sex representation. There is no end to the definitions of this type that one could put into such a bill. Therefore, while expressing sympathy for the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena, I would urge the House to reject them as not being appropriate for this particular bill.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is my view that increasing the size of the Parole Board, which the act now says shall consist of not less than three and no more than nine, by adding another ten ad hoc members to it falls for short of solving the problems that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is burdened with in the responsibilities placed upon his shoulders under the Act establishing his department.

The policies being followed by the government which are making parole problems proliferate are not going to be solved by the simple addition of numbers. When you have government policy being followed by the board to the extent that, in effect, the board is overruling the findings of judges and juries, and imposing an entirely different sentence from that imposed by a judge at a trial or on appeal, even though this falls within the board's powers, it can be seen we are close to the root of the problem. I wish to cite a number of cases in support of what I have just said, one being the case of William Kraft.

Before getting into that, let me say that the root of the present attitude, which I think results in a policy that this government is following; was established by the previous solicitor general in 1971 who then had responsibility for penitentiaries. He established the precept that from now on the policy is going to be to stress rehabilitation over and above all else. That is one of the factors that is set forth in the provisions of the Parole Act now which has to be considered by the Parole Board when considering parole. But when putting that policy into effect, it seems that the emphasis has been placed, decidedly and emphatically, on rehabilitation rather than on the protection of the public.

How far the pendulum has swung, according to Judge Bewley, is evident in the case of Robert Leroy Barber who was convicted of 19 criminal offences between 1950 and 1964 including theft, breaking and entering, assaults on police, and possession of unregistered firearms. In 1964, he was convicted in Toronto of robbery and sentenced to 15 years imprisonment. He was paroled on May 28, 1969. While on parole Barber and an accomplice, Clarence William Kraft who had 22 previous convictions, robbed a bank in Deep Cove, North Vancouver of $34,602 on June 18, 1971. That was just a little over two years after his first parole. Police dogs tracked them down in bushland and there was a gun battle in which 500 rounds of ammunition were exchanged. An RCMP constable and a police dog were wounded and a second dog was killed. Barber was captured and Kraft killed himself.

When the RCMP asked for cancellation of Barber's parole, a national Parole Board representative in Vancouver refused and the reason given was "because Barber was not guilty until proven guilty". Fortunately, the judge before whom he was arraigned denied him bail. When Barber was being sentenced for this latest crime,—he received 17 years for attempted murder and robbery—the same parole representative spoke on his behalf and stated that he felt the man could still be rehabilitated. That is only one of several illustrations of the deeper concerns that beset the Solicitor General than simply increasing the number of members on the Parole Board.

There was a comparatively recent case in the city of Ottawa where an individual was out, I think, on temporary leave of absence or day parole. He had been serving a sentence for a violent crime. While he was out he applied for and was granted a LIP grant, the purpose being to help rehabilitate convicts who were coming out of prison. While he was undertaking this work in the city of Ottawa he was arrested for attempted murder. That is the kind of concern that most Canadians have with respect to the function of parole in this country. They feel that the government is placing undue emphasis on the rehabilitation factor set out in the Parole Act. There are three such factors and I cannot put my finger on them at the moment, but rehabilitation comes last on the list.

I am not speaking against the fact that rehabilitation is one of the criteria that should be considered when parole is granted, but I am voicing my opposition to placing that factor at the very top of the list and placing emphasis on it and it alone. There is a hard core of prisoners with whom extreme care must be taken before any parole is granted.

I am sure many members read the Globe and Mail editorial page this morning. Under the heading "Last word" appeared the following:

> Judge Douglas Latimer did his best to be emphatic in dealing with a man convicted of raping two 16-year old girls at knife point while on parole from a five-year prison sentence for raping a third girl. He sentenced him to life imprisonment plus 15 years and ordered that he serve the three years remaining on his first sentence.
>
> However, a National Parole Board spokesman said the man would be eligible to be considered for parole again in seven years—one of those little pronouncements that seem to suggest judges are often wasting their breath.
>
> When the Commons extended the trial ban on capital punishment it incorporated in the Criminal Code amendment a provision that full parole for a convicted murderer would be impossible until he has served between 10 and 20 years, depending on the sentence handed down by the judge. Day parole or temporary leave would be withheld mandatorily for the first seven years.
> The principle is sound. It should not be confined to cases of murder.

That is what Judge Mulligan and Judge Bewley were saying when they were highly critical of the actions of the Parole Board. Indeed, the board can make decisions without any reference to the convicting judge or any of the convicting court officials. It seems to me to be the prudent course for any parole policy that in all cases of parole of a person convicted of violent crime, there should be a mandatory provision requiring consultation with the judge who had an opportunity of seeing the prisoner at first hand. It used to be a policy of the National Parole Board that they would consult with the judge. Perhaps it is the tremendous case load that has caused the government to steer clear of that kind of policy. According to my information, in 1970, there were 5,923 parolees; in 1971, there were 4,965 and in the first six months of 1972, 1,938. That represents a 24 per cent drop in paroles granted at federal and provincial institutions over the same period in 1971.

I think it is a proper observation that the Parole Board's decisions are often made by academics, such as sociologists and criminologists, without consultation with the police or the courts. For that reason, I find the amendments brought in by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) of some attraction, but in a moment I will say why I and others cannot support them at this time. The result of the amendments would be the appointment of people who have some knowledge of human nature outside of academia. In any event, these academics and sociologists and criminologists, expert as they may be, have no consultation with the police or with the courts that cause the convict to be sent away.

Judge Bewley of British Columbia has stated that:

> we want the law changed to make the Parole Board an advisory body which would be required to consult the judge who passed the sentence before considering an application for parole. That would keep the power where it belongs . . .

I have a lot of time for that opinion and I think it would avoid a lot of the very curious errors that have been made in the past through the actions of the board.

Let us consider the case of Daniel Ceklay. In September, 1968 in the Georgia Hotel in Vancouver, Ceklay shot a man in full view of hotel patrons. On January 31, 1969, he was convicted of attempted murder and sentenced to 4½ years. In 1970, he was released on parole, just a year and a half after he entered the penitentiary. He had four previous convictions for crimes involving personal violence and threats. In September, 1970, a bare three months after he was paroled, he and an accomplice badly beat a man in a hospital bed, in full view of attending nurses. He was sentenced to ten years imprisonment.

● (1520)

The Canadian chiefs of police have argued that parole is a privilege rather than a right, and that society's rights must prevail over those of the individual. The police chiefs have also asked for closer co-operation between parole authorities and policemen. It must be extremely discouraging to law enforcement agencies of the country which have spent laborious hours, days, weeks or months accumulating evidence for putting behind bars criminals for ten, 15 or 20 years, to see those same individuals paroled at the earliest possible moment.

Since the Parole Board's creation in 1958, some 40,505 men and women have been given parole. Of those, as at December, 1972, 6,182 had violated parole regulations or committed offences after their release under supervision. The Parole Board's rate of failure has increased, from that date, from 8 per cent to 15.2 per cent. Notwithstanding the fact that paroles, in general, have been cut back the failure rate has increased even more. Mr. Choquette, Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec, criticized recently the administration of parole in this country.

Speaking, for the Quebec Minister of Justice, to the province's association of police chiefs and firemen, Mr. Robert Normand, Quebec Deputy Minister of Justice, outlined some of the province's main concerns with regard to the Canadian parole system. According to the deputy minister, the system is inadequate and needlessly open to criticism. His main comments on the system were these: first, a convicted person should not be granted the same benefit of reasonable doubt when seeking parole as was granted during the trial. Mr. Justice Mulligan of British Columbia also makes the same point. Second, the factors affecting the sentence decision should be reviewed when considering the parole of a convicted person. I submit that they should be reviewed. Third, unlike Great Britain, Canada does not conduct in depth consultations with the judges who sentenced the prisoner seeking parole. That point is being made from one end of the country to the other. The legislation still omits provision for that kind of mandatory consultation.

Also included in that speech was a comment on what is termed as an "intimidation" file, which was created as a result of recent unrest in Quebec. Where there is sufficient evidence, the file will be used by police to sentence those involved in subversive actions in the province. He concluded by saying that general police matters are presently being discussed by a ministerially appointed group, headed by Mr. Charles Cliche.

I have only a few more brief comments on the bill before us, sir. This bill provides for an increase of ten ad hoc members to the National Parole Board. This enlargement of the National Parole Board was promised by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in his June 1 statement to the House on the penitentiary system and the new regulations concerning parole and temporary absences. I have not seen these new regulations. I believe that the old regulations which are still appended to the Parole Act are not by any means comprehensive.

In his nine-point statment last June, the Solicitor General promised that legislation would be introduced at the earliest opportunity to amend the Parole Act, to permit the appointment of ten additional ad hoc members of the Parole Board. He said that these ten members will be assigned in teams of two to the five parole regions of Canada and will deal primarily with day parole and panel hearings in the institutions. This step will enable the National Parole Board to deal with a considerable backlog of cases that require detailed consideration, and simultaneously satisfy the new volume of decisions on day parole that will come before the members.

The Parole Board at present is composed of nine members and 34 officers. On May 1 of this year George Street, Chairman of the Parole Board, announced that the Parole Board was discontinuing its practice of face-to-face interviews with inmates because of the heavy case load of applicants. He explained this decision on a May 20 appearance on the television show "Question Period". He explained that interviews were being stopped at the present time "until we get more members and the Board is re-organized, because we just couldn't keep up." He noted that the number of cases reviewed in 14 years by the Board went from 5,000 to 17,000 every year. Then, as the Board started to travel, he said, "We got more and more applications and more and more work." One of the most essential processes in any parole system, sir, is that of face-to-face confrontation, face-to-face interview between the applicant for parole and the parole officer. I hope, at the minimum, that the increase of ten ad hoc members will permit a reimplementation of that kind of work.

Mr. Street also pointed out that half of the Board's work deals with provincial prisons. I say in passing that there has been a good deal of criticism directed at the Chairman of the Parole Board, as evidenced in committee hearings and as voiced by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). I, for one, have every confidence in the abilities of the Chairman of the Parole Board, Mr. George Street. Instead of dwelling constantly on failures and attributing these failures to one individual, perhaps we should be looking at some of the progressive and meaningful things Mr. Street has been doing in his administration of the Parole Board. I certainly want to say now that we emphatically endorse what he is doing. He is doing a good job.

I should like some questions to be answered. I do not suppose the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who is doubling for the Solicitor General, will be able to answer these questions. I wish to ask whether the increase of ten ad hoc members to the Board will permit reinstatement of interviews with inmates. Second, are there any plans to decentralize the Board by having panels stationed in different parts of the country so that institutions can be visited on a more frequent basis? Third, are there plans to increase the number of parole officers? I understand that there are some 34 such officers at the moment. Fourth, what will be the effect on the Parole Board of the new regulations regarding parole and temporary absences. Will the expanded board have some input into the system of temporary absences, which are not the concern of the Parole Act—

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask two more questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps with the consent of the House the hon. member might be allowed to complete his remarks, although his time has expired. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, my fifth question is this: has any consideration been given to restricting the Parole Board to federal institutions only? The corollary to that is, will some functions of the Parole Board be transferred to provincial parole boards, in cases where there are such boards, or are provinces to be encouraged to set up parole boards, in cases where there are not such boards, in order to decentralize this function. Lastly, when will the Huguesson report be released? If it recommends, as is widely rumoured, amalgamation of parole and temporary absence procedures under the National Parole Board, will the Board be able to handle the increased workload, given its already existing backlog?

Those are questions I should like answered before being asked to vote on this measure. Also, I must say at once that we cannot go along with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena, because inasmuch as he suggests that we ought to include on the Board two Indians or persons of native origin, or two persons to be drawn from those who have served some time in penitentiaries, or others, we should, as the minister pointed out, open the door to a wide range of people, who, it is suggested, might be left off. The female sex has been mentioned. I can imagine such a provision would open the door to insisting on their being given persons of French speaking origin and five persons of English speaking origin. Breaking down the composition of the board by race, sex and colour would be unworkable. I would be content to have the power to appoint members exercised as in the past in the hope we might get some people a little closer to the earth, and a little further from academia, making the practical decisions that are made by the board. I thank the House for extending my time.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will say only a few words on Bill C-191 because I do not intend to participate in a lawyer's marathon. I have always considered that lawyers were most interested in such problems as they give them another opportunity for fighting among themselves.

I am quite surprised at this bill being submitted now. We believe that the National Parole Board has enough members now. We are being presented Bill C-191 aimed at increasing by ten the number of members and moreover it is suggested that two Indians, perhaps also two Esquimos as well as two ex-convicts be appointed. But why not also appoint two life convicts to complete this group? This is done in the name of equity. As regards the number of members, I do not know whether the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) found that their number was not all proportional to the population and whether he wants to be fair. Even though the board would include two Indians, two ex-convicts and so on, it would not be proportional to the population and I fail to see what those extraordinary members have to do with parole.

Besides, I have always found that the board often neutralizes the law. Today, Mr. Speaker, I am merely speaking as the man in the street because I am not a lawyer. However, people are wondering why the public at large no longer believe in justice or law. It is that after having discussed a bill for weeks and months to try to adapt it to our society, we immediately note, as we have seen today, that lengthy discussions are held to create a parallel instrument which would neutralize the effects of that legislation.

When a bill is introduced to provide security for society, it seems that every effort is made to restrict it covertly in order to eliminate all security provisions which it included. This is why 90 per cent of the people today do not believe in justice or law, because when sensible legislation is passed, everyone says: Something will happen and the security provided under the legislation will be eliminated. It is precisely what is happening today.

With respect to parole, the board should, as the hon. member who spoke before me said, discuss the case of a prisoner before the judge who sentenced him. But now, even if a jury is most cautious and a judge sentences an individual to a term of one or two years, a board can destroy all that has been done, even without asking for permission to do it. That is becoming ridiculous. So one wonders if that is not a gimmick to give even more problems to lawyers and have them fight more.

Lawyers are probably not busy enough, and still do not make enough money. That is why they are looking for work. So they have a prisoner sentenced, and that costs a lot, but it costs even more to take him out of prison so they can have him back and thus make even more money.

I have attended coroners' inquests for 30 years. I saw so many of them that I lost all faith in them. I have seen so much politics involved in courts of justice that I now call them courts of injustice.

Instead of introducing further amendments to constantly destroy the present legislation, let us rather try to have it appreciated by restoring confidence within the population and respecting sentences handed down by the courts. If the government appointed judges, it must have had confidence in them. When you appoint a jury, it is because you trust it.

I do not agree with the present jury appointment process whereby all members of a jury must be acceptable to the accused. Too often the accused accepts the members of a jury because they are favourable to him. Furthermore, we do see terrible things. That is why we must absolutely get back to the act which says that if a judge has any authority, this authority must be respected and not destroyed by a parallel group that pulls all sorts of strings. By doing this, we shall restore confidence among the people. I repeat that the people have no more confidence in justice.

We must try and restore that confidence and not introduce amendments such as those. Therefore, we cannot approve this amendment.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it is not often I intervene in debates of this kind in connection with a bill sponsored by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) but there are some points I should like to make with regard to the two amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

First, may I say I do not support the amendments. It is not that I object to what the hon. member is trying to achieve. On the contrary, I am definitely of the opinion that men and women of experience whose origin is among our native peoples could make a very effective contribution to the parole system as members of the Parole Board. What I do find objectionable is that the hon. member is seeking to impose a quantitative requirement. He says that at least two members of the board should be persons of native origin. Upon the basis of this approach, we might well prescribe minimal representation by other groups which also have an interest in the operations of the Parole Board. I do not think it accomplishes anything to say there should be a minimum of certain categories of people on any board.

Similarly, I think it would be the most unjust thing in the world to include at least two persons with criminal records, people who had served time in an institution. We hope that the records of persons who are rehabilitated are forever extinct. There is provision in other legislation that pardons can be obtained so that a man's record can be expunged completely when he has paid his debt to society. As for the hon. member's suggestion, what a way to indicate to everyone concerned that two members of the board are people who have served time. It would be like asking them to wear a badge saying they had prison records. I cannot accept this. I realise that the hon. member wishes to see on the board persons who have had experience, as it were, on the other side of the table. Well, there may be something in that idea but there is no way in which it could be implemented by passing a law saying the board should include representatives of Canadians who had served time in correctional institutions.

It seems to me that the record of the Parole Board has been unjustly attacked all too often by the hon. member for Skeena and others. The board is having an extremely difficult time attempting to cope with a situation which is, in many instances, beyond its capacity, bearing in mind that Canadian law has a predilection for throwing people into jail. It is a national characteristic in this country. There is hardly a statute carrying a sanction in which the penalty section does not say: Throw him into jail! What is the result? Naturally the consequence is an overblown prison population.

It seems to me we would be far wiser, both from a social point of view and from a financial point of view, to prescribe that in the case of a first offence or, indeed, of a second and third offence in minor matters, culprits should be sentenced not to incarceration in an institution, but to a period of restricted conduct; they would have to report to a probation officer on a regular basis for a determined period. To my mind, it is a downright shame that so many of our statutes, so many of the offences under the Criminal Code should call for a prison sentence. No wonder so many young men and women continue in a life of crime. No wonder the percentage of recidivism is so high. I am no expert in prison administration or penology, but one has simply to be aware of what goes on, to read what appears in the press, and to listen to what is said in this House from time to time to know that this is not the answer.

It seems to me the Parole Board should be allowed wider scope, that increased personnel should be made available for its work. People who have done time in a corrective institution, and native people, certainly, because we know our prisons and penitentiaries contain an altogether disproportionate number of inmates who are of native origin, can certainly make a valuable contribution to its work. Why not a ticket of leave system, a system of probationary sentences whereby an individual must show by his own good conduct and prove by his good behaviour that he merits a return to the full freedoms of society. In this way he would be left outside an institution and not be subject to the very severe restrictions of a corrective institution where all kinds of negative influences are at work. Frankly, the man who can go straight after having served time in a prison or in a provincial jail does so in spite of the system, not because of the system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In these circumstances, I think the personal criticisms that are often made of the chairman of the Parole Board by the hon. member for Skeena, personal and bitter charges against the chairman, are totally without foundation. I am sure the chairman himself would be the first to say that the board is not perfect and that all their decisions are not correct. But they do what is humanly possible, and that is all we can ask them to do. The same could be said of the courts. If we impose upon them a greater burden than that, then let the individual who does so himself adopt that course of conduct. I think we would then hear a lot less criticism of individuals by others who are engaged in much less onerous tasks.

Having said this, let me turn to one area in which I believe there could be improvement. I refer to the degree of liaison between the Parole Board representatives in the various provinces and the local penal administration authorities in provincial jails. As the House knows, many times the Parole Board is quite prepared to entertain an application for day parole in certain cases.

I had a case a while back that was a combination of bureaucratic idiocy which translated itself into the thinking of the magistrate who sentenced a barber to some 60 days in jail, without the option of a fine, because the man had wrongfully taken benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act. He had entered into a scheme of repayment, the whole thing having been done with the connivance with his employer. The individual had a wife, two children and another on the way. The magistrate, in a spirit of zeal to try to enforce an unenforceable and unworkable Unemployment Insurance Act, sentenced the man to 60 days. His employer said that if day parole could be arranged they could keep the man's job open for him.

This man's wife got in touch with me and the whole thing was arranged without any difficulty with the Parole Board. She had seen the Parole Board to start with and the Parole Board worked very expeditiously on the matter. However, once the decision had been made by the Parole Board, it took three to four days for the provincial jail authorities in Edmonton to process the decision and to have the man transferred from the provincial jail to a detention centre where he would be granted day parole. He almost lost his job, notwithstanding the fact that as far as his employer could do so he was going to try to keep his employment open for him. The alternative as far as society was concerned was that the wife and two children would go on welfare and the man would have been without a job.

I think the original decision of a mandatory jail sentence under the Unemployment Insurance Act for an offence of wrongfully drawing benefits to the tune of just over $200 was totally wrong. It is ridiculous to send the man to jail for that. He is the type of individual who should be on probation, and it seems to me this is the sort of thing for which we should strive. In the city of Edmonton, the former RCMP divisional barracks or administrative offices have been taken over and turned into a day detention centre where parolees can report, some to carry on their jobs, some to attend school and university while technically serving the remainder of their sentences for relatively minor offences. These people are those who have already indicated they are well on the road to rehabilitation. I think this is the natural and progressive step forward.

I should like to see the duties and the scope of the Parole Board expanded, with less people being sent to jail and more being put on probation. As I indicated earlier in my remarks, I do not propose to support these two amendments.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has brought us face to face with the problem of discrimination. Most of his speeches in this House have usually been speeches about discrimination against Indians and other groups in our society, but now the hon. member for Skeena is himself practising discrimination. He is saying that we should not discriminate against the Indian, we should discriminate for the Indian. The reason I say that is that he is well aware of the evidence that has been set forth in the Ouimet report, and also in the report on the status of women, which detailed acts of discrimination against the Indian people across the country. As a result of this discrimination, there is a very high ratio of Indians in our prisons today and this is rather unfortunate.

We have before us Bill C-191, the provisions of which add ten additional ad hoc members to the Parole Board. The hon. member for Skeena has said that if we are going to do this, then in view of the high number of Indians in penitentiaries today we should impose an obligation on the Parole Board to have at least two of their number be representatives of our native Indian people in Canada. I rise to support that motion. I do so, first of all, because of the high incidence of Indian people in our penitentiaries, and secondly because of what the minister said in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The minister indicated that the kind of person who would be added to the board would be a retired judge, a person with experience in law enforcement, and probably a social worker. I do not think that is an appropriate mix to compose the Parole Board.

This is the reason the hon. member for Skeena has brought forth this motion. There has been no assurance by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) that he would include on the panel of members of the Parole Board people from different walks of life. It is very easy to get a professional person to serve on the Parole Board. Although he probably brings with him an academic training and experience in the field, he does not bring with him the day to day experience of the people with whom the board will be dealing.

One cannot help but support the main principle of the bill, which is to add ten additional ad hoc members to the board. But one does hope that the members who are appointed have that experience that would make them better suited to fill this position. Therefore, I think we owe the hon. member for Skeena some credit for bringing this question of discrimination to our attention. We have the Huguessen report on parole and the Senate carried out a study in this regard. It is now necessary that legislation be brought forward in the near future to implement the recommendations of this report, as well as the recommendations of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (1600)

In the meantime, we have a tremendous backlog of applications. It has been said by the minister that we must deal with these parole applications. He has also said that because of the volume members of the Parole Board have stopped personal interviews with prison inmates. They have also stopped some of their official hearings. All that is taking place at the moment is a review of the reports by members of the Parole Board. As suggested by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), with the addition of 10 members we will be able to reinstate prison interviews of inmates and parole committees that will travel to different institutions to hold hearings.

It was a great step forward when the Parole Board was split into small committees which visited penitentiaries. I think the hon. member for Skeena, having a tremendous background in respect of some of the problems inmates have not only within institutions but on the outside, and having broad and specific knowledge about discrimination against Indian people in the courts and within the institutions, as well as within the structure of our parole system, was right when he suggested there should be a change in the composition of the Parole Board and that there should be discrimination in favour of our Indians rather than against them. It is very easy for us to suggest this, but if we discriminate in favour of the native Indian people I am sure we will hear screams for discrimination in favour of other groups in our society, and perhaps even on the basis of sex.

This amendment provides the opportunity of dealing with discrimination imposed against our native people. I realize the need for a strong parole system, as paroles and probations are two necessary steps in integrating prisoners back into society. It should be pointed out, and I am sure the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) will do so, that there is a high recidivist rate in Canada. With this in mind, there is a duty on us all to make sure our probation and parole systems work, that our retraining programs are devised in a way that will ensure the rehabilitation of these citizens. Our Indian friends face a problem not faced by the rest of us, and I am sure that the hon. member for Skeena wanted to underline this fact when bringing these motions to our attention.

We now have an opportunity to help these people. The statistics respecting the number of Indian people in our penitentiaries are staggering. Another fact we must consider is that Indians do not, on many occasions, receive legal assistance. I would be quick to say there has been a tremendous improvement in our legal aid, but there is still a long way to go. By adopting this amendment in relation to Indian people, I believe we are taking a big step in the right direction.

The second motion, and I understand we are dealing with them both at the same time, deals with the appointment of former inmates to the Parole Board. I suggest this is a real challenge. I think there is a tendency for most people in our society to look at those who have been convicted of a criminal offence and sent to penitentiary in a different way than they look at others. It seems to me that people who have been convicted and have been in jail may have something to offer a parole board. These people have knowledge about the situation inside our penitentiaries, and I think they could make a contribution that cannot be made by sociologists, psychiatrists and psychologists. In this way our Parole Board can get first-hand knowledge about discrimination taking place not only in our penitentiaries but also in respect of our educational system and our system of employment.

What I have suggested would represent a step forward in our penitentiary system, but such a step requires a great deal of courage. Hon. members who have spoken today have displayed some reluctance to take such a great leap forward. During the capital punishment debate, many members professed to be against capital punishment but then proceeded to set forth certain exceptions. I think we must have courage in order to cope with this grave problem. By adding two members of the Indian race to the Parole Board, and by adding two members to that board who have had prison experience, I think we will move a long way toward coping with this problem. I hope we do not get tied up in an academic approach to this matter.

I trust that the Solicitor General will take to heart what has been suggested this afternoon, and I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will indicate that he thinks this is a good idea. These members would be ad hoc members of that board and subject to reappointment. This is not absolutely necessary, but I hope that hon. members will not be too restrictive or too discriminatory in respect of the appointment of these members to the board.

● (1610)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister wishes to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: A few questions have been asked of me by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). If hon. members were to agree, I could give him the answers now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister, who has already taken part in the debate, is to be given the opportunity to reply unanimous consent would be required. I could put the question now, or perhaps I could put it after other hon. members have spoken. Is it agreed that the minister have the right to reply now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will only take a few seconds, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for allowing me to put on the record answers to some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Yukon.

First of all, he asked whether the changes that are proposed in this bill will allow the reinstatement of face to face interviews. The answer is, yes. This would mean a significant improvement in the services provided by the board to the inmates. We certainly hope also that there will be a significant improvement in the assessment of the various cases that come before the board.

Second, the hon. member asked whether there would be decentralization by regional panels pursuant to this amendment. There again the answer is, yes. Our intention is to set up a series of two man teams who would sit in the various regions and who would be responsible for the inmate population in the territory to which they have been assigned. This again would allow for a much greater contact with the inmate population and would give opportunity for gaining greater personal knowledge of the cases by the members of the board who would be present in the various regions in the country.

The third question deals with increasing the number of parole officers. I am advised that there has been an increase this year but the problem, it is felt, really lies with the Parole Board itself, in the sense that the members of the board were overworked and, because of their limited number, they could not cope with the type of service they would have wished to provide to the inmate population. Also, there has been an increase in the number of probation officers, and although one can expect a normal increase, it is not planned that there should be a substantial addition to the number of probation officers in proportion to the number of people on the Parole Board.

Mr. Nielsen: How many are there?

Mr. Lalonde: I am afraid I could not give the hon. member the exact information. He will have to ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand).

So far as the effect of this proposal on temporary absences is concerned, this matter is being reviewed. At present it is under the jurisdiction of the penitentiary services. We hope that the Parole Board, in its new form, will be again in a better position to have personal contacts with both the inmates and the prison administrators in each region and will be in a better position to perform its duties.

The fourth point had to do with Parole Board activities, and the take-over by the provinces in this field. Discussions are taking place on this very subject at present, and I suspect that the Solicitor General is discussing this matter in Victoria this afternoon. Some provinces have shown interest in this respect, others have not. This subject will be on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference which is to take place between the 12th and 14th of December in Ottawa. So, we will have to await the results of that conference to find out exactly what the situation will be.

The last question concerned when we would release—

Mr. Nielsen: I was reading old notes.

Mr. Lalonde: The report was released on June 22. I could not believe my ears when I heard the hon. member and realized how well acquainted he was with what goes on in the House.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to clarify one point in his answer. He referred to two members of the Parole Board sitting in various regions. Will the decisions which they make at the local or regional level be binding on the whole board? I could put it more clearly. For example, a panel of board members sits at the Drumheller institute or at Prince Albert and makes a decision there. Does that decision need to be reviewed again in Ottawa? That is one of the problems. Everything will be moving smoothly if those decisions are binding on the board.

Mr. Lalonde: I am subject to correction in this respect but I remember having discussed this matter with my colleague and his intention, if I remember well, was that those decisions at the regional level would be final. However, the Solicitor General might contradict me when he comes back. So far as I can remember, the intention was to decentralize the operations of the board and to make sure that decisions are made by the people who know the inmates and who know the local conditions. However, once more I would like to stress that the Solicitor General might say that I was wrong and that I misinterpreted the situation.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that the addition of ad hoc members to this Parole Board will solve the concerns of the people of Canada. Indeed, the whole question of people being allowed out of the institutions only to commit further crimes and further damage to lives and to property, is of concern to all Canadians. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) mentioned the fact that a person on parole who comes from my area had twice committed the crime of rape. I want to mention another one to you. It is the case of a man on parole, again from my constituency, who was previously charged with drug offences. He was out on a nice weekend pass, and was again picked up for drug offences.

The problem is that too much effort has been expended by the Parole Board on allowing persons out on leave from the institution, persons who have clearly not demonstrated they are prepared to integrate into society. The people of this country are most concerned about the attitude that has been displayed by this government over the past years towards public safety. It is time they paid attention to the people of Canada and said: we will not allow people who have not reformed and who are still a menace to society to wander in the streets of this country. The thinking seems to be that since the rehabilitation, of the inmate may be helped by parole the rest of the people can take the consequences of the government's lack of ability to come to grips with social reality. Recently we had the example of a person released on a weekend pass who murdered the daughter of a prison guard.

How can any of us possibly be in favour of this kind of activity? If adding ten members to the Parole Board on an ad hoc basis will help, I compliment the minister for that addition. But unless there is a change in attitude in respect of allowing people their freedom prior to completion of their sentences, there will not be an improvement. This bill will only be a cover up for the problems that have occurred.

It may be that our prison system itself is totally at fault. Indeed, there has been more than ample evidence before a committee of this House which has yet to report that our prison system does little if anything to rehabilitate people, to reform people so that they can once again integrate into society. The number of persons who are allowed out of our institutions, either on parole or on completion of their sentences, and who return to those institutions again, and again and again, is overwhelming. Well over two-thirds of the people who serve time in our institutions return to serve time again. That is a disastrous situation.

It is high time the government introduced methods into the administration of our penal system that would rehabilitate people and thus enable them to integrate into society once more. It is high time the government took the clear stance that until the authorities were clearly satisfied that persons in institutions were properly able to integrate into society, those persons should stay in our institutions. Surely, the government has an obligation to protect those of us who perhaps need protection from the avarice, from the crime, from the brutality of some members of society who really do not fit into society.

I wish to refer to the amendments before us. They propose two things. They suggest that the Parole Board have at least two members representing the native culture of this country, and another two members who have had experience in the penal system on the other side of the fence. I commend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) for bringing these to the attention of the House. But I, too, can see all sorts of reasons why it would be most difficult to talk about people of various racial backgrounds, people of various social experiences and backgrounds.

Certainly, we need good people, but one of the deep concerns is that the people serving on the Parole Board, and the people suggested by the minister for these ad hoc jobs, are people who come from the goody-goody side of society. They are people who really do not know what it is all about. They have studied. They have gone to university, and they know something about penology. Maybe they were good police officers. Maybe they were fine lawyers at one time. But what do they know about sticking a knife in somebody's back, or how to make a zip gun in a penal institution, or how to sneak heroin, marijuana or cocaine into that institution? What do they know about imposing discipline in a penitentiary? They are goody-goodies, and they really cannot analyse whether a person has reformed and is able to go back into society. So, they go by the record. Some pretty competent people are criminals. Anyone who knows his way around knows how an institution works, knows how to fill in forms, knows the right things to say at the right time, and before the right officer.

It does not matter that the officer is not a member of the National Parole Board. The criminal can satisfy the guard on duty. He is a cute fellow, and he can persuade the parole Board that he should be allowed out. We need somebody who understands the criminal mind, who understands what is going on in an institution, who understands when someone is really ready for parole or just wants a night out on the town, or wants to return to work in his old profession. Making X number of judges or X number of former police officers or members of the Public service ad hoc members of the parole board is not good enough. The amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena stipulate that the board have a couple of native people on it, and a couple of ex-inmates. I suggest that the minister should not be bound to do either. Perhaps he should have more than two native people and more than two ex-inmates on the board. He should not be bound by exact numbers, but he certainly should have people on the board who are not just goody-goodies. The minister should appoint people who know what is going on in the institutions, who could get inside the prisoners, who would understand when they are ready for parole, and when they are rehabilitated.

We have all had experiences in our constituencies of people allowed out on parole or probation. Recently in my riding one young man was allowed out on parole. It was said that he was going to be able to get a job and do all sorts of wonderful things. He got out in June. He had 12 offers of jobs from the Manpower organization. He has not taken one of them. He finds he can live well on welfare. I do not know what else he does for a living, but I am sure he does not live only on welfare. When will he be back in the institution? He will be back probably as soon as the police catch him. Clearly, he was not ready for parole. Yet we let him out of the institution so that he can be put on welfare, so that he can engage in his other activity again, so that he can keep the police officers busy, keep another court busy, and provide work for more lawyers and legal aid people before he goes back to jail.

That is not rehabilitation. That is not the proper use of parole. But that is the kind of thing that has gone on and is going on. If adding ten new members to the Parole Board will help, that will be great. But first the board itself must look seriously at how it is operating, to see if it is going to get down to business, to see if, as suggested by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), it gets the judges report at the time of the original sentencing, to see it makes sure that there are proper in depth interviews, that there are good psychiatric reports, and helps to ensure the prison system is encouraging the proper attitude among inmates so that they are ready for work again.

But there is no point in having remission of sentence and putting a person out on the street early just because somebody thinks it might be a good idea, or somebody thinks that if he got out of the institution he would be able to rehabilitate himself. The chances are he will not. The chances are he will be back again. The chances are that the people of Canada will suffer from his crimes again. That is not the answer. What we need is a complete investigation, as a result of which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) will reorganize the whole system so that we do not have the problems we have had in the past and which continue.

Mr. Speaker, the whole question of putting people to work and getting them rehabilitated is the most important penal reform this country has to face. It can only face it with a Solicitor General and a government that is prepared to look the problem in the eye and not use parole as an easy method of emptying the prisons. We must have a government that is prepared to engage in a concentrated effort to make it possible for those who are serving time in our institutions to be reformed. We must have a government that is prepared to make it pretty clear that parole will not be used as a method of rehabilitation, but that parole will be used for those persons who have been rehabilitated. In the past, parole has been used as a method of rehabilitation and that is not the proper use of it. The penal system must be reorganized to accomplish the rehabilitation. The parole system is a system whereby you say to someone who has been rehabilitated that he can now go out because he can take part in society. It should not be used, however to push people out of jail in the hope that they will rehabilitate themselves in society.

Mr. Speaker, one of the finest institutions or groups that I have seen operating in the province of Ontario, a and one of the few good things to have come out of the LIP program, is an organization called "Operation Springboard" which was basically sponsored by the United Church of Canada. This is an organization that, through ex-convicts, attempts to relate to convicts presently in prison so that when and if they are paroled or discharged, they will be able to fit into society. It is an organization of ex-inmates working to help straighten out those persons now in prison. I have spoken to the Solicitor General about this organization and I know he is impressed with its record, but even that record is pretty bad. Members of the organization have told me confidentially that most of the people they work with cannot be helped yet most of them are given parole.

This brings me to the second amendment which refers to the use of ex-inmates as members of the National Parole Board on an ad hoc basis. Operation Springboard is an organization run by ex-inmates. Ex-inmates know what it is all about; they know the problems of rehabilitation and they know the numbers of persons allowed out who are very quickly brought back in again. The success of that organization could well be the beginnings of a model system whereby we might learn how to rehabilitate prisoners, by using ex-inmates.

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

I want to make it clear that I do not believe the National Parole Board should be used as a method of clearing the jails; rather it should be used as a method of allowing those persons who are clearly able and rehabilitated, to leave the prison system. We should not just allow people out because we think they might go straight. That is not the way the Parole Board worked in the past, and I ask that it not be the way the Board works in the future.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we are at the report stage of the bill which provides for an increase of ten ad hoc members on the National Parole Board, and we are considering two amendments moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), one of which reads:

> Two of the ad hoc members shall be persons who have served a period of time in a penitentiary under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada whether or not such persons, at the time of their appointment have been granted a parole.

I should like, first of all, to say a few words about a matter which seems to have been misunderstood by the media at times as well as by people considering the Parole Board. We should differentiate between the function of the Parole Board and the function of those persons in authority who are granting temporary releases. If we look at the record of the Parole Board under the chairmanship of George Street, I think we will find that they have done an excellent job. They try to weigh very carefully each case as it comes before them and, except for a few mistakes,—and nothing can be perfect when you are dealing with human beings and human behaviour, especially with this type of person—they have done excellent work. I should like to congratulate the minister for increasing the number of members on the board, but the number of officers should also be increased.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who is piloting this bill in the absence of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who is at a conference, if these two members of the Parole Board were meeting in different regions, whether they would have binding authority to make decisions on any persons coming before them for a hearing. I would hope that to be true because I think the most important aspect is not increasing the number of parole officers, but is to make certain that these hearings are held at the regional level. In this way, the various institutions in western Canada such as those in Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia would be served. I would hope that hearings could be held in those areas so that people could come before the board there rather than having a number of applications of deserving people delayed for a long time.

I know what the hon. member for Skeena is trying to do, and I am somewhat sympathetic to his amendment which would put two native Indian people on the Parole Board. Unfortunately, if you go to a police court you often find a line up of Indian people on drunk charges or some other minor charges. Because many of them do not have the money to pay fines, they find themselves incarcerated. I am sympathetic to the idea, but I am going to oppose it. That is not because I think it is a bad idea. I oppose the amendment on the ground that we should not specify certain groups of people the members of which are eligible to sit on the board. You might say that those serving on the board should be of Scottish origin, or of French origin; that there might be French-Canadians or English Canadians, or people whose origins were Ukranian or German. I cannot accept that. Surely, we are all Canadians. That is the very basis of the Bill of Rights and the hon. member's amendment would fly in the face of the Bill of Rights.

I hope that the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and his department will make sure that one or two board members are native people, that is, representatives of the first Canadians. Perhaps the matter could be remedied in that fashion. Discriminating, and saying that we should have two from this group and two from that would divide the nation, not into two parts but into many parts. I have never subscribed to that idea. We are all equal as Canadians, and all equally citizens of Canada. If the Bill of Rights means anything, it means that.

The hon. member, in his second amendment, suggests that there might be some sense in appointing to the board two people who have served time whether in federal or provincial institutions, as they may be better able to understand the situation with which the Parole Board would be dealing than some other people could understand it. I cannot accept that suggestion, either. The next step might be to say that the judges in our criminal courts should be men who have served some time in these institutions to which they are sentencing people appearing before them. I do not think anybody in his right mind would accept that theory. On the other hand, bearing in mind our advance in jurisprudence and understanding, the fact that someone has served time but has rehabilitated himself should be no bar to his serving as an officer of the Parole Board. If the authorities were to consider that suggestion, we might go some way towards what the hon. member for Skeena is trying to do. Nevertheless, I cannot accept what he is proposing. The best I can suggest is this: When new officers are to be appointed to the Parole Board, consideration might be given to some of the proposals the hon. member has made. On the other hand, I cannot, and I am sure the Canadian people cannot, accept the hon. member's suggestion with regard to the personnel making up the board.

In Canada, of course, we work under two programs, that of the Parole Board, and that of temporary releases. As I said at second reading, most failures in this area have occurred under the temporary release program. Although I did not vote for abolishing capital punishment, Parliament abolished that penalty. We should not slide back in this area. The minister has said that back-to-back absences and temporary releases would be abolished. In those cases involving people who have committed murder, cases in which capital punishment does not now apply, surely the whole board should decide whether that kind of person should be released.

In this regard I need only refer to the Head case. That man committed a second murder while out on temporary absence in British Columbia. I also refer to the Swearngen case. He was sentenced for murder in 1963. He was released for a Christmas holiday, and duplicated the crime for which he had been originally sentenced. I mention merely these two examples; there are dozens of other examples. I hope that when the Solicitor General sets up the enlarged board, and brings in rules and regulations under the new act, he will specify that the whole board must sit in review before anyone who has been sentenced to life is allowed to go free, without supervision. Otherwise, we will run into the same difficulties we experienced with the temporary release program.

The Globe and Mail took the skin off George Street for certain mistakes he is alleged to have made. Those mistakes had nothing to do with the Parole Board; they had to do with the temporary release program, over which the Parole Board has no jurisdiction whatsoever. The Parole Board was given a black eye for those things which had happened under the previous solicitor general, who practically ruined the way in which the system had been operating for a number of years.

We have in Canada approximately 9,000 people in federal penitentiaries. In 1962-63, it cost, on average, $3,380 to keep one person in prison, for a total cost of $23.9 million. In 1971-72, the cost per inmate was $9,325, almost double the 1962 cost, for a total national bill of $79.8 million. It has been suggested that in Canada more people, proportionately, are in federal and provincial institutions than in any other nation. I, therefore, support progressive and, indeed, aggressive parole programs under which inmates can be released from various institutions in order that they may rehabilitate themselves and join the stream of society.

On the other hand, in cases where people have been convicted of violent crimes, there should be no release from an institution until there has been a hearing by the full parole board, backed by reports of psychiatrists, psychologists and all those whose work is necessary if an adequate decision is to be made. That should be done before violent criminals are allowed to return to the street, to the main stream of society.

Having said that, I do not think there is much more I can say about the hon. member's proposals. As I said on second reading, this bill is a move in the right direction. Nevertheless, I must oppose the amendment, for reasons which I mentioned in my opening remarks.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to this debate and heartily agree with some of the suggestions and comments which have been made. I also disagree with some other aspects of this debate. We are dealing with something that is of extreme concern to all people of this country. I think, as well, that we are dealing with an issue that is not easy of solution. The answer will be difficult to arrive at. In the final analysis, I think we will find that there are many differences which will still be unresolved at the conclusion of the debate. I am thinking particularly of the parole system.

In thinking of parole, I am also reminded of other problems which have arisen in connection with the administration of justice. Recently, a feeling of insecurity has been created in this country as a result of what happened under certain programs involving penal reform and the administration of justice. The people have felt in some cases, while recognizing the problems involved, that there has not been adequate concern or recognition of the importance of the safety of the citizens of Canada.

The question we are considering today poses a great many problems. I agree that, in many respects, the Parole Board has done an admirable job; nevertheless, I am not going to join those who have given the board bouquets, even though there are many instances in which the board's decisions have been justified. I can think of many instances in which the board's decisions have not been wise. In many respects, it has completely overlooked some fundamental problems and not paid sufficient attention to the activities of those to whom it is extending parole not for the first time, but for the second time, or, perhaps, the third time.

● (1650)

In a recent debate the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) referred to the fact that you can pass out bouquets and perhaps reserve some judgment. He stated the situation is similar to a doctor saying he has saved two thirds of his patients, so don't blame him for the other third who became worse. In some respects, the Parole Board has functioned adequately. There are other cases which deserve some attention and concern on the part of those who are in authority. If we were dealing with something less than human life or the lives of many humans, perhaps the government would be justified in having a permissive attitude towards our policies governing social reform, the administration of justice, the granting of bail, parole and so on. The fact is, the security and protection of society is very much at stake.

The incidents revealing errors made by the parole board and those engaged in the granting of temporary absences, involve human life in general. I do not think that we can somehow say we are going to counterbalance these errors by some successes that have been achieved. The parole board ought to give serious consideration to its activities, and certainly the minister concerned ought to pay attention to some of the criticisms that will be and have been levelled during this debate. There have been violations of parole by inmates. Crimes have been committed by those who have been let out. This has horrified Canadians in various communities. In addition, great harm, and in some cases death, has resulted for many Canadian citizens. Perhaps we should not blame the Parole Board altogether because they have to rely upon professional advice in assessing the various cases.

Our attention was drawn to a situation that was brought to light by a story in the June 4, 1973 issue of Newsweek. The reference was to an incident in the United States, but it can also be considered in light of certain situations that exist in Canada. The article relates how a young boy 15 years of age, who was mad at the world, killed his grandparents. I want to point out the possibility of error, even on the part of professional men. I quote from the article:

> Two court-appointed psychiatrists examined Kemper and declared him no danger to society. "He has made an excellent response to the years of treatment," one of them report. "I see no psychiatric reason to consider him a threat to himself or any other member of society." . . .
> But the psychiatrists were to be proved tragically wrong.

The result was that he went out and engaged in further criminal activities. Most psychiatrists admit the problem is almost unsolvable because specialists have no way of predicting anti-social behaviour. I again quote from the article:

> Usually, court-appointed psychiatrists rely entirely on an interview, often cursory and seldom lasting more than an hour. And if the patient is clever enough, he can deceive the examiner.

Dr. Bernard Diamond of the University of California, a founder of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law and one of the nation's outstanding forensic psychiatrists stated:

> "If a person lies or restricts his response, it may be impossible to determine whether he is mentally ill."

Therefore, we do recognize the problems of those who are responsible for our parole system. I do not think it is altogether a determined attitude to clean out our penal institutions, although some may have that attitude. I certainly do not agree with it. I would like to see our penal institutions without any inmates, but I would not like to see them empty at the expense of the safety and security of the community. Therefore, I would express continuing concern over the administration of justice and the granting of parole in our society.

As I mentioned before, we have tied in with the problem of the parole system the granting of temporary releases or the pass system. Even though these programs are administered by different agencies, we must recognize that they are part of a situation that has created confusion, uncertainty and fear, as well as undermining the credibility of our system. In addition, these incidents have brought about a situation in which the implementation of a sensible and sane penal reform program faces a great deal of opposition. This is one of the most unfortunate aspects of the whole problem.

It is all very well to try to get people out and see them rehabilitated. I believe we ought to bend our efforts in that direction. However, we must recognize that if that is done without proper consideration and care, those who are released will continue to perpetrate acts of violence and infringement of the law. This will not encourage society in general to say this is a good program and should be continued. They will say it is not working. They will back away and say they do not want anything to do with it. The poor results of the program were dangerous for the minister's predecessor, who stated that rehabilitation was going to take precedence over the safety of individuals. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) saw fit to move that gentlemen to another position. Questions are now being raised as to whether he is adequate for that new portfolio. Perhaps the situation we have today is dependent upon the particular course that was established during the administration of the former minister. The present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is taking a more wholesome attitude with regard to this matter. I regret that he is not able to be here. I know he is engaged in activities in other parts of the country and I do not say anything about that. However, I do regret that he is not able to be with us today.

The minister must give a great deal of attention and consideration to the citizens of this nation. He must realize that if he is going to expect the co-operation and assistance of communities and individuals in rehabilitating or assisting to rehabilitate these people have to follow the law. It must be a very carefully planned and supervised type of operation and program. We realize the present bill is somewhat limited, but it does open up the whole matter. It appears to me that adding members of the Parole Board will not be effective in meeting the major problems which confront the board at the present time, although it may lead to some improvement. The minister said he was studying the Huguessen report and would be introducing legislation later to implement some of its recommendations. It seems to me that for the present at least, he is not prepared to go very far in carrying out those proposals. We await further legislation which will disclose his own thinking with regard to what is contained in that report.

Two amendments have been proposed. One would require that two of the additional members of the board would be from the native peoples. I have a great deal of sympathy with the motivation which prompted the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) to put forward this amendment. We read from time to time of the high percentage of native people who run afoul of the law for various reasons and find themselves behind prison bars, so this is a matter of real concern. Perhaps there is some ground for feeling that white people cannot understand the thinking of the native people and, on the basis of the treatment accorded to the native people down through the years, that discrimination may be shown against them by the Parole Board in the absence of native representation. Nevertheless, I agree with other members who have argued that to accept the amendment would be to create a precedent which would be unwise, since in the establishment of other boards and commission in the future we might find ourselves resorting to a similar operation although it would be extremely difficult for every facet of our community or society to be represented on these boards. Thus, I do not think the course recommended by the hon. member would be a wise one to follow.

His second proposal was that the board should be comprised of two members who had been, in a phrase used by my hon. friend from Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn), "on the other side of the fence." I should not like to see this recommendation find expression in the act itself. I am reminded of a situation which arose when an Opportunities for Youth grant was given in respect of a study of the drug situation. Some of those who conducted the study were drug addicts and, of course, they recommended that drugs be freely available. That, of course, was to be expected in the circumstances. I do not think anything should be written into the law along the lines suggested by the hon. member, even though I believe such people as he mentioned should not be barred from participating in the work of the board in certain circumstances.

A number of examples of violation of parole on the part of various individuals have been brought to our attention today. I shall not take up any time by referring to such cases, but I wish to conclude by saying that though offenders should be given every opportunity to rehabilitate themselves we must do everything possible to ensure that those who have committed violent crimes, especially, do not return to become a danger to society.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to join my colleagues on both sides of the House to applaud this amendment to the Parole Act. I support the principle of this bill without qualification, Mr. Speaker, because it is long overdue. It is so long overdue that I feel compelled, before continuing with my comments on the measure, to ask a question: Why has it taken the government so long to discover that the Parole Act no longer serves the purpose for which it was designed?

At the present time, the Parole Board is based in Ottawa and it is hopelessly understaffed. This has been known for a very long time. We did not need a royal commission or a task force to tell us that. It has been common knowledge for a long time that the Parole Board has abandoned the practice of interviewing prisoners face-to-face because it could not keep up with the backlog of requests for parole hearings. Because of understaffing and because of the growing backlog of requests for hearings, the board has been forced, in many cases, to grant parole on the basis of incomplete information. It was inevitable that the board would hesitate in some cases to grant paroles which were justified, and it was also inevitable that some of the paroles which were granted would prove to be bad risks. The evidence of this can be seen in the extremely high rate of parole violations. It is a sad fact that a great many parolees in the past two or three years have committed serious crimes such as rape and murder after being paroled.

While I support this amendment, and while I applaud any move which would increase the number of members and officers of the Parole Board, I must confess I have some reservations about how effective the measure would be. I have witnessed too often the way in which the government uses bona fide situations such as this for partisan political purposes. No safeguards are built into the bill to prevent the government from using it as an opportunity to reward party hacks and camp followers. Parliament Hill and many of the government agencies are crawling with defeated members of the Liberal caucus in the last parliament, and I am apprehensive that the bill before us will be used to look after those who have not yet been suitably rewarded.

In this connection, I must ask whether the procedures and practices followed in the past by the Parole Board will still govern the new, enlarged board. There is a demonstrated need here for a clean sweep. The entire parole system has fallen into disrepute in the past few years and the dedicated, competent members of the board are under the same cloud as those who are disinterested and incompetent, those who, in fact, are members because of certain services rendered at some other time and in some other capacity. It will not be enough just to swell the ranks of the Parole Board. We must ensure that the Board is given new guidelines, terms of reference which are in line with present day situations and needs. I would like to see the board granted sufficient flexibility to enable it to deal with applicants on a personal basis, but in view of the failure of the parole system in the last couple of years, especially with regard to leaves of absence of prisoners, this would have to be approached with great caution.

There are many aspects of the parole system that must be reviewed, Mr. Speaker. I have no doubt we will find that our basic approach to parole and rehabilitation needs updating. While I have been an outspoken critic of the sleazy and haphazard administration of the Canadian penitentiary system and of our parole system, this is not to say that I have no feeling for the plight of the offenders and prisoners in our society. I recently spent some time in the B.C. Penitentiary as a visitor, and I am just as aware as anyone else that these are people that we are dealing with, and that they must be treated humanely and with a view to returning them to society when their debt has been paid. However, I feel perfectly justified in criticizing this government when I look at the record. There is no doubt whatever that in many cases the sympathy of this government is misplaced when you examine its policies and some of the bills that have been tabled to deal with the problem of violence in our society.

I have some sympathy for the unfortunate people who decide to follow a life of crime and who resort to violence to achieve their ends. However, the weight of my sympathy and concern is for the unfortunate victims of criminal acts. It is very difficult for me to muster up any sympathy for a prisoner in one of our prisons who, having been given a leave of absence on humanitarian grounds, commits murder upon an innocent Canadian citizen. This is happening over and over again today under the present prison administration and the present Parole Board administration. I maintain that it is extremely difficult for even a member of parliament to remain purely objective and to think about these acts humanely.

An amendment to the government's capital punishment bill, passed in the last few weeks, allows a judge to specify that a convicted murderer must serve from 10 to 20 years of a life sentence before becoming eligible for parole. This is an improvement over the old policy whereby the same murderer could qualify after serving only seven years. Unfortunately, this provision applies only to a person convicted of murder. This provision should have been extended to include other types of crime, where the perpetrator could reasonably be considered unworthy of sympathy or consideration. I refer my colleagues to the case of a young man who was recently sentenced to five years in prison for rape. While on parole from his sentence he raped two 16 year old girls, and was sentenced to life imprisonment, plus 15 years. This man will be eligible to apply for parole in seven years.

I said earlier that I would like to see the Parole Board function under rules and regulations that are flexible enough to allow them to assess each application for parole on its own merits, and the case of the rapist I just mentioned is certainly a case in point. If it were possible to keep this man from committing further crimes, then I am sure that anyone would be in favour of putting him back on the street. But the only guarantee that we have right now is that he remain in custody. If, on the other hand, I thought that a future Parole Board would turn this man out on society after he had served the seven-year minimum, then I would do everything possible to see that the Parole Board was denied this authority.

In another case that I am about to cite, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether or not the Parole Board has in fact exceeded its authority. If not, and if the board can overrule a sentence imposed by a judge, then this is certainly the time and place to re-examine the terms of reference of the board and the regulations under which the board functions. I refer to the case of a Hamilton judge who recently sentenced a youth to a prison term, plus ten strokes of the lash, for committing a brutal and vicious assault on a 95 year old man. After the sentencing the youth directed a torrent of verbal abuse at the judge, mouthing obscenities as to what the judge could do with the sentence. The Parole Board afterwards wiped out the part of the sentence, imposing lashes and in my view also wiped out the deterrent value of the sentence.

What is the point of giving a judge the authority to pass sentence on a convicted offender if a Parole Board is granted even higher authority? I would be interested in knowing just what procedure the Parole Board was required to follow in wiping out that sentence. If this is a blanket authority, then I will call for a review of that and other levels of Parole Board authority. We have a provision for appeal in our judicial system, and it sets our system apart from most others in the world. If there had been any feeling on the part of the convicted youth that his sentence was too harsh, then he could have appealed the sentence, using counsel provided by the courts. This is the proper way to contest or protest a decision of a judge; the authority to overrule a judicial decision should not be vested in a quasi-judicial officer.

We are being asked to consider an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), a member who enjoys my esteem and my high regard. That hon. member proposes that the enlarged Parole Board be composed of at least two persons of native Indian origin as ad hoc members. He further proposes that two of the ad hoc members should be persons who have served a term in a prison administered by the federal government. I am aware of the purpose of the hon. member's proposed amendments, and I would like to say that I am sympathetic to both amendments. However, I would be apprehensive about making appointments to the board on those recommendations. In the first place, there is the danger that such appointments would destroy or inhibit the objectivity of the board's assessments and decisions, and we should make every effort to ensure that its objectivity is not inhibited or even put in question. My own view is that the board should be constituted in such a way that it will be required to seek the advice and counsel of people of the same native group wherever practicable, but only in cases where Indians or Eskimos are involved. We would tend to isolate people by race or for a multitude of other reasons if we carried this idea to its extremes; what we are really after is a fair and objective assessment of an individual's ability to live in our society and accept its responsibilities.

As I have stated before, I want to see every effort made to prevent anyone from using the Parole Board for partisan political purposes. I noted in a speech on this subject on May 15 of this year that the present Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) inherited an awful mess from his predecessor, and a large part of it stemmed from the fact that political appointments to important positions in the penitentiary system destroyed its efficiency and undermined the morale of career employees in the system. We have seen enough of this type of appointment in the federal public service, and I do not want to see any more of it in the vitally important parole system. I would not like the Solicitor General to think that I came here today only to criticize and complain about the way he is trying to do a difficult job. My purpose is neither to bury nor to praise him, and just to show that I do have a warm spot in my heart for the minister I would like to conclude by throwing him a bouquet.

I am in wholehearted agreement with his proposal to restructure the parole service on a regional basis, and to attempt to restore the practice of having parole officers interview applicants on a face-to-face basis. I might recommend also that the parole service attempt to get some input from family members, police officials who are knowledgeable about the applicants, and any other sources of useful background data. In conclusion, may I say that this return to a personal approach to assessment of parole applicants is the best move that has so far been proposed. But I wonder if we are realistic in proposing the addition of only ten more members to the board. Will this be enough to allow the board to clear up the enormous backlog in applications for parole and for temporary absences, and at the same time do justice to the new applications that will be forthcoming?

This is a question that we should be answering now rather than later, along with such questions as whether the National Parole Board should also be dealing with provincial prisoners, whether the board should be empowered to overturn sentences by a court, and whether or not the board should try to cope with the separate problems of temporary absences as well as parole of sentence. These should be worked out in more detail. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that the minister will have answers ready for my questions, as well as other questions that are being asked today.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment as follows: The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher)—inquiry of the ministry; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—external affairs—Garrison dam diversion, North Dakota—further action by Canadian government—consideration by International Joint Commission; and the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Public Service—amount of increases offered by government to those at lower levels.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and motions Nos. 1 and 2.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I will try to do my part to keep these motions before the House until the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) arrives to support them. I am not that favourably disposed to his amendments, but I think he should be given an opportunity to support them if at all possible. The purport of the hon. member's amendments is to establish a quota system in respect of appointments to our National Parole Board.

At the outset, I must say that I am opposed to artificial quotas in respect of any judicial board or, for that matter, any other organization associated with the day to day activities of our penal system. The best example of the application of a quota system to an organization, and how it can hurt such an operation, is to be found in the experience of the Democratic party in the United States in 1972. Following the 1968 national convention of that party in the city of Chicago, a so-called group of reformers captured control and decided to open participation in that party to a number of formerly outside groups. This covered black people, young people, females and all sorts of others who were from that point on recognized as official working members. Then, we saw what happened in 1972 when that very effective compaigner, Senator George S. McGovern, was nominated as the presidential candidate. I think it is well recognized that the operations of that so-called reform party were not too effective.

I think we should have some second thoughts in respect of the imposition of quotas as related to our native people and ex-convicts. This is a bad principle, and I do not think it could fail but to have a bad result on the parole system of this country. I have no objection to the appointment of two people of native origin to our National Parole Board, but surely the criterion to be followed should relate to the qualifications, educational or otherwise, of the people involved. Surely this should be the first consideration in respect of whether individuals should be appointed to this national board, regardless of their ethnic background. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) should certainly select qualified people for appointment to this board, and I am sure there are many people available who would serve with effectiveness.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to the work done by the Chairman, Mr. George Street. I should like to associate myself with the remarks of that hon. member. Mr. Street has been a very good chairman, and, with the exception of one or two decisions made by that parole board, we have seen an excellent job of administration. When considering the appointment of people to this board, we must consider the people with whom they will be dealing. The prison population of this country has been growing by leaps and bounds and, unfortunately, a significant proportion of that population is made up of Indians.

The Drumheller Institution lies within the constituency I represent. We have heard examples of what takes place in institutions from other hon. members of this House. Let me say that I am pleased to be able to report that the Drumheller Institution has not given the Solicitor General or law enforcement officers in this country very much trouble. Surely, this institution could be cited as an example of a well-run and effective penal reform institution in Canada. A significant number of Indians are imprisoned in this institution. I feel that these Indian people should have representation on our National Parole Board, and I would like to hear the views of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in this regard. I think the efforts of our Parole Board could be improved by such representation. This would certainly be true of the population of the Drumheller Institution, and I am sure the same would apply to the Prince Albert penitentiary and other penitentiaries in this country.

Having regard to the appointment of convicts or ex-convicts on the Parole Board, I do not adopt the same point of view expressed by other hon. members because this is a little too close to the Alice in Wonderland approach. That approach is quite common in respect of some problems dealt with by members in this House, but I think it is unacceptable. Apart from the principle of tokenism, I do not think convicts or ex-convicts have demonstrated an ability to serve as effective members of the Parole Board. I do not intend to belabour that suggestion, but I must say I have no sympathy toward this amendment of the hon. member for Skeena.

I think it is useful at this stage to ask a question or two about what is happening in our society to produce such a rapid increase in the prison population. We find it going up and up. We also find that the cost of maintaining prisoners in these institutions is rising at an ever-increasing rate. We find, as well, that there are people who feel that the treatment meted out at these institutions is so desirable that on occasion they have made special efforts to be caught after committing an offence, in order that they may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment; particularly during the winter months in certain parts of our country.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member agree?

Mr. Schumacher: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): In view of the fact that the hon. member represents the riding in which Drumheller penitentiary is located, I wonder if he could give the House some idea of the percentage of Indians and Metis who now occupy the cells in that penitentiary?

Mr. Schumacher: I believe it is about 25 per cent, which is a significant number when you consider that there are between 450 and 500 inmates in that penitentiary.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Danson: Did you rehearse this, Jack?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member agree?

Mr. Schumacher: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): In view of the fact that 25 per cent of the inmates in the Drumheller penitentiary are Indians or Metis, and that most of the inmates in that penitentiary come from what may be called the southern half of Alberta—and also from other parts of Alberta—could the hon. member give the House an idea as to the percentage of the population of Alberta that is Indian or Metis?

Mr. Schumacher: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. member that information. Perhaps he will be able to dredge it up before he participates in the debate. In fact, I do not know whether the answer to his question can be given accurately, because the Drumheller institution, as I noted before, is an unusual one. It does not create many problems for the penitentiary service or for the Solicitor General. Also, it is unusual in the fact that it does not draw its population from one particular part of the country. Although located in Alberta, it is populated by inmates who come from the four western provinces primarily, and it is mainly reserved for young offenders who have committed their first offence. So I do not know whether that percentage could be applied with relevance to the population of Alberta.

In any event, we now have a problem with the prison population. I think that every hon. member who has any connection with penal institutions knows that far too many people are coming in and there is far too high a rate of recidivism. The situation reached a critical stage at Drumheller in the past summer and a number of mobile houses, or modular type buildings, have had to be erected outside the fence of the Drumheller institution. There are now 50 or more inmates who reside outside the institution's fence. The fact is that the prisoners at that institution are better behaved than others and they do not present much of a security problem. I do not know whether it says anything for the quality of everyday life at that institution when you realize that the inmates do not have to be behind the fence, let alone behind bars, in order to stay there.

I think the House would be better employed trying to attack some of the root problems instead of trying to streamline the parole procedures to see whether we cannot get more people out quicker, particularly in view of the rising population in such institutions. It is interesting to note that the Solicitor General is at present attending a federal-provincial conference on the subject. I believe there will be a continuation of that conference, or another federal-provincial conference held here in Ottawa next week, and it will be interesting to see if any solutions are brought forth at those meetings.

Reference was made in the debate this afternoon to a possible connection between the sentencing judge and the Parole Board. I think there has not been enough communication between the judge who sentences a prisoner to a term of imprisonment and the people who decide whether they should let the inmate out before the term of his imprisonment has expired. I am happy to see that the Huguessen report makes reference to that matter, and that to some extent the amendments to the Parole Act implement that report.

May I say, in conclusion, that I will await the next stage of this bill before participating further.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), I am horrified by the decision of the House to group together amendments Nos. 1 and 2. Although I have filed a number of amendments at the report stage of various bills, I have always been cautious in the way I have grouped them. Although I do not want to cast any aspersions upon those who did the grouping, being the member who represents the constituency of Crowfoot, and in that way directly or indirectly representing that great Indian chief, Chief Crowfoot, I cannot allow the present grouping to be accepted without comment.

What the House has done—inadvertently, I might add—is to group one amendment proposing that two native people be appointed to the Parole Board with another amendment that two persons who have served a period of time in a penitentiary be appointed to the Parole Board. In grouping those amendments we are saying, in essence, to the native and Indian people of Canada that an Indian or a native person is equal to one person in jail, whether or not that Indian or native person has committed any wrong or has been apprehended or sentenced by a court. Such an Indian or native person is being assumed equal to a convicted person. I will not be party to such grouping and I hope that a great many members of the House will not be party to it either.

There is one thing we Canadians must acknowledge—that the Indian and the Eskimo are the first citizens of Canada. Whether you like it or not, Mr. Speaker, or whether anybody else in this House likes, it is a fact beyond changing by the present white man who rules Canada, beyond changing by the past white man who ruled Canada, and beyond changing by the white man who will continue to rule Canada in the years ahead. We cannot erase that fact.

As I look around the world today, I see that in many countries the first citizens are coming into their own. Just look at South Africa. Look at any other country you want to name. The original inhabitants are coming into their own. But what are we doing in this parliament? We are creating a sin among sins, one of the greatest sins: we are saying that these people in our penitentiaries are the same as people already serving a sentence. Mr. Speaker, many Indians, many native people feel they are serving a life sentence within a white man's world.

When I looked at these two amendments and saw they were grouped together, I thought a sin had been committed by this House. I could not allow it to go unnoticed. To me it is an important matter. First of all, I represent the majority of the people whom Chief Crowfoot represented when Canada became a nation. I have always said to myself that I must have a special part in my heart for these people. They are the ones who brought about peace in western Canada. Chief Crowfoot said, "I must recognize that there shall be no continuance of this continual strife between the white man and the Indian. There shall be peace as long as the waters flow, the grass grows green and the sun shines." Of course, I am paraphrasing what he said in his memorable statements in 1878.

As a representative of that group of Indians, I too must recognize the part that Chief Crowfoot played. On coming to Ottawa, representing the constituency of Crowfoot, one of the first things I did was to write a letter to the Blackfoot tribe at Gleichen, Alberta. In it I said that I now represented the tribe of Chief Crowfoot. I wrote that I would do my best to believe what he believed in, in 1878; that there should be peace between the white man and the Indian, and that the Indian's rights and beliefs should be respected. I wrote that I would dearly like to have a picture of Chief Crowfoot hanging in my parliamentary office as long as I represented them. I received a very nice reply from the secretary of the Crowfoot band in which he said it was indeed a pleasure to send a picture of Chief Crowfoot to hang in the parliament buildings in Ottawa, that during his lifetime Chief Crowfoot had visited Ottawa on many occasions, and they hoped that with the return of his picture his beliefs would return with it.

I had no intention to speak on this bill dealing with the Parole Board until I saw that these two amendments were grouped together. I thought this was done out of careless disregard for the Indian people. I asked myself, why is it that 25 per cent or more of the inmates in our jails and penitentiaries today are Indians and native peoples? What have we done wrong as a society? Have we callously disregarded their beliefs, their philosophy and their concept of life? Have we told them, "If you don't adhere to our wishes and our desires, we have no alternative but to send you to jail"? The grouping together of these two amendments reinforces my belief that this is what the white man has said to himself on many occasions and in numerous courts. We have said, "We cannot understand your ways, your beliefs. We care not for your concept of life. If you don't adhere to ours, we will send you to jail." That is what we have said time and time again. That is why in Drumheller penitentiary over 25 per cent of the inmates are native people, as pointed out by the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) in reply to my question.

There are some native people in this House, Mr. Speaker. To my knowledge they have not spoken on these amendments. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to hear from them their concepts and views. But I say to everyone in this House who is not a native person, let us examine where we have gone wrong. What have we done, not just recently but over a period of 50 or 75 years?

I have just finished reading a tremendously interesting book, "Across the Medicine Line," by C. F. Turner. In this book he describes the problems of the native people 100 years ago. He writes about Chief Sitting Bull, how he fled the terrible Americans and came to live in Canada for several years. It is a recently published book and can be obtained in the parliamentary library. The author tells us the great man that Chief Sitting Bull was. He was a man among men. All the sub-chiefs under Sitting Bull were men among men in those days. I say to hon. members of this House, look around you; how many prominent men do you see in today's Indian race? Is it the fault of the Indians? No, it is because the white man has failed to understand them; in fact, has demonstrated an expressed unwillingness to understand them. He has not cared; he has shown no desire, no love, no appreciation of Canada's first citizens. We have run roughshod over our first citizens. We have said they are "no accounts." On the white man's conscience must rest that responsibility. He has failed to hear, to listen and to pay attention to their problems.

Of course, we have not been as bad as the Americans. We can proudly say that we have not created a Wounded Knee in Canada—yet. But just look at the James Bay project. The courts have played havoc with the treaty of 1812 which the native people up there signed. The courts have played havoc with the conscience, the heart, the beliefs and the soul of those native people. True, the Supreme Court is hearing that case today; but we in this House have allowed the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to rise in his place and plead that he understands the Indians and encourages them in their fight.

This government has the right to move in and disallow, if necessary, any provincial legislation which it feels is wrong or detrimental to the well-being of Canada and its future. If this House so desired, it could have moved in and dealt with the question of James Bay and the lands involved in the area. It could have revoked the provincial legislation that brought about that problem. But it chose not to do so.

Speaking to the bill before us, Mr. Speaker, I have no harmful thoughts with regard to the chairman of the National Parole Board. He has been in office at a very difficult time because this House has failed to lay down the criteria by which he could administer the Parole Act. I do not have time to go into the whole concept of capital punishment versus its abolition. However, I do say that we have placed the chairman of the National Parole Board in a very difficult position during these past years, because we have failed to lay down the concepts that he must adhere to and he has had to try to judge the mood of the people on his own. He has tried to judge what is best for people who have run afoul of the law and who perhaps can be released.

The only part of this bill that I wish to speak to is the first amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Skeena which suggests that two of the ten ad hoc members of the Parole Board should be native people. How can I disagree with that, Mr. Speaker, when I sit here in Chief Crowfoot's name? Nearly a hundred years ago he said that there shall be peace as long as the rivers flow, the grass grows green and the sun shines. Well, Mr. Speaker, the rivers are running, although more polluted, the sun is shining and the grass has been growing green, particularly in the summertime. In saying that, Chief Crowfoot placed his trust in the hands of the white man and said, in effect, "I acknowledged your greater numbers. I acknowledge your great armaments. I place in your hands a trust that you will take care of my people, that you will not see them in want or suffering starvation, and you will see them treated fairly and equally."

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

Mr. Speaker, anybody interested in the history of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or, as they were called at one time, the Northwest Mounted Police, should read "Across the Medicine Line". It tells how the RCMP dealt out justice fairly and equally and won the respect of the native peoples of the plains and of the northlands. Is there a man in this House who can say that we have continued to understand the problems of the Indians and the native people since that time, when over 25 per cent of the inmates of our jails and penitentiaries across the country are native people? What percentage of the Canadian population do they represent, Mr. Speaker? Just 2 per cent.

I ask every member of this House to examine these figures, to examine his conscience and ask himself as he goes to bed tonight if his conscience is clear, as a white man, taking over this land from its first citizens. Let him ask if he has dealt fairly with the native people as Chief Crowfoot would have wanted. There is not a white man in Canada who can say that we have. It is all well and good for us to pass this bill, Mr. Speaker, and make a number of amendments to please ourselves. Normally, I do not support the ideas of the hon. member for Skeena, particularly his socialist ideas. But on this occasion, when he asks that two members of the National Parole Board be native people, I do not think he is going against the desire of most white men in this House of Commons.

There should not be one Liberal cabinet minister rise in his place to say that he is against this amendment. If there is, I hope that every native person in Canada remembers who it was and the political party to which he belongs. It was the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who gave the native people the vote and told them that the only way they could exert pressure upon the white man was through the exercise of their vote. I hope they remember, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) is a very capable native person, one who has a right to be proud amongst his native people. But if he fails to stand up and speak in favour of this amendment, then I would not blame the native people for saying that he has become one of those who has been washed in some kind of water which has cleansed him of his native beliefs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m. Order, please. May I remind the hon. member that his time has just expired.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, Mr. Speaker. I do not agree with that. I was watching the clock very closely, and I have two minutes left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. We will be able to check.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I ask for further time when the House reconvenes at eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I think there is agreement, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was speaking at six o'clock, and when the Acting Speaker called it six o'clock it was suggested that my time had expired. I did not think my time had expired before six o'clock and I did not have the appropriate occasion, in any event, to ask the unanimous consent of the House for permission to continue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member appreciates that the time is kept, on behalf of the Chair and of hon. members, by the table. The Acting Speaker was advised at the time that the hon. member's time had expired. The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There appears to be agreement.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kindness of the House in allowing me further time to speak about the proposed amendments to Bill C-191. Before six o'clock I had been dealing with the amendments of the hon. member for Skeena. Speaking as a white man representing the constituency of Crowfoot, I am disappointed that the House should consider at the same time both amendments proposed by the hon. member for Skeena.

The hon. member's first amendment suggests that two of the additional ad hoc members of the board shall be persons of native Indian origin. His second amendment suggests that two of the additional ad hoc members shall be persons who have served time in a penitentiary under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. I was most disappointed in noting that these two amendments are to be considered at the same time. The idea that Indian or, for that matter, Eskimo people—that is, native peoples—should be equated with somebody who has served in a penitentiary is a degrading idea. That is what I feel, as a member of parliament in Ottawa, representing the constituency to which Chief Crowfoot gave his name. My constituency is called after him.

I felt very humiliated, to say the least, when I found that these two amendments were to be considered at the same time and voted on together. I hope the House will not do that. I hope this House will consider the problems of the native people and pay close attention to those problems. Their difficulties arise from the fact that they were the first Canadian citizens. Like it or not, they were the first citizens of Canada and we must acknowledge that fact. We cannot lump those people with other people in Canada who have been sentenced to incarceration in penitentiary.

I say, however, that the hon. member for Skeena has moved a worth-while amendment. Mr. Speaker, 2 per cent of Canadians are native peoples, yet of that 2 per cent, 25 per cent are in jail. As white men, no matter what our ethnic background may be, we must acknowledge that fact. We must ask ourselves, why is this so? We must examine the entire problem of the native peoples. Speaking as the member representing the constituency bearing the great name of Crowfoot, I say that the part Chief Crowfoot played in Canadian history has an important bearing on this issue. My constituency in southeastern Alberta is called Crowfoot as a result of the trust Chief Crowfoot placed in the white man in the early 1870s, and in 1877 and 1878. Because of the trust he placed in the white man, Chief Crowfoot said, as I pointed out before six o'clock and as I will repeat in order to imprint the words on members of the House and on Mr. Speaker, "There shall be peace."

He meant that there shall be trust and belief one in another; that is what he really meant. He said there shall be peace, but he meant there shall be trust. There shall be peace, there shall be trust, there shall be understanding: he said those words. He went on to say how long that trust and understanding would remain. He said it would remain as long as the rivers flow, the grass grows green and the sun shines. The rivers are still flowing, the sun is still shining and the grass will again be green in the spring. This is the early part of December and the grass is not green today. But he said those words in the sense that he was placing his trust in the white man for many years to come. He hoped his trust in the white man would be borne out. There was no question about his trust in the Indians. He had trust in them, even though most judges and magistrates might say the Indian had broken faith and had not adhered to the law. At that time Chief Crowfoot said, in effect, "Please believe that we will try to adhere to the white man's law."

I suggest that if hon. members read the book about Sitting Bull they will comprehend the difficulty of the Indian understanding the white man's law. Chief Sitting Bull had a great deal of difficulty understanding the difference between the American and the Canadian law. However, the Northwest Mounted Police explicitly explained the law to Sitting Bull. The Indian of that day accepted the law. Have we understood the explanation of that law? Therein lies the problem. It is easy for normal white men to conceive the law. They do not understand the difficulty. To equate it very simply, 25 per cent of the Indian and native people have run afoul of the law, in spite of the fact they represent only 2 per cent of the population of Canada. Have we sufficiently explained the law to them? I defy any member of this House of Commons to stand up and say we have explained it to them but they are ignorant and dumb and refuse to accept it. That is what a lot of the government's proponents are thinking. I defy any member of the cabinet to stand up and say that. They may couch their words in different language, but that is what they are thinking.

I go back to the time when there was peace on the prairies. That was because Chief Crowfoot put his trust in the white man. He said the white man understands there shall be peace, and the Indian would accept the white man's justice which was laid down clearly and unequivocally. Have we deteriorated from the position which the Northwest Mounted Police took in the late 1800s and early 1900s? You do not have to read much history to determine that question. We have deteriorated from the position laid down by Colonel Walsh when he talked with Chief Sitting Bull. Some members may doubt what I say. If so, I suggest they read the book "Across the Medicine Line" by Turner. They will then understand that we have pulled the rug out from under the Indian trust which Chief Crowfoot placed in the Queen's system of justice.

The first amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena suggests that there be an ad hoc committee of ten members, two of whom shall be Indian or native people. Who in this House can oppose that? Would any cabinet minister oppose that? Nothing would give me more pleasure than to hear a cabinet minister stand up and say he was going to oppose it. I would want the country, particularly the Indians, to hear that. They would realize, not how the white man has broken faith with them but how the Liberal Party has broken faith with them. It is not the white man nor the Conservative Party that has broken faith with the trust Chief Crowfoot placed in the white man's Canada and the law of the Queen of England.

At that time the Queen of England was superior to all persons within this colony. We quite correctly divorced ourselves from the Queen in the sense of having our own rule. We divorced ourselves from what might be called colonial rule. However, we must still adhere to and believe in the basic foundation by which the Queen solved the disruption that could have occurred in this country. We must still believe in that solution. The Queen said there shall be justice and fair play among all people in Canada, that all people in Canada must be here and that justice must prevail.

The white man can no longer say that justice prevails when we have 25 per cent of the native and Indian peoples in our jails. We cannot say that the Queen's wishes or the wishes of the white man, when he signed the peace treaty with Chief Crowfoot, are being adhered to when 25 per cent or more of the native and Indian peoples, who represent 2 per cent of our population, are in our jails. This is an appalling failure by the white man in his understanding of the problems of the native people.

I will watch closely the vote on the first amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena. I had hoped these amendments would be voted on separately. As I say, it came as a great shock to me to find these two amendments lumped together, the first having to do with representation of the Indian people and the second dealing with representation on the board of people who have served time in institutions of correction.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

Why should these two amendments be dealt with together? Is the hon. member who moved them saying, in allowing this procedure, that he lumps all the native people together with men and women who have served penitentiary sentences? I know that many of my constituents who live on reserves believe they are, in essence, serving a penitentiary term, but they don't like that thought and neither do their leaders. I do not accept it in any circumstances. These amendments should be voted on separately, if for no other reason than to clearly show the native people that they are not being dealt with on the basis of equality with people who have served a penitentiary term. The native people should be dealt with as the first citizens of Canada. They were here first, whether we like it or not, and we have occupied their land.

Chief Crowfoot was right when he said peace would be best for the Indian people. Chief Crowfoot said, and I paraphrase his words—let no man hold it against me, because I represent Chief Crowfoot in this House—that the Indians were prepared to sign a peace treaty valid as long as the river flows, the grass grows green and the sun shines, provided the white man was prepared to recognize that they enjoyed certain rights. Can we not accept the proposition that two of the native people should be members of the Parole Board, despite the fact that 25 per cent or more of the persons held in our penitentiaries are native or Metis people?

I will watch closely the manner in which this debate proceeds and I will take it upon myself to notify all of Chief Crowfoot's following, all the descendants of the Indian people whom Chief Crowfoot represented at the signing of the treaty, how the cabinet voted, how the Liberal Party voted on this issue. Is this a matter completely beyond the comprehension of most white men in the House of Commons? Are we not prepared to recognize the problems facing the Indian people? I say we would be wise to support the first amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to express appreciation to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for moving these amendments on my behalf earlier today when Air Canada and I could not quite agree as to when I should get back to Ottawa.

I think, also, with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), I should say that while I welcome very much his endorsement of my motion—and hope that it passes—the grouping together at the report stage of various amendments into one item for the purpose of debate is a prerogative of Mr. Speaker under the rules. And that is what Mr. Speaker did: he brought the two motions together in one item as they were considered to be one motion for the purpose of debate. But when the vote takes place on them, they will be separate items. I want to get that point through to the hon. member for Crowfoot, and to others as well.

I am not the first to have thought of this idea of specifically selecting native Indian people to take a position on the Parole Board. I think it is regrettable that we should have to think in these terms, that we should need to select a particular group of people and say to them, "The law falls upon you so heavily; the law demands that so many of your people go to jail that we have found it necessary to take extraordinary steps to ensure that there should be representation on the Parole Board of someone from the general grouping of people we call native Indians in order that full and proper consideration be given to applications by native people who happen to be in penitentiaries or provincial jails over which the National Parole Board has jurisdiction."

I have some statistics here with application to federal penitentiaries in western Canada. I do not know whether those who compiled them were talking only in terms of native Indian people registered in band lists, or whether they were talking in terms of both registered band Indians and non-status or Metis people. I am inclined to think the former. But the statistical analysis of the numbers of people in federal prisons in western Canada indicates that the range of native peoples in relation to total inmate population is around 25 to 30 per cent. In some of the provincial jails the percentage is much higher—up to 80 per cent, I have heard, in some areas.

● (2030)

People of Indian origin in jail do not receive the same kind of equitable consideration in the matter of parole applications as the non-Indian population. Not too long ago a survey was conducted in the Matsqui institution, a federal prison in British Columbia. On the question of day parole—that is to say, inmates released for one day over an extended period of time—although I do not have the figures immediately available to me, they are in my office, the native Indian people who applied for day parole received parole to a much lesser extent per ratio of population than the non-Indian people in Matsqui. In other words, if you were white and applied for day parole, your chances were good; if you were Indian, the chances were good that you would be turned down. The same statistics apply to temporary absences from that institution; the white inmate population got the advantages, the favourable consideration, whereas the number of successful native Indian applicants was much less per capita.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is in your province?

Mr. Howard: Yes, in Matsqui institution in the Fraser Valley. I am talking about a particular survey made over a period of time. In so far as paroles were concerned as distinct from day paroles, the same situation prevailed; the white inmate population, or non-Indian population, at Matsqui received better consideration and treatment than the Indian inmates.

I do not know what the case is at Prince Albert, where the inmate population in the Saskatchewan penitentiary is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 40 to 50 per cent, but I am inclined to think that the same situation prevails because it is the same Parole Board that deals with parole applications and with day parole applications, and I cannot see why they would favour one group in one institution and not favour the same group in another. There is a universal application of the parole criteria.

Some of the reasons given for this, apart from what I consider to be a general lack of understanding on the part of penitentiary administrators and Parole Board officials of native Indian feelings, their home life and culture, in their assessment of the rehabilitative possibilities of Indians I think are fairly scant. But there are other factors that the Parole Board take into consideration. One is home environment. If a person applies for parole, they find out what is the situation at the home he will go to if paroled. I do not mean his family home but, rather, his home community. What are the possibilities there for parole supervision?

For example, the Parole Board discovers that if a native person goes home to the reserve, most times it is in a remote area where the opportunity for parole supervision is much less than it is in an urban setting. If he goes home to an urban setting, the chances are that he was never permitted to get fully into the community in the first place but existed only on the fringe of it. Therefore, his chances, so the Parole Board consider, of making a success of his parole are less and thus he does not get equal consideration in the granting of parole from that point of view either.

Employment is another factor the Parole Board examines. We all know—at least I hope we all know, though I sometimes wonder when listening to the debate in this House whether there is a full appreciation of this—that the native Indian person in society is the low man on the list when it comes to employment. Within the native Indian population there is a high percentage of unemployed. Within the native Indian population individuals have the least chance of finding a job, and I am sure this is a consideration the Parole Board weighs. Thus, the chances of a native in jail getting equitable consideration for parole, apart from the fact that the Parole Board and some officials may be completely ignorant of what it is like to be a native Indian, are far less than the chances of the non-Indian.

In society generally there is not too full an appreciation of the cultural, economic and social position of the native Indian in this land. It is just a simple fact of life that there are large groups of people in Canada who know absolutely nothing about the native Indian and do not want to. His position in society is disregarded, ignored. By many he is considered the invisible man. In jail, apart from the custodial staff I think the same thing applies; there is not any great desire to look upon this person as having any greater or lesser difficulty than anybody else, when in fact he has.

Outside of society there are a number of native people—this applies, I think, to any group that has been treated in the way the native person has been treated—who feel left out of things. They feel denigrated. They feel put down. They feel their position has no appreciation on the part of the great bulk of Canadian society. They feel they have been discriminated against deliberately and consciously, though not so much now as in years past, in terms of education, employment possibilities and the simple, uncomplicated respect that one human being should have for another. They feel rejection or, at the very best, non-acceptance by society.

When the native person comes to town—I think this situation can be duplicated in Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Vancouver, any urban centre that attracts people from outside—he invariably lives or finds his associates in a certain part of town. He finds that he has to live on the periphery of society. He finds he has to live on the fringe and does not fully become part of the community. Again he feels left out. He lives in an urban area where drugs and booze are most easily and readily available.

● (2040)

I am not talking in straight terms of native people; I am talking about human beings. History has shown that in times when a person or a group of persons feels rejected, despondent and not wanted, they develop a sharp sense of inferiority, following which it is very easy for them to turn to ways of easing or lessening their internal sorrow. Most often they turn to the use of alcohol, but very often they turn to drugs of various sorts.

I have heard an expression very often from native people in my home area. I do not repeat this in any sense to do harm to the native people, but very often one says to another, "Let's get drunk and be somebody." In other words, what is being suggested is that they use alcohol to rid themselves of their inhibitions. They turn to alcohol as an anaesthetic. They wipe out their misery in this way. I suggest this misery has developed as a result of the relationship these people have with society. That is a pretty sad commentary on what our society has done to the Indian people.

From the easy accessibility of alcohol or drugs, or a combination of the two, it is a very short step to jail. These people wind up in our penal institutions because of their use of alcohol or drugs, or because of what they do as a result of being intoxicated from the use of one or the other. This is probably one reason there are so many Indian peoples in our jails. The percentage of the total Indian population is much higher than the percentage of others in our society. Indian people are not more criminally minded than others. In fact, I think they are less so. Most of them that I know are more honest than a lot of white people. They suffer a great deal of misery and torment in trying to feel their way and find their place, much more so than other individuals in this country.

We are talking now in terms of sociology. We must change our social values. We must give these people a deliberate and conscious respect for themselves in terms of our society. We are talking about life, we are talking about building up respect, and we are talking about family life. This is all-important to the meaningful existence of these people. These are the things we must do in a sociological sense. We must cut down the difficulties faced by these people, many of whom are not able to cope with the everyday strains and difficulties we all must face. As a result, they end up in our jails and penitentiaries.

I think the appointment of native Indian people to our Parole Board would be a wonderful thing. I suggest this in the hope that these people will give the Parole Board some understanding of the difficulties which exist in our penitentiaries: they would impart a great deal of knowledge to such a Parole Board in respect of the discrimination suffered by these and many others of various ethnic origins. As a result, the native people might be given equitable advantages in respect of their parole applications. This would be advantageous whether these paroled natives go from jail to remote communities or return simply to the urban area from which they came. The whole point is that these people would be returned to society as a result of tenderness and affection, with an opportunity to make good out of prison.

The minister has said on one or two occasions that he would like to appoint Indians to the Parole Board. I have referred to the appointment of two in the motion, but that is an arbitrary figure. No matter what number one hits upon, it is arbitrary. I have always had the feeling that when someone suggests the appointment of one native person to a board, there is tokenism involved. I suspect that is what is happening in this case. I hope the minister is not guilty of that approach to the problem. I remember when Ellen Fairclough was made the minister of citizenship and immigration. That was in the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). That appointment was extolled as the most dramatic and wonderful thing that could happen in Canadian society. She was the first woman appointed as a minister in a Canadian government. The fact that she was incompetent did not matter—it was democratic, and extolled as such. I suggest that we should move as far as possible from that approach.

The other thing I have in mind in respect of the selection of one person is that perhaps the minister has a person in mind already. I am not sure that this is the case, but I suspect that the minister has in mind an individual who has an attachment to the Liberal Party. Such action seems to be typical of the record of the Liberal Party. That may be what is being done, because following the next election the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo may not be here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

An hon. Member: Don't take as much time as Jack Horner.

Mr. Howard: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for not realizing that my time was limited to 20 minutes. I will not transgress on the generosity of hon. members of the House. I am inclined to think that the minister has one individual in mind and that individual has had some attachment to the Liberal Party. It is my suggestion that such an appointment might not be the best one.

The number of people to be appointed is, I repeat, arbitrary. Some hon. members might suggest that three or four should be appointed. I picked the number two because of considerations for regional and geographic factors. I do not intend any sort of division, but there are two basic groups of Indian people in Canada. There are Indians who come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Indian Act. These Indians are registered as such on band lists as treaty Indians. Then there is the other group which does not fall within the jurisdiction of the federal authority or the Indian Act. These are the non-status Indian people; the Métis, as referred to by certain people.

There are these two groups, and I mention two appointees in the hope of taking both groups into account. An individual might be selected from each of these groups to be appointed as a member of the Parole Board. Some hon. members will argue that this is a good or an excellent idea. In fact, I came into the House just before the bells rang at eight o'clock, and a couple of hon. members from a particular party said to me, "It's a good idea, an excellent idea; but I do not think we will vote for it. We don't think we should spell out that sort of thing in the law. We should leave it to the intricate mentality of the minister who may be making the appointment as to whether or not at any given time he will or will not appoint someone of native Indian extraction to the board." To me it is such an important question, such a necessity, that I think this parliament is almost duty bound to try to write it into the law and to spell out that that will be such a guarantee.

● (2050)

This is an ad hoc addition that we are talking about anyway. These members would not be permanent members of the board, as are the other board members. They will come and go as the minister determines at any given time. They are temporary. The hope in my mind is that a sense of responsibility about native Indian people in jail can be imparted to the board so that it deals with parole applications by native people on an equitable basis.

I also hope that we will be able to generate within society a sense of respect for people that has not heretofore been very prevalent, so that the population of native Indians in our jails decreases and eventually disappears. As we approach that time, the necessity of having people selected for membership on this board because they are of particular racial extraction or origin will likewise disappear. But until we reach that time, we should nail it down and say that it is necessary to have this type of concern reflected in the laws that we pass, in the hope that it will generate some sense of good feeling in the nation on the part of the board about people in jail who are of native Indian origin, and that the numbers of these people in jail will be cut down eventually to the point of elimination.

There is another motion that deals with people who are ex-convicts. I do not want to make any extended comments about them because of the time factor. I should like to say simply that in another sense, people on the board who have had some experience of having gone through jail, who have been rehabilitated or who may be on parole—because that is what the motion says—should also be appointed to the board and thereby bring to the board a sense of experience that the members of that board do not have right now.

This does not necessarily bring with it greater leniency on the part of the board by proposing to put ex-convicts on it. In fact, the reverse may well be true. We know of a situation in Matsqui prison where a pilot treatment unit that was in existence for drug offenders was presented with two temporary absence passes by the medical director, who received them from the warden and who was told to distribute them as he saw fit among the people in the unit.

The inmates in the pilot treatment unit were undergoing group therapy. The medical director said to them, "I have two weekend temporary absence passes for you people. You decide who will get them". Their first response was, "We can't do that; that is not our responsibility. We don't want to touch that; that is for you to decide". He said, "No, siree. You inmates decide. Start taking some kind of responsibility toward other human beings. And remember this, that if those whom you pick blow it, that's the end of the temporary absence possibilities for a long period of time". The group of inmates wrestled with that problem for some weeks. They were very cautious and careful about their choice because they were dealing with themselves. The two men who received the temporary passes came back on time after the two or three days. Nothing serious occurred, and the system progressed from there on not too badly.

I think the same thing could prevail on the Parole Board if we could get some ex-convicts on it and as parole supervisors and working on the staff. They would have a much better rapport and relationship with and consideration for the person who leaves the jail on parole than is the case now. I think I should conclude my comments on that aspect at this time and again express my appreciation to hon. members for having accorded me a few extra moments.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) speaking in favour of the presence of Indian members within the Parole Board, as well as ex-convicts who would, according to him, bring new knowledge on the matter of parole.

In any event, Bill C-191, an Act to amend the Parole Act, has been reported with an amendment by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, by the Sollicitor General (Mr. Allmand).

Mr. Speaker, the reason I somewhat dislike the present composition of the Parole Board is that they take ages to give us results. We ask them for information, they are not ready to provide it.

If we recommend and not for political purposes, the release of an inmate because we are satisfied that he can find a job, fulfill normal tasks, the Parole Board takes so much time that when we get the answer, the prisoner has usually been released after serving his sentence. This means that the Parole Board is not very fast and does not give proper answers whenever we ask questions or write letters. Often, we write a letter and we get an answer one month and a half later. They always take recommendations into consideration and the stamp of Mr. Street or somebody else is always there. It takes ages to get results.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say that, as proposed in this amendment, we must show discrimination and say: the Parole Board should include two former inmates, two Indian people, two English-speaking Canadians, two French-speaking Canadians, two Ukrainians, two Italians, two French people—

Mr. La Salle: We have enough Canadians—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) said, it seems to me that we have enough Canadians. I consider Indian people as having full Canadian citizenship. If one of them is chosen to sit on the Parole Board, so much the better. If none of them is chosen, so be it. If English-speaking Canadians, Ukrainians, Polish, Yugoslavs, are appointed, good, but it will not be because they are Yugoslavs, French-speaking or English-speaking Canadians, but because they are Canadians. This is what we want on the Parole Board. The Indian people must be considered the same way as others, no more, no less. If any rehabilitated ex-convicts are appointed, good, but let them not be there as ex-convicts but as Canadians. They have made mistakes, but very few among us have never made any mistake. We have all done so at one time or another. Let them not say: Because they are ex-convicts, we accept them on the Parole Board.

● (2100)

Mr. Speaker, one would have to—

Mr. La Salle: One would have to serve a sentence to be a member of the National Parole Board.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —as the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) said, one would have to serve time in prison to be a member of the National Parole Board. I believe the main amendment should be to enable the board to expedite things, to solve cases more quickly and not to spend hours before answering requests. If there is a shortage of employees, let us give them employees; a shortage of secretaries, let us give them some; and whenever a member of Parliament writes to them, let them be decent enough to reply as soon as possible. Months go by before they give an answer. I can understand that we can make mistakes, the same way the Parole Board did make mistakes already.

I never recommended the release of a person named Dion for instance who had killed young people in Quebec City. He was released. He killed again, he went to prison, he was again released; he was released four times. The board had considered the record and everything that time.

As I said a while ago, there are mistakes. I once recommended the release of a 19 year old boy in my constituency. It took so many letters: one from the parish priest, one from the mayor, one from the bishop, letters from everybody. Finally he was released. I will not name him but I remember. I forgive him but I do not forget. Once he was released, he arrived in Rouyn at noon by plane and the same night broke into my garage and stole $350 worth of tires. This guy I had recommended for parole, well, he was picked up again.

An hon. Member: You didn't recommend him again!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, I did not recommend him for a second time, Mr. Speaker. I prefered that he stay where he was.

Therefore, we can be mistaken like this. I realize that the Chairman of the Parole Board himself can be mistaken, that precautions must be taken. In many cases, the recommendation for the parole of criminals has been done with much less caution.

An hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, I can name some: Chartrand, Pépin, Laberge, etc., were not liberated by Mr. Street but by the province of Quebec. They could go home during the weekends. During the rest of the week, they could also stay at home, or almost. This was a prison system suited to individuals while the regular system was completely different.

Mr. Speaker, this has nothing much to do with the Parole Board but I should like to make a complaint to the government: the Parole Board is ineffective. It includes dead wood, do-nothings, people who do not answer when we have business with them, who no not follow up on requests or recommendations. They drag on, they make no decisions and then refuse to tell us why. We are told that all this should be kept secret before Parliament! Therefore, I ask the government to urge the parole officers to be more active, vigourous and not so sluggish. Let them not die from lingering illness but give them orders for action.

As regards the amendment providing for the appointment of a couple of Indians and ex-convicts to the Parole Board, I find it secondary. When the hon. member for Skeena suggested that in his province there are more Indians inmates than white inmates it is because Indians do not behave as well as the others.

There are Indians in my riding. In fact there are two reservations. However, I have seldom seen an Indian being jailed. Since those people are behaving there is no need to imprison them. There is no need for us to ask for parole for them because they are not in jail. Therefore, I conclude that the Indians in my riding are behaving better than in the Skeena riding. In my riding the Indians are not jailed whereas it seems that in Skeena they are about all imprisoned.

Mr. Speaker, I have much respect for the Indians which I consider as Canadians. If they do not want to be considered as Canadians, it is up to them. There should not be any preferential treatment for the Indians nor for the French-speaking, English-speaking, Ukrainian-speaking or Italian-speaking Canadians. We are all full-fledged Canadians. Consequently, let us have genuine Canadians on the Parole Board and not do-nothings with marshmallow backbones. We need people able to take their responsibilities and to reply when they are asked questions.

[English]

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the amendments before the House lead me to consideration of the much broader question of parole and the manner in which it is being implemented. I should like to speak briefly at the report stage of Bill C-191 to urge that the amendments proposed to the Parole Board Act, providing for the addition of not more than ten members to the National Parole Board, be implemented as quickly as possible. The need for a larger, more flexible board with regional representation and regional areas of jurisdiction is obvious when one considers the tremendous backlog of cases now before the board; and as the board assumes wider responsibilities for day parole as well as full parole, that backlog is apt to increase accordingly.

I am not at all sure that ten new members added to the board will be sufficient to handle the ever-growing administrative and time-consuming paperwork that accompanies applications for parole; but at least their numbers will help to distribute the burden of interviews, reporting and judgment that is proving onerous for the presently constituted board.

The proposal to have these new members located in various regional centres across the country will, I trust, restore the former practice of allowing inmates to be interviewed personally by parole panels, a practice which was a much fairer and more equitable one than the present system of forwarding detailed documentation to Ottawa for assessment and adjudication by officials far removed from the penal institution in which the inmate is housed.

The number of inmates in our federal institutions is at an all-time high—approximately 9,000 men and women. Not only have convictions been increasing, but the granting of parole has been considerably tightened up in the last few years, with the resultant overcrowding in penal institutions that now poses such significant problems in our penitentiary system; problems of lack of physical facilities, training programs and, as well, problems of lowered staff morale due to longer work hours and heavier duties. These problems all contribute to the security risk factor, one which poses a potential threat to the communities where penitentiaries are located.

I would like to see the minister move ahead much more rapidly than he has to confront these very serious problems, by utilizing the proposals in the Huguessen report and the wealth of information presented to the committee under the distinguished chairmanship of Senator Hastings. I would like to see the recommendations put forward in the Outerbridge report given early consideration so that a large network of halfway houses can be available for inmates who can be considered for early parole. To accomplish this, a strict screening of applicants for such centres would be required on the part of the Parole Board.

But having visited many of our federal institutions, I am convinced that there are many who should probably not have been incarcerated in such institutions in the first place, and there are others who, having served an initial sentence, would be of more benefit to themselves and to the general public if allowed to operate in a much less restricted atmosphere. Halfway houses under the supervision of the parole service should be able to offer that opportunity. The words of the Outerbridge report make this very clear. An article in the Calgary Herald of September 25, 1973, comments on the report and quotes excerpts as follows:

> In general, halfway houses are smaller, more visible to the public, less expensive to operate and they do not require capital construction costs as high as those of prisons.
> In addition, if residents are well selected, CRS's—community residential centres—can be introduced without substantially increasing the risk to the community.
> The report says "more than 90 per cent of incarcerated offenders are released to the community within two years, and, the question remains whether the risk to the community is greater or smaller after their incarceration then before."
> We submit that it is likely to be greater.
>
> In our opinion, therefore, it seems logical that a high priority should be placed in the developments of alternatives to imprisonment.
> Presented at a time when paroles are down and the prison population is rising at such a rate that the Canadian penitentiaries service is contemplating a building program, the report calls for an expansion of halfway houses as "an alternative means of relieving the increasing pressure on our prisons."

I would suggest to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), in his consideration of parole, that the time has come for a revision of mandatory supervision releases to see whether or not this form of release is proving effective or whether it is, in all too many instances, extending sentences in a manner that was not originally intended when the program was introduced. I would also urge that where the facilities are available, such as in Ontario, parole applications for inmates in provincial institutions on criminal charges be processed by provincial parole boards rather than by the National Parole Board. If such a step were to be taken, it would substantially reduce the congestion that now exists at the national level.

When the minister first served notice that he intended to add new members to the Parole Board, I asked him to give consideration to the appointment of a native person to the board and he gave his assurance that this was being actively considered. Having in mind the numbers of native persons in prison and the treatment they are accorded, I trust this proposal is still receiving his very careful assessment.

Finally, I would like to see the Solicitor General initiate a campaign designed to encourage members of the general public to get involved in helping those who have been released on parole to normalize their role in society. That would mean encouraging business and labour to guarantee a certain number of jobs for men and women on parole. It would mean accepting ex-inmates into homes and community organizations in a way that happens all too infrequently. It would mean recognizing that men and women who come out of penal institutions—and let us face up to the fact that they do come out—need all the help, support and encouragement of the general public that they can get in those first lonely, disruptive and frightening weeks and months when they are released from prison.

Russell G. Oswald, commissioner of correctional services in New York state, wrote recently on correctional administration but he could have been speaking to all of us when he said:

> Correctional administrators have an awesome responsibility . . .
> The disruptive prisoners are in the minority but get excessive publicity. Most of the others are literally crying out for our help so they can climb that steep grade back to decency and constructive community living. We cannot permit ourselves to be diverted from our commitment to meaningful change by those who would try to confuse and frustrate us by their illogical violent behaviour.

Mr. Speaker, it is through the medium of a properly and humanely administered parole system, one which would operate more effectively than the present parole system, that the majority of inmates will be able to climb that steep grade back to decency and constructive community living.

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks on Bill C-191, although I do not think there is very much I can add to what has been said within the last hour or so by other hon. members. I was however, happy to hear the favourable remarks concerning this bill, and in particular the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that two of the ad hoc members of the board should be persons of native origin. I think it is time we had something like this on the statute books to accommodate the native population of the country.

I was also very happy to hear some of the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). I was rather surprised by some remarks made by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). He being a member of one of the minority groups of this country, I would have hoped to hear from him some favourable remarks concerning the bill and in particular the two amendments.

I wish to direct the attention of the House to some shortcomings in our justice and legal system as a number of people are not fully familiar with the facts. Not many of the native population of this country are judges or magistrates. Not many of the native community are parole officers. Few of our native community are lawyers or justices of the peace. Few of our people are policemen. Very few of the native community are members of the RCMP, the force which polices a large part of our wonderful country.

In the earliest days, the RCMP or the Northwest Mounted Police, whichever one wants to call them, depended to a large extent on the native people of this country. Actually, one of the greatest tragedies in the history of the Northwest Territories occurred not far from my home village of Fort McPherson. It involved the patrol between Fort McPherson and Dawson City in 1910 or 1911. The mounted police patrol was not accompanied by the special constable, the native person who acted as guide. The patrol went ahead without the guide, and perished. The mounted police, even today, take with them special guides in the Northwest Territories who act as interpreters, and so on.

Looking on the brighter side, there are today people of native ancestry who work as court personnel. They explain people's rights to them. This is not enough. Very few of our people serve on juries, including coroners' juries. A large part of our population of native ancestry is serving time in correctional institutions. This is deplorable. That is why I was happy to see this amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Skeena and to hear the remarks of certain hon. members.

To sum up, I feel that the hon. member's proposed amendment will bring improvements. May I point out something else which may be of interest. In early days when the Indian people governed this entire land, this country's policies were slightly different from those of today. Our immigration policy in particular was pretty good. The result now is that we are outnumbered in this country by immigrants. In the matter of jails, we are the prisoners of our guests.

Our justice was also of good quality. Under our policy, lawbreakers of the land were dealt with more humanely.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

Under our system they were rehabilitated without being locked up behind bars. We did not do what is done today. After lawbreakers had gone through our system, they had paid for their wrongdoing and became useful citizens of our country. We should bear that in mind when voting on the hon. member's amendment. Those are the only remarks I wish to make at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House tonight has already received favourable comment from most hon. members who have participated in the debate. I have been checking the debate on second reading and note that there was general support for the motion that the Parole Board should be reinforced with additional new members.

The bill has been brought back for further consideration. It was almost inevitable that amendments would be moved during committee stage for consideration in the House. When hon. members considered the matter, they soon realized that Bill C-191 does not constitute a really comprehensive approach to the problem of parole services. Rather, it was felt that it is an emergency response to the difficulties which have been hitting the headlines of Canadian newspapers for the past few months. The bill suggests that the parole service has suffered from a breakdown in administrative efficiency and that this requires some immediate response from the government.

When the minister introduced the bill, he pointed out that its subject matter deals only with one small aspect of the problems confronting the Canadian parole service at present. We have the excellent report of Judge Huguessen before us. The legislation put forward by the government hardly considers any of the recommendations of that excellent report. The report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs still has to be brought down. Those of us in the House who have been following the deliberations of that important committee realize that we will have to go much further if we are to bring Canadian parole services into line with the needs of the Canadian penal system.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has brought in an amendment which points out one of the weaknesses and deficiencies in our parole service. It highlights the special problems of the native population of Canada. During the period of rapid change and transition in lifestyle, mostly brought on by the fact that our native peoples are migrating in increasing numbers from the rural environment, or the environment of the wilderness, to urban centres, our native people have been finding it extremely difficult to make the necessary adjustments. Inevitably, many of them have run afoul of the law.

Those of us who come from western Canada and have had occasion to visit penal institutions both at the provincial and federal level have been increasingly disturbed by the fact that a large percentage of the population of our penal institutions is made up of native peoples. In most cases it is younger native people who have found it impossible to make the adjustment to living in our complex, urban environment.

I want to speak briefly tonight on penal reform because I have followed the problems of penal reform most of my adult life. Actually, my first employment, at the end of the "dirty thirties," was as a police court and prison worker with the Salvation Army, one of the institutions which early concerned itself about penal reform and rehabilitation services for Canadian people who run afoul of the law. I remember back in the city of Toronto that one of the workers in this field was Mr. Alex Edmison, who at that time was working for the John Howard Society. He was one of the pioneers in penal reform. He has since become an outstanding authority on penal reform in Canada. Indeed, he was on the National Parole Board himself at one stage, and is now lecturing in penalogy at the University of Ottawa.

As I look back over the 30 or 40 years which have passed, I am encouraged to note that we have made some progress toward a more humane approach in dealing with people who find themselves in the toils of the law. It was with considerable disappointment, because of the glaring headlines over the past year or two arising from the breakdown in the administration of the parole system, that we found it necessary to try to plug the holes in this ad hoc, half-hearted way. I had hoped the government would have waited until such time as it had thoroughly reviewed the Huguessen report and received the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs after its long deliberation on the matter, so that adequate amendments might have been brought in to the Parole Act. That will still have to wait further action on the part of this parliament, or more likely, in light of the present trend in this parliament, for another parliament to be elected by the people of Canada.

I suggest that in addition to the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Skeena, we should emphasize in our parole system not only the matter of selecting candidates for parole whether it be long-term, permanent parole or short-term day parole but more adequate supervisory personnel and facilities to assist in the rehabilitation process. The essential purpose of parole is to make it possible for the offender to return to society and become re-established and rehabilitated in society at an early date outside the confines of the penal institutions. To be successful in the rehabilitation process, the first responsibility of the Parole Board is to make an accurate assessment of the rehabilitation potential of the individual concerned.

The emphasis should be on young people who are first offenders, people who are not yet in the category of recidivists that we find all too frequently, particularly in our federal institutions. In many cases these recidivists or repeaters move into the area where they are psychopaths. Regardless of the rehabilitation facilities that might be made available, it would be impossible for them to benefit from the rehabilitation system under the parole program.

With regard to our young offenders, I think it would be almost essential in the kind of society which we are operating today to have halfway houses or youth hostels such as the House of Concord in the city of Toronto. That institution is operated by the Salvation Army and deals almost exclusively with the rehabilitation of youthful offenders. All of these halfway houses or rehabilitation hostels for youthful offenders are operated by voluntary groups. When the government finally comes around to comprehensive amendments to the National Parole Act, I hope it will take into consideration the fact that this service is absolutely essential to the successful rehabilitation of youthful offenders.

There is one other suggestion I wish to make. There needs to be greater co-ordination and co-operation between the provincial and federal services. As far as I can see at the present time, the provincial parole service and the federal parole service operate in splendid isolation. If we are going to deal with the problem of particular needs in regional or provincial areas of Canada, this can only be accomplished by closer co-ordination between the services of these two levels of government.

The problem the amendment is trying to come to grips with, that of providing specialized services for the growing penal population of our native citizens, must take into consideration not only the special needs of natives but other ethnic groups where they predominate in certain areas, particularly in western Canada. However, this is for the future. All we have to deal with at the present time, is a bill that is responding on an emergency basis to problems that have become widespread in our parole administration over the past several months.

I am not going to refer to some of the scandalous situations that have emerged. They have been discussed many times by earlier speakers during this debate. However, I wish to emphasize that when we get this bill through and when we have the ten additional members on the Parole Board, the minister responsible for the administration of the act should try to plug some of the areas of deficiency that were mentioned during the course of the debate and make the best possible use of the additional manpower.

I refer to only two areas, the need for closer supervision and the need to deal with special regional and ethnic requirements of various areas of the country. We must always keep in mind that this bill deals only with the shadow of the substance. We will not have the kind of parole service required to meet the problems of Canada's penal institutions, as they operate in the complex society of today, until we have an act containing very substantial amendments based on the two reports, one of which is before the government and one which we hope will be in the hands of the government at an early date.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, at the opening of the debate today I was amazed to hear the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) make some remarks about a former minister of citizenship and immigration, the Hon. Ellen Fairclough. I would say to him that there is none so blind as he who will not see. With that I will make no further comment.

I was surprised when this bill was brought back to this House. It came in, like so many other government bills, with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) so proud of what he was doing. He reminds me of the man who thought he was an atheist until he realized he was God. This bill falls far short of where it should be going. We are a saving nation, both in dollars and in human lives. We put the dollars in the bank, and we put the men in jail and let them stay there. We hope they do not earn interest in our society. We do not do a thing, substantially, to rehabilitate them. This is our failure in the parole system.

I admire what George Street is trying to do in our society to help our parole system. He fights against innumerable odds. He does the best he can as one individual, but he receives little or no help from the government. This is why we have trouble with recidivists and all the problems we have with our inmates today. Where does the problem lie? We spend thousands and thousands of dollars keeping men in our institutions who need help on the inside for the outside.

I can tell of a situation where a young man of another race was assigned to a penal institution in this country. He was sent there at age 17 and remained until age 33. No one looked after him. He just sat there. No one taught him how to read and write. He was not given any education. He was taught to upholster chairs and chesterfields. A judge on a very routine investigation of the institution found him sitting there upholstering. He wondered why he was there. The amazing thing is he was never sent to that institution. Someone said he was a psychotic, and away he went to that institution for about 15 years. No one looked at this man to see the problem. Really, there was no problem. He had a rough beginning in life as many of these boys do. He stayed there for about 15 years. There was no trial, no judge who sentenced him to that institution. He was just put there and forgotten. This is our penal system.

Bring the matter to the courts for redress, and the magistrate says; "Do not look to me for redress; I was not on duty at that time." I think of this young man put in an institution for 15 years, with no kind of help, nothing going for him. So he is black? So what? He is a Canadian citizen—white, black, pink or purple; I don't care. Surely this is a despicable record and we can do better. We certainly need more parole officers. Why does the government not go the whole way? Of course we need more board members, but we also need more parole officers, people who would go into these institutions, talk with the prisoners and decide whether they are eligible to go back into society.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) says there should be natives, or ex-convicts or ex-parolees sitting on this ad hoc group. I do not see any objection to that. I would like to see one representative of the native population on this group, and if I could believe the minister when he says he would arrange for such an appointment, I would be content. Unfortunately, with all due respect, we cannot always believe what spokesmen for the government say. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has given so many different sets of conflicting facts and figures that his credibility leaves a lot to be desired. I am reminded of the small boy who was having difficulty with his arithmetic. His teacher asked him, "Suppose I were to lay two eggs here and three eggs over there; how many would I have laid?" The small boy looked at him and replied, "Well, teacher, I really don't think you could do it."

I feel the same way about this government. I do not think they can or will do what they promise. I should like to leave the legislation as it is, leave it up to good brains and good intentions to decide who shall form this committee. Basically, I do not like the amendment, but I am ambivalent in this respect because the government so often says one thing and does another. However, as I say, if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) will do what he said he would do this afternoon, I shall be content, if I can believe what they say.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Can you?

Mr. Morgan: Yes, that is the question. And I am not sure of the answer. So maybe I should be inclined to go along with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and opt for one member from the native population. I say this because I think we have a sad story in what the people across the way have done to the Indian people. They have not done it to themselves; we must blame ourselves for the situation. They are victims of their environment and we must take full responsibility.

I look to where the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) sits across the way, and I say to him, "It has been a lousy job." It is time we made use of the abilities and skills of our native people, yet where do they end up? The government has the power to assist the Indian people, but so far it has obviously not done so. The attitude is: let them stay in jail, let them rot. That is what is happening.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. member for Skeena proposed that somebody on parole should be a member of the ad hoc group. I do not think it should be somebody on parole. I think it should be somebody free of parole, not subject to the sanction and the unction of penal authority. He should be free in what he says and thinks.

I was talking the other day to a young man who was on day parole. He had been found guilty of a drug offence, possession, and had been sentenced to some months in jail. The judge recommended him for day parole immediately, but day parole took about two months to arrange. That is bureaucracy, I guess. He has now become very interested in the John Howard Society and is working to help people who are in trouble as he was. He is a university graduate, a very intelligent young man. It is true he got himself into difficulty, but he is not the first to do so nor will he be the last. It is people like this who should be given an opportunity to help people through one institution or another. He knows the problems. He has been, I suppose you would say, associated with the wrong elements, though I do not much like making comparisons.

My hon. friend from Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said we do not need expertise. Perhaps he is right; perhaps some people do lack direct experience. But I do not have the gut feeling, if I may use that term, that experts are always wrong. If there is a happy admixture of the two qualities, we shall have reached the position we are seeking. Again I say to the Solicitor General that the bill should surely have been more comprehensive, that he ought not to walk into the House waving a piece of paper as a "be all and end all" when there is so much more to be done. Let us get something done.

We have been here ten months, yet this is the best legislation we can produce to deal with all the problems in penal institutions throughout this country. We have ten additional members. Big deal! If I were on the government side, I would be ashamed of this legislation. It does not begin to comprehend the problems that beset the penal colony in this country—and it is a colony.

We must accept the fact that there are good criminals and bad criminals. So let us have people in these institutions who can separate the good from the bad. I have often gone into a judge's chambers with the Crown attorney while the jury is out to discuss sentence. The judge will say, "All right, boys; if it is guilty, what do you think?" and we discuss the kid in question. Surely we can ask the Parole Board to do the same with the judges. The judge knows how defence counsel and the Crown attorney feel, so for goodness sake let us do something with the Parole Act and consult the judges who are intimate with these boys. They can look up their notes, review the evidence and make a solid evaluation whether there should be parole. They could act in an advisory capacity.

What are our judges for? They are not "dum-dums", sitting up there on the bench doing nothing. They have intelligence just as much as people on the Parole Board. They assess these boys. They have seen the pre-sentence report and heard the evidence, whereas the Parole Board has not. A parole officer does not have time to look over the evidence in a given case to see what were the motivations and what were not the motivations. Is not this what judges are for? They are there to sentence people, to say whether someone is guilty or not guilty if there is no jury. If the answer is guilty, then give the judges a chance to have a say in the parole action. I suggest that only makes good common sense.

What does the government do with the sex criminal? They treat them as if they are armed robbers. Most of these people need psychiatric help, there is no question of that. What facilities do we have in our penal institutions to administer proper psychiatric care, or what knowledge has a parole officer in that field? Before they make an assessment, do they consult the psychiatrist? Are they institutionalized? In Toronto there are doctors like Dr. McKnight who make assessments and say what should be done in such cases.

Even with all these facilities available to us, I suggest the Parole Act is so deficient and the government so derelict in taking action that they have reached a point where they throw up their hands, say they do not know what to do and run away from the problem. I suggest that no problem has ever been solved by running away from it. They typical reaction of the government is to band-aid this and band-aid that. As some wag said to me the other day, with this government it is like "hockery night in Canada", and how true that is. But this reflects on me too, because I am proud to be a member of this chamber. But people say all we do is to take stopgap measures, that there are no long-term programs to rehabilitate those who need our help, because the government lets the situation go on day after day, doing a little bit here and a little bit there.

I wonder why government members sit in their chairs yakking and laughing but doing nothing. The noise across the aisle, Mr. Speaker, tells me what interest they have in what other people think or say or do. I do not say that I am an Einstein or a brilliant criminologist, but at least I give some thought to what I try to do and I pay attention to the problems besetting this country. When someone else is speaking, I do not yak away and pay no attention. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, as a result of some of the words I hear from across the aisle I do not learn very much, but at least I have the decency to listen because maybe, just maybe, I will pick up an idea, though there is not much hope of that.

An hon. Member: Not from over there you won't.

Mr. Morgan: "Hope springs eternal in the human breast: Man never is, but always to be, blest."

If the National Parole Board has far too much to do, we must realize this. That is number one. Number two: I think the provincial governments must take responsibility for their own prisoners. It is about time the National Parole Board, through this government, said to the provinces that they should set up their own parole system. We have our problems, they have theirs, and we cannot accept responsibility for doing more than we are at the moment. I see no reason why the National Parole Board should, I was going to say "fry the fish" but I do not like that expression. I see no reason why they should settle the problems of the provinces, which should have their own parole system. They only come back to us, and nothing is accomplished because the workload of the Parole Board is too heavy.

Let me say in summary that I do not approve of the two amendments. I would feel much better about saying that if I could believe the Solicitor General when he says a native person will be appointed. Assuming he will, let me go on to say that the answer is (a) let the provinces go to the judges in the matter of parole, and (b) go to the provinces and tell them to set up their own parole system. If such a provision were written into the act, I think we would have something worth while, not the wishy-washy, ad hockery that we have at the moment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—GARRISON DAM DIVERSION, NORTH DAKOTA—FURTHER ACTION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT—CONSIDERATION BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is the first evening in many a long while that I have had more than one fan on the "late show." I rise to discuss a matter which poses an alarming and insidious environmental danger to Canada, to inquire about what steps the government is taking to avert this threat and to ensure that in the future this situation will not recur. I am referring to the vast public works project in the United States which, if completed, will pollute the waters of two important river systems that flow into Canada.

This American undertaking, known as the Garrison diversion unit, is located in the state of North Dakota. Construction is already well advanced. This project is designed to divert large quantities of water from the headwaters of the Missouri River and, through a vast network of dams, dikes and canals, irrigate about 250,000 acres of American range and farmland. The run-off waters would then be diverted into the Souris and Red Rivers which flow into Canada in the province of Manitoba. It is these run-off waters which pose the threat of water pollution. By flowing over and through the arid North Dakota soil, the run-off water would acquire a heavy load of dissolved salts and other matters, with the result that the level of salinity in the Red and Souris Rivers would be raised to harmful concentrations.

The consequences of this made-in-U.S. pollution in Canada would be numerous and potentially devastating. The water supplies of the cities of Souris and Portage la Prairie, and many smaller communities as well, would be rendered undrinkable. Economic and social development would be stunted as the river waters would be not only unpalatable but also useless for certain industrial processes. The use of the water for irrigation in Canada would be cut off, even though such use would not itself be polluting. The natural ecology of the river systems would be disrupted, thus posing a wide-ranging danger to fish, animal and plant life.

Such water pollution would clearly stand in violation of the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty between Canada and the United States which states in article 4 that "waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other." It would further violate principles endorsed by both the Canada and United States governments in the Declaration on the Human Environment at the 1972 Stockholm conference.

The Garrison diversion unit was first conceived in 1965, and since then some $60 million has been expanded in construction of diversion facilities. I have learned that Canada did not become interested until 1967, and only in 1971 did serious consultation begin either at the diplomatic level or between Canadian and American technical experts concerning the hazards we are facing. Last week we learned that the matter of transboundary pollution in the Souris and Red Rivers will be referred to the Canadian-American International Joint Commission for study. Canadians, of course, must applaud this move, but it is astonishing and of grave concern that not until this project has been under way for eight years and large sums of money have been invested has our government been able to persuade the United States to take notice of our very genuine complaints and to take action on them.

We may expect, in light of our experience, that the IJC study will be thorough and fair, but its report will not come soon. Will the minister inform the House whether or not, pending completion of the IJC study, the American government has agreed to place a moratorium on all further construction on the Garrison diversion unit so that the Canadian people will not be faced with a fait accompli?

[Mr. Knight.]

It is widely recognized that the key issue in making public policies for the control of pollution is good planning—it is the difference between taking preventive measures and trying to clean up the mess afterwards. In future instances Canada must be assured that the Liberal government gets in on the ground floor in defending our environment if it is threatened by the projects of other nations.

Accordingly, I ask the minister: Does the government intend to propose to the U.S. that the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty be supplemented by further standards laying out explicit standards for the water quality of transboundary lakes and rivers? Furthermore, so that formal Canada-United States consultation and study on water pollution matters can be rescued from its current ad hoc level, will the minister recommend that the International Joint Commission be given the power to review and to report on all relevant issues without the need for a prior formal reference from either country or, in fact, as at the present time, from both countries?

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been aware for some years now of the American proposals for diverting waters from the Missouri basin to supply the Souris river basin for irrigation purposes.

This diversion has been and still is a source of concern for the Canadian government and that of Manitoba because of the possible serious deterioration of the water in that part of the river which flows in Manitoba.

We have repeatedly expressed our concern to the American government, both officially and informally. Our most recent notes to the American Department of State were dated January 25, 1973 and October 23, 1973; in addition, there have been several written and oral exchanges between our embassy in Washington and the Department of State since 1969.

[English]

As envisaged at present, almost all thee water used for this U.S. irrigation project would, following use, be returned to waters entering Canada. Without going into all the details of the proposal, the effects we are interested in are the following. First, the tremendous increase of total dissolved solids which would seriously impair the water quality of the Souris and Red Rivers in Manitoba to the extent that the water would not be usable for either human consumption or irrigation in the state in which it enters Canada. Second, very hard, unsoftened water may also affect certain industrial activity, such as laundering and food processing. Water at this level of hardness may also be marginal for irrigation purposes. Further, the increase in nutrient loading may be critical in southern Lake Winnipeg which is presently close to a state of advanced eutrophication. Third, moreover it is apparent that the project as presently envisaged is likely to result in other serious problems of water quality which have not been adequately dealt with, such as increased water turbidity and temperatures. All of these facts are clearly outlined in our diplomatic note No. 432 which the minister tabled in the House some days ago.

We appreciate the concern expressed by a number of honorable members with regard to this situation. Honorable members will note that we have drawn to the attention of the U.S. authorities the implications which this project could have for the intent of the Stockholm declaration and the obligations assumed by Canada and the United States under the Boundary Waters Treaty. The problems posed by the Garrison diversion project do not automatically involve the International Joint Commission under the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty. Because this is so, we are continuing at present to deal with the matter at an intergovernmental level.

Until we receive a reply to our October 23 note, it is not clear whether a role by the International Joint Commission would become necessary with respect to this problem. We are confident that we shall have the opportunity to meet with U.S. officials in the coming weeks to seek a solution to this problem, and of course we hope that the United States will respond positively to the request for a moratorium contained in our note of October 23 last. I can assure the House that any solution, as we have repeated in the past, shall ensure that Canadian rights and interests have been fully protected.

PUBLIC SERVICE—AMOUNT OF INCREASES OFFERED BY GOVERNMENT TO THOSE AT LOWER LEVELS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on October 25, 1973, I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) as recorded on page 7212 of Hansard. At that time it became apparent that the government was likely to take the advice of big business—the advice it usually takes—and increase the pay scale to senior members of the public service to some $60,000 per annum, an increase of approximately 20 per cent in pay levels. At the same time, the government was making an offer to junior persons in the public service of approximately 7 per cent over a three-year period.

We understand that the senior people in the service are not unionized, and that this was a preliminary offer. But I address the House tonight on the principles of that offer and on the principles of this government. And while my friends to the left are here, let me say that these are the principles they support when they support this government. There has been in this country, over the past few years and months of inept administration, an inflation rate of 8.7 per cent. A person earning $100 a year ago now has the purchasing power of someone earning $91.30. So they have had a cut of 8.7 per cent in their real purchasing power. This government has the audacity to suggest, as a matter of bargaining, that 7 per cent over three years is all they are entitled to. It may be that the civil service of this country is not too efficient. Many of us in this House have seen the waste of this government. But that waste must be attributed to the management of the government. It must be attributed to the very people who are to be offered the 20 per cent increase. There is no indication that the government will increase its efficiency, its use of people, its organization of the affairs of Canada, by increasing the pay scale offered to those at the higher level. So in order to save dough, it suggests that those at the lower end of the scale must receive less.

A moment ago I spoke of 8.7 per cent inflation. Analyse that important statistic produced by Statistics Canada, and what do you find? You find that it includes a whole range of things like housing. It includes the fact that a great many people in this country own their own homes, and the debt associated with those homes five or ten years ago at rates of 5 per cent, 6 per cent, 7 per cent and 8 per cent. But the young couple coming to the housing market today, some of them working for the government in junior positions, are not faced with that kind of inflation in housing but with a rate of inflation that in my riding alone drove up the price of houses nearly 20 per cent this year.

While the inflation rate may average 8.7 per cent, we must ask ourselves, what does the average mean? It reflects the advantages for those with some capital in their pockets. It reflects the fact that some families do not have growing kids at home who need more and more food. It does not reflect the fact that some families have had to buy more groceries this year than last year, and that the cost of groceries is up 16 per cent to 18 per cent.

That 8.7 per cent is an across the board figure and when applied to growing families is not realistic. What does the government offer to the junior people on its staff? It offers 7 per cent over three years. I say that that offer is inexcusable. Speaking at this time of year, I say it is the kind of offer that only Scrooge could suggest. There is no justification for an offer to anyone working for the public service of this country that does not reflect the cost of living. We must remember that the bulk of the rise in the cost of living is the result of inept government, a government that prints money to pay its bills, a government that refuses to invoke an incomes policy to control the avarice of big labour and big business.

We have a government that takes advice from big business and big labour, big labour to my left and big business opposite me. This is a government that does not really care about the ordinary people of Canada. This is a government that says it is O.K. if only 20 per cent of the people in the country are able to stay even with inflation, and the rest of us get further and further behind with our grocery bills, mortgage payments and finance expenses. This government cannot be excused for making the kinds of offers it has made to the public service of the nation.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, most salaries in the public service are established through collective bargaining in accordance with the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. When the parties are unable to reach agreement, the act provides for other methods of dispute settlement such as, in the case of nurses, binding arbitration, or in other cases, conciliation and possible strike action. In the case of arbitration, the arbitration tribunal has full authority to consider all factors including representations from the employer and the bargaining agent. The decisions of the arbitration tribunal is binding on both the employer and the bargaining agent. In such a situation, comparability with the private sector and increases in the consumer price index may be considered by the arbitration tribunal.

In the case of higher levels, particularly deputy ministers and senior executive officers in the public service, the government appointed and has received advice from the advisory group on executive compensation in the public service. The advisory group has now made three reports, the latest of which was released on October 5, 1973. In this report, the group noted the need to establish some degree of comparability with the private sector and noted the pressure from below exerted on executive salaries by salary settlements in collective bargaining. We can categorically deny any inference that we are trying to restrain inflation by offering minimal increases to the public service, and at the same time affirm that public service rates are comparable with the private sector.

It is very difficult for me to understand how a Conservative member of this House would say that if his party was in power, it would not try to bring in people from big business or would not try to make sure that civil servants in higher positions would be paid salaries commensurate with those paid in business. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. It seems that the Conservatives would settle for people who would be less good than those we have, or would ask people from business to come as missionaries.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF CHAIRMAN OF MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES COMMITTEE TO HEAR POINT OF ORDER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on a matter affecting my rights as a member of this House. I shall not go into the question in detail as I have already done so in the notice I have given Your Honour. Briefly, Sir, yesterday at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc), refused to hear me on a point of order when I attempted to obtain agreement to have the committee sit beyond the agreed time of five o'clock as the committee was late in commencing its proceedings.

The committee had before it vote 15a of the supplementary estimates, Canadian Radio-Television Commission, which gave me the only opportunity I will have this session to examine the commission on its failure, in my view, to comply with the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts on children's television advertising, which were concurred in by the House on July 24. Standing Order 65(10) states:

> In a standing or special committee, the Standing Orders of the House shall be observed so far as may be applicable, except the Standing Orders as to the seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

I am not going to go into the matter of the improper use of an illegal timing device. I leave that to Your Honour, although it is worth mentioning because it has to do generally with what I consider to be the unsatisfactory conduct of the chairman of the committee. This timing device was obtained, believe it or not, from a discarded coin operated laundry drying machine. I am not going to go into that, Mr. Speaker, although I cannot resist suggesting that in the case of this committee I believe we have been taken to the cleaners.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I feel that as a result of the conduct of the chairman of the committee my rights were denied me because of his failure to adhere to the provisions of Standing Orders 6(5)(a), 12(1) and 34(1). If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie case, I am prepared to move that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East gave notice of his intention to raise this matter by way of a question of privilege and the Chair has given it very serious thought in the meantime. I am ready to make a ruling now but, in accordance with the practice, the hon. member whose conduct is being questioned has the right, if he wishes, to reply. Apparently there is no suggestion that he wishes to do this, so I am prepared at this point to make a ruling.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to reply.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, is the Chair going to invite comment from other members of the House who could also file proper notice with Your Honour if that is the way the Chair wishes it to come about?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The practice is well established that there should not be a debate when a member raises a matter by way of a question of privilege. This is a long-established practice. If a suggestion is made by an hon. member that he has a question of privilege I am willing to hear that hon. member but I suggest, as I have before, that there should not be debate on the matter unless there is a finding on the part of the Chair that there is a prima facie case of privilege. I would hope that hon. members would recognize the value of this practice and allow the Chair to proceed on that basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the minutes of the proceedings of yesterday's session of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates will speak for themselves. As for the incident mentioned by the hon. member, I believe that the facts are somewhat different from what he has said, because we applied the rules as we always do in the committee, that is when the time has expired, the debate is closed, when it was called at the proper time. Obviously, there are many other things which I could say before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; if you wish me to appear before this committee, I shall be happy to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier has replied to the hon. member and has put on the record his comments in regard to the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East. I am prepared to make a ruling on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege, and I suggest to hon. members that the Chair should be allowed to do so at this time.

[Translation]

I thank the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who, in accordance with the Standing Orders, gave notice of his intention to raise this matter by way of a question of privilege. As is usual and traditional in such a case, the Chair gave the hon. member whose conduct is being questioned the opportunity to answer briefly. I am therefore ready to make a ruling. The ruling that the Chair must make is simply to determine whether there is a prima facie question of privilege requiring a motion which would then be put to the vote. If the motion were agreed to by the House, it would then naturally be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In view of the precedents, the Standing Orders of the House and the books pertaining to the proceedings of the House to which I have referred, I doubt whether it would be possible for the Chair to say that there is a prima facie question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for St. John's East, in the notice he supplied to the Chair and in the explanation he has given, states that the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Laurier, adjourned the committee sitting at five o'clock yesterday, thus preventing the hon. member for St. John's East from asking on a point of order that the sitting be extended beyond five o'clock. The hon. member further states that as a consequence of that action he was denied an opportunity to oppose an item in the supplementary estimates which concerns the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. The hon. member has taken exception to that proceeding and seeks to move that the conduct of the chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

As hon. members know, this is not the first time that certain aspects of proceedings in committees have been brought to the attention of the House by way of a question of privilege. I refer hon. members, for example, to rulings reported in Votes and Proceedings for January 12, 1972, and also in Hansard on another occasion, Friday, March 3, 1967, at page 13697. On the basis of the precedents to which I have alluded and on the basis, also, of citations and the Standing Orders, the ruling of the Chair has always been that such matters cannot be resolved in the House under the heading of privilege.

It is well established practice that committee proceedings cannot be brought into consideration or debate in the House except by way of a report from a committee. If a point of order or a question of privilege should arise in a committee, it should be settled there rather than by way of an appeal to the House. Hon. members are also referred to Citation 295(1) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which reads in part as follows:

> On July 24, 1956, an appeal was taken to the House from the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the Speaker ruled that the chairman's ruling should be settled in the Committee and not reported to the House.

This ruling led to the enactment of Standing Order 65(11) which, as all hon. members know, reads as follows:

> The chairman of a standing or special committee shall maintain order in the committees; deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the House, on receiving a report thereof.

Essentially, the hon. member for St. John's East, by way of question of privilege, would propose that the conduct of another member ought to be the subject of an investigation by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is a long established practice, as I have said, that the conduct of another member cannot be subjected to the scrutiny of the House by way of a question of privilege. On this point I refer hon. members to the well known and often quoted ruling of Mr. Speaker Michener reported at page 584 of the Journals of June 19, 1959. Also, I have always had serious doubts as to the advisability of having proceedings in a committee investigated by another committee of the House.

For all these reasons the Chair must rule that there is not a prima facie case of privilege, so the motion proposed by the hon. member cannot be submitted to the House at this time.

AZORES EARTHQUAKE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the disastrous earthquake on the island of Pico in the Azores, where some 1,500 homes were destroyed, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill):

> That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration do send a special team to the island to take in and process applications from refugees who wish to immigrate to Canada and that the government do such things as may be appropriate to assist the government of Portugal in alleviating suffering.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peel South. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put at this time.

DESIGNATION OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT REPRESENTATIVE TO SERVE ON TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the House whether, when the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand was established by the government, he designated a specific person to represent his department on that committee? If this was the case, can he tell the House who that person was?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this committee reports to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I think the question ought to be referred to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: This was a government decision to establish the committee.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will have to apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. I was in conversation and did not hear the full question.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my question was directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was a very simple question. I asked whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand was established, designated a person to represent his department on that committee. If this was the case, will he tell us the name of that person? I think this is a question that only the Secretary of State for External Affairs can answer.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my information is there were representatives of a number of departments designated on this committee. Except for Mr. Jack Stabback, a member of the National Energy Board, I am afraid I cannot say who the individuals were at the moment. However, representatives of various departments have been designated.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have frequently been critical of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but I do not think I can properly criticize him in this regard. I am directing the question to the minister in charge of the department concerned and asking him whether he designated a specific person to represent his department on this committee and, if so, will he tell us who this individual is. This is a perfectly simple, straightforward question that the minister can either answer or not answer.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if I may attempt to answer this question, I was not asked by the cabinet to designate an official on the committee. The government established a committee which included a representative of the Department of External Affairs. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said, I do not know who it is who has been designated for this purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Nobody knows what is going on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I know a hell of a lot more than you guys. I know who the fellow is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has finally said he does not know. I accept that he does not know. However, I wish to ask the minister whether he receives regular written reports from the representative of the Department of External Affairs sitting on this technical advisory committee on the deliberations of the committee. I ask that question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in view of the obvious importance, or what ought to be the obvious importance, to the minister of the deliberations of this committee with regard to his responsibilities as Secretary of State for External Affairs of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs is represented on many inter-departmental committees and this is one of them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: In the ordinary course of events, these reports would be made to the head of the department if he himself were not attending. If he felt there was some matter of importance to bring to my attention, he would do so.

● (1420)

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources having stated that the decision he took with regard to seeking mandatory allocation measures was founded upon the advice of the technical advisory committee with regard to supply from abroad from Arab and other sources, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he was specifically informed by the representative of his department on this committee that the committee would give the advice that Canada would have to share not only in the direct cut-back of oil to Canada from Arab sources but also share in the general world shortfall from Arab sources? Was the minister given this information, or did he interest himself enough to make inquiries?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may answer the question in this way. My colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has put before the House the worst possible situation that might arise—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: —if we were to be cut off from the supplies of oil we would otherwise have expected. In this respect I think he was very wise as it is most important the public should understand, not a view which might be overtaken by events but the sort of contingency this country might have to face. I believe this was a wise decision on his part and I fully support the way in which he has presented it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The minister has also said that he does not yet have any reason to believe that these circumstances will arise.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he did not make inquiries himself with respect to the advice being given by the technical advisory committee and that he did not feel it necessary to interest himself in the prospect of oil from non-Arabian sources being cut back to the extent of 125,000 barrels a day and the principle upon which this cut-back might be based?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have the utmost confidence in my colleague—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: I have full confidence in the statements he has made in the House and I repeat what I have said before, that the minister is, it seems to me, acting in a very prudent way which should have the support of all parties in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROPOSED ACTION BY ALBERTA TO INCREASE CRUDE OIL PRICE TO ALL CANADIAN CONSUMERS—DISCUSSION WITH AND REACTION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on a subject of direct concern to all the people of Canada arising out of the announcement by the Conservative premier of Alberta yesterday of certain steps that his government is taking and is intending to take for the purpose of increasing the price of crude oil to all the consumers of Canada. Have the steps proposed by the Conservative government of Alberta been discussed with the federal government, and what is the reaction of the federal government to these steps by Sheik Lougheed of Alberta?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the discussions in the last several weeks we have received a general description of the legislative framework proposed by the premier of Alberta. We have expressed our concern on two principal points, namely, that the structure of such legislation should not interfere with the general responsibility of the government of Canada for trade and commerce within the country and, second, the possible impact of these proposals from the standpoint of federal taxation and equalization. There are obviously a number of serious and important questions to be discussed in this connection. It is for this reason we have continued discussions and will be expecting to discuss the further implications both this week and next.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, since the legislation proposed by the Conservative government of Alberta means a very hefty increase in the price of all oil products to Canadians, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he has agreed to lift the price freeze as of January 31 and has agreed with the government of Alberta on price increases after that date and, if so, at what level?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there has been an exchange of views on these questions but there has been no agreement as to the position taken on either side.

Mr. Lewis: Since the future of Canada and not merely the game in this House is involved in the question of energy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Who is playing the game?

Mr. Lewis: Obviously all the Conservatives in this House support the Conservative government of Alberta on higher prices.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The hon. member for York South has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact, as I have said, that the future of this country is involved in the supply of energy and in the price that is gouged out of the Canadian public by the multinational corporations, with the assistance of the Conservatives in this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. It seems to me the hon. member should ask a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Athabasca is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member who is supposed to be asking a question, but I think that the leader of a national party should not promote disunity in the country by making childish references to the premier of a province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that we might try to return to the question period. The hon. member might ask his question now so that we may make some headway.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but that last statement on an alleged point of order is not going to go unanswered.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order and will be recognized.

• (1430)

Mr. Lewis: The fact is, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fairweather: That you wanted an excuse.

Mr. Lewis: —that on two or three occasions in the last couple of weeks the Leader of the Official Opposition has raised peripheral issues in order to cover up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And you're the latest gas well in this country.

Mr. Lewis: As far as I am concerned, the only people who bring disunity to this country are those who want to gouge the rest of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has procedural doubts about the validity of both points of order. This is obviously debate. I would hope that all hon. members would try to restrict themselves in asking questions and making replies to straight inquiries and straight answers, without argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: May I then ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to inform the House whether he has indicated to the government of Alberta the intention of the federal government to eliminate the price freeze on January 31, and has the government of Canada agreed with the government of Alberta to permit increases in the price of conventional crude oil in Canada after January 31, whether in one increase or staged increases?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I have said, at the moment there has been no agreement between the two levels of government. We have had discussions with regard to both the question of pricing in the Canadian market, whether before or after the date stipulated, and the question of economic rent and appropriate royalty and tax structures for Canada. There have been exchanges in this regard. Our preference obviously would be to arrive at an agreement which would meet the regional ambitions of the government of Alberta and at the same time protecting all Canadians. I must say that at the moment such an agreement has not been reached.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising from the questions posed by the hon. member for York South, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he will do his best to get an answer to the questions asked by that hon. member before Friday, or not later than Friday, so that the leader of the NDP and those following him will be able to swallow themselves on Monday?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: If you don't give them some oil, give them some castor oil.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTION THAT DEPARTMENT ADVISE CHILEAN REFUGEES TO GO TO COUNTRIES WITH SIMILAR IDEOLOGY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

The minister stated yesterday that the Department of Manpower and Immigration would be strict enough with Chilean immigrants who wish to settle in Canada. Is the department considering the advisability of suggesting to Chilean immigrants to go rather to the USSR, Cuba, the People's Republic of China and Algeria where ideologies would be more in keeping with their deep convictions and yearnings?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

He may not have heard the news on Saturday that people like Chartrand, Pépin and Laberge had made a call to arms to liberate the Canadian people. Is the government taking any steps to find out how serious are the comments made by these fellows in Montreal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the question is not put properly. These are not serious but rather weird statements.

Mr. Nielsen: Throw the War Measures Act at them, Pierre.

DESIGNATION OF TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT REPRESENTATIVE TO SERVE ON TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and it arises from a question posed by the Leader of the Opposition in respect of the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand. Has his department designated a representative to serve on this committee, and can the minister provide the name of that individual or individuals to the House at this time?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are meetings held between the departmental officials and officials of the oil companies and the railway companies in order to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Is that what you are referring to?

An hon. Member: You have the wrong committee.

An hon. Member: And you have the wrong department.

Mr. Hees: Turn on your earpiece.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. It seems to me the minister was not given much of a chance to answer the question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will simply repeat my question. Has his department designated a representative or representatives to serve on the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand and, if so, will he give the House the names?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there is one person or more than one. Many persons serve on many committees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You know, it is so long since members opposite have been the government that they do not know how these things work. There are many committees. I will have to inquire as to the name of the member and I will report back to the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: It was never like this in the old days, Jean. We knew where the boys were.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You are saturated with guile.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the hon. member for Vegreville has the floor.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, and his knowledge of the committee, can he indicate to the House whether his representative or representatives have been attending meetings regularly and, if so, have they been reporting directly to him?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will inquire of the representatives and make a full report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

DESIGNATION OF REPRESENTATIVE OF DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES TO SERVE ON TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, and perhaps the direction of this question will ensure that we do not strike out completely over there. I direct the question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Does he have a representative of his department who is concerning himself with the problems confronting Canadians in respect of the oil shortage? If so, what is his name, what is his profession, and does he report regularly to the minister?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Certainly, Mr. Speaker. Not just one person but a good many of them are at our disposal, depending on the nature of the problems to be discussed.

EFFECT OF POWERS OF ENERGY SUPPLIES ALLOCATION BOARD WITH RESPECT TO POLLUTION CONTROL STANDARDS AND PROVINCIAL PERMITS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Can he assure the House that the provisions of Clause 24 of Bill C-236, whereby the Energy Supplies Allocation Board is empowered to override environmental laws, will not apply to pollution control standards or to permits issued by provincial governments?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot assure the hon. member of that. However, we are working very closely with provincial authorities and we have the closest liaison possible with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that over some years this government by its own neglect has drifted into this energy crisis—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the fact that for a good number of years some hon. members, including members on the government side, have worked very hard to establish good environmental laws, can the minister advise whether Clause 24 will apply? Will he make a statement to make it clear to the House that environmental standards are not going to be sacrificed across this country just because of an energy shortage in some parts, and will he tell the House why the power to regulate relaxation of environmental law is given to five appointed officials without any provision for appeal or public discussion?

● (1440)

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is correct in suggesting that that clause can suspend environmental standards. At the same time, I know of no existing federal or provincial legislation which will in fact be overridden.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the co-operation of hon. members. We are not moving very quickly this afternoon. The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary and then I will see the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Fraser: In view of this abdication of responsibility, can the minister advise whether as Minister of the Environment he has an arrangement or any provision whatsoever whereby he can veto a decision of this group of five officials when it comes to abrogating or overriding environmental law in this country?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that when a law is passed by this House no minister has a right of veto, but I can assure him the closest co-operation will exist—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Davis: —and that the officers of Environment Canada will be consulted at every step and the provincial officers likewise.

PROVISION OF RAILWAY CARS TO SHIP BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER—PRIME MINISTER'S RESPONSE TO TELEGRAM FROM PREMIER BARRETT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. At the end of last week did he receive a telegram from Premier Barrett of British Columbia to the effect that the railway transportation situation in British Columbia is critical, that there is an inability to obtain sufficient railway cars from either the CNR or the CPR and that there are approximately 6,000 cars of lumber standing on sidings and at sawmills that the industry is unable to move that lumber because of the shortage of boxcars? Can the Prime Minister say what his response was to the telegram and what action the government is taking in respect of this continuing request?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the telegram was acknowledged and I have referred the matter to the Minister of Transport for discussion with him. He also had received a copy of the telegram. We are trying to get an answer for Premier Barrett as soon as possible.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Inasmuch as he made a commitment in the latter part of October, more than a month ago, to Mr. Nunweiler, MLA for Fort George and to this House that he would take under advisement the possibility of appointing a transport or boxcar co-ordinator to ensure availability of boxcars, and inasmuch as he has not given any response to anybody yet about this matter, can we expect a reply about what he is doing other than simply examining the situation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been doing more than examining the situation. We have asked the railway companies to try to find ways and means so that more boxcars may be made available to the lumber companies there. We are advised that the CPR and CNR are in exactly the same position as the British Columbia Railway headed by Mr. Barrett, which cannot supply more boxcars than the CNR or the CPR.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. I have to interrupt him. The hon. member for Skeena rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege is that the minister has done this on two other occasions. He attempts to duck his responsibility as Minister of Transport for national transportation in this nation by making reference to a provincial government-owned railway. I would like to point out that this province is currently using every means it can to acquire boxcars, while the CNR and the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. It seems to me this is debate and not privilege.

NAME OF REPRESENTATIVE OF DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ON TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister give the name of the representative of his department on the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand and indicate whether or not the representative has attended all meetings?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, following well established precedent, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to divulge his name. But I should like to tell the hon. member who asked the question that I have satisfied myself that we have a leading, able and very effective official on that committee.

Some hon. Members: Who?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have to try to make as much headway as we can in the last few minutes of the question period. The hon. member for Trinity will be recognized, followed by the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister. Will he indicate how fully he has been informed and, if not more fully than indicated by his previous answer, how he manages to keep abreast in monitoring the possible impact of the oil shortage on the manufacturing industries of this country?

Mr. Gillespie: I am very well served by my officials, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: A final supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a supplementary and I recognized him for that purpose. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Champlain.

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON FINANCING OF CONSTRUCTION OF NUCLEAR PLANT AT GENTILLY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy.

Can he tell us whether there has been an agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec regarding the construction of an atomic plant in Gentilly, and how much money the federal government is contributing to this project?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, an agreement to that effect was concluded with Quebec a few months ago. Generally speaking, the federal input in such a project amounts to 50 per cent of capital costs. An atomic plant is already being built in Gentilly.

SUGGESTED SUBSIDY TO QUEBEC AND ATLANTIC PROVINCES TO PERMIT THEM TO REDUCE TAXES ON GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the leader of the government.

Has the federal government the intention to grant subsidies of a sort to Quebec or other eastern provinces in order that they can reduce their taxes on gasoline and heating oil and thus dampen the impact of price increases on consumers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, assistance to those who cannot support themselves in these circumstances because of higher prices for heating oil is a very important matter. The Department of National Health and Welfare has already been in contact with the provinces to determine means that could be taken to help consumers. As to the suggestion that provinces should not change their own tax structure, especially in this period of increased prices when consumers must pay more, I find interesting that the provinces cannot act on their own to alleviate the burden of their own taxpayers without grants from the federal big brother.

EXISTENCE OF NATIONAL EMERGENCY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether there is now a national emergency in Canada as established by clause 11 of the new allocation of supplies act and, if so, when did that national emergency occur?

An hon. Member: Where were you?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is referring to a bill which is before the House, I think the simple answer is that it will be brought on tomorrow for debate. At that time we will have occasion to indicate our position on it, and we hope the opposition will be forthcoming with its own position.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baldwin: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries on this question. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Peace River, but I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are just three or four minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Baldwin: If the right hon. gentleman finds it difficult to answer that question I will now ask him this supplementary. In light of the fact that any shortages or disturbances in the market exist, according to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because of dislocation of supplies outside Canada, can the Prime Minister indicate why the government did not take advantage of the existing import-export law which is now in place and covers petroleum products? Was it because of a feud between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that a question in those terms is not in order.

JUSTIFICATION FOR GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE— REQUEST FOR WORKING PAPERS COMPILED BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with reference to the justification for the price increases in eastern Canada, with Saturday's increase now amounting to a total of 7 cents per gallon. In the committee on Thursday night I asked the minister if he would table the working papers justifying such an increase and he said he would not because they included confidential information supplied by the oil companies. Is he now prepared to table the working papers compiled independently by members of his staff?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the hon. gentleman that traditionally information of this kind supplied by competing firms has not been made public, and since the documents prepared by the government officials would be founded on the same information it seems to me the same principle should apply.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, it seems strange to me that there is no independent study made by the department. In light of sources of information I have which say that increased costs only justify an increase of 4½ cents per gallon, with the remainder representing a rip-off of the Canadian consumer totalling $400,000 a day, is the minister prepared to dispute this claim with relevant data from the studies available to him?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am content to dispute it by saying I have relied on the best judgment of my advisers, and I think it is sound judgment.

ACCEPTANCE BY MINISTER OF ADVICE BY TECHNICAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PETROLEUM SUPPLY AND DEMAND

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and is based on his earlier answer this afternoon. May I ask him why he would accept the advice of the technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand when the membership of the committee and the qualifications of the members are unknown to him?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has had some experience as a Privy Councillor and knows that within departments, under existing departmental structures, the best men would be selected for the job.

Some hon. Members: Who?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would contest directly the hon. gentleman's implication that the officials representing the various departments are anything less than competent.

GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL—SUGGESTION THAT PROVINCES REDUCE TAXES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister with regard to the question previously asked by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. In view of the fact the Prime Minister has talked about a just society, and in view of the fact he established a special Department of Regional Economic Expansion because of the regional economic disparity that exists in the Atlantic Provinces, how can he now suggest to the House that the provincial governments in those regionally depressed areas of Canada should reduce their taxes in order to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is clearly argument. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege, and also the hon. member for Lotbinière. I will hear the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North first.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, this question is vital. If I do not get an answer, there is no reason for my being here. This government has stated it has taken special action to try to eliminate regional economic disparities in our area. At the same time the Prime Minister stands up and suggests that the provincial governments cut their taxes even though the taxes are not sufficient in themselves to look after the people in that region. I am asking the federal government what it is going to do to reduce taxes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated that a question asked in those terms is not in order. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. The right hon. Prime Minister wants to rise on the same question of privilege. I will recognize him and then the hon. member for Lotbinière on a question of privilege, after which we will go to the order of the House which we have for consideration at this time.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not get into debate on the question of regional economic expansion because I think the record of the government stands for itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: But, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hon. member, I must recall the facts to him. Last September 4, because of federal government action, we were able to assure that there would be a price freeze in these eastern provinces, a freeze at the then existing level in spite of the fact that prices of international oil were going up considerably. After a long period of time during which those provincial governments have had very high taxes on petroleum products in their provinces and when the people of Ontario and the people of the west were paying high prices for petroleum from Alberta, I think it is pushing it a bit far and it is a little bit much that now those provincial governments expect the federal taxpayers to bail them out when the sheikhs of Araby have increased their prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION BEFORE CHRISTMAS ON PROVISION OF CAPITAL IN SLOW GROWTH REGIONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Is it true that before Christmas the federal government plans to introduce in the House an important fundamental bill to establish a policy on the regionalization of capital, and if so, when will it be announced?

Mr. Speaker: I thought the hon. member was rising on a question of privilege. He has put his question; the minister may reply to it, after which I shall call orders of the day.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not anticipate bringing in legislation in precisely the form the hon. member has referred to, at least as I understood him amidst the din. On the other hand, there will be announcements made—some have already been made—with a view to assuring that there is in fact additional capital in the slower growth regions of the provinces. If there is anything more specific I will be glad to discuss it with the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Over the weekend, at a meeting held in Drummondville, the parliamentary secretary to the minister announced to the population that such an act would be introduced in the House before Christmas and that important statements would be made in this connection. I want to protest against the practice of making unfounded statements elsewhere; I also object to that same policy being pursued in this House merely to serve the interests of that "politicking" parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Mr. Bell: On a point of order—

Mr. Prud'homme: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are going to establish a record for questions of privilege today. I will hear the hon. member on his question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, you will admit with me that this is surely a prima facie question of privilege. The hon. member, as he usually does, has wrongly reported to the House my comments which appear in the newspaper before him, La Tribune. It is true that I spoke to several hundred Liberal supporters in Drummondville Sunday night. I would therefore urge the hon. member, if he wishes to deal with the question of privilege in the House, to quote exactly what has been reported by the newspaper. I merely said that before Christmas we would be signing agreements with some provinces, including Quebec naturally. Now, I say that the hon. member is interpreting what he read in La Tribune and I maintain that it is not quite fair for this House of Commons—

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member for Lotbinière be kind enough to resume his seat? He raised the question of privilege. The member concerned answered. It seems to me that the interpretation of a report in one way or another gives rise to a debate between both members. I must rule that there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

[English]

I will then recognize the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster and the hon. member for Central Nova on points of order. We will hear all these points of order and questions of privilege in order, one by one.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I think I should reply to the hon. member because he said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to reply to the parliamentary secretary, I must tell him that I have already ruled that this is not a question of privilege. The parliamentary secretary pointed out to the hon. member that he was misunderstanding a newspaper report. The hon. member now wants to rise to give his own explanation. Perhaps another hon. member will seek to challenge the interpretation of the hon. member for Lotbinière. This is not a question of privilege. I do not think it is in the interest of the hon. members to pursue this dispute.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I, although a day early, ask the government House leader to keep this exciting mood going and to clear the decks for action. Can the government House leader tell us that Monday will in fact be an official allotted day for a vote of non-confidence?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would designate the day; if the hon. member wants to designate non-confidence, that is his opportunity.

Mr. Bell: Assuming that it will be Monday, will the House leader take the opportunity to clear away measures such as the family allowance bill this week, which we will pass very quickly without debate, so that members will be able to vote on Monday without any excuses or inhibitions?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that my hon. friend was approaching Monday with such timidity.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a brief word on the same point of order. The other day when I asked the government House leader if he would call these two items for third reading, the Canada Pension Plan No. 2 and the family allowances bill, to which we would agree without debate, he said he was interested in some quid pro quo. May I offer on behalf of our party also to give him, without any further debate, the second reading of Bill S-4. These three things could be done in a minute and a half.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise again on a question of privilege.

I asked the hon. minister, at the end of the question period, whether he intended to submit a legislation. As you clearly heard he categorically replied no. The hon. member suggested that I did not repeat his words exactly. Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want it to be understood that I have repeated only facts and that I said nothing—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is again raising a question of privilege. I think this is the same question that was raised previously. I do not want to be unfair to the hon. member but I fail to see how we should proceed further about this matter of interpretation of a press report between the hon. member and the parliamentary secretary. The hon. member knows that under a House order we should proceed with votes on Bill C-176 and I trust I may rely on the co-operation of all hon. members so that we can proceed with the House order.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and I will ask you to bear with me for a moment as I do not do this very often. I am quite disturbed at the action taken by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in relation to the widely publicized head tax for travellers and the proposed charges under the Aeronautics Act. The minister was in the House yesterday, then he went out and made this announcement. He should have made a statment on this important matter because it involves taxation which, after all, is one of the fundamental reasons for parliament's existence.

I do not intend to go on at any length but I should like to say, through you, that I would respectfully request you to suggest to the minister that he follow what I believe to be the better practice, one which has been followed by custom in this House of Commons, that is, to make announcements of this nature in the House of Commons or at least have the courtesy to do so in committee, instead of leaving the House to make an announcement of such fundamental importance to the newspapers.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, a bill has been passed by the House three years ago under which the government could levy an airport tax. The only amendment brought in by the Progressive Conservative Party at that moment dealt with levying a fixed rate tax, and that amendment had been brought in by the hon. member for Edmonton West. That bill was passed by the House, and its coming into force has not been proclaimed by the government. The House was then fully aware of that situation, as evidenced, Mr. Speaker, by the fact that the opposition did not even ask me one question about the tax that has been levied.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House will now proceed to the question on the amendment (as amended) to motion No. 13. Is it the wish of the House that we proceed immediately without calling in the members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following:

That motion numbered 13 be amended by deleting therefrom the words "is relevant and that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done in the matter to which the proceedings relate," and substituting therefor the following:

"(a) is relevant,

(b) is inadmissible by reason only of a defect of form or an irregularity in procedure, not being a substantive defect or irregularity, in the application for or the giving of the authorization under which such private communication was intercepted or by means of which such evidence was obtained, and

(c) that to exclude it as evidence may result in justice not being done,"

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am not certain that the amendment as amended has been put.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that we are now putting to the House the amendment to the motion as amended.

Mr. MacEachen: That is my understanding, but in the reading I did not catch the words that had been adopted by the House.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is clear to all hon. members that what we are putting to the House is the amendment moved in the name of the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) as amended by the vote of the House a moment ago. I appreciate that perhaps I did not read it correctly but followed the words before me at that time.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. Should we proceed with the division without the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

My understanding is that the adoption of the amendment to the motion substantially supersedes the motion itself, so that there would be nothing to put before the House. I think hon. members would agree that it would be useless to put the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House will therefore proceed to motion No. 20 (Mr. Lang).

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lang moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

And the Clerk having announced third reading of the bill.

Protection of Privacy

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Prior to the announcement by the Clerk, I had risen to speak on third reading of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members will want to be fair to all hon. members. Certainly, as far as I am concerned, I did not see the hon. member rise. I would not want him to be deprived of his right to take part in a debate. If the hon. member was on his feet, I should have seen him and the motion for third reading was improperly put to the House. The hon. member for St. Paul's ought to have a chance to speak on third reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: Pursuant to the same point of order, it is my understanding there is an agreement between House leaders that there will be speeches on third reading. I am not the only member who has indicated a desire to speak. Perhaps the House leaders might confirm whether an agreement has been made.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly agreeable to the suggestion that there be a few additional comments. I might say I was watching to see if members wanted to rise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: I was prepared to say a few words myself.

Mr. Speaker: In the ruling which the Chair made, I indicated there can be a full fledged debate on third reading. I did not only recognize the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). If hon. members wish to have a debate, of course, there is no hesitation in any way in complying with their wish.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I want to express satisfaction at this point because within a short time we will have prohibitions against electronic eavesdropping. All members realize that until this bill is enacted, there is no law to prohibit wiretapping. There is no law to prevent the purchase, sale or possession of electronic devices with which to engage in electronic eavesdropping. Until this bill is passed, there is no law to prevent the disclosure of information obtained from unlawful electronic eavesdropping.

After all is said and done, in considering today's amendments and other amendments agreed to prior to today, we have seen an example of parliament working. In at least one instance today, we have seen parliament uphold the non-partisan work of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. In another case parliament, by a slim margin, over-ruled the work of the standing committee. All members are aware there have been negotiated compromises, if I can use that term. The government accepted the principle that the term "offence" must be more specifically and narrowly defined. Another compromise which the government accepted was the principle that emergency interceptions must always be subject to judicial approval.

I am proud to have been the author of one of the amendments in committee which the House today saw fit to uphold in the face of the reactionary and illogical attack by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: I am rather proud also to have been the one to put forward in committee the proposal to limit the range of offences for which legal authorization to intercept could be obtained, a proposal which was eventually accepted by the government in the amendment which was adopted in the House today.

I am, of course, most proud to have been associated with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, drawing upon his great wisdom and experience, on May 8 first alerted Canadians to the dangers of the unsupervised 36 hour emergency permits. It was the right hon. gentleman who eventually brought the Minister of Justice to his knees with an amendment requiring judicial approval in all cases, an amendment which was little short of complete capitulation to the time honoured rights and freedoms of the individual. We in this House and, indeed, in this country, are most fortunate to have a person like the right hon. member for Prince Albert whose contribution to the advancement of fundamental rights and freedoms in Canada is unequalled. Canadians will always be in his debt for his contribution to this debate.

I should like also to acknowledge the contributions and improvements made to this bill by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Halton (Mr. O'Connor), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). The last named person operated under some difficulty because of the albatross of the Liberal party and the reactionary Minister of Justice, around his neck.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: He was one of the few government members who, at least at the committee stage, attempted to put aside party considerations and come to grips with the substantive issue of protection of privacy. In particular, I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) who made perhaps the greatest single contribution to the work of the committee and the House on this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: While some of us did not agree with all his arguments, we were convinced he understood the goal of protecting privacy perhaps better than anyone. His arguments were always put forward clearly, honestly and without partisanship. I can say sincerely that it was an honour for me to have been associated with him in this matter.

● (1650)

With the bill before us about to become law, many Canadians may well ask: will my privacy now be protected? The answer to this question reveals the great fallacy underlying commonly-held assumptions about the bill.

[Mr. Atkey.]

The real answer to that question is: only to a small degree. This measure really covers only the tip of the iceberg. Granted, it is designed to prevent unauthorized electronic surveillance; sale, purchase or possession of devices used in electronic surveillance; and the disclosure of information obtained from unlawful surveillance. But that is all. There is no protection offered against visual invasion of privacy, such as the taking of unauthorized photographs of individuals alone or together with other persons on private property or in public places. There is no protection against the unauthorized taping of conversations where one of the parties agrees to the taping unbeknowns to the other party. There may be no protection against certain new devices produced by modern technology such as, for example, a laser beam which can pick up a conversation within a room by turning a window at which the beam is aimed into an acoustical membrane capable of transmitting every word spoken in that room. It remains to be seen whether such devices come within the definition of "electromagnetic, acoustical, mechanical or other devices" embodied in the act.

Even more important is the question of computers and privacy. This field is one which is relatively new. I have already given the government full marks for having the wisdom and the foresight to commission a task force in April of 1971, composed of some very able people, to examine this area. The task force came up with an excellent report in December, 1972 and I would commend this report to all Canadians. They should read it because it may alert them to some of the dangers which threaten their fundamental freedoms and liberties.

The report identified the issues on two levels. The first related to accuracy of information, the right of access to files, the control of dissemination, security standards and similar matters. The task force reported that no fundamental conceptual analysis was required in this area but, rather, a careful assessment of the precise extent and nature of the problems, and possible solutions.

The task force then went on to delineate a second level of issues, less tangible, and came up with the following questions:

> What is the relationship between information, privacy and political power? Will current and projected uses of the computer lead to loss of individuality or enforced conformity? Is the desire for informational privacy fundamentally social or antisocial? How can a balance be achieved between claims to personal privacy and claims, as legitimate but sometimes conflicting, for unimpeded access to information?

These are issues to which the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces should address themselves. The computer, as developed by modern technology in this country, in the country to the south and in some countries in Europe, poses a frightening prospect. We see in this country the growth of social science and market research firms. We note the huge growth of credit granters and investigators and their use of the computer. We know that our own Income Tax Department, the Department of National Revenue, uses the computer and has compiled a great deal of data about millions of Canadians. We know, also, that universities and post-secondary educational institutions use computers to store confidential data about Canadians.

We are aware, too, that the new central police computer called the Canadian Police Information Centre is now on line, keeping files on millions of Canadians, files which may be available to every police officer, every police station in the country. We recognize that this computer system may not only contain information about offences which have been committed, but also about offences which may be alleged or suspected or about investigations which have taken place and which have not led to a conviction. I suggest there are many potential dangers to fundamental liberties emanating from this particular operation.

I might also mention the existence of medical data banks. In my own province of Ontario, and also in the State of Michigan, there are medical data banks in hospital complexes to which doctors and health centres have access. This system, too, poses great danger to individuals because it is capable of revealing highly personal and confidential information to anyone who can gain access to it. I would suggest also that the government consider the use of data banks by bankers. Most of the major branches of the chartered banks in Canada, at least in the urban centres, are linked to a computer system. It is possible, I am told, to steal large sumes of money merely by gaining access to the data stored by these computers used by the chartered banks in Canada.

Most Canadians are now familiar with various credit card systems exemplified by the Chargex card and Master Charge card all of which depend on the computer for storing of information and processing of accounts. One wonders to what extent there is security of access to this system. Finally, I raise the spectre of information kept in computers by employers. One of the largest employers of people in the country, the Government of Canada, uses computers and certainly has a great deal of data in its possession.

There is no single prescription applicable to all these systems, but there are certain problems areas which can be dealt with by means of legislation. I do not suggest that all the legislation should be at the federal level. Indeed, the provincial level might be the appropriate jurisdiction in some cases. The government of Ontario has enacted a bill called the Consumer Reporting Act, which is an act to control the storage and supply of personal information for rating purposes. The bill requires consumer reporting agencies and investigators to be registered. Persons ordering consumer reports are required to notify the consumer, and if the credit information results in adverse action the firm refusing credit is required to notify the consumer accordingly.

The bill also provides that the consumer may inspect all the information about him in the files of any consumer reporting agency, and the consumer may secure the correction of information about him which is on file. This can be done through the authority of a tribunal if necessary. Finally, the bill provides that information included in a consumer report is restricted; a standard of accuracy and decency must be maintained, and information must be corroborated. This bill goes at least part way in protecting the privacy of individuals in the province of Ontario as far as this aspect of the matter is concerned. I hope other provinces will use it as a model in their attempts to regulate consumer credit recording in a sensible and humane way.

May I refer again to the Privacy and Computers Report and to some of the recommendations that were made at the conclusion of the report. I suggest that the government of Canada should give very close consideration to the adoption of these recommendations. The task force appointed by the government concluded:

> The principal areas of specific concern about privacy and related values which may be affected in stores of personal information reside in the accuracy or otherwise of the data, in the extent to which the individual concerned has been informed that the information has been gathered and of the uses to which it may be put, in the nature of the controls over the dissemination of data to third parties, in the quality of security techniques, and in the extent to which individuals have a right to inspect and to verify the accuracy of their own files.

In all the areas I have mentioned, for all the computer uses under both public control and private control, these are important considerations. There is much to be done by the government of Canada. It was out of concern that the government not lose sight of the need for legislative action in all these areas that I sought in committee to change the name of the bill before the House today. I thought, and I still think, that it was presumptuous of the federal government to call this bill, which deals only with electronic surveillance, the "Protection of Privacy Act". As I have said, the bill covers only the tip of the iceberg; there is so much yet to be done.

Let me, as one member of this House, warn this government, or indeed any federal government, that I will not sit idly by and allow the government of Canada to rest on its oars with the passage of this bill. I hope this is only the beginning, and that the government will forge full steam ahead to try to protect the privacy of Canadians in all the areas I have mentioned.

There are, of course, many ways of doing this, and one is to bring forth legislation immediately. Alternatively, I suggest the government might reasonably call on one of its more skilled agencies to conduct the sort of studies and to suggest the sort of implementation that would be in the interests of all Canadians. I refer specifically to the Law Reform Commission of Canada which is a body that has established itself and has attained a great deal of credibility among the people of Canada. It is a body that I think, with competent personnel, could carry out the sort of work that is needed for the government to proceed in a fairly expeditious manner..

Now, let me change direction for a moment and comment on one provision contained in the present bill which I think is capable of providing the government of Canada, and specifically the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), with certain dangerous powers. This provision should be closely scrutinized by the people of Canada and certainly by every hon. member of this House. I refer to the amendments to the Official Secrets Act which today received certain approval by virtue of the defeat of an amendment moved in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

I do commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) for coming at least part way to clean up the amendments to the Official Secrets Act contained in the bill before us. Hon. members will recall that on second reading attention was drawn to a real problem with respect to this provision in the bill. The term "subversive activity" was not defined, and a number of hon. members pointed this out to the Minister of Justice. The provision was there merely to be defined by the Solicitor General and the RCMP acting in concert.

Another problem was also pointed out. While the Solicitor General was authorized to grant unilaterally power to the RCMP to engage in certain types of interception, to engage in certain activities of electronic surveillance pursuant to alleged or suspected espionage, sabotage or subversive activity, there was no political accountability on the part of the Solicitor General as to the number of times that this sort of device could be used, or as to the length of time for which warrants were to be in force, or as to a description of the methods of interception or seizure which were used, or in regard to any assessment of this particular type of emergency device.

To his credit, the minister brought in an amendment in committee which, for the first time in our history I think, provided a definition of subversive activity. This is good. I can also say that after considerable pressure from both opposition parties he required the Solicitor General to provide as soon as possible at the end of each year a report indicating the number of warrants issued under the section, the length of time that the warrants were in force, a description of the methods of interception, and a general assessment of the importance of warrants of this sort. The Solicitor General will now be required to lay that type of report before parliament forthwith upon completion thereof, or if parliament is not sitting, on any of the first 15 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

I think this an important protection. But let me warn the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, whom I am glad to see in the House today, that there is one dangerous section in the definition of subversive activity of which all Canadians should be aware. I refer to subsection (3)(c) which is the section that contains part of the definition of subversive activity and allows the Solicitor General to grant a secret warrant pursuant to activities directed toward accomplishing governmental change within Canada or elsewhere by force or violence or any criminal means.

The main purport of the section of the Official Secrets Act is to deal with threats to Canada from outside. In other words, it is meant to deal with external threats to Canada and to Canadians. Subsection 3(c) is part of the definition of subversive activity related to internal threats to the government of Canada. I am particularly concerned that these secret warrants could be used by the Solicitor General unilaterally to grant authority to the RCMP to engage in legalized wiretapping or eavesdropping where there was a suspected attempt to achieve governmental change by criminal means. Indeed, if there were any suggestion of a bribe being offered to a politician in the course of an election campaign—election campaigns, many people would argue, are intended to achieve governmental change—then surely that particular allegation of a bribe could be made the subject of a secret warrant issued by the Solicitor General.

[Mr. Atkey.]

I am concerned about that, Mr. Speaker, because subsection (c) uses the words that are to be found in the very carefully defined term "sedition" which is an offence under the Criminal Code. I would have thought it would be better for the Minister of Justice to have excluded subsection (c), since this is dealt with as a criminal offence under the code and could be subject of a normal judicial authorization under section 178.13. At this point, I merely throw out the warning that there are dangers to the civil liberties of Canadians if this particular section is ever misused.

To a certain extent the House of Commons, by approving the section as it now stands, is putting a great deal of faith in the honesty and integrity of the Solicitor General. I certainly hope there will always be a vigilant opposition which will peruse the annual report of the Solicitor General when it is tabled in the House, and will closely examine the Solicitor General in committee and during the question period, about the sort of information that he will require by law to provide to all hon. members and to the Canadian public generally.

Let me conclude my remarks by saying that we need this bill. There have been victories and there have been some defeats on both sides, but I think in large measure this has been a non-partisan debate. It has been a healthy debate. I think all hon. members, and indeed all Canadians, are much more aware of what the substantive right of privacy means for them and what it means for their fundamental freedoms.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Land Act regulations respecting acquisition of small holdings; the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Veterans Affairs—request that deadline for applications under Land Act be extended; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—health—possible toxicity of blood imported from United States.

PROTECTION OF PRIVACY BILL

CREATION OF OFFENCES RELATED TO INTERCEPTION OF PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS BY CERTAIN DEVICES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-176, to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Official Secrets Act, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps before I recognize the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who, having moved the motion in respect of this bill, may be closing the debate and depriving other hon. members of the opportunity to speak on third reading, I could have some comment from hon. members on this point.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He does not close the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could ask for the unanimous consent of the House in order that the minister might be permitted to speak.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why should the House have to give unanimous consent?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is not unanimous consent, I will not recognize the minister.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to deny unanimous consent, but I should like to point out that other hon. members of the House should be allowed to speak following the remarks of the Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: The minister cannot close the debate on third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is any objection, I should like to hear hon. members on the point of order. For the moment, I am asking hon. members whether there is unanimous consent to the minister speaking.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, we certainly will give unanimous consent to allow the minister to speak, but we want to clarify our anxiety in respect of the suggestion that if he speaks he will close the debate. We have more speakers on this matter. I can understand why the minister wants to speak, but I do not understand why he did not speak when the motion for third reading was made. That would have been the appropriate time for the minister to make his remarks.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. But I do not do so to deny consent to the minister making his remarks. I rise as a result of the suggestion that if the minister speaks at this time on third reading he would close the debate. In all my experience I have never heard of this proposition, or a similar request for consent for the minister to speak on his own bill on third reading.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to disagree with my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), but there is a rule that states a member cannot speak twice.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Surely, that is not applicable here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a moment now. My hon. friend is not Mr. Speaker any longer. There is another rule which says that when an hon. member moves a bill even without speaking, or even if he only tips his hat, he is regarded as having spoken; that is his last chance. What we are being asked to do now is give the Minister of Justice the floor a second time. Speaking for members of my party, we give that consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is the position the Chair adopted in this instance, and that is why I asked whether the House gave its unanimous consent. When the minister moved the motion for third reading he had his opportunity to speak. However, I gather there is unanimous consent, and that it is understood others will have an opportunity to speak on third reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the consent of hon. members and it may be understood by hon. members that at the point when it seemed a vote on third reading was imminent I rose to indicate to the House that I did not want to interrupt or prevent the passage of the bill, but I was watching if other hon. members were rising to speak on the bill. It was at that time that I deferred my remarks when the Chair recognized the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey). I recognize the privilege I have been given by hon. members of the House in allowing me to speak at this time. I hope this bill does receive third reading very shortly.

I noticed the remarks of a number of hon. members today and on previous occasions, that this debate has proven that parliament works. I would have to say as well, because of the time spent debating this bill, that it proves that parliament works exceedingly slowly. This subject matter has been before this House of Commons for approximately four years.

Mr. Fairweather: And some of it has been pretty abortive.

Mr. Lang: Under those circumstances, it does seem to me that it takes a great deal of time to arrive at the position where we are enacting into law something a lot of members want to see in the law. I am referring to all the provisions of this bill, but particularly to the important provisions which provide an offence for the first time in the criminal law in respect of the general intrusion into the privacy of other persons, and specifically the intrusion by electronic devices.

The other important provision in this bill, and perhaps it is the more important provision, is the provision making it an offence to possess or to sell devices intended for the intrusion into the privacy of individual citizens. I suggest that with the adoption of this provision we will provide a diminution in the number of these devices for sale on the market. If we do not provide this penalty for this offence under the law we would not have confidence in the privacy extended generally to citizens by the other provisions.

There is also a change which is important and somewhat novel in the provision of damages of up to $5,000.00 against the user of unlawful wiretapping in favour of the person whose privacy has been invaded. I am delighted that we seem to be in agreement in respect of most of these provisions. I agree with the remarks to the effect that this House and the committee have worked very hard and very thoroughly to sort out the details of this bill. This work has taken place over the course of four years, and I am sure this work has resulted in important improvements in the provisions of this bill.

I am also delighted that members of parliament who have worked in this way today agreed to a rule which will be much more satisfactory to the 10 provincial attorneys general in this country. They are the people who are politically responsible for the administration of the bulk of our criminal law, and I am sure they will be delighted that we have come to this conclusion. I am sure they will be delighted that we have adopted the amendment to allow indirect evidence being accepted. I continue to have some reservations about the practicality and workability of some clauses, but I do not attach as much importance to those provisions as to the two I referred to earlier. I look forward to having conversations with Attorneys General in the near future in respect of some of these problems. I expect they will outline the difficulties they see in terms of their practicality and of the difficulty they create in the investigative process.

An hon. Member: I am sure there will be many.

Mr. Lang: I do not accept the suggestion of the hon. member across the way. It is our intention that we should arrive at some reasonable balance in respect of the acceptability of direct and indirect evidence, and we think we have arrived at such a balance in this bill.

The basic principle that a judge should be involved in the process of granting permission to use electronic devices was something I grew more and more convinced about as the debate proceeded. This was something about which there was a great deal of discussion among Canadians who have outstanding understanding and experience in the law and jurisprudence in Canada. They felt it would be better to give this power to the politically responsible officers; namely, the Attorneys General. I think the experience of other countries has sharpened our understanding of the dangers and the advantages of involving a judge in this process. As hon. members know, we wanted to allow exceptions to this general rule under circumstances of emergency in order that law enforcement officers could move quickly, particularly when a judge might not be available.

I am delighted that in the process of considering this whole matter, we were able to extend the principle, to which I am becoming more and more attached, of involving the judge in this process even in emergencies. I give great credit in this respect to my colleague, but much more to that distinguished fellow from Saskatchewan, the right hon. member for Prince Albert who did a great deal toward the advancement of this bill when he eloquently expressed his views to the House. If he sometimes went a little further than I thought right, I recognized the political talent he has so often shown during the time he has spent in this House and the experience gained during the many years he has been here.

In the course of the committee debate, and again here, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) raised the question of privacy beyond the ambit of this bill. I assured hon. members in the committee, and I am glad to say again, that I consider this merely part of the over-all fabric of protection for privacy in this country which we must erect quickly. I do not particularly follow, or think in terms of following, the suggestion that the matter be referred to the Law Reform Commission, partly because of the other extremely important work that body has before it which must be disposed of before any new work is taken on. But I do anticipate us coming forward with additional measures, both in relation to computers and in other ways, to further protect individual privacy in this country. Privacy after all is a matter which perhaps was so much easier to protect in respect of individual rights before the days of the many mechanical devices, transportation and communication techniques which so easily invade the privacy of and interfere with individual citizens. In those days the law did not create a fabric of protection for privacy, partly because privacy was rather more easily taken for granted than it is today.

We must move to meet these advances and techniques in our time. We are doing so at this particular time in respect of the devices for intrusion related to the conversations of individuals. We will do so step by step and without delay with regard to other areas. It was for this reason that we commissioned the study on privacy and computers, and followed it up with action inside the government to determine how we could most effectively carry out the recommendations or suggestions which are implicit in the work which went on in producing that report. The House will before long see the fruits of some of that labour, and with that we will continue to do what we are doing in respect of this bill in protection of privacy.

With those few words, I commend to hon. members the third reading of this bill so that it may, in this particular session after these four years of hard work, become an important part of the law of the land.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of reluctance I stand up to say I will support this bill on third reading. This is not because of the result of the votes today or the amendments made with regard to the section dealing with the use by police of wiretapping. It is only because the necessary protection of privacy from private interception is still included in this bill, and I consider this a significant and important step in the direction of the protection of privacy. I think in terms of the kind of industrial espionage which goes on across this country and is carried on, for instance, by companies against unions and by unions against companies. These are significant areas. But I am reluctant because I think we have done very little in terms of limiting the kind of governmental intrusion on privacy about which one reads so much.

Let me give some examples. We read recently about the abuse of privacy through interception, and I wonder whether this bill would have afforded any protection in those cases. Let us look at what the Montreal Gazette has to say about the wiretapping situation in respect of the lawyer's offices in Montreal. I shall read into the record part of the report:

Electronic bugs found in the offices of two Montreal lawyers last week were planted there by police officers, Justice Minister Jerome Choquette admitted yesterday.

Choquette told the National Assembly that members of Quebec's special organized crime squad had spied on the lawyers offices for more than two weeks last February.

The minister admitted there was a possible violation of professional secrecy but pleaded he hadn't been informed of the operation until much later.

'I can't control all these systems, I can't control every police investigation in Quebec. That would be impossible,' . . .

Under the aegis of the legislation this House is about to pass, we still could not control what occurred in Quebec. Therefore, in terms of the usefulness of the bill in restricting governmental invasion of privacy, it is very clear to me the bill has not gone nearly far enough. One might think again in terms of the kind of surveillance that has occurred. One example was the electronic interception in respect of the St. Jean Baptiste Society in Quebec. There is not provision in this bill that would prevent such activities. All that would be required would be for the police to make an allegation of sedition to a judge who could authorize a wiretap and electronic surveillance within the terms of this legislation. I shall support the bill on third reading because of the restriction in respect of private electronic interception, but I am most disappointed about the section which would allow governmental electronic interception.

May I make one last point about the effectiveness of this bill? One will recall the report of the RCMP in which it was shown that 663 wiretaps were used and that convictions were obtained in only 129 of those cases. These figures do not indicate this practice is very effective when one considers the amount of wiretapping that is being done by governmental agencies. As I say, I support the bill because it moves into a private area, but where we are going in the public area I think is well described by Maxwell Cohen, the noted law professor in an article which appeared some months ago in the Monreal Gazette. He had this to say:

How shall we view the police, perhaps the most immediate symbol of order, yet, in North America at least, unable to project themselves, very often if at all, as a symbol of justice. Not to recognize that 'the policeman's lot is not a happy one' is to be naive. Equally not to understand how close to the edge of the abuse of power his role places him is to shut eyes to the sense of disquiet shared not only by civil libertarians but often by wise policemen themselves.

The guts, the important and significant thing about this bill is that we must defend the rule of law. This bill has gone too far in the direction of opening the door to unlimited governmental and police wiretapping, because in a sense one cannot fight fire with fire in law enforcement. That is a tremendous error. It is an error every totalitarian state makes to cure its problems by cutting a few corners and getting at people. It does not work. The proposition that this House should have accepted, and I am sorry it did not, is that the rule of law is founded on the proposition that governments can protect their people without acting unfairly and immorally themselves in any respect.

The use of a wiretapping device is immoral. We cannot have lawful society unless people have respect for the law, and respect for those who enforce the law and, most important to this issue, respect for the means by which the law is enforced. That has to be a fundamental proposition of the rule of law and enforcement of the rule of law. To use this dirty method to protect citizens in this country is to erode the rule of law and respect for law and order. However, as I say, I agree with the minister that this is a significant move in the direction of controlling private electronic interception. I can therefore support the bill, but I do not really think the minister should be taking too many bows for his labours when one examines closely the provisions of this legislation.

● (1730)

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, among the many reactions which I find, after attending meetings of the committee concerned with this question and listening to debates in this chamber, is apprehension about what might have happened if the government had a majority in this House. It is very clear that the bill originally introduced by the minister was improved under the pressure of committee study and discussion, a committee study that was given great strength, not only by the quality of the criticism offered by various members, but also by the fact that always there was a majority of members of the other parties on the committee. We see here one of the reasons why we can welcome the fact that over a year ago the government did not gain a majority, because in this instance it brought legislation into the House that needed great improvement under the criticism and study of opposition parties.

There are two points that have been made and that need to be repeated in this debate, even at third reading. One is the need for recognizing the primacy of the judiciary in protecting the rights of people. That is a primacy that was not adequately recognized by the government in the way in which it introduced this legislation and carried much of it forward. For example, we have seen in the government's attitude to capital punishment its willingness to commute sentences passed by the courts, and how it wants to establish itself as a court. We have seen in the attitude of the government to this legislation that the government has not the full confidence in the judiciary that one would expect it to have. We welcome the way in which the minister has accepted a good amendment introduced from this side of the House. We welcome the return to some confidence in the judiciary, a confidence that recognizes that the rights of private citizens must be protected fundamentally by the courts.

I want to give the greatest emphasis in my remarks to the way in which this legislation disappoints so many of us because of its inadequacies. We have to recognize at the outset that privacy is not only a right that most of think we should claim, but it is also a right that we find difficult to define. This legislation really does not add much to the definition of privacy which we can enjoy under the law. For that reason it seems to me that the title of the bill is a shocking exaggeration. This bill really is not protecting privacy. Indeed, in many of its provisions it is providing for the invasion of privacy by the state, an invasion that under certain circumstances may have to be accepted in order to protect society. None the less, it is scarcely a bill that protects privacy.

We have to be all the more mindful—and I gather from his statement that the minister is mindful of this—of the need to go further than this bill will take us. We have to think of ways in which the individual's right to protection is not adequately safeguarded by this legislation, for example in the use of cameras which have become a major device or instrument used by businesses and other organizations. We have really no provision in this bill to protect the privacy of the individual against the use of computers. Because of these two exceptions we have even more reason to question the validity of the title of the bill. That question should be raised not simply because of the words used but because the bill is making a pretence that it cannot support. The bill is intended to protect the privacy of the individual, but at the same time it leaves that privacy wide open to invasion by the government or by any private organization using the kind of instruments to which I have referred. In passing this bill we are taking one step toward protecting the privacy of the individual, but it is a very short step and we ought to be mindful of the many steps that remain to be taken by government and by parliament.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, under the general heading of the inadequacy of the bill, I would point out that it is still possible under this legislation for anyone to do that for which so many criticized the President of the United States. We were shocked when the President of the United States revealed that he taped conversations of people who visited his office, without telling them even though his motive for so doing was to record for all eternity the important words uttered by visitors and by the President.

Under this legislation, any one of us is legally free to record any conversation that is held in his office, his home or anywhere else provided he consents to the recording of the conversation. Since we were shocked at the blatant disregard of the rights of individuals entering the office of the American President, I think we should become more aware that we are permitting individuals in Canada to do same thing. It is for such reasons that if we give our support to this bill tonight, we give it without enthusiasm. We cannot really feel much enthusiasm for a bill that makes so little progress in an area where one had hoped much progress could have been achieved by now.

The minister has reminded us that this bill has been before parliament previously. We realize that the complexities of the question make it difficult for legislation to cover every possible problem that could arise with respect to privacy. But, surely, after all this time and after all this work, it should have been possible for the government to come forward with a bill that would live up to its name. We have to conclude that this bill is simply making a pretence of protecting the privacy of individuals but that in fact it leaves that privacy wide open to all kinds of invasion.

We will have to return to this task in the future. In the meantime, I commend the minister and the government for the little they have done. But if they were living up to the responsibilities of their mandate, they would surely have gone much further.

[Mr. Stackhouse.]

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is not every day that I can stand up and exhibit the fact that the borough of Scarborough has solidarity in its representation in this House. I do not always find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse), but I am considerably in agreement with what he has just said. I think I know what he is driving at. I think I understand the dilemma in which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) finds himself; and I must say I am going to do something which is quite unusual for a member of this House, and that is to confess at this stage, right here and now, that I do not know which way I shall vote on third reading of the bill.

Very obviously, like the hon. member for New Westminster, one cannot help but feel that this bill does do something in that it provides sanctions against wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping undertaken by individuals, by private corporations, by private associations, clubs, unions, and so on. Therefore, I have to respect the view of those in this House who say, as enthusiastic as they may be, that they feel they have to vote for this bill because it at least does this much.

I very much share the view of the hon. member for Scarborough East that the title of the bill is a horrible distortion of the English language. I think he knows as well as I do the very famous essay by George Orwell entitled "Politics and the English Language". That is one of the most significant pieces of writing on politics that has occurred in this century. In the essay, Orwell lays the philosophical grounds for the horrifying imagery which he was to lay out for us later in a work that we all know, entitled "1984". In that work, as we know, falsity became truth, and so on.

I think Orwell was absolutely right when he said that one of the first signs of deterioration in the politics of a nation is the degradation of the language it uses to talk about politics. The examples in his essay are manifold. Rather than talk about invasions or war, we talk about "readjustment of borders". Rather than talk about the elimination of people, we talk about "rationalization of topography"—and so on. In this case, rather than talk about a bill which should be entitled "An act relating to unfortunate but necessary intrusions into private life," we call the bill, by an unbelievable pirouette of logic and knowledge, "the protection of privacy act".

There is a point that I raised on second reading of the bill, Mr. Speaker, which has not been answered to my satisfaction. It appears on page 2, section 178.11(2), and refers to subsection (1) which is the subsection providing for supervision of electronic eavesdropping. It provides:

> Subsection (1) does not apply to
> (a) a person who has the consent to intercept, express or implied, of the originator of the private communication or of the person intended by the originator thereof to receive it—

Since this subsection (2) is in the bill, it means that in most cases the provisions further along that provide for some protection of privacy, that provide for some limitations of intrusions on the part of the state on the private lives of citizens, need not and cannot apply. Let us try to follow what that subsection implies. It means that any single party to a communication, by giving consent either expressed or implied—and I do not know to this day what "implied" consent is—can have a third party listen in on a conversation originated by the first party or received by the second party.

In other words, I could if I so wished—and I assure you that I do not wish—if I sought to frame the hon. member for Scarborough East, call up a third person and say, "I will call the hon. member for Scarborough East, and you bring along your tape-recorder or just simply listen in." That would be without my notifying the hon. member for Scarborough East. Then his words could be intercepted and recorded, and thereby used against him.

I hope that somebody can stand up at this third reading stage of our procedure to indicate why what I have suggested can be done cannot be done, or indeed will not be done. I know wiser heads around this place have suggested to me outside this chamber, but in the halls of this House, that this kind of thing is done all the time. For example, an employer can rightfully say to a third party, "I shall call my employee," or "I shall be called by my employee, and I want you to listen in." If that can be done in our society, then I say it is wrong and it ought not to be done with impunity.

Surely this bill falters right at the very beginning, and from then on its temper is the same. I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that the limitations which he has put in the bill, the limitations which he has acceded to, and the limitations which have been thrust upon him through the procedures in committee and in this House, can be obviated for a good part of the time by the provision of subsection (2) to which I have just referred.

I was referring a short while ago to older and wiser heads around this House. Recently, one of them indicated to me that this is a bill which no self-respecting lawyer would want to be without, or that no lawyer could vote against because the lawyer would see how the bill could help investigative police practices. It just happens, Mr. Speaker, that a very few days ago in the city of Toronto I met a man who had retired after many, many years on the bench. I certainly will not specify who he was, but it was someone whom many of us have learned to respect over the years. He said to me, "Mr. Harney, what kind of madness are we stepping into when we proceed to pass a piece of legislation such as the one you are studying in Ottawa at the moment? What are we doing to ourselves? What is our opinion of ourselves that we must proceed to pass this kind of legislation?"

Of course, my answer to him was, "You know much more about the bench, about jurisprudence, about police activity, about investigation, about crime, the prosecution of crime and conviction than I do. Surely you must feel, as so many in your field have felt, that there is some value in the bill." And he said categorically, "None at all." So there are very wise heads experienced in the law in this country who are opposed to this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, those of us who will oppose the bill on third reading or who will hesitate before we stand up and vote for the bill because it contains some good, or who will simply absent ourselves because we cannot be associated with its passage, will be told that this bill at least prohibits some eavesdropping and that what it provides for the police and the state is necessary, although perhaps objectionable and not particularly nice. Evidence has come out to the effect that wiretapping is not effective. Let me be a "law and order" man for the moment. I think that allowing the police freedom, under limitation, to wiretap will hamper their investigative activities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harney: Time and time again our police departments in various parts of the country have been completely taken over by a love of gadgetry and machinery. Rather than go out and follow the standard, normal steps of investigation, they have allowed themselves to become bedazzled by machinery, by computers and by electronic gadgetry. I would feel more secure as a citizen of this country, worried about the depredations of organized crime, if I knew the police were not relying upon gadgetry of this kind.

● (1750)

I need not remind hon. members of the House how, and by whom, persons involved in the kidnapping and murder of Mr. Laporte were finally brought to court. I am sure there was wiretapping in that investigation. I certainly know that there were squads upon squads, indeed legions, of police of all kinds around Montreal. As well, the military were evident in huge numbers. The investigation was eventually successful, not because hundreds of people around Montreal were hauled out of their beds in the middle of the night and held for periods of time without charge but because an RCMP officer, literally on his time off, finally realized that standard steps of investigation had not been taken. He checked for himself and turned up the evidence which brought to court those who were eventually charged with the kidnapping and murder of Mr. Laporte. And all the rest had been bedazzled by machinery.

Mrs. Morin: The hon. member knows that is not true.

Mr. Harney: If the hon. member suggests that I know it is not true, let her stand in her place when her turn comes and present evidence to the contrary. Further, if the Minister of Justice knows it is not true, let him back the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin).

Mrs. Morin: Why does the hon. member not start proving what he is saying?

Mr. Harney: I have said what I have said. If I may speak again on third reading, or provide information to another hon. member who will speak on third reading, I will establish the truth of what I have said. Perhaps my most serious worry is that this is the first time this parliament has legislated against wiretapping. I know there are provisions in the law allowing the telephone company—the ubiquitous, omniscient telephone company—to watch its wires and the people using them: however, this is the first time that parliament, in full deliberation, has decided to take away by an act of law some of our privacy. I know one can say, "Of course, people have been wiretapped before." That does not change the position. We here, now, are deliberately, by open choice, limiting our freedoms.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have not decided in my mind what to do when the final vote on this bill comes. I hope to sit here and listen to more speeches, listen to the deliberations of my colleagues and then make up my mind. If I absent myself from the House, you can be sure that I will read every word that is said in tomorrow's Hansard. I just wanted to stand up because these things matter and so that people in future will know that one member of this House at least had considerable hesitation about this bill.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, as it is close to six o'clock, I wonder if I might call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken in this debate, this is the last time I shall do so. I speak, not so much because my remarks will have any effect on the eventual outcome of this legislation, but to register a tiny squeak of protest from one who three years ago was honoured—and I deem it a distinct honour—to be called by the Prime Minister of this country a weak-kneed, bleeding heart.

Like the hon. member for Scarborough (Mr. Harney), I am not certain I can support this bill. I do not feel all that enthusiastic about the bill, because to my way of thinking it is a bad bill and I see no reason why I should support a bad bill. I think it is a bad bill because it makes legal and gives to the people of Canada the official sanction of the Parliament of Canada for people to do things to others which most Canadians, in my view, find disgusting, demeaning and degrading—and all in the name of law and order.

We have been told mainly two things about this bill by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). First, that it really protects the privacy of people. Indeed, it is named the "protection of privacy act." It is fair to say that it provides stiff penalties for those who snoop and sneak electronically provided they do not have official permission to do it. That is all it does, and nothing more. It no more automatically protects the right to privacy of Canadians than guns automatically protect lives. It can be turned back on us with the utmost ferocity.

The bill says that in defence of morality we must do something that is immoral. It tells us that in defence of the right to our own privacy we must make possible the legalized, supervised and highly-organized intrusion into the privacy of others. Just because there are evil men in our numbers, must we automatically resort to evil in order to apprehend them? Must we submit to being taken yet another step down the road to the day when "1984" could be upon us, when there could be a Big Brother and our needs could be made totally subservient to those of the state? I think that is a lot of bunk.

The minister poured a little snake-oil around here this afternoon, telling the opposition what a fine job they had done, and praising the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) because he was happy that he carried the day. But what about his demeanour earlier, before his victory? Let us look at that. After the committee had worked untiringly to produce a report and had submitted that report to this House, the minister began manful efforts to tear out its guts. He was determined to get exactly what he wanted.

It was only after a bitter attack on the bill, led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that the government backed down on its proposal for a 36-hour free fire zone during which police and law enforcement agencies—and that takes in an awful lot of people in this country—could electronically eavesdrop on anybody without the need to resort to the judiciary. The minister told us this afternoon that he gradually was becoming fond of the opposition's position. But only a week ago yesterday he was attacking it in the House, ridiculing it—

Mr. Lang: You have it wrong. I am more and more convinced of our position.

Mr. Reilly: No. On the 36-hour zone, the minister said this afternoon—

Mr. Lang: I am more and more convinced of our position.

Mr. Reilly: I see. In any case, he told us he was gradually coming around to this position. But only a week ago he accused the opposition of trying to tie the hands of the police, and he was making fun of the very same proposal which he now espouses. No one on this side of the House wants to tie the hands of the police, we least of all. However, I want some rigid restraints on their power. I have seen far too many cases in which that power has been abused. In any case, police forces are not autonomous groups with lives of their own. They are an extension of our society. They help us. They are paid to do what we tell them. When we authorize them to do something immoral, we are denigrating and demeaning our society.

The minister defended the bill by talking about helping the police. He told us we will be safe because, after all, its administration will be under the Attorneys General. As I said during the report stage of this bill, there is nothing inherently good or trustworthy about Ministers of Justice or Attorneys General. I certainly do not intend to repose my trust in one simply because he is one.

For the second time, I remind the minister and other members of the House that in Ontario just about ten years ago an Attorney General brought before the legislature a bill which, if it had passed, would have allowed the Ontario police commission to imprison people for an indefinite period of time without a hearing, without bail, without a lawyer, without the right to habeas corpus, if they refused to give evidence before the commission. These people were to have no rights at all. The Attorney General of Ontario was asked during a press conference whether these procedures did not violate due process of law. He replied, quite reasonably, that they did not, because once legislation had been passed they became the due process of law. Hearing this, it was impressed upon me how fragile our civil liberties were and how easily, in the absence of a bill of rights, they could be trampled on.

The position I have just outlined was seriously defended over several days by that man—a man whose job it was to uphold the law and the civil liberties we enjoy in the province of Ontario. Eventually the bill was withdrawn and he resigned his position. But he had put that package together and brought it before the legislature because, he said, he thought it was necessary in order to fight organized crime.

It was an Attorney General of Newfoundland some years ago who pressed for plane loads of Royal Canadian Mounted Police to be flown in to act as strike breakers to fight against men whose only crime was, in their desperation, to try to form their own union. And it was an Attorney General who passed the famous censorship laws in Alberta, and another who brought in the infamous padlock law in Quebec.

Three years ago, a former minister of Justice, now Prime Minister of Canada, told the people that an insurrection was just around the corner and that the power to suspend all civil liberties was needed. People believed him, or at least, some of them did; in fact, most of them did. As it turned out, they were wrong. Time has proved them wrong. But the scars of that period will be a long time going away.

All these were, and are, honourable men. Each of them, doubtless, believed he was doing his job, and any of them would have been horrified by the suggestion that they had anything sinister in mind. But motives are not always important. They were wrong—but they had the power, and they used it, but not to further the well-being of the Canadian people because their well-being was not being menaced. They were simply wrong, but they had the power. Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, I say through you to the minister that they will be wrong again when this bill is passed into law and evidence is gathered by every conceivable agency of government through means that most of us, I believe, find repugnant. Massive files will be built up on people whose only crime is to be unpopular and, perhaps, different; and when some of this is allowed as evidence in courts, mistakes will be made again.

When the so-called Quebec crisis was upon us, hundreds of innocent people were taken from their beds in the middle of the night and thrown in jail. They had committed no crime except that of being unorthodox. They were imprisoned by the anti-subversive squad of the Montreal police. I say to the minister that if he turns wiretapping equipment and licence to use it over to that gang, there will be dossiers built up on anyone who is not currently in political favour. In the end, as I said last week and as was repeated here this afternoon by the hon. member for Scarborough West, it wasn't electronic gadgetry, or snooping, or the suspension of civil rights of hundreds of people that solved the Cross and Laporte cases; it was simple, good, hard digging by the police.

I will admit that the bill is now better than the one originally proposed by the minister, but that is about all one can say in its favour. In my opinion, the only proper bill to protect the right to privacy of Canadians would be one that outlawed electronic snooping of this kind for any reason, by anyone, and forbad the manufacture, sale, importation and possession of such equipment. I hope the day will come when we have this kind of law in Canada, because if I were the minister I would not want this law to stand as any monument to me.

In conclusion, I want to sum up my main points. This kind of snooping is immoral, degrading, and I do not think we should authorize police forces to conduct it. If we go along this path, it will eventually do society more harm than all the organized crimesters would ever do, because we shall have accepted a pernicious doctrine which has always brought disaster to its practitioners. That doctrine is: the end justifies the means.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I carefully listened to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) who said that Bill C-176 was absolutely worthless and tried to relate this bill to the events that took place three years ago in the province of Quebec and everywhere throughout Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, not in Canada.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of Bill C-176 is not to provide for the supervision of the running abouts of the hon. member for Ottawa West or the hon. member for Témiscamingue, but to protect society against organized crime and those who want to resort to violence against subversive elements of our country.

Mr. Speaker, in 1970 violence broke out in the city of Montreal. The hon. member for Ottawa West now tells us that the government was wrong. But at the time the events took place, did the hon. member for Ottawa West know the number, the action and the organization of F.L.Q. members in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Reilly: Not necessarily.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): He knew nothing at all. Today, he has the nerve to say that this government was wrong. I supported the government when they passed their measures at that time. And if the same thing happened today, I would do exactly the same and assume my responsibilities exactly as I did then.

Mr. Speaker, it was found that there were only a dozen or two real criminals in the organization.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Only two of them were convicted.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The hon. member for Edmonton West says that only two of them were convicted. But he will agree with me that he did not know either if they were 3,000, 5,000, 10,000 or 15,000 in the city of Montreal.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The government is the one that kept the whole thing secret.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The government did not keep it secret, nor did the Progressive Conservative Party, or the Social Credit Party, or even members of the New Democratic Party. We simply did not know. Time and time again, bombs exploded right and left in Montreal. And at a certain time, it ended with the murder of a minister, the seclusion of a reprensentative of the United Kingdom in Canada and threats issued right and left against everybody. The system had to be blown up! Those are the exact words that we hear now being uttered by Michel Chartrand, Louis Laberge, Marcel Pépin, lawyer Robert Lemieux and other individuals of the same stripe, in short, the very scum of Montreal ready to rouse the people.

Mr. Speaker, when a responsible government which is concerned not only in saving itself but in protecting society, takes steps, either wiretaps or other means designed to protect citizens, what can the hon. member for Edmonton West have against that?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, indeed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Was he ever imprisoned by a civil or military police force? I can say that I still recall events that occurred twenty-one or thirty-one years ago when I was taken prisoner of war and the German police, not the Gestapo, but the Germans used the same logic with me.

So, I should like to ask the hon. member if he lived such an experience. He might change his view.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member for Edmonton West, I shall tell him that I underwent questioning when Camilien Houde was imprisoned by the Canadian government and confined in a concentration camp for five years. The hon. member for Edmonton West did not go there. He was not—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, not there.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —he was not aware of that. There were Nazis in Germany and there were also some of them in Canada but we were not allowed to express our views.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They were your Liberal friends!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, my Liberal friends supported by the Conservatives of those days.

Mr. Speaker, it does not mean that we should enter houses or intrude in personal or family relationships. Let us take action intended to protect society. I believe that the government is right and if the party of the hon. member were in power, he would not act in a different way from this government if it really tried to protect the individual and Canadian society.

Here is an example. Saturday afternoon—

[English]

Mr. Reilly: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes.

Mr. Reilly: Did he not in this House last week tell hon. members that his own office had been bugged electronically?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I said it may have been.

Mr. Reilly: The hon. member said it probably had been, and that he was proud of it.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The Bell Telephone Company is probably responsible, I do not know; but I know that my line has been tapped time and time again from this place to Rouyn, my own place. But I did not care about that at all because, for the information of my hon. friend from Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly), I am not afraid of what I have to say and I have nothing to hide.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, when union leaders Pépin, Laberge, Chartrand and Charbonneau announced that 15,000 people were at the Montreal Forum to welcome during her stay in Montreal Mrs. Allende, widow of the Chilean president who was murdered or who committed suicide, it was stated that there was only one way to liberate the people, that is by force of arms and violent revolution. This is what Michel Chartrand said.

Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Allende said at the Forum that American imperialism is to blame for the events in Chile. Yesterday the same lady was in Vancouver where she suggested that Canadians boycott Chile and refrain from buying Chilean products. How inconsistent can that lady get? On the one hand, because Americans refuse to sell Chileans spare parts to repair their machines, that is bad, that is dangerous American imperialism. But on the other hand she strongly advocates boycotting Chilean products. Communist imperialism is more important to her than American imperialism.

Mr. Speaker, that is why at noon I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), instead of accepting Chileans—those who want to flee have reasons to do so—instead of bringing them here to create trouble, as happened in Mexico, to help the USSR, Algeria, Cuba and the People's Republic of China to accept those Chilian refugees not because we do not want them to stay alive but precisely because we want them to feel at home. In a capitalistic regime such as ours, those people would be like fish out of the water. So let us send them to China, the USSR, Cuba, Algeria. There they will feel at home, they will meet ideologies that will match their deepest convictions, their deepest aspirations, and nobody will be able to say that we are against humanity.

Even my friends from the New Democratic Party who want to see all those people here in Canada will have to agree that we want them to go to countries where people think like them, and not impose our customs upon them. We have no need for that. We do not want to exterminate them. There is room for them in the USSR and Cuba. I hear my hon. friend from Toronto something—

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a new name!

An hon. Member: Scarborough West.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Scarborough East?

An hon. Member: West.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Scarborough West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He should come from the East. He is from the East and has a beard!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is right, if he came from the East, it would be fine! It is because he comes from the West that it is not.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are some fine people in the West.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I am not blaming the hon. member for saying: Let us accept them in the name of humanitarianism. Why not suggest that we help financially, physically, morally and mentally to send them to the USSR, Cuba or China instead of bringing them to Canada? It is strange that this is never mentioned.

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Nor does anybody say where the Social Crediters should go.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, because they are at home in Canada. Mr. Speaker, it is as simple as that. The Social Crediters sincerely want to develop Canada and not to destroy it. That is so evident that we are a group of 15 here all from the province of Quebec—

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): But only three are here now.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): —and yet we are trying to help all Canada. I think that all my colleagues will admit that we are making a stand for one Canada and not for 12 or 15. We want to have a genuine Canadian Canada as we say in my own area. Mr. Speaker, even though they are trying to protect Canada, to protect all Canadians, I believe that some people, police officers or others, might misuse the powers provided under Bill C-176, but we will support it not because there have been abuses but in order to protect society against subversion, not to punish someone who does not deserve to be punished but really to protect society.

• (2030)

This morning two police officers and a counsel for the Montreal Urban Community police force were in my office and they told me this: If this bill requires us to advise a criminal that we are going to tap his telephone within 90 hours, it is clear that the man will not go anywhere near his telephone. Therefore if we want to detect criminals, we must allow police to use wiretapping when necessary.

Mr. Speaker, in many areas, we will need the services of those people, for instance as regards those who sow ideas of subversion and violence all day long. As Chartrand said in Montreal last Saturday afternoon: To arms, Canadians! To arms, citizens, in order to recover our freedom!

I would like Chartrand to tell me what freedom they have in Cuba, in Moscow, in Peking or in Algeria. I said it last week, if Chartrand made the same remarks in Cuba, in less than 12 hours he would be facing the firing squad. And what I say is true.

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): In Chile too!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): In Chile it would be the same thing. The hon. Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) has just said that. I do not know if it is because he was a close friend of Mr. Allende, but in Chile it would be the same thing. But in Chile they call it repression. In other countries they call it revolution. It is exactly the same but the words differ. They talk about a revolution to free the people and they put the yoke around the neck of people like in Czechoslovakia and in all the other socialist countries in the world. When we struggle against that, when we fight to protect our freedoms, they call it repression.

Well, Mr. Speaker, they can call me whatever they like, I want my freedom, I want my Canadian fellow citizens to have their freedom. Let us take the means to protect this freedom against the whole world. It is the reason why Bill C-176, applied in a logical and human way, will protect Canadian society; It will protect us and futur generations because if we deprive them of the freedom of tomorrow, in 15, 20, 25 years we will be blamed for being outcasts and for having forsaken that freedom which perhaps will never be recovered.

So, Mr. Speaker, let us be logical. We have a vast country, one of the most beautiful in the world, it is a country rolling in money and its people are anxious to take part in its development. Mr. Speaker, it is our moral duty to help, protect, safeguard and guide that nation towards undreamt-of progress, towards complete freedom and economic security for each and everyone. Then, nobody will lecture us, but Canadians will be a living example for all the countries of the world showing them that security with freedom is possible because we will have given it to our fellow-citizens.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, no, Mr. Speaker. I apologize to my colleagues of the House. I was discussing with the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) a very important matter on behalf of all hon. members. This is the first time I have used—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Write me a letter.

Protection of Privacy

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says I should write him a letter. I won't say it would not reach him but, since it concerns the rights and facilities of the hon. member, I believe it would be more important and a personal discussion would be the best way to decide its fate. I therefore hope we can continue the present debate.

I am taking part for the first time in the debate on Bill C-176 and I must say that, naturally, being a professional lawyer, despite the fact that I have not practiced with the public for a long time, I am concerned about the general interests of every citizen and certainly every lawyer.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this bill is entitled "the protection of privacy act". Like my colleague from St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey), I find this an entire misnomer. The bill protects a person only from electronic, acoustical, mechanical or other devices in respect of hearing. I would think that perhaps our colleague from Villeneuve—

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Témiscamingue.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Témiscamingue. It was the former member for Villeneuve, a much better name.

[English]

He would also, as I am sure would all members here, like to see some protection of the person in respect of viewing. How is it that one can, with the types of cameras available today, visually spy upon any individual and the public without consent, and that the individual, minding his own business, seem to be the legitimate prey of any camera-hound who, for whatever interest—pecuniary, prurient, or what have you—may take a photograph and publish it? Frankly, the individual citizen today possesses but a mere residual of rights to his own personality.

● (2040)

This bill attempts to put some order in a certain sector. As my colleague from St. Paul's said, we would like to see far greater protection of the individual from all sorts of invasions of privacy. To me, what difference does it make whether my telephone is bugged, or whether my window, my garden or my automobile as I am travelling along is similarly bugged with a long-distance lens by an individual whose motives may be far different, far less honourable and far less justifiable than the individual who may put a bug or listening device on my telephone, in my house or in my hotel room? They are equally an invasion of the privacy of my person as a citizen. I insist that I, as a citizen, as an individual, still have certain inalienable rights, rights which I may place in jeopardy by wrongful actions against society and to that extent I agree in principle with this bill, but as an innocent, law-abiding citizen, why should I be subjected to this invasion of privacy, acoustically or visually?

In his gloating speech this afternoon the Minister of Justice said it was high time this subject was dealt with because it had been around for four years. Mr. Speaker, the bill that passed report stage this afternoon is certainly not the idea that was broached four years ago, nor is it the same bill. It has gone through a certain fire and a certain modificatiion, and I think it was totally wrong for the hon. gentleman to say it was high time the House accepted the idea, just because it had been around for some time. There are many ideas that have been around for generations and are still rejected and will continue to be rejected for generations because they are not sound. The fact that they have been around for discussion means nothing except that the longer they are around and discussed, the less merit they may have.

The Minister of Justice attended the same law school as I did many years ago. Of course, his attendance came after mine but I am sure he was exposed to the same ideas. I find it rather amusing to see that he absorbed so little of the philosophy of that school with regard to the admissibility of indirect evidence. There is a lot to be said on both sides of that question. I remember arguing with my tutors because basically, I suppose, I am one of those who favour law and good government.

An hon. Member: That is what we have got.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Perhaps this may be a lesson for the young and honourable member who made that interjection. However, the longer one serves in this House, the more conscious one becomes of how the rights of the individual in today's society get nicked away, which is another way of saying that our essential freedoms are being lost, slice by salami slice. They can be cut very thin, but they are still being cut and restricted.

I say that in this instance there has now been a formalization into law of what you might call a restriction of a fundamental freedom. Of course, my views have changed, Mr. Speaker. There comes a point where the paramount interest of society may have to take precedence over the rights of the individual. I will accept this because I recognize that man is a social animal, that man is interdependent one with another, and that any right that I may have I must exercise in such a way so that I do not injure my fellow man, because if I claim fundamental freedom some people will call it a licence to act as I see fit heedless of the consequences to my fellow man. Then, if I am injured by my neighbour, I have very little cause for complaint because surely my neighbour is my equal.

If by reason of my conduct I use this licence to injure him, he equally has the right by his licence to act to injure me. As I say, we are socially interdependent animals and our relationship must be conducted with concern for others. Therefore, if here there is what we might call a fundamental right to freedom from the invasion of privacy, going one step further there comes a point where the public interest may demand that there be some curtailment of that right. I see the former solicitor general shaking his head. I do not know whether he had the same legal training that I had.

● (2050)

[Translation]

After all, he has studied civil law and I studied common law and in different schools to boot; so maybe it is quite another philosophy. But I would like to share the views of the Minister of Supplies and Services (Mr. Goyer), the former Solicitor General on that whole issue, for he undoubtedly participated with his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), in determining the philosophy of this bill.

[English]

Remember, Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to rationalize the invasion of the freedom of the privacy of my person which is incorporated in this law. This permits an invasion—

Mr. Goyer: No.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, yes. This permits an invasion of the privacy of my person, under controlled conditions. I will admit that I think in some ways this may prove better, and that is why it would have my support. But there are many details of this bill that I, as a lawyer, consider to be terribly bad law. I have already indicated a terrible lacuna, that there is no privacy of persons from viewing and spying. Only acoustical spying is covered by this bill.

To those who had objections to the bill, and as far as the police are concerned, I would say that it must be remembered that prior to passage of this bill electronic bugging is illegal. Now, under certain controlled conditions, it becomes legal and to that extent there is that much more assistance, I think, to the police forces of the country.

I do not think there is going to be any great difficulty about getting permission from a judge, etc. I do not like the amendment that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) insisted upon, because I think that knocks the props from under the bill. I am glad to see the Minister of Justice back in the House, Mr. Speaker. He will undoubtedly have read the same arguments that I have in many a learned article in legal journals on the philosophy of the admission of indirect evidence following illegal confession, illegal bugging—that in effect it is a matter of judicial revenge upon the accused. He is able to refute the burden of the so-called innocent confession and the confession is thrown out, but in many ways then the law turns around and clobbers him by admitting the very evidence to which he confessed. It almost says, "Yes, you beat us on one thing but we will get you on the other." This in effect is the same thing.

I am sorry to see the amendment of the Minister of Justice. At one time I thought I could support it, but when I look at it in the light of recognition of a wide power of the police forces and security forces to engage in electronic and acoustical bugging, I find it rather strange that the minister would insist that indirect evidence obtained as a result of illegal bugging shall be admissible in a court of law. Why go through the formalities of getting permission to carry out a legal bugging if the indirect evidence or the evidence flowing from the eavesdropping is going to be admissible in any sense? The amendment was illogical nonsense.

Mr. Railton: Question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member, the distinguished member of the medical profession, that on the next occasion there is a medical subject under discussion which he finds of interest, perhaps if I were to call out "nonsense" to him, as he has done now—

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the hon. member rise on a point of order?

Mr. Railton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to correct the hon. member. I did not say "nonsense". I was just getting a little weary of the repetition of things and I called out "Question". The other point that I request permission to speak on is this. The hon. member says if he were a member of the medical profession, he would have more right to speak on it. He is not speaking as a lawyer tonight, I hope; he is speaking as a citizen of Canada—and everybody should have an opinion.

I did not intend to speak on this bill because it has taken such a great deal of legal argument, which to this point I think has been very well done. However, from my experience I feel it is about time we stuck to the question and did not get into legal argument. The question is, are we invading privacy? I do not believe we are.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. If he did not say "Nonsense" but said "Question," the word "nonsense" was implicit in what he said. I will, hopefully, listen to him when he wants to make a point.

Mr. Railton: It was probably your conscience that was speaking. It must have been nonsense.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Well, since it is the first time I have spoken on this bill, I thank the hon. member for the extreme narrowness of his closed mind. There is one final point that I should like to make, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday we had considerable discussion about amendments to the Parole Act. We felt there were far too many people in prison. We felt there should be much greater facilities for the Parole Board. At that time I indicated that far too many laws in Canada provided for imprisonment. I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice and, if we were here, of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), that this act provides that the improper use of an electronic device for acoustical interception or listening shall be an offence punishable by imprisonment of up to five years. There is no option of a fine under this law. Illegal wiretapping means imprisonment. And illegal wiretapping can be an offence of a very technical nature.

• (2100)

I see the parliamentary secretary nodding his head in affirmation. Does this not follow up my assertion of yesterday, that we in Canada say, "Obey the law or you go to jail?" We love to send people to jail; then we complain about our jail system, our prison system, our system of parole, etc. People complain about far too many people being in jail; of course they do. Yet we have acts like this one which say that jail shall be the only sanction and that there shall not be any fine.

I note that some people are impatient; they think this bill is God-given, that it is their birthright, that there is nothing wrong with it. I hesitate to think that some day some of those people may have to go to jail for some offence. I hope they will not rue the day when they muttered approval of the fact that this law provides for no alternative penalty to jail. It seems to me that this administration and others who are responsible for the administration of penal justice in this country should have started a long time ago reviewing all our acts to see why we should insist upon jail, why we cannot have a system of probation under laws like this, or fines as an alternative to jail. Too many are sentenced to jail without being given the alternative of paying a fine. Certainly, a sentence of restricted conduct for a lot of offences would be of far greater import than the sentences contemplated under this bill.

Hopefully, there will be an opportunity when I can debate this matter with the Attorney General so that I may get some notion of what is the philosophy of the government with regard to the sanction provision in this legislation. The Minister of Justice is no greater lover of law and order than I am. Certainly, many things that were said in connection with this bill on behalf of so-called civil liberties cannot stand the light of day. On the other hand, although in many ways this bill is full of inherited or imposed defects, I hope they will not prove too difficult in practice. I am a hopeful person. Before long there will be another day, with another administration and another minister of justice, and then the appropriate changes can be made to this act to make it more effective in protecting against the invasion of privacy of the person and to make it less objectionable from a logical point of view.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair, in wrapping up this debate, to say a word or two about some hon. members who have been particularly helpful in improving this bill as it has progressed through the House. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) spoke of its four-year history. The delay in bringing it forward is not the fault of parliament: there have been a few interruptions in that period. I am satisfied that the present bill is substantially better than the one brought forward a couple of years ago, and the one which was debated in May on second reading.

I remember the debate of 1960, I think it was, when the Bill of Rights was before the House. Some sneering references were made, rather unfortunately I think, to the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the efficacy of the Bill of Rights. At that time I was actively practising law and remember the debate in the Canadian Bar Association about the Bill of Rights. I remember that a very learned dean of law, who is now a member of the minister's law reform commission, said how important it was to have general public understanding of the Bill of Rights; that it was not some arcane little statute which was of interest only to lawyers. I think the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert on that occasion popularized, if I may use that word, the concept of fundamental rights in our Canadian statute law.

I think what he did was very important. I had hoped that the Supreme Court of Canada, much before the occasion of the Drybones case, could have used the Bill of Rights in order to pass judgment on some statutes of this parliament. Be that as it may, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was able to make a complicated legal situation understandable to the general public. I am referring to the value of the right hon. gentleman's amendment to abolish the 36-hour notice provision. He made a greater impact on the public's mind than did the Minister of Justice. That in itself was an achievement.

I have repeated before now what Dr. Cory of Queen's University has said. I do not know Dr. Cory's politics; I presume he is a supporter of the Liberal government.

An hon. Member: He is from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Fairweather: He is a man of great capacity, as many Saskatchewan people seem to be.

An hon. Member: You are not narrow.

Mr. Fairweather: No, I am not as narrow as the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin). Dr. Cory said that he felt more comfortable when he knew that people like the right hon. member for Prince Albert were in parliament. I think that is a great tribute. Some people measure worth in dollars; others by the time spent on a speech. I have never felt that a man's worth is to be measured by the time he takes speaking in this House. I do think, however, that the right hon. gentleman was able to persuade the government to make a fundamental change in this bill. As well, of course, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) did a professional job on the bill, which is much better now because of his energetic work. He knew his subject thoroughly and he was able to articulate the issues and persuade many of his colleagues of the correctness of his views.

I should like to pay tribute to the conscience of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané). I like to see him and listen to him. He was the one who persuaded the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that it would be valuable and useful to hear one of the greatest attorneys general of this century, Ramsey Clark, who rightly pointed out that during his period of administration he had not used wiretaps. Mr. Clark made a profound impression on the committee. I think we were all enlightened by his evidence. We must also consider our colleague for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

● (2110)

Mr. Fairweather: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is calling "order", I will be glad to hear him on the point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I said "Hear, hear".

Mr. Fairweather: I am just trying to pay a compliment or two. I think the hon. member for New Westminster made a real contribution. The minister said he was worried about the time spent on this bill. I do not share this view. I do not think the time was all that badly spent. Maybe one day we will reach some accommodation about allocation of time. But in a way, in this country it takes a little longer than it does in Britain. There is a national press in order that issues be clearly understood by Canadians and to obtain some feedback. That is exactly what happened with this bill. It took a while for the Canadian public to get alarmed. They did get alarmed. The government, to its credit, heard about the alarm and made some amendments.

I am particularly glad parliament has decided to reinstate the provision of the committee with regard to notice. I do not think the minister should be worried about this. He could have had his own provision but he did not see fit to do that. I think it will be very salutary that a citizen will have an opportunity to know that if no charges are laid he has in fact been subjected to an intrusion of his privacy. I am sure Attorneys General will be glad to co-operate with the minister in establishing whatever formula he devises so that this notice can be given.

I share the concern of the hon. member for New Westminster and others about the national security issue. I suppose, as others have said, this clause has given all of us concern because of events in the United States. I am going to repeat something that a very wise public servant told me when I had written a little article on the excessive secrecy of government. Usually it is based on national security. He was kind enough to comment on my article. He said it is not the security of the state that governments worry about; it is the security of the government. I hope this government takes a very broad view. Perhaps it should be the other way around, that national security will be very narrowly defined.

I am particularly glad the minister was forthcoming about amendments on the whole matter of sedition, espionage and subversive activity. This is a better bill because the minister heeded the committee's request in this regard. The problem with the President of the United States is that that gentleman mixed up the security of the state with the security of himself and his government. I hope this is a warning and that this government will not try to do the same. If so, I hope there will be ample warnings, reports to parliament, questions, and so on. I will conclude by quoting a very interesting Canadian, Morley Callaghan. He said national security means——the protection of someone who has a big job and finds someone else breathing down his neck.

The minister has a big job. The government has a big job. However, I hope that the provisions of national security are so tightly drawn, and the jurisprudence so carefully enunciated by the courts, that this country will not have to go through anything as grubby as we have been witnessing in Washington during the past few months.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how fearful I am that this legislation is nearing passage. The reason my votes went the way they did today, and the reason I will be supporting the bill on third reading, is that there is far more good in the bill than there is bad. It makes wiretapping a crime. It makes provision for substantial penalties for those who would invade the privacy of others by electronic surveillance devices. That part of the bill is something we cannot do without, regardless of how much the remainder of it is distasteful. That is why it will get my support on third reading.

I want to sound a warning about what could very well happen when this bill becomes law. We know from evidence given in the standing committee that there have been a substantial number of electronic intrusions on the telephones of private citizens in this country, surreptitiously placed there by law enforcement agencies and without the knowledge of the telephone user. I might point out that in this bill we are not confined to the telephone. As I have said before in this debate, electronic intrusion devices today are highly sophisticated. One example I did not cite is the development of a laser device that is capable of being directed against the window or wall of a room and will transmit sounds from within that room to an unscrambler. A conversation is capable of being detected over a distance of several miles. I did cite the example of the instrument being capable of being converted into a listening device with the receiver remaining on the hook.

We heard some very disquieting examples of what could happen. We heard the example of the offices of two barristers in the province of Quebec being bugged at the behest of the police commission there. At the time this arose, I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) whether there was any agency in the province of Quebec operating under the provincial government which conducted activities of this kind directed toward national security matters. He was kind enough to assure me in private that there is an organization with a similar name but which has no federal connection.

A year ago last fall there was the example of the affairs of the CNTU in the province of Quebec being made the subject of an army intelligence report. Many members and others think all we are concerned with in the application of this bill in terms of surveillance and electronic intrusion has to do with law enforcement agencies in the country. How wrong they are. The armed forces of this country have a very active and, I must say, having some knowledge of the functioning of this service, very capable security and intelligen-e organization. That organization has every capability of engaging in the kind of surveillance activities that this bill will make law. So when we are speaking of the application of the bill, let us not forget the activities of other agencies in the country.

I want to sound, too, a warning as to certain possibilities. If electronic eavesdropping has been occurring—and it has been occurring, according to the evidence given by the law enforcement agencies before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—this bill is no assurance that it will not continue to occur illegally. From a practical point of view, the main thrust of the bill being directed at the investigatory function rather that the evidentiary function, what the overzealous law enforcer will do is tap anyway or intrude electronically in any event. It can be done without danger of detection for a great length of time. Then, should anything come up in the course of this kind of surveillance, it is a simple matter to obtain an order legalizing the portion of the evidence he wishes to introduce in court.

I was happy about the extent to which we convinced the government that judicial controls should be placed upon the application of this legislation. At least in the case of what I might call ordinary crime in his country it will be obligatory for any person intending to intrude upon the private life of anyone else to go before a judge and satisfy him with respect to several criteria as set out in the bill. Then there is the distasteful clause which relates to the dispensation of this kind of detailed process when the situation becomes urgent. Thanks to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) we at least have been able to insist upon the applicant obtaining the signature of the judge upon the order.

I would be surprised if the penalties provided in the legislation were ever invoked. They will certainly not be invoked against the law enforcement agencies, whether electronic supervision is legal or illegal, because of the inability to detect these devices except by sheer accident. One of the most frightening aspects of the legislation is the provision which applies to the granting of authority to intrude electronically in cases affecting national security. The government did go part of the way with us when we extracted from it a definition of "subversion." But the phrase "national security" is still wide open.

There are many who believe that the thrust here is toward electronic intrusion in the investigation of cases which affect the national security of our country, from abroad. Nothing could be further from the truth. Quite apart from any knowledge I may have gained in committee, I know that surveillance activities are carried on with respect to so-called subversive groups in this country. An example which comes to mind is the army intelligence report prepared on the operation of the CNTU in Quebec. Some of the things said in that report were pretty far out.

The bill would allow electronic intrusion in respect of any matter which the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) might decide was one which could affect national security; for example, the leak of cabinet documents. There is not a single employee of the government whose telephone could not be kept under surveillance under this provision of the bill. The capability of doing precisely that certainly exists in the city of Ottawa. One would almost think that very well-laid plans had been made, in anticipation of the passage of this legislation, by the creation of the police and security planning group in the Department of the Solicitor General. In any event, the capability is there and the likelihood is there.

I do not believe for a moment that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would hesitate to go to the Solicitor General when his telegrams were leaked to the hon. member for Scarborough West, for example, and say, "Look here, Warren; we must put a tap on a few of these employees of mine to find out who is responsible for this leak."

Mr. Allmand: That would be illegal under the bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Not at all. As I read it, and I hope I am wrong, the bill permits the Solicitor General to grant a warrant for electronic intrusion in cases which he figures affect the security of this country. The supposed threat need not be external.

Mr. Allmand: Does the hon. member think the RCMP would agree to that?

Mr. Nielsen: They may not agree. But that is not the point. What is the army doing in the bill? They may not agree, but if the Secretary of State for External Affairs went to the Solicitor General and said, "I need help. We need a tap on a few telephones".

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a serious enough matter. But suppose it were even more serious. I am sure the Solicitor General could be easily convinced that it was in the interest of national security to issue a warrant. That is what I think is wrong about the principle contained in this provision.

Frankly, I do not have a telephone in my apartment in Ottawa. And I am giving serious consideration to getting rid of the one in my office. I tell hon. members here, and anyone who calls me, "If you do not want to read or hear again anything you say on the telephone, don't say it, because that is the situation we are in." The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) shakes his head in disbelief.

Mr. Lang: Not in disbelief. At you.

Mr. Nielsen: He says responsibility will fall mainly on the shoulders of provincial Attorneys General. Well, God help us in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories where the Minister of Justice is our Attorney General. All he has to do is exercise the powers of any provincial Attorney General. He exercises these powers in the north. The minister smiles. What is he going to do? I can tell him in advance. He is going to delegate that power, and he is going to delegate it most likely to the Crown attorney in the Yukon and to the Crown attorney in the Northwest Territories. And while I have great respect for the first appointee in the Yukon as well as for his successor, I certainly do not like the thought that a Crown attorney anywhere can exercise the kind of powers that are granted in this bill.

So I express these fears about the operative clauses of this bill. I cannot bring myself to vote against them, to vote against third reading, because I think wiretapping and electronic intrusion in all its aspects is a despicable level to which to resort in the investigatory process. I do not feel the proper guarantees have yet been written into the bill. But far more important is the fact that the activity is made unlawful even though application of the penalty provisions will be very remote. The very fact that it makes these activities unlawful is a far more important step to be taken.

Since wiretapping and electronic surveillance will be carried on anyway whether the bill is passed or not, the government is merely legalizing it by judicial control of this kind. Giving certain powers to the Solicitor General will not change matters. All it will do is to legalize something that is now illegal in terms of introducing evidence in court. As far as I am concerned, that is another unsavoury part of the bill.

Having said those things, I just want to sound one last warning. I think the provisions of the bill will be abused. I am convinced of that, and I shall sit back and wait and see. I am sure other members will discover that what I am saying now, and the fears that have been expressed by a good many members, will be realized notwithstanding the fact that the Solicitor General shakes his head in the negative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PAROLE ACT

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL AD HOC MEMBERS TO NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

The House resumed, from Monday, December 3, consideration of Bill C-191, to amend the Parole Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and motions Nos. 1 and 2 (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, one of the questions that arises from the legislation before us is, will it give us more of the same? When the government came back to the House after the October 30, 1972, election this was a question that many Canadians were asking themselves generally about this government. They hoped that, chastened as it was by the result of the election, we would get something different. But increasingly both public and parliament have come to realize we are getting more of the same. We feel this is true in terms of the Parole Board and of the policies of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). We are getting more of the same.

As we are called upon to approve the appointment of ten ad hoc members to the board, we also wonder whether this will simply mean more of the same kind of parole policy that we have had in the past. Indeed, one might wonder whether the legislation to appoint ten additional members to the Parole Board means more of the same in the sense of appointing more ex-Liberal candidates to government office. Most of all, we are wondering whether the appointment of ten more members to the Parole Board will mean more of the same in terms of providing parole to inmates who should not receive parole.

One of the matters that has brought the parole Board and the system into disrepute in many parts of Canada has been the maladministration of parole by the board. In saying that I do not want any member of the House to think I am calling into question the principle of parole—that is an easy misrepresentation through which the Parole Board itself can be defended when it should not be defended. What I am questioning is not the parole system itself, but the maladministration of that system by the board. In raising this point I think of such example as the notorious case of the Nelles kidnappers. Ralph Cameron and Peter Burns were paroled in July, 1971, after serving 20 months of their ten-year sentence. In November, 1971, John Rogan was paroled after serving 24 months of a 12-year sentence. Michael Whiteside was released after serving 26 months of a 12-year sentence.

A Toronto barrister, Glen How, wrote the chairman of the National Parole Board to protest, he said, against the shortness of the terms that these men were obliged to serve. Referring to their crime, he said that this was a cold-blooded, premeditated act carefully planned by people who knew better. What did the chairman of the National Parole Board say in reply to that letter? In his letter to Glen How he said:

> The board does have power to grant parole ahead of normal eligibility date—which is one-third of their sentence—if there are exceptional circumstances about the case. We are of the opinion that there were such exceptional circumstances in this case, and that it was more of a stupid prank than a real act of kidnapping.

That is the attitude of the man who was then chairman, and still is chairman of the Parole Board. So if we are going to appoint ten more men to the board, we have to ask whether we are going to receive more of the same. Is this the kind of thing we can expect? As Mr. How asked of the chairman of the National Parole Board in his second letter to the chairman:

> To characterize a crime as a "stupid prank" does not change the nature or quality of the act. Was the woman seized and held against her will? Was it intended by the perpetrators? Did they try to get a ransom? Was it carefully and exhaustively planned? Were they teenage children or men of age of responsibility?

So very frequently over the years that kind of maladministration of parole has been the record of this board, for the example I have cited is not an isolated exception. I should like to quote as follows from an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 23, 1973:

> There are times nowadays when the proceedings in Canadian criminal courts seem to follow a script written by Groucho Marx.
> There was, for example, the trial in Montreal recently of Thomas Oszlansky. Last June, Oszlansky had a slight brush with the law. Armed with a rifle, he held up a delicatessen, herded four employees into a walk-in refrigerator, and shot all four of them dead. He also shot a security guard in the head, but in this instance his aim was less accurate and the victim has recovered.
>
> At the trial, Oszlansky pleaded guilty to non-capital murder and was sentenced to life imprisonment. But the talk at the hearing was less of putting him in jail than of getting him out.
>
> Defence counsel said that application would be made for Oszlansky's earliest possible release. The prosecutor agreed that eventual parole should be considered.

● (2140)

The editorial continues:

> This is strange talk to hear after a massacre such as Oszlansky committed. It is still wierder in view of the psychiatric evidence in the case. The psychiatrists advised that while Oszlansky was not legally insane, he was subject to mental disorders aggravated by drugs; he suffered from hallucinations and was apparently inclined to go berserk when he imagined anyone was laughing at him. The picture suggest a criminal psychopath capable of any extreme of violence and liable to go off the rails again and again.
> Against this background, it is hard to understand how even a defence lawyer could speak of early release—and still harder to understand how a responsible prosecutor could give the idea even qualified support. The only sensible way to handle a killer like this is to keep him confined in either a maximum security penitentiary or an equally secure mental institution for the rest of his life—or until highly qualified, cautious and responsible experts are satisfied that he is no longer dangerous. We can only hope—for the safety of everyone—that the National Parole Board will not allow itself to be pressured into handling the case on any other basis.

That is a hope which many people across this country clutch with some despair because of the record of the Parole Board. I should also like to quote from a collection of case studies by Judge A. L. Bewley of British Columbia. I cite the example of a person granted parole after more than one instance of criminal activity and who committed an offence while on parole:

> This man began his criminal career in Quebec in March, 1960, with the theft of an auto.
> Between then and June, 1968, he was convicted of 20 separate criminal offences, including theft, escaping lawful custody—twice—assaulting a guard on escape, possession of stolen goods, possession of an offensive weapon.
> On May 5, 1967, at New Westminster, he was sentenced to 12 years for breaking prison by violence and other crimes committed during that escape. He appealed, and the Appeal Court reduced his sentences to seven years on February 28, 1968.
> Eleven months after being sentenced thus by the Court of Appeal, he was released on parole—June 18, 1970. His sentences were due to expire in 1976.
> Less than one month after being released on parole—on July 6 and 16, 1970—he committed three robberies. He was convicted of these and sentenced on August 24, 1970, and November 26, 1970, to 15 years on each charge.

This kind of thing has been so widespread in the record of the National Parole Board that according to one survey conducted during the administration of the former solicitor general, 40 per cent of those who were released on parole broke that parole by crime or some other violation. So we must ask, when we are requested to appoint ten more members to the Parole Board, whether it is just to have more of the same, or can we expect that there will be a more reasonable, common sense and responsible administration of the parole system so that there are not released on the public of this country people who are still a danger to the safety of ordinary citizens.

On the other side of the coin we must ask ourselves whether this will also mean there will be more of the same in the way in which frequently the Parole Board has mismanaged its responsibility by being rigid, and even repressive, in depriving parole to people who could act in the way in which it is intended they should act. A good example of the Parole Board applying the last letter of the law rigidly and repressively is the case of Rhonda Murray, the 17-year old girl who was convicted of an offence in New Brunswick, sent to prison, paroled and then came to Toronto in contravention of her parole. There she was arrested and placed in the Don jail. She was held there, according to the letter of the law, for violating the letter of the law. She was penalized by being kept in that institution. What a danger she was! Certainly we must wonder at the thinking of a Parole Board which will release on parole men who have committed serious and dangerous acts of violence, not once but twice or three times or more and have been given parole, and who treat this girl as if she were public enemy number one. This is not an exceptional case. Would that it were!

In this debate we have heard about the situation in some of our institutions, particularly by Saskatchewan penitentiary and the Drumheller institution, both of which I have visited. An inordinate number of native people are confined in these institutions. In the Drumheller institution perhaps 25 per cent of the inmates are Indian people. I would hazard a guess that the percentage in the Saskatchewan penitentiary is comparable. These people, as an ethnic group within Canada, represent a very small percentage of our people but an extraordinarily large proportion of the penitentiary population.

This must raise a question in our minds concerning the way in which the Parole Board is being administered. We must wonder, are all the Indians so dangerous that so few of them can be released on parole? Are they such a threat to public safety that we must have so many of them confined behind bars? Do we really take seriously the implication that the rest of the country produces people who can be released onto the streets after committing an offence, but not the native people?

It is for such obvious reasons we must ask, are we to have more of the same, more of the maladministration of the parole system? The minister may, defensively, point out how many successes the board has achieved. I would hope, on the contrary, that he would take seriously this kind of criticism which is directed, not against him personally or against his record as a minister so much as against the way in which over the years the board has administered or misadministered its mandate, and that he would direct his attention more to making those reforms which will make this board a responsible institution, because certainly its opportunity is great.

The people of this country want parole to be managed and distributed in such a way that those who are not a danger to citizens will have an opportunity to be released from the penitentiary in order to gain experience in preparation for full freedom. Most people believe in the principle of parole. What disheartens me is not that parole is being granted, but that it is being misused in the way it has been, in a Canadian sense. We would therefore hope that the minister would begin to enunciate in this House some reform policies more than the meagre promise that is contained in this bill. He has suggested to us he intends to appoint this kind of person and that kind of person who will greatly improve the quality of the Parole Board. We hope he is right. But really the kind of bill to which he has committed himself is far below the need of the parole system in the country as a whole.

I can, therefore, have a great measure of sympathy with the amendments that have been suggested because their motivation is to recognize that Parole Board reform, in the limited way that the bill calls for, is not enough and that we must have much more extensive and profound reform of the board and of the parole system. However, like other hon. members I would question the validity of the particular amendments that have been put before us. There are obvious weaknesses in them, suggesting that there ought to be two members from one group and two members from another group. If one were to continue this logically, one would have to bring in representatives from various groups in the populace. But notwithstanding that weakness, I certainly share with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and others the concern that there be adequate reform of the Parole Board and of the parole system so that we will not simply have more of the same, which is the great fear that many people have across this country.

For one thing, Mr. Speaker, we will have to look for a much greater attempt at decentralization than seems to be the intention of the minister. We have been told that the members of the Parole Board will be distributed across the country instead of being confined to the national capital. But we have to wonder if this decentralization will be as thorough-going a reorganization of the board as we might have hoped. And we have to wonder whether the decentralization of the board, distributing its members to various regional centres, will be a thorough-going decentralization by which each regional centre will have sufficient autonomy to do its work properly.

One of the things that has impressed me on visiting penitentiaries throughout the country and discussing the situation with staff members as well as inmates has been the feeling of alienation that can be found on the part of officers and guards and other staff members in our institutions, a feeling of alienation which I dare say afflicts the parole system as well, a feeling of alienation that I think can only be treated properly when we begin thoroughly to decentralize our system and give each of the regional centres adequate authority to function more or less on its own.

At the present time, the authority is almost entirely restricted to Ottawa, and there is great difficulty in transmitting the edicts and policy decisions of top officials to those who have to carry them out in the local institutions. It is for that reason that we need decentralization. I am really at a loss to know whether the intention of the minister, in calling for the appointment of these ten ad hoc members, is to have that kind of thorough-going decentralization or not.

One can suspect that while board members will be put here and there, the reins will still be so tightly held within Ottawa's hands that there will not be very much change involved. So once again we come back to this fundamental question: are we just going to have more of the same, or are we going to have something sufficiently different that we can look forward to a parole system that will be a credit to this country, that will express the humanitarian ideals of its people, administered in such a way that there is a realistic appraisal of danger and violence, and that there is a proper balance of rehabilitation with restraint?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret interrupting the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. However, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I think that the bill before us, discussed and studied as it has been by many concerned members in the House and in the committee, has indicated the sense of responsibility which we have as representatives of people from various parts of the country. Because of the maladministration of the parole system in recent years, a cloud has developed over parole and there has been great concern that there be adequate reform of the administration of parole in Canada, a concern that I do not think has been properly provided for in this legislation. Certainly we on this side of the House are prepared to support the bill, but we would like to have some straight and constructive answers from the minister to the serious questions which we have put to him, answers which we have not yet received.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—LAND ACT REGULATIONS RESPECTING ACQUISITION OF SMALL HOLDINGS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not an accident, it is not a coincidence, that the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and I both have questions for this "late show" period tonight with respect to the Veterans Land Act. It is quite deliberate on our part, for we both feel very strongly about the issue and we hope that by giving the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) two chances to answer our questions we will get the right answers.

Perhaps I might say that it is not without significance that in these 20 minutes the three of us who have the floor are a Progressive Conservative—and in the case of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe I emphasize the "progressive"—the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who I hope is a liberal Liberal and in my case a New Democrat, with emphasis on the "new". Together we demonstrate the concern of all hon. members for the welfare of our veterans.

On Friday, November 9, as recorded in Hansard at page 7693, this House unanimously passed a motion which I had the privilege of moving, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. That motion read as follows:

> That this House requests that the Minister of Veterans Affairs give urgent consideration to the amending of the Veterans Land Act regulations to permit veterans to acquire small holdings, even if the main purpose of most of the older veterans now applying for loans under the Veterans Land Act is to meet their housing requirements, it being the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of any veteran.

Some days later, on Wesdnesday, November 21, I put a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs in which I referred to the motion which had been passed on November 9 and asked whether he was yet in a position to report to the House on the request made in that motion. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe had a supplementary question on that occasion, and so here we are tonight, the three of us. My friend and I have divided the field a bit. I wish to concentrate on the position that has been taken quite often by the minister, to the effect that VLA is not for housing. He spelled this out quite fully on November 6 when he was responding to another question of my friend from Newfoundland. I will quote in particular a paragraph on page 7605 of Hansard where the minister said:

● (2200)

As indicated, in previous statements which I have made both in the House and to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, VLA was not designed as a program of urban housing nor as part of a retirement program for persons reaching the end of their productive careers. Its basic purpose was to provide loans for the purchase of agricultural land to be used on a full or part time farming basis by veterans who were interested in this form of rehabilitation program on their return to civilian life following wartime active force service.

The point that my friend and I sought to make in the motion that this House passed, on November 9 is that the minister should meet head-on the contention that veterans are now making, since these veterans are older men, that even though they are not now at an age that they can go into farming, even though all they want a smallholding for is a place to have a home and to retire, that that request should be met. A good deal has been said about the number of veterans—whether it is 125,000 or 140,000—who have certificates that would qualify them for a loan under the Veterans Land Act because they got the certificate before October 3, 1968. It is often said about them that they got those qualification certificates just in case they might want to use them, but now that there is a deadline of March 31, 1974, unless they get a loan before then, they are out. Some of these veterans, admittedly, are not wanting to go into small farming but they have other comrades who got assistance for a smallholding which includes a home and a house that they are living in, and in which they are able to retire, and they feel they should have that right as well.

As I say, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe will develop other aspects of the matter, but the point I should like to impress upon the minister is that it does not satisfy us for him continually to tell us that the act was set up simply for farming purposes. We think that the desire to have a small piece of property on which to retire, the desire to have a piece of this land for which our veterans fought, and the wish to have a home is a legitimate one. We think that the minister should consider seriously what this House unanimously passed on November 9, namely, that thought be given to changing the regulations so that veterans can get loans under the Veterans Land Act even if all they want is enough money for enough land on which to build a place where they can live and enjoy their home and their period of retirement.

As I say, there are various angles in this issue but it seems to me that the time has come for the minister to deal directly with this request: that the Veterans Land Act, or at least its regulations, be transformed to meet the needs of over 100,000 veterans who have certificates, who admittedly want mainly a chance to build a home in which they can retire. I simply say, why not? For my part, and I know I speak for my friend from Newfoundland and I think probably the minister agrees with both of us, this desire ought to be met and I hope that tonight, either in his answer to me or in his answer to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, the minister will give us the answer that I believe, he really wants to give us.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on November 9 last requested that I give urgent consideration to the amendment of the Veterans Land Act regulations to permit veterans to acquire smallholdings, even if the main purpose of the older veterans now applying for VLA loans is to meet their housing requirements. I believe the nature of the amendment contemplated would be cancellation of section 24 of the Veterans Land Act which prescribes that the minimum size of property for VLA smallholding purposes shall be one half acre or, at the discretion of the director, not less than 17,424 square feet. This is not, of course, a new proposal. Although I have not completed the consideration which the House requested I give to the matter, I must say that I am impressed with the substance of the numerous factors which on previous occasions led to the conclusion that a change such as I believe is contemplated by this motion should not be made.

In looking at this matter in the perspective of the purpose of the Veterans Land Act, it must be remembered that it was one of three alternative rehabilitation measures enacted to assist veterans following discharge from wartime active service, and was designed for those interested in settling on the land as full-time farmers or in utilizing agricultural land in conjunction with off-farm employment.

I believe it is evident that the smallholding or part-time farming provisions of the Veterans Land Act were never intended to represent a measure to assist veterans in the acquisition of urban housing. To have done so would have served to duplicate the provisions of the National Housing Act and the various arrangements made under that act in the post-war years to make housing accommodation available to veterans. It was, in fact, to avoid any such duplication and to adhere to the intent and purpose of the Veterans Land Act that minimum acreage requirements for smallholdings were prescribed by regulation in 1946.

Further evidence to this effect is furnished by the approval given by parliament in 1954 to the introduction of part II of the Veterans Land Act—as recommended by the government by the Royal Canadian Legion—under which financial and other assistance was made available to veterans interested in building homes on city-size lots and who were approved for loans under the National Housing Act.

More than 4,500 veterans built their own homes under the provisions of part II. I think it must be acknowledged that these veterans at least would consider complete elimination of a minimum acreage requirement to be a breach of faith. I believe it must also be realized, however, that a substantial number of veterans who used benefits alternative to those of the Veterans Land Act did so because VLA smallholding loans were not available for the purchase of city-size lots in urban areas and particularly those who did not obtain a VLA certificate of qualification for that reason by the deadline of October 31, 1968, would take a similar view if action were to be taken now to eliminate the minimum land requirement.

In considering this matter, I must also keep in mind that section 24 of the Act already provides that the minimum land requirement does not apply to veterans in receipt of a disability pension of 50 per cent or more. As I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet completed my consideration of this matter. From my studies to date, however, I would reiterate that I am strongly impressed by the various factors which have led to the conclusion on previous occasions that a minimum land size requirement should be maintained, and some of which I have reviewed here tonight.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST THAT DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS UNDER LAND ACT BE EXTENDED

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, what is happening tonight is another attempt on my part and on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to get some straight answers from the minister—perhaps I should not say that—but to get consideration for the fact that because of changing conditions veterans find it difficult to meet their needs under the Veterans Land Act. Apparently the first attempt has been in vain. Whether my own few words will be effective, I do not know.

The minister indicated that in 1954, in order to meet changing conditions, the department made provision for building lots primarily to be used for the building of homes. That is where the problem lies today, Mr. Speaker. A vast number of veterans are being stultified by restrictions. The minister indicated that many of the 140,000 applicants applied "just in case"; they certified themselves after October 31, 1968, just in case they wanted to build a home later on. According to reports of the department, only 5 per cent of those 140,000 applicants will take up their right to build. Even so, those people are being stultified by restrictions imposed with regard to the size of the lot, to which the minister referred, by mortgage loans being only as high as $18,000 and by the down payment requirement of $2,600. The minister ought to know, and if he does not he can find out by asking the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), that it is impossible to build a house on a lot of one half acre or less for $18,000.

I am sure the minister is getting as much mail as we are to rebut his remarks that there are not many now applying. He must be receiving mail from those who indicate they did not know about the October 31, 1968, deadline. I was on an open-line show in Kingston the other day. I received two or three calls from World War II veterans who did not know about the deadline.

Apart from the facts I have mentioned, there is no justification for phasing out the act if there is even one veteran in this country who is denied the opportunities provided under the act. A pledge was made in 1917, and again in 1944 by the then prime minister who stated emphatically, and I am not trying to be dramatic or emotional, that no veteran would ever have to say that Canada did not repay the obligation owed to all veterans who served.

Without going into further debate, there is a very simple solution to the problem that the minister could propose to his conscientious-objector cabinet. I suggest the minister suspend phasing out the act for a period of three years. I suggest he amend the act to raise the maximum loan to $30,000, reduce the lot requirements to a normal-size building lot and provide the same method of 95 per cent loans under the National Housing Act.

The minister should write a letter to every veteran who is certified, asking whether they are now ready to build under the new conditions. He should write to every veteran of World War II and Korea offering the same terms and asking their intentions on retirement. With the co-operation of the national veterans organizations, every last veteran should be allowed to be certified within that period.

It would also be a shame to phase out the veterans land administration which is set up with top expertise. It has the organizational ability to serve a large segment of our population in the desperate housing situation that exists today. All the minister will be doing is throwing thousands of citizens into the jungle where many hundreds of thousands are having a difficult time finding housing today, something which this government is finding difficult to resolve.

I hope the minister will not quote more meaningless figures and leave the matter hanging in the air. We only have four more months. I ask the minister to ensure that all of us will not be sorry for the impending action this government intends to take.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) has suggested that the deadline of March 31, 1974, as specified in the Veterans Land Act pursuant to an amendment made to that act some eight years ago, will be detrimental to some 125,000 veterans who are qualified to apply for VLA loans because the time remaining is so short as to preclude them from locating suitable properties and submitting loan applications. It seems to me that the essence of his representations was expressed in his remarks in the House on November 6 last. My response at that time is recorded at page 7605 of Hansard and I believe there is little more that I need say tonight.

I think I should repeat, however, that I am satisfied the vast majority of those veterans who obtained VLA qualification certificates by the deadline of October 31, 1968, did so on a purely precautionary basis in case their personal circumstances or plans should alter before the March, 1974 deadline. My view in this respect is supported by the fact they have already had some 28 years to settle under the provisions of the act if they were interested in doing so; and that apart from the increase which I think was to be expected in this final year, there was relatively no change in the number who applied for establishment in each of the three previous fiscal years.

Having regard for the lending deadlines specified in the act as approved by parliament in 1965, the veterans land administration has been taking advantage, wherever practical, of normal staff attrition so that there will be no undue number of surplus personnel after new settlement comes to an end. Notwithstanding the lesser number of staff now on strength compared to last year and the year before, almost without exception loan applications are being handled in an effective manner. I am confident the VLA staff will continue to do so between now and next March even if some further acceleration should occur in the rate of applications.

Adjournment Debate

HEALTH—POSSIBLE TOXICITY OF BLOOD IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on a matter of the utmost urgency and importance. I refer to the use in Canadian laboratories of contaminated blood samples imported from the United States. Radio CJOB in Winnipeg brought this situation to light recently. These blood samples are used for testing the delicate equipment employed when exact tests are carried out on blood samples from Canadian patients.

At the University of Saskatchewan Hospital in Saskatoon, two laboratory technicians have died within the past year. Both deaths have been traced to infectious hepatitis. In both instances it is believed the disease was attributable to the presence of Australia antigen in imported commercial blood products. During the past year, five other technicians at the laboratory also contracted the disease. Fortunately, their symptoms were not fatal.

I have raised this serious matter in the House on several occasions. However, all my efforts to alert the minister appear to have been in vain. To date I have received no concrete assurances that anything at all has been done. On November 6 I asked the minister whether he was aware of the situation. He assured me that his department was aware of it and added that an investigation was under way. On November 22 the minister informed me in a letter that an investigation had been carried out, and said:

> Certain blood fractions used for experimental or diagnostic purposes have on occasion been contaminated with hepatitis viruses. There is at present no foolproof way to test such products to ensure they are free from hepatitis viruses.

I was surprised when I read those words. The minister does not appear to be familiar with the modern tests for detecting hepatitis. I shall elaborate in a minute. On November 29 I asked the minister whether he intended to conduct an inquiry into the deaths, as requested by the University of Saskatchewan laboratory technicians. I was informed that the matter "now falls under the purview of the Saskatchewan government and there is no need for a special inquiry." These statements are difficult to understand, considering the fact that three weeks earlier the minister had assured me the federal Department of Health was investigating the matter.

The danger that blood products can be contaminated with Australia antigen has been known for some time. It is therefore surprising that there should be no federal legislation to deal with the hazard. The minister acknowledges the danger but appears unwilling to do anything about it. An article which appeared in the May 5, 1973, edition of the Lancet, a leading British medical journal, clearly spells out just how serious the situation has become. The article states that special tests of commercial blood products distributed by eight United States companies and one European company showed that 72 per cent were contaminated with the heptatitis B antigen. The article goes on to say, however:

> Routine detection of the hepatitis B antigen has become possible, significantly assisting the clinical diagnosis.

However, in his letter of November 22 the minister stated, as I have mentioned,, that there is no foolproof way to test blood products for hepatitis. It seems the minister may have been mistaken. According to the Lancet, techniques such as immune radiometry are currently being used with much effectiveness in detecting infectious hepatitis. It seems to me that if these techniques are available, the health department should perhaps familiarize itself with them. Although extremely tragic, the events at the University of Saskatchewan hospital should not be surprising, especially in view of the British findings. The situation is undoubtedly the same across the rest of Canada.

[Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan).]

As I mentioned earlier, practically none of these laboratory samples is manufactured in Canada. Instead, we are mainly dependent upon American sources of supply. Americans, like Canadians, are reluctant to sell their blood, even for a good price. The result is that the pool of professional blood donors includes a large number of drug addicts, the majority of whom probably carry infectious hepatitis.

If the Canadian government enacted federal legislation requiring that all laboratory blood products imported into Canada be tested and guaranteed free from hepatitis, problems would arise for the commercial manufacturers. If the drug addicts and others who carry infectious hepatitis had to be dropped from the pool of professional donors, then the price which would have to be paid to attract a sufficient number of donors would have to be increased very considerably. Since we are dealing with a multimillion dollar industry, you can expect some pretty powerful opposition if you attempt to get any Canadian federal legislation passed to deal with this matter.

The risk which lab workers face of contracting infectious hepatitis from blood specimens which they handle from patients would, of course, remain. But the over-all risk could be very substantially diminished if it could be guaranteed that the laboratory products which they have to use every day are free from infection. This can only be done through legislation similar to that recently passed in the United States. The law there now requires such testing and screening. It is also very important that a wholesale inventory is taken of existing supplies, should legislation be enacted. Existing stock in hospital and other laboratories should be tested or destroyed immediately. The minister must act to correct this serious situation.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I answer the hon. member concerning the important and serious problem he has raised.

I will mention first that the tragic deaths that occurred in Saskatchewan are events regretted by all authorities concerned. As I have already said to the hon. member, an investigation has been undertaken by the Saskatchewan government which has jurisdiction over the hospital and laboratories involved. There is nothing extraordinary nor unusual in this, for such investigations are regularly conducted by provincial governments, and it is appropriate to proceed in this manner.

[English]

As far as my departmental responsibility is concerned, my department does not have the responsibility of carrying the investigation itself but of looking at the safety of particular serums being used and the safety of the procedures regarding importation and distribution of serums. I must point out that up to now there is no conclusive evidence linking the two tragic deaths with any particular serum. However, as I have told the hon. member in a previous letter, officers of my department have investigated this matter and have concluded that certain blood fractions used for experimental or diagnostic purposes have on occasion been contaminated with hepatitis viruses. I also stated that there is no foolproof way to test such products to ensure that they are free from hepatitis viruses.

My department is aware of the particular article referred to by the hon. member in the Lancet and of the particular immune radiometry experience. My department is looking into this particular testing at the present time and trying to assess how foolproof this particular test would be. At the present time we are not in a position to assure the House that this will be a foolproof test either. In the absence of appropriate tests, laboratory workers who utilize such products must take necessary precautions to ensure that they will not be exposed to undue risk. Research on the development of tests to assess the safety of blood fractions is being conducted at the present time in a number of centres in Canada and elsewhere. Pending its successful completion, persons handling such materials must take appropriate precautions.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF RAILWAY CARS TO SHIP BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to seek permission to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the continuing refusal of the government to take any steps to provide railway cars for lumber and lumber products, although it deems it worth while to ask for legislative authority to act in the area of oil products by authorizing the movement of railway cars, as set out in Clause 25 of Bill C-236. Therefore I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett):

That this House instructs the Minister of Transport forthwith to introduce legislation that will establish an office or official with the authority to order railway cars, motive power or other railway equipment to be allotted, distributed, used or moved as required—

That is an extract from the bill.

—for the purpose of ensuring that lumber and lumber products are able to be transported by rail.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

POST OFFICE

QUALITY OF SERVICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Because of the continuing deterioration in Canada's postal service as evidenced by the great numbers of complaints pouring in from all parts of Canada, the failure of the assured mail delivery service, and the resort to gimmicks such as plastic tie bags rather than fundamental solutions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That this House authorize the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, to inquire into the above-mentioned matters with a view to restoring Canada's postal service to its former high standard of efficiency.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

PROVISION OF RAILWAY CARS TO MOVE GRAIN—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. As the government has brought forward legislation to force the railways to allocate cars for the movement of oil, I seek to move the following motion relating to grain, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That this House instructs the Minister of Transport forthwith to introduce legislation that will establish an office or official with the authority to order railway cars, motive power or other railway equipment to be allotted, distributed, used or moved as required for the purpose of ensuring that sufficient grain is in place to meet our export commitments to our international customers.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I believe my motion will have the concurrence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet). I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

That this House urge the Postmaster General to announce immediately his new policy of payments to rural mail carriers and sub-post office contractors.

PROVISION OF RAILWAY CARS TO SHIP BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I seek authority to move another motion under Standing Order 43 relating to the same subject matter as my first motion, railway cars. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House condemns the Minister of Transport for his continuing refusal to take steps to provide railway cars for lumber products in British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has expressed views from time to time regarding the propriety of a motion such as this. Under the guise of a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43 the hon. member is really proposing what is tantamount to a censure motion or a non-confidence motion. I doubt that the Standing Order ought to be used for this purpose, for the reason that the practice of the House does not make it possible for a minister to reply or for debate to take place. Having cautioned hon. members on this basis, I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent for this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

IDENTIFICATION OF CRIMINALS ACT

PROVISION FOR DESTROYING OF RESULTS OF IDENTIFICATION PROCESS UPON DISCHARGE OR ACQUITTAL OF ACCUSED

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-237, to amend the Identification of Criminals Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Identification of Criminals Act to provide that the results of the identification process be destroyed upon the discharge or acquittal of the accused. As the statute presently stands, the results of the identification can become part of police records and can be used by the constabulary as they see fit and published and distributed generally among the police forces throughout Canada.

The amendment is to bring the statute into line with the time-honoured tradition of the Canadian criminal process that a person is not deemed to be guilty until proven guilty.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

1. What were the amounts of money spent by the Privy Council Office on publicity and/or information in each of the fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74 to date?

2. What were the names and addresses of firms and individuals who received these contracts, what amounts of money were spent in each case and what was the purpose of each contract?

3. In the case of expenditures for publicity and/or information made within the Department by its publicity or information division, what was the amount in each case and the purpose of the expenditure?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. Nil.

3. Not applicable.

TRANSPORTATION DEVELOPMENT AGENCY PROGRAM

Question No. 2,969—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What were the names of organizations, other than universities, receiving transportation research grants from the Transportation Development Agency Program in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74 to date and what were the amounts of money involved in each case?

2. What are the objectives of the above program?

3. Has the department conducted any evaluative study of the program and, if so, what was the date of the latest report?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): It is presumed that all elements of the inquiry refer to the Grants and Contributions portion of the Transportation Development Agency program. 1. No grant or contribution expenditures were made by the Transportation Development Agency during fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71 or 1971-72. Responsibility for administration of the university grants and fellowship program was transferred to the agency from the Canadian Transport Commission during fiscal year 1971-72. All of the grant and contribution expenditures made by the agency during fiscal years 1972-73 and 1973-74 were in support of the university grants and fellowship program.

2. The objectives of the university grants program is to encourage the development of broad interdisciplinary transport-related research and teaching programs and to support research into specific aspects of transportation. The fellowship program permits qualified candidates to undertake studies and research in transportation and transport related fields at Canadian universities in order to increase the number of people with educational and research experience in transportation and to provide opportunities for conducting research in areas of significance related to Canadian transportation problems.

3. An evaluation of the effectiveness of the grants and fellowships program is currently under way and it is expected that the report will be completed by the end of January 1974.

Question No. 2,997—Mr. Reid:

Has the government made any (a) grants (b) loan guarantees (c) loans to the Anishinahbeg Man-O-Min Co-operative of Kenora, Ontario in the past three years and, if so, what were the amounts, by year, in each of the above categories?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Grants, loan guarantees and loans were provided in 1972 and 1973 in connection with the harvesting, processing and marketing of wild rice crops. Question No. 3,010—Mr. Howie:

1. Were changes made in the term of security deposit requirements before the closing of tenders for cleaning contract STJ2-5528A at CFB Gagetown in March 1973 and, if so, for what reason?

2. Excluding Saturday and Sunday, how many days prior to closing were these changes notified to each of the tenderers and how was this notification made?

3. Was the time for closing of tenders extended and, if not, for what reason?

4. For what reason was the lowest and next lowest tender not accepted and what were the amounts and names of these and the successful tender?

5. Was a representative of Custodian Services Limited, Mr. Vincent Fox, denied information as to the time and place of opening of tenders so he or a representative could attend and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes. As the requirement was of substantial value the department required to have a security deposit or bid bond submitted at the same time as the tender.

2. Telegrams were despatched four working days prior to closing date of the tenders.

3. No. It was decided that there was sufficient and reasonable time for all tenderers to respond. No requests were received from any of the potential bidders to extend the tender closing date.

4. The lowest and next lowest submissions were not accepted because they did not conform to the requirements of the Invitation to Tender. Better Building Maintenance Limited, $19,490. per month; Custodian Services Ltd., $21,431. per month; Jet Janitor Services Limited, $22,600. per month, (Successful Tenderer);

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 259.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF PEI RESPECTING BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE

Motion No. 259—Mr. Macquarrie:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents between the Minister of Transport and other responsible Ministers and the Government of Prince Edward Island respecting the Borden-Tormentine ferry service subsequent to the date of the latest national railway strike.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the release of any exchanges between the Ministry of Transport, the Prime Minister's office and the government of Prince Edward Island on the Borden-Tormentine ferry service cannot be made in light of the decision of the government of Prince Edward Island to take legal action against the government of Canada on the matter of federal constitutional obligations. It would appear that this might prejudice any proceedings before a court of justice. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I would like the motion to be put.

Mr. Reid: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the other notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

OIL SUPPLIES—EFFECT OF AMOUNTS MOVED BY SEA OR LAND TO EASTERN CANADA AND FUTURE PRODUCTION AT COME-BY-CHANCE ON ESTIMATED SHORTFALL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I hope he can hear me. Is he prepared to revert to motions to make a statement to the House along the lines of the declaration he made in a special briefing to the press this morning with regard to petroleum supplies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there were widespread requests this morning, so I responded in general to the press. I am quite prepared to answer questions. We will, of course, be debating the question of supplies later this day.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the minister tell the House whether the 200,000 barrels a day figure he gave as the possible shortfall in the supply of petroleum for Canada took into account the amount that might reasonably be made up from the movement of Canadian crude into Quebec and the Atlantic provinces by sea or by transportation across land? I think the figures he has given us are a possible 50,000 barrels a day by sea and between 40,000 and 60,000 barrels a day by land. Did the 200,000 barrel shortfall make any allowance for that movement?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The 200,000 barrel figure was the anticipated interruption from international sources. Naturally, we would try to make good, as we have attempted to do, on the supply side by the methods suggested by the hon. gentleman. The 200,000 barrel figure had reference to interruptions of supplies reaching the eastern Canadian market from overseas.

Mr. Stanfield: So it is possible that the movement of western Canadian crude might offset the shortfall from overseas by about 100,000 barrels a day. When the minister estimated a 200,000 barrel shortfall from overseas, did he take into account the projected petroleum product that might be available from the operation of the Come-By-Chance refinery which is supposed to have a capacity of 100,000 barrels a day, or was his assumption based on the worst expectation at all likely and nothing was taken into account from Come-By-Chance on the basis that nothing could be counted on from a refinery that was not yet in operation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am advised that the judgment of the advisory committee was that the Come-By-Chance refinery would not be in a position, at least early in the first quarter of 1974, to assist the Canadian market and for that reason the committee discounted the ability of that refinery to assist the Canadian market with product supplies.

Mr. Stanfield: In other words, if in fact arrangements are possible to move 100,000 barrels a day of Canadian crude by sea and/or by land, and if the Come-By-Chance refinery goes into operation at the end of this month as its management predicts it will, producing approximately 100,000 barrels a day, these two sources might offset a large part of the shortfall which the minister considers possible from overseas?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If those two eventualities came about, the exposure of Canadians would be very much reduced. I would agree.

Mr. Bell: In other words, no crisis.

OIL SUPPLIES—REQUEST THAT OIL COMPANY HEADS APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE TO INFORM MEMBERS ABOUT SITUATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): In view of the many uncertainties surrounding the energy situation at the moment, would the minister give consideration to inviting immediately the heads of the principal oil companies in Canada to appear before the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works so that members of the House might better inform themselves about the actual situation that exists today and be able to decide to what extent, if at all, an oil crisis does exist in the country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not, of course, give instructions to the committee but I would be delighted, should the committee be interested in that suggestion, if it would issue such invitations.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Give them terms of reference.

CONSIDERATION OF IMPORTED OIL REQUIRED BY COME-BY-CHANCE REFINERY IN ESTIMATING POSSIBLE SHORTFALL—GUARANTEE OF SUPPLIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On November 13, as reported at page 7732 of Hansard, in answer to a question of mine about the availability of petroleum products from the refinery at Come-By-Chance, the minister said that "if it does go into operation this winter it will be covered by the export control regime we now have in effect with regard to refined products." I want to ask the minister whether, in estimating a shortfall of 200,000 barrels a day, he took into consideration at that time the imported oil which the Come-By-Chance refinery would need? I ask this particularly in view of the fact that it is supplied by the British Petroleum Trading Company whose primary suppliers are the Arab emirates, Iran and Nigeria. Can the minister tell the House first of all whether that was included in the shortfall, and second, has he any guarantee of supplies of raw material for the refinery at Come-By-Chance?

● (1420)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was assumed that the refinery might be in a position to import some feedstock, at least for its own operations, which if it did not go into operation might be part of the general Canadian pool of crude oil. But the assumption made was that the imports could not be continuous so as to assure a supply of 100,000 barrels a day until the refinery got into operation. As I said to the Leader of the Opposition, the advice of the committee is that, given the difficulties generally of starting up and the difficulties encountered at this refinery in particular, it was not anticipated that it would at an early date be able to supply the Canadian market with a full range of products.

Mr. Douglas: When does the minister anticipate the refinery will be operating at full capacity, and if it is operating at full capacity how much does this reduce the shortfall which the minister anticipated at 200,000 barrels a day?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I gather that at the moment the refinery is not being completed because of a strike situation. It is a matter of judgment as to when the starting up difficulties of a refinery can be overcome, but the opinion of my officials was that it is unlikely to be in full operation before, at the very earliest, the end of the first quarter. I know Mr. Shaheen is rather more optimistic and I suppose his success in life has been based on his optimism rather than otherwise, but this is the informed judgment of the industry.

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS BETWEEN GOVERNMENT MEMBERS AND SHAHEEN INTERESTS PRIOR TO PUBLICATION OF POSSIBLE OIL SUPPLY SHORTFALL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister by way of supplementary whether, when he made his statement in the House on November 26 regarding the 200,000 barrels a day shortfall, he or other members of the government had had meetings with the Shaheen people prior thereto and, if so, when did these meetings take place?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands may I say the shortfall would be reduced to the extent that the refinery could be brought into full operation. The difficulty at that point would, of course, be that during the period of the freeze-up in the St. Lawrence it would be difficult to deliver the product to Montreal where the particular shortfall arises.

In reply to the question put by the hon. member for St. John's East, and I apologize to him, the Shaheen company, Newfoundland Refining, is represented on the technical advisory committee to which I have made reference, and its official has been participating in those discussions.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for a further supplementary and then I will try with the assistance of the House to complete the first round of questioning. Following that, we might return to further supplementaries, including the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister tell the House whether he or any other minister of the government held meetings with the Shaheen company prior to his statement on November 26? I am not thinking of any meetings that may have taken place with the advisory committee but meetings at the ministerial level. Was any assurance given at that time that the Come-by-Chance refinery would be able to feed into the Canadian market?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had met with company representatives earlier in the month of November.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might try to complete the first round of questions and then we will return to hon. members who have supplementaries.

[Mr. Douglas.]

GASOLINE AND DIESEL OIL—SALES TAX REDUCTION ENABLING IMPERIAL OIL TO REDUCE WHOLESALE PRICE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, still with oil but having to do with price I should like first to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Would he explain briefly to the House what magical wand his department was able to hold in its hands in order to reduce the sales tax payable by the oil corporations, which apparently made it possible for Imperial Oil to announce some slight reduction?

Hon. Robert L. Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have been able to take any step that helps the oil companies to reduce prices for Canadian consumers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanbury: In fact, however, it was a rather unspectacular administrative step which was taken.

Mr. Lewis: I expected that.

Mr. Stanbury: For many years the department has widely applied sales tax equalization measures in various industries. The effect is to make the values for tax accounting equivalent to the selling price to wholesalers in industries where manufacturers sell at various marketing levels.

An hon. Member: That's clear.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hees: You must have learned from Paul Martin.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the obvious supplementary would be to ask the minister to explain, but I think that would probably be a further waste of time. I am too dull to follow that. I should now like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he or anybody in the government has assured himself that the reductions Imperial Oil has announced in the wholesale price, very significantly not in the retail price, of one and two-fifths of a cent a gallon east of the Ottawa Valley and four-fifths of a cent a gallon west of the Ottawa Valley, something about which the Minister of National Revenue should not boast too hard—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Lewis: —reflect fully the saving which the Santa Claus National Revenue Department gave to Imperial Oil, and will he also indicate why it is limited to gasoline and diesel oil and does not apply to home heating fuel?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the last part of the question, these are the only two commodities covered by the manufacturers' level sales tax. Home heating oil is not subject to federal tax. Therefore it is not a question of lowering the price on it. I would have to say that at the moment, without an audit, it would be difficult to estimate the exact impact on the price, but I would be glad to investigate that to ascertain, from the information we have available, the exact impact.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question that I wish to ask probably because I do not know enough about the industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: You will understand a lot more on Monday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am very flattered to be applauded by my equals in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: I didn't think there were any.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are admitting there are some?

Mr. Lewis: I do not know whether the minister knows the answer now but I should like to know why there is a difference between the reduction per gallon in eastern Canada and the reduction per gallon in western Canada? Why should that difference exist?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I cannot answer that question now but I will investigate and see if I can give a lucid reply.

COMPLAINTS ABOUT VARIATION IN GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL PRICES—SUGGESTED INQUIRY

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Richmond wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the great number of complaints we are receiving concerning the enormous differences in prices which Canadian consumers must pay when purchasing gasoline and heating oil, which cause them to have serious doubts about the fairness of this practice by the petroleum industry, will the minister investigate this matter so that Canadian consumers may know where they stand and be advised concerning the oil crisis of this type?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is the result of an oil shortage. We would also want to be able to investigate such practices and if the hon. member can mention particular instances we shall be happy to hear him.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF GOLDEN EAGLE CANADA LIMITED TO DELIVER FUEL OIL

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

He had promised the hon. member for Témiscamingue that he would look into cases in the lower St. Lawrence region. Can he tell the House what is the attitude of Golden Eagle Canada Limited in this matter? Is he aware that the same thing is now happening in Lotbinière, that is Golden Eagle Canada Limited is refusing to supply to its branches the oil that they need to serve the consumers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have been able to confirm the existence of the situation mentioned by the hon. member of Témiscamingue. The National Energy Board has investigated and arranged a meeting of the man concerned with Golden Eagle Canada Limited. During November, the quota of this man was increased, but I must say that in view of the present shortage of supplies, similar difficulties could occur in the future. If special cases occur, we can order investigations.

OIL—POSSIBILITY OF RENTING UNITED STATES TANK CARS FOR MOVEMENT—CONSULTATION WITH U.S. AUTHORITIES—ALBERTA REFINERY PRODUCTION

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he has consulted the United States railroads or the United States government with regard to the possibility of the rental of tank cars to move crude and refined products from Alberta to the Montreal market? If he has so consulted, what was the result of those consultations and, if not, is he prepared to consult with these people regarding rental and is he also prepared to put the Alberta refineries on 24-hour production?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a survey of the transportation industry, which I have mentioned several times in the House, has been conducted by the Ministry of Transport. I would have to confirm with them whether or not they have had discussions with the United States lines in this regard. I will be glad to make that inquiry and respond to the hon. gentleman.

On the question of refinery speed-up I think this depends upon the location and whether the decision is to move crude oil into the Ontario and Montreal refineries or to move the product from western Canada. If the latter is the better solution, then we would propose that the companies should increase their throughput.

Mr. Skoreyko: Is the minister aware that if the three refineries in Alberta were put on 24-hour production they could not possibly store the final product and that the problem lies in the transportation area alone? I should like to know what the government is planning or what the minister's department is planning with regard to this matter so we can put the refineries to maximum capacity in order that eastern Canadians will not have to suffer this winter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question of whether the particular product can be moved effectively by the transportation system, in effect we have a substantial transportation system, the Interprovincial pipeline, for moving crude oil to the refineries in the east. I think it is likely that any transportation proposal would be designated more specifically between the Sarnia end of the Interprovincial pipeline and the Montreal refinery market rather than all the way across Canada.

DELIVERY OF OIL PRODUCTS FROM COME-BY-CHANCE REFINERY TO MONTREAL AND QUEBEC

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to ask him to what extent the lack of delivery systems from the Come-by-Chance refinery has affected his decisions about products from that refinery and whether his industry advisory committee has given the minister any advice regarding delivery of products from that refinery to Montreal and Quebec?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the constraint I just mentioned was, of course, the date of the starting of the refinery but, if that should be effective with a full product line, at the present time it looks as though the two tankers of the Newfoundland Refining Company would be the best available for winter shipment. It might be possible to find other ice-classed tankers for the purpose of moving the product. But there is a constraint arising from the fact that it is difficult to move it through the ice in the winter time.

HOME HEATING OIL—REQUEST THAT SALES TAX BE REMOVED IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has indicated that the consumers of home heating fuels in the two northern territories will suffer price increases along with other Canadians, since the Prime Minister and other members of the treasury benches have indicated that if any sales tax relief is to be experienced it will have to be at the provincial level, and since the minister is directly responsible in the area of the two northern territories, will he give the assurance that he will instruct each of his appointed commissioners in those two territories to introduce legislation to remove the sales tax which now exists on home heating fuels in both northern territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall consider the hon. member's suggestion and see if it could be applied. There are several taxes, but I know that most consumer taxes do not exist in the Northwest and Yukon Territories in respect of heating oil. I shall look into the matter and see if the situation could be improved.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville rising on a supplementary?

CRUDE PETROLEUM—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING CONTINUATION OF PRICE FREEZE AFTER JANUARY 31, 1974

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary is on pricing. I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether or not he can assure the people of this country that after the end of January there will be a price freeze on petroleum products?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday in response to the hon. gentleman's leader, I cannot do this at the moment. This is one of the questions being discussed with the Alberta government.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the tremendous pressure coming from Canada's biggest oil lobby, namely, the Conservative Party and Sheik Lougheed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Obviously I hit a sensitive spot, Mr. Speaker—to end the price controls on crude oil, can the minister assure the House that he will not succumb to this pressure which is highly undesirable for the people of this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, when I do not co-operate with Alberta I am given hell and when I do I am given hell too. It is a difficult situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Bellechasse wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BASIS OF OPINION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING POSSIBLE SHORTFALL IN OIL SUPPLIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since the House is going all the way on supplementary questions, then I shall ask mine so as to follow this practice. I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who seems full of energy.

Seriously speaking, my question is the following: a release from the Canada-Near East press service indicates that Canadian oil production is 2 million barrels a day, including 1 million barrels for domestic use, and also that Canada has obtained considerable oil supplies in Venezuela and Romania which are more than sufficient. Can the minister inform the House whether government fears of an oil shortage are based mainly on the fact that Canada has too heavy supply commitments with other countries? If so, what countries are involved?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the problem at this time is that we have not adequate means of transporting oil to all Canadian markets.

INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT BY SASKATCHEWAN TO SELL CRUDE PETROLEUM AT LESS THAN ALBERTA PRICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister. Yesterday the leader of the New Democratic Party chose to talk about legislation in Alberta on the price of crude petroleum. Can the minister tell us whether the Saskatchewan government and Premier Blakeney—Saskatchewan supplies a certain percentage of crude petroleum through the Interprovincial Pipeline that comes east—have agreed under any conditions or under any method to sell crude petroleum at less than the price at which Alberta petroleum is sold?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have no such agreement with that province.

NATURAL GAS PRICE INCREASE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—PRIOR DISCUSSION BY MINISTER WITH PREMIER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): When the premier of British Columbia doubled the price of natural gas to consumers in that province and thus took advantage of those consumers who are Canadians too, did the minister have any discussions with the premier with a view to reducing the price?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I did not have the pleasure of discussing it with the premier of British Columbia.

An hon. Member: But the Prime Minister did.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I did have an opportunity of discussing it with a member of that great and famous clan to which I belong. He indicated that the decision to increase the price of natural gas in British Columbia by the NDP government was a firm decision and that the increase would be 81 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Another socialist sheik.

Mr. Fairweather: Sheik Barrett.

Mr. Hees: Let's have a word from Sheik Douglas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East followed by the hon. member for Trinity.

EASTERN CANADA OIL SUPPLIES—REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN BY PROVINCES OF POSSIBLE SHORTFALL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister regarding the pipeline to Montreal and the fact, which has been mentioned a number of times, that the river freezes over. Can the minister say whether or not he can identify, so that we can keep this dialogue straight in our own minds, the amount in barrels of the shortfall that will occur or could possibly occur in Quebec, the three Maritime provinces and Newfoundland? In other words, is the minister able to break this down rather than continue to lump it together so that we may better understand the necessity for adequate transportation systems?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot break it down between the provinces. As the hon. member knows, some of the provinces supply others. I think that kind of breakdown, at least in the Atlantic provinces, would not give a full account of the resources available.

POSITION OF SAUDI ARABIA ON SUPPLYING OF OIL TO CANADA—AMOUNT SHIPPED IN LAST 30 DAYS—COME-BY-CHANCE REFINERY OUTPUT

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister be good enough to reconcile for the benefit of the House the view he related from the Saudi Arabian minister that Canada is on the middle list with the statement of Mr. J. A. Armstrong, one of Canada's most knowledgeable oil men, that as early as October 22 Saudi Arabia had advised one of the Exxon affiliates that oil would not be supplied to Canada and that this information was given to the minister?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as a result of that information on October 22, as the hon. gentleman will recall, our ambassador to Riyadh, who actually resides in Beirut, visited Riyadh for the purpose of confirming the position of the government of Saudi Arabia on this question and was assured that Canada was not on the embargo list although shipments would not take place to the Portland pipeline. I took the opportunity of speaking to the Saudi Arabian minister, Sheik Yamani, who was in New York yesterday, and he confirmed to me again that Canada was not on the embargo list.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Wait until tomorrow.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister advise the House how much oil has been shipped from Saudi Arabia to Canada in the last 30 days?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would have to seek information on that.

Mr. Hellyer: It would appear that if in fact we are on the middle list, there is an asterisk and a footnote beside Canada's name saying "ship no oil".

My final supplementary is this: can the minister advise the House whether or not his advisory committee discounted the output of the Come-By-Chance refinery and the availability of that output to the eastern part of Canada by 100 per cent or by some lesser percentage for the coming season?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not have the actual percentage, but the over-all figure that I have given to the House is a rounded figure for the eventualities that the committee thought could occur in eastern Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

OFFERING OF COME-BY-CHANCE REFINERY PRODUCTION TO CANADA—POSSIBLE IMPOSITION OF "FORCE MAJEURE" CONTRACT PROVISION—DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it regards the Come-By-Chance refinery situation. Has the government consulted with the government of the United States regarding citizen Shaheen's offer, and can the minister inform the House of the attitude of the American government to the prospect that force majeure provisions of Mr. Shaheen's contracts with the American oil companies will be exercised with the apparent approval of the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not had such discussions with the United States.

Mr. Symes: Does the minister intend to have discussions with the United States to find out the attitude of the American government on this situation?

Mr. Sharp: It may be desirable to have such discussions.

TAR SANDS OIL—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT TO ENABLE SYNCRUDE PROJECT TO PROCEED

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can he assure the House and the country that he, the Alberta government and the Syncrude people have nearly reached an agreement regarding the go-ahead for that project?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the present stage of the matter, as far as I know today, is that in view of the reaction I gave earlier, namely, that the agreement as then drawn did not meet federal taxation policy with respect to resources and mining, the province of Alberta and the Syncrude consortium, according to my understanding, have been renegotiating that contract. Both my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and myself have had certain reactions to it. I do not yet know what the reaction is of the parties to the contract.

CONSIDERATION OF CONSTRUCTION OF PIPELINE FROM SAINT JOHN TO MONTREAL

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the Portland pipeline difficulty and the ice in the St. Lawrence to which reference has been made in a previous question, has the government under any consideration at the moment the construction of a pipeline from Montreal to Saint John where the largest refinery in Canada and the first deepwater facility are located and, if not, why not?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of discussions with Premier Hatfield on the question of a possible deepwater port at Saint John and a pipeline connection into the St. Lawrence valley. At the moment there has been no final decision by the government.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

SUGGESTED FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROJECTS DESIGNED TO HELP INVALIDS AND INFIRM IN THEIR HOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of a report stating that certain local initiatives programs will be cancelled, particularly those dealing with the care and help to the infirm, invalids and the aged in their own homes, I should like to ask the minister, as this involves the pressing social problem of the aged and infirm, whether there are any arrangements to cover such programs through the Canada Assistance Plan or otherwise with the provinces?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the program is as the hon. member has described it, I would think that this is a program that could be cost-shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. However, it is up to the provinces to take the initiative and recognize it as a welfare service.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—FORMULA FOR ALLOCATION OF GRANTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the vast discrepancies in allocation of LIP grants for the various ridings, can the minister inform the House what formula was used in arriving at these amounts?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that formula was tabled when the allocations were tabled and made available to members a week or two ago.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ABILITY OF WHEAT BOARD TO FULFIL SALES COMMITMENTS AND DEFERMENT OF SALES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Since at the present time our export sales are down some 100 million bushels and we have very small amounts of feed or cereal grains on hand at Thunder Bay, may I ask the minister whether the Wheat Board can fulfil its sales commitments, and can he also inform the House how many sales have had to be or are going to be deferred in the coming months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board did make arrangements with some of its customers to take delivery at a later date than originally intended. Of course, with that change in deliveries it is expected that all commitments would be met. The supply of feed grains for eastern Canada is being watched very carefully, and the Wheat Board remains confident that the feed grains required will be moved either by lake freight or by rail.

Mr. Murta: Can the minister say whether or not this means that because some grain sales will be deferred to later months the grain will be sold at a lesser price than it could be sold at the present time?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, the sale contracts that are involved are normally firm ones. The over-all picture for this year is an expectation by the Canadian Wheat Board of exports in the 700 million bushel to maximum 800 million bushel range, and it should still be possible to get within that range.

FEED GRAIN—MINISTER'S POSITION RESPECTING STATEMENT BY CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ON PRICING AND SELLING POLICY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. In light of statements by the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board to the National Farmers' Union meeting in Winnipeg, which the minister chose not to attend, that he had grave misgivings about the present feed grains pricing and selling policy, may I ask the minister whether the chief commissioner said the same thing to him? Did he convey to the minister his misgivings about the policy?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the exact words of the commissioner were not those, but of course the proposals for next year, whether one adopts the ones we outlined in August or the ones outlined by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, are extremely complex as inevitably is the case in the matter of grain. Therefore there are naturally concerns about the exact details of their operation. I am satisfied that the plans can be implemented in a way which will in the end completely reassure the commissioner of the Wheat Board and all the supporters of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I remind hon. members that we are quickly coming to the end of the question period. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar will be recognized for another supplementary, and then the hon. member for Annapolis Valley and the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. Gleave: Since the minister did not chose to answer my first question, perhaps he will answer this one. Again referring to the matter of the movement of feed grain into position, the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario has stated they are three million bushels short at Goderich. Is grain going to be moved into position in time to serve farmers in that area who want to buy feed grain?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I answered that in answering an earlier question by another hon. member by saying that the Wheat Board is watching the situation very closely and that, while not all the grain that is wanted may be moved by lake because of the delays which occur, there will be rail movement to make up the deficit.

FEED GRAIN—REQUEST THAT PRIORITY IN ROLLING STOCK BE GIVEN TO MOVEMENT TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the answer of the minister and along the lines of the questions on the shortfall in the supply of feed grains in eastern Canada, will the minister ensure that, in terms of rolling stock, priority will be given to moving feed grains into eastern Canada where the short supply is becoming very critical, with Atlantic Canada having only an eight day supply at a good many points, and not let happen what happened this week when the Wheat Board cancelled 150 cars with the CNR one day and then because of pressure finally put them back on the rails?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to assure the hon. member that the Wheat Board did no such thing. Canadian National Railways had thought it might be better to serve the Thunder Bay movement at this immediate point in time rather than leaving those cars in the movement to Nova Scotia. After consultation with the Wheat Board and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the Wheat Board arranged that Canadian National put 150 cars out of the Thunder Bay movement into the movement of grain to the east.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for the explanation and I am glad the matter was clarified. But the first part of my question was whether the minister would personally ensure, in terms of priority of rolling stock, that priority will be given to servicing and filling some of the bins that are in short supply in eastern Canada rather than the very necessary and important export trade?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we are really talking about domestic trade both ways. It is a question between all rail, or rail to lakehead and boat from there, but my answer surely should have reassured hon. members that the Canadian Livestock Feed Board and the Canadian Wheat Board are indeed making sure that the domestic market is being served.

Mr. Gleave: You cannot assure anybody of anything; that is your trouble.

ENERGY

SURVEY OF OIL AND GAS PATENTS IN ORDER TO REDUCE USE OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister having just advised the House that there is no shortage of oil in Canada and that in spite of this the consumers have had to bear the brunt of price increases in recent months, does he intend to ask his department to review the registration of patents and list those liable to reduce the consumption of heating oil and gas used by vehicles? If so, will he increase publicity intended to encourage their application, even though some inventions were turned down in the past to protect oil companies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, but I shall take note of the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a supplementary. I must point out to the House that we have reached the end of the question period. I shall still allow the hon. member to put his supplementary.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I could very well put my question to the Prime Minister since I do not think that the government oil policy is established without his knowledge.

Since the government is asking the staff and members of parliament to set an example by saving energy, we can see that in parliament, at the restaurants, ladies have to wear more clothes and the Leader of the Opposition is just about dying from the flue. Here and there, complaints are heard concerning the low temperature in the building and as far as I am concerned, my hands are always cold. So, I must come to an understanding with the minister. Is he prepared to come and keep my hands warm if we cannot get more energy?

Mr. Speaker: I suppose that this is a suggestion which will be considered.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada will hold my hand Monday night, I shall be most pleased to warm his.

PICKERING, STE. SCHOLASTIQUE AND SEA ISLAND—GOVERNMENT OFFERS TO PEOPLE WHOSE LANDS HAVE BEEN EXPROPRIATED

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister explain to the House why the government has offered the people of Pickering and Ste. Scholastique an additional 10 per cent on the purchase of their lands to cover the cost of living and in British Columbia the government tries to tell the people that it has been included in the price?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The same principle that prevailed at Pickering will also prevail at Sea Island, and 10 per cent has been incorporated in the offer to the people of Sea Island.

Mr. Reynolds: In the minister's reply he said that the same principle will apply. The question was, why did you offer an additional 10 per cent in Pickering but for Sea Island you tell people it is included in the price? Do they think they are stupid?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in relation to the item of business that is to be considered today, and also in relation to the announcement that Your Honour just read from the chair. Will it not be possible, before we proceed with Government Order No. 79, to take one minute and give third reading to the family allowances bill, so that it can be dealt with by the Senate this afternoon and included in the Royal Assent before five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I am sure I speak for all members of my party when I say that we will give our sincere and utmost co-operation to this worth-while Christmas-like suggestion, without debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, our party has always approved of an increase in old age security pensions and family allowances because we want to improve the status of our fellow citizens. I want to assure the House, on behalf of my colleagues, of our entire co-operation so that this bill to improve conditions for Canadian children will be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, they are now playing politics with the oil shortage while our children are in need of money and while our party wants to deal with serious matters by passing immediately the family allowances bill.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the House is ready to move so rapidly, perhaps I can add a few other bills, to test hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Here comes the red herring.

Mr. MacEachen: Let us complete the parole bill; let us complete the Canada Pension Plan (Mennonites) bill; let us do the parks bill and the report stage of the residential mortgages bill, and take it all the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I was going to say that we would agree to taking the report stage of the residential mortgages bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I said all the way, and not just the report stage. I was referring to third reading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of co-operation and in an effort to clear the decks for the showdown on Monday, we will agree to the residential mortgage bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, members of the Social Credit Party of Canada are here to do their job. We are ready to approve this proposal.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it must be Leader of the House's day. I must say I am just delighted. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, we need a House order now in order to give third reading to the family allowances bill, to deal with the CPP (Mennonites) bill at all stages—

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): No, no.

Mr. MacEachen: —to deal with all stages of residential mortgages, all stages of the Parole Act, and to give the parks bill second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to do this. There may be one or two bills, such as the residential mortgages bill, on which we shall say "On division". However, we will let them pass. We will not force a recorded vote. We will agree to the whole package.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I failed to gather what the minister is giving in return for this agreement. He gave no assurance that the family allowances bill would be dealt with immediately.

An hon. Member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Trudeau: Ask your leader.

Mr. Speaker: I am not precisely sure what has been agreed to. Perhaps the President of the Privy Council might make it clear and the Chair will ascertain whether there is to be an order of the House for that purpose.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my suggestion was that we give the family allowances bill third reading today.

Mr. Bell: Without debate.

Mr. MacEachen: Without debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: I cannot give any assurance about what is to happen in the other place. I have not reached that stage yet. I suggested, in addition, that we do the report stage of the Canada Pension Plan bill, which comes with an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot, and give that third reading today, without debate; that we give the parks bill second reading, without debate; that we give the Parole Act third reading, as well, without debate; and that we complete the report stage and third reading of the residential mortgages bill. I will leave for the day when that is done.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, every member of this House from time to time has to assert his presence. Perhaps that is what I am doing on this occasion. The government House leader has outlined a very full program for this afternoon, in the hope that there will be complete co-operation. I say to him and to the House, Mr. Speaker, that I very much regret that I cannot give that assurance, because there is a motion standing in my name which is to be considered at the report stage of the Canada Pension Plan bill, and I want that motion to be dealt with at length.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, unless I did not hear the minister correctly, I think he neglected to include in the last list he gave Canada Pension Plan bill No. 2. He knows that that was part of the package, and that it, too, would be given third reading without debate. I suggest to the President of the Privy Council that despite the reluctance of the hon. member for Crowfoot with regard to one of the less important bills, that he should regard the package of four or five bills as a pretty good deal. We shall go further than second reading with the National Parks bill. Indeed, all the bills could go all the way.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to reconsider the matter tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, we cannot proceed unless there is unanimous consent, so that there will not be an order of the House. Orders of the day.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR ALLOCATION BOARD, MANDATORY ALLOCATION OF SUPPLIES AND RATIONING OF CONTROLLED PRODUCTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-236, to provide a means to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada and to amend the National Energy Board Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill on second reading, I refer the House back to the remarks I made on November 26 when I outlined some of the measures which the government and industry were undertaking to supply additional amounts of crude oil and products to eastern Canada. I discussed such things as the rapid increase of movement through the St. Lawrence Seaway, government purchases of products on world markets and the organization of transportation through the Trans Mountain pipeline system and Panama Canal.

At that time, I stated that even with these arrangements, we could not guarantee that oil, which had been lost to Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces through the production curtailments of Arab nations, could be completely replaced. I called upon the people of Canada, Canadian industries and manufacturers to enter wholeheartedly into voluntary programs to reduce the use of heating oils and motor gasolines. The response to that call is now beginning to take effect. At the same time, I announced what the government was proposing to do to reduce its own requirements for these petroleum commodities. Those measures are now generally in use.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I announced it was the government's intention to introduce a program of mandatory allocation at the wholesale level. That has been done in the form of this bill which was given first reading Monday, December 3.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that it would be useful to put these recent events in better historical perspective. It will be recalled that in December 1972, the National Energy Board prepared an assessment of the crude oil situation in Canada. That assessment indicated the need for caution in respect of Canadian crude oil exports. Flowing out of that report, a program of crude oil export controls was put in place beginning March 1, 1973. At the same time, the government announced that the National Energy Board would be holding public hearings to inquire into the appropriate mechanisms which might be established in the future authorization of crude oil exports. Continued developments of shortages in the United States throughout the summer prompted the government to impose export controls successively on gasoline, middle distillates, heavy fuel oil and propane. Thus, even before the occurrence of the Middle East war and the subsequent oil production curtailments by Arab nations, the government had moved and moved decisively in protecting Canadian supplies.

As I have mentioned on other occasions, with the outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East, the government very quickly established a technical advisory committee on petroleum supply and demand. That committee, composed of senior representatives of oil companies and of the various departments of government, has continued to meet every week. It has established a number of sub-committees composed of specialists in the various aspects of petroleum supply and distribution.

The recommendations prepared by that committee have been undergoing continuous review and refinement. The picture which emerges indicates clearly the possibility of shortages of middle distillates and heavy oils in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec and to some extent in Ontario. There is also the possibility of local shortages of these products in British Columbia.

In spite of its efforts, the technical committee is unable to advise the government of the precise extent to which international crude oil deliveries to Canada will be reduced. However, the committee has recommended that the government plan for possible curtailment as great as 20 per cent for these areas which are dependent on overseas oil. The government has also been advised that the voluntary program will be unable to restrain demand to that percentage level. Industry has urged the government to put in place a mandatory allocation program as quickly as possible in order to avoid a chaotic situation and inequities that might develop if each company institutes an allocation program of its own when its own supply situation becomes serious. That, Mr. Speaker, is the intention of the bill now before the House.

The advisory committee has also suggested to the government that serious problems could begin to emerge when and if curtailments reach 20 per cent of normal requirements. It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that the bill provides for the extension of the mandatory allocation system to a full rationing program.

Before dealing with other aspects of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the government's energy policy document tabled in this House in June 1973 had a number of important things to say in respect of the security of oil supply for eastern Canada. On page 121 of that document we find, and I quote:

> In the past, the security of Canada's imported petroleum supply was not considered to be a problem in then prevailing conditions of world supply. However, the magnitude and nature of world oil operations are now such that traditional patterns of oil supply no longer have the same relevance.
> In this decade, the Middle East will be the key in the balance of the supply and demand pattern. If the countries in that area which have the largest potential for increasing their output do so to the extent required, then a relatively stable world oil supply situation will pertain for the 1970's. If, however, even one of the very large exporters were to restrict its production for an extended period, a politically and economically unstable world oil situation would result. It is assumed that the impact on eastern Canada of an interruption of oil supply would be proportionate to the global diminution in the world trade in oil.

The last sentence which I read indicates that the present basis of the government's planning regarding the degree of curtailment of international oil deliveries was clearly set out in June of this year. The technical advisory committee has continued to reaffirm that this is an appropriate basis for planning in Canada.

If I might continue to quote from the same page of the energy policy document, Mr. Speaker:

> A fourth outbreak of major Arab-Israeli hostilities is a possibility which cannot be ignored. The effects on world oil trade of such a development or other developments affecting the oil producing states, cannot be readily determined.
>
> The United States oil industry has reached the stage where it is unable to expand its production significantly, at least in the short run.
>
> The decline in oil discoveries in the traditional oil-producing areas in Canada and the decline in known reserves in these areas, are unlikely to be compensated for, in the short term, by the exploitation of sources in the Mackenzie Delta, the Arctic Islands or areas off the east coast.
>
> In calculating the impact of a supply crisis on Canada, the assumption has been adopted that the impact on eastern Canada of an overseas supply interruption would be proportionate to the global dimensions in the world trade in oil. There are, of course, circumstances in which Canada might be proportionately better off or worse off than other oil importers.

● (1520)

It was factors such as those contained in the quotation I have just read from the energy policy document which led the government in early September to announce an intensive study of the question of the extension of the transportation system so as to make western crude oil available to Montreal. The government has now announced that it is it's policy to see such a pipeline built in order that in future Canadian oil may be delivered on a continuing basis to Montreal and could, in an emergency, be delivered to Atlantic refiners.

There has been much discussion in recent days about the level of interruption in petroleum deliveries Canada is likely to experience. I have already indicated the difficulty, and indeed the hazard, of trying to guess that level. The far more important question is the level of interruption for which planning provision should be made. I have indicated the level recommended by the technical advisory committee. That level, and, indeed even a significantly higher level, would require appropriate action by the allocation board which the bill now before the House seeks to establish.

There is one aspect of this question of curtailment of overseas oil supplies which I believe requires serious thought by the House and by all Canadians. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has referred to our assistance to the United States in its present time of crisis. There are others who are our friends and who could be in dire circumstances through oil shortages in a very few weeks. Some European nations may face curtailment amounting to as much as 70 per cent or 75 per cent of their heating oil during the depth of this winter. Those countries are our friends, as the Prime Minister has said, and friends help each other in times of crisis.

During the meeting which took place with the energy ministers of all the provinces in Toronto on November 23, I reviewed the general nature of the mandatory allocation program contained in the present bill. There was free discussion of these concepts with the provinces, both at that time and subsequently. The government has responded to a number of requests from the provinces and has made appropriate changes in the bill now before us. In this measure, the government is seeking authority to handle the present petroleum supply emergency, in any form it might take, over the coming months. No one knows the exact nature of this emergency, how deep it may go or how severe its impacts may be upon the various regions of Canada. Accordingly, the government has to be prudent by asking for sufficient authority to enable it to respond adequately and quickly as these fast moving events unfold. It is not the intention of the government to bring in controls applying to all products in all regions of Canada.

There is provision that alternative fuels and electricity can be administered by provincial authorities under appropriate agreements. In some instances use of these alternative fuels and electricity can make a positive contribution to easing the petroleum supply shortages. However, in other instances, due to limited transportation facilities, curtailment of the use of these alternate energy sources would bring little or no benefit to regions of Canada experiencing petroleum shortages. Thus it has seemed advisable to the government that these energy sources should remain under provincial control provided appropriate agreements can be worked out with the provincial governments.

In respect of petroleum products, it would be the intention of the government to have the Emergency Supplies Allocation Board establish a mandatory allocation program dealing with each product in short supply. This would only occur, of course, after the Governor-in-Council had by order stated that a national emergency existed by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbance in the petroleum markets affecting national security and the welfare and economic stability of Canada. The bill grants the allocation board power to make regulations subject to the approval of the Governor in Council and covering all aspects of the trade and supply of petroleum.

The board is instructed to produce a mandatory allocation program which shall:

(a) designate the regions of Canada in which the program is to operate, if it is not to extend to the whole of Canada

(b) specify the petroleum products included under the program

(c) set out the priorities of use of the controlled products, and

(d) provide for systematic allocation of the controlled products.

Although the board is empowered to make regulations prescribing the price at which, or a range of prices within which, any controlled product may be sold, it is the intention of the government that such power would only be exercised subject to the approval of the Governor in Council and to the extent that price should not become a factor in frustrating the equitable allocation of petroleum products. As the Prime Minister said in his address to the nation, the principle here is that petroleum products in short supply should be allocated to those who need them rather than to those who can pay high prices for them.

Part II of the bill covers the concept of the rationing of controlled products. This part becomes activated when the Governor in Council orders the allocation board to extend the mandatory program because supplies of a controlled product are, or are likely to be, so short as to cause the mandatory allocation program to fail. Under part II, the board is once again given the authority to make regulations, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, covering all aspects of petroleum trade and supply to all levels including the ultimate consumer of those petroleum products. It is the hope of the government that a rationing program will not have to be instituted. Nevertheless, the government feels it must be in a position to order the allocation board to institute such a program, perhaps on very short notice.

Throughout the history of this current emergency, the government has moved in every way possible to seek the advice of industry and of provincial governments. Advice from the industry will continue under the mandatory program and, perhaps, even under the rationing program if that should come about. To this end provision is made in the bill for industry to enter into agreements, arrangements or courses of action which might involve contravention of the Combines Investigation Act. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) shall be consulted in this regard but the board may, by order, exempt industry from the provisions of that act with respect to any action prescribed by the board.

Similarly, the board may find it necessary to make regulations contrary to provisions of law relating to the control of the emission of pollutants into the environment. Again, the board shall consult on these matters with the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) but industry and private citizens shall be exempt from pollution control legislation if they are conforming with a valid regulation of the allocation board.

There is, too, provision in the bill for support of the legislative authority of the National Energy Board and the Canadian Transport Commission in order that petroleum products may be moved so as to relieve current or anticipated shortages. Moreover, the bill provides that the authority of the National Energy Board may be extended in respect of pipelines not carrying a controlled product. This is in order that the uncontrolled product may make a contribution to areas experiencing shortages of controlled products.

Finally, there is provision for the termination of any mandatory allocation program by the end of December, 1974 unless such a program is extended by an order of the Governor in Council. Such order for extension shall be laid before parliament not later than 15 days after it has been made or within the first 15 days after parliament resumes sitting. A notice of motion in either House, signed by ten members within ten days thereafter praying that the order be revoked, shall be debated at the first convenient opportunity. If both Houses of parliament resolve that it be revoked it shall cease to have effect, and the mandatory allocation program in respect of which the order was made shall thereupon terminate.

There is one aspect of the bill which may raise questions among hon. members. It is the addition of a measure not strictly confined to the allocation program, a proposal to create two additional members of the National Energy Board. As I have already told the House, the jurisdiction of the board has been substantially expanded during the current year; first, so as to extend its control over the export of Canadian oil from Canada and subsequently over a range of petroleum products. The work involved both in the hearings of the kind the board has been carrying on, the proposed hearings with regard to oil supplies, the proposed hearings with regard to the pricing of natural gas for export and the hearing which may take place if the Canadian Arctic gas study group makes an application for the construction of a McKenzie Valley pipeline, has greatly increased the range of tasks falling on the board. The substantial increase in the hearing time involved will throw an extra burden on board members and for this reason the government is recommending the appointment of two additional members to assist in this work.

Before closing, I think I might refer to a question which has been much debated in the House in recent days. It is whether or not the supply in Canada this winter may reasonably be expected to be in jeopardy. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), as I note from his remarks reported at page 8222 of Hansard for November 28, indicated he did not believe a report coming from the technical advisory committee that there would be a shortfall in supply.

● (1530)

Mr. Stevens: What committee?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —there would be a shortcoming in the supply of oil to the Canadian market. The hon. gentleman may not have done so, and I suppose it is a question on which reasonable men could differ. In effect, he feels that Canadians are secure for the winter and that they do not require further assistance.

This is not a view that has been shared at the provincial level. I should like to refer him, for example, to the action taken, the rather extensive action taken, by the government of the province of Ontario through publicity in the journals of the province, to action taken prior to the actual conversations between the federal government and provincial governments concerning interruption, founded upon that government's conversations with the industry. The province has said that action should be taken not only to relieve the situation regarding home heating oil in the province of Ontario, also to make any surplus available to relieve a possible shortage in the province of Quebec.

Among those who support the action taken by the federal government would be the minister of energy for the province of Ontario. I should like to read to the House the following remarks made by Mr. McKeough in the Ontario legislature, as reported at page 5576 of the debates:

> We in Ontario rely on and are well served by Canadian crude oil from western Canada. We must face up to the fact, however, that some of our domestic oil supply will and should be diverted, if necessary, to other Canadians. The big oil companies are multinational, so it is only prudent to assume that a world shortage will in all probability reflect in domestic shortages on a worldwide scale. In other words, Canadians cannot expect to escape the effect of a Middle East embargo on the United States. As a consequence of all this, there is more than a possibility of a Canadian gasoline and heating oil shortage. We in Ontario must accept our share of the burden.

So much for the views of the Ontario government.

Mr. Stevens: Did they set up a board, too?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): They do not have authority to set up a board to deal with energy on a national basis.

Mr. Lawrence: Neither do you.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is a matter of opinion. As for the views of another provincial government, I refer to remarks made by the Quebec minister of transport as reported in La Presse for November 30 of this year. He indicated that he felt voluntary restrictions would not be adequate for the purpose of protecting the Quebec market. I quote from his remarks in La Presse.

[Translation]

> Voluntary restrictions, he explained, would not be adequate for the purpose of protecting us against a possible scarcity.

[English]

So Mr. Mailloux, the Quebec minister, felt the same concern, as did the premier of New Brunswick, the Hon. Richard Hatfield, in his statement to the legislature on November 27, when he set out at some length the kind of interruption that New Brunswick felt it might experience in the course of the coming winter. He supported the measures taken by this and other governments for the purpose of voluntarily restricting the use of products of these kinds.

There are really two main areas in which the powers of the mandatory allocation board would be necessary. The first is the situation where, because of the increasing international tightness of supply, there will be a shortfall in international supplies coming on to the market in Canada, and where for over-all statistical reasons there may be within the eastern Canadian market a drop of supply below demand.

The other area, even if there were no tightness of supply—though I must say we are anticipating one—would be within our own market where, whatever the statistical balance of supply might be, the government would have no authority to set priorities between individual or company decisions concerning allocation of supplies. One could therefore find an imbalance in the supply of particular commodities in one region, an imbalance between various companies, where some customers would be going short while others would have no inadequacy of supply.

Under the law as it stands at the moment, there is no way government can intervene on behalf of the general public interest to set these priorities. So some kind of legislative authority like this would be required for the purpose of giving authority to the government of Canada to make such reallocation, and to do so without damaging the contractual situation or without creating any legal liability on the part of the contracting parties to any private arrangement.

The bill is really analogous to an insurance policy. As with insurance, the actual loss in the event of the occurrence assured against cannot be calculated in advance. What is required is an estimate of the risk, and the exposure that the risk will bring out. In conjunction with industry we have projected the potential loss if certain events come about, but we cannot be certain either that they will come about or even that those events not now anticipated may not occur. If any of these events do not occur, then we will all be relieved in the situation. We will have been insured, as an insured party is, by this particular bill, by the policy the government has followed, and there will have been no risk to the community.

If the event does occur, the measure that we are proposing will be available to enable the government to protect the priority needs of Canadians. On that basis I suggest it is important that the board be constituted at an early date and that it be given power to develop a mandatory allocation of supply for Canadians. It is important that the Canadian community, particularly the eastern Canadian community, have protection in this kind of legislative intervention so their interests can be guarded in the event this kind of interruption during the winter takes place.

There will undoubtedly be some questions at the committee stage regarding the detailed provisions of the bill and I shall say no more at this particular time. But the critical consideration, and I would re-emphasize it, is that Canadians by voluntary measures make efforts to reduce the exposure to which we may be subject in the coming winter because of international interruptions in supply, that these be moderated to a degree by voluntary restraint.

It would do no service to the community as a whole, and in particular it would do no service to eastern Canada, to try to suggest that there is no risk, given the interruptions we hear about every day taking place around the world, particularly as they affect our closest trading partners. Under those circumstances, I think it is important that we have the full support of the community in the program of voluntary restraint; and in anticipation that the interruptions will be even greater than the savings we can achieve through a voluntary program the government should also have authority to be able to take the measures outlined in the bill in order to protect the Canadian consumer.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the minister, as have all members of the House, and I am sure the country will be listening to what he has had to say. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the members of this House, that what strikes me about the over-all approach taken by the minister is the light, almost casual touch that he gave to this request he is making to the House for these tremendous powers. I wonder why the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), when doing his bargaining this afternoon, did not ask for the bill to be passed without any debate at all. He might well have done so in view of the attitude the minister has taken.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, if the hon. gentleman is agreeable . . .

Mr. Baldwin: The minister talked about an insurance policy, but if you take out an insurance policy you want to know in some detail what the risks are. You want to know what premium you are going to pay. This information was not given to us by this minister of the government, but I intend to go into this aspect, as will my colleagues, to some extent at a later period in our discussion.

I want to make but one other comment at this particular stage regarding what the minister said, though I will deal with other remarks of his as I continue my comments. Although I do not think he intended to do so, I think he quoted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) out of context. The Leader of the Opposition did not at any time say categorically there would not be any shortage or any problems in respect of supply in this country. What he did say, and you have to take this in context with his questions before and after this statement, was that he was not satisfied with the diverse remarks of the minister and other members of the government, and that there may be in fact very strong discrepancies in respect of these statements regarding this energy problem. It was that which compelled the Leader of the Opposition to seek a more detailed statement in discharging his responsibilities. So far the Leader of the Opposition, hon. members of this House and the country, have not received such a statement.

● (1540)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Before leaving the question of insurance, and I think Your Honour may have had occasion to deal with insurance law in the days when you did not have to worry about listening to speeches on energy, let me say that when one is dealing with insurance he wants to have some knowledge as to the integrity of the broker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I would be the first to acknowledge that the members of our party have made no attempt to conceal the fact there are difficulties and problems in Canada and in the world. It would be a foolish person who would deny that fact, but these are problems which differ as to kind, as to intensity and as to geographic location. Steps are required to be taken in respect of these problems, but we in this party have never at any time attempted to deny the necessity of taking such steps.

An hon. Member: We have even asked for them.

Mr. Baldwin: As my friend has said, we have asked for them during the question period and in the course of discussions in the committee as well as in the House. We must bear in mind that, as we saw last night, as we have seen today and during this week, there are day to day alterations in these rapidly moving problems both in Canada and in the world. We may well hope that international conditions will settle down, and that there may be a mellowing which will make some difference in this regard, but conditions may in fact worsen. Certainly, no one on this side has attempted to deny that fact, but this does not mean we in this party will be panicked or that we are going to be pushed into granting this authority to the government until we are satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that the problems are such that they require a cure of the size the minister is asking us to approve. There are other ways of making roast beef than by burning down the cow barn, and this is one of the propositions I should like the minister to keep in mind.

We do not intend to meekly give up the rights of not only ourselves but of other people outside this House.

An hon. Member: Of the oil companies.

Mr. Baldwin: Hon. members in the backbenches over there do not know what they are talking about, because we represent the people of Canada. We have seen what this government does when it is granted unreasonable power and authority, and it is not our intention to tamely give to those people those things they are demanding.

I sometimes think as I look at the minister of those lines of Shakespeare:

Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,

That he is grown so great?

I think the first thing to do is have a look at this bill which the minister skipped over very casually, simply and easily. I intend to take a little time to look at this measure. It has been before us for a very short time, although I had a few hours to consider it yesterday when I was interrupted by some event in the House of which we are all aware. I want time to look at it and discover precisely what is being asked for as well as what will be the effect if it is passed under the circumstances which exist today. I want more time to look at it to discover what powers the government will have. We will have a look also at the objectives the government seeks, and which I believe the people of Canada seek to achieve in dealing with this energy problem. I want to consider the things upon which the bill is based to see whether there are any alternatives to what is proposed by the government. I want finally to have some discussion and consideration of what we would suggest about the measure and how we should deal with it.

What does the bill do? In the first place there is no question at all that this board with the high sounding name, the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, is in fact government owned, operated and manned. There is no question at all that there is no indication of independence on this board. This board will be subject to the direction of the Governor in Council, which means the minister, in everything it does.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member says "yes". This is what the Liberal party believes in; powers granted to the board which is out in front, but authority which this government can secretly use to obtain its way. That is what we intend to see shall not be granted unless, in fact, there is an adequate case made for doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Hon. members on the opposite side may be conditioned to meekly acquiesce to all this government seeks, but that is not our responsibility, and we are not here to say no as a matter of perversity. We are here to examine and scrutinize, and we will not let this bill pass until we have discharged our responsibility in this regard, no matter what my hon. friends may think we ought to do.

I am not going to take this time to deal with the clauses one by one, and I would probably be out of order if I did, although the minister has done so. Referring to Clauses 1 to 10, there is not the slightest doubt in the world that this board will be subject to the day to day controls, orders and directions of this government and the minister. Let us not delude ourselves on that score. There is no doubt that this is the purpose of the bill as set out in Clauses 1 to 10.

Going on from there, we find the power of delegation. It may well be that in certain circumstances, no matter what the extent of the authority granted, the right to delegate part of that authority will be exercised. The minister did not touch on that and he has not made a case for it. He may make one in the committee, I do not know. But if we are to rely on his statement in this House today we must remember that he has not by one word, one sentence or one argument suggested any reason we should give this power to the government to delegate this authority in any part of the country.

In addition to that, the minister was not silent but not very effusive as to the extent to which the mandatory allocation program can be applied to other products than petroleum products. He used the phrase "mandatory allocation program", but this phrase undoubtedly constitutes a complete, 100 per cent granting of absolute authority to the government to act in any way it wants. There is no question about that, and I do not think the minister will deny it. He can call it a mandatory allocation program, but that is much like calling lying, mendacity, or saying theft is only embezzlement. This is just a choice of words. We in this House want to discuss the extent of the authority the minister wants us to give him under this program.

Alternative fuels can be used, such as electric power.

As has been pointed out, alternative fuels consist of coal, natural gas and many other commodities. Electric power can be used. There is no doubt that this clause, taken in conjunction with the clause which provides for byproducts or derivatives of petroleum products, could cover derivatives or byproducts of alternative fuels and that these could be placed under the mandatory allocation program. I am not an industrialist, but I would think that if this provision is taken at its face value the number of commodities which could be covered under a mandatory allocation program of this government could run literally into the thousands, including the very important industrially produced commodities of the petrochemical industry, plastics and fertilizers. There is no indication of the limit to which, in this modern world, this government could go in delivering its ultimatum to administer its so-called mandatory allocation program.

On the question of price, I would point out to the minister and to my hon. friends to my left that some ten months ago the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), our leader and members of this party, suggested an incomes policy. Had it been put in place at that time, there would not have been any necessity for the inclusion in this bill of the question of price. I say to my friends to the left in good faith that they must accept a very large share of the responsibility for keeping this government in place, thus enabling this government to deal with the question of price. If what the government does with regard to price does not please my hon. friends, let them bear the responsibility for keeping the government here.

I thank my hon. friends for the hallelujah chorus. It is always inspiring to have such intelligent help from the back benches. The right to vary and change contracts has been mentioned by the minister. Later on I will show the extent to which this bill intrudes into provincial rights, but from time immemorial contractual obligations have fallen squarely under the civil rights clause of the constitution. This minister and this government are clearly on record as asking us to move away from a right which does not belong to us by the simple process of bringing this bill into operation. This is something which at the moment is quite unsupported by hon. gentlemen opposite and the minister.

Then, there are the import and export regulations. I shall deal with those later. I shall just mention here, so hon. members can consider it, that the inclusion of the import-export regulations in this bill brings into the open the feud which exists in the cabinet. This is a fact of some significance. As I understand it, not so long ago the cabinet was considering what step it would take in this regard. It was decided to use, for the time being, the Export and Import Permits Act. I intend to deal with that later in more detail. The matter would then have fallen under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). The very fact that this bill is here today, and the fact that these proposals appear in it, are a certain indication that the minister has won this particular battle. There are several ministers present in the House and since none of them have spoken up, I take it that what I am saying is quite correct, Mr. Speaker.

Now, I wish to deal with what I consider to be a very important and very dangerous clause, clause 15. It is what I think will be known as the blackmail clause or the bludgeon clause, and the bludgeon falls very easily into the hands of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources because he is accustomed to using bludgeons. This clause provides that the board may, with the approval of the Governor in Council—and of course that means the Governor in Council or the minister-negotiate with a provincial government with regard to alternative fuels or electric power for the purpose of there being regulation or allocation of supply. Then, it goes on to make the distinct threat that if no such agreement is made, then the government will find it necessary to bring in its mandatory allocation program. I believe the minister when he says that there has been some discussion with the provincial authorities. I think the minister learned his lesson a little while ago. I say to him candidly that I hope he and his officials will keep in close touch and liaison with the provincial authorities.

Problems of this kind which mature rapidly require co-operation by all levels of government with the present minister and his officials. If the minister and his officials deal with these problems on their own, they are bound to meet with difficulty not merely for them, for us, or for the government, but for the people of Canada. I deplore the language in which this clause is phrased when it includes this implicit threat to provincial authorities that they must deal with the government, that they must accept this government's proposals and disposition with regard to petroleum and other alternative fuels and electric power because if they do not this government will bring in a mandatory program. I consider that is no way to deal with other governments which, within limitations, are sovereign in that respect.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal very briefly with the question of the regulations. The minister touched on this. In this Parliament we are becoming accustomed to a government which governs by regulation. I have said before, and I shall repeat again, that were it not for the British North America Act this government with the power and authority it has, with the regulatory power it has seized from this House under a number of statutes over the past few years, and with the changes with regard to the passage of supply, could stay in power for two or three years without calling parliament together. The proof of this lies in the fact that it is now three or four years since the CNR financing bill, which was discussed the other day, has been passed. Hon. members of the opposition have had valid questions to ask about that measure which have not been answered. Despite the fact that under the statute this bill needs to be passed each year, it has not been passed in three years and the government has carried on dealing with the auditors, the capitalization and so on. I say it is essential that we look at these regulations, look at the people administering them and then survey what has been done with the regulations. In this particular instance clause 16 provides:

> With the approval of the Governor in Council, the Board may make such regulations as may be necessary in the opinion of the Board to carry out effectively a mandatory allocation program . . .

● (1600)

In other words, the government is saying to itself through the board: pass any regulation you want; there are no restrictions; there is no curtailment; there is nothing at all to constrain you in the type of regulation you pass. That is the effect of that clause. The clause goes on to set out a few particular headings, but these are only afterthoughts. The meat of the regulatory granting clause lies in what I have read, and I say it is a dangerous practice for hon. members in the House to grant such powers to any government, even to a government composed of members of this party which will soon be occupying the treasury benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: I would still dispute and challenge for a much better cause than the minister has so far stated, the giving up to hon. gentlemen opposite of the kind of powers which they seek in this bill and this clause in particular.

As the minister said, in addition to what I have already pointed out, the effect of the Combines Investigation Act and all combines legislation can be suspended, and the environmental provisions, laws and regulations which I take to be not only of this parliament but of any of the provincial administrations can be waived and overridden. There is a biblical phrase—and I think the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) could probably give me a lead on that—that the Lord created the earth—

Mr. Douglas: In six days.

Mr. Baldwin: —in six days. I was not sure of the number of days. By that part of the clause dealing with the environment, the government is seeking to give this board of nameless, anonymous officials the right to destroy with one signature those regulations and those statutes which the provinces and the federal government have, over some opposition and with great difficulty, enacted over the years in trying to make this a better world in which to live. I think it is a dangerous precedent and I am sure that hon. members on both sides of the House will deal with this more extensively later.

There is a right of expropriation and commandeering of the four modes of transport: rail, pipelines, transportation by vessel, and road transportation. In effect, if you search closely the powers which are granted in the clauses which deal with these particular issues, there is no doubt that the almost complete right to commandeer, to expropriate and to make use of any of these facilities of transportation will be vested in this board under the direction of the government.

As to the expiry of the powers, the minister has correctly stated that the bill will expire at a fixed date, but it can be extended by a simple order in council. There is, of course, the saving clause that a negative resolution can be advanced in the House. That, I submit, is not good enough. Our previous experience in trying to get hon. members opposite to give up powers which they have taken unto themselves can be described by a good Peace River saying, namely that it is like dragging a cow out of the muskeg, and probably just about as noisy. I am very unhappy about that proposal.

Having dealt, in this casual and perfunctory way, with what is in the bill, I consider it my responsibility to point out in far more detail than the minister did, the dangers, the extent of the powers which this government is asking for by this legislation. On what basis does the government ask that this bill be passed? I think it would be of some value to hon. members in the House to examine some of the comments which have been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the two Bobbsey twins from Pollyannaville. Their comments with regard to this energy crisis have been a little different, have varied from time to time, and have not always created that sense of urgency regarding the passage of this bill intimated by the government.

For example, the Prime Minister said on November 22:

> Our current assessment is that oil rationing at the retail level will not be necessary.
> If Canadians generously support the voluntary program—and I know they will—there is every prospect that shortages can be minimized throughout this winter.

On September 20 of this year, on a television program, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said this:

> In a sense, this is a passing situation in Canada because we've got new refinery construction under way which will be completed in the fall of next year, and further refinery construction will be completed in the year after.

Is that the kind of statement on which to base the far reaching and extraordinary powers for which the government is now asking us?

On October 16, 1973, the same minister, in speaking to that society of which the Prime Minister is so fond, the Royal Society of Canada, said:

> Comparing the Canadian situation with that of other developed nations of the world, for example Germany and Japan, we are not on the whole in too dangerous a situation.
> Compared to other nations, Canada is in a relatively fortunate position.

On October 7, not so long ago, on a television program the minister said:

> Well, Canadians have been more fortunate than many other people. In terms of shortages the government has been able to take action by way of export controls to make sure that Canadian refineries will continue to have supplies of oil to turn into gasoline, into heating oil, and also to make sure that there will be supplies of gasoline and heating oil throughout the year.

This statement was made less than two months ago by the minister who has now come here to demand these extraordinary powers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It was made before the war.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister has already quoted from the first report which was tabled last June in which he points with pride to the fact that the report deals with the question of the war. He knew about it then, he knew about the possibility then.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I did not know about the war, did you?

Mr. Baldwin: It was certainly under contemplation at that time. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), that great Canadian who is in difficulty now because of the fact that he has not been given, as he ought to have been given, more authority in relation to this problem than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—however, this is a family feud and I do not want to become involved in it—said before the Commons committee yesterday:

> It is very important that Canadians do not overreact to pessimistic scenarios based at this stage on inadequate information about the oil crisis.

I have a feeling that that statement was directed at the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: They are fighting the convention battle already.

Mr. Baldwin: The Minister of Finance has been in the cabinet long enough to know all about inadequate information. He went on to say:

> While we must be concerned . . . there is no justification at this moment for panic and pessimism.
> Canada is in a much better position with regard to energy supplies than most other industrial countries.

Amen. May I refer to the Globe and Mail, Mr. Speaker? I quote the Globe and Mail when I should and they quote me when they should. There is a very interesting editorial in that newspaper today anticipating this debate entitled "Warm Measures Act". I refer to it because they take a very sensible position, namely, that before we accept in total all of those exorbitant demands which this government is making, we want to be satisfied there is in fact a need for the legislative provisions contained in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: So I am glad to cite that editorial, briefly and concur with the Globe and Mail at this time, Mr. Speaker. I could go on ad infinitum—ad nauseam. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who sits in the Liberal caucus, knows very well the kind of statements he gets from ministers and that is why he uses the term "ad nauseam" in describing them. I say in a purely political sense that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the minister are disreputable witnesses and their testimony is discredited and suspect when they come to this House and demand that we give the government, without further scrutiny, without further challenge, without further information, the kind of powers that they are asking. I would think that if you went to trial defending a man on a murder charge with witnesses of this kind he would be found guilty of attempted suicide.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is surely inappropriate, right at this point in time, for us to pass without further challenge this particular legislation. Certainly, people want to provide for the present difficulties and they want to provide for the future. We have never opposed, and we do not oppose now, a reasonable program of allocation at the wholesale level and, if necessary, of rationing with certain limitation. However, Mr. Speaker, that is extraordinarily different from the gigantic intrusion into so many aspects of the life of the Canadian people that is being requested here. I say the burden is on the government, as it is with any legislative program and certainly, doubly so with legislation of this character, to establish the need for this legislation in all its aspects. So far they have not discharged that burden.

Mr. Hees: Thumper has tried to become C. D. Howe Mark II.

Mr. Baldwin: It may be very well for my friends to my left—and I know I will be criticized for saying so, but I hope in a good natured way by them—to make this move to have a measure of centralization, of authoritarianism. As I said to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) when he referred to Sheik Lougheed, he reminded me, as he talked to the ministers opposite, of Ali Baba and the 40 ministers! I know we are called the old line party, but I think the hon. gentlemen to my left, as a political party, are well into their political menopause right now!

With eloquent vindictiveness and political bombast, the hon. member for York South has been chastising us. That is his right, of course. He has the right to be wrong if he so desires, but he is probably the most highly paid talking doll in the business. If you press him almost anywhere you will hear him squeak "capital ripoff, capital ripoff".

An hon. Member: Corporate ripoff.

Mr. Baldwin: "Corporate ripoff". However, that is not part of this measure. I say to my hon. friends to my left in all seriousness that we have no brief for large corporations or small corporations or individuals who have no proper claim to assistance, and we will be making propositions to indicate this later. During the course of my speech I will make some proposals with regard to dealing with what might be a very serious situation because of improper conduct by the multinational corporations. I simply say, Mr. Speaker, that if it comes to a choice, as some day it may, it is my preference to keep the government as much as possible, from any unnecessary intrusion into the affairs of mankind. It is essential at times, sometimes temporarily and sometimes more than temporarily, and to that extent I am prepared to go along with it. However, as long as this parliament resists dealing in a firm way with the problems created by the improper conduct of multinational or other corporations, I much prefer to see vested in the dead hands of government the kind of powers which are asked for here and which, once granted, are not easily taken away.

Let me suggest some alternatives, Mr. Speaker. By a question I asked in the House two days ago, I have already indicated that so far as the crisis or the difficulties have been apparent, and to the extent to which we can accept, after working our way through the dense undergrowth, the various statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources outlining the facts, I believe the problems which have been delineated could well have been dealt with by existing legislative programs. The Export and Import Permits Act provides for a licensing of imports or exports to which can be attached firm, specific conditions spelling out precisely what an importer or exporter can or cannot do.

Last night, for example, we had the revelation that a refinery in Newfoundland was making a proposal to the government which would likely ease the present situation. I do not know the facts, and I can only hope this was a suggestion on a voluntary basis. But let me say categorically that if the government had chosen to act, it would have utilized that legislation and could have said to the company operating the refinery, "you cannot export except subject to the conditions which we lay down". There is in existence today an export control list which includes petroleum products. All that would have been required would have been an order in council or a direction establishing the conditions under which export licences would have been granted or altered and, it would have been compulsory for that corporation to obey the order. It is the law of the land today. I point that out because it has some effect on what I am about to propose. The people of Canada, through the government, are not today defenseless; they have reasonable opportunities in the shape of existing legislation to deal with the problems which so far have come to light, which we have examined and which have been detailed in this House.

The same thing would apply to the other multinational corporations. It would have been consistent and quite in accordance with the provisions of that legislation, in the ease of a multinational corporation in Canada which was receiving supplies of petroleum products from Venezuela under a contract, and which acquiesed in a diversion of those petroleum supplies to other countries, for the government to lay down conditions. Such a case would come within the scope of the legislation. The government could say to the companies, "These are the conditions under which you are operating and under which you are given a licence." Those conditions could be set down and insisted upon. The government could insist upon compliance with those provisions both on the part of the supply company in Canada, and on the part of the supplying company in Venezuela. If, by any chance, a simple amendment was needed to bring about such a result, that could have been done. I have only looked at the legislation casually, but I say as a lawyer that that right exists today.

● (1620)

The problems which we face are, first, those concerning the possibility of diversion, and those concerning refineries in Canada which should not need to export their product but utilize it in this country. I suggest to members of the House that this right exists today. If it were necessary to go a step further, the members of my party would consent to any simple amendment which might be required, just as we would have consented perfunctorily to the kind of simple legislation the minister led us to believe would be produced today, which was to deal with allocation of supplies at the wholesale level as well as other questions to which we have referred.

Let me say finally what our position is. In view of the limited facts which have been given to us, the contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and other ministers, I would be extremely reluctant to approve second reading of this measure without giving it further examination. If I were to approve it, I would consider that I would not be discharging my responsibilities to the people of Peace River and to the people of Canada. I would not subscribe to this legislation in its present unpalatable form on the basis of the indifferent case which the government has attempted to bring forward. That is my position today.

Before this debate on second reading concludes, I hope the government will produce better evidence, more concrete facts, as to what are the problems. In his opening statement today, the minister said that the technical advisory board, these holy ghosts, or these deputy holy ghosts who have not yet been identified, were unable to advise the government as to the extent of the shortage. That is what the minister said today. I might not have used his exact words, but that is the effect of what he told the House today. Those are the gentlemen who have advised the government to bring in this legislation. How, then, can we give credence to a government which asks us to pass this bill which is based on submissions of that kind from a board of this nature?

I have tried to keep this debate at a reasonable level. I have refrained from making the kinds of criticisms I should have liked to direct at hon. members opposite. Let me make this serious suggestion, however: there should be adequate discussion of this measure today, possibly tomorrow, and possibly even on Friday, although I do not know what business the government House leader proposes. Unless responsible ministers have told us by then, in the House, exactly what are the facts, this bill should not be debated further until it has been sent to the appropriate committee armed with the appropriate terms of reference. It should be before the committee for a very limited period of time and witnesses ought to be called so that we may discover what are the facts, what is the truth and what are the shortages, present or anticipated.

The members of my party and my friends to our left asked the government some questions today. Some political questions were asked, of course; nevertheless, there were some very searching, very earnest questions, designed to permit members of this House to find out what the facts are. The minister either did not know or, if he did know, he would not tell us. Under those conditions, we would be remiss in our duty if we were to pass this bill in its present form without knowing in more detail and with more certainty what are the facts. Until we know them, we must stand firm in our position.

We know that there are difficulties; we want to try to cure them. Legislation is directed at curing difficulties. When problem arise we legislate, in order to cure those problems, if at all possible. I and my colleagues want to approve measures which the government may need to cure existing problems. On the other hand, the government owes it to this House and the country to reveal with more accuracy what those problems are, and exactly how this bill will deal with them.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the measure now before us, Bill C-236, asks Parliament to vest the government with very wide powers for dealing with the energy crisis facing this country. I do not propose to deal with the details of the bill. Some sections, as we may urge when the bill is in committee, ought to be amended. I will deal mainly with the principles behind the legislation.

I suppose Canada is probably the only country in the western world which does not have legislation giving it authority to allocate its energy resources to meet the needs of its people. Personally, I have always been reluctant about giving to governments sweeping powers. On the other hand, when any country, especially a cold country like Canada, faces a situation like we face today, very wide powers are necessary, provided there are adequate precautions and restraints with regard to misuse.

My main concern at the moment is this: why did it take the government so long to introduce legislation creating an energy supplies allocation board for allocating resources according to the needs of the various regions of Canada? The government has taken a long time waking up to the fact that we are in the midst of a crisis. Warnings have been given by the oil industry, by the public and by members of opposition parties. The government was told of the situation creeping up on us, and these warnings were quite apart from warnings connected with the Arab-Israeli war. Yet the government went blindly along in its Polyanna spirit, closing its eyes to the impending situation.

When the minister made a Freudian slip in his speech and talked about the shortcoming rather than the shortfall, I thought he showed a guilty conscience and that he was cognizant of the fact that the shortfall was owing to the government's shortcomings. My criticism is not so much of this legislation as the fact that the legislation will merely provide a mechanism by which an oil policy could be implemented. An energy supplies allocation board is not, in itself, an oil policy. So far, we have not had an oil policy. After the minister's statement today, we do not know the oil policy framework within which this energy supplies allocation board will operate.

● (1630)

An oil policy has to set forth two things. First, it must ensure that adequate supplies of energy are made available to all the people of Canada who need them. Second, it must ensure that Canadians will not be required to pay unduly high prices for the privilege of using their own products merely because world prices are escalating for similar products from other countries. Those are the two basic things which must be included in an oil policy. We still do not know the government's oil policy. As a matter of fact, for the lifetime of nearly all of us here, the oil policy in Canada has not been established by the government. It has been established by the four multinational corporations which control 91 per cent of the oil production in Canada and 99 per cent of the oil refining in Canada.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I enjoy listening to him because he is always so delightful and non-partisan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: A great parliamentarian.

Mr. Douglas: He became quite vehement about concentrating power in the hands of the government. I wish he had been equally concerned about concentrating tremendous power in the hands of the corporate elite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: What kind of an oil policy has the oil industry imposed on this country? With regard to supply, they have made sure that the supply went where they wanted it to go. Just imagine, this country, one of the few countries in the world that is self-sufficient in oil and gas and which has only 2 per cent of the world's supply, has been shipping more than half its oil and gas to the United States. The oil majors have used this country as a source of supply. They have sucked our reserves dry wherever they could get away with it. That is why today we are faced with the prospect of a 10 year life index for our present supplies of conventional oil.

Almost every plan that has been brought forward has the same end in view. Only a few months ago the present government, with the support of the official opposition, talked about a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to the United States at a cost of $6 billion or $8 billion to take oil south. The government is prepared to entertain applications for the Mackenzie Valley pipeline to take gas from the Mackenzie delta to the United States. Some American companies have already made prepayment for that gas. They have advanced $75 million to PanArctic, in which the government has a 45 per cent equity, in order to get their hands on gas.

We export electricity. We will be shipping more and more uranium. We are exporting water power. If we are in a crisis situation now, let us not forget that the foreign-owned and foreign dominated multinational corporations have brought us to the position in which we find ourselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: They have taken the position that the price they would get for our products and which they would charge us for the privilege of using our own products would be the highest price they could get on the world market. We have had two prices set in Canada. We have had the Chicago price, the American midwest price, or the gulf coast posted price which is based on prices in Texas and Louisiana. They set the price we pay.

It was only on September 4 when the government finally took its courage in both hands, and I congratulate them for doing it, that we sought to cushion Canadians against the disastrous rise in the world price of oil. We froze the price of Canadian crude until January 31. We put an export tax on the differential between the Canadian price and the Chicago price with the money to go for future development of oil in Canada. I have said in this House before that I would certainly favour turning all of that export tax back to the oil producing provinces on condition they use that money to develop the oil sands and oil shale so that these resources can be developed by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians and under the control of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We have had an oil policy in Canada by the oil industry, for the oil industry and to enrich the oil industry. We are in a situation today where our oil reserves are being rapidly depleted. We passed the peak in 1972. In that year, our oil reserves showed a decline for the first time in our history. We probably only have 10 years left in which to busy ourselves with the task of developing other oil supplies, preferentially the oil sands of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

My criticism of this legislation is that, while the minister has brought forth a mechanism which is necessary to allocate what oil supplies we have, he has not yet enunciated a policy to ensure that now and in the future there will be security of supply. Nor has he stated what his policy is with regard to how the government proposes to insulate the Canadian consumer against rising world prices. Let us not deceive ourselves, Mr. Speaker, into thinking that this energy situation is of short duration.

● (1640)

I think it was on television last night that the Conservative member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), speaking of the fact that Mr. Shaheen had said there would be 100,000 barrels a day available from the Come-By-Chance refinery in Newfoundland, told us that in these circumstances the energy crisis was over. Mr. Speaker, it is not over. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources talks of the crisis from time to time as though it were solely the result of the Arab-Israeli war and that if this war could be settled our problems would be over. Our problems would be easier, but they would not be over.

The growing demand for oil throughout the world, the fact that the United States had to increase its oil imports by 31½ per cent this year, the fact that in our own country available reserves are being used up at an alarming rate, as are our resources of natural gas, all indicate we are heading into a crisis. I would suggest that if the diminution of our oil reserves continues at its present rate, by 1978 or 1979, unless oil from the tar sands is on stream, the country will face a much more serious crisis than it faces presently. Therefore, I say the government must make two things clear: first, the principle upon which the allocation of resources is based, and, second, the price structure it intends to follow.

Let me deal with the first proposition. At the present time there is no oil shortage in Canada as a whole; we produce more oil than we can consume. Our only problem is that we do not have a delivery system to take western oil to eastern Canada and that in some areas we do not have the refining capacity to produce the middle distillates and bunker fuel we need. For this reason, there needs to be some system of allocation in order to ensure that Canadians in one area are not in a surplus situation while residents in another part of the country suffer hardship. In the legislation before us I see no criteria set out to ensure equitable distribution. I know mention is made of distributing supplies on the basis of the existing market position. But if this is done we shall drive a lot of the small independents out of business—indeed many of them have already been driven out of business.

When oil was in surplus supply in Canada, the major companies were glad to use the small independents to take surpluses off their hands and dispose of them at lower prices, provided they did not use a brand name. The independents performed a useful function from the point of view of the oil cartel. But in the last year or two when oil was becoming a scarce commodity, the small independents were slowly being starved out. I could give the House a list of small independent companies which have been forced to the wall, of independent retailers who have been forced to close their doors.

I hope that before the bill is passed we shall be able to insert a clause into the bill which will ensure that independent wholesalers, independent brokers and independent retail outlets will be able to get their share of the oil available. Their situation should not depend on the existing market position, because in the last year or two their situation has been a most unfair one. I want to make sure that these independents get a fair deal and I hope the minister will be able to tell us when the bill is in committee what criteria will be used in the allocation of oil supplies.

The real issue on which the government has been evasive and ambivalent is that of the price structure. In this legislation, apart from clause 16(1)(L), no reference is made to price and the reference in that paragraph is a minimal one. It speaks of the power of the energy supply board to prescribe a price at which or a range of prices within which any oil product may be sold to customers in particular market areas. This does not give us any information at all as to what the price structure will be. The hon. member for Peace River, when he was speaking earlier, told those of us in the New Democratic Party that if we had only supported the Conservatives' idea of a price freeze instead of voting against some of their non-confidence motions this situation would not have arisen. Mr. Speaker, we were not confident that a 90-day price freeze would solve our difficulties. By now, the 90 days would be long past. Second, we did not believe you could freeze the price of goods imported from other countries or the price of goods produced and sold within a single province. What we did advocate, and what we are still advocating, are selective controls. And oil is one of the commodities to which we want selective controls applied.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I should like to see such controls applied to lumber, to steel, to farm machinery, to synthetic rubber, all of which are produced in this country. Those are the only kind of goods whose prices you can control. One of my hon. friends says the N.D.P. is coming round to the idea. Mr. Speaker, I moved a motion in this House ten years ago calling for a prices review board which would establish selective controls on some 30 or 40 commodities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The fact is the government has to make up its mind whether it is going to set the price or whether the international oil monopoly is going to set the price.

Mr. Yewchuk: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. member wishes to ask a question, I shall be very glad to answer it when I have finished what I have to say, but I don't want to interrupt my line of thought. I should like to continue the point I am endeavouring to make.

Mr. Andre: Whatever it was.

Mr. Douglas: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can only give thoughts. I cannot guarantee that the hon. member has the receiving apparatus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We have to decide whether the government, in the interest of the people of Canada, will establish the price which the public will pay for Canadian oil or whether it will be set by the international oil industry. I would point out that the oil industry is only interested in establishing the world price or the international price for our present continental oil. It is also seeking to get its foot in the door with respect to the development of the oil sands in western Canada.

● (1650)

If one doubts that, one has only to see the statements of Syncrude made up of four large multinational corporations. They are asking, supported by the premier of Alberta and supported, I presume, by Conservative members in this House, first of all for special tax concessions. Despite the fact that the oil industry only pays taxes on 6 per cent of its book profits, it wants further tax incentives. Second, it wants a written guarantee that it will be free from any price controls; third, that it will be free from any export controls; and fourth, that it will be free from any export tax. If you add those four things together they spell only one thing, and that is that the oil monopoly wants to get its hands on the western oil sands and to be assured that it can ship oil without any restriction to the United States, while requiring the Canadian people either to pay the American price or go without oil.

When I talk about an oil price freeze, I am not suggesting that you can keep any price absolutely static. There has to be room for adjustments, and if the oil industry can demonstrate that its costs of production have gone up, then of course the price should be reviewed. If the increase is justified, it has to be granted. But the oil industry has not done badly, as is apparent when one looks at the profits it has made, up some 87 per cent, or if you realize that in the last 12 months there has been an increase of 95 cents a barrel, which represents a 37 per cent increase, increasing revenues by some $700 million annually. But the industry has done even more than that. It has increased the value of the oil in the ground by $9.5 billion, which is not a bad increase in the value of one's assets.

What we have to know from the government is what it proposes to do on January 31 when the price freeze which was established temporarily has ended. We have had a lot of contradictory statements. At one time the minister said outside the House that he would fix the price at the Montreal market price, which would be the international price. At other times we are told that it is going to be phased in. I notice Mr. Don Getty, minister of intergovernmental affairs of the province of Alberta, said they had reached an agreement with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and this was corroborated by the premier of Alberta. Mr. Getty said they would be prepared to phase in this increase to bring the price of Canadian crude up to the international market price, and they should start with an increase of $1.50 a barrel. An increase of $1.50 a barrel increases the revenues of the oil industry of Canada by $1,100 million a year.

I notice that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made a speech out on the Pacific coast to the Conservative convention. The Vancouver Province for Saturday, December 1 quotes him as follows:

> Mr. Stanfield said the federal government should be meeting representatives of oil producing provinces with the idea of increasing prices in stages and working out an arrangement leading to a Canadian price ceiling somewhat below the international price.

The Canadian people are intelligent enough to know that if it costs more to produce oil, or if we have to pay higher prices for imported oil, no one can keep the price down. But in my opinion the Canadian people will not stand for this government or for any other government raising the price of oil when an increase is not needed, merely because the oil industry can get a better price somewhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The oil industry needs to be reminded that this oil is not their oil; it belongs to the people of this country and to the people of the province where it is produced.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): What about the oil in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Douglas: Saskatchewan is selling its oil, which as the House knows is sour oil with a large sulphur content, in the main to the United States.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): How did you treat the oil companies when you were there?

Mr. Douglas: We were not using domestic oil at the time. We exported it. We got our domestic oil from Alberta, which is sweet oil, the kind of oil our refineries are equipped to handle.

What I think this House and the Canadian people have to recognize is that every time the price of oil goes up the Canadian economy loses money. Professor Bruce W. Wilkinson of the University of Alberta, a well known economist, has pointed out in an article in the Canadian Forum, and also in many other articles that he has written, that there is a net loss to the Canadian economy of 7.73 per cent when there is an increase in the price of oil. He has pointed out that the higher prices paid by Canadian consumers more than offset the revenues that the federal and provincial governments collect from taxes or royalties and dividends and retained earnings received by Canadian shareholders. As a matter of fact, only 14 per cent of the dividends and retained earnings derived by the oil industry stay in Canada; the other 86 per cent goes across the line. That means that if the price of oil is raised by $1.50 a barrel and revenue is increased by $1,100 million, the Canadian economy would be the net loser by $80 million.

Mr. Nystrom: You mean $800 million.

Mr. Douglas: No, $80 million—it is 7.73 per cent. He further points out that the 95 cents a barrel increase already granted this year with respect to the oil now in place will cost the Canadian economy $450 million over the life of those oil reserves. If the price is raised by $1.50, it represents a loss of over $1 billion during the life of the oil field. The Canadian people will not get the benefit of the increased price for oil; they will pay more for their oil and the Canadian economy as a whole will be out of pocket by nearly 8 per cent of the increase.

I know all the arguments, Mr. Speaker. I have heard them from my friends to my right and I have listened to them as briefs were presented by oil companies. They say "We need the money. We cannot make a case on the basis of increased costs, but we do need the money for future development". They say they need the money to go out and find more oil wells and bring in more oil reserves. I have listened to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) say that ad nauseam. There are two things to keep in mind. First of all, we have no guarantee they will use the money to search for oil. Mr. Joseph Yanchula, a petroleum consultant in Calgary, wrote an article in which he said that $1,000 million goes out of Alberta each year; that $300 million has gone to the Arctic and $700 million went elsewhere, but that Alberta had a net loss of $1,000 million. We must remember that we have no guarantee the extra money the companies get for oil is going into research in this country. If that is their only argument for increasing the price the government should take that extra money, put it into a fund and use that in conjunction with the provinces to develop the oil sands on the basis of public ownership.

• (1700)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The other fallacy of that argument is that the oil companies do not need money to look for oil, drilling 6,000 to 8,000 feet below the surface. Our main reserve of oil for the future will be the oil sands and we know where they are. This is a mining and refining proposition, and the companies do not need the extra $1.50 per barrel in order to take over control of one of Canada's last great energy resources.

I hope the government will give serious thought in the next couple of days to what it is going to do when the present price freeze ends.

An hon. Member: It has only two days left; 48 hours.

Mr. Douglas: I know the government is being pressured by the oil industry, being pressured by the government of Alberta and being pressured by our friends in the official opposition to raise the price of crude oil at the end of January. That will mean a substantial increase in the price of gasoline and home heating fuel as well as diesel fuel. I would remind the House that the largest single consumers of diesel products in Canada are farmers and fishermen, and when you raise the price of diesel fuel you automatically raise the price of food in the supermarkets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I say the government ought to think about this matter very carefully. The government has a duty to tell us within the next few days what it proposes to do about this price structure which will be put into effect when the price freeze ends.

An hon. Member: You will support them no matter what they do.

Mr. Douglas: I say that the price which must be set is a price which will be fair to the oil industry.

Mr. Yewchuk: And what is that?

Mr. Douglas: My hon. friend asks "And what is that?" It ought to be the present price subject to an adjustment that the oil industry can prove reflects increases in cost.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Twaits of Imperial Oil, when interviewed by the press, admitted they could not justify an increase on the basis of cost. He said they wanted the increase because it reflected the world price structure. We do not want the Canadian people living under an international monopolistic price structure; we should arrange to establish our own price structure.

I see that my time is almost up. May I close with one sentence. I say to the minister, and through him to all his colleagues including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I urge most strongly that the government make a statement within the next day or two telling us what the price structure will be when the present freeze ends, because upon that decision by the government will depend the attitude the NDP will take in respect of this bill and the whole energy policy of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member can only ask a question with unanimous consent as the hon. member's time has just expired. Does the House give its consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members. The hon. member who just spoke made a great to do about his support for price controls. I wonder if he could tell us why he and his leader nearly broke their necks running around the country saying that price controls would not work?

An hon. Member: Selective price controls.

Mr. Yewchuk: I think that we cannot have a member of this House talking out of both sides of his mouth at the same time. We want to know where he stands and whether he is or is not in favour of controls.

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. member will read the speeches that have been made by the leader of this party and by myself, both inside and outside the House, and I would be very glad to send him copies of radio speeches and the motions I have moved, he will see that we always were in favour of selective controls; but they would have to be permanent or stay in effect for a considerable period of time. We are not going to be led down any garden path by some phony talk about a 90-day freeze that will only postpone the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: We want to be honest with the Canadian people and tell them that we cannot freeze the prices of imported goods. In respect of coffee, bauxite, citrus fruits and other things the price is set in the countries which produce them, but in respect of our products in Canada which cross provincial boundaries we can have selective controls. We cannot have price controls on products produced and sold within provinces, but we ought to have selective controls on those products that cross provincial boundaries. If the Conservative party believes so much in controls, it had a good many years in office when it could have put them into effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Any more questions from Athabasca?

An hon. Member: Do you want to freeze doctors' incomes too, Paul?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, the House is now considering Bill C-236 which provides, as a result of an alleged oil crisis, the establishment of a control agency for energy resources rather than oil.

At the beginning of the discussions the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) stated that there was a shortage of oil in Canada. Later, he tried to withdraw from his position when he maintained that there was no shortage of oil, but no means to carry oil in eastern Canada. Again today he has just confirmed that there is effectively no oil crisis in Canada, but administration problems. Why are the people still being misled since once again, on the basis of an inexistent crisis, the establishment of a control agency has just been suggested.

In our view it is necessary to establish an assessment agency. What are the requirements of the Canadian people, what are the available resources in Canada? An assessment agency could determine it clearly on a 25-year basis. Therefore, every year, after a review of figures and data, we might have the most accurate knowledge of resources, production and requirements of Canadians. On this basis of agreement, balanced by this agency, we might guarantee that products will be available for Canadians and that they will be distributed to meet their needs.

Thus, indirectly, instead of ensuring the Canadian people that their needs will be met, they simply want to control both production and distribution and, at the same time, the needs of individuals. They want to control them as they have done for a few months, strengthening restraints and giving themselves the right to tell Canadians at a given time: We have energy, but try to do without it because we have not been clever enough to develop the means to take this energy and distribute it according to requirements.

But today, this bill is designed to establish a mandatory allocation program in four regions. This program is to apply specifically to petroleum products because once more it is under the pretence of an oil crisis that they interfere in the energy capacity of Canada as a whole. The kinds of petroleum products are specified—it is suggested to set up a list of priorities—to provide for the systematic allocation of products and to see what controls are proposed by the government.

And, as the previous speaker said, they forget, on the other hand, to ensure Canadians a fair price or a price truly representative of the costs of that production or those so-called controls.

I say that this a case where the pretence of a crisis is used to control all energy resources. Clause 14 goes even further, and I quote:

14. (1) Where it is considered necessary to do so for the purpose of conserving the available supplies of such petroleum products as have been included in a mandatory allocation program, the Governor in Council may amend the mandatory allocation program by adding electric power thereto and establishing mandatory allocation thereof.

The bill before us is not a bill aimed at controlling petroleum energy resources, but rather all energy resources.

Clause 15 goes on to state:

—any alternative fuel—

—not the oil problem that faces us now, but alternative fuels. It goes on:

—within the meaning of section 13 or electric power will be regulated as to allocation of supply and pricing—

There again, the pretence of a crisis is used to ensure control and not an assessment or the ensurance of fair distribution at equal prices across Canada. The bill does not talk about that. When the ensurance of a distribution is sought or when it talks about ensuring some distribution, nowhere does it talk about ensuring fair, or at least equal, prices to all Canadians.

We will still have the same system as now where there is a price for western Canada and another for eastern Canada. We were told why our petroleum in the province of Quebec and the Maritimes Provinces came from outside Canada. So we were subject to international prices.

I agree that a board must be set up but it should be responsible for evaluating resources and requirements and should advise the government as to what precise steps it should take to meet the needs of Canadians. If such a study had been undertaken two or three years ago the construction of a pipeline to the east would have been initiated. On the contrary, we have wasted all this time helping the major oil companies with guaranteed revenues to the detriment of Canadians. Again today, to favour the big corporations and allow them to increase their benefits to the prejudice of Canadians, they suggest a crisis and a price increase.

Once again today, as I have suggested to the minister, what effort did the government actually make to help the people? Absolutely none! For instance our fellow citizens have been obliged to bow to the government decisions, to accept price increases, to accept restrictions, but the government forgets once more to guarantee the country maximum exploitation of its energy resources.

This afternoon, I told the minister that patents have been submitted to reduce the gas consumption of vehicles and increase the efficiency of a gallon of gas. The same thing could be done in our houses with our heating facilities. We could simply raise the pump pressure of a heating system from 100 to 150 pounds and thus automatically decrease oil consumption by 20 per cent. Why is it not mentioned by the minister? Why is the minister not suggesting precisely that by using those patents we improve the return of our resources? Why has the minister, other ministers or the government not ordered its research personnel to study these patents and accept some of them for the benefit of the individual, and not, as in the past, to consider dangerous certain patents, only to assure companies, especially oil companies, maximum consumption of their products? And now, while we are supposedly facing a shortage which in fact does not exist, instead of acting for the good of the whole population, the people are asked to tighten their belt and, moreover, to help big corporations.

The bill provides the government with means to keep on lying to the people, fooling them, limiting individual liberties at all times by saying that we are facing another crisis, another mess. This legislation will then be used to stifle the citizen and to impose the desired restrictions. The present situation will prevail but in a much more legal way. The two price system, one for the East and one for the West, will be maintained throughout Canada.

More restrictions can be imposed on some parts of the country for the benefit of other parts. We can go on with our regional disparity policy.

The bill as a whole is further proof that the government is much more interested in obtaining money for its electoral funds through the large corporations than in meeting the needs of the population.

If we want to control, as we are now doing, the need for products and their distribution, I think that we could go much further in imposing these unfortunate controls and suggest something like the NDP members were suggesting a while ago, that is controlling everything by selection. The Liberals may find this funny, but they are progressively going towards such selective controls.

No consideration is given to protecting the individuals through all this. The aim is always to protect the large corporations to the disadvantage of individual interests. What I hope is that during the discussions in committee it will be possible to review this bill in full details in order to integrate amendments which will put an end to these attacks upon the individuals and to this protection of the large corporations.

● (1720)

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to argue briefly against the views expressed by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette).

First, he started with the premise that there was no oil crisis. Mr. Speaker, I wonder where he has been for the last couple of months, whether he is aware of the Middle East crisis and whether he is really serious when he suggests that obviously, as far as he is concerned at least, there is no crisis.

He says that he lacks information on the oil situation in Canada. Yet, we know that in February, March, April, May and June this year, the Committee on National Resources and Public Works has been sitting. We have made a study of all this information. We have questioned officials and experts concerning our supplies and national resources.

The Social Crediters were of course absent from these meetings, Mr. Speaker, and if there exists a lack of information within their party it is because they did not take part in the discussions of the committee which was considering this problem.

Moreover, I advise the hon. member for Charlevoix to ponder the information found in the energy policy for Canada. The first stage is the analysis of this point which he appeared to support and which is incorporated in the bill under review. The hon. member suggested that this would increase the division between the various areas of Canada. I suggest to him, with all due respect, that if he should review the bill, he would realize that we are aiming at unity. As regards the allocation of supplies we do not want to encourage regional disparity but prevent that some be favoured at the expense of others.

That is one of the aims of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I was also interested to hear what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said. Of course, I was not aware of the fact that we were supposed to carry out a clause by clause study of this piece of legislation. I was under the impression that we were supposed to discuss and analyse the principle of this bill. Evidently, the hon. member for Peace River has quite skillfully taken the tack which has been previously taken by the party of which he is a member, namely, that of avoiding discussion on the principle of the legislation because discussions on principle may lead to discussions on policy and we might soon become aware of the complete absence of any policy of that party with regard to energy. The hon. member stated that he has no facts upon which to come to a decision with reference to this bill.

First of all, he did not indicate whether or not he supports the principle of the bill. All he said was that he is ignorant. That much is evident from the speech that he made. It appears that the hon. member, like the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette), has been absent from the country during the past two and a half months. Indeed, I understand that Peace River is an area of Canada which is perhaps not as favoured with good means of communication as are other areas, but he must have been aware of the Middle East crisis; he must have known of the war between Israel and the Arab States; he must know of the shortage of energy in the form of petroleum in Canada and of the international shortage of energy.

Indeed, he must know that the European Economic Council is in dire straits as a result of the shortage of energy. A consultation has been taking place between France, which seems to have no shortfall of petroleum products, and Holland which has been placed on the Arab embargo list. Evidently, the hon. member for Peace River has not read the news relating to the serious situation in the United States where certain pundits have foreseen an unemployment level of up to 12 per cent. Neither is he aware of the difficulties of the president of that country with regard to his energy advisers, Mr. Love having resigned the day before yesterday.

Undoubtedly, he must be aware of these facts because he must have been advised by some researchers of the presence of force majeure clauses in most of the supply contracts. He cannot plead ignorance of that matter, and he must be aware of the repeated replies of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when the latter stated that force majeure clauses might result in a shortfall of some 200,000 barrels a day. Again, he must also be aware of the fact that we in Canada are vulnerable. There has been a difference of opinion today between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the president of Imperial Oil as to whether Canada has been placed on the Arab embargo list.

He must be aware also of the fact that we will become vulnerable if we are placed on the embargo list. Surely, then he must recognize that since Canada imported 900,000 barrels a day of petroleum from offshore sources during 1973, if indeed there is an embargo which affects Canada, and if that embargo is added to the one facing the United States or if we are affected by the force majeure clauses contained in the supply contracts, we may be facing a serious shortage this winter. I am surprised that the hon. member has no information, because during the question period in the past three weeks the minister has been ready and available to provide information. Picayune questions of picayune importance have been directed to his attention, such as the reference to the force majeure clause. These questions are asked not because the opposition is interested in what it means but simply in order to score political points. Again, the same situation applies to the constitution of a technical advisory committee, which is not a policy advisory committee, relating to supply of petroleum. Mr. Speaker, these are the picayune matters which are directed to the attention of the minister and which, to my mind, explain the absence of knowledge of the hon. member for Peace River and I am sure, after listening to the speeches and contributions of members of the Tory party, of all its members.

● (1730)

The hon. member also suggests that the government ought not to have introduced this particular bill. We are very much aware that on Monday there will be a motion of non-confidence presented by the opposition. I would hope that this bill could receive third reading before Monday. I am sincerely hopeful of that, because this government is responsible for the maintenance of order and good government in Canada, whether or not there is a parliament sitting. It may well be that as a result of the next vote we will be defeated and this parliament might have to be dissolved.

I see the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) shaking his head. He is agreeing, as any irresponsible member of parliament would agree, that it would be a good thing for this country not to have a parliament sitting during a period of crisis, a crisis the like of which we have not seen for some time. Surely, the hon. member realizes that we could be without a parliament to pass effective legislation relating to these problems that we might be facing for a period of four or five months, not just any four or five months but those four or five months when the crisis would be at its height. That is the time when in Canada we would indeed be feeling the utmost effect of an absence of energy and petroleum. The government has a responsibility to introduce this bill at this time in order to forestall the difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, in order to indicate that there has been a strenuous objection to the strength of this bill, I might point to section 11, which evidently the hon. member for Peace River had not read,—

Mr. Stevens: Stick to the principle.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) says that I am not dealing with the principle. Yes, I am, but I cannot leave on the record statements that are made without foundation by a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I have to reply to the groundless statements, and one of them is that the bill is too powerful. I suggest that if it is too powerful, and the minister is attempting to assume powers that are usually exercised by the provinces, the constitution protects the Canadian people through the division of powers which indicate that only in a state of emergency can the powers which are proposed be exercised. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that section 11 states exactly that. The passage of this bill does not mean that the board is created; this bill does not take effect until the Governor in Council determines there is a situation of emergency which requires that the provisions of the bill come into play. Section 11 reads:

> When the Governor in Council is of the opinion that a national emergency exists by reason of actual or anticipated shortages of petroleum or disturbances in the petroleum markets that affect or will affect the national security—

He can apply the provisions of this particular statute. The constitution is very clear and section 91 of the British North America Act relating to order and good government is very clear. These particular provisions could not be brought into play unless and until there is an emergency. So much for the hon. member's objection with reference to the powers that are to be exercised, Mr. Speaker.

I might also indicate that there was a strong objection—or at least I thought it was but we never know whether the hon. member for Peace River is taking a partisan view or being serious about a matter he is advancing—to sections 14 and 15 of the bill dealing with the control over electricity and discussions with the provinces. He suggested these sections cannot be applied under the constitutional position I have just indicated. Surely, in a time of crisis no one would seriously advance the proposition that the government of Canada, in order to benefit the whole of Canada, would not have a right in the event that there were one or two recalcitrant provinces, to take those measures to bring them into line and to administer that source of energy which may be completely within their boundaries. Surely, that is the aim of the bill, but it is a powerful measure that is not to be taken unless there is an emergency.

It may be that after next week we will have an energy situation which would require measures to be taken, and we might not have a parliament to take them as a result of an opposition motion. The government, therefore, has an obligation to protect the welfare of the Canadian people by presenting legislation of this nature.

Because of the time available to me, Mr. Speaker, I will try to deal with those objections that I find most important. There is the objection relating to the destruction of popular safeguards which have been enacted into law. The hon. member was referring to environmental situations and the Combines Act. Perhaps he had not paid too much attention to the matter, but he forgot to mention that there are provisions in the bill relating to consultation with the ministers responsible prior to any of the regulations being passed which affect some of the present provisions of the law. I should like to cite clause 24(2) with regard to environmental considerations which reads:

> Before making a regulation under this section, the Board shall consult with the Minister of the Environment regarding the relaxation of any provisions of law relating to the control of emission of pollutants into the environment.

Surely, those provisions are there to protect the Canadian people, just as the environmental statutes are there to protect the Canadian people. But there may be situations where these particular laws will have to be bent in order to provide a greater good, that of the health and welfare of the nation. The same applies to the Combines Investigation Act, the Transportation Act and the National Energy Board Act. I suggest that is only reasonable, and I do not find anything objectionable in these provisions.

There was also an objection to the duration of the bill. Clause 35 explicitly indicates that this shall be no longer than November of 1974, when these measures shall simply expire. If we want to extend the effect of these measures, we will have to come before this House and debate whether an emergency condition continues which would justify the continuation of the provisions of the bill.

The hon. member also objected to the intrusion of the provisions of this bill on the rights of the Canadian people. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the only persons against whom the intrusion would be directed would be those multinational corporations which control 92 per cent and 99 per cent of our production and refining capacities respectively. When I hear reference to this question of intrusion, I cannot recall any questions from members of the loyal opposition when the quotas of certain private individuals in Canada were being curtailed as a result of a shortfall of oil production or refined products. I do not remember any sort of concern then, so I am wondering whether the accusations coming from the party to the left of the Loyal Opposition that they are indeed a lobby for the big oil companies, have not some truth in them. They are only defending an intrusion against those people involved in the petroleum industry.

● (1740)

Finally, the last point I wish to make in the few minutes available to me is this: the hon. member indicated that there is existing legislation on the statute books which will permit the government to do exactly what it wants. I am surprised at the extent of the information available to the hon. member. Nevertheless, he did not state specific examples, so far as I could ascertain. He merely indicated that he has looked casually over the whole field of available legislation. Indeed, his may have been a casual view, a casual examination, indicative of the attitude his party has taken on matters affecting energy within this nation. That party indeed is very casual in its procedures with regard to analysis. I find that objectionable, and I suggest that those members are not acting responsibly as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments left before we shall be called to go to the other chamber I wish to begin my remarks concerning Bill C-236. The Liberal member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais), who just preceded me, said that there is a crisis in the country the like of which we have not seen for some time. I wish the hon. member would take counsel with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), as those ministers in the last week to ten days have been assuring us that we are over-reacting to the energy crisis and, to use a phrase similar to that used, that we are deluding ourselves into some type of recession.

One reason why the Liberal government is using this argument in connection with the energy crisis is this: ministers want to hide the fact that they know that governmental policies are bringing this country to bad times. One barometer is the falling stock exchange, which in Canada fell to a new low for the current period.

An hon. Member: How about New York?

Mr. Stevens: New York went down as well. Nevertheless, in percentage terms, our rate of fall has been more rapid than that of the New York exchange.

The hon. member for Nipissing suggested that certain of our comments concerning the composition of the technical advisory committee which was set up by the government to advise the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) were "picky". I refer members of the House to what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said before the committee. He said that the government's decision to go ahead and seek a mandatory allocation measure was founded on the advice received from the technical advisory committee. The very bill before us today is the mandatory allocation bill to which the minister referred. I suggest that referring to our questioning concerning the composition and activities of that committee as being "picky" is tantamount to misleading this House.

Having had the opportunity to examine the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, we are not at all satisfied that those ministers know what they are doing and that the government is in a position to bring in meaningful legislation, even if it is necessary. Let there be no doubt on one point: we feel that the bill in its present form is unacceptable. It must be modified before it can receive the approval of our party in this House.

It has been suggested that we should not at this stage deal with the bill clause by clause. One need not deal with it clause by clause to show how alarming it is. Read the title of the bill. If most hon. members are not alarmed by the title, I suggest they do not fully understand what the government is seeking in asking for such discretion as is outlined in the bill. On the front page of the bill we see that it is "An Act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of petroleum products within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada—".

I intend to elaborate on what would be the net result for the government if this bill were passed in its present form.

Judging from the reaction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as evidenced before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, I would say he is putting this nation into the hands of the private international oil corporations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: By asking for passage of this bill he would make us, virtually, a pawn in the hands of the international corporations. I say that because that minister has put on the record of this House a statement to the effect that we have to accept a world shortfall. When the minister was asked in committee who had said so, he, in effect, said that the international private corporations said so. That position constitutes a complete abdication of power on the part of the government.

I have referred to the minister's statement on previous occasions. I think I ought to read it again into the record, as, apparently, many ministers and other members of the House seem to forget what the minister actually said on November 26. As recorded at page 8138 of Hansard for that date, the minister said:

> Canada will have to share, not only in the direct cutback from Arab sources but in the general world shortfall.

We asked the minister about that statement in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee, to learn who says we have to accept a world shortfall. In this connection it has been suggested that two questions must be considered. First, there are certain private contracts in existence which may or may not be honoured, largely at the discretion of those private corporations. The second suggestion of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was that, in any event, if we are to be good international citizens, we must accept a world shortfall.

I suggest that that attitude fits in with the attitude behind the presentation of an allocation bill such as this which confers such far reaching powers. Once international oil corporations realize the extent of the powers available to the minister, they can set whatever terms they like and the government will have to live by them.

Actually, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared before the committee, I was astounded to hear him say that not only did he not have any jurisdiction for interfering with these private corporations but that, in any event, it was a private matter and that he did not think he ought to interfere any way. I suggest the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, also adopted that tone when testifying before the committee. That is the background we must bear in mind when debating this bill.

It is anything but clear as to whether the government has facts before it which would justify the measure it is requesting this House to pass. Second, it is anything but clear as to whether the government itself is apprised of the correct facts, not only in Canada, but world wide, regarding this situation. Really, it has no oil policy or policy to deal with a shortage.

There has been some discussion concerning the technical advisory committee. I believe it is important that we inquire as to who sits on that committee, what meetings have been held, whether minutes have been kept and in what way they made representations and recommendations to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources before he made some of his statements. Let me give an example.

It is suggested there may be a 200,000 barrels per day shortfall in oil imports to Canada. When we asked the minister who so advised him, he stated that the first time he saw that figure was in a draft of a statement he gave to this House on November 26 and from which I have already quoted. We asked him whether that meant the day he gave the statement was the first time he had been made aware of the possible 200,000 barrels per day shortfall. His answer was no, it had been in earlier drafts. When asked when this was, he could not remember. When we asked who gave the information upon which the 200,000 barrel estimate was based, he replied it was the technical advisory committee. I think it was just yesterday he was asked if he could name the individuals who sit on the committee. He said he could not remember.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

POSITION ON ORDER PAPER OF MOTIONS FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), filed a notice of motion in these terms:

That the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, presented to the House on Wednesday, December 5, 1973, be concurred in.

I may point out that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) filed precisely the same motion.

My point of order relates to the position these two motions have been assigned for the order paper. As of today they are simply on the notice paper, but the notice paper indicates where they will be when they are transferred tomorrow to the order paper.

Their position on the notice paper indicates that they will be listed for debate on Monday next under motions made pursuant to Standing Order 58(4)(a). As everyone knows, Monday next is to be an allotted day on which it is thought there might be a non-confidence motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

My contention is that, since these two identical motions relate to the adoption of a report of a standing committee, they should appear on the order paper under Routine Proceedings in the same place where half a dozen or more similar motions are already listed. Some of them have been standing for quite a while. There is one in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), one in the name of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), and several more.

My point is that the motions filed yesterday for concurrence in the report of the standing committee should be given treatment identical with that given to other such motions. I suspect the reason the Chair and the Table have put these motions where they are is because of Standing Order 58(16) which reads as follows:

There shall be no debate on any motion to concur in the report of any standing committee on estimates which have been referred to it except on an allotted day.

I have to point out that the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is not, strictly speaking, in fact in any terms, a report on estimates themselves. Rather, it is a report on a matter that arose in that committee out of consideration of the estimates. Just to identify it so that we will know what we are talking about, the actual report contains a recommendation that matters having to do with the administration of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, including in particular the dismissal of Mr. Rudnicki, should become the subject matter of a reference by the House to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. That is a recommendation made to the House arising out of consideration of estimates that were referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, but in no sense is it a report by the standing committee on the estimates.

I can tell by that winsome smile on Your Honour's face that you are ready to tell me the report is out of court on another basis. That, of course, is a separate issue. I am not now arguing the question whether the report itself is in order. I am contending that the place where the motion should have been set out is where other motions for concurrence in reports of standing committees appear, namely, under Daily Routine of Business.

• (1410)

Your Honour might ask what is the difference, since the motion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby or the identical motion of the hon. member for Calgary North will be reached in due course. I point out that if these motions appear under Daily Routine of Business it would be the prerogative of either of these hon. members, any day on motions, to ask the House to proceed thereon. But if those motions appear under the item of an allotted day one is faced with the fact that on the next allotted day, namely, Monday, December 10, a non-confidence motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition may be filed.

Since Your Honour has the responsibility, when several motions are set down for the same day, to decide which shall take priority, if you have to choose among motions proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, the hon. member for Calgary North and the Leader of the Opposition one can imagine which one you would feel should be given priority. In such circumstances the motions in the names of the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby would never be reached at all. If they were placed under Routine Proceedings, at least one or the other of the two members I have named would be able to move concurrence in his motion and, thereby, concurrence in the report.

I realize there are arguments about the validity of the report. It seems to me a case could be made for the right of a committee dealing with estimates which have been referred to it to make a recommendation about a matter arising from those estimates. This, indeed, is what happened in the committee. There was a discussion of the estimates of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and particularly with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Rudnicki, resulting in this recommendation that the whole matter be referred by the House to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, the committee to which housing matters are normally referred.

As I say, the validity of the report in Your Honour's eyes is another issue. But to enable even that question to be decided it seems to me the motions ought to be in a place on the order paper where (a) they are entitled to be, and where (b) they will be reached. If they are put under the order for Monday's opposition day I assert they will never be reached. My point of order is, therefore, that they should be placed under Routine Proceedings.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I understand fully why you smiled, Mr. Speaker. I was smiling at the same time at the valiant effort of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to demonstrate to us that we are not dealing with a report on estimates. It has to be a report on estimates. The reference from the House was on estimates, and if the report has any validity at all that validity must be founded on the fact that it is a report on estimates. If it has any standing at all it ought to stand where it is. I think it would be a splendid thing in this case if it were never reached because, for other reasons, it is obviously a breach of the rules.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a comment on the point of order. It is true that the committee on estimates has made this report. But it is the Prime Minister who said on several occasions in the House that this vehicle could be used to discuss the matter and to interrogate the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation about this very serious affair. It happened to be the committee on estimates that made this report, but deserves the place on the order paper which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said it should occupy. It was the Prime Minister who directed the House as to which committee should initiate action, and I submit the motion of the hon. member from Calgary should certainly be dealt with right away.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who preceded me referred to the substantive seriousness of the content of the motion and I should like to speak very briefly on that point before I get to the procedural issue. As has been indicated, the committee was quite properly dealing with the estimates that had been referred to it. In conjunction with that task it also touched on the important matter of social housing and the firing of Mr. Rudnicki. The committee decided that it would be inappropriate, in the context of discussing estimates, to pursue that inquiry and referred the subject back to the House so that the appropriate committee of the House, at a different time and with instructions by the House, could deal with the issue.

I point out that a clear majority of the committee, and therefore a majority of the members of the House, have said that they want the dismissal of Mr. Rudnicki and the government's social housing policy investigated, and this seemed to be the only way that this majority view could get a fair hearing. Whether Your Honour decides that my motion should be in its present place on the order paper or elsewhere, it is certainly my firm wish that you rule that, whatever the location, the motion itself is in order.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to this motion. The problem that arose in the miscellaneous estimates committee was that only an hour and a half was devoted to the consideration of this matter. When there is an important matter like the wrongful dismissal of Rudnicki one wants to discuss it, but during that time government members, backed up by a biased chairman, would not let us deal with the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member who has no right, on a point of order, to rise and accuse the chairman of a committee of bias. I think that is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what other word to use. He made it very clear when we tried to rise on points of order that he would not even listen to us. Even when we raised a point of order just before the ending of the committee itself, he would not allow us to speak to it. What else can you say? Certainly he was prejudiced, and he was backed up by his own members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we might limit ourselves to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre some minutes ago. I invite hon. members to take that into account. We have already spent some time on the point of order and, although it is an important one, we certainly should not at this point revive proceedings that took place in committee. The hon. member for St. John's East a few days ago raised by way of a question of privilege certain matters which took place in committee and a ruling was made at the time. I would hope that aspect of the situation might not be revived in the present circumstances but rather that we would limit our discussion to the very important procedural point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I am sure that the hon. member for Calgary North, with his experience in the House and elsewhere and his intimate knowledge of the rules of the House, can give very valuable guidance to the Chair on the procedural aspects of this matter.

Order, please. I am not sure whether I can assume that all that might be said for or against the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has now been said. I had thought for a while that perhaps I should reserve my decision and think about it, but in all honesty I have to tell hon. members that since the notices were given to the table yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby I was placed in the situation where I had to give serious consideration to the whole matter.

The weakness I see in the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he refers to motions already on the order paper is that he does not take into account a point of order raised, I think, on June 15 or June 16, followed by a ruling which was made on June 18. At that time the Chair received the benefit of excellent advice which was given by hon. members who went at length into this matter and gave their opinions. After considering the advice and counsel given by members, the Chair felt at the time that the only way this type of motion could be considered was on an allotted day as business of supply. It would be very difficult for the Chair to reach any other decision. When hon. members look at Standing Order 58(16) they will see it states:

> There shall be no debate on any motion to concur in the report of any standing committee on estimates which have been referred to it except on an allotted day.

How can the Chair rule that there can be a debate on the report we now have before us on a day other than an allotted day as part of supply business? I think I would be remiss in my responsibility if I ruled in any other way. I think the House would embark on a rather dangerous procedure if, when we refer estimates to a committee and receive substantive reports on matters, which I think can legitimately be considered by the committee, we received reports and considered them from day to day under motions. The House would then turn not to the consideration of the regular business, and we would possibly never get to the question period from day to day if we were to consider these many reports with recommendations, very valid, I am sure, in many instances, but coming from the estimates committees where these committees are required substantially to consider and report to us on estimates.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other hon. members have raised the point that perhaps this report is out of order in that it should not have been accepted at all. I am not prepared to go that far. I am not ruling whether the report is in order. But I am saying that if it has any validity at all it must be as a report of the committee on estimates, and therefore it should be considered as required by Standing Order 58.

I have some qualms about the work which is assigned to these committees, and particularly to the miscellaneous estimates committee. I see no reason why all or most of the estimates should be referred to that particular committee. I am referring to the supplementary estimates. I wonder whether, by agreement, there should not be some arrangement whereby this work might be spread over a number of committees—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —rather than heaping it on the miscellaneous estimates committee and its poor chairman who is then called upon to allocate time, perhaps with imaginative timepieces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members will have sympathy for the chairman of that committee. If they were placed in a like position they might feel they had to resort to that kind of extreme measure to ensure that all the estimates of the different departments are considered before the time the report has to be made.

For all these reasons I think hon. members will agree that it is perhaps generous on the part of the House to suggest that this particular report should stand as supply business rather than under the heading of motions.

Certain Motions' Position on Order Paper

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested it is up to the members who are the sponsors of the motions under routine proceedings which are called from day to day to have them debated. I suggest to him that if he reads the ruling made on June 18 he will realize there would be considerable resistance on the part of the Chair to this being done. It was my impression when the ruling was made that there was at least a tacit understanding that these motions perhaps ought not to be where they are now and that certainly we should think twice before we embark by common consent and with the sanction of the Chair on the consideration of motions or reports of this kind from the committee charged with the responsibility of considering estimates.

For these reasons I hope hon. members will see their way clear to the accepting of the decision of the Chair to allow the notices of motions in question to stay where they are at least for the time being.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I raise a further point of order very briefly. I believe that the restlessness of the House and the motivation for the first point of order arise out of what has flowed from the ruling of June 18 and the inability of the House to express itself in respect of any particular item in the estimates. Because of what happened last June, when a committee of the House after due deliberation varied an item in the estimates and expressed the opinion of that committee as charged by the House to do so and the government then moved to restore that item, the House is denied, as a result of the ruling and the move by the government, an opportunity to express itself on that particular item. The House must accept a vote on the entire set of estimates rather than on an item.

With the greatest respect I suggest that was not the purpose of the rule when it was introduced. I was a member of the procedure committee which considered these matters. I was not happy with the abolition of the committee of supply and never have been. But, Mr. Speaker, hon. members have in previous years posted particular items in the estimates and the House was asked to express its views with regard to those items. Only twice have we been denied that. I would say that the frustration expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in trying to move as he has on this occasion, and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and all of us goes back to this ruling that we cannot express ourselves with regard to any particular items. I would invite reconsideration of the ruling in June and the previous one and the practice of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I will not engage in a debate with the hon. member for Edmonton West, but the ruling of June 18 had nothing to do with the point now before the House. I appreciate the difficulty to which the hon. member has alluded. I realize the difficulty, but my suggestion in the past has been, and I express it again to hon. members, that perhaps the time has come for the House, or for the House through a committee, to look at the rule which hon. members feel has not been operating well.

But certainly the duty of the Chair is to see that the rule regarding votes on individual estimates as it is clearly written—perhaps it does not represent the intention of the hon. member for Edmonton West or is not what he wanted to see in the rule itself—is observed whether or not the Chair thinks it is right. Again I say with all respect to the hon. member that I agree with much of what he has said in the sense that certainly hon. members do not have an opportunity to debate or vote on certain items in the estimates, but that is not the responsibility of the Chair. It should be the responsibility of all hon. members who feel a better procedure should be evolved to get together and see that the procedure is changed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROPOSAL FOR PASSAGE OF CERTAIN BILLS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief statement with respect to the business of the House. Yesterday, after some discussion, I undertook to reconsider a package of legislation that might be passed without debate and about which we had almost reached unanimity. As a result of that reconsideration, I am prepared to make a further proposal which involves the deletion of one of the items included yesterday, the addition of another item, and the progression of a third. Possibly hon. members will find a basis for unanimous agreement.

May I begin with government order No. 17, Bill C-135, residential mortgages, which involves the report stage and third reading. I understand there was no difficulty with respect to that.

The second item is government order No. 43, Bill C-190, the Canada Pension Plan No. 1, having to do with the Hutterites or Mennonites. I note that the hon. member for Crowfoot exercised his undoubted right to dissent from giving unanimous consent, and because of that I am prepared to delete this item from the package of proposals. However, because the government attaches importance to its passage, I certainly will seek the conclusion of this bill before adjournment or the prorogation of the House.

The next item is the Parole Act, Bill C-191, involving a report stage amendment and third reading. Yesterday there was no dissent on that point.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The next item is Bill S-4, national parks, for which I sought second reading. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre advanced my proposal and said he would be prepared to carry the bill all the way, including third reading. I am therefore putting that forward as part of my proposal, which I think is sensible.

In addition, I am prepared to suggest Bill C-211, the family allowances bill, concurrence at the report stage, third reading and passage.

Finally, I am making an addition that was not included in my package at any time yesterday, Bill C-224, the Canada Pension Plan Bill No. 2.

If we could agree to deal with these items without debate through all their stages, I would be pleased to suggest that it be done now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, the House leader did not give us any notice, of course, of what was to be in this package, both new and old.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: We are primarily concerned with the family allowance bill and the Canada Pension Plan bill because they are welfare legislation, and we object to the fact that they are being used as bargaining items and as blackmail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: The House leader has changed his mind on the order of priority of some of these bills. For example, the Hutterite bill was not on the first list of priorities and it has now been moved to the secondary list.

Mr. MacEachen: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, this is an absolute mistake on the part of the hon. member. If he will look at the list I mentioned yesterday, he will see that the first item on the list was CPP No. 1—the very first.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He protesteth too loudly.

Mr. Bell: The House leader is carried away with excitement about next Monday. We realize that it is a very difficult time for the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: However, I did not refer to any list of yesterday. I referred rather to the priority list of last week which I have in front of me which contains the seven bills that were discussed at the House leaders' meeting. The list of seven bills does not include this particular bill, and the House leader can check this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Withdraw!

Mr. Bell: In view of the mistakes the House leader made yesterday, the ones he has made now and the fact that there are changes, we reserve the right to look this over in caucus in a democratic way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are most anxious to see an arrangement of this nature agreed to. Perhaps I might throw a little oil on troubled waters, if there is any oil to spare—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Crude or castor oil?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know whether it is sweet oil, sour oil or bunker oil. My suggestion is that there be a meeting of the House leaders as early as possible this afternoon and that if we can reach an agreement, as I believe we can, we put that agreement into effect later this day.

We stand by our agreement to the initial offer of the President of the Privy Council yesterday. May I say that in the bargaining that took place yesterday, when the hon. member for Crowfoot would not agree to Bill C-190 I made an offer to go a bit farther with the parks bill. I made that offer quite straightforwardly. One or two of my colleagues feel that they would like a committee discussion of that bill but we still agree to no further discussion in the House on that bill. I put in that point of protection, but I do think we could reach agreement on the total package after a meeting of the House leaders this afternoon, and I hope the government House leader will summon such a meeting.

Some hon. Members: Now.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the position of our party is as clear today as it was yesterday when, on behalf of my colleagues, I indicated our willingness to accept the government's proposition without discussion.
