Debates of the Senate

OFFICIAL REPORT

THE SENATE

Friday, January 7, 1955

The Parliament of Canada having been summoned by Proclamation of the Governor General to meet this day for the dispatch of business:

The Senate met at 11 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

OPENING OF SECOND SESSION TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, I trust you all have had an enjoyable Christmas season, and I wish you happiness and good health throughout 1955.

As honourable senators know, His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the Parliament Buildings at 2 o'clock this afternoon to open the Second Session of the Twenty-Second Parliament of Canada. His Excellency will read the Speech from the Throne, which will be referred to the Senate and to the House of Commons for consideration. Until the Speech has been read and placed before us, there is no business for this house to consider.

I would therefore move that the Senate now adjourn, to reassemble, at 1.30 this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before putting the motion of the honourable Leader of the Government, may I read a message from the Secretary of His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the main entrance of the Houses of Parliament at 2 p.m., on Friday, January 7, and, when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the Senate chamber to open formally the Second Session of the Twenty-Second Parliament of Canada.

I have the honour to be,

Sir

Your obedient servant,

Lionel Massey,

Secretary to the Governor General.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until 1.30 p.m.

The Senate met at 1.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

At two o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded to the Senate chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and, that House being come, with their Speaker, His Excellency was pleased to open the Second Session of the Twenty-second Parliament of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It affords me great pleasure to greet you as you resume your parliamentary duties at the beginning of this New Year.

Since you last met, the people of Canada have been given an opportunity of extending once more an affectionate welcome to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother. They have also had the pleasure of greeting again the consort of our Sovereign, the Duke of Edinburgh, who came to attend the British Empire and Commonwealth Games held in Vancouver during the summer and to visit northern parts of Canada.

While there is hopeful evidence that the increasing strength of the free world has lessened the likelihood of aggression, the terrible destruction that war would bring to North America and indeed to all mankind has been magnified by the increase in the number and effectiveness of atomic and thermonuclear weapons and the means of delivering them.

My ministers are convinced that, while the resources of diplomacy must never be neglected in the search for peace, the efforts of the free nations in building their deterrent forces must be maintained. To this end, Canada was represented at the London and Paris Conferences which formulated an alternative to the European Defence Community and provided for the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. You will be asked to approve the agreements reached at those meetings.

Our country continues to give full support to the United Nations. The Canadian delegation took an important part in the deliberations of the recent meeting of the General Assembly in New York. It is earnestly hoped that the adoption of the resolution on disarmament introduced in the political committee by the Canadian delegation may lead to agreement on an effective system of international safeguards.

While no final settlement has been reached in Korea, the lessening of the threat of renewed aggression in that area has made possible the withdrawal of a substantial portion of the Canadian forces.

At the invitation of the Geneva Conference Canada has accepted the heavy responsibility of serving on the Armistice Commissions which have been formed to supervise the restoration of peace in the Associated States of Indo-China.

Last autumn our nation was the host at the annual meeting of the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan. You will be asked to approve Canada's continued participation in the Plan as well as in the United Nations' Technical Assistance Program.

A meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers will be held in London at the end of this month to consider a number of problems affecting the peoples of this great association of nations. My Prime Minister plans to attend this conference.

During the summer arrangements were completed to permit the navigational facilities of the St. Lawrence River to be enlarged and a hydro electric project to be undertaken in the International Rapids section.

Work on these two projects has already begun and my ministers are convinced the stimulus to the national economy resulting from their construction will be shared in all parts of the country.

Since you last met, Cape Breton Island has been linked with the mainland by the new causeway, which will be ready for service as soon as the ship canal has been bridged.

It is expected that, in the course of the coming season, the new ferry between North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be in operation and the ferry service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour started. Construction of a new ferry to operate between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island will be undertaken early in the present year.

To improve navigation on the Pacific Coast, you will be asked to make provision at this session for the removal of Ripple Rock.

Canadians learned with deep regret of the loss of life and damage to property caused by two severe storms felt heavily in the province of Ontario and the province of Nova Scotia. An agreement has been reached with the province of Ontario to assist those persons whose homes were damaged or destroyed, and assistance has been given under the Agricultural Prices Support Act to the producers of apples in Nova Scotia. You will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for these arrangements.

The Disabled Persons Act which you passed at the last session was proclaimed to come into force at the beginning of the present year. The governments of all the provinces have announced their intention to participate in implementing the program to assist those who are totally unable to care for themselves; and my ministers are now in a position to conclude the necessary federal-provincial agreements to bring this humanitarian measure into operation.

Although the national economy is in a generally healthy condition, the relatively poor wheat crop is being reflected by a small decline in the total national income. Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced. To help meet this situation work on public construction projects already approved is being accelerated and you will be asked to make financial provision for construction in the programs of various departments and agencies on a scale that will make possible a substantial increase in the total expenditures for this purpose.

The Government proposes to introduce legislation immediately for the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act to provide for an increase in the duration and scale of supplementary winter benefits. It is also proposing to introduce, during the session, broader amendments designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument in providing financial support to unemployed workers.

The National Housing Act, 1954, enacted early in the last session, which authorized lower down-payments and larger loans, and which enabled the chartered banks for the first time to make loans on the security of residential mortgages, has been an important factor in stimulating the construction of a record number of houses in the past year. The prospects are favourable for a high level of house building in 1955.

It is proposed to bring into general operation on the first of February the provision of the act under which loans may be made for home improvements. In accordance with an undertaking given at the last session, this section was proclaimed for small holders under the Veterans' Land Act with effect from the first of this year.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the Railway Act relating to the elimination of level crossings. The Government also hopes to lay before you during the present session a measure to consolidate the legislation affecting the Canadian National Railways.

Amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and a measure to control works which affect the normal flow of rivers which cross the international boundary will be proposed for the purpose of ensuring that natural resources are developed in the best interests of the Canadian public.

You will be asked to consider a measure to implement a convention between Canada and the United States relating to fisheries research on the Great Lakes.

You will also be asked to consider legislation to provide facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided to farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The Government will submit amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act to raise the basic rates as well as the ceiling on permissible incomes of recipients of allowances.

THE LATE SENATORS BUCHANAN AND BEAUREGARD

TRIBUTES TO THEIR MEMORY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, since we last met, the Grim Reaper has taken from our midst two of our highly respected and dearly beloved senators. The Honourable Senator W. A. Buchanan of Lethbridge passed away on July 11 of last year. It was my great privilege to have known the late Senator Buchanan as a close friend from the time I first entered the House of Commons, in 1935. As a member of the House of Commons he always took a keen interest in young newcomers to that chamber, and throughout the years I valued his friendship and advice most highly.

It is difficult to refer to the late Senator Buchanan without calling to mind the rugged individualism which characterized his whole life and public career. His willingness to accept new challenges at every point of life, and a devotion to substance rather than form, marked his rise to pre-eminence in his chosen field of news publication as well as in public service.

The late W. A. Buchanan was a son of the manse. He was born at South Monaghan, Ontario, on July 2, 1876, to the Reverend William and Mary Pendrie Buchanan. His father, being a clergyman, was required to move from place to place, with the result that the senator received his early education at a number of public schools throughout the country. I will mention some of them: Norwood, Warkworth, Brighton and Trenton. He left school at the age of 16 years and immediately took a job as a printer's devil with the Peterborough Examiner. Afterwards he was employed as a reporter with the Peterborough Review, and later in 1899, he went to Toronto, to work on the Evening Telegram, of which he became city editor, and subsequently news editor. With this experience behind him he went on to St. Thomas, and in 1902 became managing editor of the St. Thomas Journal.

As with thousands of others, the lure of the West at the turn of the century beckoned the late senator, where he found new challenges in both private and public life. In 1905 he arrived at Lethbridge. The town had only 2,000 inhabitants, and by comparison with busy Calgary, 126 miles to the north, did not indicate great promise. However, neither in Calgary, nor in Edmonton, to which he went later, was he successful in setting up a newspaper. He returned, therefore, to Lethbridge, where he shortly became sole owner of the Weekly Herald.

Having established himself in private business, he soon turned his attention to public affairs, and in 1909, only four years after his arrival in the West, he was elected as Liberal member to the legislature of Alberta. His ability was soon recognized, and Mr. Rutherford, the Premier of that province, made him a minister without portfolio in his cabinet. Certain difficulties arose in connection with a railway scandal, and his sense of loyalty and fairness to those he represented overcame political ambitions in the provincial government of that day, so three months after his appointment he retired.

Honourable members will recall what was known as the "Reciprocity Election". Turning from the provincial to the federal field, in 1911 he ran as a liberal candidate in support of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and was elected for the constituency of Medicine Hat, and in 1917 he became the first federal member in the new constituency of Lethbridge, which he represented in the House of Commons until 1921. He then retired from federal politics, and was appointed to the Senate in 1925.

During his many years in parliament, Senator Buchanan performed yeomen service, not only in both chambers but on committees. Although champion of the West, he disapproved of sectionalism, and never allowed sentiment to becloud his conviction that legislation should be in the interests of Canada as a whole and not of one section of the country only. His outlook was always "Canada first." Truly, he was a great Canadian. As a member of virtually all the important committees of this house, and latterly as chairman of the Tourist Traffic Committee, he earned the respect of everyone in this chamber.

Admirers of the late senator—and we all were admirers of him—often thought that had it not been for his physical disability he might have risen to higher prominence in our land. Certainly it prevented him from accepting the leadership of the Liberal party in Alberta, a position which was offered to him at one time. His disability, however, did not reduce in any way his magnificent contribution to fellow journalists and citizens of Canada. Truly both they and we are beneficiaries of a career dedicated to the betterment of his country and mankind.

To his wife and his two sons who survive I express deep gratitude for the unselfish service of a great man, and my sincere sympathy in their grievous loss.

On August 27 of last year we lost another dearly beloved and highly respected member of this house. I refer to the late Honourable Elie Beauregard.

Here again in one man was combined a variety of the most important elements that have brought many Canadians to eminence: a knowledge of the law, a keen interest in industry and vision in politics. These in themselves are enough for greatness, but in addition the late Senator Beauregard possessed the highest qualities of heart and mind, and a gentleness of manner which endeared him to everyone in this chamber.

I first became acquainted with Senator Beauregard when, in 1949, I was elected Speaker of the House of Commons. At that time Senator Beauregard had been appointed Speaker of this chamber. During my term of office it was frequently necessary for us to confer on matters of mutual interest. I found him to be a man of deep understanding and sympathy; and we had no problems which we could not solve amicably. When I came to this house he greeted me as a friend, and I frequently turned to him for advice. His passing is a great loss to me personally.

The late Elie Beauregard was born on July 8, 1884, at La Patrie, Compton County, Quebec, the son of Henri Beauregard and Helene Ducharme. His formal education was received at St. Hyacinthe Seminary, Montreal College and Laval University, where he pursued the study of law.

After having been admitted to the Bar of the province of Quebec in 1909, Senator Beauregard opened a law practice in Montreal. He soon gained eminence, and in 1919 was created a King's Counsel. In 1941 he was elected President of the Montreal Bar Association.

But the late senator's activities went far beyond the practice of law. He was a leader in the business life of the community as well. He held, among others, the offices of Chairman of the Provincial Bank of Canada, Vice-President of General Security Insurance Company and President of H. Corby Distillery, Limited.

His interest in the field of education as well was marked by continual contributions. He was appointed Vice-President of the Administrative Board of the University of Montreal, and in recognition of his services he received an honorary degree from that institution in November, 1953.

However, Senator Beauregard's great love was for the field of public service at every level—municipal, provincial and dominion. Of course, it was in the last named field where we came to know him and respect his ability when he was summoned to the Senate, in 1940, and especially when he was appointed Speaker of this house, in which office he gained recognition for his fairness in the consideration of all problems that came before him.

In the provincial field he was always at the forefront in the Liberal party, and for a time was Treasurer of the Liberal organization in the Province of Quebec. I think it is a tribute to his greatness as a politician and a leader at all levels, and emphasizes his belief in "grass roots" politics, that he continued to be active in the municipal council of the city of Outremont even after he became a member of this house.

Of course his service here needs no elaboration. He was Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce from 1945 to 1949; and before he became Speaker, and after he left the Speaker's chair, he was a member of all the important committees of this house. In recognition of his services to our country he was created a Privy Councillor in 1953.

Senator Beauregard has passed on, but he belonged to that class of great men whose works live after them. His memory will be for ever green in the hearts of all of us in this chamber tonight, and among the many thousands of Canadians whose lives touched his during his long and colourful career.

To his wife, to his son and to his three daughters, I extend my very deep sympathy.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I find it a little difficult to rise and speak about these colleagues who have departed this life. I had known Senator Buchanan personally for a very long time. He was a westerner, engaged in the newspaper business, as the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said, and he performed very outstanding work in this field. He was one of the founders of the Canadian Press, an organization which was formed for the purpose of supplying newspapers with a news service which none of them would be able to obtain through their own resources. He always afterwards played a leading part in that organization, and at one time served as its president.

Like all members of this house I feel the passing of Senator Buchanan very keenly. He was so typical of the men and women who have come from other parts of Canada to our western country and left a lasting impression there. The respect of the people of western Canada for the eastern provinces has been enhanced by men of Buchanan's character and ability. When you ask "Where did Bill Buchanan come from?" or where did someone else of outstanding ability come from, the answer frequently is that he came from some place in eastern Canada. As a result, although we think the west is the best part of our country, we have a feeling that there must be something pretty good in those parts which produce men of such high character.

I will not repeat what my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has said. I will only add what I think is in the hearts of most of us. By some measure men and women in the legislative bodies of this country assess the character and ability of their fellow members. I cannot tell you what the measuring rod is, I cannot tell you the method by which they arrive at the measurement, but it is usually reliable. And as to our late colleague, the conclusion is: "Bill Buchanan was quite a man, quite a gentleman." That phrase seems to stick in your mind when you think of the late Senator Buchanan. He was a man, and he was a gentleman; and I want to add another word: he was also a Christian gentleman. He took a very active and leading part in the church of his choice in southern Alberta. Indeed, he made a great contribution to the building of new churches in that part of our country.

We will miss him here, because we always felt that his opinion was the considered opinion of a man who loved his country and also wanted his country to be right on every question. For the life of me, sitting here as I have done for so many years and the late senator sitting just about opposite me, if I had not known through reading current history I must say I could never have been quite sure on what side of politics he was.

As a westerner, I want to pay my very great respects to Senator Buchanan for the contribution he has made to Alberta, to western Canada, to the Canadian newspaper field, and to our whole country. I would say in conclusion that his wife, who herself is very ill, and his two sons have been left a priceless heritage in the memory of this Christian gentleman, and great citizen.

Now I want to speak a word or two of Senator Beauregard, whom I knew quite well. It seemed to me that it was a real pleasure to know him, and I was delighted when I found that he was a keen student of religion. Indeed, he was a very advanced student of the subject, and he spent many hours reading religious theses in order to understand the religious problems facing the world today. And whether I agree with his particular form of religion or not, whether you agree with it or not, the fact is that anybody who knew his religion as well as he did, and was willing to spend so much time studying it, must have found there something that the rest of us can copy. That was one of the factors that made him so influential in cementing the good feeling between the people of Quebec and those of the rest of Canada. We as Canadians need more men and women of that kind in our legislative bodies, in our House of Commons and in our Senate, because Canada can never be as great a country as it should be unless we achieve the kind of unity towards which Senator Beauregard made so valuable a contribution. In whatever part of Canada we live we feel proud of Quebec for producing so eminent a fellow citizen as Senator Beauregard.

During his term of office as Speaker, the late Senator Beauregard's judgments were invariably sound. He was fair and considerate and always remembered that our group was not very large. I hate to admit that I was sometimes wrong in my contentions, but I knew occasionally that I was a little out of line. He always tried to keep me on the right road, because he was aware that the government supporters could override me if they really wanted to do it. It was heartening to me and to others of our group that he was so keen to see fair play given to the minority in this chamber.

His wife has lost a great life partner, and his son and daughter, a noble father. I say the same to Senator Buchanan's family. I speak of what I know: I can sympathize with them to the very limit. I want them to know that we, who have been associated with him for so many years, loved him,—yes, not only respected and admired him, but loved him. When a member of this house has a pretty hard battle before him, the assurance of the support and love of his fellow members for those who may be bereaved is a great help and comfort to him. To the families of both our friends I say that we shall retain the happiest memories of them; that we believe they are yet living with us, that tonight they are listening to our statements, and saying, "We did not think they thought so much of us as they do."

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Gouin: Honourable senators, I cannot let this occasion go by without saying a few words in memory of my friend, Senator Elie Beauregard.

The last time I chatted with him, last summer, I had no idea that I would never see him again and that I should have, this evening, the difficult and bounden duty to pay to him this posthumous tribute.

He was a deserving man, a most deserving man. A great lawyer, he became at one time president of our Bar Association; a shrewd businessman, he was a member of the Board of Directors of the Provincial Bank and of various insurance companies.

To his great intelligence and his capacity for work, he joined devotion to duty and kindness. Those who saw him at work know what pains he went to, as a member of the Board of Directors of the University of Montreal, during the great crisis of 1930.

As a man of great culture, he showed by his actions how much our culture meant to him. I have myself been in a position to witness the solicitude he showed those whom he could help. He enjoyed being of service to others and did it with admirable tact as well as with all his heart.

On many occasions I was an associate of his, so I had occasion to admire his clear and sure judgment, his deep knowledge of men and his extraordinary acumen. A man of good counsel, he played in the Liberal party a most important part. His was the ability of a great tactician. Even more, I would salute in him a strategist of exceptional value. In the record of our electoral battles, Senator Beauregard deserves a place of honour.

I have lost a very dear friend, while our country, in my estimation, has lost a great citizen. Those of my generation will never forget the name of the former Speaker of the Senate, of a Canadian who was as distinguished as he was modest, Senator Elie Beauregard.

To his widow and his children, I would express my deep sympathy.

Hon. Mrs. Jodoin: Honourable senators, may I join with the honourable members of this Chamber who have just spoken in praise of the honourable senator from Rougemont, who, for fifteen years, was the pride of the Province of Quebec.

As gracious as he was modest, his greatest quality was the absolute discretion which gained him the complete trust of his own as well as his political family.

He carried discretion to the point of silence, for among his intimate friends he often claimed that: "When we speak of our neighbour we are always inclined to speak against him". But in his case we are not tempted to do so. Our attitude is rather one of sincere praise and gratitude for the great principles which inspired him with respect for the reputation of others and for the confidences which his legal profession obliged him to receive. "Live and let live", he would say to his children, "with due respect for the personal opinions and tastes of each one of you". In his private, political and public life, he was true to that principle.

(Text):

Honourable senators, it was for me a matter of much pride and confidence that I entered this chamber for the first time leaning on the arm of the late senator from Rougemont (Hon. Mr. Beauregard). He was my godfather in the Senate.

I wish to join with others in extending to his wife and daughters the deepest sympathy of his many friends, especially the women of the province of Quebec, and our admiration of the great man who has passed from our midst.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, we are paying tribute tonight to two senators who will be greatly missed from our midst. Senator Beauregard endeared himself to all of us when he was Speaker of this chamber.

I had the opportunity of attending the very impressive funeral service of Senator Buchanan. The large church was filled with people from the city and the surrounding country. The chancel was banked high with flowers: each blossom, each petal, representing someone's kind thought, or the memory of some kind deed. The minister expressed his feelings and the feelings of many of us when he recited Lord Tennyson's poem, Crossing the Bar:

> Sunset and evening star,
> And one clear call for me!
> And may there be no moaning of the bar,
> When I put out to sea.
> But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
> Too full for sound and foam,
> When that which drew from out the boundless deep > Turns again home.
> Twilight and evening bell,
> And after that the dark,
> And may there be no sadness of farewell
> When I embark.
> For though from out our bourne of time and place
> The flood may bear me far,
> I hope to see my Pilot face to face,
> When I have crossed the bar.

There was a long funeral procession, and our late friend was buried in Mountain View Cemetery, on the crest of a hill that overlooks a vast stretch of prairie, and from which the distant foothills of the Rockies can be seen. Those were the lands he loved and its people were those he had served for nearly half a century.

I join with my colleagues extending to the relatives of the late Senators Buchanan and Beauregard the sympathy which has been so well expressed.

Hon. James A. MacKinnon: Honourable senators, I did not realize that there was going to be an opportunity this evening to speak of our late colleagues, Senators Buchanan and Beauregard. I cannot permit this occasion to pass without speaking about my former deskmate, Senator Buchanan, a man whom I had known for over fifty years from the day he first came to Edmonton from Eastern Canada. He came there because Edmonton and Alberta were being very much spoken of at that time in Eastern Canada, and because several people with whom he had gone to university were then in professional and public life in Edmonton. I refer particularly to the Attorney-General of Alberta at that time, the Honourable C. W. Cross, who was an intimate, personal friend of Senator Buchanan. I remember the conversations that Billy Buchanan had with his friends about getting established in the newspaper business in Alberta. It was decided that he would go to Lethbridge, which he did, and this proved a happy choice for him. He eventually spent a lifetime in Lethbridge, in the midst of thousands of people who dearly loved him and who have mourned his passing most deeply.

Senator Buchanan founded the Lethbridge Herald in a fairly modest way. To begin with, I think, the paper was published weekly, and subsequently it was published daily. He built the paper into a very substantial organ of public opinion, a newspaper that has been respected and quoted throughout Canada and in many parts of the world. Billy Buchanan did his own thinking and he spoke and wrote as he thought.

I also knew Billy Buchanan when he went from Lethbridge to Edmonton as a member of the provincial Legislature, and I knew him again during the period to which my honourable Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has referred, the period of political unrest and uprising in the Liberal party in Alberta. I say the Liberal party, for there was only one party in the province at that time. There was, I believe, only one representative in the Legislature who was not in the ranks of the Liberal party. Senator Buchanan eventually came to Ottawa, where he had a most distinguished career. He had a great love for Canada, for Alberta, but particularly for southern Alberta. He possessed a great affection for his fellowmen. It has been mentioned that he was not a partisan; he certainly was not a narrow partisan. An ardent Liberal, he thoroughly believed in Liberal principles but, as I have already said, he did his own thinking and followed his own conscience.

The late Senator Buchanan also had a tremendous love for Waterton Lakes National Park in southern Alberta, which he did so much to establish and build up.

Senator Buchanan was called at a time when he had so many reasons for wanting to remain. First of all, there was his family, and then he had just seen completed the construction of a splendid new building to house his beloved Lethbridge Herald.

Senator Buchanan, who had the love and affection of everyone who knew him, could always be called upon to give everything he had to public service or any cause that needed his help. He was always ready to go at a moment's notice to any part of Alberta where duty, political or otherwise, called.

I cannot say enough about my memory of the late Senator Buchanan. We had always been intimate friends. His friends were my friends and my friends were his friends. I have felt his passing most deeply, and I know that everyone in my province sincerely mourns the loss of such a wonderful adopted son of Alberta. There is nothing more I can add. There are many things I would like to have said in a much better way, but I am glad of the opportunity to pay tribute to my old friend of over fifty years' standing, a man for whom I always had the deepest affection and regard.

I did not know our late colleague, Senator Beauregard, nearly so well, but I knew him to be a man who impelled respect and affection. To the families of those two departed colleagues I wish to extend my very deepest sympathy at this time.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, occasions such as this are always sad and perhaps a little depressing. For that reason I shall be brief. I should like to endorse everything that has been said about the late Senator Beauregard, who was our highly respected Speaker for some four or five years, but I particularly want to pay tribute to my late senatorial friend and newspaper colleague, Bill Buchanan. I knew Senator Buchanan for about 30 to 35 years. I sat with him on the board of the Canadian Press for 20 years, during two years of which he was the presiding officer. The honourable senator from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) spoke of Senator Buchanan's interest in the dominion newspaper organization. I have here a book on the history of the Canadian Press, the co-operative news gathering organization of this country, and I would like to tell the house that this non-partisan, non-profit-making organization, owned and operated by the newspapers of this country, was born in the Canadian west. The newspapermen of the west found that getting news from the east and far countries was a very difficult business indeed, when they started their newspapers out there in the early days of the century, and even before. I do not know what part Senator Buchanan played in stirring them up, but they became more and more agitated about the situation as time went on. They were getting very little news and paying a very big price for it. In this book entitled The Story of the Canadian Press, by M. E. Nichols, President of the Canadian Press in 1931-33, is a picture of a group which had met in Winnipeg in 1910 to see if they could do something about the poor news services which were being purveyed. In the very front row is Bill Buchanan. Some of the western senators will know the others, such as M. E. Nichols, of Vancouver, J. W. Dafoe, editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, and Tom Miller, publisher of the Moose Jaw Times, who was Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan for a short period before his death.

These men decided to do something about a better news service. As I have said, the late Senator Buchanan was always in the very forefront. Eventually, in 1917, they came to Ontario and met with Senator Jaffray, of the Globe, John Ross Robertson, of the Telegram, and two or three others, and that was when the Canadian Press was born. Perhaps it is true to say that the Canadian Press was born in the West, but it had achieved, shall I say, at least a youthful appearance by 1917.

I saw much of Senator Buchanan at our newspaper meetings. I sat with him once when he was president of a committee which was dealing with an application from the telegraphers for more money. We sat as a sort of labour committee, and I was very much impressed at that time with the kindliness and fairness with which he approached the whole matter. Too often there is a feeling that when employees ask for more money they do not need it and do not deserve it. Buchanan did not take that attitude, but he listened very patiently to everything the delegation had to say. We sat down around the table, and it was largely due to his kindly interest and fairness that a very amicable conclusion was reached. I only wish some other industrial disputes, which seem to hang like a shadow over this country at the present time, could be settled in the same amicable way.

Senator Buchanan was one of the founders of the news gathering organization of this country. While a number of senators who knew him well for many years have paid tributes to his memory, perhaps I may be permitted to read a short extract from this book The Story of the Canadian Press to show what the newspapermen of Canada thought of him:

> When William Asbury Buchanan joined the staff of the Toronto Evening Telegram in the late 'nineties he quickly established his claims to recognition; all his associates believed that he would eventually be one of the chief executives of the Telegram. But Buchanan was not content to remain an employee; his thoughts were fixed on Canadian towns where small capital would buy a long-term option of ownership of a small daily or a weekly in a town that had possibilities of early growth. His survey led him finally to Lethbridge, then a town of 2,000; Lethbridge made good its possibilities of growth; the weekly blossomed in the Lethbridge Daily Herald, one of the most admired of Canada's smaller dailies.
> Buchanan's incursions in politics, which ended in his Senate appointment, were only faintly reflected in the conduct of his newspaper; his heart was in the Herald and fairness to the reader was his primary concern. He helped to plant that spirit in the principles and practices of the Canadian Press, an institution which his abilities and energies have enriched. The Western Associated Press had in Billy Buchanan a staunch supporter; in its darkest moments there was in Lethbridge an unfailing source of encouragement.
> In business and in politics Buchanan's progress was relatively free from the rude jolts commonly suffered by men who start with light kit on long and rugged roads. He won his objectives with apparent ease. For these mercies his debt is to Nature's equipment: he had ability; everyone liked him; everyone had confidence in him.

I think we can all endorse that tribute.

I will close by joining with other honourable senators in expressing to the families of both Senator Buchanan and Senator Beauregard sympathy in their great bereavement.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I left my native province while Senator Beauregard was still at school, but I should like to endorse everything that the honourable senator from Sorel (Hon. Mrs. Jodoin) has said about him. And I agree with the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon) that it would be impossible to say enough in tribute to Senator Buchanan. He was my earliest, and may I say my best, friend in this house. When I first entered the chamber, feeling very much lost amongst the many males, he took me under his wing. I asked if I might sit next to him, and I was privileged to do so for many years. I was always happiest when I could have his counsel and advice. Of his unselfishness and his devotion to duty, I can speak most highly, and I should like everyone here to know that he was a very fine man. To his wife, whom I have known for a very long time, and to his sons, I extend my own sympathy as well as that of everyone in the chamber.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words of tribute to the memory of these two great Canadians. I always admired and respected Senator Beauregard, and I am sure we all agree that he enriched the prestige and dignity of this chamber.

I was drawn to Senator Buchanan, when I first entered the Senate, by a friendship which, over the years, grew into a very deep affection. I can assure honourable senators that no one present here tonight could be more deeply conscious than I of that vacant chair, which the late senator once occupied.

At his passing sincere tributes, such as we have heard tonight, were paid to him from all over Canada. There were tributes to his memory as a man, as a publisher, as a distinguished Canadian citizen and an adornment to public life. I cannot and do not propose to attempt to add to what has already been said in these respects. But I do want to express my own appreciation of the privilege it has been for me to know and to love the late Senator Buchanan. His great heart and mind influenced me considerably.

Senator Buchanan will be missed perhaps not so much for what he did, as for those rare and precious qualities which he possessed. This chamber, honourable senators, will be very much the poorer for his passing.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, may I say one last word, not to repeat what has already been said, but to underline a characteristic which was common to both our friends. Both Senator Buchanan and Senator Beauregard understood that noise is not the necessary accompaniment of good, but that good is often brought about without noise.

They both lived up to that principle and quietly worked in their own way toward the prosperity and development of Canada, making little noise but doing much good.

In closing, may I repeat the prayer I said in each case on learning of their passing: "O God give him eternal peace and protect his family".

(Text):

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) would have liked to be in the chamber tonight and to pay tribute to his friend of many years' standing, the late Senator Buchanan. In his absence from the city, the senator from Ottawa has asked me, with your leave, to pay tribute on his behalf. It reads as follows:

In joining with all members of the Senate in paying tribute to the memory of our late colleague, Senator Buchanan, I should like to refer particularly to his outstanding place as an editor and newspaper man.

In recording these words I have at hand a souvenir of an historic group of editors and publishers who for several years were colleagues together in this chamber. In 1934 they met at dinner in Ottawa to celebrate the 75th birthday of the late Right Honourable George P. Graham. The names of the twelve different publications with which the attending guests at that dinner were individually associated were printed on the cover page of a specially prepared menu card. I think that it is fitting now to place these names on the pages of Hansard. They were: The Brockville Recorder and Times, owned by the Right Honourable Senator George P. Graham; The Gazette of Montreal, headed by the Honourable Senator Smeaton White; the Nelson Daily News, owned by the Honourable Senator R. F. Green; Le Soleil, associated with the Honourable Senator George Parent; the Lethbridge Herald, owned and edited by the Honourable Senator W. A. Buchanan; the Sydney Post-Record, owned and edited by the Honourable Senator J. S. McLennan of Sydney, Nova Scotia; La Feuille d'Erable, edited by the Honourable Senator Gustave Lacasse of Windsor, Ontario; L'Avenir du Nord, edited by the Honourable Senator J. E. Prevost of Quebec; the Halifax Herald, published by the Honourable Senator William H. Dennis; the London Morning Advertiser, edited by the Honourable Senator John Lewis; the Sentinel, edited by the Honourable Senator Horatio Hocken of Toronto, and the British Columbian, published by the Honourable Senator J. D. Taylor of New Westminster.

The passing of Senator Buchanan removed the last of this distinguished group from our midst. I may say that I am indebted to Mr. Reynolds, the custodian of the Senate Barber Shop, for placing this interesting souvenir in my hands. He was an old friend of Senator Buchanan, who gave this menu card to him as a keepsake with the words that never again in their lifetime would either of them likely see twelve members of the Senate identified actively at the same time with the press of Canada.

From this reference may be realized the sincere pride with which our late colleague regarded the profession of his choice. Indeed, a real appreciation of Senator Buchanan is inseparable from his identity as an editor and newspaperman. I knew him for over forty years, and he stands out clearly as a great example of responsibility for the written and printed word as reflected in the press of this country.

His own paper in Lethbridge became an institution of dependability throughout Southern Alberta. He always sought to supply his readers with accurate reports of the news of the day rather than to impose upon them his own editorial opinion. He could do that effectively when the occasion for it arose; but my memory of him identifies him as a man with an objective interest in daily events and in their collective importance over longer periods. The same characteristic applied to his utterances in this house. They were for the most part lucid and accurate reportorial statements about some subject which was of interest to him and the people he knew. He had no axe to grind other than that of service to his own community, and to Canada as a whole. In short, he had an abiding faith in the capacity of public opinion to judge affairs aright when enlightened by full information.

The soundness of his own judgment sprang from this ability to evaluate the opinions and views of others. Unbiased and uninfluenced by any personal ambition or desire for power, Senator Buchanan was a good friend and a wise counsellor. Personally, I shall always be in his debt for much good advice and wise counsel; and in company with so many others in this chamber I feel that the Parliament of Canada has lost one of its greatest members. Heartfelt sympathy is extended to Mrs. Buchanan and her two sons Donald and Hugh, who are left to carry on a great work.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Second Session of the Twenty-second Parliament.

Hon. Nancy Hodges moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada. May it Please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of Parliament.

She said: Honourable senators, I am deeply conscious of the honour of being asked to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Perhaps my sense of privilege is enhanced by the fact that I noticed in looking through the Speech from the Throne that those who prepared it must have had British Columbia very much in mind, for many of the things that are in it and much of the legislation which is formulated, is not only of general interest to Canada as a whole but is of peculiar and deep concern to the province of British Columbia. First of all in that category comes a suggestion that there are to be amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act and a measure to control works which affect the normal flow of rivers which cross the international boundary, for the purpose of ensuring that natural resources are developed in the best interests of the Canadian public.

This, as most honourable senators know, has reference to the recent controversy which has been going on in British Columbia over the Kaiser Dam proposal which, of course, would affect the waters of the Columbia River and give considerable benefits to United States interests. The Government of British Columbia has not made a final statement on this proposition, so I have to depend on statements which have been made by the honourable Minister of Lands and Forests of British Columbia, Mr. Sommers. Although I have not personally seen any changes in the original statement, I understand the honourable minister has modified it. From statements that were originally made by the minister, it was clear that the project involved the construction, near Castlegar and about twenty miles north of the boundary, of a $25 million or $30 million dam designed to store and regulate some 3 million acre feet of water. The intention would be to release this water during periods of low flow and thus to activate otherwise idle generating capacity in the States of Washington and Oregon. The Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation of the United States would finance the project and receive part of the downstream power, which would be used for aluminum production at Spokane.

According to the statements then made by the British Columbia minister, the water licence to the Kaiser interests would be issued for a period of 50 years. The 3 million acre feet of storage would produce about 2 billion k.w. hours of electricity a year. Of this, it is understood that British Columbia is to receive 20 per cent. Including $275,000 to be collected in taxes, the value of the overall return to British Columbia has been set at around $1 million a year.

As I said before, I want to make it quite clear that I believe this has been changed, although I have no figures or official statement before me to that effect. According to reliable sources the Kaiser Corporation and the Bonneville Power administration were each to receive 40 per cent; that is, they would receive 800 million kilowatt hours each. In addition, Kaiser agreed to pay $1 million annually to Bonneville Power for its share of power, and $275,000 in water rentals and taxes to the British Columbia Government. Finally, the capital carrying charges assumed by the Kaiser Corporation to finance this $30 million dam in British Columbia were estimated to be approximately $2·4 million annually.

There has been some indication that there is in the agreement a provision under which the British Columbia Government may be obligated to forgo its share of the power in certain circumstances and receive a cash payment annually. If this is correct—and I want to emphasize the words "if this is correct"—it would appear that there is an agreed price for power for 50 years, no matter what may happen to power values over that long period of time. So far, to my knowledge, there is no provision for British Columbia to get any share of, or payment for, power that may be produced in the United States or any works that may be constructed there in future to make use of the storage facilities on the Arrow Lakes.

Honourable senators, in a nutshell, that is the basis of the original agreement. As I said before, there has been some indication, I believe, of a change in the proposition, but no official statement to this effect, only pronouncements made by the minister, of which I have no record.

The point at issue to which the people of British Columbia as a whole object—and I say "as a whole" advisedly, for there has been great controversy and objection heard from all over that province because of the number of people who would be flooded out by the project—is that it would provide for the Kaiser Aluminum Company in the United States very much cheaper power than we in the province could get. It is not necessary for me to explain to honourable senators that this would militate against the establishment of industries in British Columbia. In addition, it would tie up potential sources of energy for many years in our province, when one has only to look into the foreseeable future to realize that before many years have passed we shall be in need of all possible sources of energy for our own use.

I think I can quite fairly state that were this project to go through—and I hope, as it now appears, that it will not go through—it would provide most unfair competition for Alcan, the Aluminum Company of Canada, which has vast undertakings in the central and northern parts of the province. I say it would result in unfair advantage over that company, because it would enable the Kaiser Aluminum Company to sell its products much cheaper than the Aluminum Company of Canada in British Columbia could. I also emphasize that the loss of potential power is inestimable.

I need not say more on this particular project, because I am sure the people of British Columbia, and I think of the rest of Canada, welcome the legislation forecast in the Speech from the Throne, aimed as it is at preventing the sort of exploitation of which I have spoken. Unfortunately, the Government of British Columbia is rather hoping for immediate returns rather than the long-term benefits that are so necessary for that province which has such great possibilities for future industrial development.

I happened to be present in the other place—I believe I am correct, Mr. Speaker, in referring to it as the other place—

Hon. Mr. Euler: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: —when this bill was introduced, and I was very glad indeed to notice the spontaneous and enthusiastic reception accorded it from all sides of the house, with the exception of one small quarter which I need not designate and which of course naturally would not approve of it. By the time the bill reaches this house I hope we shall have further facts on the subject and shall be able to go into it in greater detail. The measure is of great importance to British Columbia at this time because the province is just beginning to realize on the vast reservoir of natural wealth with which it has been so richly endowed. Indeed, the eyes of the western world over the past five or six years have been focussed on British Columbia with its great expansion and development.

As a private member of the former Coalition Government of British Columbia I am proud to say that in 1951 that Government announced a billion dollar investment program in the province. It included important projects that I feel are worthy to be brought to the attention of this chamber, because I think, with all due respect to honourable members, that many of them do not realize the tremendous development which is taking place in British Columbia, that jewel in the crown of Canadian provinces.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Among the projects which were launched, started or initiated at that time was the Westcoast Transmission Company's $700 million natural gas pipeline, destined to be laid from the Peace River district to the United States border south of Vancouver. Unfortunately, for causes which have nothing to do with British Columbia but which originated on the other side of the international border—you will remember there was a great deal of opposition there—it was announced that the construction of that pipeline would not be started till 1955. The British Columbia section of that pipeline alone is estimated to cost $130 million.

Of course, the most spectacular development of all is one to which I have already alluded, the one undertaken by the Aluminum Company of Canada at Kitimat. I had the good fortune to be flown in to that development in the early stages of its construction and it was only then I realized what was being done, that this great industry, this immense undertaking, was being built in the middle of the wilderness, in virgin forest, five hundred miles from the nearest settlement.

Those of you who have not visited British Columbia's hinterland cannot envision the magnitude of the task involved in setting up what is to be a $600 million development by the time it is completed. The project comprises a power development, a smelter, and a townsite at Kitimat. The Aluminum Company has already spent $275 million on this development. The first unit of the smelter was completed at Kitimat in 1954 and the first ingot was poured in the presence of the Duke of Edinburgh. The first shipment was made to the United States in September of that year. The present plant is capable of producing 91,500 tons of aluminum a year, but already plans are under way for so extending the present facilities as to increase the yearly output by 60,000 tons and give employment to an additional 1,000 people. The operations at Kitimat at this stage have provided jobs for thousands of workers, skilled and unskilled. The new townsite is being built in the wilderness, and in order that it may be laid out along modern lines, town-planning experts from all over Canada have been retained. It is expected that within a few years the development will give employment to at least 10,000 people, and that the townsite at Kitimat will ultimately provide habitation for 50,000 to 60,000 people.

This vast undertaking, I must point out to honourable senators who do not know the district, will lead to a very great development of the lands along the Canadian National Railway line in that part of Canada from Alberta to the Kitimat area, and this also will be of tremendous advantage.

Another important ramification of the Alcan project is the proposed $65 million Kitimat Pulp and Paper mill, which will be jointly owned by the Aluminum Company of Canada and the Powell River Pulp and Paper Company.

I would like to mention a few other developments which have taken place in British Columbia in the last few years. The Pacific Great Eastern Railway has constructed a new line from Quesnel to Prince George, and an extension is being projected north from there, opening up that vast area. My colleagues from Alberta will realize what this will mean to that part of the country.

Other big developments include the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line, involving a crude oil pipe line from Alberta oil fields, refining plants at lower mainland and refineries at Ferndale and Anacortes in the State of Washington at a cost of $100 million. As a result of the construction of this pipe line new refineries will be constructed at Ioco (Imperial Oil Company), and Stanovan (Standard Oil Company of B.C.), and an addition at Shellburn (Shell Oil Company of Canada, Ltd.). The estimated cost of these is $30 million.

In the mining and metallurgical field, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company has spent $57 million in the last few years in extensions to its plants. Plans for the development of a power plant at Waneta were announced in 1951, and this undertaking was completed last year. Various other extensions of the operations of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company have also been put in hand.

I hope I shall not be accused of being too biased if I point out that most of these projects were started long before the present Social Credit Government came into office. I mention that, though I do not want to be too partisan, because the present provincial administration has a habit of taking credit to itself for everything that has been done in British Columbia, whether before or after it acquired power, and it is only fair to point out that many of the things I have mentioned today were initiated and in fact completed, before its regime began.

The H. R. MacMillan Harmac plant was completed in 1950. An addition was begun in 1951 and finished in 1954. The total cost of these two developments was $35 million. Another and smaller enterprise which I should like to mention is a veneer plant operated by Western Plywoods Cariboo Limited at Quesnel: it employs five hundred people and represents an investment of $1,700,000. The Elk Falls Company Limited, of Duncan Bay, is building a newsprint mill at a cost of $40 million. Another great industrial development was started by Columbia Cellulose Company at Prince Rupert about five years ago. This pulp mill first came into production in 1951, and the initial investment was about $27 million. Since then the plant has been considerably enlarged, at a cost of some fifteen to twenty million dollars. Over five hundred persons are employed, and the investment represented today is of the order of $47 million.

The addition to the plant of the New Westminster Paper Company Limited, which was announced and proceeded with during the Coalition regime under the Liberal leadership of Premier Byron Johnson, involved an outlay of $2,500,000.

The Alaska Pine and Cellulose Company's addition to its plant at Port Alice, which was started in July 1951, represents a cost of $8 million. B.C. Forest Products has spent $2 million on a new veneer plant at Victoria, employing 375 persons. Powell River Pulp and Paper Company Limited has increased the capacity of its plant at Powell River with an outlay of some $50 million.

These are just a few of the developments which I thought should be specifically mentioned, because it is only right, in my view, that honourable senators and, in fact, all the people of Canada should know of the progress which is being made in the province of British Columbia. In fairness, I must add that under the present government many extensive operations are in progress. Millions of dollars are being spent on industrial developments. Very large outlays are being made by the B.C. Power Commission and the British Columbia Telephone Company. The Frobisher and Venture interests envisage a multimillion dollar project; and when these and many other plans have come to fruition the effects on the economy of British Columbia will be very marked indeed. Having touched briefly on matters raised in one portion of the Speech from the Throne, I wish to turn for a few moments to another item which, while of peculiar value to our province, is of interest to the rest of Canada, namely the intimation of an improved deal for municipalities affected by the tax-free federal policy under the Municipal Grants Act. It is reported that where the value of federal property in any municipality amounts to more than 2 per cent of the total assessment, that city will get grants equivalent to the full municipal tax. At present, I understand that those communities which contain federal property in excess of 4 per cent get grants equal to 75 per cent of the tax. I have not yet seen the bill, so I do not know what it contains; but if the provisions are generally in line with what is reported, they will be of great value, particularly to my own city of Victoria, which contains $3,250,000 worth of federal properties. As honourable senators know, there are in Greater Victoria a big naval base and various other federal properties which are not included in this total; but excluding these, the value of federally-owned property in Victoria amounts to roughly 2½ per cent of the 1955 gross assessment.

Everyone welcomes such establishments. One has only to look at the requests for post offices and other public buildings of all kinds throughout the country to realize what tremendous assets they are to the payrolls of the communities concerned. At the same time, the fact that they are usually located on what are, for assessment purposes, the most valuable local sites, means that the tax rolls suffer accordingly. Services of various kinds have to be supplied, and as a consequence the ordinary ratepayer is more heavily taxed because of the existence of these federal buildings. I believe that if the suggested legislation becomes law the harassed ratepayers of cities such as Victoria and Vancouver—to mention only two out of many—will be substantially helped; and I am very glad that this matter has been included in the Speech from the Throne.

I must say a word in connection with another item in the Throne Speech, which is, of course, of peculiar interest to British Columbia; and that is, the proposed provision for the removal of Ripple Rock. For many years Ripple Rock has been causing a "ripple" on the surface of British Columbia, because it is a very, very serious hazard to navigation, and the cost of removing it is considerable; otherwise, I am sure, the Government would have removed it long ago. I know the news will be welcome that at last the Government are going to blast it out—or whatever it is they intend to do with it.

Having touched on some material matters mentioned in the Throne Speech, I want to refer to the more distinctly humanitarian projects which, of course, are of particular interest to me as a woman. I welcome the inclusion of the promise of legislation to make substantial increases for public construction projects with a view to helping to meet regional and seasonal unemployment crises. In view of what I have said about the development, growth and expansion of British Columbia, some may suppose that we in that province should be immune from crises of this kind, but even in our salubrious climate, because of too much rain, or from other causes, outdoor industry must occasionally stop. Then, of course, there are other factors over which we have no control—outside factors, which tend to upset the delicate balance of the economy. The fact that wages and standards of living are higher on the Pacific coast than anywhere else in Canada makes it very difficult for shipbuilding, forest, and some other industries to compete in world markets with industries whose wages are lower and, in consequence, every now and again we are faced with a burden of unemployment.

Also, there is the fact that the genial climate of British Columbia attracts to that province unemployed workers from the prairies and other parts of the country where nature is not quite so kind, who move to the West in the hope of finding work under rather more comfortable conditions. All these factors tend to enlarge our problem of unemployment, particularly in a city like Vancouver, which is not only a seaport but a border town. Vancouver has been having a worrisome time. Frankly, I think its troubles have been exaggerated a little, but, in any event, no one with any feeling at all in his heart can but sympathize with these unemployed people, whether they number 100 or 20,000. I am very glad to see that something is going to be done in that connection, both by way of public construction projects and by an increase in the benefits paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act as well as by general amendments to increase the effectiveness of the act itself.

I know there are a good many complaints that this is not enough. I have not seen any figures or any bills, so I cannot tell whether it is enough, but at least it is a step in the right direction. It is encouraging to those who are undergoing these hardships at the present time to know that the Government is at least trying to do something to help them.

I am, of course, glad indeed to see that there is to be an increase in the basic rates payable under the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and a higher ceiling on permissible incomes. I have always maintained that something is wrong with a policy which decrees that a man or woman should not be allowed to earn more than a certain sum. I think it is a very bad principle and I do not believe we should put any ceiling on permissible incomes of any kind. Any person who has the initiative and energy to go out and work should be allowed to do all he or she possibly can and not be subjected to an arbitrary restriction on income, for such a policy stultifies initiative and energy.

I am very glad to see that we are also going to consider lowering the age of eligibility of blind persons for pensions, and raising their income ceilings. I do not think we can do enough for the blind. Never having lost the use of my eyes, even temporarily, I find it difficult to imagine what it would be like to go through life without sight. I feel we should do everything we possibly can to make things easier for those who are afflicted in this way.

Now I want to come down to a particular problem which besets British Columbia perhaps more than any other province. Apart from factors I have mentioned—our salubrious climate and the climatic amenities—the leisurely tempo of living draws to our province a great number of elderly people from all parts of Canada. We welcome them. Many of them are retired and have means, but many others are working people and they come with their families. We are glad to have them all, but the fact remains that their presence has helped to create a problem.

In 1954 the population of British Columbia was 1,266,000. I should like to emphasize that as the provincial area is 366,000 square miles, there is an average of about three persons to every square mile, most of whom are concentrated on the coast. Of that population of 1,266,000, 13 per cent were in the 65-years-and-over age bracket, as compared with 8·5 per cent for Canada as a whole; and 20 per cent were between the ages of 45 and 64. Here I come to a point which is to me particularly interesting. In Victoria we have the highest ratio for all Canada of citizens in the over-65 age group. One in every six citizens in that city is over 65. As I suggested before, this speaks volumes for the climatic and other amenities of the province. We have no deep snow, no extremes of heat and cold, no mosquitoes, no tornadoes, none of the things you people in the rest of Canada have. The percentage of the 65-years-and-over age group in ratio to Victoria's overall population has quadrupled since 1941. Some of the people who have come there to retire are comfortably off, but many others are barely eking out an existence on small pensions. Among this latter group are retired federal and provincial civil servants and burnt-out veterans with small superannuation benefits. All these people have a very difficult time, and I think you will find from statistics that many of them are included in our unemployed.

In Victoria at the end of October 1954 there were 2,375 unemployed men and women on the books of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Of this number 331 were 65 years of age and over, which represented 13·93 or practically 14 per cent of the total. A similar pattern presents itself in the general unemployment picture of British Columbia. On October 28, of the 8,171 unplaced applicants for jobs from people of 45 years of age and over, 2,731 were in the 65-and-up age group. Roughly, 39 per cent of the unemployed men and 8·5 per cent of the unemployed women were in the 45-years-and-over category.

I want to point out to honourable senators that a psychological problem is involved here. We are gradually getting to the point of generally accepting, unintentially perhaps, the slogans: "Too old at 45" and "Get out at 65". I feel I am speaking to a sympathetic audience here when I bring this up, for if we had arbitrary retirement at 65 in the Senate this house would be robbed of some of its finest members—including, of course, myself. So I know whereof I speak. It is time we realized that the chronological yardstick for measuring the earning ability, capacity and powers of men and women should be changed. Some people are too old at 35, while others can go on doing a good job until 80. What would the world have done had Sir Winston Churchill been told to get out at the age of 65? I can mention many men and women in Canada who have made their greatest contribution to Canadian life after having reached the age of 65. And yet we say arbitrarily to civil servants and people in industry that they must get out at that age. Unfortunately, also, if any of them lose their jobs at 35 or 40—which may happen through no fault of their own—and try to obtain other employment, they are met with the objection: "You are too old". The consequence is that the length of time in which men and women can earn enough with which to take care of themselves in their old age is shortened. I have seen this happen many times.

It is a tragic thing to me that a man of 40 or 45, who is just at the peak of his earning power and faced with full family responsibilities, when his children are growing up and looking for higher education, should be summarily told by the labour market that he is too old. That is quite wrong. We shall have to change our thinking altogether, and I think the Government should start to give a lead in that direction. The science of geriatrics has seen to it that the life span is going to be longer than ever. At a national health assembly meeting in the United States a couple of years ago, a certain scientist envisioned a time, not too far in the future, when a life span of 146 years would be possible. He expressed the rather horrible thought of a man marrying at 111, remarrying at 130, and living to be 146. Happily, I shall not live to that age. The scientist did not say whether women would have a chance of remarriage at 130. The fact remains, however, that the science of geriatrics, as well as medical science, is lengthening the span of life, while the span of working years is being shortened. I think it is very bad psychologically to tell people of 60 or 65 years of age that they are of no further use on the labour market. I have known cases, as I am sure honourable senators have, of men being compelled to leave their jobs at 65, probably at the height of their experience and skill, and suddenly feeling so frustrated and lost that they have not lived very long afterwards. Also, such people tend to become a burden to themselves and the community. It seems to me ridiculous that we should insist on men retiring at 65, when we do not grant them the old age pension until 70. The two things do not jibe. We must reconstitute our whole thinking on this subject.

I spoke of the application of the science of geriatrics and of medical science increasing the span of life, but apparently other things are also conducive to longevity. I was amused to read in a newspaper the other day accounts of various people who had attained 100 years of age, and who gave some recipes for longevity that were quite interesting. The recipe of one old lady, in Missouri, was this:

> Drink a nightly glass of beer with an egg beaten in it. Also don't worry, and keep calm.

Another person, Charles Macklin, 107, of London, England, gave this advice:

> Every night before going to bed, wash yourself all over with good brandy. Then dress in an ordinary business suit and climb into bed.

From what I know of a great many men, they would think that a shocking waste of good brandy!

A Toronto man of 100 advised eating three steaks a day to live to a good old age. He did not say whether he was a millionaire, but I think he must be if he can afford three steaks a day. One a day is the height of opulence for most of us.

Honourable senators, we have got to face the serious problem of our aging citizens. At the present time nothing is being done about it. True, we have marvellous social welfare programs. The other day I discovered that the total amount appropriated by the federal Government before the war for social welfare in all its varied branches and phases, amounted to $60 million. Today it is somewhere in the region of one billion dollars. So we are doing as much as we possibly can in the general direction of caring for our people, but we are not doing all that we might particularly for the aged, and those who are "too old at 45", and have to get out of their jobs at 65.

It was said in the United States the other day that by 1970 one-half of the working force of the United States would be over 60 years of age. So the problem is not confined to Canada. Indeed, I think all the civilized countries of the world will have to look into this problem of the older people. Unless we want to become nations of preponderantly old folks, so-called, at 40 years and over, we shall have to change our present day estimate of old age.

Honourable members, when I first came into public life I was told that one of the primary requisites of public speaking was to stand up, speak up and shut up. I have stood up, I have tried to speak up, and I hope that the interval between standing up and shutting up has not been too long.

Hon. Leonard Tremblay: Honourable senators, in rising last year to propose, with eloquence and elegance, the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the honourable and most distinguished senator for the senatorial division of Sorel (Hon. Mrs. Jodoin) pointed out the fact that "for the first time in the history of this country, a woman is awarded the honour of moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne" and concluded quite reasonably that such an historical event "strengthens the fine traditions of our Canada, which advocate the freedom of one and all to express their opinions".

(Text):

I recall also the interesting and witty speech made last year, in seconding the motion of the honourable senator from Sorel, by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), who, a bit later in the same session, revealed herself to be a remarkable and most persuasive debater by obtaining the amendment of a bill affecting certain categories of civil servants who claimed the liberty of deciding themselves whether the measure was in their interest or not.

Our colleagues who belong to the sex which our ancestors, ironically enough, qualified, with a somewhat protecting air, as "the weaker sex", showed, in the case to which I have alluded, first of all their strength; and, secondly, they demonstrated beyond any doubt that the freedom of speech which they enjoy may serve to safeguard in Canada other liberties which are dear to their fellow-citizens.

Things have changed a great deal since the days of the great Corneille, who could place on the lips of one of his characters, loudly applauded by his contemporaries:

Monsieur, quand une femme a le don de se taire
Elle a des qualités au-dessus du vulgaire!
(When a woman knows how to remain silent,
Sir, she is endowed with uncommon gifts.)

The above quotation alone shows most clearly the progress accomplished in this respect since the glorious seventeenth century. In recognizing the happy results of the accession of women to public affairs, it is fitting, I think, to rejoice sincerely and to acknowledge the moderating and humanizing influence of women in politics . . . as well as elsewhere, for that matter.

This year again the task of proposing the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was entrusted to a representative of the gentler sex, the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). The masterful speech which we have just heard is proof that the choice of the authorities was both a happy and a judicious one. May I offer to our colleague from Victoria my warmest congratulations and express to her my very deep admiration. In so doing, I am voicing, I am sure, the feelings of all honourable members of this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time in this house, I would not like to be remiss in the most agreeable duty of congratulating you warmly upon your appointment to the high and honourable post which you occupy with so much dignity and ability. Because of your sense of justice, your tact and your experience in parliamentary procedure you are eminently qualified for the high duties entrusted to you, and I am particularly happy to add my tribute to the very just homage already paid to you by my honourable colleagues.

Honourable senators, there is in this chamber another most distinguished person whom I wish to welcome, and who must assume the responsibility for the perilous honour which I have had the temerity to accept, that of seconding the motion of the honourable senator from Victoria. I speak of the likeable and—I might as well say it—the irresistible Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). Elected for the first time in 1935, we sat together for eighteen years in what we are agreed to call "the other place".

Hon. Mr. Euler: No! Call it the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Tremblay: I was, therefore, in a position to follow his steady and well-deserved rise from the ranks of backbenchers to the Speaker's Chair in that house.

It is sufficient for me to say that in all the public positions which he has filled with such a rare perfection, his infectious good humour, his unruffled tactfulness, his proverbial good nature, the skill which he possesses in the highest degree of making friends and of keeping them, his deep sense of duty and his eagerness to serve his fellowmen, convince us that he will continue for a long time his march towards new summits.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Tremblay: May I be allowed, since we all know that he is bilingual, to express in French my deep appreciation of the honour which he has seen fit to bestow upon the people I represent in the Senate, in asking me to second the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

To the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout), I wish to offer my warmest congratulations upon the fine mark of trust placed in him when he was called to share the responsibilities of the Leader of the Senate. This son of Quebec is an honour to his province and we are proud of him; his appointment is a matter of satisfaction to his compatriots who have the greatest affection and the deepest admiration for him. To this man, also, who accomplished great things for province and country when Canada was at grips with the most terrible dangers of its whole history, we extend our wishes for success and the hope that the coming years may offer him many other and greater opportunities of devoting his talents and his patriotism to the service of his fellow citizens.

In welcoming the newly appointed senators last year, my very good friend the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), with whom I had the honour to sit for ten years in the other place, recalled certain weaknesses of your servant for vocal music and his incorrigible habit of urging his colleagues to sing in a chorus when the bell called the "Commoners" for a division. He even invited me to introduce in this honourable chamber that old and somewhat noisy custom which rather belongs to another place. I thank him for his generous and cordial welcome, but I hesitate to accept his kind invitation to sing. Let him not worry, however. The reason for this attitude of mine does not stem from a feeling of having grown older since having been introduced into the new atmosphere, so calm, so congenial and so pleasant, of the Upper Chamber. On the contrary, in coming here one has the impression of getting younger, for the hearty and spontaneous welcome one receives from Your Honour and all honourable senators produces on newcomers the same effect as the Fountain of Youth. Having listened to the encouraging speech of our honourable lady colleague from Victoria, I may say that if ever my former habit gets the best of me, I will undoubtedly sing again Let me call you Sweetheart, and not Darling I am growing old.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Tremblay: Honourable senators, although the Speech from the Throne may not justify excessive optimism in regard to world problems, it none the less leaves a comforting impression and shows us that, through their laborious efforts, the Western nations are firmly and efficiently progressing toward their ideal of peace.

"...While the resources of diplomacy must never be neglected in the search for peace," the Speech from the Throne states, "the efforts of the free nations in building their deterrent forces must be maintained."

It is generally acknowledged that the first duty of democratic nations is to build and maintain the best defence system—I mean collective defence—they can possibly provide. Toward this end Canada must and does in fact contribute generously. We are happy to express our satisfaction to the Government of our country whose external policy, I am sure, has the unanimous approval of the Canadian people.

May I take this opportunity of telling the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, the Right Honourable C. D. Howe, the Honourable Lester Pearson, the Honourable Paul Martin and all the other ministers who so efficiently second the Prime Minister, how much we appreciate their efforts and their inestimable contribution to the building of a true and durable peace in the world. Without security, there is no use dreaming of development and prosperity, since all that would be wiped out once and for all were another cataclysm to break out. Let us pray Divine Providence to spare us from such a calamity and let us be confident.

The sincerity, integrity and nobility of soul of the Prime Minister, acknowledged and appreciated by everyone at home and abroad, have made of him an authoritative and respected apostle of good will, of understanding, of unity and of peace, not only within the Canadian nation but among the free nations of the whole world. Canada owes him an irrevocable debt of gratitude for everything he has done for our country.

At home, notwithstanding the shadows cast by various fluctuations and difficulties in some sectors of the economy and by increased regional and seasonal unemployment, the general picture is good and prospects most encouraging.

Last September, there were 109,000 people without work drawing unemployment insurance benefits, a large number, it is true; but it should be noted that during the same month more than 5,100,000 persons were occupying remunerative employment in Canada.

But there is some feeling of unrest and there are those who really fear an economic recession and general unemployment. The Government is conscious of these problems, and is therefore seeking a solution to those coming under its jurisdiction. For instance, to avoid unemployment, the Government proposes that public construction projects already approved be accelerated, and asks Parliament "to make financial provision for construction in the programs of various departments and agencies on a scale that will make possible a substantial increase in the total expenditures for this purpose."

The Speech from the Throne indicates, moreover, that the Government intends to introduce "immediately" a legislative measure designed to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in order to increase the duration and scale of supplementary winter benefits.

The Government "is also proposing to introduce, during the session, broader amendments designed to make unemployment insurance a more effective instrument in providing financial support to unemployed workers".

These measures, as well as others of no less importance mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, clearly demonstrate the care with which the Government is doing everything in its power to help all those householders, Canadian men and women who, through the force of local or temporary circumstances, might not find work.

Another measure, which has both an economic and a social effect and which is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne—and the advantages of which the province of Quebec has unfortunately not made as much use of as its sister provinces—is the act approved by the House of Commons on March 8 last, providing for the construction of new houses, repairs to and modernization of existing houses and also for the improvement of housing and living conditions.

With regard to this act, the Speech from the Throne declares that it "has been an important factor in stimulating the construction of a record number of houses in the past year" and that "the prospects are favourable for a high level of house building in 1955."

Judging from the marvellous results obtained the very first year, the hopes entertained for the year 1955 are certainly not too sanguine.

In a public statement made recently, the honourable Minister of Public Works, Mr. Winters, gave significant figures, which show beyond any doubt what a strong impetus the new act has given to house building. May I be allowed to quote a few.

In the course of 1954, the building or remodelling of 110,000 to 115,000 houses was started, while it was completed in the case of 104,000 to 108,000 houses, which represents a considerable increase over any other year in Canadian history.

The present number of houses which we are starting to build is even higher. Taking into account average seasonal changes, we start building 120,000 houses each year, that is about 380 on every working day of the year. The number of new houses started in October 1954 alone reached 12,600, which represents an increase of 22 per cent over the same month in 1953.

It might be interesting to glance over the volume of loans made under the Housing Acts in 1953 and 1954 in relation to the whole housing program for each of those years.

In 1953, exclusive of conversions, construction of 102,000 houses was started throughout Canada. The building of 40,000 houses was approved for loan purposes under the National Housing Act, that is somewhat less than 40 per cent of the total number of houses on which construction was started. In 1954, the number of houses started being about 110,000, exclusive of conversions, it is expected that about 52,000 housing units will be built under the National Housing Act. According to this figure, it would seem that from 1953 to 1954 and even before then, the total increase in the housing program has been carried out under the National Housing Act. The number of houses on which construction has started has increased by 8,000, while the number of housing units with respect to which loans were extended under the National Housing Act has increased by 12,000.

Such figures testify to the real efficiency of the 1944 act. From the very first year, the results obtained were equal to the hopes it had inspired.

May I be permitted, honourable senators, as a citizen of the good old province of Quebec, to express regret at the costly indifference of the authorities of my province towards the advantages offered all provinces under the National Housing Act of 1944, and more particularly under section 35 thereof. As you know, the said section provides, and I quote:

35 (1) The Corporation may, pursuant to agreements made between the Government of Canada and the government of any province, undertake jointly with the government of the province or any agency thereof projects for the acquisition and development of land for housing purposes and for the construction of houses for sale or for rent.

(2) An agreement referred to in subsection (1) shall provide that the capital cost of the project and the profits or losses thereon shall be shared seventy-five per centum by the Corporation and twenty-five per centum by the Government of the province or an agency thereof.

Seven provinces, Ontario especially, have derived great benefits from this Act and have taken advantage of its provisions to do away with slums. Toronto alone, as a result of agreements concluded with the federal Government, has received for that purpose from the Canadian Government an amount of $1,362,000.

In that city, whole wards have been cleared away of their filthy slums and good, sanitary and bright homes have been built to house human beings created "in the image and likeness of God", who used to live in abject conditions and who now live in conditions where their physical and moral health is not threatened any more. Unfortunately, certain of our large cities in the province of Quebec are faced with the problems arising from slums, which are perhaps the worst social evil of our times. We express the wish that all people of good will unite in an effort to remove them.

Canada is a young, vigorous and rich country. She is endowed with a healthy and enterprising population. She is blessed with natural resources of which we have found but a small proportion. The pace of our growth is such that for the first time in history it has exceeded that of the United States. To give only one example of this, our Prime Minister said recently that our annual production of steel increased from 2 and a quarter million tons in 1946 to 4 million tons, and other Canadian industries have expanded as rapidly.

Since 1946, our gross national product has doubled, passing from 12 billion to 24 billion dollars.

In northern Quebec and in Labrador, rich deposits of iron ore are being developed. Already a railroad has been built for that purpose from Knob Lake to Seven Islands on the St. Lawrence, which is a greater distance than that from Montreal to Toronto. More than one million tons of rich ore have already been transported to Seven Islands and put on board ships or piled up near the shore. The St. Lawrence Seaway will permit the 10 milion tons or so annually produced at Knob Lake to be transported quickly and cheaply as far as the plants located around the Great Lakes.

The marked increase in orders of wheat coming from foreign lands during these last weeks is another encouraging sign.

In the field of international trade, everybody knows and admires the unceasing efforts that our tireless and dynamic Minister of Trade and Commerce makes to bring Western nations and more particularly our great and sympathetic neighbour to lift the obstacles that hinder freer trade. Our trade being in the hands of a man of such stature and ability as Mr. Howe, we certainly can look upon the future with a good deal of optimism. The speech which President Eisenhower delivered recently before the American Congress on the subject of tariffs constitutes for us a ray of hope. We are deeply convinced that other friendly nations will undoubtedly follow such a commendable example in the best interests of all.

Many other questions, such as the coming into force of the Disabled Persons Act which was passed at the last session and from which all provinces, ours "like the others", whatever one may say about it, will benefiit through agreements concluded with the federal Government; the amendment to the Blind Persons Act in order to lower the age of eligibility and raise the maximum permissible incomes; many other beneficial measures that were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne deserve more than a passing reference, but we shall have other opportunities to deal with them. Therefore, as I have already abused your patience, I beg of you, honourable senators, to excuse me for omitting them.

I conclude by repeating my wholehearted approval of the program outlined in the Speech from the Throne, and I second with deep pleasure the honourable senator from Victoria who moved the Address in reply to the Speech.

DIVORCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the first report of the committee.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant:

1. Your committee recommends that their quorum be reduced to three members for all purposes, including the taking of evidence upon oath by the committee or any subcommittee as to the matters set forth in petitions for bills of divorce.
2. Your committee also recommends that leave, be given them to sit during all adjournments of the Senate, and also during sittings of the Senate.
3. Your committee further recommends that authority be granted for the appointment of as many subcommittees as deemed necessary by the committee for the purpose of hearing and inquiring into such petitions for divorce as may be referred to them by the Committee on Divorce. The subcommittee in each case to report their findings to the main committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be considered?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, I move that the report be concurred in now.

Honourable senators, perhaps this is an appropriate time to make some comments. At its organization meeting this morning, the Committee on Divorce did me the honour of electing me as its chairman,—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: —for which I was duly grateful and appreciative.

May I say to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that the members of the Committee on Divorce will not be taking a holiday on Monday and Tuesday next, but will be sitting every day next week and also the week following, and perhaps for a number of other weeks as well; yes—and sometimes perhaps on Saturdays. Already 334 petitions have been filed. There are open files—by that I mean that notice has been given by publication in the Canada Gazette—of 409 petitions. So I think that we are assured of the largest docket that has ever come before the Divorce Committee for consideration. Last session we heard 145 cases before Christmas. This session we are starting later, with a larger number of cases to deal with.

Honourable senators may have noted that we ask for certain rights and privileges for the committees. We recommend a quorum of three senators to hear evidence on the general committee or on any subcommittee. I am sure that the house will be interested to know that we now have an arrangement for the sitting of four sub-committees—really four divorce courts operating simultaneously —every day next week, and for as many weeks as may be necessary to dispose of the docket. Some 72 cases are ready for hearing this coming week, 13 on Monday, 17 on Tuesday, 15 on Wednesday, and so forth. These cases will be heard by subcommittees who will report the facts to the general committee, and in turn the general committee will make its recommendation to the house.

At the close of last session I thanked the members of the Divorce Committee for their very good attendance during the session. I think it remarkable that with a total membership of about twenty, and frequently with four sub-committees sitting, there was not a single occasion when we had to adjourn for lack of a quorum. This indicated a strong sense of responsibility and devotion to duty by the entire membership of the Committee.

I look forward to the completion of a rather strenuous job. It is not one that we have asked for, but since it is our obligation we hope to do it with the utmost devotion, care and responsibility. Thank you.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before making a few remarks I should like to ask a question of the Chairman of the Divorce Committee (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). How many cases are set down for Monday next?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There will be thirteen cases heard on Monday.

Hon. Mr. Haig: By how many subcommittees?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Four subcommittees.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not rise to criticize the Chairman of the Divorce Committee or the work done by his committee. On the contrary, I was too long a member of that committee to have anything but admiration for its chairman and its work. I think all those who serve on the committee make a sacrifice that is made by none of the other members of this house. However, I should like to make a point quite apart from any possible criticism. We do something in our divorce proceedings that I do not think is necessary. As this is not a political question I am speaking for myself and not for the Conservative party. I refer to our practice of not setting a deadline for the completion of petitions to be dealt with in a session.

According to the terms of the British North America Act, Parliament has jurisdiction over the granting of divorce. Ever since Confederation applications for divorce have been presented to Parliament and we have dealt with them. For myself, I, in clear conscience, could not object to doing my share of the work. And I do not think that, after my extensive experience of some years gained while serving on the Divorce Committee, I could do otherwise than recommend divorce in certain cases, for it appears to me that to do so is in the interest of the children, the innocent parties in the proceedings, and of the good conduct of our country.

I am not going to argue the question as to whether Parliament should continue to deal with divorce petitions or not. Many people have religious scruples about divorce, but I am not going to discuss that matter at all. However, the majority of people in Canada believe that divorce is necessary. Two provinces only are without divorce courts.

Now, there are some 310 petitions for divorce ready for hearing by our committee.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: 334.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In my opinion a date such as March 1, or April 1 should be set as a deadline, after which all applications not completed should stand over until the next session. I do not think that we should allow these applications to drag along into May and June before being completed and made ready for hearing. I may say that very frequently these late applications are the ones out of which certain members of the House of Commons—very few I am glad to say—try to make a little political capital by criticizing the Senate on its handling of divorce proceedings.

I have practised law in Winnipeg for over fifty years and well do I know the attitude of the courts in Manitoba on divorce matters. We did not have divorce courts in that province prior to 1890. We really had the right to grant divorce in 1870, but it was not until about 1890 that we suddenly found that out. Because of my long practice of law in Manitoba, I am in a position to say that even the judges of the divorce courts there sometimes make a little slip.

It is my opinion that our Divorce Committee in the Senate, under the chairmanship of my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), is as able a body for the trial of divorce cases as is any court in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The custom is, whenever possible, to have at least one lawyer on every subcommittee, as chairman, sitting with two or more laymen. The lawyer chairman can direct the subcommittee on questions of law on what evidence is legally admissible, for instance—and the laymen can say what they think of the facts in the case. A layman's judgment of the facts is just as good as a lawyer's. That is the kind of court we have in the Senate, and it works well. Now, out of the 385 applications for divorce heard last year there were two or three cases in which our committees were a little lax. In Manitoba, if the judgment of a trial judge is appealed, the appeal is heard by a court consisting of five judges. Its attitude to the facts is that as the judge who tried the case, saw and heard the witnesses, his view of the evidence should be upheld, unless, of course, his findings are abhorrent to honesty and good sense—that is, for instance, if he held that twenty-five people who said one car hit another were wrong, and one man who said it did not, was right. The same principle holds good with regard to our own tribunal. There are not less than three senators on each committee which takes evidence, and they decide on the facts whether one side or the other is to be believed. Their findings, with the record, go to the House of Commons. From time to time some honourable members of that house declare that they do not agree with the judgment of one or other of our committees. Well, why in the world should a selfish House of Commons assume to initiate practically all legislation? The gentleman who occupies the first position in this chamber (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and the present Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) have tried hard to have more legislation initiated in the Senate, but one excuse after another is raised to deny that right to this house. If this principle is to be followed through, why should not the Commons try divorce applications themselves, and send the bills here for final consideration?

Having voiced my objections, I want to offer a remedy. I do not think we should stop trying divorce applications, because I realize the necessities of a country like ours. If any of my boys or girls, their wives or husbands, were guilty of misconduct, it would be in the interests of my grandchildren, I believe, that the parents should be separated. I love my children very much, but I am sure that my grandchildren would fare better in a household which was not divided by the behavior of their parents. As a lawyer I find as I grow older that the number of women who consult me on these domestic matters is increasing, because most women prefer to talk with elderly lawyers. One thing that troubles them is the cost of proceedings. As a rule the husband is the wage earner, and it is difficult not to feel sympathy with a woman who finds it almost impossible to finance her suit. On many occasions I have had to advise a divorce, because the effects upon the children were such that I could not conscientiously advise the wife to carry on. So, while I do not favour divorce, I admit its necessity; there seems to be no alternative. But I will not argue the question.

On a matter of procedure, I suggest that this house should lay down a rule that cases which are not ready for hearing by the 1st of March, or at least by the 1st of April, should be held over until the following session. If this were done our members would have a reasonable chance to deal with other matters, and we should hear less criticism to the effect that this house is a glorified divorce court. I do not like that. I do not appreciate anyone saying to me, "Well, I suppose you are going down to Ottawa now to help get the Senate divorce mill running". It was certainly never the intention of the Fathers of Confederation that the Senate should find itself open to such criticism. It was intended that men and women experienced in public life should help to formulate better legislation for Canada by serving in the Senate.

I do not know what I would do without the services of the honourable and distinguished senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). When I go wrong he puts me right. You ought to hear him lecture me sometimes. In any event, I believe my honourable friend served on the Divorce Committee for some fifteen years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Twenty-one years.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is worse than I thought. Finally, one day I said to him, "Well, Walter, you can continue to serve on the Divorce Committee if you want, but I can tell you that you are not helping either the Conservative party or myself by working on that committee all day." I added, "You owe it to the people of Saskatchewan, particularly Rosetown, to devote more of your time to other legislation." I would say such a thing to any honourable senator who has served on the Divorce Committee for a long period of time.

In conclusion I would again urge that the Chairman of the Divorce Committee take steps to see that no divorce cases are heard in the Senate this session after April 1.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I have the indulgence—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would draw your attention to the fact that if the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have just a few comments to make in reply to the very kind remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). I wish to thank him for his sympathetic attitude towards the Divorce Committee and particularly towards its chairman. I would like to associate myself with his remarks about the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), who gave many long years of patient and excellent service both as a member and Chairman of the Divorce Committee. However, there was one remark which I believe was inadvertently made by the honourable Leader of the Opposition. In speaking about the criticism made in the House of Commons he intimated that on one or two occasions a Senate divorce committee had been a little lax. He used the words "a little lax". Now there was no occasion last session—and I speak from personal knowledge—when any divorce committee was lax to any degree whatsoever.

Hon. Hr. Howard: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I should like to thank the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity for correcting me. I used those words intentionally because I thought that was the case.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That was not the case. There was no laxity at any time, and there was no case in connection with which any chairman or committee member should apologize. The case that was most criticized last year was one which we had heard with care and devotion for no less than seven hours. At the end of that time we adjourned to think the matter over for the evening, and on resuming next morning we were unanimous in our decision. That decision was criticized in the House of Commons, and a number of outrageous mis-statements were made with regard to the facts. We were also criticized because the evidence had not been sent to the House of Commons, and as a result a committee of that house approved of our decision without reading the evidence or knowing anything about the case. That was all right. It showed confidence in our committee which was justified. I do not say the evidence should be read, but when criticism is directed against us for not supplying the evidence it is going a little too far.

The rest of the criticism was equally unwarranted. This house has no apology to make to anyone for the course of events during last session. We anticipate criticism again this session. No one can take part in public affairs and hold himself above criticism. Sometimes a little check-up does good, and everyone is subject to being jacked up on occasions. No one complains about that at all, but I do appeal to the press of this dominion to deal fairly with us and to see that they verify their facts before publishing them. That is something they failed to do on many occasions last year. I appeal to them to be square with us. We are conducting a judicial institution with judicial calm and taking all the time that is necessary. We are not hurrying a single case. We are giving these cases the very best thought of which we are capable, and we are rendering our decisions according to the dictates of our conscience. In these circumstances, I think we should be justly treated.

This session we have no fewer than sixty-seven contested cases, which represent a large docket. We have many other cases that are not contested. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) suggests that we should lay down some deadline for the completion of cases. Our Rules provide that no petition may be filed later than five weeks from today; that is to say, by February 17 the right to file petitions expires. Last session we insisted that all cases be completed within one month after the final date for filing petitions, and I have no doubt that the committee will follow this procedure again. It is certain that no cases will be filed after February 17, and probably no cases will be heard that are not completed by the end of March.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I interrupt the honourable senator to ask a question? Has it been customary in the past to extend the date for filing petitions?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It has been done.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Has it been done over the years?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Very frequently over the years, yes, but by no means has there been established any precedent for doing it again.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Has it been done as a result of a motion brought in this house?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: On recommendation, of course, of the committee. Usually special circumstances have been pleaded which have justified this action. There were several reasons which justified our action in that regard last year. There is no assurance that we shall do it again this year unless there are good reasons for doing so.

Until last year divorce applicants were allowed an unlimited time to complete their cases in connection with the necessary publication, services, and filings under the rules. However, last year we set a deadline, and those cases not completed by the appointed time went over to the next session. We shall certainly follow that procedure again this year, and this should take care of what the Leader of the Opposition has suggested.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Thank you.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

PETITIONS WITHDRAWN

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented and moved concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, recommending that an application for leave to withdraw a petition be granted and that the parliamentary fees paid under Rule 140 be refunded to the petitioner, less the sum of $25 to apply on costs, including printing and translation costs.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, may I inform the members of the house who are not members of the committee that it has been the custom over the years, when divorce petitions have been filed but later withdrawn, to refund the parliamentary fees, less $10, for printing and translation costs. However, the small sum of $10 is scarcely enough to pay these costs, and this year the committee thought it fair, and decided this morning, that the amount to be retained should be $25, which is a very moderate sum indeed.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck severally presented and moved concurrence in the third, fourth and fifth reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, recommending that applications for leave to withdraw certain petitions be granted and that the parliamentary fees paid under Rule 140 be refunded to the petitioners, less the sum of $25 to apply on costs in each case, including printing and translation costs.

The reports were severally read by the Clerk Assistant.

The motions were agreed to, on division.

PRIVATE BILL

HURON AND ERIE MORTGAGE CORPORATION BILL—FIRST READING

Hon. W. D. Euler presented Bill G, an Act respecting The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Thursday next.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, at the present time the House of Commons is discussing a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. The purpose of the bill is to increase the supplementary benefits and to extend the class eligible for them. It is felt desirable that the bill should become effective on Monday, and to make this possible it would, of course, have to receive Royal Assent before then. The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) was good enough to say that he would defer his discussion on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, so that this house would be free to deal promptly with the bill, if it comes from the House of Commons today.

I propose, therefore, that the house rise now, to reconvene at the call of the bell. If the bill comes to us from the House of Commons it can be taken into consideration immediately, and, if deemed advisable, receive third reading, and be given the Royal Assent today. I am assured that there will be an opportunity later in the session to discuss the bill thoroughly.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the sitting was resumed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 6, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: With leave of the house, I move the second reading now.

Honourable senators, the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in the House of Commons was interrupted this afternoon in order that consideration might be given to this bill, which by reason of some urgency received second and third readings there in the one sitting. The bill provides that unemployment insurance payments shall commence on a Monday. Therefore, if this house deems it advisable to pass the bill today, a considerable number of working people will receive the increased benefits for which it provides as from last Monday, and others will receive the full benefits under the bill from that day; whereas, if the bill does not pass until next week, the benefits will not commence until next Monday. It is for that reason that I suggest that the bill be considered now.

Some honourable senators may feel that we are unduly rushing things. I would point out, however, that the House of Commons was assured by the Minister of Labour that another measure embracing this bill would be introduced later in the session, and that a full opportunity would be given at that time to all honourable members and senators to discuss not only the features of this bill but all phases of the general question of unemployment.

Honourable senators will recall that under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act the employee and employer each pay, shall I say, two units of the amount contributed, and the Government pays one unit. That is to say, if the employer and the employee each pay $1.00, making a total of $2.00, the Government pays 40 cents, together with the cost of the administration of the act.

In order to be eligible for benefits under the present act a man must have been employed for a period of thirty weeks or 180 days. If an eligible person happens to have used up all his benefits during the period between January 1 and April 15, he may receive what is known as supplementary benefit. The act also provides that when a man has made contributions for 90 days, instead of 180 days, he is entitled to supplementary benefit for the period between January 1 and April 15, to the extent of 16 days.

As honourable senators know, in Canada there is considerable seasonal unemployment, most of which occurs in the winter months. In order to ease the burden of those persons who are out of work at that time supplementary benefit is paid.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand that supplementary benefit is paid at the same rate as the regular benefit?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: At the present time the supplementary rates are less than the regular rates.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does this bill bring them up to the regular rates?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. Honourable senators will notice by the table in the explanatory notes to the bill that a person without a dependent receives supplementary benefit of $12.90 per week, and a person with a dependent receives $16.80. The table which appears in subsection 2 of section 1 of the bill indicates that under this measure a person without a dependent will receive a weekly supplementary benefit of $17.10; and a person with a dependent, $24. It is apparent that the bill would bring the supplementary payments to about the same amount as the regular payments.

The bill would also provide that a person who has not qualified for regular payments, and who under the present act would receive a minimum of 16 days' benefit, will now receive 60 days' benefit.

I think, honourable senators, that concisely explains the purpose of this bill. You will all agree, I am sure, that in the interests of those who are unemployed and who need the increased benefits which the bill would provide, it should be considered and passed by us today. As I have suggested, we can reserve our right to criticize the measure and to seek further information on the general unemployment question when the other bill comes before the house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable leader when the present rates came into effect?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The present supplementary rates have been in effect since 1950, but I would remind the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity, who I know has shown great interest in this subject, that the regular rates were increased in 1952.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Has the honourable leader any information as to the approximate amount of money expended for supplementary benefits, and what will be expended at the proposed increased rate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have in my hand a table which shows the supplementary benefit, Classes 1 and 2, for the period January 1, 1950, to November 30, 1954, inclusive. It covers the payment of benefits, the number of persons qualified and the days paid. If my honourable friend from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill) or any other honourable senators would like to have this information, with leave of the house I would be pleased to place the table on Hansard.

Supplementary Benefit Classes 1 and 2
January 1, 1950 to November 30, 1954.

Year Ending December 31	Expenditure Benefit	No. Persons Qualified	Days Paid
1950	$ 2,761,402	69,088	1,443,192
1951	3,886,657	88,549	2,028,329
1952	4,657,654	95,986	2,275,825
1953	9,220,152	149,317	4,297,262
1954 (To November 30)	14,082,897	210,654	6,469,164
	$34,608,762

Hon. Mr. Haig: As I understand it, the present act provides for 16 days' supplementary benefit, and the bill now before us will increase that to 60 days?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Sixteen days was the minimum for those who had not qualified for regular payments.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I understand.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The bill would also increase the amount of the supplementary payments.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The rates would be increased for the two categories from, in round figures, $12 to $17, and $16 to $24?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I have no objection whatever to the bill; in fact, I do not know how some people live on the amounts they receive by way of unemployment insurance benefits. I do, however, have one observation which I should like to make at this time, and the opportunity will be open for me when the other bill comes before the house to discuss the matter in greater detail.

According to my understanding of the act, its original purpose was to provide unemployment relief benefits as required, and also to create a surplus fund to take care of periods of widespread unemployment if they should occur. For instance, in my own office we pay our contribution towards unemployment insurance every two weeks, as do the employees in the office, and it has always been my understanding, and I think that of the public generally, that by such contributions we were accumulating a fund to meet a major emergency. Now, the same thing was done in Great Britain, yet, when the great depression came, even with all the savings that had accumulated in the fund were not enough to meet the payments, and Parliament had to vote supplementary supply. I am just a little bit disappointed that the supplementary payments provided for by this bill have to be taken out of general reserves. I think supplementary estimates should have been voted by Parliament, because this measure is really for the purpose of taking care of unemployment that is not normal. For instance, supposing a bank clerk is let out of his employment, there is not a chance of his being taken on by any other bank. The same remarks apply to many stenographers. An employer does not want to take into his office a stenographer who has been discharged. Now, all those people pay for unemployment insurance, and surely, payment of benefits to them should come out of a special fund. That is to say, various classes should have been created, as was done under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

However, this is not the time to discuss that point further. I am quite willing that the bill should pass at once, for I really do not understand how people can live and keep a home together on amounts paid out under the present act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There are no supplementary estimates to provide for this bill? This money, as I understand it, comes out of the fund, does it not?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is plenty of money in that fund.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am assured that there is plenty of money in the fund to cover the anticipated payments. A statement will be presented to Parliament showing the amount in the fund, but at any rate I am assured that the fund is well able to pay what it will be called upon to pay under this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On account of the urgency, I move, with leave, that this bill be read the third time now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the bill having passed both houses of Parliament, it is ready to receive the Royal Assent this evening. This, I am sure, can be arranged. I therefore move that the house rise now, to resume at the call of the bell, at approximately 9.45.

The motion was agreed to and Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

THE HONOURABLE SENATOR KING

BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, this is a very important day in the history of our country. Eighty-two years ago today there was born in New Brunswick a child who was destined to become a medical practitioner, with a large practice, in British Columbia. Subsequently he was elected to the Legislature of British Columbia, where later he became Minister of Public Works. In 1922 he resigned from the provincial Legislature and Cabinet and became a member of the Dominion Government. He was summoned to the Senate in 1930, and in 1942 he was appointed Leader of the Government in this house. Honourable senators, I refer to our dearly beloved colleague, Senator J. H. King.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: On behalf of the members of this chamber, may I take this opportunity to extend to him our very best wishes for his continued happiness.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I cannot let the Leader of the Government get ahead of the Leader of the Opposition. The honourable senator from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King) comes from western Canada, and is one of our heroes in that part of the country. In fact, I recall many years ago hearing my mother, who was an admirer of Ralph Connor, speak in glowing terms of the great doctor who was the leading character in one of his books. Little did I think at that time that I would have the honour of sitting in the Senate of Canada with that great doctor, the senator from Kootenay East.

I extend to the honourable senator my best wishes that he may be spared to be with us for many more years.

Hon. James H. King: Honourable senators, although the felicitations extended to me are a bit embarrassing, I do appreciate the kind remarks of the honourable leaders on both sides of the house.

I have been a member of the Senate for some twenty-five years, and I regard my association with this chamber, on behalf of my province of British Columbia, as one of the wonderful experiences of my life.

We grow up and we get old, and as we get old we realize that we cannot enjoy things as we used to in our younger days. However, we have many happy memories.

I do thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DIVORCE PETITIONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 6 to 16, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

INCOME TAX

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING PROVINCIAL TAX

Hon. Mr. Reid: I wonder whether the Leader in the Senate of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) would give consideration to having printed in the proceedings the correspondence which has passed between the Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec with regard to income tax.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think that could be arranged. If it is the pleasure of honourable senators, the correspondence could be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

See Appendix to today's Hansard, pp. 36 to 41.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, January 12, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable members, first allow me to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne. Of course I followed the speech of the mover, the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), better than I followed that of the seconder, the honourable senator from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Tremblay); but I read his speech the next day and came to one conclusion—that he is at least a friend of the Prime Minister of Canada.

If the honourable senator from Victoria had changed one word in her speech she could have covered the whole subject of Canadian affairs as she covered those of British Columbia. Those who were here admired the able address she delivered about the province in which she lives. In summary, what she said amounts to this, that a great deal of money has been spent in the development of the natural resources of British Columbia, that employees there are paid very high wages, and that there is now a great deal of unemployment because the goods they produce cannot be sold to the outside world. The honourable lady, who is a new member in this house, certainly outlined the situation in British Columbia correctly, as I understand it from what I have read.

I am not going to attempt to make a long dissertation on the Speech from the Throne. I should not try to do so even if I could. I do not want to hurt anybody's feelings, but I am bound to say that I was disappointed in the Speech from the Throne. I thought it was a poor summary of what has already taken place and a very scanty report of what is to come. Had the Speech merely stated that Parliament would be asked to amend the Statutes of Canada it would have covered everything. The Speech disclosed that the Government would propose the amendment of certain legislation. Whether it will actually do so I do not know, but the matters referred to are not vital to the business of the country anyway.

Honourable senators, I want to say how delighted the Canadian people were on the occasion of the Queen Mother's gracious visit to Canada last November. As members of the Senate, we were all invited to Ottawa to attend the luncheon given jointly by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons in her honour. I know that all those who attended were delighted by the function and had the highest praise for the way in which it was organized.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The Speakers of the Senate and of the House of Commons need not take second place to anyone in acting as hosts at a formal luncheon of that kind. I have not been all over the world by any means, but I have travelled a little and read a great deal, and I cannot imagine a more perfect luncheon than the one we enjoyed on that occasion. The Speaker of the Senate, assisted by the Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), did credit to this chamber. I am sure that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, upon returning home to Britain, carried with her the kindest thoughts of the Canadian people.

As far as I was concerned, there was only one fly in the ointment. I really did not intend to come down to Ottawa, but the people of the city of Winnipeg seem to think that I am a public servant, and the minute some of them heard that I was not planning to be present at the luncheon they said to me: "Jack, you had better get on the train and get down to Ottawa right away. You can't tell what the Liberals, Social Crediters or CCFers will do." I replied that I could trust the Speaker of the Senate and the Leader of the Government in this house to do a good job, but they insisted that I should be present. They even said, "If you won't go on your own we will take up a collection and send you." Four days before leaving for Ottawa I received a communication, I believe it was a telegram, advising me what kind of clothes I was expected to wear at the formal luncheon. For one thing I was to wear a secretarial coat. Well, it seemed that no one in Winnipeg knew what a secretarial coat was, but finally I located an old tailor who knew and he made me one. Then I came on to Ottawa, only to find that most of my fellow senators did not have this coat. However, the good ladies of our Speaker and Government Leader quickly recognized that I was wearing the prescribed dress, and this made me feel rather proud of myself. The Queen Mother appeared to us to be a wonderful woman who had reached her zenith in life, and at the luncheon and other functions in Ottawa she gave a demonstration of womanhood that I am sure could not be surpassed anywhere. Like their fellow Canadians, the senators and their wives were pleased and honoured that such a gracious lady had come to this country to give us the feeling that we are an important part of the Commonwealth, and that she recognizes us as a nation which can be depended upon to stand four-square for freedom in the troubled world of today.

Honourable senators, I now want to refer to other matters of a different character altogether. First of all, I should like to deal with the labour question. There have been many complaints lately that labour forces are demanding too high wages for the amount of work they do. Now, I am neither pro-labour nor anti-labour. Like many other Canadians I started out in a small way, working up through different stages in life until I was in a position where I took on a certain measure of responsibility. As a result I know some of the problems that face men and women in the ranks of labour, and I know that our taxation system imposes such a burden on labour that production costs are higher than they should be.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There is no doubt about that at all. As a practising lawyer in the city of Winnipeg I have observed the taxation rates increase so much since 1940 that many wage earners are no longer able to live on their pay, even though their incomes have been increased. Certain factors are involved in the manufacture of any article. There is the cost of labour and the cost of the raw material. Of course, in many cases the raw material has been processed before being shipped to the manufacturing plant. Then a tax is imposed on the income from the sale of the manufactured product. I think last year the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company made a profit of approximately $900 million.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Not $900 million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: $900,000.

Hon. Mr. Horner: $9 million.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In any event, half of their profits went to the Canadian Government, which had done nothing to get that money. It did not have one nickel invested in the mine. The mine owners knew that in order to get people to invest in the mine the products had to be sold at prices which would give a reasonable return on the investment. When a manufacturer sells machinery, cars, binders or tractors he has to make allowance for his taxation costs, and he increases the price of his product to the consumer accordingly; otherwise, he would have to stop manufacturing. This sort of situation has come about in the last fifteen years, and it is the main reason why we are having trouble selling our manufactured goods on foreign markets.

Let us say that a labourer receives $3,000 a year. If he is a married man without children he pays income tax on that part of his income over $2,000, and if he is a single man he pays tax on that part of his income over $1,000. Out of this small income of $3,000 he must provide for food, clothing, shelter and perhaps put aside something for his old age. and so he seeks higher wages to carry on. Some honourable senators, including the honourable gentlemen from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King), and Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), and myself, have served in this house for some twenty years, and we know that we had as much money left to ourselves when we got $4,000 a year as when we got $6,000. The difference in costs has increased that much. We cannot cut taxes down in Canada by just saying we are going to do so. We have to cut down expenditures first, and then cut down taxes. We cannot do it by the reverse way.

Everybody is faced with two tax loads. First of all there is the personal income tax. Then there is the corporation tax, which is supposed to be imposed on corporations. But who owns the corporations? They are individuals. A few years ago the Bell Telephone Company endeavoured to get an increase in rates. The Board of Transport Commissioners proposed a certain rate, but the company demanded twice as much. Upon being asked why, it replied that the Government took half its profits anyway. Well, that is the situation. All those costs increase the price of goods to the consumer and, as I said before, this is one reason we are having difficulty in selling on the world market.

Hon. Mr. Horner: There is also the matter of the sales tax.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The sales tax and the excess profits tax only partly enter into the picture. In any event, we are faced with all this heavy taxation, yet there is no apparent desire on the part of people to cut down on expenditures. But if we do not cut them down we are going to be driven out of the world market. You may say, "Well, we have had good markets for the last few years." But look at what is happening today. The United States has just started to do exactly what I think they had been expected to do. They have a surplus of many agricultural products, and are shipping grain and other products to different countries, accepting their currencies in payment. We cannot sell grain to those countries on those terms. We as Canadians must realize that if we are going to compete successfully in the world markets our costs must be cut down.

Honourable senators, I am not one to criticize labour, and I stress that before going further. I want to say that unless taxes are reduced so that the labouring man, who earns his money, has enough left to live on reasonably—that is, to provide housing, clothing and food for himself and his family—there will be trouble. I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to inquire and tell us how many men and women were unemployed in Canada at January 1 this year. I do not want to know how many applied for positions at the Unemployment Insurance Commission, because a lot of people who are working have applied. The labour organizations say there are many thousands unemployed in Canada, and I want to know what the actual number is. Why cannot the department tell us within a month how many are unemployed? I think it ought to be able to give us an authoritative figure.

I do not want to enter into the discussion on taxation between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec, but one thing I have noticed about it is very interesting, and that is the large number of people who will be relieved from paying taxes at all if the exemptions are increased to $3,000 for married wage earners and $1,500 for single people. That is where the big tax load is. I am persuaded that that illustrates the problem I am raising today. I do not say that the rich man should not be taxed, but I do say that taxes have got to be cut down so that the labouring man earning a moderate wage can live. Only three months ago a labourer came to my office, and told me that he was earning about $2,200—I think that was the amount—and his wife, who had been a nurse, was also working. They had two children. His wife, who earned about $1,500, took the exemption of one child, and he took the exemption of the other. Although I forget the figure, I was shocked to learn what they had to pay in taxes. The man told me that after he and his wife had paid their taxes, and regular living expenses had been met, they had nothing left. At the very first attack of unemployment, such people are on the street. I have a very keen feeling for them. I do not pretend to preach on behalf of labour, but I think we as educated men and women, holding positions of importance, and who control one division of Parliament, should raise our voices to see that fair play is given to that class of people in our communities.

Turning now to another class, our farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—I do not know so much about those of British Columbia—are demanding parity of prices. Just today, the farmers of Ontario officially—I am not speaking of the men on the line fence—demanded of the Ontario government that agricultural products be put on a parity price basis. Canada sells about 30 per cent of its agricultural products on the world market, and that controls the cost of the other 70 per cent. Remember that in dealing with the farmer, when it comes to getting votes, you are dealing with a different type of man from the labourer. Mr. Farmer knows where he is going, and if he is convinced that he is not getting a fair deal in the economy of Canada he is going to vote for a change in government. That is why the politician, or the statesman, whichever you care to call him, has to consider the interest of the farmer. The Premier of Quebec has given an exemption of 30 per cent on incomes of $3,000. Why? Because he believes that will exempt the farmers of that province from taxation. He may be wrong, but he believes it. That is why he is putting that exemption into effect. I have no doubt of that at all. In the next election we shall have to face the fact that the farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—I do not know about British Columbia—and no doubt of Ontario and Quebec, are going to demand that they be given a fair deal in the economy of Canada and receive a very fair share of its earnings. These are matters that we as senators must recognize in time and try to solve.

To change the subject somewhat, I want to make a suggestion to the Government, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate. For many years I have felt that we are not getting the best possible service from the United Nations. By that I mean that we do not send any opposition down to the meetings. We are sending observers, but they are not members on the committee. I have been there, and I know. At the time I was there, Canada had delegates, or alternates, who sat in on all the proceedings. Let me tell you a story. We used to meet at 9 o'clock every morning. On one occasion the then Minister of External Affairs, now the Prime Minister of Canada, had to prepare a speech for delivery before the Committee on External Affairs. When he delivered the speech I happened to be sitting next to him at the table, and he said to me, "What do you think of that speech, Haig?" I said; "Not much, Mr. St. Laurent. I am sure it does not express the best Canadian opinion." Mr. Coldwell spoke up and said, "I agree with Haig". You were there, Mr. Speaker. Sitting across the table was Paul Martin, and he said he agreed with Haig, and John Bracken agreed with Haig, and then Mr. St. Laurent said, "I agree with Haig." Well, he took off for two or three days, and then wrote a real speech, and the funny part of it was this: Mr. Bracken was his deputy on the committee, and on the day that speech was to be delivered Mr. St. Laurent was sick with the 'flu and could not be there, so it was delivered by Mr. Bracken. The press of the United States said that the Leader of the Conservatice party had made a great speech before the United Nations. I think very highly of that representation on the United Nations.

I suggest that in addition to her Government representation at the United Nations meetings Canada should have two men or women from the major parties and one from each of the smaller parties. These representatives would, I believe, return from their participation in the work of that body feeling as I did, that while it has its faults and may be far from perfect it is the most promising organization on the horizon today for the promotion of world peace.

As a delegate to that body, I had freedom to express my own opinions, but by agreement those of us who were not members of the Government did not attend meetings at which money questions were being discussed and voted on.

I should like to make a brief reference to the matter of credit buying, and to remind honourable senators of the steps taken some five years ago by the Honourable Douglas Abbott, then Minister of Finance, to restrict credit arrangements. Statistics published recently indicate that as of the end of September this year there was some $1,885 million worth of credit outstanding in this country. Buying was tremendously heavy during the Christmas season in my home city of Winnipeg, and I presume it was so in other cities, but the greater part of it was on a time-payment plan. This seems to me to create a false economy, and what the result may be if we run into more difficult times, I do not know. I believe the time has come when some restrictions should be imposed to prevent such heavy credit buying.

In a notice of motion tonight the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) referred to the ratification of the agreement made between Germany and the NATO countries having to do with the European situation. As I see it, the world is no more secure today than it was a year ago, and we cannot afford to relax our efforts to maintain peace. The recent incident in the French Assembly illustrates the delicacy of the problem in that part of the world. We in Canada should therefore be very clear in our course of action when we face the question of ratification of the agreement.

I may be anticipating what some honourable senators may say on this subject, but I believe no nation in the world today, not even the United States or Great Britain, has a greater responsibility than has Canada in deciding what treatment shall be accorded Germany with respect to her place among other nations. In the eyes of other countries Canada is a nation without ambition for world power. In saying that I am not criticizing the United States or Great Britain, for I am well aware of the magnificent fight those two nations have put up over the past ten years to meet the threat of domination by Russia. Without them, I dare not guess what might have happened. But now Canada has her own part to play along with the other nations in deciding whether Germany should be rearmed.

Those of us who were in this chamber on September 9, 1939, will recall vividly how member after member stood up and voted on the question of whether we should go to war with Germany. Although we knew that a decision to go to war meant that the sons or other relatives of many of us would go overseas and that some might not come back, there was not a dissenting vote.

That decision having been made, we later turned to the question of whether we should ally ourselves with Russia in her fight against Germany. We knew we were a small factor in the battle between those two giant nations, but there was not one of us who did not feel, rightly or wrongly, that we should maintain a united front against the German military machine. And in the end the United States and Great Britain with Canada's help were able to defeat the strong German forces.

We now face a new problem, and in that too Canada must take her stand. I am again reminded of an experience during my visit to the United Nations. A delegate from Iran approached me and asked if I was a Canadian, and when I told him I was he invited me to come out after lunch and have a talk with him. His first question to me was, "Are you afraid of the United States?" I replied that we were not, and added that while we did not always see eye to eye with that country on every detail, as neighbours we were truthful with each other, trusted each other to keep its word, and got along together well. It is for that reason, I said, that we hold up our hands in favour of United States' policies which we feel we can support through the United Nations.

Those of our citizens who lost relatives and friends during the last war feel very bitter about the proposed rearmament of Germany, and I can quite understand why they would have that feeling. I am reminded of a remark my son made to me after he returned from service as a pilot in that war. I asked him, "Doug, when you were taking off from the runway in your plane carrying six tons of bombs to drop on Germany, what were you thinking about?" His answer, I think, was significant. He said, "I thanked God that my mother and dad were safe, because I knew that I might well kill a good many mothers and dads with the bombs I was to drop."

I feel very strongly that if we do not have Germany on our side we will see her absorbed into the Russian family. It is a bitter choice we have to make, but I believe the majority of the thinking people in this country are in favour of our backing up the treaty to allow Germany to rearm. In doing so we will not only be doing right by ourselves but we will be giving leadership to the smaller nations. Because they will take their leadership from us, I think we should be clear and unanimous in our support of the treaty.

In conclusion may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have enjoyed the period during which you have presided over the sittings of this house. I have also enjoyed my relationship with the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and I congratulate him upon the fine job he is doing. While I do not always agree with him, I know where he stands and the reason for his stand. I am sure that as Leader of the Government in this house he is trying just as I, the Leader of the Opposition, am trying to do—to be of the highest possible service to the people of Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

Province of Quebec

Quebec, October 11, 1954.

The Right Honourable
Louis S. St-Laurent, P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My dear Prime Minister:

Since our pleasant meeting last Tuesday in Montreal, my colleagues and I, with particular attention and with the sincere desire of co-operating to the fullest reasonable extent in its solution, have studied the important fiscal problem which was the subject of our interview.

Our Legislative Assembly opens in a few weeks, on November 17th. I need hardly mention the vast additional amount of work involved in its preparation. Moreover, I am leaving this week on a vacation of about ten days' duration, the first I have taken in over a year.

Under the circumstances, even with the best of intentions, it is physically impossible before my departure to obtain and study the statistics which form the basis of the subject. At the earliest possible moment I will write you again on my return.

Nevertheless, I wish to mention here that, if you decide to call a Canadian intergovernmental conference at Ottawa, we will be happy to attend and we will not hesitate to defer our parliamentary work should this conference take place during the session of our legislature.

With my sincere regards,
(Sgd.) M. L. DUPLESSIS

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter of October 11th and I understand that, under the circumstances, it has not been possible for you to send me the information which, at our meeting of October 5th concerning your suggested amendments to your Income Tax Act, we had agreed you would forward to me.

I hope that, when you receive this letter on your return, you will have had a pleasant and restful vacation and that we will then be able to resume consideration of a temporary and acceptable solution of the matter which is a problem for all of us.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

Office of the Premier

Quebec, November 1st, 1954.

The Right Honourable
Louis S. St-Laurent, P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

Pursuant to our interview in Montreal on October 5th last and to the letter I sent you on the 11th of the same month, I am writing you on the subject of the provincial income tax in and for the Province of Quebec.

We believe that we clearly defined the opinion and the attitude of the Government of the Province of Quebec, in matters of the powers of taxation during the Canadian intergovernmental conferences which were held in Ottawa since 1945 and came to a close at Quebec in 1950, as well as in the correspondence we have had with federal authorities, particularly since 1949.

The agreement concluded between the preceding provincial government and the federal authorities, concerning important provincial powers of taxation, expired in 1947. Since then, the Province of Quebec has not availed itself of its right to collect a provincial income tax in the province. This shows the earnest desire of the Quebec government to come to an agreement with Ottawa and, after all, the federal government has profited financially, to a large extent, by this situation which lasted approximately seven years.

The great progress and the tremendous developments, from which our immense province benefits, particularly large and numerous districts which were formerly less-favoured, necessitate numerous public services and many improvements in several important fields of provincial administration, especially in the vital fields of education and hospitalization.

Such tremendous progress and the brilliant prospects before the province require a more complete utilization of the sources of provincial revenue. It is unnecessary to emphasize that the progress and prosperity of the Province of Quebec make a truly worthy contribution to the progress and prosperity of the country in general.

Therefore, the Quebec Legislature decided to levy, within the province, a provincial tax on personal income. Unquestionably, as agreed by all, it is a tax that the Canadian constitution authorizes Quebec to impose. Actually, this tax represents only approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax on personal income collected in the Province of Quebec, because, even though our provincial tax is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax, the exemptions provided by the provincial law materially reduce this proportion.

In short, the provincial tax represents approximately 10 per cent of the federal income tax collected from the taxpayers in the Province of Quebec and, by deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax, Ottawa will in fact receive about 90 per cent of the tax on personal income collected in the Province of Quebec.

The federal authorities assert that the province and the federal government have concurrent rights of taxing personal income. About 10 per cent to the province and about 90 per cent to Ottawa, is an extraordinarily reasonable concurrence, you will no doubt agree. Furthermore, it should be recalled that our provincial income tax is used entirely for purposes of education and hospitalization, public health and social legislation among others, in and for the province.

Since the end of the last war—I merely mention facts without details or appraisal—some provinces have abandoned to the central authority certain important sources of provincial income in return for payment by Ottawa of federal subsidies to these provinces.

We have said on several occasions that the Province of Quebec wishes to retain its powers of taxation and does not wish to exchange them for subsidies. We consider it our duty to maintain such an attitude.

We are ready to enter into a really temporary agreement which would grant to the parties concerned a further extension of time to arrive at a definite arrangement. The federal authorities are of the opinion—and we respect their opinion without sharing it—that they have the right to impose taxes in one province to assist certain provincial projects in another province. The Province of Quebec has always been and is still ready to co-operate reasonably and in a constitutional manner for the welfare and prosperity of the other provinces of the Canadian confederation.

It is beyond question that the revenue derived from taxes levied by Quebec, including the provincial tax on personal income, and which would be affected by the arrangements arrived at between Ottawa and the other provinces, it is beyond question, I say, that such revenue of the Province of Quebec represents much smaller sums than the amount offered by Ottawa to the Province of Quebec in its proposal to exchange important sources of provincial revenue for federal subsidies.

In short, the other provinces and the federal authorities, in our humble opinion, cannot reasonably object to the proposal we are making; first, because the amount collected by the province is financially less than the grant offered by the federal government and, secondly, because, as everyone agrees, the province is only exercising an indisputable right. It seems to us only elementary justice that the federal authorities should deduct from their tax on personal income paid to Ottawa by the taxpayers of Quebec, the amount of the provincial income tax which only after all represents a small fraction of the federal tax.

It is our profound conviction that the taxing powers which belong to the Province of Quebec must be exercised by the province. These powers, which spring from dearly acquired rights and freedom, are indispensable to responsible government; they are also essential if the province is, freely and in accordance with its religious and national traditions, to exercise its rights and fulfil its obligations, amongst others, those pertaining to the vital fields of education and hospitalization.

In order to reach an agreement concerning the deduction of our provincial tax, we are ready to delete from our Act authorizing a provincial tax on personal income the statements, in the preamble to the effect that the province has a prior right in the matter of direct taxation.

Further, we shall give effect, by Order in Council, to the decision we have taken, a couple of months ago, with a view to making the tax payable to Quebec on undistributed income and dividends consistent with the Federal Act. In other words, by virtue of such amendment, the province will only get 15 per cent of the rates authorized by the Federal Act in such cases.

Our provincial tax Act on personal income is for a period of three years, that is to say, for each of the calendar years 1954, 1955 and 1956; we suggest that an agreement to be arrived at between Ottawa and Quebec should be for the same period.

The Quebec Government wishes earnestly to reach an amicable settlement of this problem, and we express the hope that the above-mentioned provincial proposals will be favourably received by the federal authorities.

As I wrote you on October 11th, "if you decide to call a Canadian intergovernmental conference at Ottawa, we will be happy to attend and we will not hesitate to defer our parliamentary work should this conference take place during the session of our legislature".

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) M. L. DUPLESSIS

The Honourable Maurice L. Duplessis, Q.C., LL.D.,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

Dear Mr. Duplessis:

Pursuant to our telephone conversation of Wednesday November 3rd concerning your letter received the day before, I wish to inform you that I am having statistics compiled by our officials of the Department of Finance, with a view to determining what would result, as regards deductions, from the fact that, to establish the taxable income under the Federal Act and your own Act, the amount of such taxable income would be, for all single taxpayers, $500.00 less under the Quebec Act than the Federal Act and, for all married taxpayers, $1,000.00 less.

Possibly, your officers have already prepared compilations to that effect, and if such were the case, it might be a good thing if we were to agree to their contacting ours, so as to prevent the possibility of misunderstanding which would affect the governing rules to be applied in order to eliminate double taxation.

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. St-Laurent,

I reply as soon as possible to your letter dated November 5th and which was delivered to my office the day before yesterday.

We would be pleased to supply the particulars mentioned in your letter with respect to the effect of the said deductions.

Our Minister of Finance, the Honourable Mr. Gagnon, is presently taking a few days' holiday. If the officers of the Federal Department of Finance, who are compiling the statistical tables to which you refer in your letter, wish to get in touch with my executive assistant, Mr. Emile Tourigny, Q.C., and indicate to him the exact information they wish to obtain concerning the provincial exemptions, the reply will be forwarded with all possible dispatch.

Kindly accept, Mr. Prime Minister, my best regards.

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, January 14, 1955

The Honourable Maurice L. Duplessis, Q.C.,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

Since receiving your letter of November 1st, my Colleagues and I have considered at length the problem raised by the Quebec income tax and by the fact that the taxpayers having to pay it remain subject also to the federal tax.

This is, of course, an inevitable consequence of two jurisdictions exercising their concurrent rights to tax the incomes of the same persons. The only way you suggested to avoid the effect of double taxation upon the taxpayers of Quebec is for us to deduct from the federal tax on the income of each individual an amount equivalent to the amount which he is required to pay as the provincial tax.

In your letter, you state that the provincial tax "represents only approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax on personal income collected in the Province of Quebec because, even though our provincial tax is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax, the exemptions provided by the provincial law materially reduce this proportion". In this quotation from your letter, you refer to two different aspects of the provincial law. When you state that the Quebec tax represents approximately 10 per cent of the federal tax you compare the yield of the provincial tax to the amount produced by the federal tax in the Province of Quebec.

When you say that your tax "is apparently calculated to be 15 per cent of the federal tax", you explain this percentage by referring to the scale of exemptions granted by your law. This scale is such that it does not subject to your tax all the Quebec taxpayers who are obliged to pay the federal tax. In order to obtain an amount corresponding to 10 per cent of the amount yielded by the federal tax, it has been necessary to fix, for those who have to pay your tax, a higher rate than if you had distributed the burden over all those we tax.

Provincial legislatures have, like the federal Parliament, the right and the responsibility to distribute the burden of their taxes on their taxpayers in whatever way seems most appropriate to them. This is a right and a responsibility which is the same for all provinces, and none of them can be compelled to conform with the course of action followed elsewhere. Whatever differences there may be in the rules adopted by the different provinces, the federal law must be the same everywhere and it must be such as to leave the federal government with the revenues needed to fulfil its national responsibilities.

At present the federal law allows every Canadian taxpayer having to pay a provincial personal income tax to claim a deduction up to 5 per cent of his federal tax. This method of deduction raises certain administrative difficulties and, what is more serious, it makes the real incidence of the provincial tax depend on the terms of the federal law and makes the total amount deducted from the federal tax depend on the terms of the provincial law. Instead of deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax, we intend to propose to Parliament a reduction of the federal tax for all taxpayers of a province having a provincial tax, whether or not they have to pay the provincial tax. Thus, the taxpayers of such a province will receive the benefit of the total amount of the reduction in the federal tax and the federal and provincial authorities will be able to determine, independently of one another, in what way and to what extent their taxpayers will be subjected to their respective taxes.

The 5 per cent deduction allowed at present by the federal law was fixed in 1946. Since that time, two changes have occurred. In the first place the rates of the federal tax have been reduced with the result that there has been a corresponding reduction in the amount represented by the 5 per cent. In addition, the tax rentals paid by the federal Government to the provinces under the tax agreements have been rising as a consequence of the increase in the population and in the national product.

Pending the results of a new federal-provincial conference, we propose therefore to ask Parliament to amend the federal income tax law in order to grant a reduction of 10 per cent to all taxpayers of any province where a provincial income tax is levied whether or not all these taxpayers have to pay the provincial tax. We will recommend that this amendment apply to the years 1955 and 1956. At the same time, we will ask Parliament to release from its present agreement any province which would prefer this new arrangement and I am immediately so informing the other Premiers.

Moreover, we feel it would be reasonable to make the new percentage apply to taxpayers who have been in fact subjected to two taxes on their 1954 income. We intend, therefore, to propose that the taxpayers who will have paid provincial income tax for 1954 be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax.

We hope that this action on our part will encourage your Government to act in the same spirit and that we will have, on both sides, helped to prepare the atmosphere for useful and fruitful work during the next federal-provincial conference.

In any event, we would have had to meet before the end of 1955 to discuss the fiscal relations of the years which will follow the expiry of the present tax rental agreements. We feel that it might be appropriate to begin the new conference at an earlier date, if that is possible. Upon my return from the Commonwealth meeting in London, towards the middle of February, I intend to communicate with the Premiers of all the Provinces with a view to working out arrangements for a conference and fixing a date for it.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, January 14, 1955

The following letter sent to all Provincial Premiers with the exception of the Premier of Quebec

My dear Premier:

You will no doubt have learned from the press that I have been in communication with the Premier of Quebec about the situation created for personal income taxpayers in that province resulting from the imposition of a provincial income tax applicable in the years 1954, 1955 and 1956.

Before this provincial tax was imposed, the situation in Quebec was that the income taxpayers of that province were paying federal taxes at the same rate as other Canadians although the people of Quebec were not receiving the financial advantage for their provincial services that the people of the other provinces were receiving through the tax rental agreements.

Since the imposition of the provincial tax many of the personal income taxpayers in Quebec are required to pay higher personal income taxes than other Canadians, and payments under the tax rental agreements are still unavailable to the people of that province, because the government of the province preferred, as was its right, not to conclude an agreement.

At the time the provincial tax was imposed, the provincial authorities suggested publicly that the total amount of the tax paid to the province should be allowed by the federal authorities as a tax credit against the federal income tax.

If the federal government had accepted this suggestion, we would have felt obliged to make the same concession to any other province, and this would have meant that the effective rate of federal taxation in each province would have been set by the provincial authorities and would have differed from one province to another. We felt that the federal law must be uniform in its application in all provinces.

We did indicate, however, that the federal government was not wedded to the principle of tax rental agreements to the exclusion of any better alternative arrangement if one could be found. At the same time, we made it clear that the present government had no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces, whatever their tax base, to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation. That is the foundation of the policy of the federal government.

I had a meeting with the Premier of Quebec at his request in October and he indicated, at that time, that he was considering making certain amendments to the provincial tax law which he hoped might make some temporary arrangement possible. My colleagues and I felt it was our duty to make every effort to find some alternative to the tax rental agreements which would preserve the fundamental objective of those agreements which I have mentioned and at the same time be more acceptable to all provincial governments.

We are not yet in a position to propose an alternative to the tax rental agreements which we believe would be generally satisfactory and, as the agreements still have two years to run, we felt that, meanwhile, we should propose a stop-gap arrangement which, without being unfair to the other provinces, would reduce the burden of double taxation placed on many of the income taxpayers in the province of Quebec.

I have already indicated that we could not meet the suggestion of the Quebec authorities and allow the whole of their provincial income tax to be deducted from the federal tax, unless we were prepared to accord a similar right to any other province.

It is our view that whatever differences there may be in the tax laws adopted by the different provinces, the federal laws must be the same everywhere and must be such as to leave the federal government with the revenues needed to fulfil its national responsibilties.

At present the federal law allows every Canadian taxpayer having to pay a provincial personal income tax to claim a deduction up to 5 per cent of his federal tax. This method of deduction raises certain administrative difficulties and, what is even more serious, it makes the real incidence of the provincial tax depend on the terms of the federal law and makes the total amount deducted from the federal tax depend on the terms of the provincial law. Instead of deducting the provincial tax from the federal tax we intend to propose a reduction of the federal tax for all taxpayers of a province having a provincial tax, whether or not they have to pay the provincial tax. Thus, the taxpayers of such a province will receive the benefit of the total amount of the reduction in the federal tax and the federal and provincial authorities will be able to determine, independently of one another, in what way and to what extent their taxpayers will be subjected to their respective taxes.

The 5 per cent deduction allowed at present by the federal law was fixed in 1946. Since that time, two changes have occurred. In the first place, the rates of the federal tax have been reduced with the result that there has been a corresponding reduction in the amount represented by the 5 per cent. In addition, the tax rentals paid by the federal government to the provinces under the tax agreements have been rising as a consequence of the increase in the population and in the national product.

Pending the results of a new federal-provincial conference, we propose, therefore, to ask Parliament to amend the federal income tax law in order to grant a reduction of 10 per cent to all taxpayers of any province where a provincial income tax is levied whether or not all these taxpayers have to pay the provincial tax. We will recommend that this amendment apply to the years 1955 and 1956. At the same time, we will ask Parliament to release from its present agreement any province which would prefer this new arrangement.

Moreover, we feel it would be reasonable to make the new percentage apply to taxpayers who have been in fact subjected to two taxes on their 1954 income. We intend, therefore, to propose that income taxpayers who will have paid a provincial tax for 1954 be allowed a deduction up to 10 per cent of their federal tax.

I shall be glad to know at your convenience whether your government would wish to be released from the tax rental agreement in order to take advantage of the proposed new arrangement for 1955 and 1956.

It had always been understood that it would be necessary to hold a federal-provincial conference before the end of 1955 to discuss fiscal arrangements for the years which will follow the present tax rental agreements. In the light of recent developments it might be the desire of the provincial governments to have this conference held at an earlier date.

I shall accordingly communicate with you again shortly after my return from the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meeting in London towards the middle of February with a view to working out arrangements for a conference at a time which will be satisfactory to all governments concerned.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT

NARCOTIC DRUG TRAFFIC

INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, before the orders of the day are proceeded with I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for certain information. It will be remembered that at the last session some honourable senators, including myself, took part in a discussion in this chamber about Canada's increasing traffic in opium and narcotic drugs. At that time it was proposed that perhaps this year the Government would agree to the appointment of a special committee to inquire into this distressing problem. The traffic in opium and narcotic drugs has got completely out of hand in the city of Vancouver, and the matter is now so serious that I would ask the Leader to ascertain right away if the Government will give consideration to setting up a special committee to examine into this whole problem.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in a few minutes I expect to take part in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and at that time I shall have something to say in reply to the question just raised by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid).

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I at the outset join with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in congratulating the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of this motion. We had expected to hear outstanding addresses by both these young honourable senators—young at least in the number of years in which they have served in the Senate —and we were certainly not disappointed.

The mover, the honourable senator from Victoria, delivered an address which applied for the most part directly to the great province of British Columbia, but a good deal of what she said could be applied to Canada's other provinces. The honourable lady has had a long experience in public life, and enjoys the distinction of being the only woman in the Commonwealth who has held office as Speaker of an elected legislative body. That is indeed an outstanding distinction. Because of her wide experience we knew that we would receive an address of the type which she delivered.

The seconder of the motion, the honourable senator from Lauzon, has also had considerable experience in public life. It was my privilege to enter the House of Commons on the same day that he did, and it was also my very good fortune to leave that house on the same day as he. I was very happy in my association with him there. He always took an active part in the work of the Commons, and I know that he will be active in the work of this chamber. The honourable senator represented his province—la belle province de Québec—with distinction in the present debate, and we look forward with pleasure to further addresses from him from time to time.

May I also join with the Leader of the Opposition in congratulating His Honour the Speaker on the splendid arrangements which he provided, and the hospitality he extended, when our beloved Queen Mother visited us in November last. As the Leader of the Opposition well said, it was an occasion on which all the arrangements were perfect. It was, indeed, an occasion we shall never forget. I feel that we were all very fortunate to be members of the Senate and so to have the privilege of gathering together on that memorable Saturday afternoon for luncheon with the Queen Mother, whom we all love deeply.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I also wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his kind references to me. If he has enjoyed associating with me in the work of this house, I can assure him that I have enjoyed my association with him; and I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to express publicly my deep appreciation of his many courtesies.

The year 1954 was a very happy year for me. I have not forgotten the friendly welcome honourable senators accorded to me when I was summoned to the Senate, nor the co-operation I received from them throughout the year. I shall look forward to an equally happy time during 1955, and I hope all honourable senators present will be able to share my happiness here for many years to come.

The Leader of the Opposition said that he does not always agree with my remarks. Well, neither do I always agree with what he says, but I always enjoy the way he says it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He speaks very well indeed, and although he does not hesitate to drive his points home, he does it in a way we can all understand and appreciate; for when he has finished speaking no one can have any doubt as to how he feels about the matters dealt with.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me to obtain information regarding the employment situation in Canada. I find that a news release issued today shows that in the week ending December 11, 1954, a total of 5,167,000 people held jobs, which was 36,000 fewer than in November, but 51,000 more than a year earlier. That is a condition about which we in Canada can be justly proud.

It is true that there are some unemployed persons; we all regret it and I do not make light of it. It is a serious matter for anyone to be out of work, and I am sure the Government and all of us are trying to do what we can to see that unemployment is kept as low as possible. I would point out that it is not as high today as some people would have us believe.

The present percentage of unemployment is 4·6; that is to say, of every 100 employable people in Canada, between four and five are out of work, including people who are moving from one job to another. In December, 1953, the percentage was 3·6; that is, between three and four out of every 100 employable persons. The present percentage, I admit, is substantial, but it must be remembered that there is never 100 per cent employment. Even during the war years, when there was an acute shortage of workers, 2 per cent of the employable labour force, or some 90,000 people, were unemployed.

As I have said, none of us like to see unemployment and we hope that all who are employable will be able to obtain work. And I repeat that the Government is doing all in its power to insure as full employment as possible.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would the honourable leader allow me to ask a question? Has he a breakdown of the figures showing the number of married women registered as unemployed who have husbands and homes?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I did not expect to be asked that question, and I regret that I am not prepared to answer it.

The Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in his address spoke about the heavy taxation in Canada and emphasized his wish that the level of taxation be reduced, especially for certain classes of our people. I ask honourable senators, who of us would not like to have our taxes reduced? I think we all share in my honourable friend's wish. But when we compare our tax rates with those of other countries we find that "high taxation" is a comparative expression, for at least certain classes of our people pay a lower rate of tax than that paid in any other country.

The honourable Leader of the Opposition referred especially to the burden of taxation upon persons with an income of about $3,000. I have taken the trouble, honourable senators, to look up the records and to get a statement of the tax rates in other countries. This is what I found. A married taxpayer with an income of $3,000 pays in Canada a personal income tax of $150, in the United States $300, in the United Kingdom $577, in Australia $356, and in New Zealand $300. In all those countries the taxation of a married person in that income bracket, without dependents, is at least twice, and in one case almost four times, as much as it is in Canada.

I have the taxation figures for other brackets of income in the countries to which I have referred, and if honourable senators would like to have the information made available to them I would be glad to place the complete table on the record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This is the table to which I refer:

All income is assumed to be in the form of salary or wages.

Canada: Tax at 1954 rates—Old Age Security Tax is shown in brackets. No deduction has been made for possible medical expenses or charitable donations.

United States: Tax at 1954 rates—Old Age and Survivors Insurance contribution of 2% of wages or salary with a maximum of $72 is shown in brackets. It is assumed that taxpayers take advantage of income splitting and use optional standard deduction. Nothing is added for state taxes.

United Kingdom: Tax at 1953-54 rates—Contribution of a male employee under the National Insurance Act is shown in brackets.

Australia: Tax at 1954-55 rates—The income tax and social services contribution is a combined levy in Australia.

New Zealand: Tax at 1954-55 rates—Social Security charge levied at the rate of 7½% with no personal exemptions is shown in brackets.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the huge amount of money being raised by taxation. Of course, huge sums have to be raised by taxation to meet our heavy expenses. I am sure that my honourable friend would not want to do away with family allowances, with old age security after seventy, or pensions between sixty-five and seventy, on the means test, or pensions for blind and disabled persons, or unemployment insurance, or any of the other social security measures for which we have made provision. If enough people want to abandon these benefits, it is possible that taxation might be substantially reduced; but I am satisfied that the members of this body and the Canadian people generally wish our social legislation to remain on the statute books.

Honourable senators will perhaps be interested in a breakdown of the revenue dollar during the year 1953-54. The budgetary revenues for that year were $4,396 million, and including old age security receipts of $293 million, we had a total revenue of $4,689 million. On that basis of revenue the breakdown of the spending of each tax dollar was as follows:

Public debt charge, 11 cents; Subsidies, tax rental payments to provinces, 7 cents; Defence, 40 cents; Veterans' Affairs, pensions, hospitals, etc., 5 cents; Health and Welfare, social security, including old age security payments, 18 cents; Resources and Development, 5 cents; Transport and Communication, 6 cents; General government, 6 cents; Other unclassified expenditures, 2 cents.

The total paid out on account of old age security during the year was $339 million.

Our heaviest expenditure is for defence, but we have large expenditures also for other items I have mentioned. We do not want to reduce our social security payments. And if we want to survive, we cannot reduce our defence expenditures. Therefore I say that although we all wish it were possible to reduce taxation, no one has yet devised a way of doing so.

Honourable senators, I am frequently asked if we could not have more legislation introduced in the Senate. I find that that question has been discussed from time to time in this house. The most comprehensive debate on the subject that I have been able to find in the records was initiated by the Honourable Charles Murphy, in the year 1934.

In that debate he spoke to the following notice:

> That he will call the attention of the Government to the work of the Senate and to the efforts made by the Senate to secure the initiation in this House of Government measures, and will inquire if it is the intention of the Government to introduce in the Senate at an early date any of the legislation indicated in the Speech from the Throne.

He opened his remarks by giving a brief history of the intentions of the framers of the constitution as to the work which should be performed by the Upper House of Parliament. He then proceeded to outline the various efforts made by the Senate over the years to secure a larger share of government business than was usually allotted to it by the governments of the day. The first effort cited is that undertaken during the first Parliament after Confederation, and he quotes the report of the committee set up in 1868 under the chairmanship of Sir Alexander Campbell to inquire into this very subject. May I be permitted to read a brief extract from the committee's report, which was presented on May 7, 1868:

> The committee would observe that independently of financial measures which begin as of course in the House of Commons, the representative character of that house, and the system of responsible government, render it expedient that some other classes of important bills should be first discussed there; the committee are, nevertheless, of opinion that it would be quite possible to originate a much larger number of bills in the Senate than has hitherto been the practice in the Legislative Councils of any of the provinces of the Dominion. It appears to the committee that it must rest chiefly with the Government of the day to accomplish this; the business of Parliament will hereafter, the committee believe, be principally in connection with public measures, and in the hands of the Government, and it will depend upon the ministers themselves in which house of Parliament many of these measures shall originate. The committee think that the public interest in the more thorough consideration of legislative measures, as well as in the dispatch of business, would be much better served by a persistent effort on the part of the Government of the day to originate in the Senate as many of their measures as the law and usage of Parliament will permit.

The report was unanimously adopted by the Senate, but nothing further seems to have been done about it until 1874. In that year a joint committee of both houses was set up to consider whether any facilities could be provided for the dispatch of business in Parliament. Nothing practical seems to have been accomplished by that committee.

It has been generally agreed that money bills should originate in the Commons. Sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act read as follows:

> 53. Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.
> 54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

Now, I do not intend at this time to go into any discussion as to the correctness of the procedure under which money bills cannot be introduced in the Senate. I think we are all pretty well agreed that where an appropriation of money is made the bill must originate in the House of Commons, with the approval of the Governor General. There are also other bills which we might say have financial implications or political significance, and it is my opinion that such bills should also originate in the other house.

There is another aspect, which the late Senator Dandurand spoke about in the debate of 1934. He said:

> I refer to the fact that the Senate is considered to be a revising body and as such has played its part since its inception. The initiation of bills in this Chamber would change that situation and make the House of Commons the revising body. Furthermore, arguments have been advanced against the abandonment by the Senate of the position of a court of appeal in regard to legislation coming from the Commons. As a matter of fact, to judge from the statements made by the Fathers of Confederation, and by Sir John Macdonald prior to Confederation, and cited by my honourable friend from Russell (Hon. Mr. Murphy), we have been appointed mainly for the purpose of giving sober second thought to proposed legislation, and, of course, if we originated legislation and passed it on to the House of Commons for approval, we should not be fulfilling that function.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But we would still be sober!

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, still sober.

Notwithstanding all that has been said against the introduction of certain legislation in the Senate I did, at your request, bring to the attention of the Government the fact that this house would be pleased to have more legislation introduced here in the first instance. Honourable senators will observe from the House of Commons Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for Monday, January 10, that the Government gave notice of 19 bills. Sixteen of those are what we would call money bills and so could not be introduced in the Senate. The remaining three are not money bills, but have what I might call a political significance. One of them is an Act respecting the construction, operation and maintenance of international river improvements. Another is an Act to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas. The third is an Act to Amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Honourable members will notice from our Orders of the Day that I was successful in having introduced in this house five of the eight bills which could not be considered money bills. I trust that, as the session goes along, we shall continue to have introduced here measures which are not money bills and have no political or financial implications.

An honourable senator suggested last year that a committee be set up to consider the relationship between the federal Government, the municipality of the City of Ottawa, and adjoining municipalities. Ten years ago a joint committee appointed for this purpose made a worth-while contribution to the subject, which is of vital importance not only to the municipality of Ottawa and the adjoining municipalities but to others throughout Canada. I took to Council the representations of this house, and, as appears in the Speech from the Throne, a proposal will be made to the Senate to set up a committee similar to the one appointed ten years ago. I am sure that in this respect, once again honourable senators will make a great contribution on a really important subject.

I come now to the question which was raised this afternoon by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). I have not forgotten the very forceful and notable addresses which were made in this house last year in connection with the narcotic drug traffic, and that it seemed to be the wish of honourable senators that a special committee of this house should be set up to consider this very important issue. A review of the drug and narcotics situation as it affects Canadians, and particularly young people, is very necessary and urgent. There is no need to dwell on the evils of the drug traffic. All honourable senators, I am sure, realize however that the question is not only one of punishment; it is also one of treatment of those addicted, and the prevention of further exposure of our young people to this pernicious traffic. In my opinion, the place to attack this problem is at the source, by concentrating on the prevention of distribution. It was remarked in this chamber last year, to point the need of an inquiry into this problem, that narcotic drugs are an evil which destroys not only men's bodies but also their souls. It is a great menace in most large commercial centres, more particularly the sea-coast cities, and the alarming fact is that the traffic is on the increase. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police annual report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1954, states:

> The illicit traffic in narcotic drugs continues to reflect a steady increase. 507 arrests were made this year compared with 495 for the previous period. This total is a record high for several years.
> Drug addiction is causing serious concern to enforcement authorities and the problem of the "repeat offender" is giving rise to a growing realization that addiction is the outward manifestation of social and medical conditions which enforcement authorities alone are not competent to cope with. The cycle of periodic arrest, subsequent conviction and imprisonment of the addict, has failed to make any appreciable progress towards correcting this situation and it would seem that any real hope for positive, long term results in dealing more effectively with the drug addict can only be achieved by the combined efforts of medical, social and enforcement bodies.

It will be recalled that in this chamber last session the suggestion was made that, in view of the seriousness of the condition which exists in so many places throughout Canada, this house should set up a special committee to consider the whole problem.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), in his speech yesterday, suggested that there should be representatives from the Opposition parties at the United Nations meetings. I was always under the impression that the Opposition parties were represented at these gatherings—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: —so I reviewed the records from 1950 to 1954. I found that in 1950 the Opposition had four representatives: Messrs. Coldwell, Graydon, Higgins and Low.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But not from the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: From Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I believe I am the only member of the Conservative party in this house who ever went to the United Nations meetings as a delegate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, as I have stated, in 1950 four members of Opposition parties attended.

Hon. Mr. Reid: From the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Surely, honourable senators, Parliament includes the House of Commons. In 1951 the Opposition parties had one representative, Major General Pearkes. In 1952 there were four Opposition representatives: Messrs. MacLean, Graydon, Stewart and Beyerstein. In 1953 there were two: Messrs. Coldwell and Macdonnell. Last year, also there were two, namely Messrs. Gillis and Michener. My honourable friend says that the Opposition in the Senate had no representatives. That may be so, but the Senate itself has been represented each year at the gatherings. I see no reason for assuming that Canada will not continue to be represented at United Nations meetings by members of the Senate and members of the various parties in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I interrupt my honourable friend to ask a question? Since 1946 how many of these representatives have been official delegates or alternates at meetings of the United Nations?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not that information at hand.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I suggest to you that none have been.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I could obtain that information, but I think I have shown conclusively that Opposition parties in Canada's Parliament have always been represented at gatherings of the United Nations.

In his address the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) said that the world is no more secure today than it was a year ago, and so on. I am amazed that the honourable gentleman should be such an apostle of gloom. Although world conditions are still in a serious state, I think some progress in the right direction is being made. I believe that January 1 of this year marked the first occasion in a long time, when a new year has been ushered in without a fighting war.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: We have one now.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so, but I am speaking about the first of January. This means that we have had at least one spell when there has been no fighting. If there is a fighting war on now, I am hopeful there will be more and longer spells of non-fighting and that finally there will never again be war. I think we are getting nearer to that goal. In Indo-China the fighting has ceased, and an International Supervisory Commission has been set up to assist towards stabilizing conditions in that country. In Southeast Asia a counterpart of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for defence has been founded in what is known as SEATO—the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization. Last year a meeting was held in Ceylon by a further group of South Asian countries not within the framework of SEATO but which have as their objective the perpetuation of peace in that area. In Europe we have seen the rapprochement of France and Germany. For the time being—and, I hope, for ever—these countries have settled their dispute over the Saar.

I am not endeavouring to say that we are living under such conditions now that we can sit back and not worry about the possibility of war. On the contrary, I do feel we need to concern ourselves about it, but at the same time I sincerely believe that men are turning their minds, however slowly it may be, to bringing about conditions of lasting peace. I feel that what is now taking place throughout the world confirms my opinion. If we can remain strong militarily; if our navy, air force and army can remain strong; if those who act for us in the councils of the nations will not become tired by continual talk, talk, talk; if they will be patient, as they have been in the past, then I am hopeful that in the not too distant future the atomic energy which is being developed today for destructive purposes will be developed instead for purposes of peace. The aim of every nation should be to develop and use atomic energy for the benefit of all mankind—for peace, not for war.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. J. J. Duffus: Honourable senators, may I ask your indulgence to discuss a matter of national importance, namely, that a fitting memorial be erected to commemorate the production, in 1842, on the farm of the late David Fife, in my native township of Otonabee, of Red Fife Wheat, which was for more than sixty years the standard variety of spring wheat grown in Canada.

(Translation):

Honourable senators, may I repeat in French that I would like the Senate to discuss a matter of national importance, namely, the erection of a memorial to commemorate the production, in 1842, on the farm of David Fife, in the township of Otonabee of Red Wheat, which was for more than sixty years the standard variety of spring wheat grown in Canada.

(Text):

It is not too much to say that David Fife's discovery revolutionized world wheat farming. Permit me to recall how this great discovery was made. Back in the early '40's of the 19th century David Fife built and lived in a log house with his wife and young family on his farm in Otonabee township in the county of Peterborough. The second building which Mr. Fife erected on his farm was a workshop. In this he made by hand all the shingles required to roof his barns and other out-buildings.

The next chapter in this interesting episode discloses the fact that unfortunately and under distressing circumstances the Fife home was burned to the ground. This made it necessary for Mr. and Mrs. Fife to take up their abode in the workshop, which was their home until they were able to afford a new one for themselves and their family.

David Fife was a tall, thoughtful Scotsman, at that time in his middle thirties, and although of modest bearing he was possessed of much native intelligence, constructive imagination and prophetic vision. He was destined to do more for Canada than perhaps any other man who ever lived in this country.

The romantic and intriguing story of the origin of Fife Wheat is inseparably connected with the history of Canada. In fact, it should be known in every classroom in this country. It kindles the imagination, and invites analogies of its importance by illustrating how Fife Wheat was given to Canada long before this young nation was ready to use or exploit it.

It is very difficult for one to picture what living conditions were like in that bushland part of Canada in the 1840's. Those were the ox-cart days of meagre transportation, and the log-cabin days of our social development, when the tallow candle was a symbol of the prevailing crude and scanty domestic comfort and convenience.

The price of existence of David Fife and his family was venture, vigorous struggle, loneliness, unremitting toil and, doubtless, little enjoyment of life. Educational facilities were limited. Even elementary schools were few and far between, and agricultural colleges and experimental farms were still undreamed of. Political institutions were at the colonial stage, with Confederation a quarter century in the future. Ontario was Upper Canada, engrossed in its political problems and slowly moving onward and upward from precedent to precedent toward responsible government.

However, under those primitive conditions, the ingenious brain and native intelligence of David Fife were at work planning means by which to improve his own condition and that of others. Obviously, he was of a practical turn of mind, and, realizing the defects of the only wheat then available in this country, he wondered whether somewhere in the world there might be a better quality of wheat, one which would mature earlier and be more immune to rust.

In the late fall of 1841 Mr. Fife left home to visit some friends in Glasgow, Scotland. While there a shipload of wheat from Danzig was being unloaded at a distillery. Mr. Fife took advantage of the opportunity and procured a small sack of wheat, which he brought home with him. Unfortunately, under the circumstances, there was nothing to indicate whether the grain it contained was of spring or fall variety.

However, in the spring, with confidence in God and inspired by the Biblical promise that seed-time and harvest shall not cease, Mr. and Mrs. Fife carefully, and no doubt prayerfully, planted the seed in a spot where a pile of logs had been burned the year before. Hopefully and patiently they waited. And how bitterly disappointed they must have been when, after anxious weeks, it became evident that most of the seed was of winter variety.

Fortunately, however, a few grains proved to be of an early spring variety, and five heads started to grow. Then suddenly, one day, high hopes were dashed by near disaster when one of Mr. Fife's oxen, quite unaware that in satisfying his own taste he was imperilling the future economic welfare of half a continent, devoured two of the heads of this miniature crop. In fact, it was only Mrs. Fife's keen eye and alertness in seeing the animal and driving it away that saved the remaining heads.

At maturity those three precious heads were harvested and hung up on a beam in the kitchen of David Fife's log home. In the spring the three heads were threshed in the palm of David Fife's hand, and the seeds, counted as carefully as if they were small pieces of gold, were planted. Under confident, intelligent and watchful care, they matured, and yielded wheat of a ten days' earlier spring variety which was more immune to rust, smut and frost damage than any wheat theretofore known in this country.

Thus, in 1842, the small area on David Fife's bushland pioneer farm in Otonabee township became the first, though primitive, experimental farm in Canada.

During several subsequent years the grain multiplied through successful and bountiful harvests. And, thanks to David Fife and Red Fife Wheat, Ontario eventually became a great wheat producing province. The salvation of struggling pioneers and the economic future of Canada were assured.

I said in the beginning of this speech that for more than sixty years Red Fife was the standard variety of spring wheat grown in Canada. I ask you now, honourable senators, what of those sixty-odd years? Had the farmers of Canada been compelled to get along without Red Fife Wheat throughout that period, the entire development of Canada would have been greatly retarded. It is impossible to imagine the course which events would have taken. I say to this honourable house that no one would venture to hazard a guess as to the great contributions David Fife's discovery has made to Canada and Canadians in all walks of life.

I emphasize these obvious truths: But for it there would have been no rush of settlers to the Prairie West, and no Sifton immigration. The year 1908 would have found no cities, such as Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon and Edmonton. The prairies at best would have been a ranching area. The buffalo would not have been displaced by herds of cattle, and agriculture would still have been an infant industry.

But, providentially, Ontario Red Fife Wheat found its way to western Canada, where eventually it became the all-important factor in rolling back the prairie grass and establishing tens of thousands of prosperous farmers and happy homes. It was the first and greatest contribution to the economic wealth of the Canadian west and other parts of Canada. It pushed the wheat boundaries of the prairie hundreds of miles to the north, and opened up vast areas of new country.

The rapid development and prosperity of the prairie provinces attracted there such able men as the late Viscount Bennett, Sir Frederick Haultain, Sir James Lougheed, the Honourable Dr. W. R. Motherwell, the Honourable Robert Forke, the Honourable Robert Weir, the Honourable Charles Stewart, the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the Right Honourable James G. Gardiner, the Honourable Thomas A. Crerar, the Honourable Charles A. Dunning, and others who have occupied some of the highest positions in this great land of ours.

For sixty-odd years after its discovery Red Fife Wheat piled up tremendous wealth for Canada and Canadians and helped to lay strongly and well the foundation of this great nation. And right up to 1905 this Otonabee farmer's wheat retained its supremacy over all other varieties in Canada. As many honourable senators know, a number of improved varieties of wheat were developed from Red Fife, such as Preston, Ladoga, Stanley, Ruby, etc. Last fall the Star-Phoenix of Saskatoon reported that a considerable quantity of Red Fife Wheat was planted in 1954, and that the results were just as satisfactory as from some of the newer varieties.

It was Marquis Wheat, a direct offspring of Red Fife, which made it possible to feed the Allied nations during the First World War, when the existence of not only this country but of democrcy itself was at stake and so many brave men made the supreme sacrifice for the sacred cause of liberty and justice. Indeed this splendid wheat which was bred from Red Fife enabled Canada to earn the proud title of "the granary of the world". However, Red Fife Wheat was a prime factor not only in developing the West and making Canada one of the world's chief grain producing countries, but also in establishing and expanding many cities and in building this relatively young land into a rich and powerful merchandising and industrial nation.

In support of that statement it is only necessary to mention some of the classes of industry whose existence and prosperity have been and are largely dependent upon the results achieved from Red Fife Wheat: Farm implements, binder twine, grain elevators, rail and water transportation systems, airborne traffic, mining, lumbering, pulp and paper, hydro-electric power developments, aluminum, cement, iron, steel, coal, telephone systems, motor cars, trucks and tractors, oil and gas wells, heating equipment, household electrical and gas appliances, packing houses, the grain trade, breweries, distilleries, flour milling companies, banks and other great financial institutions, insurance companies, etc. In fact, one could go on and include almost every major class of production and merchandising in this country, for the importance of Red Fife Wheat in the development of our economic life cannot be exaggerated, as Canada and Canadians have benefited by countless millions of dollars. In all humility, we must regard it as God's blessing to this country.

To put it another way: The economic blessing that accrued from Red Fife Wheat raised not only the prosperity and standard of Canadian agriculture, but likewise the status of the Canadian people as a whole. Undoubtedly it was as a direct consequence of the efforts and ingenuity of David Fife and his wife more than of anything else that the wheat supplies in this country in the last two years totalled over 983 million bushels, and that in 1953 Canada rose to the rank of the world's third greatest trading nation.

Such, honourable senators, was the heritage left by two humble souls, two noble tillers of the soil, who have long since passed away. God bless them. It was the gift of their hearts, of their loyalty and intelligence, of their ingenuity, of their faith, and of their hard and unremitting toil. And the world over, Canada's No. 1 spring wheat is renowned, providing a standard by which all others have been judged.

Marquis Wheat, a cross between Red Fife and Red Calcutta, for the development of which Charles Saunders was knighted, was first distributed in 1910, replacing Red Fife to a considerable extent. This fact, however, does not in any way detract from the greatness of David Fife's discovery. On the contrary, it emphasizes and enhances its greatness.

But, honourable senators, what of David Fife? Seriously, I repeat, what of David Fife? Has he not been just about the most forgotten man that ever lived in Canada? Apparently no one was sufficiently interested in his great discovery to honour him, except by a proposed cairn which was going to be placed on the side of the road at Concession 4, in Otonabee, in 1938, when I was a member of the House of Commons. To this I respectfully demurred, as being totally inadequate and unbecoming such an outstanding achievement and as a reflection on the farmers of Canada. And, honourable senators, not a stone was turned to mark the spot.

Incidentally, did David Fife have a laboratory in which to develop Red Fife Wheat, as did Dr. Saunders at the Dominion Experimental Farm from 1900 to 1910? Well, yes, in the kitchen of his home with a staff consisting of himself, his devoted wife and children gathered around the kitchen table year after year, during the long winter months, each taking plateful after plateful of Red Fife Wheat and deleting therefrom every scintilla of foreign matter and every inferior grain so that only the highest quality of seed was either planted or sold by David Fife.

David Fife was a God-fearing farmer, one whose innate characteristics were sincerity, honesty, application, and devotion. He was such a farmer as we read of in the Bible. In other words, he was one:

> Who drinks of the rills that flow from the hills,
> And the land that he tills is his own.
> He is happy and free wherever he be,
> And needs bow but to God alone.

Canada owes more to David Fife than anyone can tell, and it is time the debt was given national recognition. Indeed, it is an indictment of the whole country that it should be necessary at this late date to revive a movement for such recognition.

However, about three months ago a national organization, known as the David Fife Memorial Society, was convened for the purpose of carrying the movement for an appropriate memorial to a successful conclusion. It is intended to have the Society incorporated, and when this is done it will be known as "The David Fife Memorial Society Incorporated".

Honourable senators, I ask you frankly is it not our turn now to act in the spirit of sincere thankfulness and gratitude?

From the bottom of this vibrating heart of mine I express the hope that we may do our part now, for if we fail we shall be false to our traditions, untrue to the citizens of Canada generally, and unworthy of the name "good Canadians" Yes, unworthy of those pioneer men and women who came from lands across the seas, and who with little but their hopes, their hearts and their hands builded for themselves primitive homes in the wilderness, rolled back the forest, and fought the battle of life, leaving to us who have followed the task of making Canada as great as its unbounded possibilities.

The great Scots poet Robert Burns said that, once having put your hands to the plow, you must not turn back.

We realize that our daily deeds represent the furrows of our individual lives and that it depends upon each and every one of us how on our field will look when the last furrow is turned.

The David Fife Memorial Society, of which I am Chairman, is deeply desirous of seeing respect, justice and honour done where they are long past due. Therefore, I stand before you today unhesitatingly, confidently, with the single-minded purpose of presenting a humble request of nation-wide importance; namely, that the memory of David Fife at last be fittingly honoured.

To be more specific, my humble and sincere request and that of the David Fife Memorial Society is that a living memorial be erected to perpetuate the name of David Fife, in the form of a modern school and hall, both to be used for educational purposes.

The school, consisting of eight rooms, would give instruction in a variety of courses, including elementary agriculture, home economics, public speaking and the drama. The hall would be completely equipped with a library, and available for banquets, concerts, lectures, debates, farm forums, 4-H clubs, oratorical contests and other public gatherings.

I submit this memorial is of a very practical nature, one which would pay handsome dividends down through the years that lie ahead, to the end that future generations of Canadians might obtain a basic education that will fit them to follow in the footsteps of this early Canadian pioneer and benefactor.

At this time I wish to inform the house that our honourable and most respected colleague from East York (Hon. Mr. McGuire), who himself is a native son of Otonabee township, at a centennial dinner held in the city of Peterborough, in 1929, was the first man to recommend that a memorial be erected in honour of David Fife, and his enthusiasm for a memorial increases from day to day.

The Society has tentatively selected a site, containing eleven and a half acres, in Otonabee township, bordering on Canada's national highway, at the intersection of Concession four, and it is proposed to have this known henceforth as Fifeville. It is adjacent to the beautiful Indian River, about ten miles from the city of Peterborough, and within view of the acres upon which the famous Red Fife Wheat was grown.

Seven and a half acres of the site would be occupied by the school and hall, with plots for experimental purposes; and this portion would be enclosed by an ornamental fence along the front. An industrial-type fence would be erected around the other three sides, and the whole would be beautifully landscaped.

The remainder of the site would provide an ample area for outdoor sports—skating, hockey, baseball, tennis, swimming—and children's playgrounds; besides parking space —a very necessary adjunct, in these days— for more than a hundred motor cars, trucks and buses. The basement banquet room, the bleachers and the land adjacent thereto would be extensively used by junior farmers and for field days, judging courses, and so on.

The total cost of the completed project would not exceed $300,000. This figure includes the cost of moving the 145-year-old Fife log home to the memorial site. The Society feels that if this log home were as nearly as possible furnished as it was when occupied by the Fife family it would, in combination with the rest of the Memorial— the modern school and hall, and the grounds —prove a popular attraction for tourists. I am confident that this appropriate and reasonable proposal to honour the memory of David Fife will have spontaneous and generous support, for sentimental reasons as well as for the sake of justice and fair play. I am definitely of the opinion that the provinces, and thousands of institutions, industries, manufacturers, municipalities, department stores, wheat and stock farmers, etc., who have profited richly from the results of Red Fife Wheat would be delighted, and indeed I believe their hearts and minds would be gladdened, by an opportunity to contribute, according to their means.

Because we have proposed a memorial which in itself would be as practical as was the work on this sagacious pioneer, I feel doubly sure that our national appeal will be successful. I respectfully venture my sincere conviction and that of the David Fife Memorial Society that in all Canada there is scarcely a citizen, be he farmer or townsman, who, if familiar with the facts, would not be delighted to see erected at Fifeville this fitting memorial to one whose inestimable contribution to Canadian nationhood has too long gone unrecognized.

Therefore, very feelingly, and with implicit confidence, I suggest to honourable senators that they assist and seek the assistance of others from their respective provinces who would be happy to make contributions to help liquidate this 115-year-old debt which we Canadians owe and intend to pay by the erection of a memorial to adequately honour the name of this great Canadian. May I most humbly suggest that it is a patriotic and national responsibility.

I would further suggest that we most respectfully seek the assistance of our honourable colleagues in the House of Commons from each of the ten provinces in giving and obtaining contributions to help liquidate this debt in the same manner.

Cheques should be forwarded to the Honorary Treasurer, c/o The Royal Bank of Canada, Peterborough, Ontario, and be made payable to "The David Fife Memorial Society".

When the amount required is fully subscribed we shall immediately start making arrangements to prepare the site and erect the memorial, which we expect will be ready for the official opening during the latter part of the month of August this year.

Our plan, after the official opening, is to carry on for a week a series of varied programs of sports, tournaments, picnics, and so forth each afternoon, and a program of concerts, plays, speeches and oratorical contests each evening, and Divine services of thankfulness on Sunday.

Surely, surely, honourable senators, David Fife is truly to be numbered among those splendid pioneers and benefactors to whom we pay the grateful and often reverent tribute that "They builded better than they knew".

I am confident that this proper and reasonable proposal will have very generous support. And because the memorial would be as practical as was the great discovery of this sagacious pioneer, I feel doubly sure that our efforts will be successful.

If the people of Canada, who have so richly benefited from the discovery which David Fife gave to our country, concur in this plea for honouring his name, who can say but that within the walls of the David Fife Memorial Hall and School there may be planted seeds of intellect and of character, which, in due season, will yield bountiful harvests as valuable as those produced by Red Fife Wheat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Duffus: Referring to the matter upon which I have just spoken, may I have the privilege of suggesting that the proposal I have presented should be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It cannot be.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am not sure that the honourable senator from Peterborough West (Hon. Mr. Duffus) is in order. It is necessary that the house should have before it a written resolution incorporating the honourable senator's proposal.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE PETITIONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 6 to 16, dealing with petitions for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, moved that the reports be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

PRIVATE BILL

HURON AND ERIE MORTGAGE CORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. W. D. Euler: May I have the permission of the Senate to make a suggestion? Last Thursday I moved the first reading of a bill respecting The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation, a measure which explains itself. At that time I thought I might not be able to be present here on Tuesday or Wednesday of this week, although I desired to have second reading on one or other of these days, so I had it set down for tomorrow, Thursday. I wonder whether the house would indulge me—for reasons which seem to me reasonable and appropriate, since arrangements have been made by those who want to appear in support of the bill to bring it before the Banking and Commerce Committee next Wednesday—by permitting me to move second reading of the bill today? I realize that for this purpose I must have the unanimous consent of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator the unanimous consent of the Senate to his request?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I move, therefore, second reading of Bill G, an Act respecting The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation.

The purpose of the bill is readily understood. Briefly, it is to give the corporation authority to reduce the par value of its $100 shares to $20, so that any holder of a paid-up share of the value of $100 will receive five $20 par value shares. Some persons hold shares which are only partly paid up, and those who have shares on which $20 has been paid will receive one share.

The Huron and Erie Corporation is a company whose head office is in the city of London. It has a large branch in Toronto and, I believe, branches elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Haig: At Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable members know, I suppose, that this is one of our strongest and most reputable concerns in its special line of endeavour. The authorized capital is $10 million. If this bill should become law the authorized capitalization will remain at $10 million, but of this amount $5 million will be fully paid up: there will be no partly-paid shares. There will then be 500,000 authorized shares of the value of $20 each, of which 250,000 fully paid-up shares will be issued to the subscribers.

All the preliminaries and everything necessary to legalize the passing of this bill have been fully attended to. First of all, bylaw number 39 of the corporation was passed by the Board of Directors. Then a fully authorized meeting of the shareholders was held, at which more than two thirds of the shareholders were represented, and they voted unanimously in favour of the bylaw upon which this bill is based. Under this legislation the debenture holders are assured that any who so desire may have their debentures paid in full prior to maturity, provided they give notice to that effect.

The purpose of subdividing shares, which has become a very common practice, is to give them a wider distribution. This company's stock is selling at a very considerable premium over the par value of $100, and it has been thought that the proposed reduction in par value would make it possible for smaller investors to participate in ownership of the shares.

The bill has been approved by the Senate's Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. John F. MacNeill. It has also been approved by the Department of Finance, through Mr. MacGregor, the Superintendent of Insurance.

Possibly that is all the explanation required at present. As I said before, it has become quite a practice to subdivide shares. I think the best illustration of that was given during the revision of the Bank Act, at the last session of Parliament, when the shares of the banks were reduced to $10 par value.

Honourable senators, if the bill is given second reading I will move to have it referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) in support of this legislation. A son-in-law of mine is a very high official in the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation, and I would like him to feel that I at least know enough about his activities to warrant my doing this.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I ask the honourable senator from Waterloo a question? Are the debentures the only debt of the corporation? The reason I ask this question is that the bill proposes that the liability of the holders who have only paid $20 on each of their present shares shall be completely extinguished. All the creditors of the company are of course interested in that extinguishment, and some might object to it. So I should like to know if the debenture holders, who are being given the right to receive prepayment of their debentures if they so desire, are the only creditors of the corporation.

Hon. Mr. Euler: So far as I know, they are the only creditors.

Present shareholders will receive five shares in exchange for each fully paid-up $100 share, and one share in exchange for each of those on which they have paid only $20.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Euler, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

The Committee on Transport and Communications, (Chairman, Hon. Mr. Hugessen), quorum nine members.

On motions, made with leave, the reports were severally concurred in.

CIVIL SERVICE ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Marcotte, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Civil Service Administration, presented the committee's first report, recommending that its quorum be reduced to seven members, and moved with leave that the report be concurred in.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the adoption of this report I should like to make a few general remarks. It may be recalled by some honourable members that some years before the war I asked that an investigation be made into the administration of the Civil Service Commission. I am sure that my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) will remember that occasion. After making my speech on the subject in the Senate chamber I received as a visitor to my room the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission. I assured him that I did not want to start anything, that if anything was started it would be by the standing committee. Not ten minutes afterwards some officials of the Commission came to me and said, "For heaven's sake, Senator, keep quiet." I told them also that I did not want to start any trouble. Then a third member of the Commission came to me, and I told him the same. I was then, as I am today, a friend of the employees.

There is something wrong somewhere. I do not know what it is, but I am going to find out. I serve notice today on honourable members to that effect. We are going to find out about several things. I ask the indulgence of honourable senators, because what I am going to say will appeal to them, and I know that I will get support. Every year thousands of people outside the Civil Service are brought into the Service and given preference over experienced and capable employees. For referring to this I shall be criticized, of course.

The honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) is my friend, a man I very much like, and I know that he wants justice to be done. And justice should be done.

Honourable senators, I hope that when the committee meets there will be more than a quorum present. The matter will require consideration by all the members of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISING OF BRITISH EMPIRE GAMES—INQUIRY STANDS

On the notice by Hon. Mr. Reid:

That he will inquire of the Government:

1. What sum of money was paid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the exclusive rights of televising the British Empire Games held in Vancouver in 1954?

2. What was the total revenue received by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the sale of the television rights of films taken of the British Empire Games and sold to United States interests?

3. What percentage of Canadian television programs, as seen by the Canadian public, are produced or manufactured in the United States?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have endeavoured but so far have not been able to obtain the information requested by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). Therefore I would suggest that the inquiry stand.

The inquiry stands.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

DOCUMENTS ON ACCESSION TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). Will it be possible for members of the Senate to have copies of the agreements reached at Paris, the approval of which we probably shall have to consider next week? I know that copies of these agreements would be useful to me, as I am sure they would be to other members.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I can assure my honourable friend that I shall endeavour to obtain copies of these documents. I was under the impression that I had already tabled the documents, but I have not been able to confirm this from our Minutes of the Proceedings.

I notice that in the House of Commons there was tabled on the 10th of January a copy of the protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed at Paris on October 23, 1954, in English and in French, and also a copy of agreements relating to Germany concluded at Paris on October 23, 1954, in English and French.

I see no reason why I should not be able to obtain copies of these documents and have them distributed to members of this house.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: If they have been tabled in the House of Commons I daresay they will be printed in the Votes and Proceedings or Hansard of that house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They do not appear in Hansard. I am quite sure I can obtain them, though.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think we should have them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I quite agree.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an address in reply thereto.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, may I first of all congratulate the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address on their eloquence and on the material which they presented to this chamber.

The Speech from the Throne indicates that Canada is making progress toward improving conditions in the homes of the common people of this land; and that of course, in the last analysis, is the object of all our legislation. Owing to the kindness of the Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and members of this house I had the opportunity of visiting one protectorate nation within the Commonwealth of Nations that is not as fortunate as Canada. In the cities of that country you cannot step out on the street after dark with safety, and people travelling through the district always carry a loaded gun.

Kenya is a beautiful country. The scenery there is lovely, just like the scenery in a dream. But it is a troubled country. The trouble, which is so great that economic progress has stopped, is caused by the friction and distrust and cruel violence that one sees in many places there.

The hospitals in Kenya are serving the people reasonably well. The staff doctors and the staff nurses are mostly British, but among the pupil nurses, ward aides and orderlies there are of course a great number of coloured people, who are doing a really good work. Naturally, most of the patients are Africans; and among them, both adults and children, are many suffering from nutritional diseases. It is the custom in that country to nurse the children until they are two or three years old, and from then on their diet consists chiefly of bananas. This diet is lacking in proteins and vitamins and causes a series of disturbances to their bodies.

In one large hospital ward occupied by a considerable number of young men, the lady superintendent said that they all had been wounded in conflicts with the Mau Maus. There were some very sad cases of gun shot wounds, spinal injuries, and so on, which left those young men permanently paralyzed.

Then, going into another ward, she said that the patients there were all Mau Maus. Walking up and down the centre of that ward day and night is a man with a loaded rifle, because the Mau Maus are not trusted. However, the hospital authorities were giving them the same thorough, kind and scientific treatment that they were giving to the other patients.

For many years Kenya was the paradise of the big game hunter. The record of one big game hunter, Lord Delamere, appealed to me greatly. He was a soldier of fortune, and a giant in his day. He had a large ranch there, extending over 100,000 acres, and he spent a great fortune in trying to produce something on that equator ranch. He stocked it first with cattle and sheep, but they all died of some tick-carried disease. He then planted grain, but the crops were destroyed by rust. However, after long years of trial and error he made a notable contribution to the production of that country.

Lord Percival and possibly other Britishers, as well as Theodore Roosevelt, conducted big-game hunting expeditions into Kenya and killed many animals. Of course, the natives killed a large number of animals too. However, at the beginning of this century it came to be realized that the wild life of that country did not belong exclusively to the people of the present generation, that they only held it in trust, and should account for it to those who came after them. And so a number of very large areas were set aside as sanctuaries for wild animals.

We drove into the Nairobi Royal National Park one afternoon. As we entered we saw the skull and crossbones of a great prehistoric animal, with these words of warning beneath them: "Do not step out of the car." We saw that the houses of the wardens and the keepers were surrounded with sheets of tin and other metal in order to keep the lions from scratching into them. As we drove along we saw large herds of zebra in their native state. We saw giraffes reaching away up to nibble on the tender leaves of the tall trees. We saw, striding along close to the car, ostriches, with beautiful plumes, stepping along with all the dignity imaginable; and some baboons jumped right up on the running-board and then on the hood of the car. The large baboons were carrying little baby baboons in their arms and begging for food. Along the banks of the streams were many hundreds of hippos in groups of twelve to twenty, wallowing in the mud, eating grass and herbs. In one place the driver of our bus had to stop in order to let a herd of elephants, in their native state, pass.

And then the birds! birds we never saw in this country: the ibis, the Egyptian goose, the crane, the stork, and a great number of other birds,—colourful, active, not noticeably frightened—flying around in great flocks. One night we spent in a hut in Queen Elizabeth Park, and just across the channel the lions had killed a buffalo and were feasting on its remains.

Regarding the people of Kenya: there are about 30,000 Europeans, 90,000 Indians—that is, people from India—and five and a half million Africans. In Nairobi is a Moslem mosque, one of the most beautiful buildings I have ever seen; and at the end of the day, when "the sun's rim dips; the stars rush out: at one stride comes the dark", we could hear and see the priest giving his call to prayer from the turrets; and Arabs, of course, wherever they are, at that time kneel down and go through their ritual. The Indian population is largely engaged in trading. They control the entire retail business of the city, and are going to some extent into other occupations.

The Europeans, of course, have made the greatest progress. They have built the Owen Falls reservoir and dam, which was opened by our gracious Queen just a few months before our arrival. This great work is situated right at the source of the Nile river, at the point where the Nile flows out of Lake Victoria; and the dam will control the waters of the river which flow north more than a thousand miles through Egypt to the Mediterranean Sea. Lake Victoria is the largest natural reservoir in the world. The undertaking has accomplished much, and will prove a great blessing to the people all along the banks of the river. It will supply power for the textile factory, the furniture factory, and a number of other industries which are there to process the products of the country—sisal, cotton, tea, coffee, pyrethrum and other crops —for export.

Most of the Europeans, of course, drive English cars, although we saw a few Fords and General Motors automobiles. They live in good stone houses and seem to be very prosperous.

The five and a half million Africans live under very different conditions. To build a house they drive cedar posts into the ground to enclose a circle, and put on a grass roof; and they are well content to live in such habitations and carry on their ordinary occupations from them. For the greater part of the time they live outside, and go inside only to sleep. The women seem to do all the work. As one goes along the roads it is a common sight to see a woman marching along with purposeful gait, carrying on her head a large bundle of wood or a big basket of produce, and sometimes, also, a baby attached to her back by a blanket, while the man with her carries no burden, and possibly even rides a bicycle. A great many of the children are naked. The adults are scantily clad, perhaps with an old shawl or something of that kind pinned around them. Hotel waiters wear large white gowns with red or blue sashes; and some of the women, particularly the younger ones, are fond of dressing in gaudily coloured clothing.

Now to discuss the land. In driving from Nairobi, the most interesting place we stopped at was the great Rift Valley. The valley is an enormous geographical fault. It starts in the Middle East, extends to the Red Sea and continues through a large part of Africa. Standing at the edge of this valley you can look down two or three thousand feet and see the tops of trees and the roofs of houses. The inhabitants of the valley, which, where we surveyed it, was from twenty to thirty miles wide, own cattle, but about the only use they make of them is to insert a hollow needle in their necks and drain off the blood for drinking purposes.

Throughout our travels in Kenya we were greatly impressed with the beautiful flowers which grew everywhere. In the fields one sees acacia trees and Dandy flame trees covered with bright-coloured blossoms; and large and very colourful poinsettias in many places. Many cattle and goats are to be seen, the cattle with humps on their backs. Higher up in the mountains the plantations of tea and coffee, but the best-paying farm operation is the production of pyrethrum—that little flower whose blossoms are used all over the world to make insecticide. It so happens that, to pick the ripened beans of the coffee plant, the tender leaves on the tea plantations, and the blossoms of the pyrethrum a great deal of hand labour is necessary; and it is on these tasks that most of the natives are employed.

The natural scenery is very striking. One sees the Kenya mountains rising to a height of 17,000 feet, and in the distance the Mountains of the Moon, on which rest clouds in formations the like of which are seen nowhere else on earth. Altogether the land is one of striking beauty.

But it is a land of turmoil. I shall endeavour to explain some of the difficulties which are so evident in that country. In 1952 the Kenyan African Union drew up a petition and, as the country is a British Crown Colony and Protectorate, the petition was sent to the government in England. The petition alleged that a large area of the most fertile land in Kenya has been transferred to European residents without adequate compensation to the natives, who, because their own reserves were incapable of supporting them, were forced into the cities and towns to work for small wages as labourers.

On the other hand, it should be pointed out that the British occupation of Kenya was a great philanthropic achievement, and a review of conditions in that country prior to the occupation will disclose what has been accomplished. Before the turn of this century the slave trade was thriving in Kenya, the slaves being forced to drag heavy carts laden with produce from the inland centres to Mombasa on the coast. In those days there were many tribal wars, the victors taking the vanquished and selling them in bondage to the Arabs. The villages were also raided by huge Arab caravans, and at one time as many as 10,000 natives were captured as slaves, and the bones of another 10,000 were found along the caravan route. Conditions generally were terrible and the people suffered from periodic famines and pestilence. The natives did not produce their own food, and they did not know how to preserve what they obtained. The infant mortality rate was exceedingly high, and there were epidemics.

While it is true that a white reserve of 12,000 square miles was set aside, 9,000 square miles of it had never been occupied, and the remaining 3,000 were only partially occupied. In 1932 the whole situation was investigated by the Carter Commission, and it was thought that enough additional land had been provided for the natives. But, of course, the grievance still continues.

Over the years many changes have taken place in Kenya. The population has increased with the development of agriculture and the adoption of new health measures. Famines are a thing of the past and to a great extent tribal wars have been stopped. Kenya's advance was really spurred by a railway built by the British at a cost of £8 million from the coast to Uganda.

A system of plural marriages has also been responsible for increased population. When a boy becomes of a marriageable age his parents take some cattle and sheep and buy him a wife. After a young couple have been married for a number of years and have a few children, they decide that another wife should be acquired, and if the husband is a good provider he may have three or four wives in the same or separate huts; but the first wife always remains the queen bee, so to speak, and the subsequent wives are more or less her servants.

Conditions in Kenya have improved generally with the coming of the Europeans, but the natives claim that the latter have exploited them. They say, "The Europeans have taught us to close our eyes in prayer, but when our eyes are closed they take our land." The natives believe a good many things of this kind. While some European industrialists might have profited in Kenya, another class of European has gone into the country without any idea of making financial profit. I refer to the missionaries who have devoted many years of their lives to trying to teach Christianity to the natives. They have found this to be difficult, because the people are easily influenced by pagan superstitions, mysticism and witchcraft. It has been difficult to get enough white school teachers to go to Kenya, but despite this fact the number of children attending schools there increased from 100,000 in 1950 to 350,000 in 1954.

Welfare centres have been established, and we visited one which contained several fine buildings. The welfare workers follow the practice of inviting ten or twelve tribal chiefs to a centre to be taught some arithmetic, veterinary science, agriculture and carpentry. Each chief brings a wife who is taught how to do laundry work, cooking and housekeeping. The idea is that the chiefs and their wives will spread what they learn amongst their villagers.

Since 1952 many atrocities have been committed in Kenya by the Mau Maus, a segment of a large and warlike tribe known as the Kikuyu. Totalling anywhere from 100,000 to 200,000 in number, the Mau Maus are scattered in groups or cells in the hilly areas surrounding Nairobi, the capital city, and a type of warfare is constantly going on. The first morning we reached Kenya a man was shot by the Mau Maus right in the streets of Nairobi, and the next morning somebody discovered that the caretaker of the golf club had been murdered and that everything that had been lying around loose on the premises had been stolen. Over one weekend alone eighty-seven casualties were reported, and a little school in the mountains not far from Nairobi was burned and the teacher badly beaten, although he managed to escape.

The atrocities which have been perpetrated by the Mau Maus since 1952 disclose that a very definite pattern has been followed. In the first place, the Mau Maus are wreaking vengeance on what they call the moderates, native Africans who wish to settle their grievances by negotiation and without violence. The Mau Maus are particularly cruel to these people. They wish, of course, to drive the white people into the sea, and to burn the schools and destroy the cultivated fields. They hamstring and destroy the cattle whenever they can. They are anti-white, anti-religious and pro-primitive; it is their terrible oath that holds them together. I have seen it, and I can assure you that it is the most awful document you could imagine. When a man takes the Mau Mau oath he pledges that, if he is ordered to bring back the head of a white person and he fails to do so, he will give up his life. If he is called at night naked to do something, he will remain naked until that is accomplished, or give up his life. If someone steals from a European he will protect the thief. He will drive the whites out, and will steal arms, when he can, so as to hide the deed. He will not attend mission schools or religious services, and if his leader, Jomo Kenyetta, is arrested, he will follow up and release him. If he hears anything about Jomo Kenyetta he will at once tell the council about it. The oath binds the Mau Maus, because they are superstitious and fear to break it, and, consequently they are scattered throughout the hills, not living in one camp, but in different cells and at different places.

I had the opportunity, with two or three others, of going through a detention camp where there are 1,500 Mau Maus. The leader of the camp gave us a little talk, and then each of us was given a guide and allowed to go through the camp. The detainees were divided into two groups, those who would co-operate and those who would not. The co-operative ones would help in working on the roads and building huts and keeping things clean, in return for which they were granted a certain number of hours each day to attend school and try to receive an education. But about half of the inmates were unco-operative. As we walked along we could see them behind the bars; they wolfed their food, would not keep clean, were savage in action and appearance, and certainly savage in thought; they were detained in that camp because they had not yet come to trial. Only three centuries ago those people lived in absolute savagery; the women gathered food and bore the burdens, as well as bearing the children, while the men had the status of warriors, were the heroes of tribal wars, but would not settle down to work.

I wish to review the grievances of which the natives complain. First, there is the white reservation, of which I have already spoken. They claim further that they are discriminated against when appointments are made to the Civil Service, and that if Africans, who are partly educated, do get appointments their wages are very much lower than those paid to whites. It did seem to us that their wages were very, very low. They also claim that they cannot get effective representation in the Legislative Council. This Council is composed of 26 men to assist the Governor, who, of course, is appointed by the Colonial Secretary. The 5½ million blacks elect six representatives to the Council; the 90,000 Indians elect six, and the 30,000 Europeans elect fourteen. So it will be seen that the natives have not a very effective representation. Britain, however, is the protector of that country and must, of course, control its policy. Probably these people have a grievance, but if so they are definitely going about the correction of it in the wrong way.

A somewhat similar situation existed in Western Canada in its early history, when it was without law enforcement, when the life and property of the traders and the early pioneers were not protected, and murders and massacres occurred. But after the Northwest Mounted Police went in, punishment for the commission of crime became sure and swift, and that splendid body gained the confidence of the people; in fact, a great Indian chief said, "These policemen come to protect us, as the feathers protect the birds from the frost of winter." And twice when the American Sioux offered to come in and drive the whites out of that country the Indians would not agree to their doing so, and would not join them.

It is to be hoped, honourable senators, that a similar control will be exercised over those savage and warlike people in Kenya who have caused so much trouble during the last few years. Of course, methods of control have been tried: pamphlets have been dropped, and magistrates have been given the power to impose very severe sentences. One magistrate said to me: "We cannot convict these people, because we are unable to get evidence against them; those 1,500 detainees will never come to trial." He told me that one day in court he was hearing the evidence of a witness who had actually seen a murder committed; court was adjourned for half an hour or longer for luncheon, and the witness never appeared again, but his body was found in a neighbouring stream a few days later.

In dealing with people to whom murder is honourable, and pillage and robbery are ennobling, in a country where tribal warfare and feuds have long been traditional, it will readily be seen how difficult life is for Europeans there.

Before closing, I should like to express a word of thanks to the Governor and the Council of Kenya for the splendid arrangements made for our visit, and for the cordial hospitality and welcome extended to us.

One of the most pleasant features of the whole trip was the opportunity of meeting members of parliament from fifty different Commonwealth countries. We became well acquainted with them and enjoyed varied and interesting discussions. Among them were cabinet ministers and ex-cabinet ministers from Great Britain, and members of parliament from Australia and New Zealand and other countries of the Commonwealth.

I should also like to pay a tribute to the nurses, doctors, teachers and missionaries who are contributing unselfish services in the hope of doing some real good. They do not feel at home in Africa; it seems that visions of their childhood are ever before them, and they long to get back to the homes which they left. They do not wish to bring up their children in that country. They are doing a great work, but some of them fear that the whites will be driven out of the country, because primitive people there as elsewhere are rising to assert their rights as they see them.

Of course, all the actual conference discussions are on record. I think the people of Kenya realize that the Commonwealth representatives understand the situation more clearly than they did before their visit. It is the hope of all that the blacks and the whites will be able to exist together in happiness and co-operation. As one delegate put it, "You can play on the black keys of a piano and produce a tune, and you can play on the white keys and also produce a tune; but you can produce a much better tune if you play on both the black and the white keys."

It is our hope that prosperity and happiness will, before long, come to that smiling land of Kenya.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, the debate was adjourned.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

DOCUMENTS ON ACCESSION TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, earlier in the sitting today the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) asked me if I could have copies of the Paris Agreements made available to honourable members. I stated I was under the impression that I had recently tabled these documents. I now find that the Agreements and the Protocol on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to the North Atlantic Treaty were tabled here on January 11, but were not printed in our records. However, the Protocol was printed as an appendix to the House of Commons Hansard of January 11, and the Agreements were printed as an addendum to the Votes and Proceedings of that house on January 19. I wish to thank the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor) for bringing to my attention the fact that these documents were printed in the records of the House of Commons.

Is it the wish of honourable senators to have both the Protocol and the Agreements printed in our Hansard or Minutes of the Proceedings of this day?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then I would ask, with leave of the house, that these documents be printed as an appendix to our Minutes of the Proceedings of this day.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Thank you.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 25, at 8 p.m.

ROBERT BURNS

196TH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS BIRTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to draw to the attention of all members present the fact that today is the 196th anniversary of the birth of Robert Burns, Scotland's beloved national poet.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Robert Burns was born on the 25th of January, 1759. No man gave more songs or poems to the world than he did. Thomas Carlyle said that when Scots and their descendants forget Burns, history will have forgotten Scotland.

The people of no other country of the size of Scotland have given more to Canada than have those from that land overseas. I might add that the people who have been able to create peace and harmony between the Lowlander and the Highlander will certainly contribute a great deal towards helping to unite the various races in this country, with their different characteristics.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am not going to speak further on the contributions of the Scottish people to Canada. My purpose in rising was to pay a tribute to Robert Burns, and to point out that he enunciated a prophecy which I think it would be well for us and all the people of the world, in fact, to recall:

> Then let us pray that come it may,
> As come it will for a' that,
> That sense and worth, o'er all the earth,
> Shall bear the gree and a' that.
> For a' that, and a' that,
> It's coming yet for a' that,
> That man to man the world o'er,
> Shall brithers be for a' that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure we all agree with the sentiments expressed by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). I am sure also that he could further honour the day by giving us a special program on the bagpipes when the sitting is over.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I might have attempted to do so, but a little while ago a good senator defined a gentleman to me as a man who could play the pipes, but did not.

Hon. Senators: Oh! oh!

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 20, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John A. McDonald: Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity of expressing my wish to join with those who have already spoken in the fine tributes which they have paid to the memory of two of our finest and ablest members of the Senate who passed on during the recess. We shall not soon forget the great service rendered to Parliament and the nation by the late Senators Buchanan and Beauregard. Their good influence will live for a long time.

I would also join with all honourable members in congratulating you, Mr. Speaker, on the great honour that was bestowed on you during the recess, that of being selected for the Atlantic Union Committee Award. I would also express our appreciation of your distinguished service to our nation and the Parliament of Canada, formerly as Government Leader in the Senate and, now, as Speaker of this chamber.

May I also be permitted at this time to congratulate the honourable senator from Brantford (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) upon the great service that he has given the people of Canada and both houses of Parliament as a most successful Speaker of the other place, and is giving now as the competent Government Leader in the Senate.

I am sure that we are all very pleased to see the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) enjoying such good health. We sincerely hope that he may be enabled to continue for many years in his present position to give that fine, outstanding and very fair service which has been characteristic of him over a long period consecrated to the welfare of his country.

I believe that all honourable members would join with me in expressing the wish to assist in any and every way possible by co-operating with our Speaker and leaders in endeavouring to make this session of the Senate a most successful one. I think we in this house sometimes take for granted the capable leadership given by the Speaker and the leaders, and also the assistance of our very efficient staff. We hope that we shall always have that competent leadership and efficient staff, but neither should be taken for granted.

We naturally expected much from the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In my opinion, they did very well, and even surpassed our expectations. Their speeches showed careful preparation and were well delivered.

It seems to me that the Speech from the Throne this session was really one of the best that has been delivered for some sessions. After hearing a critical remark concerning it when the Speech was being debated the other day, I read it over again and I cannot help but think that it covered the ground very well in reviewing the leading events, good and bad, of the past year; and it also gave us a pretty clear picture of much that the Government wishes to accomplish through legislation during this session of Parliament for the good of our country and the welfare of our people. Increased unemployment assistance and further aid to the blind are especially welcome.

Honourable senators, during the past year our people continued to enjoy prosperity, with the exception of those who were engaged in the production of grain in the western provinces, and in growing apples in the Cornwallis-Annapolis Valley of Nova Scotia. Except for last year, there has not been a year since 1945 when our gross national product has not risen. Last year we did have a drop of about $500 million, which cannot be attributed to anything but adverse weather conditions suffered by both the grain growers in the western provinces and the apple growers in the east.

I would like to take this occasion to express the sincere thanks of the fruit growers of the Cornwallis-Annapolis Valley for the promptness with which the federal Government and the provincial Government sent representatives to the scene of the disaster last fall when Hurricane "Edna" struck the Maritime district, ruining a large percentage of the apple crop. These experts sent by both Governments quickly assessed the serious losses incurred and did their best to help. The day following the storm the minister for Nova Scotia was himself in the valley.

It is hard for me to explain to honourable senators what a great people, a wonderful people, these apple growers are. They were my constituents over a comparatively long time and still are. God bless them all. I only wish that you could see how they took this terrible disaster. Many growers are going to find it difficult to finance the production of a quality crop this year because of the loss of last season's crop. It costs a lot of money to grow a crop of fruit, and to have it wiped out overnight means a serious loss to those people, but somehow they have a way of making the best of things and even now they are beginning to plan for the production of an even better crop than last year, if that is possible.

One reason why the loss was so quickly assessed and dealt with so far as our Government felt that public funds could be used, was that our authorities had a most efficient committee to handle the matter, of which the honourable senator from Milford-Hants (Hon. Mr. Hawkins) was chairman.

With an increased home market and our main market in Britain again open to us, I believe that there is an encouraging outlook for orchardists who will produce best quality dessert fruit by adopting the most improved scientific methods, by always remembering to keep costs to the minimum and by marketing so as to return to the growers the largest percentage possible of the consumer's dollar.

F.A.O., or the Food and Agriculture Organization, has stated that although for the second season in succession world food production has continued to rise faster than the increase in population, yet we have continued shortages and widespread malnutrition in some regions, with surpluses in others. Canada has undoubtedly done well and accomplished much by assistance through the Colombo Plan, and we are pleased to hear there is a suggestion that our aid will be increased to assist countries, mainly in South-East Asia, where not sufficient food is produced to feed their people. I do hope that this most beneficial aid that is being given through the Colombo Plan may be increased by sending our trained and practical men to the extent that their valuable services can be used to advantage, and by sending equipment required to help these people provide themselves with the staff of life. Let us continue, and even speed up, this good work. Places nearer home, in the Caribbean area, could be helped under a Colombo Plan to remain free of communism.

I cannot think of a more effective means of keeping communism from spreading further than by providing, in co-operation with the churches, favourable conditions which would give the people of the free nations who need assistance a new hope and faith in the future. I would do even more, if a practical method of doing it could be found. The nations that have surpluses, and can afford the expense, should sell those surpluses, at prices which the recipients could afford to pay, to countries where there are undernourished people. In some cases it might be necessary to make an outright gift of food. The United States has already adopted this course to a limited extent.

In adopting this policy, the free nations possessing surpluses would not only be doing something humane and practical in the fight against communism but would be helping their primary producers in the marketing of their surplus products. I must admit that I do not know all the objections—if there are real honest objections—to such a scheme, yet I cannot but think that we should give earnest consideration to this plan. Some of our people have suggested that we do even more, and I think we should honestly consider what they propose, namely, that those members of NATO which can possibly do so, now that some reduction of their defence expenditures seems feasible, should take at least part of the money thus saved, and use it to increase the amount made available under the Colombo Plan, with the hope that the discouraged view of life which is fostered by undernourishment, idleness and depraved conditions will be more speedily reduced.

Those of us who believe that this last suggestion merits serious consideration are not actuated wholly by unselfish motives, for we, with many others, though we would enjoy a speedy reduction of taxation, feel that it might bring a larger and more permanent reduction in taxes, even though delayed, if the money were used to do all that may be practical in arresting the further spread of communism and in making it possible for those nations that are in danger of losing their great freedoms, not only to successfully resist this menace, but to more speedily improve their standards of living. Although, as the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said here on Wednesday last, our defences must be kept strong, we cannot defeat communism by arms alone.

There are a couple of other items to which I wish briefly to refer and which I did not include when dictating the contents of this talk. With the permission of honourable senators I will mention them at this point.

First, the rearming of Germany. I realize that this matter will be discussed in detail here tomorrow, but as I am on my feet perhaps I may express in a very few words, and without arguing for or against the proposals, my feelings concerning it. I believe, honourable members, that although we fear in some degree the rearming of Western Germany, we would have even more cause to dread the consequences of not having a rearmed Germany. Therefore I shall follow the advice of the minister and of those who have given more study to the problem than I have, and vote for the Paris Agreements.

As regards the other item, that of the dominion-provincial agreement, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister and his colleagues upon the seemingly very fair and impartial temporary solution of the vexed and delicate federal and provincial income tax problem. Honourable members appreciate, as I do, that it was not easy to find an alternative to the federal and provincial income tax agreement to which nine provinces have consented, and which one of our larger provinces has felt it cannot accept. A method had to be found whereby no province would be unable to share the wealth given to other provinces; yet it was necessary to have a solution which, while as generous as possible to the provinces, would not cripple the resources of the national treasury.

I hope that after all our urgent demands, including further aid to the Colombo Plan, have been satisfied, it will not be long before the Government is able to take at least a first step to bring our income tax exemptions in line with those of Quebec. Also—if I may reiterate a hope I have expressed before on the floor of this house—I trust that our Postmaster General can arrange with the postal authorities of the United States to make uniform the postage rates, in respect both of air and land transportation, between the two countries. I am sure that no person would be more pleased if effect could be given to these two proposals than the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

Leaders throughout Europe and the United States are saying encouraging things these days about our growing and progressive nation. Believe it or not, it is only in our own country that one finds pessimists taking the place of enthusiasts, at home and elsewhere, in their expressions concerning Canada and its future. An editorial in the London Times of September 11 last, under the title "Young and Lusty", notes that "the place of Canadian development during the past decade has been tremendous".

It seems to me that the record performance of our housing industry demonstrates our continued progress. The Minister of Public Works, who is also Minister of National Housing, reported in a year-end review that "New Housing Starts, in 1954, including conversions, will be between 110,000 and 115,000, and completions, between 104,000 and 108,000." This will represent a substantial margin of increase over any previous year in our history.

The present rate of starts is on an even higher level. If one allows for the average seasonal variation, it is in excess of 120,000 houses per year, or about 400 houses started every working day of the year. Starts of new dwellings in October alone last year numbered 12,600, an increase of 22 per cent over October the previous year. Besides the growth of population the continual rise in income among many of our citizens and the satisfactory supply of building materials, it would seem that some of the changes made in the National Housing Act last session are having a beneficial effect. At the end of last year there were 65,000 to 70,000 dwellings under construction, a considerable increase over the previous year's carryover. If no new commitments at all were forthcoming in 1955, we would still be assured of a larger number of new houses added to our stock than in any year up to 1946. Under the circumstances it is difficult to imagine anything but an increase in completions for this year. We are thankful to the banks that have approached the problem of establishing a sufficient number of homes for our people in a spirit of co-operation, and their entry into the mortgage field has provided a gratifying impetus to house building. We wish Dr. Bates, the new President of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the continued success, of his predecessor in this very important work.

May I just take time enough to introduce another important problem; that is, how can more of our voters be encouraged to properly appreciate and accept their duty as good citizens in exercising their franchise, not only willingly, but at the same time help in keeping election expenses to the minimum?

This is a subject which it would be much easier to discuss if I were a member of another place; but I am discussing it here because I think it is most important that serious thought should be given to it now as there will likely be only two more sessions before the next general election. This will not allow more time than is necessary for a thorough study in committee and to have adequate amendments made to our act. I would like also to say that if any fault is found by anyone for my discussing this topic here, I shall have to take all the blame, as no one knew that I was going to say anything about it.

I am aware that some honourable members of the Senate and probably more of the other place will think that I am presumptuous in bringing this matter up in the Senate; but because of its great importance may I ask you and them to overlook my boldness and interest in a subject which more properly belongs in a House of Commons debate. There seems to be less found in Hansard under this topic than under other subjects of anything like its great importance.

Although there was keen interest taken in the issues of the last election campaign, it is to be regretted that on the average more than thirty voters in each of every one hundred voters who had the privilege and duty to cast ballots, did not put first things first and vote. For all Canada the average percentage of electors on the list who voted was 67. In other words, 33 people out of every hundred who had their names on the list stayed away from the polls for one reason or another.

Those of you who have read about compulsory voting in Australia will know that the number of people there who do not vote because of illness or absence from the country amounts to 7, 8 or 9 per cent. This indicates that there is no known excuse for about 25 per cent of the eligible voters who do not turn out at the polling booths to exercise their franchise in this country.

The record by provinces of the percentage of electors on the list who voted is as follows: Ontario, 67; Quebec, 69; Nova Scotia, 72; New Brunswick, 78; Newfoundland, 57. I am sorry to say this is the lowest percentage in the whole country. Prince Edward Island is to be congratulated upon having had the largest turnout of any province, 83 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Grant: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: If the other provinces had done as well as Prince Edward Island I would not be raising this question tonight.

The percentages in the remaining provinces were: Manitoba, 59; British Columbia, 65; Saskatchewan, 74; Alberta, 63; and the Yukon and Mackenzie River, 69. As I mentioned before, the average for the whole of Canada was 67 per cent.

More is being done by the press, radio and television than ever before to create an interest in public affairs, and they should be congratulated and thanked for the very competent work that was done by their personnel in the election campaign of 1953 as well as between elections. It is to be regretted that interest in political meetings is on the wane in many constituencies. Joint public debates used to be a most effective way of arousing the interest of voters.

Should not this study of civics be given more time and attention in our institutions of learning? Are our normal colleges and universities employing the most competent instructors in this all important subject of civics that treats of citizenship and the relations between citizens and the Government? Are our public schools instilling into the minds of our youth the interest and respect that they should have to enable them to become good citizens? I think that question has to be answered in the negative, for a recent poll disclosed that only one out of every three school children can name a single member of the Government and describe what his work is. A person cannot truly be said to be a good citizen if he or she does not take interest enough to become acquainted with public issues of the day and take advantage of their privilege and discharge their responsibility of exercising their franchise.

It seems to me that we could develop a greater interest in public affairs by having the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation record and broadcast at appropriate times the speeches of Government and Opposition leaders in important parliamentary debates. I hope the length of speeches will be reduced in another place by at least ten minutes, for it would be a mistake to broadcast too long speeches.

I would like to commend those responsible for televising the program when we had the privilege of hearing President Eisenhower in November 1953, and for televising the opening of this session of parliament.

We, as members of the Senate and Parliament, have a great responsibility in this matter of encouraging greater interest in public affairs if we are to deserve fully the respect and interest of the public. All honourable members, I feel sure, would agree that we should make certain that we are doing our full duty by helping to make the Senate an even more useful and democratic institution than it has been, if that is possible. But, I will not now take the time to repeat my views on this question, as I am already on record.

Much more could be said on how best to arouse greater interest in public affairs and in Parliament, but I trust that the suggestions I have made may encourage other honourable members to give us the benefit of their views on this important topic.

Now, honourable members, though time does not permit, and I would not wish to weary you with an exhaustive review of my reading and thoughts regarding the seemingly increasing cost of elections, and what if anything can be done to remedy the present unfortunate situation in far too many of our constituencies, I desire to say enough to encourage further discussion and, I hope, some action which will halt the increasing cost of elections, as noted from declared election expenses, which is the only source of information available, aside from hearsay or personal knowledge.

Although I cannot prove misuse of funds at election time, many candidates will frankly admit the high cost of elections, while others hesitate to do so. In too few cases election expenses have not increased. Many criticisms are heard from citizens who earnestly desire to arrest this evil, and they are asking if something cannot be done to assure us all that future elections will be carried on without the expenditure of so much money and possibly the consequent transgression of the law. I would hope that more constituencies could follow the fine example set by some of our ridings in the last election, where, I am told, the minimum was spent for election purposes. If this could be done, more of our best citizens would be encouraged to take a greater interest in public affairs. This is a problem which Opposition parties are probably as anxious as we are to assist in doing everything that can be accomplished, and therefore they would be pleased to help make a thorough study of our Elections Act, with a hope that helpful amendments might be made.

After having first written this talk, in which I requested a study of the Elections Act, I was pleased to note that the Government had given Notice of Motion that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to study the Act and suggest to the house such amendments as the Committee deems advisable. I am in hopes that these remarks of mine will help a little in bringing it to the attention of committee members that we are greatly interested in their important work, and I hope that after a very thorough study they may be able to suggest some adequate amendments to the Act which will ensure, as far as legislation can do so, that future elections will be conducted with expenditure of funds curtailed to legitimate purposes such as advertising, rentals of halls, the use of radio and television, etc.

The British North America Act created our Parliament by the simple assertion that:

> There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Subsequent clauses of this Act established the privileges of the two houses; the number of members each was to have; the constituencies which were to return members for the first Parliament; the electoral machinery and franchise which were to be used until Parliament decided otherwise; and the officials who were to have charge of the machinery.

The British North America Act did little more than to establish our Parliament as a going concern, and arrangements for the first general election were made. But for all elections of the future the whole representative system, from the periodic adjustment of constituency boundaries to post-election trials for corruption at the polls, was provided for in terms which gave Parliament a wide discretion to alter it at will.

Professor Norman Ward, in his book The Canadian House of Commons Representation, states that the first few decades after Confederation were years of bitter struggle over election laws and that general reform of the electoral machinery in the public interest was a literal impossibility until well after the turn of the century.

A review of the reports of Special Committees appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, with the co-operation of the former and present Chief Electoral Officers of Canada, shows that seemingly reasonably adequate provisions of the law have been recommended and adopted by Parliament for the correction of election abuses; but Mr. Ward states—"these provisions have been uniformly disobeyed". He further states—"the tale is one of quiet but thorough law-breaking in practice, and of genteel but persistent hypocrisy in utterance".

Although I have read everything that I can find dealing with registration and compulsory voting as it is carried on in the Commonwealth of Australia, where through compulsory voting legislation they have raised from 59 per cent to 91 per cent the number of enrolled voters exercising their franchise, it would seem to me that we should only adopt this principle of compulsion as a last resort, and only then with the unanimous agreement of all parties.

Probably honourable senators know that the first compulsory voting legislation was passed by the State of Queensland. The Australian federal Government passed a similar Act in 1924, and the last State of the Commonwealth of Australia to adopt the legislation did so during World War II.

I trust that we can make a determined effort to encourage larger numbers of our citizens to take a greater interest in public affairs, with the sincere hope that more and more in succeeding elections will willingly discharge their responsibility in exercising their franchise, and do it gladly without any special inducement, which tends to increase the cost of elections. Let us make certain again, after the latest experience which we have had, that the provisions of the Elections Act are adequate to meet the needs.

We certainly must realize that it would not be desirable for election expenses to become so large that only the more wealthy of our people could afford to be candidates, and without doubt it would not be in Canada's best interests to select our candidates from the class of people who have nothing to lose. We do not mean to exclude, of course, the occasional young man or woman who has not had tme since leaving school to engage in his or her profession for long, but who may have other qualifications which would make such a person a very useful member of Parliament.

This plea has been made in the sincere belief that it is in the best interests of our nation, our constituents and candidates. What if it fails and nothing more can be done by legislation? Then I have enough faith in our people, when properly aroused to the danger, to correct it themselves, by parties getting together and determining to have their elections contested fairly and honestly, as should be done in any case, without being forced to do right by law. If there is abuse, it seems to me that one party is as much to blame as the other.

Realizing, as I am certain all members of Parliament do, how vital it is to retain this great freedom of the secret ballot, let us with renewed vigour endeavour to inculcate a greater patriotism in young Canada, so that our citizens will be glad to demonstrate their love and zeal for Canada by more and more of them showing an increased concern in matters of public interest, and showing that they are good citizens by going to the polls and without restraint voting for the candidates of their choice.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, the debate was adjourned.

NORTHLAND INCIDENT

SURVIVAL OF ESKIMO PARTY

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, may I call attention to a recent incident in our far northland which to me is one of the most amazing stories of survival I have ever heard. I refer to the nine Eskimos who were cast adrift on an ice-floe and without blankets or equipment survived for some seventeen days. Rescue planes flew back and forth across the area, but because of the fog no trace of the lost men could be found. They had been given up for lost when one day they walked into their own village.

To me this amazing story is proof of what strong and courageous men can do in the face of untold hardship. It is a lesson to us to face whatever we may be called upon to face, whether it be serious illness or great danger, with a calm and determined spirit. I pay tribute to the strength and courage of these men.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS OF CRIMINAL LAW—SENATE MEMBERSHIP

The Senate proceeded to consideration of a message from the House of Commons regarding the appointing of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect, and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries, should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent.

That the following senators be appointed on behalf of the Senate on the said joint committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Bouffard, Farris, Fergusson, Hayden, Roebuck, Veniot and Vien.

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary.

That the minutes of the proceedings and the evidence of the special committee appointed last session to inquire into and report upon the foregoing questions, together with all papers and records laid before it, be referred to the said committee.

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of Parliament.

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records; to sit while the Senate is sitting and to report to the Senate from time to time.

That the committee have power to engage the services of counsel.

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators will recall that at the last session of Parliament a joint committee of both houses was appointed to inquire into three branches of the criminal law, namely, capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries, and that that committee made considerable progress in its study of these three important subjects.

Assuming that the members of this house who served on the committee last session are again prepared to undertake the task, I think they should be reappointed to continue the studies undertaken by that committee. I have suggested that the name of Senator Vien be substituted for Senator Beauregard, who passed away during the recess.

I am very proud, honourable senators, that the Senate representation on this joint committee has been composed of outstanding men of wide experience.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And women.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall mention their names. The first is that of Senator Aseltine, who has had wide experience in the practice of law and for ten years was chairman of the Divorce Committee of this house. Senator Bouffard is an eminent counsel, a former Batonnier of the Quebec bar, and a man eminently qualified to serve on the committee. Senator Farris was at one time Attorney General of the province of British Columbia. I need not remind honourable senators of the numerous important cases in which he has appeared in Canadian courts, and the many occasions on which he has represented the Government and private clients before the Privy Council. Senator Hayden comes from Toronto, and is recognized as one of the leaders of the Bar in Ontario. He performed yeoman service for his country in connection with the revision of the Criminal Code. Senator Roebuck, who also comes from Toronto, has had an extensive practice in both civil and criminal law, and was for a number of years Attorney General of the province of Ontario. Another senator who served the committee last session was Senator Veniot, a doctor with a wide experience in medical practice. I am sure honourable senators agree that there should be a medical man on this committee. Senator Fergusson, who was at one time a practising lawyer, has in recent years headed the social service branch of the Government of New Brunswick. She brings with her a very wide experience.

The late Senator Beauregard was well known and highly respected as a member of the Bar of the province of Quebec, with an extensive practice in the city of Montreal. To replace him on the committee I am suggesting the name of another well-known senator from the city of Montreal, Senator Vien. For a number of years Senator Vien was a member of the House of Commons; he served for a time as Deputy Speaker of that house and later as Speaker of this house. He has practised law extensively in the city of Montreal, and has had wide experience in meeting the people of Canada.

As I have said, honourable senators, I am very proud of the representation that the Senate had on this joint committee last year. Indeed, I do not think it would be possible to draw from any other legislative body men and women of such high calibre. I have much pleasure in nominating them, together with Senator Vien, to serve on the joint committee this session.

I have just been reminded, honourable senators, that in my reference to the senators who served on the committee last year I overlooked the Honourable Mrs. Hodges. We in this house were justifiably proud of the fact that two of our lady senators were members of that committee. In the motion that has been handed to me tonight the name of the Honourable Mrs. Hodges has been omitted. She was a very faithful member of the committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not need to recall to you her qualifications, for I mentioned some of them the other day when I congratulated her on the excellent speech she made in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. To the list of members mentioned already may I add the name of Senator Hodges, and express my regret that it was omitted from the motion.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, I have no fault to find with what the Leader of the Senate has said with regard to the abilities of the senators nominated for this committee we are discussing. Last year I rose when a similar report was made because at that time, I think, it was not proposed to have on the committee a single lay member, if I may so describe anyone who does not belong to the legal profession. Among the members of the legal profession mentioned in the present motion are men of very great ability in the practice of law, and they did a splendid job last year as a subcommittee in dealing with the technicalities of the Criminal Code revision that was then before the Senate. But consideration of the subject-matter to be gone into by this proposed joint committee does not particularly require the knowledge and special ability that were so valuable on that subcommittee. The joint committee is being set up to deal with the question of corporal punishment, and the advisability of continuing or discontinuing the penalty of capital punishment, and also to consider whether we should permit the holding of lotteries or not. I contend that men and women of ordinary intelligence can deal with these things and that no special legal training whatever is necessary for the purpose.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am not trying to get on that committee, by the way. My point is this, that while perhaps there should be some lawyers on the committee, I do not think lawyers have as good qualifications for a consideration of these questions as have ordinary men and women possessed of plain common sense. I do believe that this committee might very well be composed of a little larger admixture of just ordinary fellows, like the senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) and others who are not members of the legal profession. It requires, let us say, just moral sense or common sense to decide whether this country should continue to provide in its Criminal Code the penalty of capital punishment, and whether we should permit the holding of lotteries.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask a question of the Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). Was an interim report issued by the committee at the close of last session? Most committees that suspend their inquiry at the end of a session and are likely to be set up again in the following session, make an interim report. My question is: Was any interim report made by this committee?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, my understanding is that an interim report was made by the committee. and that one of its recommendations was that the committee should be set up again this session in order to continue its work, as it had not sufficient time to hear all the evidence. It is for that reason I am suggesting the committee should be set up again this session.

Now, whether my staff is working properly or not, I must assume the blame for another omission. I have now been informed that Senator John McDonald was also on the committee last session. He is a layman who has had wide experience in public affairs. Before coming to this house he was a member of the Legislature of Nova Scotia and a minister of the Crown in that province. So, if I may be permitted to add his name to the list of names that I have mentioned, I will do so. I am very sorry indeed that I did not have this information before I came into this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is getting better all the time.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: This appointment might very well overcome Senator Euler's objection.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, my honourable friend from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) objected because there were not a larger number of laymen on the committee. It is bad enough not to be on the committee if you are a layman, but when you are a lawyer and not on the committee, it is much worse. I am a lawyer with fifty years' experience, yet I do not rate a place on that committee. I must say that it has got to be pretty bad when a man who has been a lawyer so long cannot even be recognized, in a place where he has been for twenty years, as a potential member of this committee. If it had not been for the remarks made by the honourable member from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I would not have drawn the attention of honourable senators to the fact that I did not "make" the committee. My experience of a little over fifty years in the legal profession does not even give me a chance to rank with a possible layman committee member.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Let me ask my friend a question: Does he think that because a man has had twenty-five years' or even fifty years' experience as a lawyer he is any better qualified to decide whether Canada should continue to have the penalty of capital punishment, and whether the holding of lotteries should be permitted? It is purely a matter for laymen.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), as able a lawyer as I have ever known, was on the committee that revised the Criminal Code, and gave evidence there of his extremely keen legal mind.

Hon Mr. Euler: Right.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He knew the legal points involved.

Not far behind him in this respect was the honourable member from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). Though as a rule I do not agree with him, I concede his very great ability. But I do not think there is anything purely legal involved in the consideration of whether capital punishment should be retained or lotteries legalized. When the findings of the committee are presented to this house they will, no doubt, produce a violent discussion. For quite a while I was a member of the Divorce Committee, and, except on technical points, I would just as readily accept the judgment of my lay associates as I would the opinions of any lawyer who might participate in the committee's discussions. The fact is that laymen play a very important part in our jurisprudence. When the life of a man is at stake, and on many other grave issues, the decision is made by a jury of twelve men, or of men and women—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Who are not lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Certainly, who are not lawyers. Not one is a lawyer. But it is on their judgment that lives and liberties depend.

Unlike my honourable friend from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I have a great respect for lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I think lawyers contribute something because of their professional experience.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I would like to correct my friend. I said nothing at all derogatory of lawyers; in fact, I appraise them very highly. I only contended that they have no special qualifications for this particular job.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am not so sure of that.

Hon. Mr. Euler: You said so yourself.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There are in my city, and no doubt elsewhere, quite a few prosecutions in connection with lotteries. Lawyers are engaged in all these cases, and their knowledge of what causes people to participate in lotteries is helpful in any consideration of the subject. However, under our jurisprudence, the final decision on these questions is made by laymen, and I do not think that we should admit technicalities in a consideration of these matters in the Senate, of all places. I notice that the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), who is reputedly a lawyer of very high standing, is not on the committee. Perhaps he has been absent too frequently of late, but I feel better because of his exclusion, since I also have not found a place on the committee.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Neither my honourable friend nor I is a criminal lawyer. That is why.

Hon. Mr. Haig: "Criminal lawyer", or acting for criminals?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I leave that to the imagination of my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My honourable friend spoke of "criminal lawyers". I hope they are not that bad!

Hon. Mr. Euler: They have not been found out!

Hon. Mr. Haig: If I were Leader of the Government I would put half a dozen laymen on this committee, but no more lawyers. I would leave off the list the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) and myself. I say this with all due respect. I know my profession very well. For a good many years I have made enough out of it to provide me with three meals a day. I recognize the fine character of the men and women in the legal profession and the tremendous contribution they make to the life of our country. Frequently in our city, and no doubt elsewhere, they are chosen to be candidates for public office, chiefly because they possess a training which some others may not have had. But the issues before us, and on which we should rely upon lay opinion, are, first, shall we approve of lotteries or shall we not; second, shall we retain capital punishment, or not? And there is a third question.

Hon. Senators: Corporal punishment.

Hon. Mr. Haig: One does not need a lawyer to determine the pros and cons of corporal punishment. On the two other questions the legal viewpoint might be of value.

I did not get up to make a long speech, but I wanted the house to know I realize that I have been passed over in the appointments to this committee.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: You were not. You are on it ex officio.

Hon. Mr. Haig: At least I have brains enough to know that I have been passed over. Sometimes, when this happens to a man, he does not know it. But, having no responsibility for the appointments, I can speak without bias, conscientiously, and with no personal feeling.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I thank the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for having suggested that my name be placed on this very important committee. I appreciate the honour very much, but I would ask to have my name withdrawn, and, perhaps, that of some other layman substituted.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, in reply to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), may I say that last year the members of this committee conducted their work very faithfully and took it very seriously. I have not the record before me, but I know they met on many occasions. They got a little more than half way—probably two-thirds of the way—through their deliberations; and my suggestion to the house is that this committee as already constituted, with Senator Vien replacing the late Senator Beauregard, should be allowed to finish its work. I think it is far better that the same members continue with and conclude their program than that, now they are two-thirds of the way through, a new committee should be substituted.

May I add that the name of the honourable leader of the Opposition was not included this year because, he may remember, he suggested last year that his desk-mate, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Alsetine), should take his place. I accepted his suggestion, as I accept all his suggestions, very gladly, and the name of the honourable senator from Rosetown appears in the list before the house this year. So, to conclude, and in spite of what has been said, I am of the opinion that the committee of honourable senators which started its work should be allowed to finish its work.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would amend my motion by moving:

That in addition to the senators named in the motion the Honourable Senators Hodges and McDonald be appointed on behalf of the Senate on the said joint committee.

The Senate representatives on the joint committee would then be the Honourable Senators Aseltine, Bouffard, Farris, Ferguson, Hayden, Hodges, McDonald, Roebuck, Veniot and Vien.

The amendment was agreed to, and the motion as amended was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DIVORCE PETITIONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, at this stage may I ask if the house would proceed now to item No. 7 on the Order Paper, for consideration of a number of reports of the Divorce Committee? My request is out of the ordinary, but I have a reason for making it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the honourable senator's request?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 17 to 61, dealing with petitions for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck moved that the reports be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAIL SCHEDULES

INQUIRY

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

According to a dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Journal last evening, it is the intention of the Canadian Pacific Railway to reduce the travelling time on passenger trains from Montreal to Vancouver by sixteen hours, and from Vancouver to Montreal by some twelve and a half hours. My question is: Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to do likewise?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, probably the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) did not read the press dispatch as carefully as I did, or I may have read into it something it did not say, but my recollection is that it stated the Canadian National was reducing its travelling time accordingly. However, I shall look again at the article and find out which version of it is correct.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Assuming the honourable Leader's version is correct, may I ask this further question: If it is possible to reduce the travelling time from Montreal to Vancouver by sixteen hours, why is it possible to reduce the return trip by only some twelve hours?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not an engineer, and am not qualified to answer that question. Perhaps the railways know the answer.

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY —DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, because the subject on which I am about to speak is an important and intricate one, involving a number of agreements, I would crave the indulgence of the house to allow me to stay rather close to my notes.

Honourable senators, this afternoon I wish to move, seconded by my desk-mate, the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout), the following motion:

Resolved—That it is expedient that the houses of Parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this House do approve the same.

This, in my opinion, is one of the most important matters and undoubtedly one of the most vital international questions which have come before this house since the cessation of hostilities in 1945. I ask your support of this motion because I believe that the effect of the carrying out of the related agreements which were worked out at the London and Paris meetings last autumn is more likely to bring about lasting peace than any other method which has been suggested for dealing with the complicated international problems—more particularly as they affect the continent of Europe.

Honourable senators are acquainted with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, commonly known as NATO, which is an organization of democratic countries along or near the Atlantic—an organization of these countries for defensive purposes and also having non-military aspects. We take NATO for granted these days, but we are apt to forget its origin.

I am sure that everyone is familiar with the quotation "A prophet is not without honour save in his own country". Indeed, Canadians are prone to look abroad either to America or Great Britain for leadership in international affairs. But I would remind members of this house that it was none other than our own Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mr. St. Laurent, with his characteristic clairvoyance, who first envisaged the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You will recall the reluctance of Russian representatives at the United Nations to approve enforcement provisions for policing decisions of that organization. Mr. St. Laurent was the first to point out that defensive alliances among member nations of this world group would not only be possible within the framework of the United Nations, but would probably become both desirable and necessary. Speaking on behalf of the Canadian Delegation at the General Assembly on September 8, 1947, he said:

> Nations, in their search for peace and co-operation, will not and cannot accept indefinitely an unaltered council which was set up to ensure their security, and which, so many feel, has become frozen in futility and divided by dissension. If forced, they may seek greater safety in an association of democratic and peace-loving states willing to accept more specific international obligations in return for a greater measure of national security. Such associations, it has already been pointed out, if consistent with the principles and purposes of the charter, can be formed within the United Nations. It is to be hoped that such a development will not be necessary. If, it is unnecessary it will be most undesirable. If, however, it is made necessary, it will have to take place.

On a subsequent occasion Mr. St. Laurent stated as follows:

> The best guarantee of peace today is the creation and preservation by the nations of the free world, under the leadership of Great Britain, the United States and France, of an overwhelming preponderance of force over any adversary or possible combination of adversaries. This force must not be only military, it must be economic; it must be moral.

Of course, those opposing the formation of the new Atlantic Union pointed to it as evidence of failure by the United Nations and urged that to adopt this measure would be to undermine the World Organization, and that within its framework alone should be preserved the freedom of all nations, that is, within the framework of the United Nations. How wrong they were and how right Mr. St. Laurent! Without this bulwark of defence put up by the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we might have already experienced domination and possible annihilation by the forces of evil aligned against us.

I am sure I shall be forgiven if I digress momentarily at this time to remind you of the magnificent contribution made by the Minister of External Affairs, the Honourable Mr. Pearson, both as President of the United Nations and as spokesman for Canada in the councils of the world. As the honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) pointed out so recently, Canada can make a worthwhile contribution in resolving international differences because, of all nations, we have neither an axe to grind, nor territorial demands. Mr. Pearson, speaking for Canada, has succeeded in making our position clear, and deserves our complete confidence and gratitude.

It is also with pride that I refer to the splendid role played by the Honourable Paul Martin as leader of Canada's delegation at the United Nations during the past year. I am sure that his plea for disarmament and his active support of his "atoms for peace" program has fired the imagination of everyone in this chamber and that he deserves the highest commendation for his contribution to a lasting and long-sought peace for mankind.

But now to return to consideration of the matter before us.

A few years ago it was felt that another organization, not entirely apart from and certainly in co-operation with NATO, should be set up. I refer to the European Defence Community, commonly known as EDC. As its name implies, this was intended to be an organization of continental European countries banded together primarily for their own defence.

Honourable members of the Senate will recall that in 1952 the Parliament of Canada considered and approved a protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty extending to the members of the proposed European Defence Community the guarantees of mutual assistance contained in the treaty. At that time the Senate was given an opportunity to examine the important issues involved under the EDC arrangements for associating the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy with the West, and in particular the implications for Canada of approving the protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty then before the Senate. That was an important step for Canada to take, not only because it would have extended the area of our commitments under NATO but because it implied Canadian support for the EDC approach to the problems of European unity and defence. The United Kingdom did not agree to be a party to this organization. France also hesitated; and you will recall that last fall, when it was proposed that Germany should be rearmed and become part of EDC, France refused to go along with that proposal, and the protocol, which was approved in June 1952, never came into force. The free world was greatly alarmed and feared for any effective defence of Europe, and in certain quarters it was seriously proposed that the United States of America should "go it alone". This course I think we all feel, would have been most undesirable and unsatisfactory even if it could have been effective.

Uppermost in our minds was the danger that impatience and misunderstanding of France's position on the part of her allies might have lead to separate direct arrangements with the Federal Republic, excluding France. In addition the possibility existed that in the Federal Republic the fruits of Chancellor Adenauer's successful efforts to encourage a wide measure of support for his policy of friendly co-operation with France and other free European nations might give way to a narrow nationalist outlook and general cynicism. Here on this continent disappointment was coupled in the minds of some with a growing attraction towards either continental or bilateral defence arrangements stemming from belief that North American defences would of themselves suffice to protect our security and permit an almost exclusive reliance on the concept of massive retaliation.

These dangers—and they were real dangers—accompanied the demise of EDC and threatened the very existence of NATO. In such a perilous situation, Canada welcomed the initiative taken by the United Kingdom whose refusal to join the EDC had increased French unwillingness to accept the treaty. It was with a profound feeling of admiration and kinship in a common cause that we in Canada followed the untiring efforts of the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary, Sir Anthony Eden, as he mustered support in the main European capitals for a new approach to the problems arising from the failure of EDC.

In the latter part of September of last year the countries signatory to the proposed EDC, along with the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, met in conference at London and worked out the broad lines of an agreement for associating the Federal Republic of Germany with the Western Community on a basis of equality. This conference also proposed measures to unify the European democracies and to build up a defensive structure in which all these democracies would share. These agreements were later worked out in detail and were subsequently signed in Paris on October 23, 1954.

The protocol which is before the Senate for approval is one important element in this general settlement, all parts of which are inter-related. They may be divided into four main groups: a group of four-power agreements concerning the restoration of sovereignty to the German Federal Republic and providing for the presence of foreign forces in the Federal Republic; a group of seven-power agreements providing for the reconstitution of the Brussels Treaty Organization to include the Federal Republic of Germany in a Western European Union; a NATO protocol providing for the admission of the Federal Republic and resolutions designed to strengthen the NATO structure; and a Franco-German agreement on the Saar.

May I point out some of the main features of these agreements.

First, it should be noted that the Federal Republic of Germany functions as an equal partner in the Western coalition but, I would emphasize, that this does not preclude the eventual unification of Germany. In fact, the NATO members subscribed to the following:

> A peace settlement for the whole of Germany freely negotiated between Germany and her former enemies, which should lay the foundation of a lasting peace, remains an essential aim of their—that is, the three powers'—policy. The final determination of the boundaries of Germany must await such a settlement.

And further:

> The achievement through peaceful means of a fully free and unified Germany remains a fundamental goal of their policy.

I am sure honourable senators would agree that this statement of policy provides a firm response to any who may maintain that, in their efforts to bring the Federal Republic into the Western Community, the Western powers have lost sight of the ultimate aim of unification and a peace treaty for Germany. As I shall point out later, the other members of NATO subsequently associated themselves with this declaration, which also dealt with other important points of substance.

Secondly, the agreements actually provide for a moderated version of the structure based on the Brussels agreement of 1948. When these agreements go into effect we shall have what will be known as the Western European Union and for abbreviation, referred to as WEU. This will include the members of the Brussels organization, namely, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, The Netherlands and Luxembourg, to which will be added Italy and the Federal Republic of Germany. One of the main differences is that the United Kingdom is included in the Western European Union and that she has pledged herself to provide an army of four divisions and the second tactical air force on the continent of Europe for another forty-four years.

The Council of WEU will sit in London, and the Armament Control Agency in Paris, where it will work in close co-operation with the NATO Secretariat and, for carrying out its duties, will use, to the greatest possible extent, NATO personnel.

I should now like to refer specifically to the right of Germany to rearm, and to point out the manner in which it is limited and controlled. It was proposed under EDC and it is agreed under WEU that Germany is to be permitted to have a maximum number of 500,000 men under arms and these are to be organized into not more than twelve divisions. Her air force power is to be defensive only and is to consist of 1,350 fighter aircraft. This number cannot be increased without the unanimous consent of WEU.

These forces of the Federal Republic of Germany when constituted are to be brought under the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe known as SACEUR and are to be integrated into the NATO forces. Contrary to what has been suggested in some quarters, there is to be no separate national army apart from NATO and I shall repeat, no separate German army apart from that which will be under the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe. Germany will also be dependent on NATO for what is known as logistic support, which includes such vital things as fuel, pipelines, transportation, communication facilities and airfields.

There is also a provision which prohibits Germany from manufacturing certain weapons of war, such as atomic, biological or mechanical weapons, nor are they permitted to manufacture long-range aircraft and guided missiles, mines, large warships and bomber aircraft and these provisions cannot be changed except on the request of the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe and approved by a two-thirds majority of the Western European Union Council. There is also a provision for inspecting the national plants.

It will thus be seen that an effective system of armament control has been set up within the Brussels Treaty but at the same time making the most effective use of the NATO machinery which, as I shall explain later, has been considerably strengthened to buttress and supplement the control measures under the Brussels Treaty. Together the arrangements under both treaties provide pretty substantial safeguards against independent military action on the part of Germany, whose rearmament has awakened so many vivid and recent memories of the Hitler war. On the other hand, one must not forget that German rearmament is a normal development in the resumption of sovereignty. It is much better that it take place in the West—it has long been in existence in the Russian-controlled zone of Germany—under controls which are found in these agreements. In this connection, we cannot fail to recognize the crucial importance of the historic commitment on the part of the United Kingdom to retain on the continent of Europe during the duration of the Brussels Treaty the present effective strength of its land and air forces stationed there—four divisions and the Second Tactical Air Force. This undertaking, combined with the Federal Republic's self-denying ban on the production of atomic, biological, chemical and certain heavy weapons and the French decision to agree to German membership in NATO, decisions all involving important sacrifices of national prerogatives, helped to make agreement possible.

You may ask what effect these new NATO measures will have on Canadian forces in Europe and, even more important what the effect will be upon our existing commitments of the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany into NATO, the protocol concerning which the house is being asked to approve. On the first point, I think I can say with some assurance that none of the measures for strengthening SACEUR's powers and for increasing the mutual inter-dependence of forces is likely to make any difference to Canada in practice. The 1st Canadian Infantry Brigade in the Federal Republic is already closely integrated within the British Army of the Rhine, and the 1st Canadian Air Division within the 4th Allied Tactical Air Force along with United States and French Units. Furthermore, it has always been assumed that our units would be subject to this overall authority in military matters and that any movement of our forces would take place as part of agreed NATO strategy. It is most unlikely that we would have ever contemplated using these forces without consulting NATO.

With respect to the second question, I might explain that the situation as far as Canada is concerned is similar to that which arose in June 1952, when the Senate approved the NATO protocol extending to all members of EDC the assistance guarantee of the North Atlantic Treaty. At that time it was pointed out that, since the Federal Republic was the only member of the EDC not a member of NATO, the effect of the protocol was to extend the obligations which Canada had undertaken under the North Atlantic Treaty to the Federal Republic of Germany. It was emphasized, however, that the extension of our obligations was more theoretical than real, because under article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty we were already under an obligation to come to the assistance of the NATO forces stationed in the German Federal Republic. If that protocol had come into effect it would have extended that obligation to include an attack on the Federal Republic itself. Similarly, in this case, by approving this protocol, Canada will have, when it comes into force, an obligation beyond those previously existing by virtue of article 6, in that we shall be committed to treat as an attack on Canada any attack on the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany.

In addition to the obligations it will assume as a member of NATO, the German Federal Republic, in a special declaration made by Chancellor Adenauer at the London Conference, has solemnly undertaken to conduct its policies in accordance with the principles of the United Nations Charter, although it is not at present a member of the United Nations, to refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of the North Atlantic and Brussels Treaties and—this is important—never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the German Federal Republic. These are reassuring promises on the part of the young German Republic with which Canada has entered into increasingly close and friendly relations in recent years. They are promises which, on the basis of our experience with the only freely-constituted government of Germany, we have reason to expect will be kept. They are promises, moreover, which have been underwritten by the Three Occupying Powers, by their declaration at the London Conference, and by the other NATO countries, including Canada, by their resolution of association adopted later in Paris. The relevant section of the three-power declaration is as follows:

> They (i.e. the three powers) will regard as a threat to their own peace and safety any recourse to force which in violation by the principles of the United Nations Charter threatens the integrity and unity of the Atlantic Alliance or its defensive purposes. In the event of any such action, the three governments, for their part, will consider the offending government as having forfeited its rights to any guarantee and any military assistance provided for in the North Atlantic Treaty and its protocols. They will act in accordance with article 4 of the North Atlantic Treaty with a view to taking other measures which may be appropriate.

This, honourable senators would, I think agree, is a clear warning to all the members of NATO including the Federal Republic that if any party to the treaty violates its defensive undertakings, or takes any steps to alter by force the present boundaries of any member of the alliance or modify the present situation, it would forfeit any benefits or any assistance it is entitled to under the North Atlantic Treaty.

In addition to the two points I have just covered, I think I should make it clear to the honourable senators—and this is a very important matter, upon which I have been questioned, from time to time, outside of this house that the Canadian Government did not undertake, at either the London or the Paris meetings, any new commitments to keep Canadian forces in Europe at any given level or for any given period.

As I mentioned earlier, the agreements, resolutions and declarations of policy constitute one settlement and it is difficult to divorce any part from the whole, for virtually all are interrelated. There is another outstanding issue which was resolved in Paris, and because of its crucial importance to the position of France and the Federal Republic as parties to all the other agreements must be considered as an integral part of the settlement as a whole, although it was not formally on the agenda of the London or Paris meetings. I refer to the Franco-German agreement on the Saar, which was finally concluded only a few hours before the other agreements were signed in Paris. The problem of this territory, which has been for so long the source of differences between France and Germany, can now be settled, I sincerely trust, to the satisfaction of both countries and the benefit of the territory itself. At the moment there is evidence to suggest that some further clarification of the views of the two governments directly concerned is required, but I have confidence that the spirit of amity and understanding which characterized the London and Paris meetings will continue to prevail and bring about a final meeting of minds on this question.

Now, honourable senators, I know that it is very difficult for many of us to contemplate a rearmed Germany. Those of us who served in either or both of the last two World Wars know what hardships were inflicted on the great mass of the people, and of the pain and suffering which many of our comrades underwent, and the loss of loved ones which many suffered through the ruthlessness of the German war lords. On the other hand, we know that this type of German is not the average German citizen, but rather of the nature of the Germans who have immigrated to Canada and whom we count amongst our most worthy and loyal citizens. We all have friends of German extraction and we know them to be of the highest integrity, of great industry and men whose words are as good as their bond. Given the proper leadership, I am confident that the young men and women in Germany will develop into the same type of citizen as their countrymen have become in Canada. That must be our aim if we are to have peace in the world. That aim cannot be attained if we allow a condition to prevail in that country which will be increasingly resented by and unfriendly to the Allied nations.

I am convinced that the alternative to rearming Germany can only result in complete disaster to those whose aim is universal peace. It is impossible under present circumstances to keep Germany disarmed and neutralized for ever. The Germans are a dynamic, powerful and proud people numbering 50 million, in the heart of Europe. The suggestion that they should be kept disarmed and neutralized for ever is completely impractical. The present occupational arrangements cannot continue for ever. On the contrary, to give her unconditional sovereignty at the present time might be disastrous, but to admit her into the Western European Union and to the Atlantic system under the provisions and limitations which I have set forth is the best possible means of having her as one of our allies. In this manner we accept her into the society of free democracies, where she rightly belongs, instead of driving her into the communistic camp, which is contrary to her natural philosophy. Proof of her feeling in this regard is seen in the fact that in the recent elections in West Germany the Communists polled only 2·7 per cent of the total vote.

Honourable senators, it is my sincere conviction that all Canadians should warmly welcome these agreements which associate the German Federal Republic with the West in a manner which constitutes a new advance in the development of the Atlantic community and a notable strengthening of the security of free men everywhere. Most important, perhaps, these agreements, reached only as a result of often exacting compromises of national interests on the part of the states most directly concerned, preserve the unity and confidence of the North Atlantic Alliance during a most crucial period in its history. The dark clouds of disillusionment and despair which arose on the Western horizon following the collapse of EDC have given way to hope and a growing feeling of mutual confidence and trust both in Europe and on this side of the Atlantic. The agreements have strengthened the bonds binding ourselves and our large neighbour to the south to our allies in Western Europe, and have resulted in renewed prospects for continuing transatlantic co-operation both with respect to defence and to non-military matters. In addition, they provide a firm foundation for unity and strength from which I am convinced it will prove possible to work towards an easing of international tension and the removal of the differences which divide the world today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald)? In his remarks he did not indicate the stage at which the proceedings now stand and what action has yet to be taken to confirm the agreements with France, Germany and any other countries in the NATO alliance. Could he give us any information on that point?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not have information as to what stage has been reached in the procedure respecting these agreements with the other countries. This protocol must be presented to the legislative bodies of the different nations concerned and be agreed upon by them. While I do not know what further is required of the other countries, I do know that as far as Canada is concerned we felt this protocol had to be approved by Parliament before the next step could be taken. It is for that reason that I now present it for ratification by this house.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not intend to follow the line pursued by the honourable Leader of the Government and review the historical background of the agreements, as he has quite properly done, nor shall I go into as much detail on the subject as I did when I spoke on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, there are one or two remarks I should like to make about the proceedings at this stage.

The decision to ratify the agreements and thereby allow Germany to rearm is a very grave decision for the people of Canada to have to make. We cannot forget that Canada took her part in fighting a war in 1914-18 against the German people, for almost every one of us had relatives who fought in that war, some of whom never came back. No less can we forget the war of 1939-45, which is even fresher in our memories, and which again required the service, and in some cases the lives, of some of our relatives.

As a third milestone in this history of events involving the German people, we as members of the Canadian Parliament cannot forget that during the Second World War we deliberately took the side of Russia in her fight against Germany. All honourable senators who were members of this house at that time felt that we were taking the right side in that struggle, but, rightly or wrongly, we along with the members of the other house were prepared deliberately to take the stand on the side of Russia against Germany.

Now that the tables have turned, there is no use in people pointing the finger at one of us and saying: "Weren't you one of the men who in 1942 voted to help Russia in her fight against Germany? And now you have Russia on your hands." To that question I would have to reply in the affirmative, but I would hasten to point out that for the representatives of the people in Parliament that was no easy decision to make. We were familiar with the history of Russia throughout the Czar regime and afterwards, yet we were prepared calmly and deliberately to decide that from our standpoint in world affairs at that day it was better for us to ally ourselves with Russia than with Germany. Whether we were right or wrong in that decision, I repeat, we did it with our eyes open, and let no one say that their representatives in Parliament were not well aware of the fateful decision they were called upon to make. There was no clear road to follow; we had to decide in our own hearts and minds what was best in the interests of the world as a whole, and particularly in the interests of Canada.

In our debate on the subject now before us we are bound to recall these incidents I have recited. If your brother, son or some other relative was killed in the First World War or in the Second World War, or was one of the airmen who were shot while prisoners of war in Germany, there is little use of your trying to forget the history of our struggles against Germany.

In the world today we are faced with dilemmas more than at any other period of time in our history. Since 1912, starting with the sinking of the Titanic, we have had one disaster after another, and today we seem to be right in the centre of more of them. However, we must do the best we can to meet conditions as they develop.

Let me mention some other places in the world that are in trouble. France, which is situated close to Germany, and was until recently one of the great powers of Europe, is very much divided. The Premier of France, Mr. Mendes-France, with consummate skill and judgment, has steered his measures through the French Parliament, and this in the face of a dwindling majority right from the start. That is the situation he has faced right along. Certainly, one may say, if the vote of the communist members is left out of the picture he had a large majority for his measures, but it must be remembered that the communist members are there, that they were elected by the people, and form part of the Parliament of that country.

In the consideration of this resolution, however, here is a point that disturbs me: as we are 2,000 or 3,000 miles away from France, is our judgment as to what Germany will do in the next twenty-five years as good as the judgment of the French people? I believe that is a question that also troubles many other men and women in this country.

I understand there are certain gentlemen in this Parliament—and I will not say to what branch of Parliament they belong—who are against approving the protocol. However, I am convinced that the best judgment I can employ, as a senator from the province of Manitoba and as leader of my party, is this —and I think it is in the interest of Canada, the interest of the free world and the interest of humanity as a whole—that we should ratify these agreements with Germany and help if possible to bring freedom to all the people of the world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Now, I have one criticism that I want to make of the Government. I made it the other day when referring to the United Nations, but I will repeat it. We are just a new country in the field of world affairs, but in the last twenty years we have become more and more involved in them, to the extent that we need an expanding Department of External Affairs to look after our interests in that field. However, I believe that we do not give as much emphasis to nonpartisan policies in foreign affairs as we ought to. I have heard a good deal of criticism of the United States, but I was agreeably surprised the other day at the support which the President of that country received for a message that he sent to both houses of Congress. On a division in the House of Representatives there were 409 votes in favour of his recommendation and only 3 against it.

Now, let me pause right here and make a comment. That convinced me that those men and women in the House of Representatives were familiar with the problem that the President was dealing with. No person can form a reasoned judgment about something unless he or she knows all the facts concerning it—not just the transitory facts, but the facts in relation to the period during which the matter in question has existed. I do not think that we can blame our government for lack of information here, but I am blaming it for what I think is the introduction of too much governmental responsibility in the Department of External Affairs.

I feel there would be no opposition in Canada to the ratification of these agreements if the issues were clearly and completely understood by all our people. Perhaps you will say, "See here, Haig, you are wrong, for the communists will influence some people to vote against this agreement." My honourable friend who sits next to me (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) received a letter the other day from a lady in Ottawa, and he showed it to me as if he had just received a prized communication. I remarked at the time "Well, my dear Walter, I am glad your wife is not here to see you getting that kind of mail. However, I received yesterday a copy of this letter which came to you today, so you are only number two on the list, not number one." The signature on each was exactly the same. I only mention this to show the kind of campaign we are up against.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What was in the letter?

Hon. Mr. Haig: All the reasons why we should vote against the ratification of these agreements, and thus vote in favour of the Russians. The writer said that they are the peace-loving people, who will save the world for democracy if only we will vote against ratification of the protocol, against the German people, or words to that effect. The letter covered a whole page of closely typed text. I thought I was the only one to whom it was sent, until I found out that the senator from Rosetown got a copy.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: She did not write to the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That illustrates the situation that we have in Canada today. In my circle of acquaintances in western Canada I can count families who lost a boy or two boys in the last war, and I know of one family that lost three. At the time of the First Great War, in 1917, I spoke at a public meeting, and I asked the chairman not to read the second verse of God Save the King, because the candidate running for the Opposition had, by that year, lost three of his sons, and they had been buried in France. People cannot forget such things.

However, on taking all these matters into consideration I believe that the cause of freedom and the cause of democracy will be better served by our ratifying these agreements than by our voting against them. I feel sure that the members in another place who apparently are going to vote against these agreements will regret so doing in the years to come. Their action will be a mark against them personally—I do not mean publicly, but inwardly they will wish they had voted the other way.

I know that the second chamber in France has not ratified the agreements yet. Germany also has not ratified them yet, and may not ratify them, so we may be doing something here to no purpose. But I am still prepared to go through with it and vote in favour of the protocol.

The people of Canada place a trust in us, believing that men or women who become senators have something to give to the country that cannot be given in any other way. I am persuaded that in the discharge of our duty we should vote for this resolution, in the hope that thereby we shall help to widen the boundaries of the free world.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, the resolution now before the Senate asks us to approve of the international agreements which were reached at Paris in October of last year. As the honourable the Leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said, and I think nobody will disagree with him, this is one of the most important and in fact one of the most vital things that this house has had to consider for some years past. This resolution and these agreements are being submitted to us in the Parliament of Canada because Canada is one of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization set up in 1949, generally referred to as NATO. What, in essence, do these agreements contain? They provide for four things. Firstly, they establish a new community of the peoples of Western Europe under the name of "Western European Union". Secondly, they provide for the admission to NATO of the West German Republic. Thirdly, they create a basis for lasting French-German co-operation. Fourthly, they introduce the West German Republic as a free partner in a free community of nations.

One might inquire how these aims have been achieved. As has been explained by the Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), this has been done by modifying the Brussels Treaty of 1948 by admitting, as parties to that treaty, Germany and Italy, and, in effect, making the Brussels Treaty as so modified a part of NATO. The original parties to that treaty were the European allies in the last war. The documents which we are now asked to approve appear in detail as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of this house of January 20 last; and I think I should read to honourable members the declaration made by the original members of the Brussels Treaty, inviting Italy and Germany to become partners:

The governments of Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, parties to the Brussels Treaty of March the 17th, 1948 for collaboration in economic, social and cultural matters and for legitimate collective self-defence;

Aware that the principles underlying the association created by the Brussels Treaty are also recognised and applied by the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy;

Noting with satisfaction that their devotion to peace and their allegiance to democratic institutions constitute common bonds between the countries of Western Europe;

Convinced that an association with the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy would represent a new and substantial advance in the direction already indicated by the treaty;

Decide, in application of article IX of the treaty, to invite the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy to accede to this treaty, as modified and completed . . .

and so forth.

The second document to which I direct the attention of the Senate is the protocol, or as one might call it, the agreement entered into by the original parties to the Brussels Treaty and the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy. The text will be found on page 7 of the appendix. The parties to this agreement are the heads of states of the original parties to the Brussels agreement, the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, and the President of the Italian Republic. In their preamble they say this:

Inspired by a common will to strengthen peace and security;

Desirous to this end of promoting the unity and of encouraging the progressive integration of Europe;

Convinced that the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Italian Republic to the treaty will represent a new and substantial advance towards these aims;

Having taken into consideration the decisions of the London Conference . . .

Have appointed their Plenipotentiaries: . . .

Have agreed as follows:

And I point out to you that article III of the agreement regarding military matters says this:

"In the execution of the treaty the high contracting parties and any organs established by them under the treaty shall work in close co-operation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization".

Recognising the undesirability of duplicating the military staffs of NATO, the council and its agency will rely on the appropriate military authorities of NATO for information and advice on military matters.

That is the Brussels Pact end of the treaty. We come now to what was done by the parties to the NATO agreement, including Canada, and that will be found on page 25, a resolution of the North Atlantic Council of the 22nd of October 1954. I venture to quote it to the house:

Recognising that all the arrangements arising out of the London Conference form part of one general settlement which is directly or indirectly of concern to all the NATO powers and has therefore been submitted to the Council for information or decision;

Have learnt with satisfaction of the arrangements agreed between the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America and of the Federal Republic of Germany for the termination of the occupation régime in the Federal Republic as set forth in the protocol communicated to the Council;

Welcome the decision of the Brussels Treaty Powers to invite the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy to accede to the Brussels Treaty as modified and completed—

And so on.

Welcome the extension of the Brussels Treaty as an important step toward the achievement of European unity; and express confidence that there will be the closest co-operation between the Western European Union and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which remains the foundation of the security and progress of the Atlantic Community.

Take note with satisfaction of the statements made on 29th September, 1954, in London by the United States Secretary of State and the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, and of the declaration by the Foreign Secretary of the United Kingdom concerning the maintenance of United Kingdom forces on the continent of Europe;

Finally, record their deep satisfaction at the happy conclusion of all the above arrangements which together constitute a decisive step in fortifying the North Atlantic Alliance and uniting the free world.

One final quotation which I want to inflict upon the house is the declaration made by Canada as a party to the NATO agreement. It is to be found on page 30. It is headed "Canadian Affirmation", and reads as follows:

"As far as we are concerned, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization remains the focal point of our participation in collective defence and of our hope for the development of closer co-operation with the other peoples of the Atlantic community. As such, it remains a foundation of Canadian foreign policy. While we emphasize, then, our belief in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we welcome the proposed extension of the Brussels Treaty. We shall look forward to a growing relationship, within the framework of NATO, with the new Brussels Treaty organization, composed of countries with whom we are already bound by such close ties."

That is the sort of skeleton framework upon which these agreements have been built up.

In brief, the Brussels Treaty as amended provides for military contributions to their mutual defence by all the member states. It controls the armaments and the nature of the contributions by those states; and it places in the hands of the Supreme Commander of NATO in Europe, General Gruenther, far-reaching authority in the inspection, direction and military integration of those forces. I do not think anybody in the democratic countries will deny that in its military aspect the Brussels pact is purely and solely defensive in character. It is a mutual agreement for defence against an attack from outside. It threatens nobody, and neither the Soviet Union nor any other country can successfully pretend to the contrary. But I do want to stress that it is not solely or even primarily a military alliance. It is also an instrument, as honourable senators will have heard from what I have read, for the integration of the countries of Western Europe in all fields. In that, rather than in its purely military aspect, lies the hope of the future.

May I say just a word about the circumstances under which these agreements came into being? I shall not follow the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) in what he has said. He has given some aspects of it. He mentioned quite truly that they came into effect as a direct result of the rejection by the French Parliament on August 13, 1954, of the European Defence Community, commonly known as EDC. Honourable members will recall the shocked surprise with which all of us on this continent heard the news of that rejection. I do not propose to enter into any recriminations; they are entirely unnecessary and the matter is now past history. But it did seem at that moment, as our honourable Leader has said, as if all hope of Western European union, of mutual understanding between France and Germany, and of a united stand by the democratic nations against the menace of communist aggression had failed. That hope was not abandoned. That within a few short weeks an acceptable alternative to EDC was reached in the form of the Paris agreements which are now before us for approval, was due, I think, indubitably to the statesmanship and the courage of three men: Sir Anthony Eden, Mr. John Foster Dulles, and Premier Mendès-France, and of these men I would certainly put Sir Anthony Eden first.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I believe it is due to him and his influence that for the first time in its history the British Government, under these agreements, has made a radical change in its previous policy. For the first time it has agreed to participation in European defence and has undertaken that British troops will not be withdrawn from the continent against a majority vote of the signatories of the Brussels pact.

Our Leader has given the text of that undertaking by the British Government. I do not need to repeat it, but I do say that it is a remarkable advance. It is one to be welcomed, and it is, I believe, the one thing which has reconciled the Parliament and the people of France to the prospect of the rearming of Western Germany, for which these agreements provide.

I said that we were shocked when the French Parliament rejected the European Defence Community last August; but looking back, and with the advantage of hindsight, it may perhaps be true that the European Defence Community was a little ahead of its time. It provided, as honourable senators will remember, for a tightly-knit international military force composed of units from the different member states. It was an organization which, I think it is true to say, was far in advance of any political union that had yet been achieved between those member states. It was, one might say, a West European federal force without a federal political organization to sustain it, and, even more important, without the necessary public opinion in favour of such a federal force or such a federal organization.

The new arrangements for which these agreements provide are looser. They are more flexible, and perhaps for that very reason they are more easily workable. They do have the advantage that they correspond more closely with the present political position of the member states in relation to the question of European union.

We all hope and pray for a closer union in all spheres between the states of Western Europe and particularly between France and Germany. But these things must come by degrees. You cannot force them too far or too hard. What we can say about the Paris agreements that are now before us is that they do provide a means by which the growth of their unity can be fostered and encouraged. For that reason I think they must be particularly welcome to two honourable members of this house, gentlemen who have taken such an outstanding lead in promoting the matter of international integration. I refer to His Honour the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and to the honourable gentleman from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler).

I do not think it is necessary to go into any more of the details of these treaties, but I do want to deal for a few moments with the arguments which have been advanced against this resolution and against these treaties. As the honourable Leader opposite (Hon. Mr. Haig) has said, they have not been advanced in this house but they have been advanced by certain members of the CCF party in the other place, and in the country as well. I do not agree with those arguments, but I am quite certain that they are advanced in good faith. I do not say the same, of course, about what is said to us by the negligible little communist clique in this country. They are impervious to discussion of any kind and they simply follow the instructions given them by their masters in Moscow.

What are the two principal arguments against these treaties which are advanced by their opponents? First of all, they object to the rearmament of Western Germany because of the danger of a revival of German militarism. Secondly, they say "Instead of signing these agreements which involve German rearmament you should make an effort to settle your differences with Soviet Russia around the conference table."

I want to deal first of all with this argument against the rearmament of Germany. I do not intend to deal with the many safeguards against what one might call a runaway German rearmament which these agreements entail. They have been dealt with very aptly and exhaustively by the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald); but what is the basic reason for this argument? It is, of course, that the people who use it fear the recrudescence of German militarism in its extreme form. They remember the time of the theory of the "Master Race" that was destined to conquer and rule the world. It is only natural that many of us—in fact, nearly all of us in this country, and particularly those of us who fought in either of the two great wars—should view the proposed rearmament of Germany with some concern.

I am going to advance an argument which may not appeal to some honourable senators, but I venture to state that in my belief the danger of a recrudescence of extreme German militarism has gone, and that it will not return. I may be wrong in that statement, but an examination of European history does lend support to the view which I have expressed. After all, the Germans are not the first people who have threatened and tried to conquer Europe. In the 16th century the danger was from the armed might of Spain, which at that time was by far the strongest force in Europe, and it reached its apex when the Armada sailed from the shores of Spain in the early summer of 1588 to conquer England. That was the apex of the danger. But when the Armada was finally sunk and dispersed, the danger instantly disappeared, and from that day to this Spain has never been a military threat to the rest of Europe.

Again, from about the end of the 17th century to the beginning of the 19th century, France tried at one time or another to dominate Europe. That was roughly the period from the reign of Louis XIV to Napoleon; or to put it into an English context, the time between Marlborough and Wellington. But after the final defeat of Napoleon, in 1815, the French dream of a conquered Europe died, and it has had no resurrection.

In the same way, I believe we can look back upon the period from the middle of the last century to the middle of this century, the period beginning with Bismarck and ending with Hitler, as the epoch of the attempt by Germany to dominate Europe. And I think we may look upon the two world wars which we have known in our generation, that is, the war of 1914-1918, and the war of 1939-1945, as constituting together the culmination of that attempt. But just as the dream of Spanish domination died with the Armada in 1688, and just as the dream of French domination died on the field of Waterloo in 1815, so do I believe that the dream of German domination died with Hitler in the Reich Chancellery in Berlin on the 29th of April, 1945.

I know it is going to be difficult for us to accept this view, with our so recent memories of all the horrors of extreme German militarism, the concentration camps, the massacres, and all the rest of it. And we must realize that it is going to be even more difficult for the people of France to accept that view—the unfortunate people of France, who have suffered the untold evil of invasion from Germany three times in the last 85 years. Nevertheless, I believe what I have said to be true, and I think that future history will bear out what I have said. But I will go further than that. If in the future some race should attempt to achieve military domination over Europe, which God forbid, I suggest to honourable senators that the danger will not come from Germany, it will come from farther east; and if that danger should ever eventuate, then I suggest that the people of Germany, by their history, by their religion, and by the long story of their leadership in European civilization and progress, will inevitably be on the side of the West.

It is for these reasons, honourable senators, that I refuse to accept the argument that these agreements should be rejected because they provide for the rearmament of Germany, particularly in the limited and controlled way in which they so provide; and I agree entirely with what was said last evening by the honourable senator from King's (Hon. Mr. McDonald), that the danger of not rearming Germany, in the present condition of Europe, is far greater than the danger of rearming Germany.

Now I want to deal, for a few moments, with the second argument advanced by the opponents of this resolution. They tell us that in place of these agreements we should hold another conference with the leaders of Soviet Russia in an attempt to settle our differences. In his noble speech in the other place last week the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave an extensive history of the failure of the international conferences which have been held during the past few years in an attempt to reach an agreement with the Soviet Union. It will not be necessary for me to repeat what he said on that occasion and, indeed, it would be rather presumptuous on my part if I did, but I do want to deal with this argument in a broader and more general way.

Remember, these agreements are designed to strengthen the forces of western democracy in NATO by the rearmament of Western Germany. I believe that those who urge us to enter into negotiations with the Soviet as an alternative to approving these agreements fail to realize or do not understand the basic Russian attitude in international affairs. It is an attitude which the Russians have held consistently, whether they have been ruled by Czar or by Soviet, and examples of it are spread throughout their history, if you care to look for them. The Russian attitude is this: In international relationships they will respect armed strength and armed strength alone.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I said there are many examples of that, and let me offer one or two of them to the house. The first is an incident, perhaps minor in its character, but really rather characteristic, and it will be recalled by many honourable senators as occurring toward the end of the last war, during one of the Allied conferences at which Stalin was present. Some member or other of the conference referred to what might be the attitude of the Pope under certain circumstances, and Stalin immediately came back with the caustic query: "The Pope? How many divisions has he got?"

The second instance to which I would like to direct the attention of the house is an occurrence now long forgotten, but which I happened to come across only the other day when I was reading the new Life of Gladstone written by Sir Philip Magnus which, incidentally, is a most delightful and beautifully written book.

It was in the year 1885. Gladstone was Prime Minister. General Gordon had just been murdered at Khartum by the fanatical followers of the Mahdi, and in response to a clamorous demand from public opinion in Great Britain, Gladstone's government had arranged for a large expeditionary force to be organized to invade the Sudan and crush the Mahdi. Seeing, or believing, that British attention was thus concentrated on the Valley of the Nile, the Russian Government of that day thought it saw its opportunity, and Russian forces invaded Afghanistan, on the borders of India. Gladstone acted at once. He countermanded the Sudan expedition. He went down to the House of Commons and got from that house a special vote of credit of £11 million, and he announced that the forces of the Empire would be immediately concentrated to meet the threat of Russian aggression. The effect was instantaneous. Faced with that resolute attitude the Russians drew back at once, and withdrew their troops from Afghanistan.

Now, I should like to give a third example, which has relation to the happenings in Europe during the last three or four years. It cannot be so clearly pinpointed or accurately defined as the other two examples which I gave, but I think it has its significance in the context of what I am trying to urge. I think it is generally agreed that in the last three or four years the danger of a third great war breaking out in Europe has diminished to an appreciable extent. We no longer believe, and the people of Western Europe no longer believe as they did three or four years ago, that a Soviet attack upon the West might take place at almost any time.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not say that all danger is over. Still less do I say that we should relax by one jot or tittle our efforts to strengthen ourselves and the other western democracies in NATO; but I do say that the most responsible opinion in international political circles holds that there has been a distinct lessening of tension in Europe over the past three or four years.

If that be so, honourable senators, I strongly suspect that the reason for that lessening of tension has been the very fact that since 1950 NATO has been in existence, and that under NATO we and our allies of the West are becoming stronger year by year. That is a matter which of course is entirely incapable of proof, but I think it is true and I think it does support what I have already said.

I could give more examples, but I think I have given enough in support of what I say is the general principle followed by the rulers of Russia, whatever form that rule may take, that they respect only armed strength.

Now, if that is admitted, surely that is an effective answer to those who argue that before we approve these agreements we should try once more to negotiate with the Soviets. I don't disapprove of negotiations. Negotiate by all means, but, I say, wait until you can negotiate from strength. Approve these agreements first; get the rearmament of Germany underway first; negotiate then, but not before, and your negotiations will have a far greater prospect of success than they have today.

Needless to say, honourable senators, in what I have just said I am not in the least degree being original. The same thing has been said over the past two or three months by every one of the leaders of opinion in Western Europe who are particularly competent to advise in matters of international relationships. It has been said by Sir Anthony Eden, by Dr. Adenauer, by Mr. John Foster Dulles, by Premier Mendès-France and by our own Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now I am sure that this house will be willing to follow the advice of men such as these, rather than to accept the opinions of a few well-meaning but mistaken individuals in this country who urge a contrary view.

Honourable senators, I have tried to deal, I hope at not too tedious a length, with the two arguments advanced against the adoption of this resolution, namely, the argument against the rearmament of Germany and the argument for a conference with the Soviets. I have done my best to show what I believe to be the flaws in those two arguments. I have nothing more to say except to express the hope, and the confident belief, that this house will vote unanimously in favour of the resolution which is now before it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette: Honourable senators, as it is not my intention to speak on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I hope I am in order at this time in offering my congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address. The honourable lady senator from Victoria certainly lived up to her fine reputation of eloquence and logic. The same compliment may be paid to the honourable senator from Lauzon, who gave a very interesting and practical speech, into which he injected some of the Irish wit which he no doubt inherits from his mother.

I should also like to take this opportunity to thank the Government for having appointed as assistant to the Leader of the Government in this house the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout). I have already extended felicitations by letter to my honourable friend on his appointment. I am confident that he will be of great assistance not only to the honourable leader in this house but to the Senate itself. It was my privilege to observe for a long time his effective work and function as Premier of the province of Quebec. In that capacity he was instrumental in having had passed some courageous and constructive legislation which will remain for all years to come a monument to his renown.

I believe, honourable senators, I hold the distinction of having been the first to prophesy that the honourable senator from Montarville would become the Premier of Quebec. Shortly after his appointment as provincial Minister of Agriculture he was chosen by the then Premier, the Honourable Mr. Taschereau, to make a speech at a special convention held at Ville Marie, which I also attended. At that convention, which was composed for the most part of farmers, my honourable friend held the audience in the hollow of his hand for a full half-hour. He then cautioned himself that he must not speak too long and thus tire his audience. They implored him to continue, and he talked for another ten minutes. Upon my return from Ville Marie I wrote the Honourable Mr. Taschereau, saying I was positive that Mr. Godbout would one day be Premier of the province. Subsequent events proved that I had prophesied well.

I offer my honourable friend from Montarville my best wishes for the great success he merits.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Honourable Senators, I speak to this resolution in all humility, for I am fully aware of the tremendous international problems that threaten the peace of the world today. The events involving Formosa are fresh in our minds. Every citizen of the democratic world is aware of the high tension and feelings that exist in the Eastern hemisphere today, and that it would take only a spark to start another conflagration. But Providence must be on our side, for we believe almost implicitly in the good judgment and leadership which has been given to the world by the great republic to the south of us since the end of the last war.

When speaking to this resolution, honourable senators, I will try to voice the sentiments of the majority of the people in the section of the country where I live. I say this because there are in my district quite a number of study clubs which have studied intensively the North Atlantic Treaty and the protocol on accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, and in most cases they came to the conclusion that for the sake of peace this protocol should be accepted by our two houses. I am strongly in accord with such conclusion, which is natural to Canadian citizens because we have always desired peace in the world, and more ardently in our time, as we wonder what humanity is going to do on the road ahead now that the H-bomb is a reality. We sincerely hope it is a road that will take us ultimately to peace. It will likely be a long road, but we shall have to travel it, hoping to surmount whatever obstacles and pitfalls are encountered, however disheartening some of them may be. There will be many mirages beckoning us to pleasant oases that do not exist. We shall have to shun easy illusions, toil through rough realities, with the hydrogen bomb our companion and peace our compulsion. To the present situation there is no alternative. On the one side there is peace; on the other side there is death and the destruction of civilization as we know it at the moment.

Whence the hydrogen bomb? The people of antiquity had astrologers who studied the firmament, and tried to discover the influence of stars on human affairs, but where they failed, modern man succeeded. He studied the stars and the sun and saw fusion. Triumphantly he produced a miniature sun, capable of destroying great cities and millions of people. Many of the older civilizations made the sun a god, but so far we have made him a terribly destructive devil. How can we chain the demon? No man and no nation can yet answer surely, but one thing is certain, that if all the nations now fully aware of its immeasurable power realize that this could be used to bring about the destruction of our world, it could then be turned to peaceful uses exclusively, in which event it would become a boon, yes a blessing, to mankind.

Certainly we do not want to live for generations on the brink of a deadly and fathomless abyss, precariously held by a hair between life and death. We have to search as never before for the way to peace. There are many false ways but ultimately we have to find, we must find, a true one.

One false way, which is very appealing and seductive, is the hope for easy, quick disarmament and the outlawry of atomic weapons. On this matter we are bound to ask ourselves this question: Is disarmament a mirage? The record says that it is, and it says so very distinctly.

In 1898 the Czar of Russia, Nicholas II, convoked a disarmament conference at The Hague. I have not the time to go into detail, but what resulted from this effort to humanize war? Nothing.

Disarmament was again in the forefront at the Washington Naval Conference in 1921 and at the London Conference in 1930. Some limitations were put on the strength or size of the navies of the attending powers, but the bulk of their fleets remained intact and fully able to fight—and subsequently they did fight.

Then came years of discussion by the League of Nations at Geneva. And what effect did it have on the size of the armies that started World War II? History certainly does not record any effect whatsoever, yet the mirage of disarmament survived. In 1946 the delegates to the General Assembly of the United Nations tried to establish international control of the A-bomb, and kept on trying in vain for three years. Finally, frustrated both by the problem itself and the attitude of the delegates from the Soviet Union, the Assembly gave up the attempt. Efforts made to control the H-bomb have been similarly unsuccessful.

It has been well said that disarmament will not precede peace. It will follow peace. But how are we going to achieve peace? Some think that it may be done by the exchange of promises between nations. Such people need to be reminded of the Kellogg-Briand Treaty of 1929, which outlawed war as an instrument of national policy. It was signed by some 60 nations, including Germany and Japan. Did that pact achieve peace? It certainly did not; and to rely implicitly on that line of action would not only be dangerous but might prove to be fatal.

But there are advocates of even a more drastic method. They would use world force to capture peace. They would strengthen the United Nations to such a point as to make it a world government, possessing an international army to suppress all armed outbreaks.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to article 43 of the United Nations Charter. It orders each member to agree with the Security Council to set aside a quota of its armed forces to be held in instant readiness to respond to any call by the Council. This is the paper agreement for an international army to overcome any nation that breaks the peace. How many members have negotiated such an agreement? Not a single one. It became possible for the democratic countries to send soldiers to Korea solely because of the fact that Russia stayed away from the meetings of the Security Council at which the proposal of the democratic countries was under consideration. If Russia had vetoed the proposal it would not have been possible to send to Korea any forces under the banner of the United Nations.

What, then, remains? It remains for the democratically inclined countries to work together for the ends of peace. We must, however, realize that even at the present time among ourselves we are not really enjoying peace to the full. We now have two worlds, two distinct worlds. With all the genius that has been put into the development of methods of transportation, making this planet of ours so small, it is horrible to think that we have two worlds on the same planet, two worlds just as distinct, one from the other, as if they were ten million miles apart.

Even the nations of the free world are almost continuously engaged in economic conflicts, in political recriminations, in covert or open distrust. Sometimes we act much as prima donnas in our dealings with one another. This is so true that in relation to the protocol we are now debating there has been much unwarranted criticism, recrimination and show of temper against France. And right here I want to compliment the previous speakers upon the stand they took. As the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) said, France has suffered not only in lives but in resources as well. In the war of 1914 France lost nearly a generation of men. It has even been said that most soldiers of France in the World War II had never known their fathers, because they had been killed in World War I. These attacks against France were made when that great and proud nation was trying to play the role that she desires to play, which role was not made any easier by the very unfair and biased denunciations emanating from nations that were supposed to be friendly. Many nations, including Canada, would have been deeply wounded in their pride if the same attitude had been adopted towards them.

For instance, a man very prominent in the United States Government, who has accomplished notable deeds in the international field, by-passed France when EDC was rejected by that country. That was a direct insult to a truly great nation. France, however, is used to forgetting and forgiving. So although the legitimate pride of the French people was deeply wounded, this incident also was forgiven, primarily for the sake of peace and unity. I feel certain that the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate will have important consequences in promoting the establishment of peace, and it is for that reason that I so strongly support it.

There is in this country an element that may be called "Little Canadians". With them, whatever we do is either too little or too late. But, speaking from the experience of visits to various sections of the world since the end of the last war, I affirm that there is no nation which evokes more feelings of respect abroad than Canada; for though, numerically speaking, a small state, Canada has proclaimed its ideals and shown readiness to make the sacrifices necessary to maintain those ideals. When principles of freedom, democracy and Christianity were in jeopardy, Canadians at once answered the call to arms. They did not need to be coaxed into participation either in World War I or World War II, and they responded quickly to the call when hostilities began in Korea. We sought no financial or territorial aggrandizement. We fought for idealism, for principles which we cherish, and we shall not be turned from our purposes by either the leaders of Soviet Russia, or by those so-called peace advocates in our own country who pester us with suggestions that the Canadian people desire war. No civilized nation desires war; and charges of war-mongering must be resented by any real Canadian.

Wars nowadays are not what they used to be. For one thing, there is the danger of enormous destruction by the H-bomb. In the old days, battles were waged by professional armies, by a hired soldiery. Indeed, centuries ago there was current in France the phrase la guerre joyeuse—joyous war; and there, as in other European countries, attacks were launched for purposes of personal and national aggrandisement. But "joyous" is about the last term one would think of applying to the struggles of the twentieth century. In future, certainly, every citizen will be conscripted; each man and woman will have a specific part to play. So to meet the perils of the coming days, we must be ready, while seeking peace, to negotiate from strength, since that is the only language which our opponents will respect.

We live in very strenuous times. During the week prior to Christmas, when a motion to ratify the pact was defeated in the French house, we had good reason to be a little fearful. Nevertheless we should try to understand the situation. Those who followed the reports on the radio learned something of the tremendous demonstrations by communists, who in thousands and tens of thousands, paraded around the headquarters of the National Assembly. Supporting them was the influence of hundreds of thousands of French men and women, veterans of two wars, mutilated soldiers and sailors, and people who had lost their all in those terrible struggles, remembering the German armies of occupation and demanding that Germany be not allowed to rearm. Happily, a sounder judgment finally prevailed. Some have said that the majority of twenty-seven deputies for ratification was not enough. But, considering the complications of politics in the French National Assembly, the fact that ninety communists voted solidly against the agreement, and that many non-communist deputies abstained from voting at all, I regard the majority as a comparatively large one. I believe that its decision will be respected by France and the French people, as it always has been in the past. When it was known, we all became immediately elated, because we knew it would make our cause stronger than ever before.

As the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) and other speakers have reminded us, dread of Germany has been prevalent for a long time, and with good reason. But we must consider the situation as it is today. Let us reflect that for centuries our two great motherlands, Great Britain and France were fighting nearly all the time. Although separated by no more than a little branch of the sea, in nearly every decade these fine peoples spilled their blood in conflict with each other. But since the entente cordiale was established at the beginning of the century there has been no friendship firmer than theirs. Again, in World War I Turkey was our opponent; in the last war the Turkish people supported the Allies. In recent days Chancellor Herr Adenauer has given outstanding leadership; he has proved himself a great statesman, a real friend of democracy, and a courageous leader, who is also a great admirer of France. I believe that under these auspices Germany will play her full role in the attainment of a final peace in our time.

The fact that Great Britain has abandoned its isolationist policies has highly elated the Allies. Her reluctance to do so was only natural, in view of the special relationship in which she and the other members of the Commonwealth stand to one another, and the virtual impossibility of agreeing beforehand on what they will do in any emergency. But the declaration made by Sir Anthony Eden gave heart and hope to France and other Western European nations. I am convinced that if Britain had committed herself in the critical days before World War I to participation by the side of France, the Kaiser would never have dared to attack that country; for when he discovered, after his invasion of Belgium, that Britain had determined to enter the war against him, he realized that his was a lost cause. A similar example of British hesitancy occurred before the war of 1939: at that time the United Kingdom Cabinet warned France that if French troops aided Czechoslovakia against the German invasion she would not be supported by Britain. This decision, I believe, was a main factor in determining Hitler to send his armies against the Czechs. But again, German aggression was eventually defeated by Britain's determination to resist him to the last man and the last woman. I must pay tribute to the leadership of that great country at that time. In the matter of leadership, all through her history, Britain has been well served. One has only to look at the etchings of those masterful Prime Ministers which adorn the corridor leading to the Parliamentary restaurant, to realize how wonderfully fortunate she has been in this respect. Unfortunately for France, 1939 produced no Clemenceau, but, happily for Great Britain, it produced a Churchill. Mr. Churchill did a magnificent job, and was, I believe one of the greatest factors in the winning of the last war, because even during the darkest hours he never lost the hope of ultimate victory for our cause.

Let me now say a few words about Germany, having reference to some features of this protocol. Article I of the schedule states that the three powers will terminate the occupation regime in Western Germany, revoke the occupation statute, and abolish the offices of the land commissioners. The Federal Republic is accorded "the full authority of a sovereign state over its internal and external affairs."

That is a message which every German will fully understand. It will do much to free the hearts and souls of the people and to increase their confidence. We cannot keep indefinitely in the chains of occupation the entire German nation. This decision will have fateful repercussions, by no means confined to West Germany. One has only to remember the revolt of the workers in the eastern section of Germany a year ago, when they tried to fight tanks with their bare fists, to realize the temper of these people and their unconquerable hope of reunion. It was a sign of the times.

The protocol provides the following:

> Declaration by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany.
> The German Federal Republic has agreed to conduct its policy in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and accepts the obligations set forth in article 2 of the Charter.
> Upon her accession to the North Atlantic Treaty and the Brussels Treaty, the German Federal Republic declares that she will refrain from any action inconsistent with the strictly defensive character of the two treaties. In particular the German Federal Republic undertakes never to have recourse to force to achieve the reunification of Germany or the modification of the present boundaries of the German Federal Republic, and to resolve by peaceful means any disputes which may arise between the Federal Republic and other states.

At first it would seem that these provisions are unnecessary, for surely the German people realize that they cannot match Russia's strength. As a matter of fact it is doubtful whether at the present time the united efforts of all free countries could force Russia out of East Germany and her satellite countries. However, one thing the leaders in the Kremlin know is that the ill feeling engendered in the hearts of all Germans over the partition of Prussia will remain forever with them. No matter how much Russia endeavours to inculcate communism into the German people she will never meet with real success, for the Germans will always maintain that there never was any justification for the communists taking part of Germany and giving it to Poland after world war II.

History shows how the people of France and Germany have felt over the problem of Alsace and Lorraine. In 1871, by virtue of a peace treaty signed at Frankfort, the French provinces of Alsace and Lorraine were ceded to the German Empire, and the French always resented this partition. Then in 1919, by virtue of the Treaty of Versailles, the Germans were forced to cede Alsace and Lorraine back to France. This embittered the Germans, and their feeling in this regard has not quite disappeared. I am sure that the attitude of the Germans over the partition of Prussia, though it may take a long time, will eventually have the effect of eroding the steel of communism. And it must be realized that most countries share Germany's sentiment over this issue. You cannot mutilate a country like Germany and not expect it to have a lasting effect on its people, and they will eventually succeed in their legitimate aspiration.

Honourable senators, I place a great deal of trust in the present leadership of Germany. There is no doubt that Herr Adenauer is a wonderful person and a stalwart of democracy. At this time I should like to refer to an address which former American President Herbert Hoover made to the German press in Bonn, in December, 1954. We must respect the words of ex-President Hoover. We all know the magnificent humanitarian work he did in Europe following World War I: in various places on the continent of Europe monuments have been erected to commemorate that work. A man of vision, he was not always fortunate in politics but he has long been recognized as a true statesman. In a newspaper article headed "Europe Bastion is Strong Germany", he is quoted as having said in Bonn:

> The tensions of military conflict with Russia seem to have abated in these recent months. I believe we can have at least a gleam of hope. Moscow has made many declarations of "peaceful coexistence". I would rather they had spoken of "peaceful co-operation". It may be that they want more time to consolidate their gains. It may be that internal forces are working to restrain them from within. Some revolutions have the bad habit of devouring their young. At least their successors are less violent.
> But from our many years' experience with the communists, we must await works rather than words. We should not be lulled into the abondonment of our means of defence. The German peoples have before now been the bastion of Western civilization which deterred its destruction by the Asiatic hordes. My prayer is Germany may be given the unity and freedom which will restore her that mission in the world.

Honourable senators, a little over two years ago I visited many sections of Germany, even spending two days in East Berlin. While staying in West Berlin I made it a point to ascertain the attitude of the young Germans, those of military age, towards the building of a new German army. I must confess they were not very enthusiastic about the idea of being called up. There is one thing you can be certain of, however, and that is that from their experience of two world wars they look upon war as a terrible thing. There is no getting away from that. In particular, these young people vividly recall the effects of World War II. German soil escaped invasion in the first war, but not in the second one. Even now, although some ten years have elapsed since the end of hostilities and great reconstruction has taken place, German cities and towns still bear the scars of the terrific devastation they suffered.

Germans do not like conscription any more than Canadians like taxes. I asked these young people if they would be satisfied to see Germany remain divided in two, and immediately you could see the blood rush to their faces. I further asked them if they would be satisfied if the full sovereignty of Germany were never recognized, and again their faces turned red. It must be remembered that all Germans, whether from the West or East, will never be content as long as their country remains divided. I have seen Germans who live in Bavaria and Northern Italy pray for the unification of the German nation, and for the return of the lost part of Prussia. These are facts which even Russia will have to realize it cannot ignore in attempting to impose its authority over that part of the world indefinitely.

Honourable senators, in concluding my remarks I wish to thank you sincerely for your kind attention. I have spoken with feeling because I believe the people of the world should try to understand one another. I think Canadians have a pretty balanced outlook. While it is true that we are not perfect and are sometimes open to criticism, we are tolerant and have accepted things as they have come. Canada has entered into three major conflicts without expecting remuneration of any kind, her people unquestioningly answering a call to duty. During World War II, when I was Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, I often watched the changing of the guard in front of our Parliament Buildings. I clearly recall the youthful faces of our soldiers, airmen and sailors who carried out these colourful duties. They were fine young men who had no personal quarrel with anyone and who were satisfied with their way of life. They joined our forces, not to fight on Canadian soil but to fight in Europe, Africa, and Asia for principles which all Canadians cherish. Since then I have often wondered how many of those fine young men who were just at the threshold of life and would naturally be thinking of love and building homes of their own, never returned to their homeland. In our own family we lost three fine boys, and one was made an invalid for life. That is why I appreciated what was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) about how we have all suffered. Surely the world has had its lesson. I think that if at least fifteen of the total delegates at the United Nations were chosen from the ranks of mutilated war veterans—armless, legless, blind, crippled for life, incapable of fulfilling duties in the armed forces—everyone attending the meetings of that organization would be vividly impressed with what war really means, with the futility of it and the fact that even the victors do not benefit from the bloodshed and destruction brought about by martial conflict. During the last war, the magazine Life contained some actual pictures of corpses of young Canadian, American, Australian, British and other soldiers, lying mutilated, their bodies were bloated, and one could see the magots in their flesh. The memory of those things should be in the minds of all people. There is no real glory in war.

Honourable senators, I feel positive that the Russian people themselves do not desire war, and I think that if we are to believe in civilization at all we should try to build monuments to peace rather than to war. War is calamitous, and repugnant to God as well as to man. I believe the United Nations are doing a wonderful work toward establishment of peace. In terminating, I want to say this: The aggression part of the Kremlin's mind we must resist to the death. The co-existence part we should encourage, because, speaking candidly, we ourselves also want co-existence, and we believe that sooner or later, knowing the horrifying power of destruction of the H-bomb, we shall find a way to live side by side with our present enemies. I am convinced that when that day comes we shall see that our true enemies were not the millions of Russian people, but the handful of men who ruled them.

A little more than a month ago the Christian world was celebrating the birth of our Lord. On that night, heavenly hosts gave to mankind a wonderful message:

> Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth to men of good will.

That message meant to the world that God's good will is always with us. But it is not only God, it is also men, who must have good will; and when this great gift of the soul, heart and mind animates the actions of mankind, then and then only shall we have peace, that goal we all so ardently desire to obtain.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Euler, the debate was adjourned.

DIVORCE PETITIONS AND STATISTICS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 62 to 87 dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few words which I think will be of interest to the house.

Notices of intention to proceed have been published in 424 cases, and petitions have actually been filed in 368 cases, which will no doubt be completed before the time limit has expired. These figures indicate that we shall have a very heavy docket. Up to date the committee has heard and disposed of 112 cases, none of which have been opposed. So far we have been sitting five days a week, Monday to Friday, but next week we shall sit only on Monday, Tuesday and Friday.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAIL SCHEDULES

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I refer to a question asked of me yesterday by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) with respect to the reduction in travelling time on Canadian Pacific transcontinental trains. The honourable senator asked whether it was the intention of the Canadian National Railways to make a similar reduction, and I replied that I so understood from a press dispatch.

I have since had an opportunity to read the dispatch again, and in all fairness to my honourable friend I must say that it does not state the number of hours by which the Canadian National time schedule will be reduced. I will read the first two paragraphs of the press announcement of January 25 respecting the Canadian National Railways.

> The Canadian National Railways today confirmed that it will fully dieselize its transcontinental passenger train services concurrent with the next time table change on April 24.
> At that time the new transcontinental passenger train will considerably reduce the running time of the Montreal and Toronto section of the Canadian National Railways run to Vancouver.

The honourable senator also asked me another interesting question, and that was why there was a difference between the running times of the eastbound and westbound transcontinental trips.

I find that under the time tables now in effect on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the westbound running time—that is the scheduled time the train is on the track—from Montreal to Vancouver is 87 hours and 10 minutes. The eastbound running time, under the same schedule, is 82 hours and 50 minutes. So the eastbound train, under the present schedule, does the same journey in 4 hours and 20 minutes less than the westbound train.

Under the new schedules to become effective April 24, the westbound running time has been reduced from 87 hours and 10 minutes to 71 hours and 10 minutes: in other words, by 16 hours. Also, under the new schedule, the eastbound running time has been reduced from 82 hours and 50 minutes to 70 hours and 20 minutes: in other words, by 12 hours and 30 minutes. Therefore, whereas under the old schedule the difference between the east and west run was 4 hours and 20 minutes, the difference will now be only 50 minutes.

There are a number of reasons why the running time cannot be the same. For instance, the eastbound and southbound trains are superior to trains in their own class going in the opposite direction, so that the westbound and northbound trains must wait at what railroaders call "meets". If it is a single track and there are sidings the northbound and westbound trains must go into the siding and wait. The fifty minutes difference allows for a slight cushion on the "meets".

Trains are scheduled to arrive, wherever possible, at hours most convenient to the travelling public. Under the new schedules this has been made possible, and other operating adjustments have been made so as to reduce the differential from 4 hours and 20 minutes to 50 minutes.

I hope that explains, in strictly layman's language, just why there is this difference.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It does explain it, but not satisfactorily.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I was not endeavouring to make the explanation satisfactory, but I hope I put it in words which the honourable senator will understand.

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

APPROVAL OF PROTOCOL ON ACCESSION TO NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, seconded by Hon. Mr. Godbout:

Resolved—That it is expedient that the houses of Parliament do approve the protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany, signed by Canada at Paris on October 23, 1954, and that this House do approve the same.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, it is with a certain degree of hesitancy that I rise to take part in this discussion. First, because there is a certain futility in discussing this any further on account of the fact that the resolution will carry, and probably unanimously. Secondly, because it may be that in what I am going to say I shall meet with a certain degree of disapproval. But that is of no real importance. After all, there is no forum in all the world in which a man or a woman can state his or her views more frankly and more clearly than in the Senate of Canada, so I am going to try to discuss certain questions—without prejudice, I hope, and with a sense of objectivity throughout.

I should like to tell the house why I intend to support the resolution. Let me say at once that it is not entirely for the same reason as was given by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and by others who have spoken. I also desire to declare my absolute abhorrence of war—war with its slaughter, its suffering both on the battlefield and at home, its waste, and the hatreds which it foments and which so often in the making of peace treaties results in the sowing of the seeds of another war. When I say that, I am thinking particularly of the Treaty of Versailles, in some features of which I believe the second World War had its origin.

During the course of my brief remarks I should like to discuss a few things which have been on my mind for some time, and quite possibly, although I hope not, I may express views with which some members of the Senate will not agree.

I listened with much interest to the speech made by the Leader of the Government. He gave a technical explanation of the agreements, and I must compliment him on doing it very well. I should also like to compliment the other speakers, notably the senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen). I did not agree entirely with his remarks, but in essence I am in accord with most of what he said. Later on I shall make some reference to his address, especially to the points with which I did agree.

Among other things, he suggested that NATO so far has had a strong influence in the prevention of war; and, inferentially, I suppose he felt the inclusion of Germany in NATO would strengthen that influence. I believe there is truth in that statement, but I feel there are two reasons even more important than that. It may surprise you to hear this, but I think the first one—and I am going to deal with it more fully later on—was the death of Stalin. The second is the atomic bomb. I believe both of these, especially the existence of the atomic bomb, has had more to do with the prevention of war, if there was a real danger of war, than any other factor; because surely all nations, including Russia, must hesitate to engage in war—war of aggression, if you like—when aware that it would mean the certain destruction of the world as we know it today. That knowledge has been the greatest deterrent.

NATO, into which Germany is being invited—although I cannot say that she will be altogether welcome—is an alliance. History has shown—and I have said this before—that alliances are not always preventive of war. In fact, one could prove that alliances have sometimes led to war. An alliance, therefore, is not particularly encouraging. An ally in one war may become an enemy in a future war. One needs only to look to the last two wars for proof of that. When the First Great War started, Germany, Austria and Italy were allied but almost as soon as the war began Italy abandoned her allies and joined their enemies. Similarly, in the First Great War Japan was an ally of the western nations, but in the Second Great War she became an ally of the nation which opposed her in the First Great War. Turkey was on one side in the first war, and on the other side in the second war. Coming down to the present day, our bitterest enemies of the last two wars become our allies under these agreements.

I support the resolution, though not entirely on the ground given by at least two others who spoke before me.

Allow me to digress for a moment. In the treaty made at Yalta, certain provisions were laid down, one of which specified that there should be no alienation of territory to any of the countries taking part in the war. Well, Russia immediately broke the agreement, and annexed East Prussia, as well as the three little Baltic states, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. She also took the eastern part of Poland, compensating that country by giving her the eastern part of Germany—the fertile, agricultural part, upon which Germany depended for her food supply. While speaking of this deprivation of Germany, may I say that while it was entirely justifiable to destroy her munition plants, I think it was a grave mistake to bring about almost wholesale destruction of her other factories, most of which were in Western Germany. However, perhaps it was a blessing in disguise to the Germans, because it made it necessary for them to install entirely new plants, with new and up to date machinery, which enabled them to compete with the rest of the world in an ever-increasing degree. It may be said that Germany deserved to have her factories destroyed, but I will not discuss that. The destruction created in the minds of the German people a feeling not only of injustice, but of unnecessary and wanton waste, for in addition to losing their main source of food supply—since East Germany was the only part of the country reasonably rich in agricultural production—they were, by the razing of their factories, deprived of the means to work and live. This led later on to the necessity of the United States and the United Kingdom—I do not know about Canada—spending literally hundreds of millions of dollars to keep alive the people whom they had recently defeated.

I support the motion, not because the agreement necessarily increases greatly the strength of NATO, for I do not think that the addition to the NATO forces of half a million German soldiers would be the deciding factor if war occurred, but because it puts Germany in with the Western nations. More than that, it will avert any possible danger of Germany ever joining with Russia.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think that is the great significance of the treaty. I do not need to dwell upon the disastrous results that might flow from the joining of Germany wholeheartedly and entirely with Russia.

Some compliments have been paid to German efficiency. I think they are merited. Had another war broken out, I hesitate to think what might have taken place in Europe if the skills and scientific powers of Germany had been placed at the disposal of Russia, and German forces had joined wholeheartedly with Russian forces. That is my chief reason for supporting this resolution.

May I now turn to the question of German rearmament? I know there is certain opposition to it, and I can understand quite well why the people of France and members of the National Assembly are fearful of the prospect of the rearmament of Germany. I can also understand the feelings of those who lost sons and other members of their families in either or both of the two great wars. But, while the hatreds engendered by war arouse opposition on the part of some, and even the thought of an alliance with Germany is distasteful to others, nevertheless, I think we ought to be realistic when speaking of a rearmed and dangerous Germany. My friend the senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) said yesterday he believed that the danger was non-existent. I myself believe the danger is negligible. Not long ago, I visited Germany. I know something of the German language, and I made it a point to discuss world affairs as affecting Germany and the rest of the countries of the world. I spoke to people of all classes, and found, rather to my surprise, first, that they were not particularly concerned with communism as such, but that in their unarmed state they were definitely afraid of Russia. Secondly, there seemed to be an abiding hatred of the thought of getting into another war. While the German people are not satisfied—they are a defeated nation—I believe that they are, in the language of the street, sick of war and want nothing further to do with it.

It should be noted that while these agreements are now before our Parliament and will no doubt be approved, they have not yet been entirely agreed to by the legislative body in Germany. There are, I think, some obstacles in the way, such as the uncompleted so-called agreement on the Saar, and some other things that the German people do not like. The paramount fact is that their hearts are set on having one day a reunited Germany, and quite naturally so. Chancellor Adenauer has always fixed that as one of the ultimate goals, although not one for which he would resort to war.

Those who have spoken before me have made reference to people of German origin in our own country. I know something about these people; indeed, I need not say that I myself am of that race. My father was born in Germany, came to this country when he was three years old, and remembered nothing of Germany, and I have no known relatives in that country. I know many people of German origin, particularly in the district from which I come, and I know of no better Canadians than those very people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think a similar statement applies as well to people of German origin who live in other parts of Canada, such as Manitoba and farther west.

I thank my friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) for what he said in this respect, for it is only the truth.

The German people have been described as a warlike race. While everyone will admit they make good soldiers, I do not believe they are warlike, or that they like war for war's sake, or wish to dominate their neighbours. Indeed, I believe that none of the common people in the world today, whether they live in Germany, Russia, France, or the United States, want war. Can you imagine fathers and mothers who have sons of military age, enjoying the prospect of sending their sons or going to war themselves to be almost certainly slaughtered or maimed for life? I cannot.

I have before me a rather lengthy article written by a columnist for the Toronto Globe and Mail which I would ask permission to read. Omitting the earlier paragraphs of the article, I quote:

> I suggest that a contributing element has been the reckless and unlimited use of propaganda as an instrument of "total" war.
> Before the First World War, nations at war never presented enemy peoples as a collection of congenitally tainted beasts. Belligerents were restrained by the attitude that wars were lamentable interruptions of normally congenial relations.

When the war was over, I suppose, they returned to their congenial relations.

> But during the First World War—largely by the campaign of Lord Northcliffe—the whole German people were presented as lacking every human virtue.

I hesitate to mention this, but by way of illustration may I relate an instance of how extreme hatreds develop in time of war?

During the First World War there was in my constituency a professional man, no longer young, who for many years had made his living from people of German extraction. When stories came back from the war, which did not go very well at first, he said that if he had the authority he would kill every person who had a drop of German blood in his veins. I have never forgotten that incident, and it is in line with what is said in this article:

> The doctrine of exclusive guilt went into the Treaty of Versailles, and propaganda reached the summit of systematically indoctrinated hatred in the Second World War. Without that wave of blind hatred, no state could have called its people to war for "unconditional surrender", nor could there have been support for the lunatic proposals of the Morgenthau plan.

That plan, as we know, contemplated the complete destruction of German industry and the reduction of German people to hewers of wood and drawers of water. However, such steps were never seriously contemplated by those who retained any sense of sanity.

> Propaganda presented the Germans as a "paranoid" race, incurably warlike, that must be exterminated.
> The Scoreboard of Wars
> Yet the fact was that since the Renaissance and the modern era, 278 wars involved European countries; that—as a measure of relative bellicosity—Great Britain fought twenty-eight, France twenty-six, Spain twenty-five, while Germany, including Prussia, fought only eight—one more than Denmark.

I was surprised to read those figures. Further:

> The excesses of the Nazi revolution were allowed to eclipse those of the Russian revolution whose casualties vastly exceeded the German.

I do not apologize here for what took place in Germany during the Second Great War, but I say that I have no belief whatever that the German people, apart from their leaders, desire to dominate and to kill their neighbours. I regard the German people as pretty much like the citizens of all other civilized countries.

The writer concludes:

> Such propaganda as "psychological conditioning" for war is a terrible newcomer upon history's stage; it makes any aim except unconditional surrender impossible; and it cannot easily be obliterated from men's minds by later appeals to reason and realism. It prolongs wars. It makes reconciliation—which is peace—all but impossible.

I apologize, honourable senators, for having read at some length, but I think it leads to something we must recognize.

Hatred still exists, as I can well understand, but fortunately it is becoming less and less as the years pass. But if we need—and I think we do—the support of the German people, situated as they are in the heart of Europe, then I think we should accept them wholeheartedly; and while perhaps many will never completely forget the things which took place during the two Great Wars, so far as our practical action goes we must let bygones be bygones and go on from there. The full value of Germany's membership in NATO cannot be had unless we change our attitude towards her. It may be difficult, but we must restore some sense of good will, equality and sovereignty towards her. Perhaps it cannot all come about now, but ultimately it must be so.

My friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr Hugessen) said yesterday that the Germans are a proud people. I am not at all sure that pride is of any particular value. But if that statement be true, then we have to reckon with it. We shall have to give them equality and sovereignty in the end. It may be a calculated risk, as the military men say, but it must be taken. I believe, though, that the danger of Germany rearming and again going to war with her neighbours is pretty nearly negligigle.

One more thing I think is necessary for the peace of Europe. We must ultimately have a united Germany. Now, I do not know that the Western powers have it within their power to bring that about, but the German people naturally will never be satisfied until they are reunited. We had a lesson on that fact after World War I, when under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles a corridor was cut through East Prussia.

Perhaps I have said too much about Germany, and I notice my friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) is getting almost as tired as I am. I shall go on to speak of Russia, if I may.

Perhaps the expression of distrust of that country is not as strong now as it was some time ago—as, say, before the death of Stalin—but if we are ever to make an arrangement with the Russians, which ultimately we must do, we certainly are not starting on the right road if we call them names and say: "We do not trust you. We won't talk to you. You are lying and deceiving us, and we have no use for you at all." It may be true that they are not worthy of trust, but I am reminded of an old saying that I heard a long time ago:

> Always tell the truth, but don't always be telling it.

I think that is a good thing to remember with regard to Russia.

Now, I spoke of the death of Stalin as being perhaps one of the reasons why Russia has not become aggressive. Is it perhaps just barely possible that under the new dispenation the expressions of apparent conciliation, if you like to call it that, may be genuine? And if that be the case—my friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) is smiling at that—should not the Western nations explore every possibility by which another war can be avoided, by at least giving careful consideration to every Russian approach?

As I said the other day to my room-mate (Hon. Mr. Baird), "I would sit down with the prince of darkness himself if that meant giving the world any opportunity of avoiding another war."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: As I see it, there are only three courses open to us. One is to continue as we are doing now, maintaining a condition sometimes referred to as the cold war. The second course is to go to war and destroy the world as we have it today. The third course is to try to get along with the Russian people and the communist nations. We have done this for years. Russia is a part of the United Nations, and we get along with her there, though not very well. And let me add here that although China is controlled by communists, I believe we should recognize her government and that she should be admitted into the United Nations. To me, the third course is the only one possible, and we shall have to come to it anyway. Certainly, the first one, of continuing what we are doing now, means living in a state of dread which our statesmen say could continue for a generation or longer, with the expenditure of billions of dollars each year and consequently high taxes. Taxes in Canada are too high anyway, and should be cut by half a billion or a billion dollars a year. However, I will not go into that now, but perhaps the Minister of Finance would agree with me, judging from the remarks he made some time ago.

The third course seems to me to be the only one that it is possible to follow. I believe Sir Winston Churchill is for it, and I think Sir Anthony Eden is too. They make this stipulation, however, that they are not going to negotiate with Russia until after the NATO treaty has been signed and sealed, after all the countries that are contributory to it are in agreement. But I am not going into that either.

I believe that ultimately we must try to negotiate a state of co-existence. I am not sure who coined that phrase. Perhaps it was Sir Winston Churchill, for he is a past master at that sort of thing. We have got to live with Russia. As against that we have just the two alternatives I mentioned: to go to war with them, or to continue in a state of uncertainty, expense and worry for perhaps another generation or longer.

I always like to look at things, if possible, from the other fellow's point of view, but I hope nobody here will say I am defending Russia, for I am not. I am as far away from communism as perhaps anyone in this chamber. Russia has been accusing the United States of being a war monger. We know that is not true. We know that the United States has no desire to extend its territories—none whatsoever. We know that that country has given billions, yes, literally billions of dollars to the nations in Europe, much of it perhaps because it was in the interest of the United States to do so, but much of it also, I think, came from the generosity of their hearts, and all credit should be given to them in that respect. Now suppose I try to put myself in the other fellow's place by imagining that I were a Russian, how would I feel if I saw my country surrounded by air fields—air fields in the United States, in Canada, Iceland, Greenland, Britain, France, Spain, Turkey, the Philippines—with bombers able to reach any part of my country within a few hours? Well, with the propaganda that is being put out today I might easily be inclined to believe that all this bodes no good for my country and ask what is the purpose of it? However, as I said before, it is not being done for any purpose of aggression at all, but I can well believe that in Russia there might be some alarm, just as there would be in this country if Russia took possession of some of the islands in the Caribbean or Newfoundland—provided my friend from St. John's (Hon. Mr. Baird) would allow them to do so. That is why I always feel that we must make a little allowance for Russia's attitude.

One other matter, and I shall be through. Two or three years ago I moved in this house a resolution for the calling of a convention or a conference to explore the possibility of Atlantic union. That meant not a military alliance but ultimately a federation, a real federation for nearly all purposes of the countries bordering on the Atlantic, and at that time I said I felt that such an organization would surely tend to the preservation of peace in at least half of the world, and if the common people of another country—say, Russia—ultimately should want to come into the Atlantic Union, that would mean the salvation of the world. I admit it is visionary, but things must be seen first in a vision and later translated into reality. As to just how visionary this idea is, let me read an item from Philadelphia:

> Only by uniting immediately into one great state can Europe end the wars and trade struggles that are destroying her, the grand old man of American politics declared here today. The sole solution, he declared, is for Europe to call at once a constitutional convention which would combine all her different states and kingdoms into one federal union.

Who, do you suppose, said that? The "grand old man of American politics", Benjamin Franklin, who urged a union of Europe on the American model, in 1787—one hundred and seventy-five years ago. Well, we have not got to it yet. But if the will of the people favours it, ultimately it will prevail.

I will only say in conclusion that if from this organization, NATO, can be developed ultimately into a world government that will for ever make war impossible, it will be the greatest boon to the people of the world, who, I am convinced, have no desire to dominate their fellows but who want to live in harmony with their fellow-men everywhere.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, you have listened, as I did, with much interest to the excellent speech delivered by my desk-mate (Hon. Mr. Euler). I venture to express the hope that he will speak more often in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He has not had much experience yet: he will speak more frequently after a while!

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Probably the resolution we are discussing is the most important that will come before us this session. Its effects may be very far-reaching. When the war was over everyone hoped that a long era of peace would be ushered in for a poor distracted world. That hope was particularly strong in all the western countries that believe in freedom and liberty and have governing institutions which give expression to that ideal. It is almost ten years since the war ended. At that time Europe had been almost destroyed. With the exception of Sweden, Spain and Portugal, every country of Europe had suffered either occupation by the German forces or devastation through bombing and otherwise. The loss of life was in the millions; the loss of treasure and happiness could hardly be measured; so it was natural that, following that catastrophe, the minds of the people should turn to ideas of permanent peace. May I sketch briefly, but I trust with some effect, the reasons why that hope has not been realized.

I am not going to discuss today the responsibility of Germany for the last war. It has, I think, been made, clear and unmistakable to the world. The great misfortune of the German people was the kind of leadership they accepted. I do not feel too critical towards them on that account. I wholly agree with the statement of my honourable friend from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) that the Germans are a people with great qualities; and I cannot believe in my heart that the German workman or the German farmer loves war any more than I do.

When the power of Hitler was destroyed, efforts were made by the leading allied nations to frame a basis of peace. It was recognized that Russia had been wandering outside the great comity of nations, and that she gave adherence to a philosophy of life alien to our ideas of freedom. But she had been an ally in the war, and I believe I am within the bounds of reason when I say that throughout Canada, the United States and Western Europe there was a strong feeling of hope that Russia would live up to the expectations which people held of her. In the various conferences held before the end of the war that opportunity was given to Russia. It was recognized that there were innumerable problems to be solved, but at the famous Yalta Conference a decision was reached by Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin, representing their respective great powers, as to the procedure that would be followed in the smaller countries in Europe. It was decided that Poland could settle her own future by free elections, choosing a communist government or a government of a different stripe. The same was true in the case of Rumania, Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Did Russia honour those obligations? The first doubt that arose in the minds of western statesmen was caused by the fact that she did not. All those countries to which I have just referred were occupied by Russian troops. What has been the result? I do not need to sketch the sorry story for this house, for it stands naked to the light of day. Every one of those countries is under communist domination today. Is that because their people believe in communism? Do you think that the Czechoslovakian people, who have been among the staunchest believers in freedom and liberty in Europe, have lost their love of freedom and liberty? Do you think the Poles who for 150 years, despite the domination of Russia on the one side and of Prussia on the other, kept alive their love of freedom, liberty and country, have suddenly changed? It cannot be.

When, according to arrangements, Germany was divided after World War II, Russia occupied the eastern sector of that country. It was then understood that ultimately a peace treaty would be reached with Germany, but every effort made in that direction has been blocked and stopped. Take the problem concerning Trieste in Italy. Russia refused to sit in with the other powers and reach a settlement, hoping to keep alive existing frictions and jealousies concerning that question. At no time in the last ten years has Russia shown a disposition to sit down and talk with other powers and settle these international disputes, excepting upon her own terms; and those terms cannot be accepted.

Russia, to my mind, is dominated today more by the spirit of imperialism than by the philosophy of communism. If she had honestly wanted to test out the communist theory of life and of government she could have done so within the confines of her own territory. No one was going to say "Yea" or "Nay". She had an opportunity to develop a socialist state of her own in accordance with all the beautiful theories of Karl Marx, but that was not the purpose of the Russian leaders. As my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) said yesterday—and there was never a truer thing said—the guiding principle of Russian foreign policy today is almost the same as it was in the days of the Czars. It is a desire for domination and expansion, and until that desire ceases to exist in Russian government circles we shall be faced with the possibility of trouble.

It became quite apparent that Russia was not going to live up to her obligations when she intervened in Czechoslovakia and upset the Government of that country, the head of which was President Benes. It was my good fortune to meet Mr. Benes on one or two occasions and to have considerable conversation with him. Never was there a man more opposed to the idea of communism and communist philosophy. He was struggling to maintain a measure of independence in his country and his Foreign Minister at that time was Mr. Masaryk, a son of the great Czech patriot of the First World War. There is no doubt as to what happened to those two men. The idea that Masaryk committed suicide is now wholly discounted, and we know that Benes was imprisoned in his house. The Government which he headed, and in which indeed there were a few communists—was done away with and a pure communist regime was installed in Czechoslovakia. Does that look like co-operation on the part of Russia?

Take Poland today. The Minister of Defence in the Polish Government is a marshal in the Russian army. Has he any more right than a Canadian general to hold that position? But Poland is not an independent country. The web has been woven around these nations, which are satellite countries in every sense of the term, and as far as we can see Russia will not relax her grip upon them. When the menace of atomic energy, that dreadful engine of destruction, first became apparent, efforts were made in the United Nations to control its use. It was agreed by the representatives of all member countries of the United Nations to ban atomic warfare, but it was recognized that this could only be done by ensuring an adequate system of inspection in every country of the world. This would mean that the inspectors of the United Nations would be free to go into Russia, the United States, Britain and Canada, and so on,

Did Russia agree to that? She threw every obstacle possible in the way of it. She said, "Yes, we will agree to a system of inspection, but we will do our own inspection." Is it reasonable to expect that the Western powers would accept that? The question of disarmament, when it came before the United Nations, was discussed at great length, and plans were submitted in an effort to bring about disarmament among the nations. What was the obstacle in the path of progress toward disarmament? It was Russia, together with her satellites, who sat at the council of the United Nations. Why did Russia take the position she did? Was it because she feared that some scheme might be worked against her? I cannot believe it. As the result of Russia's opposition, prudence dictated that the Western powers rearm, which they decided to do with reluctance. And, honourable senators, it is worth noting, in passing, that when World War II ended the Western powers demobilized their forces. The United States army, which participated in the war, was dissolved and her soldiers went home. Britain did likewise, and so did Canada. Did Russia demobilize? Was there any reduction in the number of her military personnel? Absolutely none! She maintained her forces. And in the light of these events, the only thing left for the Western powers to do was to draw together and formulate the Atlantic treaty, as it is known in Western Europe. Out of that combination grew NATO, and from NATO developed the building up of military strength.

The purpose was not to attack Russia. It is absolutely absurd to think that the forces of the Western powers as they stand today could successfully attack the forces of Russia. Russia proper has 175 divisions; she has 500,000 men on the western side of her western frontier in Europe, in Romania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland, and a vast total of 400,000 in East Germany. The people of East Germany do not like communism. A year ago last June they raised the standard of revolt against their communist government, and they would have succeeded in upsetting that regime if the Russian army had not been there. It was only when Russian tanks and machine guns rattled through their streets and cities that the uprising against the communist government collapsed.

I repeat that there is nothing for the Western powers to do but combine in their own defence.

Russia says that the United States is imperialistic. Russia has endeavoured everywhere to poison the minds of people in Europe and Asia against so-called United States imperialism. Well, we have lived alongside the United States during all our years of experience and history, and we know that the United States are not imperialistic and that they do not covet a foot of territory anywhere. But they do want to see order and peace in the world. They do want to see civilization built on a solid foundation so that their institutions in the future may not be challenged or attacked. In furtherance of that fine design they have given unbounded help to the world. What would have happened, in 1948, for instance, if the United States had not given the Marshall Plan to the world? A few moments ago I pictured Europe broken, its commerce gone, its people disspirited and almost helpless. Into that broken Europe came the offer of help from the United States through the Marshall Plan. I assure honourable senators that that great gesture of help from the United States to Europe prevented Italy and France from going over to the communistic idea of government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: And it gave encouragement to all the freedom-loving countries of Europe to reassert themselves. I know there are times when American foreign policy is difficult to understand, and when there appear to be inconsistencies, but I state here that the underlying principle of American policy is peace, and that the American people want peace above everything else. Is it a pleasant thing for the United States to contemplate keeping armed forces in Europe indefinitely? Was it pleasant for Britain to decide to maintain four divisions in Germany, as well as a secondary air force? Why have the United States kept their forces in Europe? And why has Canada kept its forces in Europe? May I say that I am proud of the fact that Canada has done so. Honourable senators, these forces have been maintained there to give courage and hope to the Western Europeans, not only to build up military power and strength, but also to build up economic, spiritual and moral strength, which are just as important to wage war as are guns and tanks.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: There is a great deal of fear prevalent that the rearming of Germany may again bring to the surface dangerous militarism in Germany. Well, I do not believe it. Our colleague from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) gave some very good reasons yesterday, I thought, as to why that might not happen. Germany has tasted of war, make no mistake about that; she has lost a substantial amount of territory; her country has been occupied for the last ten years; her cities have been destroyed; her people for years have been compelled to live in any place where they could find shelter. Do you think those experiences have not seared the hearts of the German people? They have paid very, very dearly for going to war. I can understand the reluctance today of German young men and women to have anything to do with war. That is one of the obstacles Chancellor Adenauer has had to overcome. And here, in passing, may I pay my tribute and respect to that great German leader, who today is one of the outstanding public men on the continent of Europe.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I have no fear that the rearming of Germany will lead to a restoration of German military power. May I give a few reasons for thinking so, in addition to those given to the house yesterday by our colleague from Inkerman.

In the first place, the German General Staff has been completely obliterated. It is worthy of note that that great body, which for a century exercised a most unwholesome influence upon Germany, dated from the time of Frederick the Great.

In the second place, these agreements which we are asked to ratify would place upon Germany very definite limitations. While they would give her almost complete sovereignty, they limit the extent of her rearmaments. For instance, she cannot have a military strength of more than 500,000 men; she cannot engage in any chemical, atomic or biological warfare activity; she cannot manufacture large guns; she cannot manufacture warships of more than a certain tonnage. These limitations are there, and Chancellor Adenauer gladly accepts them.

But when these agreements are ratified Germany will become a part of the western European Community, and will sit not in an inferior position but in an equal position with the other members of the community, thus having her self respect restored.

I can apreciate the arguments advanced against German rearmament, though in passing I am bound to say that they proceed wholly from emotion and not from reason. As I say, one can understand the opposition to such a move. But if these agreements are not ratified, what will happen? We have given Germany back her sovereignty. She is now the arbiter of her own policies with respect to foreign affairs. If we do not bring her into the family of Western powers, what may happen to her?

Without any question at all, the hope of Russia has been that Germany could be kept out of this community of Western powers. Russia tried at the outset to defeat the move, by playing on the French fears of Germany and thus causing the French Assembly to refuse ratification of the arrangement. Russia is adopting much the same strategy with Germany today. If she succeeds, what will be the result? Germany has been a great power, and situated as she is in the heart of Europe, may again be a great power. As Chancellor Adenauer has said, if these agreements fail, the temptation will be very strong for German statesmen in the future to play the East off against the West and to make the best deal they can with both worlds.

We can never escape the truth that Russia holds some strong cards in her dealings with Germany. First, there is the reunification of Germany, which is uppermost in the heart and mind of every German, and which must sooner or later be brought about. Secondly, every German wants the restoration of eastern territories taken from Germany and given to Poland. Russia made a cynical arrangement in that connection: she took a slice of Eastern Poland for which she compensated Poland by giving her a slice of Eastern Germany. But a cynical government in Germany might well sit down with Russia some day and decide to partition Poland, as was done before. If Germany and Russia are allowed to be drawn together, make no mistake, there will be trouble for Europe. Indeed, there may be trouble between these two countries in the long run, for as the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) has so well said, alliances very often lack a stable and permanent quality.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the sensible thing to do is to pass this resolution, ratify these agreements and hope that the countries of the new alliance will get along together; that they will build up their strength, not for aggression, but to hold their place against further domination by Russia. If that happens, the organs of the United Nations may come fully into play, its prestige and its power may be increased and established, and through that organization we may find the way to ultimate peace.

I am under no illusion that today the outlook for the world is anything but bright. Every country is spending enormous sums on armaments. We know the burden of taxation that defence costs impose upon us here in Canada, and I do not like to look forward to that prospect indefinitely. But, we must face up to the fact that every other Western power is in the same position, and there is no possibility of escaping it. But away in the distance is the goal of peace.

In our travels towards peace I sometimes think that we are not unlike Bunyan's pilgrim in his travels towards the celestial city. Those of you who have read that great allegory will recall the troubles and difficulties that he met on the way and had to overcome. So it is with us: the dangers are many, and we face a long pull that will test the quality of our people. If we rely only on a materialistic philosophy of life we shall sooner or later fail. We must, therefore, drink deeply from the moral and spiritual sources of strength, and falter not though the way be long and hard. We must have a reasonable confidence that in the end we shall win through all these troubles and come at last to the sunlit valleys of peace.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I feel it only fair to state at the outset of the few remarks I have to make, that no treaty on foreign affairs has created so much interest throughout Canada, and in Parliament, as has the present treaty by which we propose to accept Germany into NATO and to make her a separate power. I can well understand, as other speakers have said they do, with what hesitation many people in Canada look upon admitting Germany into NATO and allowing her to rearm again. I have a great deal of sympathy for them and I can understand their viewpoints because—and this is something we should never forget—in the two world wars 98,626 young Canadian men and women gave their lives because Germany set out to conquer the earth. I am not going to emphasize the amount of money which the Canadian people paid out to prosecute those wars, for in my opinion money is secondary to the great loss of human life. But it could be mentioned that upwards of $20 billion was expended by the Canadian people to help defeat the military aims of Germany.

As I say, I can well understand what is in the minds and breasts of those who lost their beloved ones, but I have no sympathy with the group of people in this country who follow a directive from Moscow to oppose this ratification. In the Tribune it was stated by Tim Buck that a directive had been sent out to all members of the LPP for nation-wide action against this protocol. I am not going to include within my severe criticism all those who oppose the treaty, but some of the letters which I receive and some of the statements sent to me make me rather suspicious that some of the writers are connected with the LPP and are not urging us to oppose the protocol from a practical point of view. Rather, they are playing the Soviet game.

I have read carefully the discussion in the House of Commons and have listened to the splendid speeches in the Senate, and I notice that most of the speakers dealt with the sole question of rearming Germany but have soft-pedalled or left out of their speeches entirely any statement on the reasons why we are compelled to have a military force in Europe and why we believe it will be to our advantage to have the help of German troops. After all, why should we not expect the help of German troops? If the Western powers had no troops in Europe today no one knows what steps the Russians would take to bring still more of Berlin, if not of other parts of Germany, under her orbit. As mentioned by the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) there are almost a million Russian troops in Europe west of the Soviet borders, distributed right around Germany. And I want to ask any person who opposes this treaty what does he think Russia has built 4,000 submarines for? Why does Russia need that many submarines today? In fact, she has the largest submarine fleet the world has ever witnessed. It is not for peace.

At the San Francisco Conference, in 1945, when Stalin and all the leaders of the Western powers met, Stalin did not talk peace even then, as you will see if you will read his speeches. And when the Western powers reduced their armaments after that conference, which nation went ahead feverishly building up its military might? It was Soviet Russia. All who have read Russian history will realize why there had been no peace or agreement reached between Soviet Russia and the Western powers. The Kremlin, under Stalin's regime, looked into history and realized that in all the wars Russia had engaged in for the past 200 years she had been defeated, and that for one particular reason: she did not have sufficient military might. So she adopted two things from the western world, and she has been using them against us to gain advantage for herself in this cold war. She adopted communism. Communism came from the west, for Karl Marx lived in London. And do not overlook the fact that although the Soviet Republic, or a large part of it is an Eastern power, it has been using the Western philosophy of Karl Marx against the Western powers, and fairly successfully at that. Then in searching for the reasons why the Russian forces had been defeated, the Kremlin came to the conclusion and believed that while the Russians are just as good fighters as those of any country, their one lack was mechanical military power, and so they have made use of Western know-how to build modern military weapons. Thus today the world finds Russia highly mechanized from the military point of view, and equipped with the atom bomb as well.

I think that should be kept in mind by those who charge that the Western powers are always talking military might. There would be no need for military might at all were it not for, shall I say, the motive or the policy of the Kremlin, which is seeking world domination. Until that aim is discarded there will always be trouble.

I am not so much alarmed today as I was in 1939. I think it was Churchill who said, after the end of the last war, that if the Western powers are ever caught again in as poor a military condition as they were in 1939, they will not survive. But we are better prepared than in 1939, and not so easily fooled. Russia may have quite a force of military power. However, the eyes of the Western nations are open now, and we have some measure of preparedness and are not going to be caught napping in the future.

Looking through a magazine the other day I came across a most interesting article, and I think some of it is well worth being placed before this honourable house. I am prepared to accept the statement of the author, Leon Volkov, because of his past experience. He fought in the Red Air Force against the Germans in World War II, and he is now a correspondent for Newsweek, a magazine published in the United States. Volkov says.

> The fear of the Russians is real fear against the arming of Germany. What we do not understand is how painfully Soviet Russia was scared by the blitzkreig in the initial stages of the last war. As a member of the Red Army at that time I saw it and felt it. We Russians suffered a traumatic experience on a national scale. We got the feeling that we were no match for the Germans. And we didn't fully recover from this sense of military inferiority even in our ultimate triumph...
> There was good reason for this. The Germans in their initial assault had 2,400 tanks to throw against the Soviet's 20,000. On defence, the German Army was sometimes outnumbered 12 to 1 by the Red Army. The Germans did not hesitate to mount attacks even when they knew that they were outnumbered by 3 to 1.

But here is the most striking statement, and I think we can take heart from it in passing this resolution:

> Certainly nothing that the western powers have done since the last war has so frightened the Kremlin as this latest, most promising plan for a start toward the restoration of German military power.

I say again that that is a very heartening statement; and, coming from a man who fought with the Russians against the Germans in the last war, and one who certainly understands the people of Russia better than most of us do, it carries more weight than many utterances we hear from time to time from others who know little of the Russian people.

It has been suggested in various quarters that we should negotiate with the Soviets. I wonder, if we did, how much longer it would take. I find on checking the records that since October 1950, on sixteen occasions the Western powers have sought for a settlement of the East and West Germany question. Russia is definitely against any settlement.

May I say, in passing, that it was most unfortunate that President Roosevelt was ill at the time of the Yalta meeting and accepted the counsel of some advisers who, it has been proven since, were friendly to Russia. Churchill stood out against Stalin and Roosevelt, but finally had to give in. Had the British statesman's will prevailed, the troubles which followed the division of East and West Berlin would never have occurred. Perhaps I am repeating myself, but I think it should be emphasized that Germany cannot be kept down for all time; her sovereignty must be restored sooner or later. In making the choice now, doubt and bewilderment are in the minds of many as to what will happen with a revitalized and well-equipped German army. But there can be no question that, with the increase of western power, the Soviet leaders have become a little less aggressive. Besides, if Germany regained her sovereignty outside NATO, she could not, in the present state of world affairs, long remain neutral; so it is certainly much better and safer to admit her into the North Atlantic Organization than to take the chance of her siding with Soviet Russia.

I have not much more to say honourable senators. My particular purpose in rising on this occasion was to draw attention to a group of people who are acting for and directed from Moscow, while they enjoy all the benefits of our free democratic country. I do not think it has been made clear enough to our people what the dominance of Sovietism would mean. This is a time to stand up and be counted. I for one am for a society in which each of us can enjoy his rights as an individual citizen, not one in which he is reduced to a mere number. I agree with the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that if Russia had confined her ideas to her own country we might not have objected, but what she is trying to do is to encircle the world and subdue it to her Communist philosophy. If anyone doubts this he should read the February number of Reader's Digest and observe what has taken place in Guatemala through the activities of Communist agents. It is an appalling record, and difficult to understand, but there it is for all who want to read.

I intend to support this motion, and I am very glad that its support, at least in the Senate, will be unanimous. In closing, I want to compliment all those who have taken part in this debate.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, I intend to take no more than a few moments. My chief reason for speaking at this time is that the member of the House of Commons who represents the largest city near my home has astonished me very much by making a bitter attack on this protocol. Personally I shall vote for it, in spite of some personal reasons to the contrary, and I hope it will have our unanimous support. I warmly compliment those who have taken part in the discussion. We have had some very fine addresses and a worth-while debate.

The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) recalled some facts of recent history which help us to realize that nowadays there can be no victor in war, and that the winner may suffer to a greater extent than the loser. Formerly wars were waged by armies of limited size, and all the participants were men; the women and children, generally, were unharmed; but the practices of modern war have changed all that. We recall the mass destruction at Nagasaki and Hiroshima which was caused by atomic bombs, and that it was our allies who used them.

On the particular question before us: while I understand that fear, and possibly hatred, influence some people in their opposition to German rearmament, I do not share their attitude. We look back at the events which followed the First Great War, and think on what might have happened if President Wilson, when he returned to his own country after sponsoring the League of Nations, had been able to secure approval for his plan of enforcement. What bloodshed might have been spared, and what immense expenditures would have been avoided! Even Canada has to accept its share of blame. What did the Canadian Government do when Mussolini's forces attacked Ethiopia? Our representative at the League of Nations was one of those who moved to apply economic sanctions against Italy, but the Canadian Government was quick to say that he was not speaking on its behalf.

Despite the circumstances surrounding World War I and World War II, and all the adverse propaganda about the Germans, I believe Canada should approve the protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Let me give an illustration of the use of propaganda to build up hatred in people and to imbue troops with a fighting spirit. One time when I had occasion to visit a war memorial in Kansas City, I saw a huge advertising display which was part of a recruiting campaign. There was a lot of propaganda, and among other things that I remember seeing were pictures of what were alleged to be German soldiers in the act of cutting off the hands of little Belgian girls. However, the fact of the matter is that no Belgian child was ever produced who had suffered in this fashion at the hands of German soldiers. A similar form of propaganda, I believe, was adopted by both sides in order to build up a spirit of hatred.

It is apparent that the Russian people have not begun to appreciate what a civilized approach to international problems can accomplish, but together with others who have participated in this debate I believe that the German people have reached this stage. West Germany would be a valuable ally in the defence of Europe, and indeed it is absolutely necessary that the Federal Republic of Germany and the present members of NATO should co-operate in this respect.

Honourable senators, there is just one other matter I should like to touch upon. I like to see credit given where it is due. I do not wish to detract in any way from the many fine qualities of the present Prime Minister of Canada. I was wholeheartedly in support of his tour of occidental and oriental nations last year, for I knew he was taking to the people of these nations a message of peace, good will and co-operation from Canada. However, yesterday the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) said that it was none other than our own Prime Minister who first envisaged the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I do not think that is so. The idea was first propounded by Sir Winston Churchill in his famous speech at Fulton, Missouri. He claimed that Russia was refusing to co-operate in any way in international matters, and he advocated a union of Western Atlantic nations.

Honourable senators, I am fully in accord with the resolution before the house and I have no doubt I can justify my actions to the people of my part of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Robertson) left the Chair to address the Senate.

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, in the Chair.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson: Honourable senators,—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Robertson: Honourable senators, the subject matter of this resolution has been so thoroughly covered that I would not undertake to add anything, were it not that one aspect of this question seems to have a direct bearing upon the honour of the Senate. I would therefore crave your indulgence for a short time while I refer to it.

In May of 1950 the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) moved the following resolution in this chamber:

That the Senate of Canada do approve of the calling by the United States of America of a Convention of delegates from the democracies which sponsored the North Atlantic Treaty and representing the principal political parties of such democracies, for the purpose of exploring how far their peoples and the peoples of such other democracies as the Convention may invite to send delegates, can apply among them within the framework of the United Nations, the principles of federal union.

Many will recall the discussion which that resolution provoked in the Senate. For the benefit of any honourable senator who was not here then, may I say that the debate on the resolution reached heights of clarity, eloquence and foresight which I am sure would do credit to any parliamentary assembly. As an illustration of the quality of the speeches made on that occasion, I would refer to those of this afternoon by the honourable members from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) and Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), who moved and seconded the resolution of May, 1950.

I should like to trace the circumstances that surrounded us at that time, shortly after the bringing into existence of NATO. Experienced parliamentarians in this house realized at once that desirable as NATO was, features of it were in direct violation of the principles of democratic government which had been part and parcel of their existence. It was natural for them to comment on the inevitable consequences of such departures.

First I refer to the military clause by which Canada and the other signatories bound themselves for fifteen years to an agreement that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America would be considered an attack against all of them. Since its inception other nations have been added to the membership of NATO, and at the present time it is comprised of thirteen countries. This number will be increased to fourteen if Germany is added.

Anyone who can recall public opinion in Canada prior to 1939 knows that in those days we did not accept the idea that the entry of Britain into war called for an automatic declaration of war by Canada. At least that was true of the party to which I belonged, and I am sure it was the general feeling of all political parties in this country. Our logic may have told us that a declaration of war by Canada in such an event would be an almost inevitable consequence, but nevertheless we stoutly maintained that the final right of declaring war rested with our own Parliament.

The second feature of NATO to which I wish to refer is that to a greater or lesser degree the NATO agreements called for the creation of a supra-national army. This meant that for the first time in our history the control of our armed forces was being taken away from Parliament and placed in the hands of another organization. Before 1939 Canada would never have agreed to hand over the control of its armed forces to any outside body, not even to a Commonwealth country, despite the fact that those in command or control there were subject to the same Sovereign as we were. Yet, it has become an accomplished fact, and now scarcely ever evokes comment. Honourable senators will no doubt recall the thread which ran through the speeches at that time. It was felt that so radical a departure would demand new ideas, and some of the elements, at least, that are necessarily incorporated in a federal state like Canada or the United States of America. It was also felt that the control of armed forces by a centralized body should be subject to the approval of Parliament. I well recall that four years ago members of this house pointed out that difficult problems might well arise by our taking so radical a step, though a desirable one, and thus departing from the school of thought in which we had been reared, and from principles we felt to be essential to our system of government. I say this because the questions that have arisen from the resolution before us have a direct bearing on that viewpoint expressed in this house four years ago. The views expressed here have almost inevitably followed the same pattern. Instinctively, our thoughts have turned in two opposite directions, and we have had to decide on whether it was desirable to take this action or not. As far as I can see, there is no difference between the entry of Germany into NATO and the entry of any of the other member nations which have contributed to the armed forces of that central organization.

In one respect, however, there is a radical difference. I have always been surprised that democratic countries, particularly Canada and the United States, have not been more deeply concerned about handing over control of their military forces to someone outside, particularly in peacetime, but I think some countries had the impression that they were only delegating token forces to NATO, perhaps 5 or 10 per cent of the total force. But in the case of Western Germany, as the honourable Leader of the Government has quite properly pointed out, as have also the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) and others, every endeavour is being made toward absolute equality, so that in future there will be no feeling of inferiority on the part of Western Germany. The treaty states definitely that Germany shall have no national army, and that her other armed forces, of which she has a total of 500,000, shall be under the control of NATO. That means all of her army, token forces and others. That is in the bond. But I venture to predict that as time elapses and public opinion develops—while governments come and go—almost inevitably Western Germany will say to her other partners: "Why are we putting in all our armed forces, when you are putting in only 5 per cent of yours and keeping the remainder under national control?" And I would think that the only argument could be, "That is in the bond." You could not answer it logically otherwise. So, a point might be reached, it seems to me, when one of two things would inevitably happen. Either you would have to agree to control by the national government of Germany—not as in the bond, but on a basis of equity, with Western Germany having control of her own army—or else you would have to put in all of your own army.

What the future trend will be, I cannot say. But I can say this, that the idea behind the resolution was well expressed by Lord Ismay, who said that NATO was a revolutionary experiment in international relations. Such a radical departure from anything we know will, in the future, demand at least some element of the principles of federal union, if it is to work and to continue to work.

Again, I draw to the attention of honourable senators the foresight displayed by the mover and seconder of the resolution made in this house four years ago. When the subject comes before the United States Congress again, I hope the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), or someone else, will address this house again. I am confident that whoever speaks when the occasion arises will display the foresight, clear thinking and eloquence which so important a subject merits.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker resumed the Chair.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would remind the house that if the honourable senator speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with members who have complimented speakers who took part in this debate. The debate has been on a very high plane. I think both yesterday's and today's issues of Hansard, together with the earlier issues to which His Honour the Speaker referred, will become valuable historic documents, and interesting to read, ten years hence. I am sure all honourable senators have reason to feel highly gratified that this subject has been thoroughly canvassed.

We have not all been able to agree as to why we should support this agreement. In fact, the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) does not agree with me as to who first conceived of the Atlantic Community. By way of compromise on the question as to which of two great statesmen is entitled to the credit, I am willing to say that Sir Winston Churchill and our own Prime Minister shared in its creation. My wish is that when these two great statesmen are in conference in the United Kingdom during the next two weeks they will again conceive of big things which will work for the benefit of all mankind. I am sure all honourable senators join with me in extending to our Prime Minister, as he leaves for the United Kingdom to meet with the Prime Ministers of the other Commonwealth countries, our very best wishes and prayers that much good will come from the conference.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not intend to review the debate of yesterday and today. My remarks upon opening the debate constituted a factual statement in which I tried to trace the history of the United Nations from its birth, coming down to the creation of EDC. I referred to the fact that EDC finally did not receive the approval of France; and I discussed the agreements made in London last fall and the resulting Paris Agreements, which are now before us.

The speeches made by honourable senators over the past two days have contained further excellent reasons why this house should unanimously agree in its support of the protocol. I had not the slightest doubt that the support of this house would be unanimous, and it became absolutely certain when His Honour the Speaker, for the first time in my experience in the Senate, left the Chair and spoke in support of the resolution. As the house is aware, His Honour does not ordinarily vote, so honourable senators do not always know just how he feels about a subject under discussion. But fortunately on this very important occasion there is no doubt at all.

I should like at this time to thank all honourable senators who have taken part in the debate, and to congratulate them on their excellent speeches. Also, I would express the hope that in spite of all our misgivings, world peace will eventually come about and that the action taken today will be one more step towards that end.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Senators: Question, Question.

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I call for a standing vote?

On a standing vote, the motion was adopted unanimously.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house adjourns today, it stand adjourned until Tuesday next, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

GERLING GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S, an Act to incorporate Gerling General Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall not delay the house more than a few minutes in an explanation of this bill.

This bill is in the usual form for the incorporation of a company to carry on various forms of insurance, as set out in the bill, other than life insurance. The company is to be known as the Gerling General Insurance Company of Canada. The bill, I am informed, has received the approval of the Superintendent of Insurance and, as in all similar cases, the company will be subject to the regulatory provisions which are contained in the Canadian and British Companies Act.

The incorporators, who are named in the bill, are members of a well-known Toronto law firm, and the head office of the company will be located in the city of Toronto. Actually, the interests promoting this legislation are, I am informed, a very large and responsible West German insurance group, known as Gerling Konzern, composed of five insurance companies. I am further informed that it is one of the leading insurance organizations in West Germany. It has participated to a rather large extent in the recent growth of business in that country. It is also engaged in the business of international reinsurance, and is now seeking to extend its field of activities to Canada.

The authorized capital of the company will be $1 million, with a right, subject to certain safeguards, to increase that capitalization to $3 million.

The applicants seek parliamentary authority to transact business with respect to the various classes of insurance which are set out in section 6 of the bill. They are those types of insurance that have been provided for in many other bills of this kind, with which honourable senators are very familiar.

By section 7 the company is prohibited from commencing business until at least $340,000 of its capital stock has been subscribed and paid for; thereafter it can engage only in transactions respecting those classes of insurance mentioned in subsection 1 of section 7. If the company wishes to engage in classes of insurance other than those specified in that subsection, additional amounts of capital must be subscribed and paid for from time to time. And all this is, of course, under the very strict and competent supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance.

If the bill is given second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Not only will the sponsors whose names appear on the bill, or some of them, be available for examination by members of the committee, but I am informed that in addition Dr. Hans Gerling, who at present is one of the active heads of Gerling Konzern, will be present to furnish whatever information honourable senators require.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 1, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS OF CRIMINAL LAW—COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

That Miss Bennett, Messrs. Boisvert, Brown (Essex West), Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Fairey, Garson, Leduc (Verdun), Lusby, Mitchell (London), Montgomery, Murphy (Westmorland), Shaw, Mrs. Shipley and Messrs. Thatcher, Valois and Winch act on behalf of this House on the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament appointed January 14, 1955 to inquire into and report upon the questions whether the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent; and

That a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours that the foregoing members have been appointed to act on behalf of the Commons on the said Joint Committee of both Houses.

COMMITTEE QUORUM

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I say a word with reference to the motion which was passed in this house on January 25 appointing honourable senators to serve on the joint committee to which His Honour the Speaker has just referred? In the motion I neglected to include the words:

That the quorum of the said committee be nine members thereof.

These words are in a motion which was passed in the House of Commons and of which we received notice some time ago. Therefore, with the unanimous consent, I would move:

That the resolution of the Senate adopted on the 25th of January, 1955, respecting the joint committee of both houses of Parliament to inquire into and report upon the criminal law of Canada relating to (a) capital punishment, (b) corporal punishment or (c) lotteries, be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"That the quorum of the said committee be nine members thereof."

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that house accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, the honourable Leader spoke to me about this and I can see no objection to the proposed amendment. The only thing I need to say at this time is that I think he should have listened to me more carefully than he did the other day when I commented upon the composition of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 88 to 118, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

THE LATE SENATOR HURTUBISE

TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, as you probably know, death removed from our midst last evening our late colleague Senator Joseph Raoul Hurtubise. Although he had been in indifferent health for a long time, his unexpected demise at this time saddens all of us in this chamber tonight.

I first became acquainted with Senator Hurtubise in 1935 when I entered the House of Commons, where he had then been a member for five years. In that house, and as well in the Senate, to which he was appointed in 1945, he made a notable contribution to Canadian public affairs. It is a great pity that his distinguished career was to some extent restricted in his declining years by continuous ill health, and unfortunately during those years our deliberations were deprived of his wise counsel.

The late Senator Hurtubise was born at Ste. Anne de Prescott on July 1, 1882, a son of Joseph and Casilde Lamer Hurtubise. He received his Bachelor of Arts degree at Bourget College, in Rigaud, and then went on to Queen's University, from which he graduated in medicine. He subsequently practised at Sudbury, and was surgeon at St. Joseph's Hospital there. In recognition of his achievement in his chosen career he was made a Fellow of the American College of Surgeons, a distinguished honour which comes to only a few.

The late senator's activities in and around his native Sudbury extended far beyond his medical career, reaching into the varying fields of education, business, church and state. He was past president of the Separate School Commission, vice-president of the French Canadian Association of Education of Ontario, past president of the Historical Society of New Ontario, a director of the Canadian Historical Society of the Catholic Church, and vice-president of the Sudbury Broadcasting Company Limited.

His long record in public life is well known. His only defeat came in his attempt to gain a seat in the Ontario Legislature, in 1923. First elected to the House of Commons in the general election of 1930, he was re-elected in 1935 and 1940. He was summoned to the Senate in 1945.

Northern Ontario has lost an outstanding champion, and Canada a distinguished citizen, in the passing of Senator Hurtubise. May I at this time extend to his brothers who survive him our heartfelt sympathy in their great loss.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, it is somewhat difficult for me to speak tonight on the passing of Senator Hurtubise, whom I knew well for the past ten years. When the late senator was summoned to the Senate, in 1945, his health was declining, and one felt that he had neither the heart nor the strength to continue working with the same vigour to which he had been accustomed to work in the House of Commons. Those of us who knew him well—and a good many of us did—liked him. We knew him to be a real gentleman, and one who represented to a marked degree the distinction which attaches to a medical man who is "tops" in his profession.

Honourable senators, I visited Sudbury two years ago—not in the capacity of a senator—and I learned from the people up there how Dr. Hurtubise was beloved as their doctor. From one end of the district to the other, every person I met inquired about his health and about his life in the Senate. As the honourable Leader of the Government has said, we have lost a great Canadian. The French-speaking people of Canada have lost one of their outstanding medical men, who for many years to come will be remembered as one who contributed tremendously to the medical profession in Canada, especially in New Ontario.

I join with the Leader of the Government in conveying to his brothers our feelings of profound regret in the passing of so great a Canadian.

(Translation):

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette: Honourable senators, I feel deeply moved in expressing my sympathy on the occasion of the death of senator Joseph Raoul Hurtubise, because I know that his demise is a great loss not only for the Senate but for the whole province of Ontario as well, and especially for the large area of New Ontario where he was universally known and admired. I, myself, have had the privilege of knowing him and of enjoying his friendship since his arrival in Sudbury in 1910, and I will find it difficult to get used to the idea that he has gone forever. He was truly a master in the exercise of his profession, and his reputation as a prominent surgeon extended far beyond the confines of his own province. He exerted himself unstintingly and his services were always available to his patients, rich or poor. As is also true of several doctors now listening to me, he amassed no fortune, but he earned the gratitude of many people.

He was always interested in public affairs and simultaneously contributed to numerous charitable or educational organizations.

He was president of the Separate School Board of Sudbury for 25 years. He gave much of his talent and time to the foundation of the orphanage and also to the establishment of new parishes in that part of the province of Ontario. He was always, from the moment of its establishment in 1910, one of the strong supporters and leaders of the French Canadian Educational Association of Ontario. He was one of its directors until 1933, when he became its vice-president and added the latter duties to those of director, until illness forced him to retire.

(Text):

Senator Hurtubise always had a high sense of duty, and when convinced of the justice of the causes he sponsored he would give the best of himself, regardless of any personal sacrifices. When the late senator entered the House of Commons, in 1930, after having been requested to run as a candidate, he felt that to discharge his responsibilities as a member of Parliament he should discontinue his large and lucrative medical practice. From that time onward, until his serious sickness of some three years ago, he gave all his time to public affairs, and no member of Parliament was more meticulous in attention to duties than was our late colleague. Throughout his fifteen years as a member of the other house he never left his office until every letter was answered and every duty performed. When the late senator came to this house he brought with him that same sense of responsibility and attention to duty.

Senator Hurtubise's activities in the French-Canadian Association of Education of Ontario were far reaching. He was fully convinced of the justness of the cause of his compatriots in the separate school question. His voice was respected by all, because not only did he work for unity among his supporters but he strove to bring his viewpoints before the other sections of the population of the province of Ontario. He was open minded in his views, and he realized the necessity of having friends and supporters among the majority of the citizens in the province. If a better understanding of this important question has been achieved—although it is not yet completely settled—Senator Hurtubise deserved very much credit for that result.

Fairly early in his last sickness, an incident occurred which I regard as typical of the sincere respect and admiration in which the late senator was held. As I stated a few moments ago, he was the leading medical doctor in that fine hospital in Sudbury, which is operated by the Grey Nuns of the Cross. When they heard of the serious nature of the sickness of Senator Hurtubise, out of gratitude for what he had done for their institution they asked that he immediately be transferred to the St. Vincent Hospital in Ottawa, and here he received the very best of care until he drew his last breath.

The memory of Senator Hurtubise will ever remain vivid and permanent in our minds and will be a great source of inspiration to us for all time.

(Translation):

Hon. Arthur Marcotte: Honourable senators, I learned just a moment ago that my good friend, senator Hurtubise, had passed away.

I have not prepared any notes but what I have to say springs from the heart. I knew the senator and I knew his brother particularly well. His death strikes me all the more because, although I was aware that he was in poor health since his return from Paris, I was far from expecting that the end would come so soon.

After he returned from Europe, I met one of my good friends, Colonel Lemay, who said to me: "Senator, let us go and see senator Hurtubise together because he is very ill." When we arrived at the hospital, we made inquiries from the doctor and the nurse, who told us: "You had better not go in. Your visit might be fatal to him, because of the close relationship which existed between the three of you". So I had to forgo that visit to a dying friend. And now I hear that he has passed away. When one reaches my age, one often thinks of death. When it strikes younger and more energetic men, men who were pioneers either in Ontario or elsewhere, their departure upsets us.

I should like to extend, not only to my good friend, his brother, but also to all the members of his family, from the bottom of my heart, my most sincere condolences.

SUBSIDIES ON FEED GRAINS

INQUIRY

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? It has to do with the recent reduction of subsidies on feed grains moving, I think, both east and west. This action has raised a considerable storm of protest in British Columbia, as it affects hundreds of producers, particularly poultrymen and dairymen, and there is much confusion as to the extent of the reduction and what the effects will be. My question is: Will the honourable Leader be good enough to bring in a statement as to what is actually taking place in this connection?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall endeavour to get the information.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, January 25, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, as I have remarked previously, for me to take part in the debate on the Throne Speech is almost an annual occurrence; but because of the smallness of our group, and the seriousness of the problems which face this country and the world at large, I believe I should take advantage of the present occasion to express our ideas and opinions on conditions within our country, and beyond it. For that reason I much appreciate the opportunity of taking part in this debate.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address. I particularly envy the ability of the seconder to speak with facility in both English and French. Both the mover and seconder deserve particular commendation in view of the fact that, to my mind, the Speech from the Throne provided meagre material with which to initiate a debate.

During this debate some honourable senators referred to various functions held in Ottawa last November on the occasion of the Queen Mother's visit to Canada. I regret that I was unable to attend those functions, but in 1939 I had the pleasure and privilege of meeting Her Majesty in Ottawa and in Saskatoon, the nearest city to my home. I should like to suggest to the Government that the Queen Mother be appointed the next Governor General of Canada, to represent her daughter, Queen Elizabeth, in this senior dominion and largest of Commonwealth countries. I think this would be pleasing to practically all Canadians.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) made particular reference to a part of the Speech from the Throne which indicates that the Government intends not to do something, but to prevent something from being done, in her native province. That seems rather strange to me. However, I can assure the honourable lady that she has my sympathy, for I too live in a province that has dared to vote for a provincial government of a political stripe other than that of the high and mighty government in Ottawa, and I have suffered disabilities in many ways, just as she has. However, in this instance, I think it is a piece of purely political spite work. All the people in the district concerned speak of the valuable land, and the desirability of a low level storage dam which has been proposed. Honourable senators, I have been in that territory, and I know that there is immense power available for development; there is no shortage of power available at all.

In this connection, it is worth noting that we are on the verge of great developments through the use of atomic power. The world's first atomic-powered submarine has recently been completed in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At a cost of $55 million.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Since this session started that submarine has left a New Jersey dock, gone on a cruise of several days, made a trial dive, and returned to the dock, and throughout the trip she was driven by atomic power. It is commonly forecast that in the near future factories will be running on atomic power. In fact, it is even said that within a few years automobiles will have atomic engines. However, I have some doubts about that.

Thinking of the atom bomb, and the splitting of the atom, one's mind goes back to that grand old gentleman who years ago settled in the northern part of Saskatchewan, Dr. Benjamin Ralph. In his younger days he conducted a school in the Old Country, and he had some difference with the Government over the curriculum, taxes, or some other matter. He was a most amazing character. A Congregationalist missionary, he had a knowledge of medicine, and when there was no doctor in the district he would get out his buckboard and team and visit the sick. Dr. Ralph loved to talk about the splitting of the atom, and he declared that one day it would be done. I remember when he would gather together a group of farmers and talk for hours on its possibilities, on how it would revolutionize the civilized world. He lived to be nearly ninety, and he was one of the founders of the University of Saskatchewan.

Now, honourable senators, on the subject of the diversion of water by the damming of the Arrow Lakes, a number of letters have appeared in the press recently. I wish to read one which was written to the editor of the Arrow Lakes News, at Nakusp, British Columbia:

Dear Sir:

A number of letters have appeared in your paper recently why the proposed Kaiser Dam should not be built on the Arrow Lakes. Now let us look at a few points why it should be built and right away, too.

Two main points against it seem to be that certain farm lands will be flooded, and that it will supply industries across the line with power rather than having the industries in Canada.

Let's look at the farm first. Our member of parliament has said that "thousands of acres will be flooded". This seems to be greatly exaggerated for there will be relatively few settlements that will be affected. A great number of those affected are not being farmed anyway, as the owners obtain most of their revenue from logging or outside jobs. Some of the so-called farms would not produce enough to keep a gopher alive anyway, so their loss would not harm anything and the owners would be compensated for the loss in any case. Considering what these farms might produce if worked, would it mean a revenue to the province of a million dollars a year as the dam will do? Certainly not.

Then again, we do not know when nature will flood these farms again as it did in 1948.

By the way, I understand that with the low level dam it is not proposed to raise the water any higher than it has been in flood time.

Continuing:

It may be this year or next and what crops or compensation will the poor farmer get then? Nothing!

Now for industries. There is no place between Arrowhead and Castlegar that a power dam could be built, so naturally we cannot generate power in that area to offer to industries. But if the Kaiser Co. use the water, which they will get anyway, and give us 20 per cent of the power generated by it, say within the next year or two, we will have something to offer industries, if they are interested in this district. What will that power cost us? Nothing. And we will get around a million dollars a year for something that has been running to waste for centuries.

Now someone has come up with the bright idea that a dam built between Castlegar and Trail, which I presume would be at Murphy Creek, and about 70 feet higher than the proposed Kaiser dam would fill the bill. Well, if the Kaiser dam will flood the settlements on the lake, what would a dam over three times the height of the Kaiser dam do, to say nothing of the now operation Brilliant power site out of commission?

Mica Creek will be a wonderful site for a power project, but supposing it could be built tomorrow. What revenue would we get from it as we have no industries to use the power? If the Kaiser dam is put in now we get the cash revenue from the taxes, etc. and by the time the Mica Creek dam is built, which they say will be 10 to 15 years, enough industries may have come in to use our share of the Kaiser dam power and then the Mica Creek would be ready to be put on a paying basis.

As for turning the mighty Columbia into the Fraser River, I think that is too fantastic for words. Look at the cost to start with and then the farmers, and they are real farmers, in the Fraser Valley, have trouble enough with flooding conditions now, so why make things more difficult for them?

Some of you may say "Listen to that Social Crediter talking, and it is certain that he has nothing to lose." You are quite wrong there, because I am not a Social Crediter and I will lose my home and business if the Kaiser dam is built, but I realize that with every advancement, someone must suffer and I am big enough to put up with the trouble that it will cause me for the benefits that it will be to the province and the industries that it will bring in.

Let's get along with the work on the Kaiser dam and cut out this idea of making a political football out of it, for it seems to be what some are trying to do.

Yours truly,
H. W. Stones.

The writer of the letter apparently lives in the district about which he talks.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: May I ask the honourable senator from what newspaper he took the letter?

Hon. Mr. Horner: The letter was written to the editor of Arrow Lakes News at Nakusp.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The writer of the letter knows nothing about the matter.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, he lives right there.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Maybe, but do not think that I don't.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I am suspicious that it is purely a political move on the part of this Government and nothing else.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I will tell you more of that tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, you will have to do quite a bit of explaining to convince me. The argument of the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) is that the United States gets the benefit. Furthermore, she boasted, and rightfully so, of the great aluminum development at Kitimat, but it has been made possible only through the investment of United States capital and the purchase by the United States Government of aluminum under a five-year contract.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: But the aluminum plant was established in British Columbia and not in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Horner: As I say, it was made possible only through the Government of the United States contracting to buy five years' production of aluminum. The Westcoast Transmission Company's pipeline that the honourable senator (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) boasted of will be feasible and possible only if the Government allows that company to sell natural gas to the United States.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: What about your wheat? Where do you sell your wheat?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I could tell you about that—that is something I do know about.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is all right to co-operate with the United States in these schemes, but, according to some people, we are not only co-operating but we are being ordered about by the United States.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You do not believe that, do you?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, I sometimes doubt if we are doing things on our own or not. Let us take the development of the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: What about it?

Hon. Mr. Horner: An extensive area will be flooded, and from what I know, it will include some really good farm land. May I say that I was perhaps the only one who objected to, or, to say the least, who was not enthusiastic about the development of the St. Lawrence. Grand old farmsteads along that river, villages and towns in that pioneer section of the country, are to be submerged. Furthermore, there is a stipulation in the agreement covering this development that a toll is to be levied on ships passing through—a sort of toll-gate on the Rhine, if you will—to pay the costs. I would like to know what that is going to mean. I expect it will be like a number of other things, that we in the West will be paying the piper to build up industry in eastern Canada.

On the eve of atomic power development great haste is being made to develop hydro-electric power on the St. Lawrence. Of course, a deep seaway is to be built in connection with this power development: the plans call for a 27-foot depth of water in the canals. Now, so far we have been getting along very well with existing facilities on the St. Lawrence. Foreign ships have come up the river, proceeded through the canals and across the Great Lakes as far as Fort William, unloading their cargoes en route, and then loaded wheat at Fort William and returned to Liverpool; and the cost of transporting wheat in that way from the head of the lakes to Liverpool is, I would say, one-third of what we pay to move wheat down to Montreal. I am told that to build the canal three feet deeper—that is 30 feet, instead of 27 feet, as proposed—would increase the cost by $400 million. What about these costs? They will have to be paid some day. But all we hear in the meantime is "Let us get going, let us spend the money, even if we do go into debt", and if anyone offers a word in criticism he is told, "Oh, you are not progressive".

The St. Lawrence Seaway interests me for another reason altogther, and that is in its relation to the Hudson Bay route. I am afraid that that route will become neglected. May I say, though, that I am glad to have some praise to offer the Government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: A large addition being built to the elevator at Churchill will increase its capacity by 2,500,000 bushels. I made a trip to Churchill last fall, the second that I have made there, and I am sorry that what I learned then I had not learned on my first trip. I found that the elevator facilities for loading, cleaning and so on are capable of handling 10 million bushels per year. While I was there work was going ahead on the building of the addition, and I thought what a pity the elevator had not been made large enough in the beginning, because this added space would have cost very little extra then. However, we are thankful for what we have.

Weather has a great deal to do with the movement of ships through Hudson Bay. While I was there I learned that the most modern means of forecasting are employed, including radar. In spite of all that we are simply not making the use that we should make of that port. It is well known in western Canada that a crop can be insured provided it is seeded between April 15 and May 15. However, in the West, seasonal weather varies as much as a month, so much so that in some years we would quite prudently seed on April 15, whereas in other years we would not seed a bushel until May 20 or 22. Now, similar variations in seasonal weather occur in Hudson Bay. Besides that, the winds play a great part in the operation of ships across Hudson Bay. Wind blowing from a northerly direction moves loose ice to the south shore of the bay, whereas a southerly wind will drive the loose ice and icebergs into the channel. The one will leave a clear channel, the other a channel cluttered with ice floes. Last fall the bay was open for navigation for three weeks, but I firmly believe ships could have safely made the harbour at Churchill three weeks earlier than they did, because a south wind had been blowing for a week and moved the ice and any icebergs into the channel. I saw in that port some fine looking ships, which had brought in a considerable variety of goods and which later took away large cargoes of grain.

While I am on the subject of Churchill, I have another request that I would like the honourable Leader to bring to the attention of the Government: that is, that a customs office be located at Churchill for the convenience of firms which might and should import through that port. Western Canadian business firms should import more goods through Churchill, and I believe they would do so if customs could be cleared at that port. The Hudson Bay route is a thousand miles shorter than the St. Lawrence route, and I understand that the masters of ships using the Hudson Bay route like it very much. A customs office, I am told, would be a great boon and convenience to that port. A port authority is located there, and it seems to me that it would not be too heavy a burden for the government to establish a customs office there.

I would like now to say a few words about the railroad. I was talking to the superintendent of that line and I was told that for two hundred miles going down to Churchill the road is on a gradual slope and is perhaps the easiest piece of railroad to maintain in all Canada, because the land there is covered with muskeg with a perma-frost base underneath. I am firmly convinced that the road should be used for three months every year, and that if it were we could easily ship 100 million bushels of wheat annually through Churchill.

There is another matter. On these trips there are a man and a woman, very capable people, interested in the On-To-The-Bay Association. They sell badges at two dollars apiece; and to boost their project they have issued a book, but some of the material in it is not very convincing. For one thing, they urge the Alberta government to co-operate with them in the assumed interest of Alberta farmers. Again, they want the Canadian Pacific Railway to be granted running rights over the road to Churchill in order that it may carry grain there. The first suggestion seems to me rather ridiculous, because for most of Alberta the natural grain outlet is the port of Vancouver. Also there is no point in granting running rights over the Churchill road to the C.P.R., because 150 million bushels of grain are raised in the areas served by the Canadian National Railways. I see that Eastern interests still voice objection to the Hudson Bay route. The president of the Montreal Corn Exchange Association is reported, in an article headed "Grain ships may bypass Montreal", as lamenting the fact that thirty-six vessels deserted Montreal for Churchill last year. These Montreal interests seem to think they are entitled to handle our grain whether or not the eastern route is more expensive. They opposed shipments by the west coast: I remember how strongly it was contended at one time that grain could not move through the Panama Canal because it would heat.

I believe it would be for the general good of Canada if a railroad were constructed from Flin Flon to serve the great area in the pre-Cambrian shield which is loaded with minerals of all kinds: This is an outlay which would benefit Canada a great deal more than huge expenditures on the St. Lawrence route. To my thinking, one of the most precious of our assets is good land; we have not too much of it, and it is deplorable that fertile farms should be flooded. There are high hopes that with the increase of power, heavy machinery and all sorts of other manufactures will be produced in great quantities; but remember that, while there is a saturation point for manufactures, the growing of food ministers to an ever-increasing demand.

I will now refer for a few minutes to some statements of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). In reply to a question by the honourable Leader on this side (Hon. Mr. Haig) with regard to the employment situation in Canada, he said that a current news release showed that in the week ended December 11, 1954, a total of 5,167,000 people were employed. This figure seems to me rather surprising. It represents a very large proportion of a total population of 15 million people, and, if correct, it is very gratifying. It seems to me that the total must include persons self-employed as well as those who work for others.

The honourable Leader of the Government went on to produce figures in relation to what the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) calls taxation at all levels of government. The Government Leader seems to have thought that, by citing some lower rates of personal income tax applicable to Canadians as contrasted with persons in similar income brackets in the United States, he had completely answered the criticisms of our leader. But the fact is that the reply was very partial and incomplete. One reads, for instance, that exchange teachers from Great Britain, though they receive on this side salaries larger than they get in England, have to resort to baby-sitting in order to keep going, and this, in spite of a bonus; while Ontario teachers temporarily transferred to England benefit from the much lower cost of living there. As regards the lower income tax levied on married Canadians, if they are cigarette users the increased cost of cigarettes entirely wipes out the tax benefit. If they have an automobile—and most married couples want to own a car—the differential in favour of Americans is $500; a refrigerator costs $100 more here than in the States; and for almost any electrical appliance used in the home, the price here is much higher. I know what conditions in the United States are, and I say that the cost of living there is less right across the board. The other day I mentioned this to a Liberal member of Parliament who lives close to the border; and he said, "I have to admit you are right." We shall have to look very seriously into the matter of a reduction of our cost of living.

I see also in the Speech from the Throne that measures are proposed to provide for the establishment of standards for all agricultural products. If I had the authority, I would standardize a provision of a sufficient amount of the products of the farm which are served to the public. In that regard, two Ottawa restaurants deserve some favourable publicity for including a fair amount of meat in the portions they provide. One local restaurant serves for 98 cents half a pound of T-bone steak; another—which I think is known as the Golden Grill—serves three-quarters of a pound of steak. But generally, in respect of meals, the Canadian working man who depends on public eating places for his food is much worse off than his brother in the United States. That is the verdict of practically all Americans who come here as tourists.

Our Government takes pride and claims some political prestige because the Canadian dollar is at a premium over the American dollar. But this achievement is costing us a lot of money. The psychology of the thing is that when our dollar is worth more, Canadians tend to travel south in much larger numbers; but when the advantage is in favour of American currency, large numbers of Americans come over here and buy freely.

I have just been reading an article which describes our difficulties in the field of textiles, electrical appliances, and other branches of manufacturing. It refers to a special report recently issued by three university professors, wherein it was stated that with the depreciation of the pound sterling it is now possible for a British manufacturer, incurring the sterling equivalent of a Canadian dollar's worth of wage costs, to cover those costs by receiving 56 Canadian cents.

I believe I have made it sufficiently clear that a comparison of the income tax figures in Canada and in the United States represents only part of the overall picture. In arriving at comparative costs of living it is necessary to know all the factors that enter into costs, not merely income tax. Let me repeat that the higher cost of cigarettes in Canada would in itself equal any saving made by a Canadian in income tax.

I am concerned about Canada's present unemployment situation, and I am really fearful about the future. Last year I expressed alarm when the Government undertook to guarantee 98 per cent of the money loaned by banks on real estate under national housing programs. At that time I feared the ordinary investor who advanced money in the field of speculative home building would soon find himself caught. Well, this is happening right now in several cities across Canada. Builders, unable to sell their houses, are up against it to recover the money they have invested. Where is this all going to lead?

Canada is badly in need of a vigorous immigration program. Immigrants are needed to fill some of these houses, to work on the land and to become consumers. But not a word was mentioned about this in the Speech from the Throne. We express concern about labour problems, yet all the while we are being driven down the socialistic road. It is all right for the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to say to our Leader (Hon. Mr. Haig) "Would you take away these social benefits?" Well, I have said it before and I say it again: once you go down this slippery road there is no climbing back. And as for asking, "Would you take away baby bonuses and old age pensions?", you might just as well ask a person how popular he would be with a child if he gave him a piece of candy and then took it away—no matter how injurious he thought the candy might be to the child. We are being driven down the road of socialism, and much faster than is at all necessary in a country like Canada.

I spoke earlier about living in a province whose Government is of a different political party from the one in power in Ottawa. Not too long ago we were treated to some fine entertainment in Saskatchewan when the Liberals held a convention there. Unfortunately the occasion was marred by the death in a plane crash of a leading candidate. I followed the convention activities from the sidelines, and judging by newspaper accounts it appeared that there was more criticism from the ranks of the Liberals themselves about "Gardiner" and other political machines than ever came from my own party. It was fine entertainment while it lasted. They had L. B. Thomson, Director of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, resign his position to contest the provincial leadership of the Liberal party, and when he lost out in that endeavour he was reappointed to his former post with the P.F.R.A. It reminds me of the old words: "Off agin, on agin, gone agin, Finnigin". It has been said that he was the only person with his qualifications available for the post. Well, it always wearies me when I hear the old story that a person cannot be replaced in his job. It is pure nonsense.

Honourable senators, all the political fun that is being had over the South Saskatchewan River Project is good for at least another election or two. The supposition is that if the electors are good people and vote Liberal the project will not cost them too much money, but if they vote contrarywise it will cost them dearly.

An Hon. Senator: Order.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I certainly hope our province never puts up too much money for that purpose. I remember some thirty-six years ago seeing an irrigation project at Bassano, Alberta. They were exhibiting some tall clover in a glass container to show what could be achieved by irrigation, and so on. A terrific boom was predicted for the area, but Bassano is still no bigger than my own home town of Blaine Lake. In some areas where ditches were dug the water still lies in the natural prairie, and the land has been used for ranching purposes. Of course, some of the trouble might be due to alkaline elements which make the land difficult to flood.

Honourable members, I want to refer again to Canada's unemployment situation. Any good farmer looks ahead at least one year. If he summer fallows his whole land in one year he will have no crop to harvest, and he will be preparing for the next year. Now, what about industry? I am fearful of what will happen when all the present housing contracts have been completed. We have to stop somewhere. Our population is not increasing, our export markets are falling off and there will be a further shortage of jobs. How are we going to sell our manufactured products? The producing power of the farmer has diminished, because of inadequate prices for his products, and the farmer is the main purchaser of manufactured goods in Canada.

I am sorry the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) is not in his place, for I think we are approaching the time I predicted when I would win the last round in my battle with him over the prohibition of margarine. Incidentally, I am glad to be able to commend the Government and the Minister of Agriculture for making surplus Canadian butter available at a reduced price to our hospitals and other institutions. I think it is a very sensible thing to do. I would continue to offer them butter at a reduced price if they, in turn, would promise to discontinue the purchase of margarine.

Basically, Canada is an agricultural country. Now I note that we are importing cheese from New Zealand again. The Liberal Government, if it is not careful, is apt to take a great slide—perhaps not as slippery as on butter—as it did in 1930. New Zealand has a mild climate all the year round. Farmers in that country do not need barns for their cattle; all they need is a cheap shed with a thin roof to shelter the cows, which are milked by machine. The farmer drives around in his big automobile and opens up the paddocks to let his cattle graze from one field to another. No summer fallowing is required, and there is no problem of seeding. When the land is neutralized, or converted from its wild state, some expense and labour are entailed, but the grass, once grown, becomes permanent pasture. The Canadian farmer, on the other hand, must house and provide feed for his dairy cattle for six months of the year. This keeps him busy doing chores for almost seven days of the week. And, honourable senators, I want to say this, that if the Canadian farmer were paid in relation to the labour he expends, he should receive about $1 per lb. for butter. However, I think it might be wise on the part of the farmers, and also good for the country, if they said, "We farmers will take fifty cents a pound for butter." I do not say that it would bring the farmers any profit. We spend great sums of money training our young people in universities, but I do not know of a better "university" for training young folks than the farm, where they can look after milch cows. Farming has compensations which far outweigh the making of profits.

On the question of which is to be preferred —work or idleness—I should like to read an article entitled, "The wheat under the stone", which appeared last fall in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

"Is it true that over-worked men are less happy, less healthy, and shorter-lived than others?"

This question was once asked by Sir William Robertson Nicoll, the celebrated editor of The British Weekly. It is an important question.

And what was Sir William's reply? He said: "I do not believe it . . . There are three or four of my friends who might fairly be described as work-drunk. They are always busy and always ready to take on more. Two of them are not physically robust . . . They never brood, they are generally helpful; they have little relaxation, but what they have is relished with an intensity of joy. They are people who keep young in the true sense."

Then Sir William turned to the others whom he knew—those with a too abundant leisure. "I think of those who are under-worked, and I will not say that I have not sometimes envied them their leisure, but I have never envied them long, nor have I ever felt that the envy was rational."

And Sir William Robertson Nicoll was very right. Quite apart from the usefulness work may have to others, it is an excellent means of preserving the soundness of life itself. Work holds a person's life together. By its very demands, it drives out much of the worry and broodings and trifling irritability that might otherwise enter in and take possession.

Of course, there is always the disturbing feeling that work is consuming one's time. And there is, even at best, so little time for anyone on this earth. The weeks pass rapidly for the hard worker, and it is Saturday again before he knows it. The more thoroughly middle-aged a person becomes, the more he is aware that time is slipping by too quickly for his own ease of mind.

Yet work is not something that is stealing one's life away. It is part of life, and a good part. It heightens the pleasures of such change and leisure as may come. For the leisure is earned. And there is something wonderfully precious about it, from the very consciousness that work must be resumed.

It can easily become an illusion that if only we didn't have to work, we might really get down to the business of living. But working and living are so close together that they are not easily separated, at least not for long.

It is the idle, or the indifferent worker, who is most likely to be full of complaints, and grievances, and nervous apprehensions. There is nothing new about this. It was all thoroughly well understood by the quaint old writer of the 17th century, Robert Burton. In his book on the "Anatomy of Melancholy", he analyzed all the causes that contribute to man's unhappiness.

He recognized idleness for what it is. "Idleness", he wrote, "is the bane of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness, the chief mother of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, the devil's cushion, his pillow and chief reposal . . ."

These are strong words. But old Robert Burton went on to say, with a great deal of plain wisdom: "Thus much I dare boldly say: he or she that is idle . . . they shall never be pleased, never well in body or mind, but weary still, sickly still, vexed still, loathing still, weeping, sighing, grieving, suspecting, offended with the world, with every object, wishing themselves dead or gone, or else carried away with some foolish phantasie or other."

Back in the 17th century Robert Burton was considering the same question as Sir William Robertson Nicoll was considering in the 20th century. They found the same answer. Work is not a thief, stealing away life itself from those who cannot escape. It is, rather, a vast blessing giving taste to the bread, order to the mind, zest to leisure, and a useful soundness to the days that pass.

More than a century ago a very wise Archbishop of Mayence, who knew the human heart well, used to say: "The human heart is like a millstone. If you put wheat under it, it grinds the wheat into flour. If you put no wheat, it grinds on, but then 'tis itself it wears away."

Honourable senators, I believe that is true.

I may get a good calling down for suggesting it, but I think that the introduction of margarine has done a great injury to the economy of this country, and has discouraged many a farmer from keeping a herd of cattle.

The honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) related an entertaining story of his trip to Kenya, and of his impressions of that severely troubled country. I found his speech most interesting.

The honourable senator from Peterborough West (Hon. Mr. Duffus) also told a very interesting story, of the life of David Fife, to whom we owe the discovery of Red Fife Wheat. For many years I was in that part of the country where David Fife had carried on his experiments, and I was pleased to have the fact brought back to my mind. Admittedly, Red Fife was a wonderful wheat. I recall that on one occasion I had a crop of it ripen in less than one hundred days, thanks to a warm wind. To this day any western farmer will tell you that Red Fife was a good frost-resistant wheat. In our part of the country it suffered little from rust and generally stood many of the calamities better than the wheat we are growing today. Certainly, we could seed Red Fife earlier than we now seed Thatcher, a type which almost always results in a poor crop if seeded before the ground is thoroughly warm. I can recall sowing Red Fife so early that the horses had to be turned around in a snowbank at the end of the field, but the wheat grew in spite of the cold weather.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What about Marquis Wheat?

Hon. Mr. Horner: Well, Marquis was a wonderful wheat too. As the honourable senator from Peterborough West (Hon. Mr. Duffus) told us, that wheat was developed from Red Fife.

I can recall an experience in my early days of farming when I went to my neighbour and tried to buy enough of his nice bin of Red Fife to plant some thirty-five acres. I told him I did not have enough money to take a full bushel to the acre. He had found himself in the same predicament, he told me, and had planted only a half bushel, but it produced forty bushels to the acre. I said, "I will try it, and hope for the best." I recall that was a dry year, the land had been broken with oxen and the next Spring the catch in the low spots was quite good but on the high land it was very poor. It was not until the fifth of June that there was sufficient moisture to give full germination to some 80 per cent of that field; nevertheless, that Red Fife wheat, planted at a half bushel to the acre, produced thirty-five bushels to the acre.

As honourable senators may know, we at one time thought Red Fife had a tendency to shell, and in the earlier days it was a common sight to see any number of binders going out to cut wheat by moonlight to avoid loss. The harvesting was done at the time when shelling was likely to be most severe. But it has since been found that Red Fife grain that is missed by the binder along the fences can remain on the ground all winter and still be quite firm in the spring. With the use of combines today it could be harvested with no fear of loss from shelling. One often hears people in Western Canada today express the wish that they could again get a bit of pure Red Fife. In places where they do not suffer from rust, I am sure they would be glad to go back to it.

Hon. Mr. Howden: What about rust?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I think the average farmer would tell you that it is more subject to rust than some other wheats. I recall back in 1916 that the rust in my part of the country was a very serious factor in wheat growing, and the southern parts of both Manitoba and Saskatchewan have often been harder hit than the northern areas. Last year the farmers thought that in Thatcher they had a truly rust-free wheat. However, the variety of rust that hit it had a tendency to weaken the straw, so that the grain broke down and lay some six inches above the ground, making it very difficult to harvest by combine.

Hon. Mr. Howden: We now have a rust-proof wheat, Selkirk.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Yes; I have seen some of it and its head appears to resemble that of the Red Fife. I understand there were places where the rust hit the straw but did not seem to affect the head. However, it must be kept in mind that new types of so-called rust-proof wheat must be introduced from time to time to meet the ever-changing character of the rust which attacks it.

Honourable senators, I should like now to discuss for a few minutes the subject of toll roads, a device which I favour very much. I have been over the New Jersey Turnpike and some 175 miles of toll road west of Washington, and I never met anyone who objected to paying the toll. To me tolls are an eminently fair way of meeting the cost of road building, because the huge truckers and other people who use the road most pay the larger portion of its cost. In other words, it is built and maintained by the people who use it.

To my way of thinking, toll roads would be a good thing for the province of Saskatchewan, and if we had the right Government we might obtain them. We also need toll bridges. As honourable senators know we have in that province two branches of the Saskatchewan River and crossings are made for the most part by ferry. I recall last summer seeing some twenty-five cars lined up at one point waiting to cross by ferry. A further serious problem is that when the water is low there is a sharp drop from the ramp down to the ferry boat, which often tears the rear bumpers off cars as they go aboard. Still further there is the serious inconvenience of a six-week tie-up between the time when the ferry stops running and the ice becomes safe for travel. Occuring, as it does, in both the spring and fall, there is a crossing tie-up every year of some three months. Needless to say, the people living in these areas would welcome the opportunity to pay a reasonable toll charge to meet the cost of a bridge.

Honourable senators, I should like to touch for a few minutes on the much discussed subject of narcotic drugs. In this connection, I may well comment on the question of a wider examination of food products. I should like the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) to make some comment about, for instance, the need for removing the poisonous colouring from brown bread. Further, I think our liquors should be examined more closely for drugs. We are sometimes inclined to think because they come to us bottled and sealed that they are free of any contamination.

bottles, one of which was a type of gin bottle with the fine writing on it which the British were sure no one could imitate. So I said to a fellow "How do you get that in here?" His reply was that all the bottles and the stuff in them were made right in San Antonio, Texas.

In a United States periodical I read that governments today are collecting excise revenue on about half the liquor that is consumed. What does that mean? That must mean that some of it, a considerable part of it, is made with drugs, and I am pretty sure that a great deal of the liquor consumed in Canada is made in that way. In the olden days when men logged this Ottawa valley they did not go crazy and kill one another after consuming liquor. Alcohol at that time was cheap, and what they consumed was distilled alcohol, distilled whisky, which caused them no harm. But when drugs are put in it, the effect is to send men wild. Our governments are exacting such a high toll of taxes on liquor that there is a strong temptation to adulterate it, and I believe that some people are not resisting this temptation.

Now, honourable senators, I have covered most of the ground that I intended to cover, and I appreciate very much your kind attention.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. George H. Ross: Honourable senators, in following the honourable member from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) I do not propose to discuss the Kaiser Dam other than to say that I do not share his view with respect to it. Nor do I share his view with regard to the comparative importance of the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Hudson Bay route.

Rather, this afternoon I propose to discuss the Indian problem in the prairie provinces.

In the early years following Confederation, Canada treated the prairie Indians and Metis not as human beings in a neighboring colony, but as wild animals to be hunted and exterminated. Since then Canada has mellowed a great deal towards them, particularly in the last few years. There is still much room for improvement.

On July 15, 1870, Canada purchased from the Hudson's Bay Company the Canadian prairies, and acquired from Great Britain the right to govern the same. For some time prior to that Fort Garry and the adjoining territory constituted a separate British colony known as Red River, which exercised self-government under the sovereignty of Great Britain. Canada then had no interest in any part of the Northwest Territories.

Self government in Red River came about in this way. In the year 1670 King Charles II granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ownership of all the territory drained by waters flowing into the Hudson Bay and the right to govern the country under the sovereignty of Great Britain. In 1869 William McTavish the governor of the Hudson's Bay Company abdicated as governor of the territory, leaving it without any government. Anarchy then prevailed.

"No matter how anarchy is produced, it is quite open by the law of nations, for the inhabitants to form a government, ex necessitate, for the protection of life and property," as Sir John A. Macdonald wrote in a letter to Governor designate William McDougall, who from the village of Pembina in North Dakota was attempting to override the Red River Government. (Strange Empire, by J. K. Howard, p. 154.)

In accordance with that principle, the residents of Fort Garry and of the territory extending in every direction for 50 miles therefrom had elected a Legislative Council which governed this area until it became a part of Canada. (Howard, p. 122. Life and Times of Louis Riel, by W. M. Davidson. p. 35)

The membership of the council was made up of the best intellects in the country, including Judge Black, Chief Justice under Hudson's Bay rule; Henry Cochrane, a full blooded Cree Indian who was in charge of the Anglican Mission of St. Peter's; Henry Prince, an Indian Chief of the Saulteux Indians; James Ross, a Scotch Metis who had graduated with high honors from Toronto University, was an able lawyer and was formerly on the editorial staff of the Toronto Globe; John Sutherland who was afterwards a member of the Canadian Senate; Dr. Curtis J. Bird, who had been educated in London and had gained a reputation for professional ability, and other distinguished citizens. Louis Riel, a brilliant, practical and highly educated young Metis, was their first secretary. He later was elected president. The Imperial Government notified them how far they could go without breaking the law. (The Northwest Mounted Police, by J. P. Turner. P. 44. Howard, p. 154. History of Manitoba, by Gunn and Tuttle, p. 381.)

By the late 1860's wild life on the prairies was becoming scarce and it became necessary for the residents to look to ways other than hunting and trapping to supplement their means of living. Acting on the advice of Louis Riel, hundreds of natives and settlers had purchased river lots for which they held legal titles from the Hudson's Bay Company.

The river lots were surveyed according to a plan which gave the lot a small river frontage and appurtenant water rights, and extended back two miles on the open prairie. On these lots the owners built their homes, churches and schools and tilled the soil. (Howard, pp. 94, 147.)

The trouble in the Northwest Territories in 1869 and 1870 is often referred to as the Red River rebellion. The term rebellion connotes armed resistance from within a country to the established government. There was no such resistance in Red River (Howard, p. 113.) It is true that a minor revolt was stirred up largely by an insolent ruffian named Scott, who mustered 100 men at Portage la Prairie to march on Red River to destroy the Government. But as the marchers neared Fort Garry and learned the facts, nearly all of them disbanded and returned to their homes. A few carried on. Scott and a few followers killed a half-wit Metis youth named Parisien who was suspected of being a spy by slicing open one side of his head with an axe, and binding him with two sashes and dragging him head first through the snow. But the murderers were soon rounded up and subdued. Scott was tried by court-martial, found guilty and shot by a firing squad. (Davidson, p. 40. Howard pp. 175, 182.)

The treatment of the Indians and Metis by the Imperial Government was at all times worthy of the best traditions of British statesmanship. It recognized Indians and Metis as human beings having unquestionable rights to life, liberty and property. The trouble arose by reason of Canada invading their territory. The residents defended themselves, their homes and their country's rights against the unprovoked, cruel and vicious attacks of the Canadians who were foreigners in the Red river and had no greater rights there than they had in the State of New York. This was not rebellion. It was simply a matter of free men defending themselves and their homes against the unwarranted attacks of foreigners.

May I now refer briefly to the many wrongs committed by Canada against the natives of Red River while it was a self-governing colony under the British Crown and before Canada acquired any rights therein.

In July, 1869, Colonel J. S. Dennis, a land surveyor, was sent by the Government of Canada to the colony with a crew of land surveyors and equipment to make a survey according to a checker-board plan. They ignored the survey already made, under which river lots had been sold, and refused to recognize the titles issued by the Hudson's Bay Company to purchasers thereof. This stirred up much hostility among the natives towards Canada. (Howard p. 93. McDougall of Alberta, by John Maclean, p. 133. Between the Red and the Rockies, by Grant MacEwan, p. 50.)

In September, 1869, Canada appointed William McDougall, its Minister of Public Works, Governor of the Northwest Territories. He and his staff appeared at the border with a display of pomp and trappings like a great satrap. He had 60 wagons and carts carrying him and his retinue, their baggage and 300 rifles. The Government of Red River did not allow them to enter the country. (Howard, p. 194, 112.)

McDougall thereupon undertook to govern the colony from Pembina. Some days later he produced a fraudulent proclamation describing himself as "our trusted and well beloved William McDougall" and giving him authority to govern; to it the signature of the Queen was forged. (Davidson, p. 24. Howard, p. 141.)

On the same day McDougall isued a commission appointing surveyor Dennis "Conservator of the Peace," authorizing him to raise, equip and use an army to overthrow the Government of Red River. Armed with that commission Dennis made his way to Winnipeg, enrolled an armed force of 40 or 50 men, and took possession of Fort Garry. But they were quickly rounded up and imprisoned. (Davidson, p. 24. Howard, p. 141. Gunn and Tuttle, p. 365.)

In 1869 Donald A. Smith, the future Lord Strathcona, appeared at Fort Garry as Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company but not of the territory. He recognized the Riel government and gave a pledge that he would take no step to upset it. (Davidson, p. 31. Howard, p. 173. Macoun, p. 464.) On behalf of the Government of Canada he appeared before the Red River Assembly and urged them to send delegates to Ottawa with a bill of rights to negotiate with the Canadian Government in the event of Canada acquiring the Northwest Territories. The Assembly agreed to do so upon Smith, "speaking on behalf of the Government of Canada", undertaking that the delegates would receive a "cordial reception". (Gunn and Tuttle, p. 382. Davidson, p. 45.)

Judge Black, the Reverend Mr. Ritchot and Alfred Scott were sent. At the Ontario frontier delegates Ritchot and Scott were met by a magistrate who offered them an escort to Ottawa. They accepted and were escorted to jail and charged with complicity in murder. As no case could be made out against them, they were released. (Howard, p. 190.)

of the Northwest Territories, and with Great Britain to take over the government of the country under the sovereignty of the Queen. The terms had to be acceptable to the residents of the territory. A plan was worked out, satisfactory to the delegates, under which the Northwest Territories was to become a part of Canada as of July 15, 1870; the province of Manitoba was created on the basis of the Bill of Rights presented by the delegates; a general amnesty was to be granted to every one implicated in the movement to defend themselves against the unprovoked attacks by the Canadians; the Government of Canada undertook to respect the rights of individuals and to settle Indian claims "in conformity with equitable principles which have uniformly governed the British Crown in its dealings with the aborigines", (Howard, p. 70); and the Riel Government should carry on until a new Lieutenant Governor should arrive at Fort Garry. (Howard, p. 192.)

On May 17, 1870, 1,200 troops had left Toronto for the West, allegedly only for police duty, under Colonel Wolseley, who issued a proclamation which Riel had printed and broadcast. It said in part, "our mission is one of peace". As the army neared Red River, Wolseley sent one Butler out to interview Riel. Riel told Butler that Red River would receive Wolseley's army on its "mission of peace" with a friendly welcome and that he, Riel, would resign his authority to the new Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba upon his arrival.

As Colonel Wolseley's army came in sight of Fort Garry, Riel received reports from reliable sources that Wolseley's plan was to capture Fort Garry by surprise, and capture or kill Riel in the battle. Learning of this, members of the Riel Government drifted away. Riel and two of his friends left for Pembina until it could be determined if they would be safe in Manitoba.

On entering Fort Garry, Colonel Wolseley paid off his troops and issued a proclamation praising their fortitude. In it he denounced the Métis. His noble force, he said, had routed the "banditti". Ten days later, on September 2, 1870, the new Governor, Adam G. Archibald, arrived at Fort Garry. In the interval the settlement was without any government. The troops went wild. The massive gates of Fort Garry were battered down by the excited soldiers. (Howard, p. 361) A number of natives were killed; many suffered injuries; others fled for their lives. (Howard, p. 208; Davidson, p. 245) Governor Archibald, the new Governor of Manitoba, in reporting to the Canadian Government, wrote:

> Many of the half-breeds were so beaten and outraged that they feel in slavery. The oppressors seem to feel as if French half-breeds should be wiped from the face of the globe. (Davidson, p. 51).

Though Red River and Ontario were two separate colonies, neither having any right or control over the people in the other, nevertheless the province offered a reward of $5,000, which it ultimately had to pay, for the capture of Riel, whom it branded as a "murderer". Many soldiers released from military discipline were anxious to win the reward, to finance them in their start in the new country. Their ruthless searching for Riel caused intense excitement among the residents who looked upon him as their hero. (Howard, pp. 186, 208.)

The amnesty was not granted as promised. Instead, Riel, the Colonial Treasurer, and a member of the Legislature were banished from Canada for five years and their political rights forfeited for that period. (Davidson p. 63. Howard, p. 246.) In the excitement the fugitives fled westward; many of them located on open prairie land near Battleford where they built homes, improved their land and applied for title. Their applications were ignored. In 1883 they were told they could not stay on their locations. They also pleaded for a measure of self-government, similar to that which the Riel Government got for Manitoba. Instead of listening to their pleas the Government reinforced the Mounted Police and raised an army which subdued them by force. The survivors were obliged to migrate and make another fresh start. (Davidson, p. 69. Howard, p. 371.)

Many of Riel's associates fled to Montana. They urged him to flee with them. He refused saying he would surrender and answer for their alleged sins. To his cousin, Nault, he said:

> Cousin, you must go, but I am going to surrender. After my enemies get me they will be joyous and satisfied, and my people will get justice, and be safe. If I do not, then the others will be caught and punished for me. (Davidson, p. 94).

Riel surrendered and was tried. In preparing for his trial, the defence asked for a month's delay to permit them to bring witnesses from Montana. The witnesses were willing to appear if they would be guaranteed immunity while they served as witnesses and be given safe conduct back to the boundary. This was refused. The witnesses did not come. Without his witnesses Riel was found guilty and hanged. "This was the most unkindest cut of all." Canada took the life of the people's hero. He sacrificed his life in advocating security and fair play for the natives. They mourned his death; they were overwhelmed with grief. (Davidson, p. 94.)

Meanwhile, the trial of the other alleged culprits proceeded. Eighteen Metis were convicted of treason, felony or they pleaded guilty, and they received prison terms ranging from one to seven years. Eleven Indians were sentenced to hang for murder, but three won commutation. The other eight, including Chief Wandering Spirit, were hanged, all at one time, on a single scaffold, in the Mounted Police courtyard at Battleford on November 27, 1885. (Howard, p. 545.) A large number were imprisoned in Stoney Mountain penitentiary (Maclean, p. 153); some sought refuge in Edmonton, Calgary and Macleod; (Maclean, p. 143): and many fled to the United States. (Maclean, p. 229.)

Louis Riel was the brain of the movement in Red River in building up and protecting the homes of the natives and in preparing them for self-government. He was unselfish and humane. The forlorn people, facing the loss of land and livelihood, learned from him that their struggle for freedom, justice and self-government was significant. Out of that struggle he emerged a symbol and spokesman for the oppressed.

Nova Scotia had its Joseph Howe, Quebec its Louis Joseph Papineau, Ontario its William Lyon Mackenzie, and the prairies their Louis Riel—all renowned reformers who devoted their lives to a great cause and resisted tyranny with courage, energy and decision. Great reformers are great people. During their active lives, history is often fabricated against them. They are best seen at a distance when unprejudiced judgment becomes possible. All four of these men were in their day regarded by many as traitors. Today, Howe, Papineau and Mackenzie are given credit for having been great statesmen. We are too close to Riel fully to appreciate his sagacity and farsightedness. When prejudice vanishes, writers of history will, no doubt, place him in the front rank among the most eminent of Canadian statesmen.

At the time Canada invaded the Red River and made the unprovoked attacks upon the natives to which I have referred, the Indians and Metis were a strong, healthy and vigorous people, proud of their race. They had imagination and were not deficient in natural understanding. They abhorred restraint. Given a chance, they would have well worked out their own salvation.

But Canada treated them at the time in a treacherous and barbarous manner, and has since treated their descendants as an inferior race. They have been humiliated; their spirits are broken; and they have in a large measure lost their self-respect.

A few years after ceding the Northwest Territories to Canada, they were huddled off like so many cattle to reserves. By treaty they surrendered a vast territory to Canada. Up to that time they were prosperous and happy. The treaties left them in poverty. The compensation given them was wholly inadequate. Canada has not to this day compensated them for having confiscated the homes of their ancestors at Red River and, fifteen years later, near Battleford. By treaty Canada also undertook to educate the Indians. The parties no doubt intended that the Indians should receive as high a standard of education as the whites. They are not receiving it. Canada has not lived up to her agreement with them in that respect. The mind is an important part of every human being and should be fully trained.

In view of the maltreatment the Indians received from Canada in the past, we can well afford to be generous and spend much to help them and the Metis, who have been brought up as Indians on reserves, to become rehabilitated. Financial assistance should be given to Indian families by Canada sufficient to induce the more ambitious to become emancipated.

The present generation of Indians, having been brought up and treated through their lives as children, without having business experience to fit them to manage their own affairs, should not be given a free hand to dispose of land, working tools or equipment provided by Canada, as they would in many cases sell the property and waste the money. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs on a reserve would have to co-operate with them in disposing of their products. But they should be given to realize that they would benefit from all such sales.

In 1910 the Indians of British Columbia said to the Canadian Government: "Today the Indian people of British Columbia ask to be put on the same level as the white man". They said: "Come, let us settle the title to these lands. Then give us title to land in fee simple, family by family. Take away your Indian reserve system; put us into your citizenship and we will rise or fall even as other men do". (Maclean, p. 248.)

Yet until the last Indian on a reserve is emancipated the tribal organization should be retained and the power of the chiefs supported in order to preserve contact with reality while preparing to embark on a new and strange existence.

I have confined my remarks to the Prairie Indians. Do the same or similar problems exist in respect to Indians living in other parts of Canada? I am not familiar with their plight. But I understand that they, too, are huddled together on reserves where they are looked down upon as an inferior race. If so, they should receive sympathetic consideration to build up their self-respect, initiative and incentive to free them and put them on the same plane as non-Indians. All humans crave freedom.

We should strive to build up a desire in all Indians to become emancipated and proud of their race. It is cruel to sit idly by while the Indians suffer for the necessities of life; it is economically unsound to have that great body of potential creators of wealth continuing to live largely in idleness; it is inhuman to have a portion of our population cooped up on reservations and treated as a lower race.

Much progress has been made during the past twelve or fifteen years. Much remains to be done, involving tremendous expenditures.

I hope the Government will do more in the way of educating the Indians and training them towards reviving their morale, building up their spirits and fitting them to become fully emancipated citizens.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable members, I have been somewhat troubled of late, because I have not seen any of the reports of the Divorce Committee. I do not like to concur in third reading of divorce bills without first seeing the evidence, because in the past we have had several tussles with the House of Commons. Members of the House of Commons have often said to me, having read the evidence in some divorce case, "Surely, you read the evidence, and how could one possibly justify granting a divorce on that evidence?" When such an occasion has arisen, I have had to hunt up the evidence. I have been told that in the past evidence has gone to the House of Commons before members of this house had an opportunity to read it. If that is so, we did wrong. I do not think evidence should go to the House of Commons until we have seen it, because no time is gained at all by that procedure. I think we should have the evidence available so as to be able to read it if we desire to do so. If I am disposed to act as a "dumb Dora" and be lenient, that is my responsibility, but when the Senate itself takes that responsibility, I do not sanction it. I have every confidence in the Chairman of the committee and its members, but I think that as a senator I also have a duty to perform.

As I said the other day, I am not in favour of divorce—I really am not, in my own heart—but I am willing to vote on these divorce bills, because I feel it is my duty as a member of this chamber to do so. If the committee recommends a bill of divorce, and the evidence warrants it, I will do my duty by voting, even though I am against divorce. I do not go so far as some other members, but I go that far. However, I think I should at least have the evidence before me, so that when I vote I know what I am voting for.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Divorce Committee I think I should say a word or two. Up to the present time we have heard about 135 divorce cases. We do not print the evidence; that is done by the Printing Bureau. The committee has received back from the Printing Bureau three, four or five printed reports, or thereabouts. These printed copies came in yesterday, and the committee is waiting to receive the remainder. At the meeting of the main committee yesterday a resolution was passed to ask the head of the Printing Bureau to appear before the committee on Friday next, when its next sitting will take place. We shall then be able to discuss the situation, so far as the printing is concerned, and obtain an explanation of why more printed reports have not been received. I have no axe to grind in this matter. We are just doing our job to the best of our ability. All we can do is to call before us those who are responsible for the printing and ask for their explanation. At one time I had thought of advocating that divorce bills should not be sent to the Commons until the printing is in hand, but the more I thought of it the more difficulties I saw ahead. We are not the printers, and if we took that responsibility we would leave ourselves in default, whereas if we pass the bills and send them to the Commons, it then becomes their responsibility, just as much as it becomes ours, to get the bills printed.

But do not overlook this, honourable senators, that every divorce bill we send to the Commons is accompanied not by a printed copy of the evidence but by a typewritten copy. If any member of the committee to which a bill is referred wishes to inform himself on the evidence, he can read the typewritten copy.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the honourable senator whether a typewritten copy of the evidence in each case is available for us to read?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Where is that typewritten copy?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The reports of the committee, with a typewritten copy of the evidence in each case, are now on the table, and the Clerk will, I am sure, furnish any honourable senator with a copy of any evidence he wishes to read.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That information is most enlightening, and should be helpful to any honourable senator who may be interested in reading the evidence taken in a particular case.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Do I understand that I can protect myself by asking that a typewritten copy of the evidence in every divorce case be placed on my desk in my room, so that I can read them all, even if it takes me three weeks or a month to do it?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Of course you can.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Then I now ask the Clerk to deliver to my room the typewritten copy of the evidence in each case. We appear to have no other business ready for consideration by the house, except divorce bills, and there is no reason why I should not read through the evidence in each case. If that is the way honourable senators want the matter handled, I am prepared to spend whatever time is necessary to read the evidence, but my own thought is that the printed evidence in each case should be available for honourable senators to read before we are asked to pass the bills.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would the honourable Leader of the Opposition consider a suggestion? It is perfectly all right for him to read the evidence in its present typewritten form, and it will take no longer to read it in that form than in print. He will have along with the evidence a copy of the report of the committee, the papers with respect to service and the other material.

If I may, I would suggest that the house pass these bills now before us. In view of the fact that the honourable Leader of the Opposition is a member of the Divorce Committee, and has been for many years, perhaps he would be good enough to attend our meeting on Friday morning and discuss with the officials of the Printing Bureau the matter of the printing of evidence.

As I have said, honourable senators, I have no axe to grind. I am as concerned about the delay in printing as is the honourable Leader of the Opposition. But would it not be satisfactory to let the matter stand until we have had an opportunity to discuss it with those responsible for the printing? I would just point out that this series takes us up to the 118th bill. We have already passed some 88 bills which have been sent to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, in reply to the suggestion of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), may I say that I am much obliged to him, as Chairman of the committee, for the invitation to attend the meeting on Friday morning to discuss the question of printing. But let there be no misunderstanding, I am not at all satisfied that bills should go from this house to the other house before the evidence supporting them has been printed. I am quite sure that some members of the other house who, like myself, are lawyers will ask me whether I have read the evidence in each case. When I admit that I have not, they will immediately ask me why I voted to pass the bill, to which I can give no satisfactory answer.

I have had this problem on my mind for a month now, and I want to say that to me our present procedure is most unsatisfactory. However, I accept the invitation to attend the committee meeting on Friday morning and, health permitting, I will be there.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then the matter can be discussed further at a later date.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes; when that committee again reports I understand I shall have permission to discuss the question if I wish to.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong this discussion unduly, but I do not think all members of this house feel it their duty to read the evidence in every divorce case. We have set up a committee to hear petitions for divorce and, in my opinion it is just as competent and as thorough in its review of the cases which come before it as is any court in Canada. I have complete confidence that the committee would not recommend passage of a bill for which there was not ample evidence to support it. Therefore, I am prepared to receive the reports of the committee and to pass on them without reading the evidence in each case.

Not all honourable senators are members of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and some do not attend the meetings of that committee. Yet, when a bill that has been before that committee is reported, the record is not even presented to the house. I am sure all honourable senators do not feel it encumbent upon them to read the record of all the proceedings before that committee before they approve the passage of such a bill.

I repeat that, as far as I am concerned, I have full confidence in the Divorce Committee. I do not think it would recommend to this house the granting of any petition that was not amply supported by evidence.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the second time, on division.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Next sitting.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise on a question of privilege which concerns the entire membership of this house. This same issue arises every session. Usually near the end of March the Minister of Finance delivers his budget speech in the House of Commons; then the members of that house carry on a budget debate for some two or three weeks, after which the house goes into Committee of Supply to deal with the various items one by one. Eventually the estimates come to the Senate, usually about ten days before the end of the session. This, of course, does not give members of this house any real opportunity to discuss government expenditures, taxation and so on. I may be over-concerned about the importance of the Senate—though I do not think so—but I believe the experience of the men and women in this chamber is a valuable asset to Canada, and that if it were directed to a complete examination of the estimates and our taxation system we could render a greater service to the Parliament and the people of this country. I do not say this with any thought of criticism in mind, and I do not wish my remarks to be used as an instrument of criticism at all. The Opposition groups in the House of Commons are free to criticize ad infinitum. I merely wish to impress upon honourable members of the Senate the fact that we get no real chance here to understand the budget and its workings, or how the national debt is arrived at and how it is paid off. Under the present crucial conditions existing in the world, it is most important that we should understand these things.

I want to suggest that the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) call in conference half a dozen members of this house, both men and women, who have had experience in parliamentary life, either in the House of Commons or in legislative assemblies of the provinces, in order to see if some system cannot be worked out for our giving more consideration to the estimates. I have no intention of trying to provoke political discussion; I am not at all desirous of anything like that in the Senate. After all, it should make no difference to the members of this house whether "Brown" or "Jones" or someone else is Prime Minister of Canada. or whether the Prime Minister is a Liberal or a Conservative, or what he is. As senators, we represent the people in all parts of the country, and we were summoned here to protect their interests.

There is a good deal of agitation in my province by people who feel that we should give more attention to the Government's economic policies. They feel this is a fundamental matter. They want to know how these policies affect the commercial and industrial life of Canada, and unemployment; and what impact they have on farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and other industrial classes in our society. After some thought on the subject, I have come to the conclusion that the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), for whom I have great respect—he has wide experience in the other house and is now in his second session as leader in this house—should call together perhaps six or seven honourable senators to consider with him what should be done. When the matter has been thoroughly studied it could then be referred to the house for further consideration, and I am sure that in this way we could devise a satisfactory course of action.

Hon. James H. King: Honourable senators, I would remind my friend the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that in 1943 I moved in this house a resolution authorizing our Standing Committee on Finance to examine the estimates after they had been brought down in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Correct.

Hon. Mr. King: I took the position that senators had the same right as bankers, farmers, merchants, representatives of labour and others to discuss either privately or publicly the budget as brought down in the House of Commons. We began our examination of the estimates after the Minister of Finance had delivered his speech on the budget, but I may say that I had some difficulty in convincing Dr. Beauchesne that the Senate had the right to review the estimates at all.

As I understand my honourable friend's suggestion, he would like to discuss the estimates in the chamber rather than in committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No. My suggestion was that the Leader should call together a few other senators and discuss how we might best deal with the estimates, and that after they had come to a conclusion it should be submitted to this house for consideration. I am not committing myself definitely as to whether their recommendation should be considered in the house or in a committee, but my preference is for consideration in the house itself.

Hon. Mr. King: I had misunderstood my honourable friend. Of course, to discuss the estimates in this chamber would be quite different from discussing them in committee. My resolution of 1943 was for examination of the departmental estimates by our Finance Committee. We called before the committee such officials as Dr. C. J. MacKenzie, then President of the National Research Council, various deputy ministers, and even some ministers. The committee spent some weeks on a study of the estimates, and, generally speaking, we had most interesting discussions.

I doubt that it would be wise for us to discuss the estimates in detail before the Minister of Finance presents his budget speech, and I think those discussions should be in committee. I am in accord with the suggestion that the Leader of the Government in this house should consult with a few senators in an endeavour to devise the most practical means for us to study the estimates.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am much interested in the suggestion of the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), and very pleased that the honourable senator from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King) has given us the benefit of his experience on this subject.

I have heard rumours, in fact I read in the press, that there are likely to be changes in procedure in the House of Commons. Those changes may, for all I know, affect the bringing down of the budget or the method of consideration of the estimates. I recall having read in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons a motion in the name of the Prime Minister to set up a committee on estimates, and it occurs to me, therefore, that the procedure in connection with the consideration of the estimates might be changed.

I agree that it is most unfortunate, most unbusinesslike, that the Supply Bill should come into this house in the dying days of the session. I do not like it any more than anyone else here likes it, and if a plan can be devised for having it brought down earlier, so that we can give it proper consideration, I think it would be most advisable to adopt that plan.

I shall be glad to consult with a number of my colleagues in the Senate on this very important matter but I do feel that before coming to a decision we might wait to ascertain if there is to be a vital change in respect to the bringing down of the budget, and consideration of the budget proposals and the estimates in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I should like to hear from the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). Two years ago, and also in the previous year, hearings were held by the Committee on Finance, under his chairmanship, and the committee did a magnificent job. I can say that because there is no credit coming to me, for I was engaged on some other work at that time. Many high officials of the Government were called before that committee, and a really informative report was made by the committee to this house. Now, I think there is no one present who can enlighten us further than can the honourable senator from Churchill as to why the committee discontinued its hearings, and it would be interesting to have his opinion on the advisability of resuming them.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I understand that my honourable friend from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) paid me a compliment while I was exchanging an observation with a colleague sitting behind me. If so, then I certainly must express my appreciation of his kindness—I will not say of his good judgment.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that this discussion is a little bit out of order. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) was perhaps quite right in raising the question on the Orders of the Day, but I would have preferred it if he had moved the adjournment of the house so that every one here could have taken part in the discussion without any violation of the rules. But now that I am on my feet, may I say that I sympathize in large measure with the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and with the observations made by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and our colleague from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King).

Honourable senators, we are not proceeding in a way to earn the respect of the country. Members of the Senate, like members of the House of Commons, have to earn the respect of the country by the manner in which they conduct the business of Parliament. I have been here for nearly three weeks, and I do not believe that during that period this house has sat five hours a week. This state of things is very convenient for honourable senators who are only an overnight journey from their homes. They can arrive here on Tuesday evening in time to take part in our deliberations, spend Wednesday here, come into the chamber on Thursday afternoon, and by 4.30 p.m. be on their way to the station to catch the train home. But those of us who come from farther away sit around here from about half-past four on Thursday afternoon until eight o'clock the following Tuesday evening, and there is not a solitary thing in the way of public business for us to do unless we are engaged in the divorce committee. Surely we can find some way of improving upon that state of affairs. I say in all seriousness—in fact, all I am saying is said seriously—that the fault is by no means wholly ours. I know we are restricted, sir, in our observations on the other branch of Parliament; and if I were to say some of the things I would like to say, probably Black Rod would be sent for to take me out! My point is that more must be done to expedite the business of Parliament. I think it is a waste of time, when so many vital problems are facing the country and require our best consideration, that so much of it is being spent in a rather fruitless and futile discussion. Let us get on to the problems that really require our attention.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to take part in this discussion, but I am moved to do so after listening to the remarks of the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). Ever since I became a member of this chamber, the existence throughout the country of a feeling adverse to the Senate has given me a good deal of concern. I have noticed that every little critical remark of the kind to which we have just listened is magnified from one end of the country to the other, and the impression is fostered that unless the members of the Senate are in session in this chamber they are doing nothing. Now there are just as many drones in the House of Commons as there are here.

Hon. Mr. Duffus: Are there any drones here?

Hon. Mr. Reid: As far as I am concerned, I am as busy as any other member of Parliament; and whenever I hear an honourable senator make the statement that we senators sit in our offices from Thursday to Tuesday doing nothing, I am going to rise in my place and express strong resentment. I am willing to bet that very little of what I am saying now will appear in the newspapers, but plenty of notice will be taken of the statement that senators do nothing from Thursday afternoon until Tuesday evening. The fact is that we are at work and carrying on our duties. I do not deny that this house could sit Fridays and transact some business. But, I repeat, I shall rise every time it is stated that for half the week honourable senators do nothing. It is an unfair reflection upon us, especially those of us who are doing fully our duty to the people of the provinces from which we come, and doing it just as conscientiously as any member of the other house.

Hon. Mr. Duffus: I think the honourable member from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) should name the "drones" he speaks of. I would like to know who they are.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I can give the honourable senator two dozen names.

EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I answer a question which was asked indirectly of me yesterday by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). In the course of his very interesting address, he referred to the fact that there are employed in Canada at the present time 5,167,000 people, and was very gratified to know the number was so large. I can assure him that the figures I gave are correct. The honourable senator stated that he assumed the number included those who are self-employed. That is so: they include everyone in Canada who is employed.

Probably the house would be interested to know that there is today in Canada a working labour force of 5,414,000 of which number, on January 19th, only 247,000 were unemployed; so that, as I have stated, 5,167,000 are at work.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Can the honourable leader give us the percentage of unemployed?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The percentage of unemployed is 4·6.

Honourable senators will also be interested to know that an additional 4,939,000 Canadians are not in the labour force. This total includes those—most of them women—engaged in housekeeping, adults taking advanced educational courses, persons retired or voluntarily idle, and others too old or unable to work.

In round numbers, the population of Canada is approximately 15 million. Of these, roughly speaking, 5 million are employed, and 5 million, for various reasons, are not reckoned as employed, yet are not unemployed: among them being, for example, those who keep house.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Unpaid employees.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: "Unpaid employees"—that is a better expression. There is no doubt that those who keep house work very hard; I would not want to give a contrary impression. The remaining 5 million of the population consists mainly of children.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Thank you.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on this occasion I intend to deal with one or two matters before coming to the proposed legislation outlined in the Speech from the Throne. First of all, I should like to inform the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) how pleased I was when some days ago he intimated that the Government was agreeable to the appointment of a special committee to inquire into the traffic in opium and narcotic drugs in Canada. It is said that honest confession is good for the soul, and I must confess that on April 7 last when I proposed that such a committee be set up and the honourable Leader promised he would take the matter up with the Government, I was a little sceptical, shall I say, that such a committee would ever be organized. Once again I want to tell him how pleased I am that a committee is going to be appointed. I feel sure that this action will meet with approval right across Canada.

Honourable senators, judging by press accounts from one end of the country to the other I believe many people approve the Government's decision to allow the Canadian Pacific Air Lines to fly the Polar route from Vancouver to Amsterdam, Holland. Many of us have been concerned about this matter, for we were wondering if the T.C.A. was going to monopolize and control the entire field of aviation; so the decision of the Government to allow the C.P.A. to fly from Vancouver to Amsterdam, a 17-hour flight, has pleased many interested people. The citizens of Vancouver are particularly gratified, because it means that Vancouver will become one of the great central airports of the world.

Honourable senators, I am going to draw to the attention of the Government something that took place in British Columbia last summer, as I think some particular notice should be taken of it. Sometimes in my quiet moments I come to the conclusion that education occasionally breeds foolishness among certain groups of people. I have in mind the hiring of an American firm to make rain fall on the British Columbia mainland around the district of Powell River. As a matter of fact, the Powell River Company did the hiring, and of course we may assume that the money it spent on this venture will be written off as an item of expense, so that probably the whole thing will not cost the firm very much. Dr. Gordon M. Shrum, head of the Department of Physics of the University of British Columbia, warned that man-made efforts to produce rain should not be carried out in British Columbia without the approval of competent government authority. In any event, this American company was hired to make rain, but it so happened that last year was one of the wettest that British Columbia has had in a long time, and not only did the Powell River district get all the rain it wanted but other areas also were deluged. Of course, the people of those districts did not have to pay the American company. If the company actually produced rain—which I doubt—it certainly was not able to restrict the downfall to the area around Powell River.

I should not have thought any Canadians would bother to hire rainmaking outfits after the experience some people of Alberta had with them years ago, but I would suggest that if this foolishness continues the federal Government should take steps to control it, just as it controls the air for radio and flying. This sort of thing could have serious repercussions. Suppose a certain group hired rainmakers to bring down rain in the summertime and, as a result, a cloudburst ruined some cherry orchards. Damage claims would be filed, and some authority would be appealed to. I maintain that the Government should investigate the activities of companies which are advertising that they will produce rain if hired to do so.

Honourable senators, a couple of weeks ago I inquired of the Government what sum of money was paid by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the exclusive rights of televising the British Empire Games held in Vancouver in 1954, and what was the total revenue received by the C.B.C. for the sale of the television rights or films taken of the Games and sold to United States interests. I had several reasons for asking these questions. I also inquired of the Government what percentage of Canadian television programs, as seen by the Canadian public, are produced or manufactured in the United States. In answer to the inquiry I have been told that during a sample week in December, 1954, approximately 30 per cent of the programs on the C.B.C. television, English and French networks, originated in the United States live or on film.

I do not intend to go into this particular question now, but I want to draw the attention of honourable members to the great event which took place in Vancouver last summer, the British Empire and Commonwealth Games. Officials of the Games Committee have stated that the Games might not have been held in Vancouver except for the fact that two tentative host cities, Montreal and Toronto, got into quite a squabble as to which of them should be honoured by having the Games. Vancouver filed a request, and the authorities ultimately conferred this honour upon that city.

The holding of the Games in Vancouver climaxed a four-year effort on the part of many men and women. I am told by those who spearheaded the move that a distinguished senator who sits in front of me (Hon. Mr. McKeen) had a lot to do with bringing the Games to Vancouver.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: At first those who sponsored the idea received little support, but eventually things began to roll, and as it turned out the Games proved to be an outstanding success and brought great credit to Canada, British Columbia and Vancouver. Incidentally, it is not likely that any Canadian city will be eligible to hold the Games for another twenty-five years.

The Games were immensely enjoyed by both spectators and athletes alike. A tent city was erected on the grounds of the University of British Columbia to house the 1,100 athletes from twenty-six Commonwealth countries who participated. It was indeed a memorable occasion to visit the tent city and observe the athletes of many races and colour living together in such complete harmony. The holding of the Games certainly fostered much good will. In my opinion it exceeded the amount of good will that has so far been created by the United Nations—in fact, I have not observed much good will proceeding from them. The good will from the Games was spread far and wide by the participants. They appreciated the wonderful treatment they received here, and I feel quite sure that when they returned to their various countries they sang loud the praises of Canada and of the Canadian people.

There were present at the Games 400 radio and television newsmen from all parts of the world. It is interesting to note that Trans-Canada Air Lines passenger revenues were increased by some $300,000 for transporting the visiting teams.

The one man who spearheaded the great project was Mr. Stanley Smith, of Vancouver. I understand that he did so wonderful a job that the British Government wished the Queen could have knighted him; but, as honourable senators are aware, Canada has frowned upon knighthoods for Canadians, and therefore he was debarred. However, I believe that all honourable members, and particularly the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen), will agree that Mr. Smith deserves some outstanding recognition for his wonderful work in organizing and directing the Games. I saw him a few days before I left Vancouver for Ottawa, and he told me that his health was completely broken as a result of the hard work he had done over a period of three or four years in this connection. Truly, his was a great accomplishment.

Unfortunately, the British Empire Games suffered a financial deficit. The Government of Canada contributed $200,000 toward the project; the Province of British Columbia, $200,000, and the City of Vancouver about $200,000. Total revenue from all sources was $2,370,000. Yet a deficit of $155,000 has been left. I suggest to the Government and to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that note be taken of this deficit, and that in view of the revenue derived by the C.B.C. and by the T.C.A., some further financial help should be given to wipe out the deficit. Mr. Stanley Smith told me that if they had been allowed to call for open tenders for televising the Games, at least $150,000 could have been obtained from American companies, but as the C.B.C. is the only televising source allowed to operate in Canada, and is state-owned, tenders naturally were warded off. Also, I am told that when the agreement was drawn up the C.B.C was strict in stipulating that no photographers should be on the field, and strict in many other ways as well. The answer to my inquiry shows that only $10,000 was received by the C.B.C. from the United States, but perhaps I had better inquire farther, for I understand that rights were sold to other countries besides the United States.

My purpose in introducing this matter today is to ask the Government to give further consideration to the wiping out of the deficit incurred at the Games. After all, it was not a Vancouver event. It was a Canadian event, carried on in the name of all Canada. To Canada goes the credit, although, in the first instance, tribute must be paid to those who spearheaded and planned the entire project.

I turn now to the proposed legislation outlined in the Speech from the Throne. I am sure that all honourable senators approve the suggestion to increase allowances to war veterans, and to consider amendments to the Blind Persons Act. We all realize that the dollar today is not worth what it once was. The latest figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show that, compared with 1939, the dollar today is only worth 65 cents. After all, honourable senators, our war veterans offered their services on behalf of this great country of ours. I believe that the proposal to increase their allowances will meet with the entire approval of the people of Canada, and I think the Government is to be complimented for the proposed legislation.

I note that it is proposed to bring into general operation, on the first of February the provisions of the National Housing Act by which loans will be available for home improvement. The latest report discloses that last year 117,000 houses were commenced, and 106,000 completed. Prior to the change in the act last year, the life insurance companies were responsible for 75 per cent of the lending, and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was responsible for 25 per cent. Under the new legislation which came into effect on April 1 last year the banks took over responsibilty for 40 per cent of the loans, and they have since loaned a total of $160 million. I suggest that the Government now go one step further and do as the United States have done. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is doing a wonderful job, but many people who have acquired houses that are now five, ten or fifteen or more years old are finding great difficulty in selling them owing to the Government scheme. Under the Central Mortgage plan, a man or woman needs to put down only $1,500 to obtain a loan on a new house costing $10,000 or $12,000, and the house may be paid for over a period of from twenty to twenty-five years, so the purchaser is enabled to pay off the entire cost at a reasonable monthly rate. It must also be borne in mind that in five, ten or fifteen years the houses now being built under the Central Mortgage plan will be looked on as old, and the owners will therefore experience great difficulty in selling. I would suggest that the government give consideration to amending further the act so that people who have older houses will be able to sell them, after valuation and approval, under as favourable terms as those allowed for new homes under the National Housing Act.

I come next to a subject which has been discussed in this house on two occasions during the present session, and which is to me a most interesting one. First, may I say that I listened with great interest yesterday to the speech of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), especially as it related to the project on the Columbia River, a subject close to the minds and hearts of people from British Columbia. With all kindliness to the senator from Blaine Lake, I must say that it grieved me just a little to hear him accuse the honourable mover of the Address (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) of referring to the proposed Columbia River project for political purposes. His exact words were: ". . .I think it is a piece of purely political spite work." It is of course unnecessary for me to defend the honourable lady from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). I have known her for many years, and have long since concluded that she is well able to take care of herself.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But I could not let the remark pass without comment. When the honourable senator from Blaine Lake hears what I have to say on the Columbia River question, I am sure he will then think less of his statement than he did when he made it.

I should like to qualify slightly an interjection I made during the speech by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake, after he had read a letter written to the Editor of the Arrow Lake News. I interjected:

The writer of the letter knows nothing about the matter.

I should have said: "The writer of the letter knows little if anything about the matter." Obviously, if he lives in that district, he should know something about the project.

Hon. Mr. Horner: That is what I thought.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I have taken a great interest in this proposed project because of my position as Chairman of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission. In that capacity I am concerned about the effect which dams on the Fraser River have on the salmon fisheries. We have devised methods of allowing the salmon to by-pass a dam on their way upstream, but we have not yet solved the problem of clearing the young fingerlings safely over dams downstream on their way to the sea. For two years or so the commission made tests of the mortality rate among fingerlings passing over dams and through electric turbines. The result of the tests of fingerlings passing over a two-hundred-foot dam showed a mortality rate among the Sockeye of 37 per cent, and a lower rate for other varieties of salmon.

I may say, perhaps with pardonable pride, that the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission is the first body on the North American continent to compile accurate scientific data as to the mortality of fingerlings over dams. Our chief reason for assembling the data was our fear that if we challenged a company which proposed to build a dam on the Fraser River, they might take action against us, and some smart lawyers—and of course most lawyers are smart—might question our information on the mortality rate. Now we are prepared to meet them with scientific data on that point.

We are, however, endeavouring to find ways and means of saving the fingerlings while passing over dams. I may say that we have been experimenting with a method which involves the use of electricity to guide the fingerlings away from the dam and down the chute. No publicity has been given to this experiment, because we fear that unless it is a complete success it may be used as an argument by people who want to build dams anywhere on the Fraser River. Personally, I doubt that we will ever completely save all the fingerlings which pass over dams and through turbines, but we still keep working on the problem, in the hope that we will.

It is for that reason, honourable senators, that I am always on the watch as to what is going on in any proposed dam building in British Columbia. People may ask why I should interest myself in the Columbia River when our jurisdiction is limited to the Fraser River. I have been told by our engineers, and they are very competent, that the potential water power of the Columbia River on the Canadian side is around 9 million horsepower. We are hopeful that with full development of that energy on the Columbia River there will be no need for the construction of any power dams on the Fraser River. Our commission feels that the Columbia River is capable of producing enough power to meet our province's wildest dreams of industrial advancement for the next one hundred years. In that respect it is notable that British Columbia's entire consumption of electricity today, apart from that used by Alcan, is 1,280,000 horsepower. If our present expanded industrial and domestic needs require only that amount, one can easily visualize the extent to which an additional 9 million horsepower would provide for future industrial development.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Does he have the mortality rate of fingerlings going through the turbines?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes, I have that information. The mortality rate of fish passing through turbines is almost equal to that of fish passing over dams. It took some years to find out what killed fingerlings in the turbines: strangely enough, it was not the swirling of the water but the vacuum created in the water. We now feel that the combined mortality rate as a result of going through turbines and over dams is sufficient to cause the salmon fisheries of the Fraser River to disappear entirely. We cannot stand idly by and see an annual revenue of $50 million and this much needed source of food supply completely wiped out. Indeed, as time goes on, there will be a greater need for fish and fish products.

The honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) in his address yesterday was sceptical about turning the waters from the Columbia River into the Fraser River. I must confess that when I first read the article about this I was inclined to believe it was just a highly-coloured story, so I took time since I came here to Ottawa to spend an hour and a half with the Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, General McNaughton, and let me say that when the story he told me is made public there are going to be many red faces. I was greatly enthused about the scheme after listening to the story he had to tell and following the complete investigation which had been made.

It is an interesting fact that the content of water varies, and surprisingly enough fish actually choose certain waters. The water of the Columbia is glacial in origin and contains no plankton or food for fish, so if water from the Columbia is spilled over into the Fraser I wanted to know what effect it would have on that river. I was anxious to know also whether it would drown out the salmon spawning beds, and also—as the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) posed the question—"What would happen to the Fraser Valley from the point of view of flooding?"

Before one speaks about a subject like this it always pays to go to the place where the best information on it can be obtained. I am very glad that I did so, for now I know some of the answers to these important questions. The information I now propose to give comes from General McNaughton, and as he has made speeches on this subject I do not believe any objection can be used to my using the information today.

To begin with, it is a very feasible scheme. A distance of only fifteen miles separates the Columbia river from the Fraser river. It happens that that separation is at the divide or highest elevation, so it is all downhill from the Columbia to the Fraser. I asked General McNaughton what would be the effect on the salmon fishing, and he replied: "Oh, Senator Reid, we have had a fishery expert with us all the time we have been studying this. We cannot allow the salmon to be destroyed, and we are going to take care of the salmon fisheries." General McNaughton went on to say that the idea behind the scheme is to use the waters of the Columbia river in Canada for industrial development in British Columbia and not in the United States. No Canadian will say nay to that. The water that will be let loose after we build the dam on Mica Creek will develop an enormous amount of electrical energy. The water to the Fraser will be released in the months of November, December, January and February at a time when that river is at its lowest level. Rather than develop all the power at Mica Creek, which is three hundred miles distant from the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster and which would involve transmitting the power that distance, it is proposed to raise the level of the Fraser river when its waters are low and, in the process, develop hydro-electric power close to the cities where it is going to be used.

I think, honourable senators, you will immediately see the feasibility and the reasonableness of this proposed scheme.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Horner: What opposition will develop internationally when the course of the river is changed from its original bed?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am pleased the honourable senator has asked that question, for it calls to mind a most interesting story.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I should think it would.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The Americans are now going to find themselves "hoist with their own petard," so to speak, because back in 1908 there was some discussion over a little river in New Brunswick which crossed the boundary between Canada and the United States at several points, and the Americans at that time dominated the position to such an extent that—I will not say they forced a treaty upon Canada—a treaty was signed between the two countries by which the principle was established that each country was to be permitted to use the water in the river in whatever way and for whatever purpose it wanted, to within its own boundaries, irrespective of the effect it might have in the other country. At that time any development of the Columbia river was undreamt of; it was not considered important then. We may well remind the Americans of the treaty they signed and of the principle established in 1908. Under that principle we propose to use the water of the Columbia to meet the power requirements of British Columbia and not those of the United States.

Now, to come to the point that those not in favour of this development are playing politics, let me say—and I say it without fear of successful contradiction—that if the provincial Government were allowed to get away with this it would be one of the biggest steals ever heard of. Further, it would have a very damaging future effect for it could for all time stop further development of the Columbia River in British Columbia.

I cannot be accused of being backward in pointing out what I believe to be wrong. Honourable senators will remember that I took a strong stand against the development of the Nechako by Alcan. I said about Alcan, and I still say, that we never got what we could have got out of that deal. However, the industry is located in British Columbia and I have no great complaint on that score. Canadians are being given employment there and the province is being developed in that region. But when it comes to the question of the proposed Kaiser Dam, I wonder if honourable senators or those who are charging that we are making a political issue out of the question realize that if the construction of the Kaiser Dam is allowed to go ahead it will interfere with the building of a dam at Mica Creek, and so interfere with any development of the Columbia at that point.

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is claimed that it would not.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You may know more about it than General McNaughton does, but of course you cannot get me to believe that.

I am going to issue an invitation to honourable senators to hear the complete story in detail when our International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission meets here in Ottawa, some time in June, at which time General McNaughton has kindly consented to appear to describe the whole scheme to us and explain how in his opinion the fisheries will not be damaged. He has told me of the heights of dams proposed to be built on the Fraser River if this scheme goes into effect, of the proposal for storing water behind the Mica Dam and pouring it into the Fraser, of how the level of the Fraser will be raised in the four months when it is naturally at its lowest, and of the extent to which our salmon fisheries will not be affected. All of this will be gone into more fully when our Commission meets here in June, at which time we will have engineers and biologists in attendance to enlarge on these points.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Is there any salmon spawning when the river level is low?

Hon. Mr. Reid: When the water is low the fish eggs are on the gravel bar, and they do not hatch out until the beginning of April.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: You say that when the river level is naturally at its lowest, waters from behind the Mica Dam will come tumbling into the Fraser. What I would like to know is, if this fast moving water will dislodge the eggs lying on the river bed.

Hon. Mr. Reid: No. Once the eggs are laid on the gravel bar they become covered up by gravel, and the flowing water above them will not, I believe, disturb them at all. If the water is high when the salmon come up to spawn, it may and will affect the eggs, though not, I think, in the months of November, December, January and February. That is the story. General McNaughton says he would like to know, if anyone can tell him, what is the agreement between the provincial Government and Kaiser. The provincial story has been changed at least ten times, and we have given up hope of learning the exact truth about the agreement. I notice that since the opening of the house nothing so far has been said about the Kaiser dam. Of course we may get some information later on, but after listening to General McNaughton I am convinced, I repeat, that if the agreement is permitted to go into effect it will result in one of the biggest steals ever known in British Columbia, and hamper the development of our province in the days to come.

I also repeat that no clear statement on the matter has so far been made by the provincial Government. I am not altogether astonished that that is so, for what can one expect from the premier of the province, a former Tory who jumped on the band-wagon of Social Credit, and who, when the Archbishop of Canterbury, during his visit to British Columbia asked him "What is Social Credit?" replied, "To the Jews it is a stumbling block, to the Greeks foolishness, but to millions of people throughout the world it is life eternal". I think that is one of the most sacrilegious statements that have been made in my time. He says "To the Greeks it is foolishness": I can tell him that to the Scots or English it is foolishness, and to most people in the British Empire it is all foolishness. Where are the "millions" in other lands who support Social Credit? And even assuming there are that many Social Crediters, how does the doctrine become to them "life eternal"? I am amazed at the shenanigans of the present Government of British Columbia. I am not going into that subject today, but if I were called upon to do it I could make the subject very interesting.

I had not intended to speak at such length. There is one other subject I should like to deal with before I resume my seat. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) dealt in his speech with labour in relation to the income tax, and stressed the impact of this tax upon labour as one of the great problems which face us today. I admit it is quite a problem, but I do not believe it is the most serious one with which we are concerned, between capital on the one side and labour on the other. I am one of not so large a group who saw what were practically the beginnings of unionism in Scotland. I knew men there in that early day who had to flee the country because of their advocacy of the rights of the workers. The pendulum had gone far in one direction: those who had capital, and businessmen generally, treated the people who worked for them almost as slaves, and by paying them a mere pittance, denied them any opportunity of saving for their old age. How could a man who got the equivalent of $5 a week, and had to raise a family on it, hope to put by any money? But I have lived to see the pendulum swing far in the other direction, and I wonder how much farther it can go without prejudice to the interests of all our people, including labour itself. The situation rather troubles me. This afternoon the honourable Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) quoted some figures regarding unemployment. In this connection I would suggest that one government authority only should be responsible for these statistics. It creates a great deal of confusion to have one set of figures issued by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and another set of figures, based on different returns, produced by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Labour takes these returns and uses the one against the other. This serves only to throw ridicule on the official reports.

Perhaps I am wrong, but I think a cold war is going on, and I do not know who will win it. I wonder whether many of those in high positions realize how serious it is becoming. I am not finding any great fault with the labour unions. I understand their objects; I could point out many injustices with which they have to deal. But I think every honourable senator will agree with my statement that today most if not all the union leaders must demand more and more for their membership or risk the loss of their positions. In the nature of things they cannot do otherwise. If all was quiet and peaceful, the workers might ask, "Well, what are we paying you for?" Not so long ago I asked an official of the carpenters' union, "You have now got a rate of $2.20 an hour: if you were granted $10 an hour would you call an industrial peace for ten years?" He replied, "We would have to take that under consideration: I doubt that we would". Speaking of income taxes, I would point to the value of the fringe benefits which have been obtained by labour. There are many smart and highly educated men in the unions today. If anyone doubts my word, let him take it on himself to argue with some of them, and he will soon find out how little he knows.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Are not the personnel representatives of the companies in exactly the same position with regard to getting something for their side as are the representatives of the unions in trying to get something for theirs?

Hon. Mr. Reid: The honourable senator should wait until I complete my speech. I could not deal at one and the same time with both sides. I have been speaking about the unions. As I said before, a cold war exists, and you cannot have any kind of a war without having at least two opposing parties.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There are two sides to every quarrel.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes, and I am coming to that. I believe I appreciate the viewpoint of labour as well as, if not better than, most honourable senators, for I joined a trade union when I was only fourteen years of age, and that was at a time when you pretty well had to be a hero to belong to one. There were not many unions at that time. I still hold my union card. I know the make-up and psychology of union members, and understand their outlook. Having been asked about the other side of the matter I will immediately proceed to deal with it.

Those who invest money in industrial companies are well aware of labour's demand for higher wages. And so company personnel are always going through their plants trying to find ways and means to cut down on manpower, and today Canadian factories are using all the technological devices they can find in order to reduce the number of their employees. Indeed, many plants employ scientists and inventors just for this purpose. Labour persists in its demands for higher wages, and at the same time company owners keep taking steps to stay in business and make profits. We are beginning to live in an all-out push-button age. Incidentally, push-button gadgets do not always give the best service. This afternoon I had occasion to use one of the new elevators in the Senate wing of this building, and I had to wait for what seemed like six or seven minutes before I was able to get on to it. I told the operator that the old elevator was much faster than the new one. The thing is that we have taken away much of the operator's responsibility. It is a push-button machine, and although it runs more smoothly and looks more attractive it does not give the same degree of efficiency as the old one did. However, I do not think you would find industry cutting down on manpower if to do so meant less efficiency and reduced profits. If you visit an up-to-date sawmill you will get an idea of how fast modern equipment can turn out work.

On the point of industry cutting down on labour, I might mention that the British Columbia Electric Company employs a special staff to think up ways of reducing manpower, and in my home town many of the women employees in the telephone exchange have been warned that in the near future their services will no longer be required because the company is bringing in new equipment. Telephone equipment is becoming so modernized that if you dial a number and the line is busy you simply hang up, and when the line becomes free your own set will be buzzed to let you know.

As another illustration of industry's attempt to cut down on labour by using ultra-modern equipment, I heard the other day that there are only 1,900 employees in Canada's brewing industry. Much of the work is done automatically by a comparatively small group of men who spend their time watching dials and little clocks and pushing buttons. As this sort of trend continues more people will be thrown out of work, and this will place a most serious burden on the country and on the Government in power. I would urge that both industry and the Government give careful thought to the huge displacement of manpower which is taking place in industry today.

I can sympathize with any Government which has to face the responsibility, as it occurs to me that Governments will, of seeing to it that there is a job for every married woman who has a husband and family and who wants to work. It could prove to be quite a problem. I do not believe our Unemployment Insurance Commission officials have experienced such a situation as arose in Britain some two weeks ago. It seems that two ladies agreed to hire each other to do each other's washing, and after six months they fired each other and applied for and obtained unemployment insurance.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I do not know of what nationality these people were, but it occurs to me that it might take a Scot to think up something like that. I believe it was said to be legal, too.

I trust no one will think that I am finding fault with the idea of married women being employed, for I realize that many of them feel they have to work in order to augment their husbands' incomes. On the other hand, many married women work for other reasons. I am excluding, of course, widows who must of necessity go out and work. There is a growing class of women, however, who have husbands and homes to look after who go out and work, contribute towards unemployment insurance, and then periodically quit or get themselves fired and sit back while they draw unemployment insurance. This is one of the problems of our age. I am merely drawing attention to it, not taking sides at all.

In commenting further on technological advancement in industry, I would point out that Donald Gordon, in speaking about the difficulties of operating the railroads, rather supports my view about industry endeavouring to find ways and means of curtailing manpower. In an address to a joint meeting of the Canadian and Empire Clubs of Toronto in November, 1954, Mr. Gordon said, in part:

> Broadly speaking, I see two lines of approach to the reduction of our labour costs per unit of transport service: Technological development, or new "tools of the hand"; managerial progress, or new "tools of the mind".

Mr. Gordon has come to the conclusion that perhaps one way to reduce operating expenses on the railroads is by introducing more gadgets and by cutting down on the number of employees. What will that mean? It will result in more unemployment; and so the burden is becoming increasingly heavy on Governments today. More and more we are hearing the cry to the Government, "I am out of work, it is up to you to provide employment". Something has to be done. I have drawn attention to the employment of married women in business and industry, to emphasize the extra burden that is being placed on the Government to provide employment for all our people. And, of course, I am speaking of married women who have husbands and homes to look after. In this new age they are joining the ranks of industry in increasing numbers.

Honourable senators, that is about all I have to say. I appreciate the kind attention which I have received, and I hope that some good will be derived from the remarks I have made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. James P. McIntyre: Honourable senators, it is always difficult to address this house after the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) has made a speech, but I shall do my best.

One purpose of the Speech from the Throne is to forecast the legislation that will come before Parliament in the current session, and the debate on the Address in reply provides honourable senators with an opportunity to take part in a general discussion on matters they consider to be of public interest, particularly as they apply to those parts of Canada from which honourable senators come. As honourable senators know, I come from the province of Prince Edward Island, but that does not mean that I am not interested in all other parts of Canada as well.

In following the long established custom, let me congratulate the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of this session of the present Parliament. I wish also to congratulate the honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) on his splendid address at the opening of this debate.

May I compliment the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) for the able manner in which he delivered his fine address. Of course, it is usual for him to speak well in debate.

In congratulating all the other members who have spoken, may I say that I was particularly interested in the speech of my honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) on the resolution to rearm Germany, and what happened to those countries which tried to conquer Europe, namely, France, Germany and Spain. He mentioned the Spanish Armada, which reminded me of my boyhood and school days, and the old English history which related how the Spanish Armada sailed up the English Channel, stretching for several miles across the blue waters. So sure were they of victory, that they called it the "Invincible Armada." But one dark night, Lord Howard sent eight fireships among them, threw them into disorder and put them to flight. Many of them were lost in the Orkney Islands, and few of the great ships of the Armada ever returned to Spain.

As I have already said, I am interested in all parts of Canada. I am particularly interested in the St. Lawrence Seaway, which when completed will be of great benefit to Canada. Half a century of negotiations had passed between Canada and the United States before the Government of Canada announced its decision that Canada would construct the Seaway alone. As a result of that decision the United States passed enabling legislation to co-operate with the Government of Canada in constructing this all-important project. Although the project had been under consideration by the authorities of both Canada and the United States for many years—in fact, an agreement was signed thirteen years ago—yet it was not until 1951 that information was tabled in the House of Commons to the effect that the two countries had tentatively agreed in principle to make the St. Lawrence Seaway development self-liquidating by means of a toll charge.

From the head of the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of 2,000 miles, there is a drop in the waterfall of 580 feet, which when harnessed is capable of developing 9 million horsepower of electric energy. According to estimates of prominent engineers, this great potential possibility, of which the greater part is on the Canadian side, follows from the head of the Great Lakes, St. Mary's Falls, Lake Huron, Lake Erie, Niagara River, Lake Ontario, the International Rapids, Lachine Section and from Montreal to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of 1,000 miles. This section from Montreal lies wholly on Canadian territory.

I understand this great project will be financed partly by New York State and Ontario for power purposes, and by the United States and Canada, and I believe the major part will be paid by the taxpayers from all parts of Canada.

In the Maritime Provinces we have a project that has been talked of not for one-half century, not for one century, nor two centuries, but for 260 years, since the days of the first Acadian settlers—the Chignecto Canal; but it was not until 1822 that the first practical steps were taken. A survey was made in that year, and according to competent engineers of that day the project was feasible and desirable. However, nothing came of this until the pre-Confederation negotiations of 1864 and 1866. This was one of the inducements held out, along with others, if the Maritimes would join Confederation. The idea of Confederation was initiated by Ontario and Quebec, and it was done for the purpose of settling a long outstanding dispute between those provinces. The statesmen of Ontario and Quebec knew that Confederation could not be complete without the co-operation of the Maritime Provinces, so they resolved themselves into a delegation and proceeded to the Maritimes. Among the delegates were Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Cartier, George Brown, Sir Charles Tupper and other notables. The convention was held in Charlottetown on September 1, 1864.

The delegates were well aware of the adverse conditions under which they were to meet. They knew that the Maritime Provinces had established a satisfactory trade among themselves, that their markets were close at hand and easy of access, and that traffic to these markets was mainly by sea. Our American neighbours bought all the lumber, fish and agricultural products that the Maritimes had to offer. In fact, before Confederation the United States was not only our nearest but our most profitable market, and after Confederation these markets would be lost. To offset this, certain inducements were held out to the people of the Maritimes to consent to Confederation: a better and more profitable market, that of the central provinces, might be substituted therefor; the coal of Nova Scotia was to find a market in Toronto; the fish, lumber and agricultural products were to find a market in Quebec and Montreal.

But as time went on it was found almost impossible to fulfil these promises, and it turned out that the coal of Nova Scotia did not find a market in Toronto, and that the fish, lumber and agricultural products did not find a market in Quebec and Montreal. In the meantime, the New England markets had been lost. And this is one of the reasons why the Maritime Provinces are lagging behind the rest of the provinces of Canada.

With the construction of the Chignecto Canal, the markets between the Maritimes, the central provinces and New England, would be shortened by an average distance of 568 miles: for instance, from Charlottetown to Boston, 442 miles; from Montreal to Joggins, Nova Scotia, 640 miles; from Summerside to Portland, Maine, 511 miles; from Saint John, New Brunswick, to Pictou, 553 miles; from Newcastle to Saint John, 612 miles, and so on. This would provide cheaper water transportation for the products of these three provinces. In fact, construction of the Chignecto Canal was a definite pledge prior to Confederation.

In 1887, the Government led by Sir John A. Macdonald called for tenders for the construction of the Chignecto Canal. The Government of the Honourable Alexander MacKenzie included the project as an item in the budget on two occasions, but nothing was done.

Again, in 1930, a Royal Commission was appointed by the Mackenzie King Government to inquire into the project, but in that year his Government was defeated, and nothing was done. About a year later the Government led by R. B. Bennett appointed its own commission of inquiry, but still nothing was done; and nothing has been done up to the present time.

Now that the St. Lawrence Seaway is assured—which when completed will be of incalculable benefit to the central and western provinces—is it not reasonable for the people of the Maritime provinces to demand that the Chignecto Canal be constructed without further delay, as an extension of the St. Lawrence Seaway?

The building of the Chignecto Canal in conjunction with the St. Lawrence Seaway, on which a large amount of money is to be spent, would give the Maritimes a short route to the New England States. I think it is up to the members of the House of Commons and Senators from the Maritime Provinces, to stand together and fight to have this long overdue and important project, promised at the time of Confederation, made a reality.

As I have said, I am interested in all parts of Canada. I am especially interested in provincial Governments, having been a member of one for a number of years, and I still follow their activities. At the end of 1952 or the first part of 1953 I was much disappointed to read in a publication by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that the provincial debt of Canada's ten provinces rose in one year by $279,622,000 to a total of $3,145,044,000. On a population basis this works out to $218.33 for each person in Canada, an increase of $13.37 for that year. As the population has increased since that time, I presume the provincial debt is now much higher. Perhaps the provincial governments will say that this is none of our concern. But the members of the House of Commons and of the Senate represent all the people of Canada. If the Bureau of Statistics sees fit to publish it, I see nothing wrong in referring to it in this chamber.

It may be that the tax rental agreements should be revised to give the provinces more rent. According to the statistics I read, British Columbia, with a population as of the last census of 1,165,000—the honourable mover of the Address (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) gave the figure as 1,200,000—has a total debt of $280 million, or a per capita debt of $240.

Alberta, with its great source of wealth from oil and natural gas, one would expect to have no provincial debt at all. But that province, with a population of 939,000, has an indebtedness of $111 million, or a per capita debt of $118.

Saskatchewan, that great wheat-producing province, from which the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) comes, is by no means free of debt. It has a population of 831,000 and a provincial debt of $164 million, or a per capita debt of $198.

Manitoba, another good grain producing province, the home of my friend the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), has its provincial debt. According to the statistics I have, with a population of 776,000 it carries a total debt of $140 million, or a per capita rate of $181.

That great manufacturing province, Ontario, which pays 48 per cent of all the corporation income tax, is by no means free of debt. In fact, its debt amounts to one-third of the total of the other nine provinces. With a population of 4,500,000, at the last census, but which is now more than 5 million, it carries a total provincial debt of $1,376 million, which works out to a per capita rate of $299.

I now come to the province of Quebec, another great manufacturing province, and it too is in debt. I read recently a statement by a prominent public man of that province that Quebec was different from any other province. I do not see how it can be said that Quebec differs much from any other province. It has its provincial Government, its law courts, judges and lawyers; it has rivers and lakes, cities and towns, as all provinces have. True, the majority of its people are French speaking. They are a very fine race of people; indeed, they measure up with the best people in any part of the world today. There are French-speaking people in every province in Canada. Some 15 per cent of the population of Prince Edward Island are French speaking, and many of them have reached positions of prominence. One French-speaking gentleman was a professor at the Prince of Wales College; another is a judge of our Supreme Court, and a recent Lieutenant-Governor was a French Canadian. I can never understand why it should be claimed by some persons that Quebec is any different from the other provinces of Canada. Her population of 4 million carries a provincial debt of $660 million, or a per capita debt of $162.

I come next to the province of New Brunswick which, from a financial standpoint, appears to be worse off than any other province. With a population of 515,000, it has a provincial debt of $176 million, or a per capita debt of $340.

Nova Scotia is not quite as badly off as New Brunswick. It has a population of 642,000 and a provincial debt of $180 million, or a per capita debt of $280.

Next, I come to the small province of Prince Edward Island with practically no industries, except its agricultural products, particularly seed potatoes, and its fisheries. With a population, according to the last census, of 98,000, it has a provincial debt of $18 million, or a per capita debt of $181.

Lastly, I shall deal with that great fishing province, Newfoundland. Despite the fact that the greater part of its provincial debt was taken over by the federal Government when that province united with Canada, its population of 361,000 people carries a provincial debt of $36 million, or a per capita debt of $101, the lowest of any Canadian province.

As I have said, the provincial governments may feel that we have no right to discuss their financial position. However, as representatives of the people in all parts of Canada, we must realize that this situation cannot go on year after year. If it does the inevitable result will be either that the provinces will be unable to sell their bonds or they will have to realize greater revenues from increased taxation.

I was listening to my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), for whom I have great respect, not to his speech of yesterday, but to his few remarks here about a week ago, when he said that, while he did not want to detract from any of the credit due to the present Prime Minister of Canada, it was Sir Winston Churchill who initiated the Atlantic Pact, at a speech in Fulton, Missouri. Well, that is not what Sir Winston Churchill says himself. At a banquet in the Chateau Laurier the last time Churchill was in Canada he gave sole credit to our Prime Minister. My friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) told this house that the present Prime Minister of Canada was the man who initiated action for the making of the Atlantic Pact, and I am going to quote his words, knowing that he will not mind. They are to be found on page 340 of the Senate Hansard of April 28, 1949:

> The Progressive Conservative party in this chamber and in every part of Canada stands four-square behind the Atlantic Pact. I congratulate the present Prime Minister of Canada on the distinguished part he played in initiating action for the making of this agreement; and whether or not he continues in his present office after the election, his advocacy of the Atlantic Pact will be one of the greatest achievements of his life. Canadian Liberals and Conservatives join wholeheartedly in acclaiming the pact.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: That does not bear out the statement of the honourable member from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner).

Hon. Mr. Horner: It does not alter my belief at all.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: No conversion!

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: My honourable friend from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) spoke about the cold war and said that we are living in a troubled time. We are living in the time of a cold war and also of a shooting war. Do honourable members not think it is time that the people of the whole world looked somewhere for divine guidance Should we not look to the leadership of the Pope, the head of the great Catholic Church; to the leadership of the great Protestant Churches; to the leadership of all the other churches? Let them bind themselves together and tell the warring nations to stop their wholesale slaughter of men, women and children, stop their racial and religious intolerance before the whole human race sinks into the common grave of disease, death and destruction.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Fergusson, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 3, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, like earlier speakers in this debate I congratulate the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address in reply to the gracious Speech from the Throne. I appreciated very much the kind reference made to myself by the seconder, the honourable senator from Lauzon, and I could not help but feel proud of my sex when I heard the very able address of the mover, the honourable senator from Victoria, whose career all women of Canada have followed and are following with interest and pride.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I was also very interested in all the other addresses that have been made, and I feel that they have added a great deal to my education regarding things Canadian. But I was particularly interested in the references made by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) to the problems of the older worker regarding compulsory retirement at 65 for men and 60 for women, and the lack of employment opportunities for unemployed people of 40 or 45—or, in the case of women, even of 35 years of age. I certainly endorse the statement of the honourable senator from Victoria when she says we are not doing all that we might for the aged, and for those who are too old at 45, and those who have to get out at 65. I believe, with her, that we shall have to change our present estimate of old age and base our estimate, not on chronological age or the number of birthdays an employee has had, but on his ability to do a job efficiently.

Because I have taken a very special interest during the past year or so in the problems of Canada's senior citizens, I would like to discuss some of the things that have been done for them and some that might be done.

As we all know, the normal span of life has been greatly increased. In 1900, in the western world, life expectancy was 49 years. Now it has increased to 65 years. This is due to improved medical services and nursing services, better sanitation and higher nutritional standards, all of which have lowered the death rates to about one-half of what they were 100 years ago.

According to the 1951 census the working population in Canada—that is, those from 20 to 59 years of age—is much more heavily weighted with people in the higher age group, from 55 to 59, than in the group from 20 to 35.

In the older age group, those of 60 or over, there has been a very great increase since censuses were first taken, in 1881. In 1881 the total population over 60 was 275,988, but in 1951 it had increased to 1,592,025; and it is estimated that in 20 years' time—that is, in 1971—the number over 60 will be 2,200,000. This represents an increase of 477 per cent in the number of people of 60 years and over between 1881 and 1951, whereas the percentage of increase in the total population was only 154 per cent. Referring to this, Dr. O. A. Lemieux, Director of the Census Division of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in a speech to the Annual Meeting of the Canadian Public Health Association, which is published in the December 1954 issue of the Canadian Journal of Public Health, says:

> We are faced with a considerably larger number of older people and we must be prepared to face the problems which will be created by this.

In the same address Dr. Lemieux goes on to say:

> With regard to the aging of the population, I would like to quote from a paper by Frank W. Notestein of the Office of Population Research of Princeton University to the American Philosophical Society. He states: "Viewed as a whole, the problem of aging is no problem at all. It is only the pessimistic way of looking at a great triumph of civilization. The population of the United States, and of the Western World in general, has grown older because it has learned to be efficient in the renewal of its life". Today, one thousand births yield about twice as large a fund of life as they produced in Colonial times, and as they produce today among more than one-half of the world's population. We are a relatively old population partly because so many of us have been successful in achieving our goal of individual survival. So, with a perversity that is strictly human, we insist on considering the aggregate result of our individual successes as a problem.

Then he goes on:

To suggest that the aging of the population is to be viewed as an asset is, of course, not at all to suggest that there are no problems of economic and social adaptation to be faced.

As Dr. Notestein says: Some of these problems are economic ones, such as employment of those members of the older population who want to work and who are capable of doing so; other problems are social, such as housing for older citizens and the providing of occupation, recreation and education for the older citizens.

Because our nation is relatively young, we have placed a premium on the attributes of youth, such as speed, aggressiveness and acquisitiveness. In employment, as in other fields, we have placed the "accent" on "youth", have tolerated maturity, but have frequently regarded as negligible the abilities and capacities of those who have passed into what is looked on as the older-age group.

In a country that is committed to the principle of non-discrimination, is it logical that in the field of employment we should accept practices that discriminate against a large and ever-increasing class of our population?

This problem of employment of the older worker is one that has been of great interest in other countries, in many of which considerable research has been done to determine if such discrimination is justified.

We, too, through our Department of Labour and our Department of Veterans Affairs, have studied the problem of the older worker, and efforts have been made to encourage employers to appreciate the value which the services of such older workers may have for them.

To illustrate some of the efforts made in this direction: in 1951 the Information Branch of the Department of Labour prepared an original script entitled "Date of Birth", which was produced by the National Film Board and shown more than 750 times throughout Canada, to more than 57,000 people, most of whom were of the executive class and directly concerned with hiring policies. The purpose of the film was to bring to the attention of the Canadian people the problem of the older worker, with a view to expanding employment opportunities for these workers. A report on the film was most encouraging and revealed that, after showings in Halifax, a number of employers who had previously stated an age limit in their request for employees, called the employment office to amend the age qualification. They had been sufficiently impressed to think that the limitation was unnecessary.

Here is another instance. In Alberta, a sales manager of a large firm reported he was hiring thirty salesmen in Western Canada. After seeing the film, he decided to insert in his advertisement that "age is no barrier". These are typical of the results listed in the report as having been achieved by the film showings.

You will be interested to know, honourable senators, that besides having been shown in Canada, this film has been shown extensively by the United Kingdom Ministry of Labour in the British Isles.

Also, in 1952, an extensive memorandum on the problem of the older worker was prepared by the Department of Labour for the National Advisory Council on Manpower. This memorandum gave figures drawing attention to the great increase among Canada's population, since 1881, of persons over 40 years of age, and it was pointed out that the tendency of employers to reject applicants over that age involved a serious problem. The memorandum points out that from the point of view of the national economy, if the trend towards rejection of older people from the productive section of society continues, while at the same time young people tend to require more years of education before they reach earning powers, the decreasing working force may not be able to achieve for all of us as high a standard of living as we might otherwise hope for.

The memorandum quotes statements by well-known authorities on geriatrics. One of these claims that not all changes that come with age are decline; that speed of reaction does not diminish but that endurance increases. He points out that it is not without significance that in foot racing the records for all sprints are held by youngsters, but the marathon records are held by men of 38 to 45. As speed declines, he says, skill is increased and, as strength declines, judgment increases. Another authority on these matters is quoted in this memorandum as saying:

It should be pointed out that no differences in efficiency in the performance of moderate work are observed between 17 and 71 years.

This finding, he says, is of considerable importance, since most work of an industrial nature falls in the classification of moderate work.

Honourable senators, we know that all through life there are compensations and if we lose one faculty other faculties will become more acute. Workers will try harder to concentrate on the things they can do when they realize that there are some things which they cannot do. To illustrate, let me tell you the story of a man who applied for work in a dockyard. He was told by the employer, "I am sorry, but I don't think you can do the hard work that these young fellows here can do." The man replied, "Well, maybe that is right but I am sure I can do as much as they intend to do".

Some specific points raised in the memorandum as reasons for not hiring older workers are the supposed inability of older workers to learn and adapt themselves to new techniques. During World War II this argument was found to be unsound. An experiment at Columbia University dealing with training and retraining workers found that intellectual power does not change from about 20 to 60 years of age. The often-repeated theories that older workers are more prone to accidents and are more often affected by absenteeism, have been proven to be false. A study of accident frequency shows that the highest accident frequency is between the ages of 20 and 24, and the lowest between 30 and 55. A survey by the United States Bureau of Labour Statistics shows that the absenteeism rate is the same for those between 65 and 74 as for those between 35 and 64.

Reference is made in the memorandum to other unsound beliefs held by employers, such as that the public prefer younger workers for jobs requiring public contacts, which belief, on investigation, appears to have no basis in fact.

The greatest objection raised by employers to the employment of older workers is that it is impossible to absorb older workers into health and retirement pension plans. Investigation and study of rates reveal that this is not an insurmountable barrier. One large Canadian life insurance company quoted rates for group insurance as $6.5 per $1,000 annually at age 25, and $7.85 per $1,000 annually at age 40. The addition of a percentage of older workers would not change the overall costs very much. At the present time, a number of studies are being made to determine if pension plans can be worked out that will be acceptable and will overcome this objection that has been raised.

In an article in the January 31, 1948, issue of Saturday Night, Seymour Pennycuick quoted a prominent insurance officer as saying:

> I know of no pension plan which, in itself, makes impossible the employment of older men. To say that it does, is sheer nonsense. Yet, the use of that threadbare argument to bolster up a policy of discrimination which originates in unsound employment practice and person prejudice is, by no means, uncommon.

On the question of the attitude of the unions towards this matter, I would like to quote from an article entitled "Should Retirement at 65 be Compulsory?" which appeared in the Canadian Unionist of March 1952. It reads in part as follows:

> In an article entitled, "Union Policies and the Older Worker", Solomon Barkin, Research Director of the Textile Workers Union of America, states:
> "Unions have resisted the compulsory retirement of workers when they have passed a particular age, even where there is a pension program. Several strikes have centered about this issue. The unions have contended that the worker has a right to his job at least as long as he is qualified. Where there is a pension program, the worker should be able to retain his job at his own discretion, and carry the normal rights to the job. Pension programs are designed to provide an adequate alternative to aged workers, who do not desire to continue their employment."

Honourable senators, to return to the memorandum of the Department of Labour: it mentions the work done by the Department of Veterans Affairs to secure employment for older veterans. The memorandum points out too that, in the work of this department there has been no attempt to over-emphasize the importance of the older person to the detriment of other groups, but officers have tried to treat these older people as individuals with abilities which employers can still use. Fitness for employment and ability to do a day's work have been stressed, rather than the chronological age of the applicant. This is the treatment which applicants for work should receive if the theory of non-discrimination is applied to our citizens.

The National Advisory Committee on Manpower has a subcommittee dealing with "Employment problems of older workers." This subcommittee has been keeping the subject of older workers under continuous review, and recently worked with the Canadian Manufacturers Association in a survey of the attitudes of employers to this question. The result of that survey will be very interesting.

The Canadian Welfare Council and some of its affiliated societies have also made a study of the question. Because of the importance of this matter to women, studies of the problem have been carried on by various women's organizations. I am familiar with two of these, namely, that of the National Council of Women and the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women.

In the decade from 1941 to 1951 the labour force in Canada increased in size by about 23 per cent, but during that period the female labour force increased by 37 per cent. This number is increasing rapidly, and I think at present amounts to 1,200,000 plus. Because the prevalent discrimination against older employees bears most heavily on women, causing them to be considered too old at an earlier age than men, I am very particularly interested in this problem.

Honourable senators, this is a field where our newly-organized Women's Bureau in the Department of Labour can do a great deal of valuable work, if the Bureau is supplied with adequate funds. Women's organizations are very interested and anxious to know that such funds will be made available.

If any honourable senators do not already know it, they will be interested to learn that the regulations under the Public Service Superannuation Act now make it possible for employees of 65 to postpone retirement until 70, if the employee wishes to continue to work, is efficient, and his work is satisfactory to his Deputy Minister. Then, too, the fixed maximum age limit for entrance to the Civil Service was abolished in 1953 in the large majority of entrance competitions.

All these things show that, in Canada, we recognize that we are faced with a problem in regard to our older workers and are doing our best to solve it, but because it is evident that prejudice still exists in many places, I feel more should be done to make our citizens generally aware—and particularly those that hire and deal with staffs—that many of the current beliefs regarding older workers are not based on facts, that a person's age cannot be determined chronologically but should be judged rather by his ability to do a job. We need wider education of the general public on this matter.

There are other problems connected with the increasing number of older citizens in our population which require consideration and action. One of the chief of these is the matter of supplying housing for this older group. In earlier times in Canada, when our population was predominantly rural, older members of the family, such as grandparents or aunts, did many of the lighter family chores and there was always space for them to live in the family home. Because of the help they could give, their presence was welcomed, and they felt they were making a contribution to the upkeep of the home. Now, with our population living mostly in towns and cities, where mechanical devices do away with many of the former family chores and houses are too small for more than the immediate family, there is a great need for suitable housing for older people, particularly for those who have retired and are living on a reduced income.

A large number of older people live in quarters far from healthful or comfortable, such as attics or basements, because of the high cost of suitable space for rent. Many room and board in private homes, where they share inadequate quarters with low-income families who use this method to supplement their incomes. Others live in institutions, although they would be happier in small homes where, with little assistance, they could look after themselves and have more privacy.

Older countries realized many years ago that the increasing number of older people in their population made special housing for the aged necessary. It was as early as the 1920's and 30's that the Danish Government arranged to give financial assistance to various forms of housing, including housing for the aged. In that country now more than one-third of all municipalities have provided small homes, devoid of institutional atmosphere, for old-age pensioners. In some places modern apartment blocks containing low-rental apartments for aged persons have been constructed through public funds.

In the British Isles, provision for the aged has been part of the general housing program, which has been organized on a national scale. In England, too, an interesting experiment which has been tried, is the attaching of a small, self-contained housekeeping unit to the single family dwelling, called the "plus Granny flat". If it is no longer needed by the older members of the family, it can be rented and bring in a return. On the retirement of the occupants of the larger dwelling, or if either of them should become widowed and need additional income, a move can be made into the "plus Granny flat" and the larger accommodation can be let. It is an idea that might well be adopted here.

Sweden, Switzerland, The Netherlands and Germany have recognized the need of housing projects to provide for the special needs of older people. In Canada some interest has been aroused, in the last few years, in plans for providing suitable living accommodation for able-bodied, older people at a rent they can afford to pay. These are usually small apartments, or cottage-type accommodation, of not more than two or, at most, three rooms. The National Housing Act, under section 16, provides for liberal loans to limited dividend companies for such persons. The loan may be for 90 per cent of the lending value of the project, and repayment may be spread over 50 years. Some provinces have legislation that makes it possible for them to supplement the assistance that can be secured under the National Housing Act.

According to an article in the September 18, 1954 issue of the Financial Post, under the heading "A New Deal for our Senior Citizens", it is stated that, up to that date, sixteen projects for senior citizen housing have been approved under the Housing Act. It might be interesting for honourable senators to know that, of the sixteen projects, eight are in British Columbia.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I presume the reason is, as the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) told us, that British Columbia had a larger percentage of older residents than had other parts of Canada. Another reason might be that that province is more alive to the urgent need of those residents.

Most of the projects referred to by the Financial Post are sponsored by municipalities and by such service clubs as the Lions, Kiwanis and Kinsmen. The article mentions several similar projects which are being planned. A few have been undertaken by national groups. In this field the pioneer work was done by the Danish people when they established their home, "Dania", in Burnaby, British Columbia. The Icelandic and Norwegian people have followed with similar projects, as have several church groups. These projects are scattered from Victoria, British Columbia, to Ottawa, and although they are encouraging we have barely scratched the surface of the great need for such accommodation for our senior citizens.

The Financial Post article states—and of this I am not so proud—that "the Maritimes have been a little slow in developing possibilities." While this is to be regretted, the possibilities that have been used to advantage elsewhere open ways for others, and we hope that with increased publicity about them they will be adopted in many other parts of Canada, including the Maritimes.

The article further states that, with the lengthening average life, in 1975 there should be more than one million people over 70 years of age and something like 600,000 between the ages of 65 and 70. It can be taken for granted now that in our urbanized society a great many of these people cannot be fitted into the homes of their families; and, if they are to be safely and comfortably housed—that is, neither in attics that are fire hazards nor in basements that are damp —many more projects must be undertaken to provide for them.

Of course, besides the economic and housing problems in connection with our increased population of senior citizens, there are social problems which must be faced. In Canada we have provided a considerable amount of financial security for our older citizens through our progressive Old Age Security and Old Age Assistance programs. No one could know better than I, who have administered the Old Age Security program in one province, what a boon these pensions are to our senior citizens. However, we have to remember that, though it is very essential to have bread, "man cannot live by bread alone." For that reason in the lives of all older citizens who are no longer employed there must be some occupation, whether it yields a financial return or not; there must be some recreation and there must be a sense of "being wanted"—a sense that they are important to someone.

It is recognized as better economy to provide the retired older citizen with interests than to have him lapse into physical or mental illness which is much more costly to the community and which, in many cases, seems to be the alternative. To provide recreational and educational interests, local communities in many countries have organized for their older citizens clubs such as Cleveland's "Live Long and Like It Clubs", and "The Golden Age Clubs" sponsored by business and professional groups. In Canada we have some such groups—I think of the "Over Sixty Club" in Hamilton—but they are all too few.

In some countries, Day Care Centres for older retired citizens have been established. Last year I visited one such centre in New York City and became most enthusiastic about the work they do and the change they make in the lives of those who attend. The centre, sponsored by the Department of Welfare and a local voluntary board, was open five days a week. I understand the department supplies only professional services by way of leadership and that the local board does everything else. The members, I found, enjoyed friendly companionship with people of their own age, learned new hobbies and played games. Many, for the first time, took up painting or the playing of musical instruments. Here I would remind honourable senators that these are not all indigent people; indeed, some of them are quite able to live in homes of their own, but nobody was particularly interested in them and they had no interest in others, so they had been spending long days by themselves in their homes.

At the centre I visited lunch is served every day and the members take turns looking after it. It is a very simple lunch, but the older people feel important when they have this responsibility.

I was told that an actual survey revealed that before the opening of the centre many of the regular members had been frequent and some had been regular attendants at clinics and had considered themselves semi-invalids, but after they became interested in the centre their visits to the clinics had ceased completely. In other words, they found the Day Care Centre more entertaining than the clinic. That in itself results in a great saving of both money and the services of trained medical people.

There are fourteen such centres in New York City alone, and the idea has spread to other cities in the United States, to England, France and Australia. A very few such centres are operating in Canada; for example, the "Second Mile Club" in Toronto, which is for people over 60 and is open seven days a week. But we need many, many more to serve the thousands of older people of Canada.

The National Council of Jewish Women sponsors a number of weekly workshops providing occupations for retired men. The things they produce are usually given for use in community projects, and this makes the men feel they are still contributing to community life. The Soroptimist Clubs have done commendable work in this field. One outstanding contribution is that of giving scholarships so that social workers can learn more about the science of aging and how to treat it.

The recreational and educational projects for older citizens which have been tried out in different places are numerous; I could not even list all of those about which I have read. The reason why communities in Canada are slow in organizing projects, most of which are started locally, is that we do not have sufficient knowledge about what has been done by other people who have been faced with problems similar to ours. Older countries have met these problems earlier, and it might well be helpful to us to know what they have done.

It is imperative that more publicity be given to the experiments which have already been tried, and the satisfying results in happiness and improvement of physical and mental health for older citizens. If these things were known, more of our communities would, undoubtedly, copy them or adopt them to their own local situations. The Canadian Welfare Council has recently set up a committee whose terms of reference include acting as a clearing house for general reports on this subject.

The necessity of making the problems regarding aging population widely known, has been recognized and faced in many countries. Various methods have been adopted to meet this need. In the United States a National Conference on Aging was held in Washington, in 1950, under federal auspices. Since then there has been, under the Federal Security Agency and its successor, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, a Committee on Aging and Geriatrics.

State governments have recognized the problem and have set up committees and commissions to make surveys and do educational work. The best known is that of Senator Thomas Desmond of New York State. Other states doing work in this field include Michigan, Rhode Island, Florida, California, North Carolina. I have read reports of these bodies, but not of those in other states.

The problem is so universal that three international gerontological congresses have been held. The last one, held in London in July 1954, was attended by representatives from more than fifty countries, so it is evident that interest in this matter is widespread.

Honourable senators, our own national problem in this field is one that we will have to solve, and its solution will require the combined efforts of governments at all levels as well as the help of our many voluntary agencies and service groups. Part of our difficulties lie, I think, in the lack of understanding of the nature and scope of the problem and the lack of knowledge concerning the financial assistance that really is available to assist in solving certain aspects of the problem.

With regard to the employment problem of the older worker, we need to develop a much better understanding of this question among employers and organized labour, and especially among the public at large.

A great deal has already been done by the Department of Labour in pointing up the nature of employment problems of the older worker and in dispelling a lot of misunderstanding concerning his abilities and disabilities. Much remains to be done, both within and outside the Government, before we can solve this very stubborn problem. I think it is only by making employment opportunities available to older workers that we can ensure a greater economic gain for the country as a whole and a more effective and happy life for our senior citizens.

In this country, of course, a large sector of older workers find themselves in a position where they have adequate housing and satisfactory health and welfare services to meet their individual needs, but a very large group in our population—which group will probably increase in size as our population ages—have not satisfactory housing accommodation nor adequate provision for health care and certain other welfare services. The needs of this group are considerable, particularly in view of the large number of people involved, and it will certainly tax the ingenuity of governments—federal, provincial and local—as well as of voluntary agencies, to make even minimum provision for their housing and social welfare.

It would appear, honourable senators, that the most urgent need at this time is to focus attention on the nature and scope of this problem and to cultivate a better understanding of ways and means in which some of these difficulties can be solved.

A number of possibilities come to mind: for example, it might be possible to create interest in and draw attention to this question through the establishment of a parliamentary committee to consider the aspects of provision for old age security other than maintenance, in the same way that, in 1950, the Joint Parliamentary Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Old Age Security considered the problem of old age pensions in regard to maintenance.

Another possibility might be the establishment of a Commission on Aging, such as has been established in many of the American states. These bodies have permitted legislators at State level and other interested persons and groups to assess the problem as it affected their own particular State and to come to some decision as to how they would meet it.

Again, while governments have a real responsibility in this area I do not think it can be denied that there is a governmental responsibility—it is traditional in Canada for voluntary agencies to spearhead movements for improvement in welfare in new fields and to carry an important share in the development of the necessary welfare services.

The Canadian Welfare Council, which is a co-ordinating agency, gives leadership in non-government fields and seems to be the focal point for advancing study and promoting publicity of a non-government nature. This work the Council, through its Committee on the Aging, would gladly do in this field, but at present it is hampered by a lack of funds to permit the employment of a full-time staff to carry on the work of a committee. Its progress, therefore, would be very slow as it would have to depend upon what its members and others could do in their spare time. One tangible way of helping the council to make progress would be to provide sufficient funds to enable the committee to operate efficiently. If our government is not prepared to take a lead itself by appointing a parliamentary committee or a commission to study this matter, and to hold meetings at which publicity would be given to the problem, financial assistance to the Canadian Welfare Council would be a token of the Government's interest in this matter.

Honourable senators, I have taken the privilege of asking to have placed on your desks a pamphlet on aging entitled Everyone grows old, prepared by the Canadian Welfare Council. It is just off the press, and I hope you may find it interesting.

We all agree, I am sure, with the statement by Professor Notestein, which I read to you earlier, that the increase in our span of life is a "triumph of civilization". But, honourable senators, this "triumph" will be a defeat unless we see that every person in Canada gets the most he or she possibly can out of the added years, for of what value is this "triumph" if these added years are to be empty and meaningless?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

(Translation):

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, my first words in rising will be to pay tribute to our gracious Sovereign. May God protect her and her family, and give her a reign of peace!

May the Queen Mother, who visited us lately and by whose charm we were captivated, live a long and happy life!

To the Governor General, who, with such remarkable dignity, represents the authority in our country, I express my heartfelt greetings.

To our distinguished Speaker, I extend my very best wishes.

To the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) I can think of no other wish than that he should long direct our discussions and keep forever his friendly smile. May I congratulate him upon his appointment of the senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout) to assist him. My best wishes to our Leader and to his assistant.

(Text):

I wish many more years to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), so that he may continue to tell us often, with the enthusiasm of youth, about his wonderful city of Winnipeg. May his criticisms always be of a constructive nature.

And now, may I say a few words concerning the mover of the Address, the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). The city of Victoria is known as the city of flowers. Well, we have among us the prettiest flower, which is not by any means on the verge of wilting.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: At what age does one become old, I wonder? One may be old at 20. I know people of 20 who are old because they no longer believe in the future; they are pessimists who see nothing good or beautiful around them: they are old because there is no love, no ideal, no beauty in their hearts. But I know people of 80 who are still young, young with all their hopes, their faith in life, young because their hearts are filled with love and devotion toward their compatriots and their country.

In other words, one may be young at 80 and old at 20.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: The mover of the Address, the honourable senator from Victoria, has shown us how to stay young. She illustrated this best when she expounded the potential economic development of her province.

And concerning the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), may I say that after listening to the splendid speech delivered by our honourable colleague last night I know why she was selected by the Canadian Welfare Council as Chairman of its very important Committee on Aging.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: The seconder of the Address, who comes from my own section of the country and who is utterly fearless, has raised a most interesting point with regard to the whole social economy of the nation when he spoke of housing.

Social security is one of our most popular topics. But can social security be provided unless the family is made secure at the same time? One of the surest ways of ensuring family security is to see that every family has its own home. I hope some day we will realize that therein lies one of the greatest factors of security and prosperity for the nation. That is why I sincerely hope that the Housing Act, and section 35 thereof in particular, will be approved in my province as soon as possible.

Taxes have been discussed, and the Leader of the Opposition has said that they are too high. I would not say that taxes are too high, but I agree with him that they are very high. Is it not better, however, to have high taxation so as to keep our economic life going and at the same time to organize the defence of our country? Most assuredly, if we fail to organize our defence and tomorrow our enemies realize our weakness, the outcome is easy to predict. We will then be required to pay a much heavier tax, the tax of blood, of bondage and of slavery. Is that what we want? I do not think so.

Some years ago, I visited one of the smaller centres of our province in order to attend a series of lectures given by well-informed personalities. On a Sunday afternoon, hundreds of people congregated at the meeting place to take part in a forum on the theme of inflation, deflation, taxation and unemployment insurance. At the end of the discussion an honest fisherman rose and said: "Tell me, is it better to pay taxes, have an income and work as we do today, or to go back to the conditions which prevailed in 1932-35?" The question required no answer and the audience broke into applause. It seems to me that that good man's conclusion was wisdom itself. When the wheels stop turning, there are no taxes to pay, but it is better to pay taxes with the money you earn than not to pay any and starve.

The Leader of the Government has informed us that a committee will be appointed to study seriously and thoroughly what concrete means can be taken to stop the traffic of narcotics. As honourable senators know, that is one of the Communists' means of propaganda, for they hope in this way to weaken Western nations. They seek to spread the use of these drugs to the four corners of the world because they weaken men physically as well as mentally. They would thus undermine the very basis of all Christian culture.

I congratulate our Leader upon this step. But I would ask him to extend the scope of his inquiry so as to find some way of putting a stop to another kind of narcotic, as nefarious as the first. I mean licentious literature and all the crime comics which are about to pervert our youth and will tomorrow cause the moral and spiritual downfall of our nation.

Over the past few years, and especially in the last few months, I have seen these filthy sheets appearing weekly and reporting the lewdest crimes, especially sexual crimes. These pocket books or digests explain in detail every kind of debauchery. An effort is made to awaken in the hearts of our young people every perverted sexual instinct, to place man's intelligence at the service of organized vice, and to lower him to a level below that of the beasts which, at least are guided by their instinct. Marriage, moreover, is degraded; it is no longer considered as the union of two bodies, of two hearts and of two souls.

And when I see editors and printers thriving on such a display of vice, I wonder if they are not paid by the devil's own henchmen, who are bent on destroying Western democracy. There is no escaping it, tomorrow we will have anarchy, and confusion. The unbridled pursuit of pleasure can not serve as the foundation for an institution such as the family, the basic cell of society, where any normal social life is born.

Let not marriage be debased, for it associates man to God's creative work and, for that reason, it is a worthy and sacred institution.

Mr. Leader, why could not this inquiry bear on both these narcotics? For both these drugs are about to pervert and destroy our young people.

(Text):

Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words now about national unity, which is becoming more and more desirable for the welfare and the greatness of our country. Above all, I wish for this unity, and I hope that everyone in this chamber wishes for it too and acts accordingly, but I regret to say that some people in either places act to the contrary.

Nobody in Quebec requires that English-speaking Canadians should speak French. However, the fact is that some of them learn French. Good! I am pleased to say that in the province of Quebec a good many of the people speak both French and English. This bilingualism enables the French-speaking and English-speaking citizens to have a better understanding of one another. Is it possible to bring about such an understanding by telling the people of the minority group in Canada that they have no rights? I would point out that the minority group has been in this country for over 350 years, and during 150 of those years it had the hardest kinds of work to do as pioneers. Both majority and minority groups have rights, but at this time I wish to point out some facts about the minority.

Honourable senators must recall that on two or three occasions the people belonging to the minority group in this country saved Canada for the British Empire; because had it not been for their courage and loyalty Canada would not now be a part of the Commonwealth.

Insults and other such acts will not obtain the national unity so much desired. Majority and minority in Canada may speak two different languages; but both love their country and live together harmoniously and peacefully. An orchestra is formed of many instruments, and they produce harmony only in so far as each performer plays the right notes.

Jules Méline, a French statesman who, as honourable senators know, was Minister of Agriculture in France at the end of the last century and during World War I, gave a striking and clear definition of the fundamental role played by agriculture in the national economy, and of the interdependence which exists between the major sectors of economic activity: agriculture, manufacturing industry, commerce and finance. He compared national prosperity to a tree whose roots are agriculture, and whose stem and branches are industry and commerce. If the roots suffer and are not treated properly, poor circulation of the sap develops in all parts of the tree, it is slowed down, the leaves fall, the branches dry up, the tree loses its value and becomes sterile or useless. The prosperity of agriculture is essential to the prosperity of the national economy.

Our agriculture is undoubtedly the most important basic industry of Canada, notwithstanding the prodigious industrial expansion of our country during the last fifteen years. Although we do not yet have the official and complete figures for 1954, we can assert, without any risk of error, that the financial income of Canadian farmers has considerably decreased since 1951, when it reached its peak in the history of the country: $2,812 million. In 1953 it was down to $2,731,200,000. The figures for the last three months of 1954 have not yet been made public; those for the first nine months of 1954 are considerably lower than the corresponding ones for 1953. The federal Bureau of Statistics has temporarily estimated the financial income of Canadian farmers for the year 1954 at $2,408,600,000, which is a decrease of 12 per cent from 1953, in which year the income was already 15 per cent lower than in 1952.

It is plain that the position of Canadian agriculture has worsened during these last years. The index of prices paid farmers for their produce has constantly decreased since 1952. From 274·5 in 1952, it went down to 247·6 in 1953; in September 1953, it was 227·3, and it has continued to decrease ever since. Although we do not yet know the complete figures for 1954, in September of that year it was set at 227·3.

A first fact which nobody will deny: the income of our Canadian farmers was lower in 1954 than in 1953; and lower in 1953 than in 1952. This is true also of the United States, where the net income of farmers has constantly decreased since 1951, and in the proportion of 14 per cent from 1951 to 1954.

A second fact which is equally true: the prosperity of agriculture is necessary and essential to the prosperity of industry and commerce as well as to the general economic prosperity of the country. The more prosperous that agriculture is, the greater are the possibilities that all branches of the national economic life will also know an era of increasing prosperity, or at least of economic and social stability.

Agricultural income must remain at the same level, and even increase, if we wish to maintain and increase the general economic prosperity and social welfare. A reduction of agricultural income soon brings about a decrease in industrial purchases, and also a decrease in production; unemployment results therefrom, and if it spreads it may cause an economic slump with its ensuing social problems. In the present world situation we cannot afford a serious economic depression. Necessary measures must be taken to maintain Canadian agriculture at its highest level of prosperity, which is the basis and the essential condition of a healthy and progressive national economy.

In pleading for agriculture, my purpose is to defend the interests of the whole nation. Social classes, as well as the various sectors of economic life, are interdependent; therefore, they must co-operate to bring about the common prosperity of the country. The Canadian government proved on several occasions, through its legislation, that it clearly understands the economic and social solidarity existing between the agricultural and industrial domains, particularly when it enacted the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which has rendered invaluable services to the whole of the Canadian nation, although it has cost very little so far: from 1946 to March 1954, a little higher than $80 million.

Nevertheless, some people claim it is a sound policy that agricultural products should be sold at a lower price and be allowed to stabilize at a lower level. To support their thesis, they say that Canadian farmers are already well paid, that they enjoy their fair share of the national income, and that stabilization of the prices of agricultural products at a lower level than that of 1951—when the prices were at their peak—would result in reducing to a certain extent the general cost of living in this country. To those individuals, I may reply that I think such assertions are not confirmed, but refuted by the facts. If we restrict our figures to statistics covering the last thirty years, we find that the agricultural population—which, according to the national census, formed 28 per cent of the Canadian population in 1921, 22·5 per cent in 1931, and 20·2 per cent in 1951—received during that period of time an average of only 10 per cent of the national income. According to national accounts in Canada, the income and expenditure figures for 1926-1950 and 1950-1953 establish that in 1953 the net income per person living on Canadian farms amounted to $565, whereas in the same year the net income per person not living on farms amounted to $1,382. This comparative survey, covering a period of approximately twenty-five years previous to 1953, established the fact that in 1933 the net income of persons living on farms was as low as $32 per person. There is nothing amazing about that, for we were then at the lowest point in the economic depression. When the farmer cannot sell his produce, or sells it at a ridiculously low price, he can no longer buy anything, and consequently there is a slump in trade and industry; it means chronic unemployment, and an economic and social crisis, such as we experienced in the years 1930-38.

A comparison of the net incomes of Canadians living on farms and of those not living on farms during the years 1928-1953, shows that the net income of those living on farms amounts generally to half the income of persons not living on farms, and that during a period of economic depression farm income soon drops to a low level. It also shows that during the depression of the early 1930's the net income of persons not living on farms also decreased, but more slowly, and that in 1933, in the darkest days of the depression, it was still twelve times more than the net rural income in Canada. As a matter of fact, in 1933 the average net income of persons not living on farms amounted to $407—the lowest level reached by this class during the depression—whereas the net income per person living on farms went down to $32.

Farmers, therefore, must be very careful whenever they make any purchases for their farms; as far as possible they should avoid buying on the instalment plan; and before making any large loans for the purchase of agricultural equipment such as high-priced tractors, they must seriously consider the matter, for they might have to repay the loans with devaluated money. If the income of non-farmers decreases very slightly or not at all, while the net income of farmers goes down to a great extent, this means that industrial salaries remain at a constant level, that the cost of industrial production remains almost as high as before, and that consequently the cost of the goods which farmers must purchase out of a much lower income will also remain at a high level or will not go down to any appreciable extent.

Furthermore, we know that this reasoning is based on facts. Data obtained in a study made in the United States, by economist Gardiner C. Means, points to the unfavourable position of agriculture during a period of economic regression. For ten groups of products whose price variations he computed against the decrease in production for the years 1929-32, and a decrease of 6 per cent in agricultural production, the prices of agricultural produce went down 63 per cent; while the cost of agricultural implements suffered a decrease of only 6 per cent against a production decrease of 80 per cent. In other words, during an economic regression agricultural prices go down considerably and at a quick tempo; whereas, on the other hand, prices of industrial products show a relatively slight and slow rate of decrease, and then farmers must pay for their purchases with devaluated money.

Canadian farmers, I repeat, should be cautious about investing money on their farms, and should as far as possible avoid purchasing goods on the instalment plan or borrowing money for purposes of mechanization of agricultural equipment. The many who have incurred debts would be well advised to reduce them as soon as possible if they do not wish to be compelled, in the event of an increasing agricultural economic regression, to pay their debts with devaluated money or to abandon to their creditors pieces of equipment on which they have already paid considerable sums of money. In the past few years requests for new loans have become more numerous and urgent despite the fact that it is evident that agriculture is not as prosperous as formerly. Instead of trying to borrow in the face of such economic contingencies, would it not be more advisable to avoid new loans and endeavour to pay our debts?

As to the influence of agricultural prices on the cost of living, it is unfair to claim that what the Canadian farmers now get for their produce helps to maintain the cost of living at an excessively high level. On this point, a distinction must be established between the price the consumer pays for agricultural products and the portion of the consumer's price actually received by the farmer. To show how false the claim is, let us look at some figures which show the proportion of the consumer's dollar that the farmer really gets for his products. The August 1954 number of the Agricultural Economist contained a compilation covering twelve agricultural products, for the years 1949 to 1953, inclusive. In 1953, out of each dollar spent by the consumer the producers of natural milk received 53 cents; potato growers, 41 cents; raisers of first-grade cattle, 58 cents; butter producers, 77 cents; and so on.

From those figures honourable senators will realize the margin between the prices paid by the consumers and those paid to the farmers. Yet in 1953, the income from the sale of agricultural products, $413 million, and from the sale of cattle, $775 million, amounted to approximately half the total agricultural income, $2,731 million.

Before passing judgment on the influence of agricultural prices upon the high cost of living, is it not therefore very important to consider the spread between the prices paid to producers and the prices exacted from consumers?

Honourable senators, I have explained to you, the economic problem of the nation, as I understand it, particularly the agricultural economic problem, in order to prove to you that we can never do too much for the agricultural class, because the basis of our national prosperity rests upon that class.

Some economists—like Malthus, in the nineteenth century, and others who are members of UNESCO— have wondered whether in the year 2000 we shall produce enough to feed the human race. If things continue going as they are at present we certainly shall not produce sufficiently, not because of an excessive increase in population, but because not enough people will be engaged in production. The land will be deserted; and then we shall be better able to understand the great truth which René Bazin has expounded in his excellent novel intituled La Terre Qui Meurt—"The Dying Land". If the land dies the people will die, and the nation will die, because of a lack of food, for a hungry people is ripe for revolution. But, on the other hand, if the farming class is stable, the nation and the world will be stable.

With our present means of production there is no danger of the human race lacking sufficient food. We can increase a hundred fold our agricultural production, but in order to do so, we must have workers. Therefore, let us organize the life of our farmers in such a way that they will be happy to live on their land, and that their sons also will be happy to remain on the land; let us act in such a way that another book may be written, but this time a book of life, which could be intituled Le Blé Qui Leve Sur La Terre Qui Vit—"The Rising Wheat On The Living Land".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, first of all I want to join those who have already spoken in this debate in congratulating the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the Address, not only upon the fine material of their speeches but also upon the splendid manner in which they were delivered.

The Speech from the Throne announced that there would be a meeting of the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth in London in the month of January. I am sure I speak for all honourable senators when I say how proud we are to have had men of the stature of our Prime Minister and our Secretary of State for External Affairs to represent us in London at this conference.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: We are, I am sure, in agreement with the sentiment expressed by the London Evening News that few who have been presented in recent years with the Freedom of the City of London have merited the honour more than Mr. St. Laurent.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: We are glad, I am sure, to welcome him back to Canada today.

In the Speech from the Throne it is stated that the construction of a new ferry to operate between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia would be undertaken early in the present year. This is indeed welcome news for the people of Prince Edward Island, even though it is long overdue. From the time of Confederation transportation has been one of our troubles, and it still is our No. 1 problem. We have at the present time operating between Borden and Cape Tormentine one of the finest icebreaker-ferries in the world. It is a large boat, designed to carry passengers, automobiles and railway freight cars. During the summer months this large ferry has to make the crossing day and night in order to avoid traffic congestion, and even then long lines of automobiles are often waiting for their turn to go across. I think it would be the part of wisdom for the Department of Transport to provide a ferry designed to transport passenger automobiles and trucks only, a boat that could be built for not more than one-third as much as the icebreaker cost, and which could be operated, I am sure, at one-third its cost. Such a boat would carry as many motor cars as the larger ferry does, and as a result we would get many more years of service out of the larger ferry.

For quite a number of years the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Transport kept the rate for trucks on the ferry so high that it was really prohibitive. I suppose their idea was to get as much business as possible for the railway. In 1939 another ferry commenced operating between Wood Island, P.E.I., and Caribou, N.S. That ferry carried trucks more cheaply, so we were able to get a reduction in the rate on the car ferry, and this has been very important to our farmers and fishermen. All the fresh fish is now moved in trucks.

Before Confederation there was no railroad on the island, and I believe that construction of a railway was one of the deciding factors in bringing Prince Edward Island into Confederation. The railroad is still there, of course, but it has now lost the largest part of its passenger business. After dieselizing the island section of the railway first, the Canadian National are planning now to take off all the passenger trains except one between Charlottetown and Borden, at which point connection is made for the mainland. That is the way things have gone, and it is not much wonder, because the trains are so much slower than automobiles On the island there are no two points that I know of between which you cannot go and return in a car in the time that it takes the train to go one way.

I have noted lately that the running time of trains between Montreal and Vancouver is to be cut by eleven hours one way, and by fourteen, I think, the other way. I will tell honourable senators the time it takes to travel between Charlottetown and Moncton by the Canadian National. We leave Charlottetown at 7 a.m., and leave Moncton for Montreal at 2.10 p.m. The elapsed time amounts to seven hours and ten minutes. Then on the return trip we arrive at Moncton at 9.50 a.m. and at Charlottetown at 6.10 p.m., an elapsed time of about eight hours. The trip by automobile from Moncton to Charlottetown is roughly 100 miles, and the drive can be made easily in two and a half hours, plus one hour on the ferry.

It is not greatly to be wondered at that so much passenger traffic has gone to the Maritime Central Airways that the railroad has been left with very few passengers.

A good deal has been said by representatives of labour about the existence of hard times and unemployment. In a cold country like Canada, with a very heavy snow-fall, it is difficult to have everybody working continuously. But I do not think it can be said that conditions are so bad when, according to returns, at the end of 1954 deposits in our banks reached a total of $5,218 million, an increase of $462 million on the previous year. This is not a bad achievement for a country of 15 million people.

One disturbing feature of our national life is the prevalence of automobile accidents. In 1951, the last year for which I have been able to get the record, this type of accident caused 2,686 deaths, injuries to 41,691 people, and total damages of $162,157,978. I think the Senate would render a service to Canada if it set up a committee to try to determine the causes of so many casualties. I believe—for one thing—that big trucks which when loaded weigh around 20,000 pounds should not be permitted to run on two-way highways at speeds of fifty miles and more. On a railroad track that speed is high enough; yet in many places large transport trucks move along the highways at fifty to fifty-five miles an hour, and when they get on a grade, are dangerous to passenger cars which try to pass them.

In some respects—two, particularly—Prince Edward Island has changed very little since Confederation. The rural population still constitutes about three-fourths of the whole population. Many of our young people leave the island for other parts of Canada and the United States. There are 41,151 people in the age group between one year and 19 years, but only 31,515 between the ages of 35 and 69; so, assuming that one-half of the latter are females, the working population in that age group is only 15,756.

The remarks made yesterday by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) as to the need of providing work for citizens over 65 years old hardly apply to Prince Edward Island, where most elderly people live on the farms and work as long as they can. In the St. Peter's district is a medical man who is 96 or 97 years old,—

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: He is 98.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: —and last year he was attending to his practice and driving his own car.

In looking over some official reports I noticed that last year the Prince Edward Island Government provided for public relief and welfare nearly $2 million, as against similar expenditures of not more than $35,000 only a few years ago. With this provision, plus family allowances, old age security payments, widows' pensions, and the rest, I think it can be said that our people are being fairly well taken care of.

But for the fact that I was served with a summons, I would not have occupied any of the time of this house. However, not only has this summons been served on me, but I was warned that very likely other senators would get similar treatment. I know that most members of this honourable body were never served with a summons in their lives, so they may be relieved to know that they will not be compelled to answer within eight days, but will have a little longer to attend to it. My copy reads as follows:

1855—CHARLOTTETOWN CENTENNIAL—1955

Summons to a Person Charged With an Offence

City of Charlottetown
County of Queen's Province of Prince Edward Island
Canada

To Senator G. H. Barbour
Ottawa, Ontario.

Whereas, you have this day been charged and information laid in Charlottetown aforesaid before the undersigned, on behalf of the Charlottetown Centennial Committee, for that you the said G. H. Barbour have not visited the said City of Charlottetown, in the County of Queen's, Province of Prince Edward Island, for some time,

These are therefore to command you, in the name of the Charlottetown Centennial Committee, to be and appear before me, during any of the months of June, July, August or September, 1955, or before such old friends as shall then be there, to answer to the said charge, and be further dealt with according to law. Herein fail not.

Given under my hand and seal, this 1st day of September A.D. one thousand nine hundred and fifty-four at the City of Charlottetown aforesaid.

J. David Stewart
Mayor

On behalf of the Charlottetown
Centennial Committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Perhaps honourable senators will receive a copy of this summons through the mail. There will be street dancing and other gay festivities to mark the Charlottetown Centennial. At this time I would personally extend a very warm welcome to honourable senators to come along and participate in the celebrations. And may I add that all who come to Charlottetown should be sure to visit the Confederation Chamber there. Among other places, I would recommend a visit to the excellent beach at Cavendish, and the nearby house "Green Gables," which was once the home of the famous author Lucy Montgomery.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to deal with a subject referred to by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) when he spoke on this motion. He said that we were not getting the best possible service from the United Nations, and he proceeded to make a suggestion to the Government, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald).

I had thought that the procedure at the United Nations was better known, but just in case it is not I wish to take a little time this afternoon to explain that what is going on there now is the same as when the honourable Leader of the Opposition was a delegate.

As honourable members are no doubt aware, the Senate of Canada has been represented at the United Nations by quite a few senators, including His Honour the Speaker (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and a highly-esteemed former Speaker (Hon. Mr. King). We have also been represented by the honourable Senators Lambert, Turgeon, Wilson, Hugessen, Isnor, Haig, Howard, and myself.

One of my most stimulating experiences at the last United Nations Assembly was seeing delegate after delegate stand up in the Economic Committee room and express gratitude to the United Nations for its technical assistance to their under-developed countries. This technical aid, they declared, demonstrated to their peoples that the United Nations did more than debate, pass resolutions and make reports. It was, they said, a live and forceful implement for helping them to answer their needs and realize their aspirations.

It is the disagreements of United Nations delegations which make the headlines. But equally significant, to my mind, is the fact of virtually complete agreement among those same delegates on the value of technical assistance. I am sure that the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) can report that this was the fact during the last session of the United Nations.

Here is one procedure followed by the Canadian party at the United Nations. At 9 o'clock each morning all the Canadian delegates, observers and alternates, whether they be members of the Government or the Opposition in the House of Commons or the Senate, meet in a conference room. Each delegate makes a report as to what happened in the committee he was serving on the day before, and all the members discuss what attitude should be taken. Canada's Department of External Affairs is represented at the United Nations by a permanent staff, which is in constant communication with Ottawa, conveying the different viewpoints back and forth. When I was there these discussions took place every morning before the sessions started, and it did not matter whether you were a Government or Opposition supporter, you had just as much to say as anybody else in these discussions. The honourable senator from Wellington has told me that this procedure was followed last year, just as it was when the Leader of the Opposition was one of our representatives.

Honourable senators, I have spoken about the differences of opinion that arise at United Nations meetings. It must be remembered that not sixty but eighty countries are represented on the Committee on Technical Assistance. In other words, there are twenty countries that are not members of the United Nations as such but are participants in the technical assistance program of the United Nations. That was the case last year, but I am not sure whether the number has been increased this year. Perhaps my honourable friend from Wellington could supply me with that information.

Hon. Mr. Howard: The number has been increased by five.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: These eighty-five countries are all contributing something to the program in either a financial or technical way. It is the purpose of the committee to raise the standard of living all over the world. In order to keep Canada's standard of living at a high level we must have export markets for our goods, and one of the best long-term ways to protect our present status is to help raise the standard of living in other countries. Just the other day I read a press item about the amount of paper that is produced and used in Canada, and the report referred to the amount of paper that could be used in China if the people of that country used paper cups as we do in Canada. Just this one small item would possibly treble the demand for the world's supply of paper.

This technical assistance program is popular with every country in the world, because it represents action speaking louder than words and because the impact of that action is felt at community levels, where we have to get in order to keep our way of life, as opposed to the communistic system.

The under-developed countries of the world want more of this aid. To the advanced Western countries, such as Canada, they say in effect: "You speak much of the need to raise the world's standard of living, to increase democratic freedoms and achieve political stability. Well, this is one way you can help us to do it—by technical assistance."

Sometimes we are tempted to resist increased support for this great United Nations program, by recalling the size of our military defence costs. But the sums involved are very small by comparison. In fact, Canada's contribution last year amounted to less than the cost of one modern bomber. There was no increase made in our contribution this year. Last year the United States' contribution was kept at about $13 million, but this year I do not know whether it will be up or down or remain the same. The budget is operated about half a year behind time. Therefore the technical assistance program for this year has not been finally approved yet, but it looks as though their requirements will amount to some $25 million to $27 million. That seems to be a very small amount to contribute towards raising the standard of living all over the world.

Under this program the countries themselves supply part of the financial aid, and quite a bit of the resources. Last year, owing to lack of UN funds for technical aid, the under-developed countries received only one-fourth of the help they would have been prepared to use. This means, in effect, that the United Nations is condemning many of its less fortunate members from using their own resources to the fullest extent. Each outlay on expert advice and service by the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and related UN agencies is matched, often many times over, by local capital or other investment in a particular project. Consequently, lack of aid or diminution of it slows down investment by countries in their own improvement.

For the information of honourable senators, may I say that the Secretary-General of the Technical Assistance Program is a Canadian, Hugh Keenleyside, who at one time was with the Department of External Affairs, and prior to his present appointment was Canadian Ambassador to Mexico.

The Technical Assistance Program, under the aegis of the UN, is a collective and co-operative effort in sharing skills for mutual gain. It carries no partisan overtones such as sometimes jar national pride. It is a program which speeds a country's own efforts to make significant advances in behalf of its own people. This is why so many nations measure the intentions of industrially advanced nations with the technical-assistance ruler. We must understand this fact to appreciate the importance of the UN program to our own country's welfare.

It is the view of Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjold that UN economic and social work around the world has more significant reality than the political resolutions of the General Assembly. Certainly, there can be no argument that evolution is preferable to revolution. And technical aid provides the base for evolution towards democratic objectives.

Let us examine the program in operation, and see how this is so.

There are today nearly 1,800 men and women working, under UN auspices, in some fourscore countries and territories. One-third of them are specialists on training missions under UN fellowship grants. Two-thirds are experts sent on missions by the UN Technical Assistance Administration or one of the specialized agencies, such as the Food and Agriculture Organization or the World Health Organization. Between 60 and 70 nationalities are represented in this corps, which right now includes about 50 Canadians. Their activities touch the basic concerns of the people they aid and consequently affect the outlook of those people and the society in which they live.

Housing, industry, food, social welfare, health, education, transportation, productivity—these are the central concerns of the peoples of the world and of the UN program.

A UN expert recently recorded the sad fact that Neolithic houses, discovered at the bottom of a Swiss lake, were more comfortable and efficient in their day than most 20th century housing in Asia. He expressed the view that the political future of Asia may very well turn on what is done about housing and food. Whether or not his view is correct, it is an observable fact that most governments of the region are using every UN facility to give a sound basis to their housing efforts and to speed them up. As in many other phases of development, the main effort is to organize in such a way as to use the main asset of the region—under-employed labour.

It is staggering to the Western mind how much partially-used manpower there is in the East. Our industrial societies shudder when unemployment approaches 5 per cent, but studies of Asia suggest that most countries in that area could give up one-half to two-thirds of their rural population without cutting crop yields. Technical assistance experts are aiding governments to utilize that labour in a way that is similar to the Nova Scotian system, which allows owner-builders of houses to count their labour as capital investment. A similar system is in operation in Hull, and it is also followed by the Newfoundland co-operatives.

The rest of the problem is organizing and financing a flow of such materials as are not at hand, and providing such skilled direction as may be necessary to supervise and assist community house-building.

In this connection, it might be worth noting that UN experts have pointed to a considerable business opportunity for the developer of a chemical antiseptic that would serve as a binder for thatching. More people in the world live under thatch than any other kind of roof. Most thatched roofs have to be replaced every four years, because of infestation and deterioration.

I would recommend that manufacturers of shingles and other building materials help to raise Eastern living standards. Then they would find a good market in Asia for British Columbia shingles.

Hon. Mr. Howard: And galvanized iron!

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Yes, and galvanized iron.

In relation to food, UN technical assistance covers a wide scope. It includes protection of plants and animals against disease, discovery of water resources, fish farming for proteins, crop selection, river control and use, population movement into lands newly freed from malaria, use and care of heavy machinery imported to uproot growth too heavy for local methods, and battling the recurrent locust plague. Victory for the locusts has meant famine in the past. But co-ordinated international attacks against the locusts in the past two years have done much to reduce crop damage. The present level of control efforts, however, has not been sufficient to stop the spread of the plague into thirty countries and territories. There are still uncontrolled breeding areas, and swarms sometimes escape even from areas that are thought to be under control. Air-to-air combat has been introduced, and in an experiment last fall, planes sprayed a new chemical on a swarm of locusts that covered thirty square miles and was so dense it could be seen sixty miles away. The swarm was wiped out. This feat led several countries involved to train pilots for their own services, with the result that this year the locusts should get real air battle.

I tell this story because it involves a vast area and because the locust control measures are a distinct by-product of the Technical Assistance Program. By utilizing facilities, the menace can be attacked by joint efforts rather than piecemeal. Equipment, specialists, and locust poison are moved across national boundaries. Previously, a country would try to control the locusts single-handed, but it was found that the pests were breeding in other countries as well. A much better job is now being done by international control. The strategic points across which these movements are made are identified by the Food and Agriculture Organization. All countries benefit, since the size of the attack on the home country is reduced.

The Food and Agriculture Organization staffs a similar regional locust control centre in Central America. It reports that $100,000 spent regionally now achieves better results than $1 million used to when the countries confined themselves to national efforts.

Increasing of food supplies depends, in many cases, on changing the entire living pattern of the growers. In some such cases, all the UN agencies work together under a program described as "fundamental education". Under this rather formidable label experts pool and co-ordinate community efforts to get across ideas on sanitation, water supply, control of pests, new crops, new handicrafts and local industries, co-operative marketing, literacy, etc.

Such a project is under way in an area of Ceylon. In passing, I must say that in Ceylon we have both the UN Technical Assistance program and the Colombo program, which is the Commonwealth plan, working together. Eight hundred years ago an invading army destroyed the area's intricate irrigation system of 5,000 lakes and canals. Jungles moved in to replace a once-lush rice granary. The cultural level sank.

Ceylon began, twenty years ago, an effort to recapture the area. When the UN Technical Assistance program came into being, she called for international help. A fundamental education centre was set up and its influence started fingering out into many fields.

Today, in that area men who never saw a book before are reading crop manuals which the Centre prepared and taught them to read. Boys are excitedly demonstrating to their fathers the value of controlling snails in their rice paddies and using new, improved seed strains. Many of the boys have been allotted small demonstration plots, given them by their fathers under a Junior Paddy Club plan organized by one of the technical assistance experts. Mobile libraries and film strips teach women more healthful methods of food preparation and how to protect their families against intestinal and other diseases. Soap is now being used because technical assistance experts devised a way to make it with local supplies.

I should like to note, incidentally, that these UN experts frequently find themselves in rather trying situations. Two of those in Ceylon were reported in the Ceylon Daily News as having been chased by a herd of wild elephants while making their rounds with one of the mobile libraries. They jumped into their jeep and managed to outdistance the elephants only to have their road blocked by wild buffaloes which forced them into a ditch. Fortunately, they escaped with minor injuries, but undoubtedly they were badly scared.

Increased productivity, another major concern of underdeveloped countries, is approached from many technical assistance angles. One is health. Indonesia gained 2½ billion man-hours of labour by having one million of her people cured of yaws, a crippling skin disease. Malaria control measures in Greece added 30 million man-hours of labour to that country's farms.

In the industrial field, the introduction of new techniques pays off. Some Israeli factories, with UN technical aid, have doubled their output without the addition of a man or machine. As the result of a brief visit by a UN specialist, production in every steel rolling mill in Pakistan has increased by 40 per cent.

Some of these examples may seem peripheral to the main problems of underdeveloped economies. But we must remember that economies are made up of people and shaped by people. Since most of the world's people live in small villages, they are for the most part influenced by those things which touch them at the community level.

Furthermore, the UN is also engaged in major and fundamental aid projects. For example, the Technical Assistance Administration is providing the international staff for a regional training center in railroad traffic control, now operating at Lahore, Pakistan.

This training program grew out of a tour of rail operations in Europe and the United States made by regional rail specialists under Technical Assistance fellowships. Now a number of governments have contributed life-size switches, electronic-control systems and the like to the Centre. Increasing the productivity of present trackage and rolling stock is cheaper and faster than double-tracking Asiatic rail lines, 90 per cent of which are single-tracked. A comparable process is under way in mechanizing Asiatic inland water transport.

A basic need for economic progress in Bolivia is government stability, that country having averaged one revolution every two years for more than a century. Here we see a remarkable UN test-tube in the field of development. In addition to receiving the usual technical experts, the Bolivian government, at the suggestion of the UN Technical Assistance Administration, has employed non-Bolivian experts in government posts to strengthen the services on which economic life depends. These men exercise authority in that government, subject of course to cabinet control. Bolivia is enabled to pay them through a UN grant which covers part of their salaries.

On the basis of advice from this international team, the Government has undertaken land and monetary reforms that required considerable political courage. The Government's tenure has already exceeded the average of two years—I think it is now four years. This experiment is expected to prove an important guide in aiding other underdeveloped countries with similar needs.

The co-ordinated efforts of technical assistance within a country can be the key to unlocking a nation's potential when its people are already tackling their own problems. For example, let me sketch a profile of U.N. aid in Indonesia.

On February 1, 1954, the Technical Assistance Administration had in that country twenty-four experts, of ten different nationalities. Two were Canadians, working in the fields of migration and demography. Other basic fields being serviced were public administration, budgetary control, industrial development, agricultural resources, natural resources generally, national income, housing and labour relations.

In addition, there were experts working in small industries, glass manufacture, ceramics, cotton textiles, leather processing, building materials and starch processing. The corps also included a mechanical engineer, a chemical engineer, and a motor-vehicle maintenance man.

Sixteen men from the International Civil Aviation Organization were helping Indonesia to integrate her 3,000 islands by air communication and transport. The World Health Organization had fourteen specialists working on yaws, malaria, insect control, a nutrition institute, sanitation, maternal and child health, and a tuberculosis centre. In the educational field, five UNESCO experts were helping with the organization of primary, secondary and general educational services. The International Labour Organization was doing a related job in vocational training, occupational health and labour statistics. And from the Food and Agriculture Organization had come specialists in crop production, agricultural economy, forestry, and land and water use.

Altogether there were more than three-score U.N. experts on the spot. In addition a dozen Indonesians were studying abroad as U.N. fellows, another twenty-one had completed such training opportunities and more were scheduled to start on them.

Indonesia, like most countries making sizeable use of U.N. facilities, has a resident representative of the Technical Assistance Board whose job it is to co-ordinate the inter-agency program and U.N. relationships with the Colombo Plan, Point Four and other national programs. This eliminates duplication of effort and stretches each dollar to the maximum.

The success of UN technical assistance is attested by the tributes I mentioned earlier. Indeed, it is the program's success that makes the people who have profited from it want more. And so should we, for we profit too by helping to direct the pace and the nature of change in the world. This is a direct move towards peace throughout the whole world.

We cannot escape the fact that the world is changing. This is due, in considerable measure, to the technological development we in the West initiated. How this movement evolves will be influenced greatly by the extent to which the under-privileged nations feel that we, the more fortunate ones, are concerned about their needs. They are in revolt against hunger, homelessness, ignorance and injustice because they have learned from us that these evils are not necessary.

This is why we appreciate the UN Technical Assistance Program. It is the reason nearly one hundred countries and territories have asked for aid on projects involving more than 3,000 experts and an equal number of training opportunities since the program began.

The 1954 total of pledges to the UN Technical Assistance Program was, as I mentioned, $24 million. This money is provided by the eighty countries, Canada's share being $1·5 million. The countries receiving aid will, as I have indicated earlier, more than meet this amount in local expenditures in addition to being also contributors to the fund themselves. An indication of the relationship may be seen in Pakistan, which has had 245 experts in the past four years working on projects on which Pakistan itself is spending $800 million.

The wide demand for more UN Technical Assistance reflects a growing concern for human welfare as well as for economic progress. Our Canadian appropriation should reflect the same awareness of the humanitarian aspect of this enterprise. And it should be made in fuller reflection of the gain to Canada from association with countries increasingly able to buy our goods, to meet our needs and march with us towards the fulfilment of our common human aims.

The good that the United Nations is doing in this connection is extensive. True, we need peace in the world so as to have time to carry this program to its conclusion. This is possibly a hundred-year program at least, and unless we lay the foundation well the program will never be completed. I feel that our Government, along with all other "have" countries, should contribute to the greatest possible extent, because, after all if we can help to feed and clothe the under-developed countries they are not going to worry about communism.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly, the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEW HOTEL IN MONTREAL—INQUIRY STANDS

On the notice by Hon. Mr. Reid:

That he will inquire of the Government:—

1. Have any arrangements been entered into by the Canadian National Railways for the leasing, when completed, of the new Canadian National Railways hotel in Montreal?

2. If so, to whom, or what company will take over the management of the hotel when completed, and

(a) is the lessee a Canadian concern?

3. Under what terms is it proposed to lease the hotel and what safeguard or guarantees are being taken for the fulfilment of the terms proposed in the lease·

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask when I may expect an answer to this question. I hope the Government will answer it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have not yet received the information. As soon as I receive it I will give it to the house.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You can tell them I am worried about it.

The inquiry stands.

RUSSIAN PROPOSAL FOR PARLIAMENTARY VISITS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to inquire of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) if any plans have been made regarding the proposed visits by members of the Soviet to our parliamentary institutions. I see from a dispatch in the Toronto Globe and Mail, under the heading "Parliamentary visits proposed by Reds", that the Kremlin has suggested that legislators of the world make personal appearances and even speeches in each other's parliaments. I am very much interested, and I would like to ask the Leader what action, if any, will be taken on this suggestion.

If I may be permitted to add a few words, I would say that during the greater part of my life I have been a member of rural councils, school boards, and so on, and doing business with people who came from the various countries forming part of the U.S.S.R. I am firmly convinced that the vast majority of people in those countries are just as desirous as we are to escape the burden of military preparedness, and as anxious as we are for peace. I think the suggestion that has been made is a wonderful one, and I hope that Canada will be among the first to extend an invitation to Russian legislators for an exchange of visits.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The matter which the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) mentioned has not officially come to my attention.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, this is a very good instance of an occasion when the honourable gentleman might well have moved the adjournment of the house —I believe that is the procedure—so that others might say something on the same subject. I mention that only in passing, because so often—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If I may interrupt the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) I would point out that Order No. 2 on today's Order Paper is for resumption of the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and under that order it is open to any honourable senator to discuss the subject which has been mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not if a senator has already spoken in the debate. The procedure mentioned is perhaps rather like burning down a house to roast a pig.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If I may again interrupt, I would point out that even though honourable senators have already spoken on the motion, some member could move an amendment, which would enable any honourable senator to speak on this subject. I fully agree with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity that the subject should be considered, and I am merely pointing out that under our rules there is a procedure whereby it can be discussed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, in the first place I should like to congratulate the mover of the Address, the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). To the Senate chamber, to Parliament and to the country, the honourable lady gave a thorough and encouraging review of the economic conditions and prospects in the province of British Columbia. And when opportunity coexists with the great natural beauty of British Columbia, we must conclude that that province is surely favoured by Providence—

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: —as well as with a new and eloquent advocate of its potentialities.

(Translation):

I would like to congratulate also the honourable senator from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Tremblay), and to tell him how much pleasure I derived from hearing his first speech in this house. His knowledge of the problems of government reflects his long and useful experience in Parliament. His contribution to the debates of the Senate is in line with our best tradition. His admirable mastery of both languages is for us all a source of pleasure and inspiration.

(Text):

Honourable senators, in part the Speech from the Throne stated:

> While there is hopeful evidence that the increasing strength of the free world has lessened the likelihood of aggression, the terrible destruction that war would bring to North America and indeed to all mankind has been magnified by the increase in the number and effectiveness of atomic and thermonuclear weapons and the means of delivering them.
> . . . while the resources of diplomacy must never be neglected in the search for peace, the efforts of the free nations in building their deterrent forces must be maintained.

To further this policy, the Government also announced that it would continue to support the United Nations, that it had accepted its responsibility for the armistice commission in connection with the settlement of the war in Korea, that would continue to support the Colombo Plan and that it would continue to honour its obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

It may be useful at this juncture to review some aspects of the defence policy of Canada over the past ten years. It will be ten years this summer since the war in Europe and in Asia ended. The period has not been one of global war comparable to the previous six years. In those six years death, destruction and well-nigh dissolution were rained upon combatants and civilians both in Asia and in Europe, and at the end of the period new atomic weapons struck terror into the hearts of people everywhere. But if the past ten years have not been a period of global war, they have not been a period of idyllic peace. The decade has been described as an era of cold war. Certainly, it has been an era of rather cold peace. There have been isolated active hostilities like Korea, and threats of more active hostilities in nearby areas in the Far East. There have been pacts between iron curtain countries and countries on the fringe of the curtain which bode no good to the peace of the world. There has been sporadic trouble in other places. Even a casual look at the expenditures undertaken by the Canadian Government for the present fiscal year shows how far removed we are from peace. This year the total Government spending will be $4,390 million, and 43 per cent of this figure, or $1,889 million, will be for defence.

Just a few days ago we concluded a debate in this chamber on the advisability of admitting the Republic of West Germany to membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I think the debate which was conducted here on that occasion was a memorable one. The argument, that to negotiate successfully with the Russians, the Western powers must negotiate from strength, was, I think, irresistible in the form in which it was put by most senators who participated in the debate. After hearing the speeches made by the senators from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) and from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), I thought that to complete the record it might be useful to have something said in this debate which would set out what has been done and what is being done in this country to build up the strength from which negotiations must be conducted. I think for this purpose it might be useful to look, first, at the financial aspects of the armed truce which has obtained over the ten-year period now ending; second, to inquire as to what these gigantic expenditures have produced; and, third, to determine if the accomplishment promotes and has promoted the best interests of Canada.

I may say that my remarks will contain nothing new. They are based upon available records, but the material, perhaps, will be assembled in a manner somewhat different from what is usual. One could find it in speeches made in the House of Commons by ministers of the several departments responsible for this program.

It may be useful to review the extent of the defence expenditures since the end of the war in the background of the Canadian economy as reflected in our gross national product.

Just before the war our gross national product was $5¼ billion. By 1950, five years after the end of hostilities, it was $15½ billion. At the present time it is over $24 billion.

In the year before the war, Government spending on defence was $34 million. In 1944-45, which was the highest year of war expenditures, it was $2,938 million. By 1950, five years after the war, it had fallen to about $385 million. This year it will be $1,908 million.

Let me give the proportion of defence expenditures in these years in terms of gross national product. In 1938 the defence expenditures were much less than one per cent of the gross national product. In 1950, five years after the war, it was 2·3 per cent; and this year, ten years after the war ended, the Government will spend on defence, nearly 8 per cent of the money represented by the gross national product.

With the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard a table giving this information which, I think, might make a perusal of my remarks a little more easily understood. Also with the permission of the house I should like to place on Hansard a further table showing Government expenditures for the services, defence research and mutual aid for the eight fiscal periods beginning with 1946 and ending with 1954. The total spent for defence in this period of so-called peace is over $7 billion—

Hon. Mr. Haig: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I ask whether the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) has the unanimous consent of the house to place these tables on our record?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not hear consent being given.

The Hon. the Speaker: Hearing no dissent, I indicated to the honourable senator from Ottawa West that in my opinion he had the consent of the house.

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Haig: But, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear Your Honour ask whether the consent of the house had been given.

The Hon. the Speaker: I did not ask. As I say, there being no dissenting voice, I indicated to the honourable senator that he had consent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I object to this procedure. I do not think we should allow a private member to place any such tables on Hansard unless they are official documents issued by the Government or a department—by the Bureau of Statistics, for instance, or the Department of Finance. In my experience in this house no other tables of this kind have ever been placed on Hansard in the manner now proposed. It may be that I am wrong in that view, but I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The honourable senator can read the statement.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Of course he can read it, if he wants to, and if he does so, it becomes his own statement. To place it on the record in the manner he has suggested would make this material look like an official pronouncement, and I do not think our practice ever intended to allow that.

I dislike being the only one to object to this procedure, honourable senators, but I do not want to see an undesirable precedent established. It is quite all right for the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to place a statement on the record, since the government is responsible for such a statement. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the estimates, and we have never in this house had a full opportunity to discuss the finances of the government in any one year since I have been here.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Oh, yes, we have.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I assume that the tables which the honourable senator wishes to place on the record are his own, and I can see no reason for excluding them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Mr. Speaker, may I speak further to this point? If we grant permission in this instance we shall thereby establish a precedent, which later on may be cited by some other senator desirous of having perhaps less accurate information placed on the record. I may be alone in my stand, but I do not propose to allow an undesirable precedent to be established.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it occurs to me that if the honourable senator from Ottawa West explains that the statements which he wishes placed on the record were prepared by himself from official statistics, the house might allow them to go in. But it should be made perfectly clear that the statements are from official statistics.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I speak to this matter, on a point of order? I am rather inclined, and with great respect, to differ with my friend the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). Undoubtedly the honourable senator from Ottawa West has the right to read into the record the figures in the statements.

Hon. Senators: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: All he has asked is that in order to save the time of the house he be allowed to place the statements on Hansard without reading them figure by figure.

While the honourable leader opposite is careful, as he should be—and I give him credit for that—in trying to prevent the establishment of a bad precedent, I am concerned about the right of a member of this house to place on Hansard a statement of his own. He needs no authority higher than himself to do so, and we accept his figures because he gives them to us; he does so from his seat in this house, with the responsibility of a member of the house.

Hon. Mr. Howard: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Therefore, I think nothing should be done that would prevent him from achieving his aim, namely, to include as part of his speech a statement which he does not read in detail, but which we may read later at our leisure.

I think the honourable senator from Ottawa West is within his rights, and that to sacrifice those rights would not be in the interests of any member of this house.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks just made by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I object to these statements being placed on the record.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then the honourable senator must read them word by word.

Some Hon. Senators: Read them.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I did not propose to go that far, but the senator from Toronto-Trinity challenged my opinion.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, may I say that in the figures I have supplied so far, I have given information for certain years only, and I thought it might be of convenience to honourable senators if the figures for some other years were also available on the record.

In proposing, as I did, to place this information on Hansard, with the consent of the house, I did not think I was creating an undesirable precedent. I may say that these figures were taken in part from the report of the Department of National Defence for the year ending March 31, 1953, and they can be supported from reliable sources. However, as I believe my speech is clear enough without the addition of this information, I will withdraw my request. May I continue?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I make just one observation, and perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition will reconsider his stand?

I realize that the honourable senator from Ottawa West must have the unanimous consent of the house to place the tables on Hansard. However, if he makes it clear that they contain figures which he has gathered and that they appear in an official statement issued from a department of the Government, I wonder whether the honourable leader opposite might in this instance consent to their going in. I think the statements contain considerable information which might be useful to the house. It is information which the honourable senator has gathered, and to avoid his taking up the time of the house in reading all these items we should, I feel, unanimously consent to the placing of it on the record so that we can review it. We may or may not accept it as correct, but I think we would all like to see it. I agree to some extent with the honourable Leader of the Opposition, but when an honourable senator says he has prepared tables which he would like to appear in Hansard, I think we should consent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable Leader. He has made a gentlemanly and very fair appeal, and I cannot refuse to accede.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding, perhaps I should tell the house what started me on this line of thought. I do not like to see so many senators reading speeches. Some of them may say to me: "That is all right for you, Mr. Haig, because you can make a speech without reading it—in fact you are a better speaker than you are a reader". That is what my honourable friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) tells me all the time; he says, "You are a good speaker but a very poor reader, and it is no wonder you do not read your speeches". I do not think that anybody who reads a speech speaks from the heart in the same way as he would if he were speaking directly. I believe that most people in this country feel we ought to make our speeches from the heart and not read them off a piece of paper. Anybody can get a ghost writer to prepare his speeches for him, but of course I do not suggest that was done in this case. I know the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), and I know that he writes his own speeches. But I do not like the practice of reading speeches at all, and it is getting worse in this house.

Honourable senators, as the honourable Leader of the Government has suggested, I will withdraw my opposition as long as the honourable senator from Ottawa West makes it clear that the figures he intends to submit have been prepared by himself.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, I have already made it clear that these are figures I have gathered from official sources, but they are figures on which I have built the argument which I propose to make today. If honourable senators will consent, I will only be too pleased to put these tables on the record.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the honourable senator the unanimous consent of the House to do so?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, it may be curious to observe that in this fiscal year 1954-55 more money will be spent on defence than was spent in the fiscal year 1945, which was a war year.

I have extracted some figures from a publication called Canada's Defence Program 1954-55 to show the division of the defence expenditures in the present fiscal year. Personnel costs are 21·3 per cent; procurement of equipment 42·3 per cent; operations and maintenance 21·2 per cent; construction 9·2 per cent; civil salaries and wages 6 per cent.

We are all aware that the basic problem for the Government of Canada today is to relate the size of this defence program to Canada's ability to support it. This means that defence spending must be related to the development of the resources of the country and to the economy of the country as a whole. Economy in all departments of government and on all levels of government, as these have been discussed in this chamber and in the Senate's Standing Committee on Finance, plays a most important part in these considerations. Moreover, the defence program must be one which we can maintain for a period of years without overtaxing our economic strength. This is a matter of concern to all of us at home but, since the defence program which we have undertaken is a joint one, conducted with other countries in NATO, the same basic economic problem confronts those other countries. If the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is to be a successful deterrent to aggression, none of the member countries should overreach themselves in their spending for defence. I will have something to say a little later about the importance which the NATO organization itself attaches to this consideration. It is vital to the issue if the strength from which NATO countries are to negotiate or to defend themselves is not only armed strength but economic strength as well.

This is the background of cost of the defence effort of Canada. Obviously the cost is enormous. In our last four fiscal periods we have spent more on defence than all of the government spending on all accounts in the present fiscal year, which amounts to $4,390 million. When 43 cents of every tax dollar goes for defence, the taxpayer must be assured that the expenditure is wise and the money is not wasted.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: It is natural therefore to ask what Canada is getting for this money.

At present the Navy has an active strength of nearly 19,000, the Army of nearly 49,000, and the Air Force of nearly 49,000. The total active strength of our forces is, therefore, 117,000 personnel, and the target, I am informed, is 120,000. This is a considerable drop from the peak enrolment of the war period for the year 1944-45. At that time the Navy strength was over 92,000, the Army strength was over 577,000, and the Air Force 174,000, the total number in the services that year having been 844,000 personnel, or more than seven times the present over-all strength. I do not here discuss the size of the reserve forces which play a part in the present defence organisation.

I am informed that the total number of aircraft of some twenty types now in service with the RCAF is some 2,800. In the past six months the Royal Canadian Navy had an average of 59 ships in commission.

The employment of these forces has varied with the requirements of the times. In the first period under the NATO organization the requirement was to build up defensive strength in Europe. This country has twelve squadrons of the Air Force involving some 5,000 men and 300 planes in the European sector. The role of the Navy in the NATO organization has been to assist in supporting the supply line between Europe and North America. The role of the Army has been to supply the ground forces now so highly mechanized. The first Canadian infantry brigade group is now in Europe and its complement is some 6,000 personnel. In addition to the European commitment Canada accepted a commitment in Korea which involved the employment of all three services. It goes beyond saying that the contribution made there was in the highest of the high traditions of Canada's armed forces. Some 2,000 personnel still are in Korea.

Honourable senators will remember the visit paid to Ottawa last June by General Gruenther, the Supreme Commander in charge of NATO forces in Europe. He then spoke in glowing terms of the value of Canada's assistance in his Command.

The Minister of National Defence spoke in the House of Commons on January 28 last, and he indicated there a change in emphasis in planning within the NATO organization. If the build-up of strength in Europe and the maintenance of the life-line on the North Atlantic was the first target; the second, and now almost as important as the first, is continental defence in North America. This shift in emphasis, he said, has arisen from the emergence of improved Russian thermonuclear weapons and of the capacity of the Russians to deliver these weapons against this continent. Warning lines of extensive chains of radar stations are now imposed upon the NATO strategists for the defence of North America and with them goes all of the organization, especially in air power and costly communications, required to utilize these radar chains to the full.

In this context it is perhaps useful to observe the remarks of Field Marshal Lord Montgomery in a lecture he gave to the Royal United Services Institution in Britain in October, 1954. This is what he said:

> The Air is coming to the front as the decisive arm. This is going to introduce difficult problems, and in solving them do not let us bother unduly about the colour of our uniform,—khaki, dark blue, light blue.

To paraphrase this great Army Leader, it now appears to be an accepted element in defence strategy to employ the various units of the armed services together as a defensive or offensive force with closely knit liaison under a supreme strategic commander. Co-ordinated or combined operations which were so successfully used in the late war are now a commonplace for overall defence planning.

I may say that Canada recognized this need some time ago. The unification of the Department of National Defence under one Minister was one step in this direction. I am informed there is a tri-service policy in effect within the Department for administrative matters as well as for supply, personnel and related problems. The combined training afforded by general service colleges is another, and the training programs within the services has followed the same pattern.

If I have the unanimous consent of the house I would like to place upon Hansard another table, which sets out the proportions in which Canada's defence dollar is distributed among the various branches of our armed services. A perusal of the table will show that for the past five years Canada's defence spending on her air arm has been increased, with the exception of one year, in proportion to the spending on the other arms. I think it would be a matter of convenience for honourable senators to have this information, and of course I place it on Hansard on my own responsibility.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The table is as follows:

Defence Dollar

Fiscal Year	Navy %	Army %	Air Force %	Defence Research & Development	(a) Other	Millions of Dollars
1947-48	21·8	41·1	28·2	8	1	196·0
1948-49	19·2	37·7	32·3	6	4·8	268·8
1949-50	19·1	35·3	35·4	5·8	4·4	384·9
1950-51	15·2	24·8	32·0	3	(a) 28	782·5
1951-52	14·7	28·5	41·8	2	13	1,415·5
1952-53	13·3	27·2	37·6	2·1	19·8	1,882·4
1953-54	14·0	25·0	41·1	2·1	17·8	1,839·7
(b) 1954-55	15·7	23·6	41·0	2·5	16·8

(a) "Other" from 1950/51 on includes substantial amounts for contributions towards military costs of NATO and Canada's Mutual Aid.
(b) Estimates figures.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Canada is well prepared, I think, to accept the proposals of Lord Montgomery.

Honourable senators will remember too that the issue of the unification of the defence forces was a hotly contested problem in the Congress of the United States some years ago. It would now appear to be an accepted pattern.

I cannot attempt to explain fully the high cost of maintaining now forces much smaller than those in being at the peak of the late war. Only a detailed examination of the department's estimates with the appropriate officials present to explain them can really do that job. But it might be helpful to honourable senators were I to give some examples.

One F-86 Sabre Jet costs about $400,000. One CF-100 All Weather fighter costs about $900,000. The great fighter used in World War II, the Hurricane, cost about $50,000. Recently in the United States it was estimated that it cost that country about $120,000 to train a jet pilot. I believe that the cost of this training in Canada is somewhat less, but we can be assured that it is still very high. To operate aircraft of the power of these jet machines, ground forces and air field facilities of new and greater magnitude are required. These are built at greater overall costs and are now being built with dollars of less value than were available before World War II, and perhaps less valuable than dollars that were available during the war.

The Navy is building the most modern destroyer escorts it can devise in shipyards on both coasts and in the St. Lawrence area. Some honourable senators may have visited some of these naval shipyards; if so, they know how fully justified I am in making that statement. The Navy is also modernizing its frigates and mine sweepers with the idea of providing a fast, powerful fleet for convoy duty and to meet the challenge—the terrific challenge—of the new submarine. Turbines are being built in this country and, with the development of new fighting and naval equipment, the costs of all these vessels, whether they are built in Canada or elsewhere, have mounted greatly since the building program of the war came to an end. A mine sweeper now costs about $5 million. The average cost of a comparable vessel built during the war was $1.7 million. The Navy has eight of these in commission, and six building. In commission also the Navy has eight destroyer escorts, nine frigates, two training cruisers and a light fleet carrier.

The cost of providing the Army with its mechanical requirements and its new weapons for the atomic age has increased likewise. Today, I am informed, a Centurion tank costs about $150,000.

So much for the defence forces. I think, however, I should say a word about NATO. The Secretary General of NATO, Lord Ismay, has recently published a book on the history of the present set-up of the fourteen country alliance. While Lord Ismay considers NATO to be revolutionary in its conception, as we do, he thinks it essential to our defence requirements and to the defence requirements of the Western world.

I shall not attempt to outline either the political or the military organization of NATO, but perhaps I should say that one of its problems has been to evolve a formula for expressing accurately the relative capacity of each country to bear defence burdens, and to study the points of special strain in the economy of each country. How successfully this can be done is one thing, but the fact that the problem is receiving continued attention is reassuring. In 1949 NATO had about twelve divisions, 400 aircraft and a proportionate number of naval vessels. Today the NATO forces number some 100 divisions, both active and reserve, and the air forces and the navies have increased proportionately both in numbers and in quality.

I note with satisfaction that extensive liaison on the military level is maintained by this country on its own account with the United States and the United Kingdom in particular, and with many other countries as well.

I shall make no extended reference to the substantial mutual aid program which Canada has conducted since 1950 and upon which she has spent over $1,100 million. This has been part of the defence expenditure and is related to the NATO program. Armament, ammunition, aircraft engines, transport vehicles, communications equipment, and aircraft, as well as training facilities in Canada, have been accorded to countries like Belgium, Denmark, France, Italy, Holland, Portugal, Turkey and others. I say little, however, about other efforts made to promote peace and the means whereby peace can be maintained by our active participation in the work of the United Nations and by our contributions to the Colombo Plan. There has been criticism of the allegedly small extent of Colombo Plan participation by Canada. The contributions which have been made—and I know we all approve of them—have been worthy ones and have been deeply appreciated by the recipient countries, but again the question of our ability to pay must always engage the active attention of those who are concerned with maintaining the strength of our economy—and that includes every member of our Parliament. We cannot afford to overstep our defence spending or our mutual aid spending.

I believe the Defence Research Board, which was established in 1946, merits mention. It has particular regard for the best employment of Canadian resources in defence and for the unique defence requirements of this country as a North American nation. It co-operates closely with similar boards in the United States and in the United Kingdom. In the past five years we have spent $187 million or more for this work. The Board is under the direction of an eminent scientist, Dr. O. M. Solandt.

When Mendes-France spoke in Ottawa to the Canadian Club last fall he singled out for special praise the importance of Canada's contribution in the field of atomic energy. Honourable senators will recall the very informative discussion by Mr. W. J. Bennett, President of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and of Eldorado Mining & Refining Limited, before the Banking and Commerce Committee of the Senate last session. He discussed not only the defence aspect of the program but as well the peaceful or civilian uses of atomic energy. The atomic energy program, of course, is in addition to the defence expenditures. The report of the company has already been circulated to the members of this house and a perusal of that report will show not only the parliamentary appropriation of over $8 million last year, but other aspects of the company's financial undertaking.

In passing may I make this additional observation. The magnitude of our defence expenditures over the past decade has been very great. I think, however, that we must realize the contributions it has made to the strengthening of our economy. Through the Department of Defence Production, just as through its predecessor, the Department of Munitions and Supply, impetus has been given to the development of industrialization here, to the establishment of new plants and plant facilities, and to the development especially of new skills. These have been essential for defence purposes, but they have also added greatly to the economic power of the country. During the past four or five years the total new private and public investment in Canada has represented some 22 to 25 per cent of the gross national product. At the present time it is estimated that some 25 per cent of the total investment in durable physical assets like new plant, housing, machinery and equipment, is devoted to outlays on strategic resource development, including hydro-electric power, petroleum, natural gas, minerals, pulp and paper, and chemicals. Support for this statement can be found in the budget papers attached to the House of Commons Hansard of April 6, 1954.

In view of the high level of debate we had in this chamber on the West German Treaty, it would be tedious were I to elaborate on the third branch of this speech—namely, the justification of this country's defence effort this year and for the past decade. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that behind the iron curtain men are at work, resourceful in the pursuit of their ambition and ruthless in their methods. Physical science has given to them, as it has given to us, weapons of a terrifying character; weapons which can destroy the materials of our ancient civilization, force which can disperse our cultural heritage. Scientific progress is a great achievement for a people, but of itself it exercises no influence of control or moderation. Technology must be modified by morality, or the people perish. Government cannot legislate morality. It can legislate defence. It can legislate for war. Morality must spring from the minds of the people. It must be based upon a sound ethic. But in the interests of self-preservation, and perhaps of the preservation of the human race, we must be prepared, with those who think as we do, to defend ourselves.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, the subject of my observations this afternoon has not been mentioned in this debate, and I realize that what I shall say may be quite controversial. Perhaps that will be a good thing, if it leads to a further discussion of a vitally important matter.

My sole purpose in taking part in this debate is to voice my concern—and I believe the concern of many Canadian citizens—at the newly announced policy of our neighbours to the south with regard to what might be termed "the Formosa question"—a policy which carries within it, I believe, the risk of war, which in this atomic age might mean the destruction of civilization as we know it. And I hope that the Canadian Government, as well as the British Government, will set their faces against it.

Although I am a great admirer of the United States—as I believe all Canadians are—I am inclined to think we are just a little too prone to follow their lead on too many occasions; in other words, that we are a sort of tail to their kite. Upon second thought, perhaps that is not a very good metaphor, because the tail of a kite at least influences the course of the kite, and I think that Canada's influence upon United States' policies is practically negligible. If I wished to give an example, I would say this: I believe Canada would have followed the example of Great Britain—or acted on her own initiative—in recognizing China diplomatically, had it not been that she feared the displeasure of the United States.

Thus to criticize the policy of a friendly country may, by some, be regarded as an interference in what is none of our business; but today, with the world as it is, the business of almost any country, in an international sense, is the business of every other country. I say that for this reason: If as a result of the policy which it has announced the United States got into a war with China and a general war ensued, Canada would almost inevitably be drawn into it. True, we might perhaps delay for a while our entry into a war started by the United States, or in which the United States took part, just as they delayed their entry into the previous two wars.

What is the situation with regard to this policy of which I speak? The President threatens military action if Red China attempts to occupy the coastal islands or Formosa. I read in a magazine the other day that the United States has been on the verge of war within the last ten months—I need not give instances—and that it has been only through efforts of the President himself that the country did not get into war. He now seems to have reversed his position.

Many of us well know that some of the leading statesmen in the United States have advocated the dropping of bombs immediately—I think on either China or Russia—for the purpose of starting a "preventive" war.

I remember that when World War I was near at hand I did not believe it would really happen, for I did not think the world was foolish enough to go to war. But it did. When World War II became imminent, I said, "Surely the world has learnt its lesson, and will not repeat the folly." Well, the world did go to war again, and we know the condition it was left in when hostilities ceased. This time, I hope I am wrong when I say, in reverse, that I fear that out of this policy of the United States there is a risk of another war getting started.

I was talking with some of my colleagues last evening, and we discussed this matter of the danger of war. One of them said, "There is no danger of China going to war; she is afraid to go to war against the United States". Then something, perhaps in the nature of a simile, came to my mind. I am not a poker player myself, but I think I am right in saying that the game was invented in the United States. Possibly my friend across the way could tell me if that is so. The American people are good at poker, but there is just a possibility that the United States is starting a poker game with the wrong people, as so often has been the case.

The world forgets that the China of today is not the China of 25 or 50 years ago, when she was weak, disunited, corrupt, after having been exploited for years by the Western nations. China today is united as never before. She feels her power and thinks she is backed up by Russia. It was reported in this morning's papers, I believe, that Russia has stated that she is behind her ally, China.

Whether we like it or not, we have to reckon with that situation.

China, having driven Chiang Kai-shek off the mainland, is convinced that she is entitled to incorporate as part of China the islands along the coast and Formosa as well, for without a doubt these islands inherently belong to China. She believes that intervention by the United States is interference in China's affairs; that is, in what she regards as a civil war. That being her sincere conviction, is it not possible that she will persist in her efforts to take possession of what she naturally regards as her own? Then, if the United States carries out the policy proclaimed by the President, the United States will start a shooting war; possibly Russia will come to the assistance of China—and there will be another world war, with all that an atomic war portends, a suicidal world war in which we ourselves will become involved, for we will not be able to escape it.

I cannot understand why the United States is so insistent upon Formosa. I sat in a theatre the other day and saw projected on the screen a picture of President Eisenhower, who stated, among other things, that Formosa was necessary for the security of the United States. With all due respect to the head of a great nation, I thought that was a most far-fetched statement. Formosa is 10,000 miles away from the United States, on the other side of the world. It is entirely unnecessary for the United States to have possession of Formosa in order to prevent China, or Russia, from using that island as a jumping-off place, if you like, to make an attack on Australia or any other country. China can launch an attack from the mainland. To try to substantiate the position that the United States needs Formosa for that purpose would be like saying that for her own security she ought to have possession of the island of Newfoundland, or Vancouver Island or perhaps the Queen Charlotte Islands. Similarly, Russia might say that if the United States needs an island 10,000 miles away from her borders, when she already has Russia ringed about with airports, then for her protection Russia ought to have possession of Cuba or some other island near the United States.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But Great Britain still believes she should hold on to Gibraltar.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Yes, but two wrongs do not make a right, nor are the two situations quite comparable. The point I have been trying to make is, that if the United States thinks this is the time at which communism should be arrested, I would say she is a little bit late. Further, it is my conviction that communism will never be stopped by acts of war.

Perhaps I have not expressed myself clearly, but my further point is that whether or not we believe that China has a valid claim upon these islands, the challenge to her involves a risk for which the possession of Formosa cannot even remotely compensate.

I have with me an article from the last issue of Life magazine which states clearly what an atomic war in these days would mean. I would like to quote from it, and I hope the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) will not think I am reading my speech. The article, which includes a statement by General MacArthur, whom we all know, begins in this way:

On his 75th birthday last week Douglas MacArthur made perhaps the most eloquent address of his eloquent career. His subject was war and the necessity of abolishing it. He traced the history of this evil old institution from David and Goliath to the modern "triumph of scientific annihilation." War has so developed, he said, that nobody can win one any more. . .

So why start one?

I continue reading:

"Science has clearly outmoded it as a feasible arbiter." He then went on to list the glorious results if war could in fact be abolished—"the greatest advance in civilization since the Sermon on the Mount."

And further:

"Must we fight again before we learn? When will some great figure in power have sufficient imagination and moral courage to translate this universal wish—which is rapidly becoming a universal necessity—into actuality?" . . . "We have had our last chance. If we will not devise some greater and more equitable system, our Armageddon will be at our door."

And there was this editorial comment:

Now MacArthur is not only quite right, but in very good company in repudiating modern war. The Pope agrees: "a war of annihilation", he has said, "is not permitted for any reason whatsoever." Eisenhower agrees: "this horror must not be."

I fear he has gone back a little in his attitude.

Churchill agrees: it "would leave us victorious, but victorious on a heap of ruins." Adlai Stevenson agrees: "no physical peril greater than atomic war has confronted mortal man since the Flood." Even Malenkov agrees: "a new world war would mean the destruction of world civilization."

We can get no higher authority for what atomic war would mean. In view of these declarations, I say we should avoid even the slightest risk of getting into a holocaust which would destroy the world.

Perhaps it is not necessary to read further, but may I include these words:

Thus the novelty of MacArthur's speech was not in what he said, but in how and when he said it. He said it in a way that placed the blame on men in office: "The leaders are the laggards. The disease of power seems to confuse and befuddle them."

The reading of that article should bring home again to senators the enormity of atomic war, the serious results it would have, and the fact that we art not justified, for the sake of the possession of Formosa, to take the risk of throwing Canada into a war. If we support the policy proposed by the United States, we are literally playing with fire, small as the risk may be in the minds of some people. I realize that the United States has taken a position from which national pride will make it difficult for her to retreat. We can only hope that China will not take up the challenge, and that, if she does, both parties will come to their senses before it is too late.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Pratt, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 15, at 8 p.m.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. M. Aseltine presented Bill O-6, an Act respecting Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Wednesday, February 23.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS AND FREIGHT RATES

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to ask the following questions of the Leader of the Government:

What is the average cost per bushel of shipping grain from
(a) Winnipeg;
(b) Head of Great Lakes;
to Liverpool via
(a) Vancouver;
(b) Montreal;
(c) Halifax;
(d) Churchill?

2. What amount of grain was shipped in the current year of 1954 through each of the routes (a), (b), (c) and (d)?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I shall endeavour to get the information for the honourable gentleman. I am sure he does not expect me to have it on hand at this moment.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: It would be in order to treat it as a notice of inquiry.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 10, consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, I would like to speak at this time to the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

First, may I offer a word of congratulations to the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) upon their very fine presentation to the House of the various matters arising out of the Speech.

The Speech covers a very wide range of duties of Parliament, both as applying to matters of provincial interest and those of national concern. At the beginning of these remarks, I would particularly like to refer to the meeting of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers, which has just concluded in London. During the period of those meetings the world was shaken by events which were not anticipated when the meetings were proposed. The importance of these events can only be appraised as time goes on. It was singularly fortunate that the leaders of our Commonwealth of Nations were together and able to consider the momentous issues that with dramatic suddenness commanded world attention. It is gratifying that Canada has reached a place of high recognition in world affairs, and we have every reason to be grateful for the self-sacrificing services of our representatives. I am sure that the high honour which was paid to the Prime Minister of Canada recently by the great City of London, in recognition of his valued and devoted service, finds a grateful and appreciative response from all the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I am sure that feeling prevails irrespective of race, creed, or political affiliation.

These are indeed serious times. Things that happen today may be causing, even in the near future, repercussions of a magnitude which no one today can estimate. This is a time, honourable senators, for balanced thought and speech, and for balanced planning and effort. It is a time for right perspectives. If we become too absorbed in local issues, and allow them to dominate our thinking, we can lose the opportunity to render our full measure of constructive aid in this world of misunderstanding and conflict. Similarly, if we pass up the obvious duty to resolve our local difficulties, and fail to plan and legislate for the progress and advancement of our people in every part of Canada, we deprive ourselves of a solid foundation for contributing unitedly to the advancement of justice and freedom throughout the world.

We are indeed fortunate that in Canada tradition, practice and the outlook of our people safeguard us from being torn asunder by extreme and fanatical approaches to national and social problems such as we observe in so many places throughout the world.

I think the Speech from the Throne preserves a balance which is commendable. It emphasizes the great part that Canada is playing in the council of the nations, and, while it strikes a note of world responsibility, at the same time it covers a wide range of needs at home.

I have spoken before in this house of the need for greater encouragement to the fishermen of my province; in fact, it is probable that every time I have spoken I have mentioned one phase or another of the fishing industry. The Speech from the Throne anticipates legislation to provide facilities for loans to fishermen similar to those provided for farmers by the Farm Improvement Loans Act. While the appropriate time to comment in detail will be when the bill comes before us for second reading, I would like to say now, however, that the general conditions applying to fishing are so vastly different from those applying to farming, which that Act is designed to serve, that I really do not think the same pattern will work for the fishing industry and particularly not in Newfoundland.

The farm loans are made through the chartered banks, and a maximum amount of any one loan is $4,000, with the banks being guaranteed by the Government up to 10 per cent of the total amounts that are loaned. In other words, all the loans are pooled and 10 per cent of the total pool is guaranteed. That is as I understand it. I presume the limit of $4,000 was fixed because of the purchases of farm implements and such like, but I think that loaning facilities with a maximum of $4,000 would be of very little use where deep sea fishing boats are employed. Investment in the industry has been turning more to the larger and expensive craft.

Another aspect I would mention is that the fishermen of Newfoundland are scattered in a thousand settlements over perhaps 4,000 miles of coastline. The areas most prominently engaged in fishing are not well provided with connecting roads.

There are, I think, forty-five branch banks in the province, and only a small number of those are situated where such service is most needed to help the fishing industry. Prospective borrowers will no doubt get to the banks, but it will be almost impossible for bank managers and inspectors to be in touch with the borrowers for the purpose of overseeing their collections and supervising their security. I feel certain there will not be the coverage which the fishermen should get. I do not know what the feasible approach is, but it seems that some guarantee to a loan board under the auspices either of the provincial government or some other agency with personal contact and inspection facilities, will be the more practical means. There is no use in building up people's expectations of assistance of that nature unless it is made available in a widespread and practical manner. Perhaps in areas other than Newfoundland such a plan as used by the farmers may be feasible in the fishing industry, but if so it is simply another case of Newfoundland requiring special treatment for special circumstances. As I have pointed out on other occasions, Newfoundland is an area for special consideration in many matters because geography, history and other factors have made it so.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I interrupt the honourable senator to ask whether the Government guarantee to the banks is not 15 per cent rather than 10 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: As I understand it, the Government guarantees 10 per cent of the loans.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My understanding is that it guarantees 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: If I am wrong in that respect, I stand to be corrected.

Last week I listened with great interest to the honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) speak of the great value to Canada of the agricultural industry. It is indeed of great importance. All the primary production industries must have watchful care and guidance and, where essential, varying forms of assistance. Fisheries is the one production industry more than any other that until recent years has been in the background. Science has only lately come into this sphere of activity. It was the earliest industry in North America established from Europe and perhaps the most neglected. The honourable senator spoke of the great future need for increasing food production because of increasing populations. I cannot think of any means of food supply which should be more carefully guarded and progressively developed than the fisheries around our coasts. The great fishing centre of the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, as well as the areas along the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador, are amongst the most prolific sources of food with rapid reproduction in the world. Unfortunately, the most precarious condition in the industry today in Newfoundland arises from the difficulty of holding the fishermen to their occupation. By reason of low returns, particularly in the salt fish industry which occupies most of the Newfoundland fishermen, the younger men are leaving, and those remaining are mostly the fathers and grandfathers. There can be only one result to that drift if it is allowed to continue. It must be remembered that once fishermen abandon fishing they are gone to stay. The fishing industry is one that can only recruit from those who are born of the sea.

One anomaly that is apparent today and is voiced by fishermen on every hand is that the labourer on the land who handles the product of the fisherman's venturesome life at sea gets unemployment insurance when he is laid off work, but the fisherman himself, who is restricted by nature to a seasonal occupation, receives no unemployment insurance when he is laid off. Fishermen in consequence of this become discouraged, feel they are treated unfairly and lose interest in their vocation. I know there are great difficulties in working out a plan to fit their circumstances, that is, if we endeavour to apply a formula which is set up for the use of citizens in entirely different circumstances. On the deep sea fishing boats some of the crew might be employed on wages and qualify for insurance, others might be employed on wages augmented by shares and presumably would also qualify for unemployment insurance. The vast majority of fishermen in Newfoundland however, are their own employers.

I have no cut and dried plan to submit, but it may be useful to present some views which should be kept in mind by those who will be working on the problem, which I sincerely hope they will find some way of solving.

Fishermen should be encouraged to develop their own independence and own their boats, while at the same time they should have available to them a social security measure in the nature of unemployment insurance or some near adaptation of it. There would have to be some method of determining the number of days which a self-employed fisherman actually has worked in a given period. The length of a fishing season for the purpose of such a measure should be determined in advance of the fishing season for different areas. It varies with different areas. Nothing should be done to reduce the incentive for fishermen to take other work in the off season. Of most importance is it that there be the incentive for fishermen to work for the greatest possible production and for the longest period of fishing.

We are thinking in terms of insurance, unemployment insurance. No one needs to be reminded that insurance is an averaging out of risks and losses paid for within the range of total premiums collected. With unemployment insurance, the employees who are most constantly at work contribute most to those who are laid off. Ordinarily, there is of course the employer's contribution, which in the case of self-employed fishermen will be lacking.

It seems to me the approach—and I know serious study is being given to this now and representations are being made by our province—will have to be made by starting with a voluntary plan. Premiums could be paid by authorized deductions from payments for fish delivered to purchasers who will be responsible for turning in the collections. Perhaps what might ordinarily be an employer's contribution could, in cases where there is no employer, be paid as an assistance allowance by the Government; or alternatively, if it were feasible an export tax on certain types of fish exports might be made for the purpose of rounding out the contributions to the fund. Newfoundland at one time had a small export tax on fish for a somewhat similar purpose. To get something practical started it might indeed have to be inaugurated as a joint insurance and assistance plan, and not simply as insurance in the accepted meaning of that term.

I wish indeed I could offer something more concrete and complete but the matter requires careful study and consultation between those most directly concerned, namely, the representatives of the fishermen and the departments of Government. I feel very strongly that the fishermen need the encouragement of some such measure of security so as to hold them in the industry.

I would personally like to have seen in the Speech from the Throne a statement of policy with regard to the encouragement of more freedom of trade between the nations of the world. I refer to the lightening of tariffs, the stabilization of currencies, and so forth. No reference whatever is made to the necessity for continued effort in the removal of trade barriers. It will be regrettable if that ceases to be a major policy of our Government. I know, of course, that we have a policy. I know it is being pursued through various agencies and channels. Such policy, to be effective, must reach right down to the very core of our economic problems, not only here but over the world and must be incessantly and constantly pressed.

Canada has a place to fill as a world leader in the moulding of opinion, both at home and abroad. It is here that balanced thought and balanced action are required. We cannot afford to ignore our own requirements, neither can we afford to heed all the demands of all our industries and of all sections of our population. If we were to take seriously all the cases for tariff protection from all the industries and agencies which are circularizing, members of Parliament we would find ourselves in a tight pocket of the world and—worse than living by ourselves—we would starve by ourselves. The greatest things of life are acquired by sacrifice. It is true we must apply that thought in moderation and with care, but it is a factor in human life, and always will be. We must give if we are to receive.

I for one feel that we have not done enough in this country to cultivate wider understanding and improved trading relations with our neighbours to the south. I know how tariff-protection-minded they can be, as we can be also. We should constantly be trying for a closer economic policy of mutual benefit. We should be preaching it so as to reach down to the average citizen, and they on the other side of the border should be encouraged to do the same. Here again, if I may say so, we need balanced thought and balanced effort. We need more balance in our approach to this subject than we seem to have here.

One sometimes hears this subject discussed in Parliament and outside—everywhere, in fact—as though we had to decide between Commonwealth affiliations and loyalties and American associations and neighbourliness. To my mind that is sheer nonsense, and it does an immense amount of harm. Unfortunately there appears to be throughout the world a growing misunderstanding and misrepresentation of the motives of America. It is becoming increasingly prevalent in countries that are near and dear to us; and this, I consider, is a world misfortune. It is true that it does not come out prominently on top official levels, but it is increasing on the street level—if I may put it that way—which is more important.

Now I don't think there is any fear that Canada will be drawn into adverse feeling against our neighbour, but there is a danger of our going along in a neutral position. There is no place for neutrality marked out by a boundary across this continent. There is only a place for the cultivation of mutual helpfulness and understanding and for more recognition that from benefits which are mutual come the greater good.

I do not say that we should go along with our neighbours hand in hand in all matters. Even their states differ, as do our provinces, in policy and outlook. That, however, does not lessen the need and value of our working together toward the closest possible understanding, both in the sphere of foreign responsibilities and of what I might term interdomestic matters.

I would like for a moment to comment on the remarks of the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), who was the last preceding speaker in this debate. I really think some of the things he said have not helped in the mutual understanding which is so essential. Knowing the honourable senator, I am sure he spoke his honest convictions, as he has a right to do, and with the deep feeling and desire to see what is the best and wisest course to pursue. As reported in Hansard, he used the words:

> Then, if the United States carries out the policy proclaimed by the President, the United States will start a shooting war.

These words of the honourable senator were, I assume, his interpretation of the professed fears of Communist China.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is exactly what the President said.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I don't agree with that interpretation. And, without taking anything out of its context, I think it will help to clarify that issue if I quote from President Eisenhower's message to Congress of January 24, 1955, as reported in the New York Times of January 25:

> The most important objective of our nation's foreign policy is to safeguard the security of the United States by establishing and preserving a just and honourable peace. In the Western Pacific a situation is developing in the Formosa Straits that seriously imperils the peace and our security.

Another quotation from the same address:

> In the interest of peace, therefore, the United States must remove any doubt regarding our readiness to fight, if necessary, to preserve the vital stake of the free world in a free Formosa, and to engage in whatever operations may be required to carry out that purpose.

Still further, and finally, I would quote:

> Again I say that we would welcome action by the United Nations, which might, in fact, bring an end to the active hostilities in the area. This critical situation has been created by the choice of the Chinese communists, not by us. Their offensive military intent has been flaunted to the whole world by words and by deeds. Just as they created the situation, so they can end it if they so choose.

Now that policy was overwhelmingly endorsed by the Congress of the United States. The House of Representatives proved that by a vote of 409 to 3, and the Senate by a vote of 85 to 3. It is my conviction that if war breaks out over the Formosa question the blame will lie, not with the United States but with the government of Communist China.

The United States has issued a warning, not in order to threaten war but in order to maintain peace—to maintain peace by making it absolutely plain to the Chinese Government that aggression against Formosa and the Pescadores will mean war with the United States.

In other words, without that warning the Chinese Communist Government could precipitate a major war by attack, in the mistaken belief that her aggression would not be taken seriously. If she does attack now she will be the aggressor in a major war, and she knows it. The fact that those islands are ten thousand miles away, as the honourable senator put it, does not, as far as I see, greatly affect the case. Australia, New Zealand, The Philippines—to mention a few of what I might term "near home areas"—are just as far away geographically. Distance on the map doesn't mean much today.

Science—and it may be for the ill fate of the world—has eliminated distance as a factor in human relations. Whether we like it or not we are unable to travel country roads any more to avoid the crowds.

It wasn't so many years ago that the great criticism of the United States in some areas of the world stemmed from what was regarded as its policy of isolationism. It is ironical that its abandonment of that policy and its active pursuance of a policy of participation in world affairs is now the cause of growing prejudices in the same areas of the world.

Without attempting in any degree to present more than the most elementary facts in the matter of Far East policy, I would like to say the United States has adopted a conciliatory attitude as compared with the bellicose attitude of the Peiping Government. The United States has bent over backwards, in my opinion, to avoid war out there in the East, if possible. First, by its influence, Chiang was induced to surrender the Tachen Islands to Peiping, and then the United States rendered assistance to the Nationalist Government to evacuate the islands. Then again, and what was most important, the United States voted in the Security Council for the New Zealand resolution to invite Communist China to participate in a United Nations debate to discuss ways and means of establishing a cease fire agreement in the Formosa area and of finding a peaceful solution to the Formosa question. That was on January 31, but the invitation was rejected by China on February 3—notwithstanding that Russia as well as America allowed it to go through.

I have just been reading the report which the honourable senator from Cariboo (Hon. Mr. Turgeon) gave to this house on February 8, 1951, on the work of the Canadian Parliamentary Delegation—of which he was a member—to the General Assembly of the United Nations just previous to that time. It would be well worthwhile for all of us to refresh our minds on the conditions then prevailing at the height of the Korean issue by reading that most comprehensive and enlightening report by the honourable senator.

To show how true to present pattern ran the attitude of the communist Government at that time, I quote from the statement of the honourable senator:

> Acting as head of the Canadian delegation, Mr. Pearson presented a motion, which was adopted by the General assembly, to set up a committee to study the question of what group should represent China in the General Assembly; that is, whether the representatives of Nationalist China or Communist China should be recognized.

The quotation follows on:

> But the Chinese communist group refused to meet this committee.

The same attitude has been repeated time and time again. As I see it the alternatives are: Is the world to be allowed to be dragged into a war on a flood tide of appeasement, which will whet the appetite of the aggressor, or isn't it better for the whole world to know where in such extreme cases the border lines of peace and war are, also where the defences are, but above all pray and hope and work without ceasing for understanding and reconciliation of the difficulties?

Honourable senators, I have referred in this talk to the benefits of more intimate association with our neighbour to the south. I have tried to indicate how they can extend and make even more valuable our loyalties in the British Commonwealth. Now that doesn't mean we have to go along just as a mouthpiece for the United States. Such an attitude would not be useful nor dignified. Neither is the often repeated expression of fear of falling under American domination useful or dignified. To my mind such an expression is sheer folly. I think it reveals an individual weakness of thought and I certainly hope it is not a national attitude.

Yes, honourable senators, our Commonwealth relations, our Australia and New Zealand members out there in the East particularly, will be helped in these times by the growth of the greatest possible degree of understanding between us and the United States.

May I close by mentioning a personal incident which I feel will be of interest as illustrating a growth of friendliness. Last year I spent a few days at Atlantic City, and while there I noticed the press announcing "Canadian Day". It puzzled me, but not for long, for I received and accepted an invitation to attend the ceremony of hoisting the American and Canadian flags in a public square of the city. It was done in a thrilling ceremony, with a band playing national music of both countries. I was then asked to attend a luncheon with many other Canadians. The big banquet hall was filled with guests. The mayor of the city spoke of the significance of "Canadian Day", and quite unexpectedly I was asked to receive the honours of the occasion on behalf of Canada and was presented with a key to the city, symbolic of their hospitality.

I found that "Canadian Day" is an annual event in that city. I was told some other places observe it also. In my response to the honour I said I hoped the example of Atlantic City in having an annual "Canadian Day" would spread throughout the entire United States and that we on our side in every city and town of Canada would have an annual "Our American Neighbour Day". It is an idea that I hope will spread widely through both countries. The example would do good, far beyond the bounds of the American continent. There is no other way, honourable senators, to resolve international difficulties than by cultivating international friendships.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, this is the first time during the present session—perhaps fortunately—that I have risen to express my opinions and to discuss the very important matters that are before us.

Quite naturally, I believe that the defence program that has been suggested will have the full approval of the Canadian people, who, after all, are nobody's slaves—and have no desire to ever become slaves.

I have listened with a certain amount of pleasure to the speeches by honourable senators on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and particularly to the definite tone of approval that has permeated the entire discussion as to our defence program. However, somewhat to my amazement, I have also listened perforce to what has sounded to me like suggestions of appeasement.

I have a vivid memory of former appeasements, particularly that of Munich, which as we well know did not prevent Great War II.

Although it is a matter of record that our friends in the United States were very slow to take up arms in both Great War I and Great War II, I well remember a cartoon—I think it was published originally in St. Louis—which was reproduced far and wide. Like all good cartoons it was very simple. It merely showed Mr. Chamberlain's umbrella staked across the road, but the caption read, "They shall not pass".

Now we are asked, sixteen years later, to repeat the appeasement performance. An article has been quoted to us from Life—a magazine definitely noted, not for its sane pronouncements, but rather for its picture propaganda directed to men and women who, even if they cannot read or understand, can look at pictures. On the other hand, I have taken some trouble to find out exactly what the intelligent Press has to say on the subject and on the pronouncements of President Eisenhower himself. Many people will agree with me when I say that I believe the communists will keep trying to add peoples and territory to their empire by internal subversion, as long as their efforts are profitable, as they have been both in Europe and Asia. The United States and its allies, on the other hand, will keep trying to counter these tactics by perfecting their system of alliances and by helping underdeveloped countries.

The Formosa crisis provides a good example of what the President's basic thinking and policies are designed to do. It looks to me as if he is playing for a stalemate in Formosa. He hopes, by moving up his air and naval strength, to make it impossible for the Chinese communists to launch a successful attack on the island. In the meantime he will do everything in his power to work for peace through diplomatic channels. And I, for one, pray to God that his efforts will be crowned with success.

Honourable senators, I believe those words are a true estimate of what is happening, and I for one must refuse to agree to or have any part in another appeasement program which in fact could be as disastrous as that of Munich.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ROMAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF PEMBROKE—SECOND READING

Hon. Charles L. Bishop moved the second reading of Bill A-6, an Act respecting The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke.

He said: Honourable senators, The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke was incorporated by chapter 105 of the Statutes of 1884, under the name of The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pontiac.

The only amendment to the original Act of Incorporation is contained in chapter 108 of the Statutes of 1899, where the name of the corporation was changed to that of The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Pembroke.

The corporation's purpose in requesting the present amendment is to enable it to give its guarantee to bodies like religious organizations, institutions, schools or school boards and the like. Frequently, such organizations, operating in the diocese, and with the approval of the Episcopal Corporation, require support for financing their enterprises in the manner contemplated by the amendment. Section 2 of the bill is designed to give the corporation these powers of guarantee. A later part of section 2 is a provision which will by retroactive operation permit the Episcopal Corporation to guarantee certain financing already accomplished by a school board.

There is a parliamentary precedent for giving retroactive effect to a statute in a similar case in "An Act Respecting the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada and the Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada", which may be found in the Statutes of 1951, chapter 34, section 7. This, of course, was approved by this house.

The other provisions of section 2 and the provisions of section 3 of the bill are designed to facilitate and bring up to date the procedure of the corporation in the management of its temporal affairs, and they deal with the appointment of committees, the passing of by-laws and the like.

These provisions are similar to the provisions contained in "An Act to Incorporate the Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Whitehorse", Statutes of 1945, chapter 48.

If the bill should receive second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. The representatives for the Episcopal Corporation will be available then to supply the committee with whatever additional information it requires.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bishop, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

FARM LOANS

GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE TO BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I should like to make an explanatory statement with reference to a point that came up last night when I took part in the debate on the Address.

In referring to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which was amended in 1953, I said that the banks are guaranteed by the Government up to 10 per cent of the total amounts that are loaned. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) then suggested that the Government guarantee was 15 per cent. Not having a copy of the act before me, I conceded that my honourable friend might be right. Now I have a copy of the act, as amended in 1953, and in order to keep the record straight I will read the new section 4(1):

> The minister is not liable under this act to pay to a bank, in respect of losses sustained by it as a result of farm improvement loans made by it during any of the periods set out in subsection two, a total amount in excess of ten per cent of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed farm improvement loans made by the bank during that period.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, what the honourable gentleman says is correct, but I would like to point out that there are in existence two acts having to do with farm loans. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, which authorizes loans on building improvements and so on, the Government guarantee to the banks is limited to 10 per cent. But under another act, which I think covers farm machinery, I understand the Government guarantee is 15 per cent. I have written to a bank for detailed information in this matter, and when I receive it I will raise the point again, on a question of privilege. If it is proved that I am wrong I shall be glad to acknowledge the fact.

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I thank honourable senators for the encouragement they have given me. It took me some time to make up my mind whether I should take part in this debate, but finally I came to the conclusion that as there are so few of us on the Opposition side of the house, perhaps I should say something.

Honourable senators, I am not going to congratulate the mover (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the seconder (Hon. Mr. Tremblay) of the motion, because I am afraid that if all of us congratulated them it might go to their heads and destroy their usefulness in this chamber. However, I wish to say that in my opinion they conducted themselves in a very creditable manner and as ably as those who have followed them.

A few days ago the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) made what I think was a very courageous speech. Of course, he had every right to express the views that he expressed at that time; certainly the Senate provides facilities to all honourable members for the expression of their views. I had fully intended to reply to the honourable gentleman, but in view of the remarks made yesterday by the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) and the honourable senator from St. John's (Hon. Mr. Baird), I do not feel that I need say anything on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is a great relief to me.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: By my concurrence in the remarks of the honourable senators from Newfoundland my position will be understood, and I need not commit myself further.

I should like to thank the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) for his invitation to all senators to visit Prince Edward Island this summer and to attend the centennial celebrations at Charlottetown. The "summons" from the mayor which the honourable gentleman read out to us, was a neat bit of advertising. I read it again in Hansard with much interest.

May I take advantage of this opportunity to remind the house that just fifty years ago Saskatchewan ceased to be a part of the Northwest Territories and became a province. This summer my province will be celebrating its golden jubilee, and I would extend to my friend from Prince and to all other honourable senators from outside the province a very cordial invitation to come along and join with us at that time. I might add that we have not yet found it necessary to use a form of summons to compel anyone to attend, but if it becomes necessary we will no doubt do so. At any rate, I trust that some honourable senators from the central and eastern provinces will make the trip west and give us the pleasure of showing them around Canada's great wheat-growing province.

Another event to take place this year in Saskatchewan is the Dominion play-offs for the Macdonald Brier Canadian Curling Championship trophy, at the Regina rink during the first week in March. My honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Haig), who is Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the organization, will be attending. I of course would like to attend too, but he tells me that I should stay here and look after things in the Senate during his absence. I hope he will have a good time at the games and come back in better shape than ever.

When the honourable Leader of the government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) spoke in this debate he said that the total number of people employed in the week ending December 11, 1954, was 5,167,000. The honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), during his speech in the debate, questioned that figure and suggested that if it was correct it must include self-employed persons. I took the trouble to secure the breakdown of those figures, which honourable senators will find in Table 5 of the December issue of The Labour Force, a publication of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It is as follows:

Self employed	999,000
Unpaid family workers	214,000
Paid workers drawing salaries or wages	3,954,000
	5,167,000

Hon. Mr. Reid: Have you any idea how the Bureau of Statistics obtains those figures?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Do not ask me. The other day I passed the new Dominion Bureau of Statistics building, located in Tunney's Pasture, and noticed that it was a very large, imposing place, so full of people that perhaps they counted themselves in the statistics.

Hon. Mr. Reid: They were able to tell us how many balloons were manufactured in Canada last year.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Another subject I wish to touch on at this time is the amount of income tax paid by the farmers of the Dominion of Canada. That has long been a pet subject of mine. I brought it up on two previous occasions, and I showed that in 1950 the wealthy potato growers of Prince Edward Island altogether paid only $5,000 in income tax, and that the farmers of the Province of Quebec paid only $50,000. I wondered how that could be, and so I followed up the subject again this year to see if there was any improvement. I stated previously that the western farmers, who pay most of the income tax collected from Canadian farmers, wanted to know why this is so. They felt that either the other farmers were not taxed sufficiently or that the western farmers were over-taxed. Honourable senators will understand that they had no objection to paying the tax, but they wanted to make sure that other farmers were being taxed accordingly.

I know the senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) will say that in the East the farms in general are small and the farmers do not make much money, and that is why they do not have to pay much income tax. I was surprised to hear him say the other day that the average yearly income of all Canadian farmers was only $565.

However, there has been some improvement in the matter of taxation of farmers since I gave the house figures previously. The taxes paid by farmers in the various provinces for the taxation year 1952, the latest year for which figures are available, as given in Taxation Statistics 1954, were as follows:

Newfoundland	nil
Prince Edward Island	$ 70,000
Nova Scotia	40,000
New Brunswick	66,000
Quebec	233,000
Ontario	2,647,000
Manitoba	1,707,000
Saskatchewan	13,268,000
Alberta	8,350,000
British Columbia	1,075,000
	$27,456,000

The total income tax of $27,456,000 paid by all the farmers of Canada is relatively small in comparison with the huge amount that is collected from the whole country. This bears out to some extent the statement by the honourable senator from Kennebec that the income of farmers was considerably lower than the income of industrial workers and other people.

From these figures it is evident that the farmers of the three prairie provinces pay six times as much income tax as all the rest of the farmers put together; and that those in Saskatchewan, who pay $13,268,000, contribute almost half the total income taxes received from Canadian farmers.

Hon. Mr. Euler: They should not make so much money!

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: May I ask the honourable senator a question? It is very hard to make a fair comparison between people engaged in the same occupation but living in different places. For instance, one cannot, I suppose, compare a large city chain store with a little store in the country.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What is the question?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Farmers in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and elsewhere down east who cultivate a little land, are in a different position from the large farmers of Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not the question. I understand the honourable senator's argument; I have heard it before; and I appreciate his viewpoint. I think one of the reasons why farmers in the West pay so much more than farmers elsewhere is, not that they make so much more money, but that they are checked up more carefully than are farmers in other parts of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am told that some fifty revenue officers—we call them tax inspectors—are continually moving around the province of Saskatchewan. Of course, when a farmer sells a load of grain, it goes to the Wheat Board, whose officials have a record of the transaction; so the revenue officer finds out exactly how much income the farmer has received, and taxes him accordingly.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Perhaps these people need a little more watching!

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I wish the department would send some of our fifty inspectors to Ontario, Quebec and other provinces to see what they could find down there.

We on the prairies are very much concerned about the present high level of taxation. Fifteen years ago I paid a tax of twenty-five cents an acre on my farm lands.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The municipal tax.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The tax per acre is now about one dollar. In the towns the tax levy has risen to around seventy mills on the dollar. We have to pay income tax, sales tax, luxury tax, and all the rest. I do not know just where these things are going to stop, but if the small crop we had in 1954 is followed by another small one this year, we will not be able to pay our taxes. Federal demands should be kept to the minimum, but from past experience I fear that this is too much to hope for.

Another feature of income tax I would like to stress is the effect of the so-called arms-length clauses of the act. At the time of their adoption, when they were fully explained in this chamber by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), some of us took strong objection to these provisions. As far as the western farmer is concerned they are not working out very well. Let me give an example. Suppose an elderly farmer, say, between 65 and 70, who wants to retire, sells his machinery and equipment to his son. As the parties are not at arm's length, the deal is scrutinized very carefully. The son, let us say, has depreciated the value of the machinery so purchased to the amount he paid for it. Then the income tax officer comes along and says: "You cannot do that, you are not at arm's length; the depreciated value of that machinery is the value it had when you bought it." Taught by the experience of his neighbour, what does the next farmer do? He hauls his machinery to the local implement agent, who purchases it, and turns round and sells it to the son, so avoiding the arm's length provision. It should not be necessary to go to all that trouble. The same procedure operates when a farmer sells his land to his son or some other relative. There is no way of fixing the value for purposes of taxation.

Many people who have contemplated doing that kind of thing have consulted me to find out how they could protect themselves. "Well," I said, "the director of income tax will not help you; he won't tell you whether the deal you propose would be approved; that is, whether he thinks you have got enough for your land. All you can do is get affidavits from real estate men and others as to the value of your property, and you should hold those affidavits, maybe for years, because you cannot tell when some official may come along and say: "This was a deal not at arm's length; the land was sold for less than its value, and you must pay gift tax on the difference." I should like to see some method evolved whereby a farmer or other person who makes a deal not at arm's length can be sure that it will "stand up" and be approved by the taxation authorities of this country. I recall a recent case where a son made a deal—a bona fide deal—with his father, who was retiring, to buy his equipment. After six years the transaction was reopened by the department, which took exception to the amount of the depreciation, with the result that the party in question has to pay about $5,000 in additional income tax. If, however, the father had sold the equipment to a local dealer, who in turn had sold it to the son, it would have been treated as an ordinary sale, and depreciation would have been admitted on the basis of the amount paid for the equipment.

That is all I have to say at the moment with regard to income tax.

The Succession Duty Act is soon to be revised. In my opinion it is too complicated and too difficult to administer. I doubt whether many members of this chamber are familiar with that statute. It provides an exemption from succession duties on any estate under the value of $50,000. In other words, no tax is levied if the net value of an estate does not exceed $50,000. On the other hand, if the net value of the estate exceeds $50,000—whether it be just $51,000 or $52,000—the tax applies to the whole amount; but no matter what the amount of the duty is, the department always leaves the estate at least $50,000. I should like to see the act amended so that no tax would be levied on the first $50,000 of an estate, for most of the estate goes to widows and children anyway. I feel that the first $50,000 should be absolutely tax free.

It must be remembered that we are living in a period of inflation, and the Canadian dollar will not buy any more today than would 50 or 60 cents a few years ago. On that account the exemption of $50,000 is not large enough. In my opinion, it should be increased to $75,000, and I hope that when the Government studies the question it will see fit to extend the exemption to this amount.

Honourable senators, I was appointed to this chamber to represent the wheat growers of the West, and I never feel that I have made a proper or complete speech until I have said something about wheat.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Last month the honourable gentleman from Peterborough West (Hon. Mr. Duffus) gave the house a fine address on Red Fife Wheat. Since that time I have read his speech with great interest. I have also read a recent article in the magazine Lifetime Living which gives a complete story about wheat, and some of the remarks I am going to make now have been extracted from that article. I am not claiming them as my own.

The story of wheat is the story of civilization. One acre out of every seven of cultivated land on the earth is sown to wheat. Wheat occupies more space on the earth's surface than do rice and corn, and there are 15,000 known strains or different kinds of wheat. Wheat is the most drought-resistant cereal plant known to man. Incidentally, that is my own assertion, for that has been my experience through many years of farming and growing wheat in Saskatchewan. Some people have asked me, "Why don't you raise cattle or grow oats and barley and go into mixed farming?" and my reply has been that if you cannot grow wheat you cannot grow these other grains. Despite the fact that the Palliser Triangle enjoys only about seven or eight inches of rainfall in a summertime, we farmers of that area are able to grow a pretty good crop of wheat. I am not speaking about fringe areas to the north or in Manitoba where barley, oats and other grains are grown, or about places where there is a greater rainfall. The farmers of the Palliser Triangle would go into bankruptcy in a short time if they went into mixed farming on a big scale.

Wheat, which as I have said is the most drought-resistant cereal plant that we know of, ripens from the Poles to the Equator, from sea level to even the 11,000-foot Himalayan slopes. One or more varieties of wheat will grow successfully in the hottest and coldest of civilized countries and in some of the driest.

A large quantity of wheat is grown in Canada, and not a single moment passes but wheat is being marketed or harvested in some part of the world. For example, wheat is grown in North Africa, Egypt, Turkey, the Balkans, Belgium, India, and so on. Except for France, which has been a wheat exporter from time to time, most of these countries do not grow more than enough wheat for their own needs, and sometimes not enough; and it is to such countries that exporting countries like Canada, the United States, Australia, and the Argentine look for markets for their surplus wheat supplies.

I learned from the article in Lifetime Living that bread as we know it was accidentally discovered by a baker in Egypt some 5,000 years ago. Prior to that time the people mixed flour with water or milk, and baked something like pancakes. It was not known that dough would rise, until one day this baker happened to leave some moist dough exposed to some microscopic air-borne yeast. When he returned he found that the dough had started to rise, and when he took it out of the oven he had, instead of one small pancake, the equivalent of about half a dozen loaves of bread. From then on the people of the world baked bread as we know it today.

Wheat created farms and cities. We always say out West that our farmers built Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Howard: There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There would not have been any Winnipeg had it not been for the farmers and the wheat growers of the Prairie Provinces. I am told that it takes eight square miles of uncultivated land to support one hunter, but the same eight square miles of land, when ploughed and cultivated and sown, are capable of supporting 6,000 people. I hope that I am not boring my audience.

Hon. Senators: Go on.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have some more information that might be of interest. It is acknowledged that wheat is vital to the economy of not only Western Canada but of the whole nation. When we have a good crop and are able to sell it the Western farmers can buy machinery, clothing and the other things they need to live, and thus the whole country prospers. In the West farmers could not get along without machinery, and we could not have produced these great crops of wheat if it had not been for the invention of the McCormick reaper. Prior to that time harvesting was done laboriously by hand, either with the scythe or the sickle. Sixty-four man hours used to be required to harvest one acre, but the McCormick reaper does the same amount of work in two and a half hours.

When I was in Italy, a year and a half ago, I found that farmers were using the old method of harvesting, and that in a field of about an acre there would be from ten to twenty people at work. The women were using a little sickle to cut the wheat, and they were tying up the sheaves with stalks of wheat. Between the cities of Rome and Florence, all along the coastal plain, we saw only one binder and one tractor.

I want to make some remarks now about the different types of wheat, and the difficulties that had to be overcome by cerealists, government officials and others. The first enemy that wheat farmers had to contend with was the Hessian fly. It was followed by the sawfly, the cutworm and the wireworm. Drought and frost have always been destructive. Now we have rust to contend with. At the turn of the century the Hessian fly destroyed practically all of the crops of the United States year after year. A man by the name of Mark Carleton happened to notice that certain Mennonite farmers had good crops, so he went to see them, and found out that they had got their wheat from Russia. He went to Russia, brought back samples of wheat from the Russian plains, and started to distribute the samples to farmers throughout the United States, with the result that crops were much better. Then he went to Siberia, and brought back a hardy variety of Durum wheat, which he distributed to the farmers of North Dakota, and from that grew up the macaroni industry in the United States.

We have all heard about the important work done by David Fife. The story I was told was not exactly the same as that told by the honourable senator from Peterborough (Hon. Mr. Duffus). My version may be absolutely wrong, but I will relate it as I heard it. I understood that Red Fife wheat had its origin in this way: A Scotsman, standing on the docks in Glasgow, watching a ship unloading wheat from Poland, caught a hat full of the wheat out of the spout, and sent it to David Fife in Ontario. Perhaps from now on the stories of the honourable senator from Peterborough and mine will be the same. David Fife, not knowing this was winter wheat, sowed it in the spring, and all died except one or two stalks. They were saved and from them he developed this great strain of wheat which became known as Red Fife, which for many years was responsible for giving the farmers of Ontario—and also, in the early days, the farmers of Western Canada—good crops of wheat. Although it was a good producer, it was a late variety and therefore subject to frost.

William and Charles Saunders started to work to find a type of wheat that would ripen a week or so earlier. Through a letter received from a missionary in India they learned of a strain of wheat which grew and ripened 11,000 feet up on the Himalayan mountains. Charles got samples of that grain, known as Hard Red Calcutta, brought it to Canada and started to experiment by breeding it with Red Fife. He had a long, hard struggle, and at one time, in 1903, he was down to one stalk, which fortunately he was able to save. From that stalk he developed the favourite strain known as Marquis wheat, which ripened six days earlier than Red Fife, and was also a heavy yielder. In spite of what my friend from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) or anybody else may say, the West really grew up on Marquis wheat. I grew it myself for twenty years, until the thirties, when rust started to develop, and from that time we grew a strain known as Thatcher wheat, which was developed in North Dakota and later brought to this country. Most of us have been growing Thatcher wheat right up to the present time. But during the last two years a new form of rust, known as 15-B, has attacked the wheat crops in Western Canada. It blows in with a southeast wind from the United States. The spores come from the barberry bush. Last year the southeast winds blew for three months almost steadily, carried the spores into Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and practically destroyed the whole of our crops. At any rate, it was the poorest crop we have grown in the last twenty years.

To go back a little, I find in the records this statement, that a man by the name of McMurachy, at McConnell, Manitoba, not long ago went into a field of badly rusted wheat and found one stem that was not affected. He gave the straw to his daughter, and she lost it somewhere in the field, but after a search they found it. He then turned it over to a cerealist, who crossed it with Exchange and Redman and produced what we now know as Selkirk, which is almost, though not entirely, a rust-resistant strain. I saw some of it growing last summer, and although it had some rust on the leaf it had none on the stem. I am told by my honourable leader that in Manitoba Selkirk produces as much as thirty bushels to the acre. On the other hand, Thatcher wheat which we are growing on better land in Saskatchewan, produced only about ten bushels to the acre, and that is feed wheat.

My honourable leader also showed me a letter from a friend who said he had 3,000 bushels of Selkirk wheat and could not sell it in Manitoba, because the farmers there had no money—which is perhaps a little hard to understand. Of course he could not sell it across the border in the United States, for that would contravene the regulations of the Wheat Board. I suggested that if the Manitoba grower put an advertisement in the Rosetown Eagle he would have no trouble selling his wheat up there.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: In spite of the income tax?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not suggesting that we have reached that stage yet, although before I conclude my remarks my honourable friend will understand that we are rapidly approaching it.

The farmers in the Prairie Provinces have for the most part been prosperous up to the present moment, because in the years 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953, they had big crops, and a surplus was built up. The quota system of marketing came into effect, and no matter how close a farmer lived to a town or an elevator he had no advantage over the farmer who lived ten or twenty miles away; each farmer in those years was given a quota of two, four or perhaps five bushels per acre. In 1954 the total quota issued to the farmer was seven bushels, which did not give him an opportunity to market much wheat and forced him to fall back on his reserves. However, he had been able to market a considerable quantity of 1953 wheat the previous year, and this enabled him to borrow money at the bank.

The 1954 crop was badly rusted, gave a light yield and graded very low. The initial payment on feed wheat is 80½ cents per bushel. With the four-bushel quota now in effect, a farmer cannot obtain much money by selling at 80½ cents. For instance, if he has a 160-acre farm—and under the quota system he must take into account his whole cultivated acreage—he would be able to market only 640 bushels, which would yield him slightly over $500. Under those circumstances, the farmers in my part of the country are something like the farmers referred to by the honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt)—their income is going down and they are getting hard up. However, I hope their income never falls to the low figure my honourable friend mentioned.

That, briefly, honourable senators, is the history of wheat growing which I wished to bring to the attention of the house.

I should like to register an objection against the practice of the Government, the newspapers, the grain companies and the wheat pools of estimating the wheat crop yield about the first of July each year. Last July, while we were being flooded out by rain and the southeast winds were blowing in the rust spores, I for one was certain we would have no crop at all. But just at that time out came the monthly reports from the Government, the newspapers, the grain companies and pools stating that Western Canada generally was going to have another 600 million bushel crop. What happened? While prices were prevented from sagging by reason of the controls in force, the importing countries quit buying wheat. They decided that if Western Canada was to have another 600 million bushel crop, when there was still a surplus from 1953, and even from 1952, they would not buy at that time. They did not buy, and the farmers have not sold much wheat.

While in Winnipeg in September, I talked with one of the big grain companies who sends out such reports, and their first question to me was, "What is your estimate of the wheat crop?" I replied, "I would first like to know what your estimate is". They gave me their figure, which was below the Government estimate by 100 million bushels or so. I said "You are just 100 million bushels too high", and they laughed at me. They pointed out that they had reports from their elevator agents all over the country. Well, it was not very long until the company came out with its final report, and their estimate then was considerably lower than mine.

I object to these reports being sent out too early in the year before an accurate estimate can be made. They only serve to harm the whole grain trade seriously.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the honourable senator care to give an estimate now for the coming year, on soil conditions?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am not that good a prognosticator.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But you have had a lot of experience.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will say this, that we have had plenty of moisture. Although we have not had a heavy snowfall, all the low spots in Western Canada are still full of water from last year's rains, and we do not think we will suffer from lack of moisture. If we can combat the 15-B rust we might have another good crop.

These crop reports, about which I have been talking, frequently contain erroneous information. We have been told that right now there is a surplus of some hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat which have not been marketed. To a large extent that information is wrong. My understanding is that there is practically no old wheat in the province of Manitoba or in the eastern part of Saskatchewan. While in the area from which I come there is considerable, the quantity is nothing like what we are led to believe it is. I noticed that the Winnipeg Free Press, in its issue of January 31 last, admitted that the grain on the farms had been overestimated by 61½ million bushels.

Hon. Mr. Horner: You can double that figure.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) says, that is just about half of the over-estimate. My estimate is that there are not now any more than 200 million bushels of wheat in storage on the farms awaiting delivery to the elevators.

I would call the attention of honourable senators to an article in yesterday's Montreal Gazette which gives quite a complete story of the present wheat situation. According to that dispatch, in the 1952-53 crop year Canada sold 392 million bushels of wheat; and in 1953-54—that is, from August 1, 1953 to July 31, 1954—she sold 288 million bushels, a decrease of 100 million bushels. The article goes on to say that there is some improvement in sight for this year, but the predicted increase in world wheat exports of 5 per cent over the previous year will not help Canada very much, because her exports would still be not more than those of the previous year, 288 million bushels. To support this the Gazette cited figures showing that from August 1 to December 31 last year Canada exported 117,200,000 bushels of wheat, or 4 million bushels less than the quantity sold in the corresponding period in the previous year, whereas during the same time the United States had an increase in exports of 20 million bushels.

I am hoping that we will be able to sell all of our surplus wheat at a fair price. Our price is away below that in the United States. On February 8, 1955, the price of wheat at Portal, North Dakota, was $2.25\frac{3}{4}$ per bushel; and just across the border at North Portal, Saskatchewan, it was $1.23. The price of $1.23 was for No. 1 wheat, and represented the initial payment only. The Wheat Board makes additional payments from time to time which, after deductions for transportation and other charges, may net the farmer a selling price of $1.50 or $1.60.

Hon. Mr. Horner: There is storage.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Storage has to be deducted before the final figure to the farmer is arrived at.

We are sorry that apparently the British market has been lost—perhaps not entirely, but to some extent—and we hope that it will be regained. We would press the Government to take all steps possible under the circumstances to recover that market, because if there is no market for this wheat the effect upon the economy of Canada will be very depressing.

For the information of honourable senators, I would say that right now in addition to wheat stored on the farm, totalling 200 million bushels, the country and terminal elevators are full, and there is still more stored in box cars and in the holds of ships tied up on the Great Lakes until spring. Honourable senators can see that we still have a lot of wheat, possibly more than we can sell, and I therefore press the Government to take whatever steps are possible, not only to regain the wheat market with Great Britain but to sell to Japan, the Orient and all other countries where it is possible to find a market for our wheat.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Howard, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS

INQUIRY

On presentation of petitions:

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, at this time I should like to ask the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) whether this is not the last day for the receiving by the Senate of petitions for private bills.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I must admit that during the comparatively short period I have been a member of the Senate I have not examined our Rules with respect to the time limit for receiving petitions for private bills. I have left this matter to others, and therefore I am not in a position to answer my honourable friend's inquiry.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My information is that today is the last day for the filing of petitions. If that is so I want to be assured that no further divorce petitions will be accepted.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure that the Clerks at the Table are familiar with the rules, and if this is the last day for filing they would not be empowered to receive further petitions after today without a direction from this house.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is correct.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I beg to move that when this house rises today, it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEW HOTEL IN MONTREAL— INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Reid inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of January 25:

1. Have any arrangements been entered into by the Canadian National Railways for the leasing, when completed, of the new Canadian National Railways hotel in Montreal?
2. If so, to whom, or what company will take over the management of the hotel when completed, and (a) is the lessee a Canadian concern?
3. Under what terms is it proposed to lease the hotel and what safeguard or guarantees are being taken for the fulfilment of the terms proposed in the lease?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The new hotel at Montreal will not be leased. Canadian National Railways, on November 8, 1954, signed a management contract with Hilton of Canada, Limited.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. The management contract covers the operation of the new hotel based on a carefully developed formula covering a percentage division of profits after payment of all costs of operation. Adequate legal safeguards are contained in the contract.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session and the motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, seconded by Hon. Mr. Tremblay, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Charles B. Howard: Honourable senators, at the outset of my remarks may I be permitted to join with those who have preceded me in congratulating the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). I wish to congratulate not only the honourable lady herself, but the Province of British Columbia upon having sent such an illustrious personage to join the galaxy of representatives of that province who were already in this house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Translation):

Hon. Mr. Howard: I hold in high esteem the senator from Lauzon (Hon. Mr. Tremblay), who seconded the reply to the speech from the throne. When I was a youngster, I had the good fortune of living with his family at St. Malachie, where his father was our manager and I know I met then one of the worthiest French Canadian families that I have ever known. I rejoiced when my colleague was elected to represent the riding of Dorchester in the House of Commons, where I sat with him, and even more so when he was appointed to the Senate. He started at the bottom of the ladder and he has made his own way to the position he occupies today. I congratulate him upon his speech and upon his success.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

(Text):

Hon. Mr. Howard: I wish now to say a few words, with which I am sure everyone in this house will agree, by way of congratulating the Speakers of the Senate and House of Commons upon the splendid reception held in this building in honour of the Queen Mother during her visit last November. Never in my thirty years of parliamentary life have I seen a ceremony better arranged and carried out.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I should also like to thank our good friend the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), and also the Prime Minister, for having named me as a delegate to the United Nations during the past year. I am sure all members of this house join me in the hope that in the very near future the Western European Union will become a fait accompli.

May I also say a word or two about the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs? It is sometimes not considered proper to praise people while they are living, but after my experience with Mr. Pearson at the United Nations last year I want to say that we have in him a man of whom all Canadians can rightly feel proud. He knows nearly everybody connected with the United Nations, comprising some sixty member nations. He is a diplomat of rare talents, and a gentleman in the true sense of the word. In short, wherever he goes he is an outstanding representative of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne this session contains something of interest to every single Canadian citizen, in whatever stratum of life he may be. However, I intend to confine my remarks to three of the subjects dealt with in the Speech.

The first of these is the United Nations, concerning which the Speech says:

> Our country continues to give full support to the United Nations. The Canadian delegation took an important part in the deliberations of the recent meeting of the General Assembly in New York. It is earnestly hoped that the adoption of the resolution on disarmament introduced in the political committee by the Canadian delegation may lead to agreement on an effective system of international safeguards.

The second part of the Speech which I will discuss reads as follows:

> During the summer arrangements were completed to permit the navigational facilities of the St. Lawrence River to be enlarged and a hydro-electric project to be undertaken in the International Rapids section.

The third subject to which I will refer is the National Housing Act, 1954. It is not necessary for me to quote what the Speech says on this.

Now, dealing with the United Nations, I will begin by reading from the remarks made at the opening of the General Assembly by Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> This is the ninth year in which we have come together from all corners of the world to discuss and try to solve international problems in the hope which is not realized often enough that by doing so we may ease international tensions and promote human progress.
> The United Nations like other human institutions is developing its own traditions, its own techniques. It has had its successes and its failures. Perhaps a disproportionate amount of attention has been devoted to the latter, which are indeed not so much the failure of the United Nations as an institution as of the peoples and Governments which make up its membership.

As honourable senators know, the United Nations has been in existence for nine years. When our good friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) was a delegate to the General Assembly its meetings were held some miles out of the city of New York, but during the last four years the meetings have taken place in the new building that is the permanent home of the United Nations.

The site for the building was donated by John D. Rockefeller, Jr. It was valued on the assessment roll of the City of New York at $6 million, though it was in probably one of the worst sections of the city. At that time it was occupied by a number of buildings, and these were torn down. The land extends from 48th Street to 42nd Street and from First Avenue right to the East River; and to avoid interruption of the view and traffic congestion, the East Side Drive passes under the buildings. Also, through traffic has been taken off First Avenue: it goes underground at Forty-first Street and emerges at Forty-ninth Street. Consequently traffic in front of the United Nations Buildings is mainly confined to United Nations business. The United States Government considered that from a world standpoint it was important that the meetings of the United Nations should take place in the United States—a view with which I entirely agree—and therefore it loaned to the United Nations $65 million for the construction of the present buildings. As some of you know, these premises consist of the auditorium or assembly hall, the conference building, and the quarters for the Secretariat. Some countries made donations towards the construction of these buildings. Canada provided, at a cost of $75,000, the special nickel alloy entrance doors situate at the north end of the building. So those who go as visitors to United Nations headquarters enter and leave by doors which our country has donated. There are 3,000 people in the employ of the Secretariat, which, as is generally known, is headed by the Secretary-General, Dag Hammarskjold. At the present time the membership consists of sixty countries. Twenty-one others have applied for admission. Because the members of the Security Council other than Russia would not consent to admission to the United Nations of North Korea, Mongolia, and other Communist countries, Russia placed a veto on the entry of Italy, Japan and some other states. Therefore none of the twenty-one countries has been admitted. It rests with the Security Council to recommend for or against the admission of any applicant nation, and only in the Security Council may Russia or any of the "Big Five" exercise the power of veto. Otherwise the various issues are settled on a straight majority vote basis.

This year when President Eisenhower proposed his disarmament and atomic energy programs, a move was at once made to refer the proposals to the Security Council; but this move was blocked by a majority vote and the proposals were dealt with on their merits in the General Assembly. Had they gone to the Security Council the power of veto would have been applied.

As a member of the "Big Five", China has a seat on the Security Council, but it so happens that Formosa China holds the seat, and Red China will not have anything to do with the United Nations until Formosa China is kicked out. It is a question whether Formosa China or Red China should occupy the seat allotted to China. My personal view is that both should be given seats. I certainly would not kick out the Formosa Chinese, and I would not block admittance of Red China.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I interrupt my honourable friend to ask him whether the term "Formosa Chinese" is now being used at the United Nations to describe the Nationalist Chinese?

Hon. Mr. Howard: That is right. I have used the term "Formosa Chinese" to be sure that we do not confuse Nationalist China with Red China.

The Security Council consists of eleven members, five of whom hold permanent seats. These are the "Big Five"—the United States, the United Kingdom, Russia, France, and China. The remaining six member nations are elected for two-year terms by the General Assembly and are not eligible for immediate re-election. Canada served two years on the council but is not a member at present. Another Commonwealth country is serving on the council now.

The Security Council meets whenever required to consider a threat of peace; for example, its members have recently been called together to discuss the Formosa and Red China problem.

The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations consists of sixteen members, all of which are elected. Canada has also served a term on this council, but is not at present a member. This council meets two or three times a year.

The United Nations has many specialized agencies, the most important of which include the World Health Organization, the International Labour Organization, and the Food and Agriculture Organization. These agencies operate independently in their own fields but have working agreements with the United Nations. Canada belongs to all of them.

It might be said that there are five branches to the United Nations: the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, the General Assembly, the five Committees, and the Secretariat.

Each nation is entitled to send five representatives and five alternates to each session of the General Assembly, the purpose being that every nation should be represented on each of the five committees. I shall elaborate on this later.

Canada's delegation to the Ninth Session of the United Nations last year, was headed by the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, as Chairman, and the Honourable Paul Martin, as Vice-Chairman. An accomplished bilinguist, Mr. Martin had a fine way of getting on with some of the adversaries we ran across. Our other delegates were D. M. Johnson, permanent Canadian representative to the United Nations in New York; G. D. Weaver, Member of Parliament for Churchill; Lucien Cardin, Member of Parliament for Richelieu-Vercheres; Mrs. K. G. Montgomery, Edmonton; Charles Stein, Q.C., Under-Secretary of State; K. P. Kirkwood, then of the Department of External Affairs and now Canada's Ambassador to Egypt; Stuart Hemsley, of the Department of External Affairs, and myself.

Earlier in this debate the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) suggested that Canada should be represented at the United Nations meetings by members of all Opposition parties as well as by members of the party in power. Last year, the Government invited all parties to name parliamentary observers to be attached to the Canadian delegation, and the following attended as such: T. H. Ross, M.P., Andre Gauthier, M.P., A. R. Lusby, M.P., J. L. MacDougall, M.P., all of the Liberal party; Roland Michener, M.P., of the Progressive Conservative party; A. B. Patterson, M.P., of the Social Credit party; and M. J. Coldwell, M.P., and Clarence Gillis, M.P., of the C.C.F. It is my opinion that the number of observers should be increased to include five senators and at least twenty members of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I would also suggest that each year new observers be sent, so that as many Members of Parliament as possible will be able to see at first hand what goes on at the United Nations. Sometimes members of the Senate and of the House of Commons find difficulty in handling certain questions, even though we can all speak the same language. We may differ in our way of thinking, but when we are unable to agree upon something we can at least agree to disagree. But the United Nations is made up of sixty nations, whose representatives speak a great variety of languages, and when you walk into a lounge room and hear one group talking French, another English, another Chinese, another Spanish, and so on, you begin to realize that it is very much more difficult for them to arrive at a common understanding of things than it is for us. In the United Nations quite a conglomeration of peoples have got together to try to do business, and it takes plenty of time to iron out the many difficulties, especially when each committee strives for unanimity in its reports, which must go to the General Assembly for approval. In the General Assembly any single person can disagree with a committee report and, by a two-thirds majority vote, the report can be thrown out. Incidentally, this did not happen last year.

Honourable senators, I want to pay tribute to our staff at the United Nations. I have never met a brighter and better informed group of young men than the Department of External Affairs officials who make up that staff. It was the practice for all members of the Canadian party to meet each morning in the common room at the Beekman Tower Hotel, where a representative of each committee would give a report on what had happened the preceding day. By this means we were kept completely posted as to what was going on in the various committees; and whether you were an observer or a delegate you had the right to express your opinions and offer suggestions.

I want to pay tribute also to the delegates who went to the San Francisco conference nearly ten years ago. At that time the representatives of Canada—my friend the honourable senator from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King), who is sitting right in front of me now; the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, who was then Minister of Justice; the Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, M.P., and the late Gordon Graydon, M.P.,—did a splendid job in helping to create the United Nations Organization.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I hold in my hand the agenda of last year's General Assembly, containing sixty-seven items. The agenda allots certain items to seven committees of the Assembly: First Committee, Political; Second Committee, Economic—on which I was chairman of the Canadian delegation; Third Committee, Social and Humanitarian; Fourth Committee, Trusteeship and Non-self-governing Territories; Fifth Committee, Administration and Budget; Sixth Committee, Legal; and a Special (ad hoc) Committee, which is usually set up each year to share the political work.

I have before me a list showing the assessments of member countries. The annual net budget of the United Nations is about $40 million. Each country except the United States is assessed in proportion to its national income. The United States, however, which might pay more than half the budget if strictly assessed according to its national income, is limited to 33⅓ per cent of the budget, because it was decided that no nation should pay too large a share. In business, that method is known as a "cut-off". Of course, if more nations could be admitted to the United Nations the cost of each country's contribution would be reduced.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Who determined that cut-off, the United Nations or the United States? I believe it was the United States which decided that no country should contribute beyond 33⅓ per cent, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Howard: That is right. It was thought at the time that if the United States were allowed to contribute its full proportion of about fifty per cent of the total cost, it would have too much to say in the affairs of the United Nations, and for that reason the cut-off of 33⅓ per cent was stipulated.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Are not some of the countries in arrears?

Hon. Mr. Howard: None at the present time.

In 1955 Canada will be paying 3·63 per cent of the United Nations' budget, or roughly $1,400,000. The U.S.S.R. pays 15·08 per cent, or more than four times as much as Canada. The United Kingdom pays 8·85 per cent. Thus, Russia pays almost twice as much as the United Kingdom. It might be of interest to honourable senators to know that the Canadian payment averages just over ten cents per year for each citizen. The percentages given do not include contributions made through the United Nations to voluntary programs of relief and assistance to under-developed countries, to which all the countries pay as much or as little as they wish. Canada has a very good record of voluntary contributions. For example, so far Canada has paid $7¼ million to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, approximately $3½ million to the United Nations Agency for Palestine Refugees, nearly $9 million to the United Nations Children's Fund, and $3,400,000 to the United Nations Technical Assistance Program for Under-developed Countries. The Technical Assistance Program was dealt with by the honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen) the other evening.

Hon. Mr. Horner: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Do the figures for Russia include the Ukraine and all the Soviet Socialist Republics?

Hon. Mr. Howard: The percentages do not include the amounts of money contributed to the various relief organizations. The money which Canada has paid, in most cases, has been used for the purchase of supplies in Canada for shipment to other countries.

Honourable senators will be interested to know why Canada stands so high in the estimation of other nations. We are apt to boast about our country—our people and our natural resources, and all the good things we possess. It is natural for the people of any country so richly endowed to do so. However, there is a very special reason for Canada's position in world affairs today. Any country dominated or controlled by another is likely to be aroused to antagonism, even if the controlling country is doing its best to help. For instance, Great Britain has done a wonderful job in raising the standard of living of countries under her control, but a feeling of antagonism has sometimes been shown toward her. Canada has never controlled any other country, and that fact has put us in a preferred light in the eyes of the other Commonwealth countries. The United States, on the other hand, has incurred disfavour—but for only one reason; that is, jealousy. Of the sixty nations comprising the UN, let us not forget that fifteen are "donor" nations and forty-five are "taker" nations. It is not surprising therefore, that it is hard to get agreement among them all on some of the most important questions at issue. There can be no doubt that while the United States has been very liberal, the under-developed countries are highly jealous of that country.

Let me relate an incident that illustrates Canada's favoured position. When the question of disarmament arose at the United Nations, Russia proposed that it be referred to the Security Council, and that proposal was voted down. Then the United States and the other "donor" nations had a conference to decide which country should sponsor an acceptable resolution. The United States representative said that if he did so, some other countries would not like it. The United Kingdom representative felt that he was in a similar position. Finally, it was agreed that if Canada was chosen as sponsor, the resolution would "go over." As a matter of fact, it did "go over." Canada sponsored the resolution, and when the question was put to a vote, Russia voted with us for the first time in the nine years that the United Nations has been in existence.

Turning briefly to the East Asian situation, may I say to my honourable friend from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), that I disagree entirely with the thoughts he expressed here a few days ago. I concur in what was said by the honourable member from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) and the honourable member from St. John's (Hon. Mr. Baird). Honourable senators, we must try to understand the thinking of the East Asian people. They do not think as we do, and for that reason we cannot deal with them on the same basis as we can with, shall I say, the Christian nations. But any country that has the necessary money and power behind it can deal with the East Asians, for they understand force and nothing else.

I think the whole world should congratulate the President of the United States, who went before both houses of the Congress and secured almost unanimous approval to move the Seventh Fleet in between Formosa and Red China in order to prevent either side from starting to fight. That was one of the most progressive steps towards peace in our time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: With the force that is now being displayed, I think we shall be able through diplomatic channels to get an agreement for peace.

To my way of thinking, there are three main causes of war: narrow nationalism, differences of religion, and differences of language. Until my recent visit to the United Nations I had not realized the far-reaching effect of religious and language differences. As honourable senators know, I come from a section of Canada where the population is for the most part made up of English Protestants and French Catholics. In that area each group has every respect for the religion of the other; and we understand each others' language and get along very well together. But the situation is entirely different when we get into world affairs, involving some 150 languages, perhaps twenty of which are spoken at the United Nations, although only some five of them are translated.

The greatest preventives of war, in my opinion, are the strength of the United Nations, diplomacy, and the power we have developed through NATO countries, which I might call the "donor" countries. I am sure that the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) will agree that when he holds trump cards in a bridge game he can play much more comfortably than when he is holding poor cards. In other words, if you have power behind you, you can negotiate with other countries more easily than if you lack power.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I don't play bridge very well even when I hold good cards.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I should like to mention some of the problems which I encountered while at the United Nations, and which will no doubt be met with by future delegates. I would mention first the Cyprus question. As honourable senators know, Great Britain was the protector of the Suez Canal since its construction nearly ninety years ago; she stood as a bulwark of strength and fair play, and allowed free access to the canal by ships from every nation of the world. But she was obliged to withdraw from Egypt, and ceased to be a protector of the Canal Zone. With the change of events she found it necessary, in her own interests and that of the world generally, to establish a base as close to the canal as possible so as to meet possible trouble in the future. Consequently, Britain took control of Cyprus, an island with a population of about 200,000 Moslems and 300,000 Greeks. The Greeks wanted to have the British withdraw and the island turned over to them. Now, Cyprus, situated as it is off the coast of Lebanon and Palestine, is a long way from Greece and still farther from Great Britain, but is the closest point at which Britain can locate a base to protect the Suez Canal. I mention that to illustrate the type of serious problem that comes before the United Nations for its decision.

Another question which demanded our serious thought was that of West New Guinea. As honourable senators know, that country has been a protectorate under Dutch control for many years. It has been developed to the stage where its people now have an improved standard of living, but it is not advancing fast enough to suit them and they would like to get free of Dutch control. Australia objected to the proposal, because it would like West New Guinea to remain with Dutch Indonesia, and to join, shall I say, the Indonesian group.

The committee of which I was a member discussed at some length the functions of SUNFED—the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development of underdeveloped countries. We all know that when money is borrowed by an individual it sometimes becomes difficult, for any number of reasons, for him to meet even his interest payments, and when pressure is used to force collection it creates hard feelings. The same thing applies to nations. In some instances we have advanced money to a certain country, and because of a decline in exports or a drop in the price of the products of that country it has been unable to meet its interest payments. Incidentally, a couple of cases of that type are being considered at the present time. As I have said, any attempt to force the collection of arrears soon creates hard feelings.

It was suggested by some of the forty-five "taker" countries that inquiry should be made to find out whether the "donor" countries would be willing to participate in interest-free loans to "taker" countries which were willing to help themselves. Of course many difficulties can arise in such transactions. For instance the borrowing country might not permit repayment to the lending country at the time agreed upon. It was argued, and rightly so, that money used to raise the standard of living in under-developed countries would create a market for products of Canada, the United States and other advanced countries. That was a serious question which involved the time of the committee for six weeks.

It should always be remembered that despite the fact that the United States contributes 33⅓ per cent of the United Nations budget, she has no more to say than a small country such as Yemen. Incidentally, when I walked into the United Nations Assembly I noticed on a desk a card bearing the name "Yemen", a country I had never heard of. I consulted the map and learned that it is a small kingdom in Arabia, situated not far from the Red Sea. That little country, as I say, has its voice, just as have the bigger countries, in the business of the United Nations. When the General Assembly opens, each nation has a right to speak, and very often one has to listen for days to representations made by one country. Fortunately, any delegate has only to turn a switch at his seat to get a simultaneous translation in his own language of a speech being made in a foreign tongue.

I have perhaps tired honourable senators by my lengthy remarks about the affairs of the United Nations, so I will turn to my next topic, the St. Lawrence Seaway development.

In speaking of that great development we hear many people say that it should have been started years ago. No doubt that is true, but let us face the isue. We have 2,200 miles of continuous waterway from the Strait of Belle Isle to the head of the Great Lakes, in the heart of Canada and the United States, yet because of the lack of development of a sixty-five mile section in the St. Lawrence River it has not been possible to have through shipping for deep-sea vessels. But in discussing the project today, we should remember that every great work that has been achieved in Canada—such as the construction of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways and the development of the West—has been undertaken in a period of prosperity. With the growth of the iron ore mining now going on in Ungava and the kudos that Canada is getting from it, and with the construction of the St. Lawrence Waterway, I firmly believe that we shall continue to enjoy the prosperity that we have had during the past ten years, and that for once—and perhaps from now on—it will be prosperity that was not created by a war. I therefore congratulate the Government on having undertaken the great seaway project, and on being successful in having the United States join with us. An undertaking of such magnitude at this time will greatly improve the employment situation in Canada.

Honourable senators, may I conclude with a few words concerning the housing situation. Without being in any way boastful, I may say that years ago I had the idea that it would be a great thing for Canada if more people owned their own homes. However, the down payment was the big obstacle. At that time a $5,000 house could not be built without an initial payment of at least $1,500 or $2,000. I had the idea that if a prospective home-builder was known to be reliable, a down payment was not necessary. After all, in the business of my honourable friend from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), and to some extent in my business, the moral risk is an element to be considered above any other. I have made it a rule that if a man has been employed for five years on the same job, and is getting a certain salary, he must therefore be rated as steady and a good worker. The houses that I built were financed by money borrowed from a trust company at 7 per cent interest. Today, thirty years later, we are almost at the same stage, except that the Government is handling the situation. Out of the fifty houses that I built, only two were turned back, and in each case because the breadwinner took sick and died and his family were unable to continue the payments.

If I were again to undertake the building of houses I would require—and I say this by way of a suggestion to the Government in connection with its housing developments—a self-liquidating insurance policy covering the balance of the payments. Then if a home-owner were to die at any time after moving into his house and before he had fully paid for it, the balance owing would be paid by the insurance company. The amount of the risk would decrease annually until the home was paid for either by the home-owner, if he lived, or, if he did not, by the insurance company. Make no mistake, honourable senators, the housing legislation brought in by the present Government and administered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, including the methods of financing, constitutes some of the most beneficial legislation ever enacted. However, I was sorry when I read in the press yesterday that the interest rate on mortgage loans had been lowered to only 5¼ per cent instead of to 5 per cent. Construction of homes creates employment, and increases the number of home-owners, and is thereby a deterrent to communism. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of all this to Canada at the present time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable senator be good enough to enlarge on the statement he made regarding payments by Russia to the United Nations' budget? He stated that Russia paid four times as much as Canada. I wonder if that is so in fact. Can he give us the basis of assessment of the various countries?

Hon. Mr. Howard: The contribution by a country to the United Nations' budget is based on its gross national income and total population. For example, Canada's gross national product last year amounted to $23 billion, and our contribution was based on that income. I gave the house Canada's percentages, which in dollars and cents last year amounted to $1,400,000, or an equivalent of 10 cents per person per year.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Is it not a fact that Canada's contribution or assessment is the largest per capita of any member of the United Nations?

Hon. Mr. Howard: That may be true, because the basis of calculation is the total population and national income. A country with a high population and a low gross national income naturally would pay less per capita than is paid by Canada, which has a high national income and a low population.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Will the honourable senator permit a question? Am I right in assuming that the percentage he has reported for Russia this year is a considerable increase over what it was four or five years ago.

My impression is that Russia's contribution to the United Nations was very much below what one might have expected in view of her population and wealth. When I was at the United Nations in 1947—if I may enlarge for a moment—Canada contributed something like 3.4 per cent of the total budget, and today it is 3.6 per cent. In addition we paid our share for the special agencies and special causes to which the honourable senator referred. I think it is still true that Russia is not paying a fair proportion of the United Nations' budget in relation to her total population and national wealth.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I have given the house all the information that I possess on this matter.

The motion was agreed to, and the Address was adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Ordered that the said Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are members of the Honourable the Privy Council.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to revert to the question which was raised by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) with respect to the last day for submission of petitions for private bills? I have had an opportunity of looking up the rules ;and I find that Rule 110 provides that:

> Petitions for private bills shall only be received by the Senate if filed with the Clerk of the Senate within the first six weeks of the session.

I have been in touch with the Clerk, and he informs me that, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested, this is the last day for receiving these petitions.

Probably honourable senators will be interested in the latter part of the rule, which states:

> . . . no motion for the suspension of this standing order shall be entertained unless a report has been first made by the Committee on Standing Orders recommending such suspension.

UNITED NATIONS BUDGET

CONTRIBUTIONS OF MEMBER STATES

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. John T. Haig: I would ask the indulgence of the house to make a statement: if anyone objects, I shall have to sit down. I suggest to the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard), following the remarks made by the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) and the honourable senator from Halifax-Dartmouth (Hon. Mr. Isnor), that on Tuesday the house should be given an authoritative statement of the exact contributions to the budget of the United Nations for the current fiscal year by Russia, Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States, and other member countries. In 1946 I was present at the United Nations Assembly, where I took the place of Mr. Bracken, who was sick, as a member of the finance committee. I recall that the representative of Brazil, a very able financier, presented the various figures and facts as to these payments, which are based on the total production of the member states. At that time

Canada paid more than Russia. There should be no question of the correctness of the figures presented to the house on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Howard: May I answer?

The Hon. the Speaker: If the house agrees.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I am one hundred per cent in agreement with the honourable Leader of the Opposition that we should be sure our figures are right, but I hope he does not suspect that I got them out of the air or out of a hat. They were given to me in writing from the Department of External Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Haig: All I ask the honourable senator to do is to inform the appropriate departmental officials that this question has been raised and, on their authority, to assure us that the figures he quoted are correct.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 22, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 22, 1955

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien, Acting Speaker in the Chair

Prayers.

Routine proceedings.

DIVORCE STATISTICS

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce: Honourable senators, I beg to present a number of petitions for divorce, and I will use the opportunity to give some figures which may perhaps be of interest.

As honourable senators are aware, the time for filing petitions expired on February 17. The number actually filed up to that date was 472, considerably more than when I made my previous report. Up to the present moment we have heard and recommended 207 petitions; two have been rejected, five have been withdrawn, four have been partially heard, and 254 are now pending.

I may say that an additional 35 petitioners have published notice of intention, but as no petitions have yet been filed by them their cases will not come before us at the present session.

Hon. Mr. Vien: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he has statistics with respect to the number of divorce applications being heard by the provincial courts?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not have such statistics with me.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Are such records kept?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, the statistics are available. Had I anticipated the question, I would have come prepared to answer it. If the honourable gentleman would care to put an inquiry on the Order Paper. I am sure the information can be provided.

DIVORCE PETITIONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck presented the reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce, Nos. 169 to 205, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. A. Neil McLean: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I beg to move:

That the Standing Committee on Canadian Trade Relations be empowered to inquire into and report on:

1. What, in their opinion might be the most practical steps to further implement article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty whereby the signatories to that document agreed that: "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

2. That notwithstanding the generality of the foregoing, the committee be instructed and empowered to consider and report upon how, in their opinion,

(a) any project for developing economic collaboration specifically between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, can be co-ordinated with the trade policies of other countries of the free world;

(b) any project for developing economic collaboration between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, might have the same degree of permanence that is contemplated in the twenty year military obligation under article 5 of the treaty whereby "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all".

3. That the committee be empowered to extend an invitation to those wishing to be heard, including representatives of agriculture, industry, labour, trade, finance and consumers, to present their views, and that the committee also be empowered to hear representatives from business interests or individuals from any of the NATO countries who might wish to be heard.

4. That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to secure such services as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

I may say honourable senators that this is exactly the same motion I placed before the house last year, and it was adopted unanimously. That is the reason I am presenting it to the Senate tonight without notice. If there is any objection I will be very glad to have it considered as a notice of motion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to agree with this motion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: A notice of this motion should have been given.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It stands as a notice of motion for Thursday.

PRIVATE BILL

BONAVENTURE AND GASPÉ TELEPHONE COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Bouffard presented Bill P-6, an Act respecting The Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company Limited.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: With leave, tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILL

LONDON AND PORT STANLEY RAILWAY COMPANY—FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Taylor presented Bill Q-6, an Act respecting The London and Port Stanley Railway Company and the Corporation of the City of London.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Taylor: Thursday next.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved the second reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Library of Parliament Act.

He said: Honourable senators, last June, just before prorogation, at a meeting of the Joint Committee of both houses on the Library of Parliament a resolution was unanimously adopted recommending that at the next session the Government should introduce a bill to amend the existing Library of Parliament Act in order to effect certain changes in the internal organization and set-up of the library. The bill before us tonight, Bill B, is almost a literal reflection of the Joint Committee's recommendation of last June. On June 23 that recommendation, as embodied in the report of the Joint Committee tabled by His Honour the Speaker, one of the Joint Chairmen of the committee, was unanimously concurred in by the Senate; and on the same day the same report was concurred in by the House of Commons.

There is nothing complicated about this bill, but in order to simplify its background I should like to place on record the recommendation to which I have just referred. It reads as follows:

> That at the next session of Parliament, the Library of Parliament Act be amended so as to have only one Librarian in charge of the whole Library from such time as one of the present Joint Librarians may retire; it being understood that there shall be an Associate Librarian who shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the official language which is not that of the Librarian for the time being, and that the Librarian should be alternately English speaking and French speaking according to the unwritten rule which has always been observed for the Speakership and elsewhere.

As I have said, that recommendation was unanimously concurred in and adopted by both houses.

The bill is composed of four clauses. Clause 1 provides for appointment of a Parliamentary Librarian and an Associate Parliamentary Librarian. I think I am right in saying that provision for the use of official languages has never been spelled out in any statute in exact detail; and so the wording of the Joint Committee's recommendation was much more specific than is the wording of this bill. But the intention is, as I understand it, to follow the conventions of Parliament under which the equality of the two official languages is recognized. Whenever the mother tongue of the Librarian is English, that of the person appointed to be Associate Librarian will be French, and vice versa.

Honourable senators, the bill really makes no other change in connection with the operation of the Library, which is carried on under rules and regulations agreed upon jointly by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, supported and concurred in, wherever possible, by the Joint Committee of both houses on the Library.

The final clause of the bill, clause 4, provides that this act shall not come into force until a vacancy occurs in the office of either the General Librarian or the Parliamentary Librarian. At the present time there is a General Librarian as well as a Parliamentary Librarian, each having equal powers. This bill seeks to eliminate that duplication, and in the interests of efficiency of administration seeks to establish one head Librarian, and an Associate Librarian, whose functions are set forth in the bill.

Honourable senators, with that explanation, I suggest and recommend that this bill be given second reading.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could the honourable senator give us any report on the library as things now stand? What is the news from the library?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In answer to the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), I may say that the report of the Joint Committee of both houses on the Library of Parliament was tabled in this chamber on June 22, 1954, and in the House of Commons on the following day. This report was generally and unanimously concurred in. The report was brief, and the second clause, which I have read, is the only one that has any bearing on the bill now before the house.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I am sorry indeed that I was unable to attend the meeting of the joint committee the other day. I would like to ask the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) a question regarding the library, and perhaps not directly related to the bill itself. My question is this: At the meeting was any information given as to when we might expect the library to be finished? I ask that because I am told that these Parliament Buildings took three years to build, and it looks to me as if the renovation of the library alone will take three years.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: In reply to my honourable friend, I can only say that at the committee meeting last June, just before prorogation, this very question was brought up, and owing to grave delays, which were increased by the unfortunate collapse of the floor, it was estimated that it would be a year and a half before the work could be completed and the books transferred from the temporary quarters to the renovated library. At a meeting of the same joint committee last week that question was brought up again, and the best advice that could be given to the committee was the same as that expressed last June, namely, that completion would not be possible for a year and a half.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, may I ask if it would not be advisable to have this bill referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, so that certain persons could be asked to come and give us the information we require? I do not think we should be tied down to a report of a committee which we only partly control. If anyone were to ask me when the library would be finished, I could not tell him, from what I have heard tonight. If the proper persons were called before our Banking and Commerce Committee they could answer the question put by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), and inform the rest of us as well.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: Honourable senators, I attended the committee meeting last week, and I regret to say that I was the only senator present, although many other senators are members of the committee. I understood from a report presented at the meeting that the library would be ready in January 1956; but of course, with the usual delays, it might not be possible to move back into the library before April of that year.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I should like to comment on the request of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig). This is a Government bill, and if the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) wishes to grant the request of my honourable friend and have this bill referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee, or any other committee, I would be agreeable; but personally I do not think it should be necessary to do so, in view of the information that was given and the full opportunity that the members of this house had to study the subject last June. The representation of the Senate on the joint committee of both houses was then able to acquaint itself intimately with what was going on. To refer the bill to committee now would in my opinion be just needless repetition, and I think the Senate should confront itself with things that are more necessary at this time.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Honourable senators, I understood my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) to say that at the meeting of the committee held last week it was estimated that the library would not be completed for still another year and a half. I hope the committee will not keep on estimating the library will take a year and a half to complete. I am reminded of the fellow who was running along a road and at every turn thought he was getting close to his destination. But when he made the turn he always found that he still had farther to go than what he had first thought was the total distance.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I suggest that the question when the library will again be occupied is quite out of order in connection with this bill. If such information is sought, the answer can definitely be obtained by having an inquiry placed on the Order Paper, for I am quite sure that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) would be only too glad to get that information from the Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Honourable senators, I do not intend to refer to the repairs to the library or the report of last June. The bill makes mention of the Speakers of the two houses, but I understand that in recent years the library was to a great extent under the jurisdiction of the House of Commons. I would like to ask the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) under what department or minister the Library of Parliament operates at the present time.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Since I have had anything to do with the joint committee, as a humble member of it, along with other members appointed from this house, the Speakers of both houses have been joint chairmen, and they have assumed the responsibility of preparing the agendas of all the meetings and of having a complete hearing of the views on any subject which came up for consideration by the committee.

As far as ministerial responsibility is concerned the Library of Parliament has always been responsible, through this source, to the office of the Prime Minister. There is no change in that status today. The minister who attended the last two meetings as a liaison officer between the Library and the Prime Minister's office has been the Honourable J. W. Pickersgill, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who is also directly responsible for the National Library as well. In brief, my answer to the honourable senator is that the Prime Minister's office is responsible for the affairs of the Library of Parliament, and that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is the liaison minister between the two.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I have asked a question, but I have not yet spoken on this subject. May I first say that I am surprised that the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) should object to this bill being referred to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I merely said that it was for the Leader of the Government to say whether or not it should be referred.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My point is that any member of the house may ask that a bill be referred to a committee. If the Leader of the Government objects and the majority of the house are behind him, that is the end of it; but throughout my experience here, whenever an honourable member has asked that a bill be referred to committee, the Government have always agreed. And why should they not agree in this case? They have nothing to fear!

It is of some concern to our people to see the functions of the library scattered around in various buildings, and the library building apparently now no nearer completion than it was a year ago. For my part, I should like to have the Librarian come and tell us why it is necessary to have a Chief Librarian and an Associate Librarian. I am sure he has good reasons for the proposals, but a committee of this house should hear them.

I would certainly have objected to the joint committee's report being passed by this house last session if certain information had been before us at that time. Since an explanation was not given then I now ask the Government to allow this bill to be referred to a committee. If they do not wish to accede to that request, I cannot force them to do so.

I think that the Senate, of all bodies, should examine this bill in every detail. We in this house are not so busy that we cannot do it. Indeed, the cry outside the chamber is that we do not do enough, while in the chamber it is that we have nothing to do. Yet, when I ask the sponsor of this bill to have it referred to a committee, he replies that that is unnecessary. I am not a member of the Joint Committee on the Library, as is the honourable senator from Ottawa, and I do not have the detailed information which he has. With his extensive knowledge and experience, he is undoubtedly better qualified than I to judge as to the needs of the library. However, in my humble opinion, the reconstruction work is taking a long time, and I would like to ask what is happening in the meantime. I happen to know that there is quite a campaign on to have something done with respect to the handling of newspapers and periodicals which come to Parliament. That matter has come to my attention because it affects me personally, and I have a right to know of it.

I would remind honourable senators that it is now only the middle of February and the end of the session is some months off. Therefore, we have no need to hurry our consideration of any subject that comes before us. If, for instance, the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) wants to obtain some information about the library, by all means give him a chance to ask for it. If there is a good reason for what is being proposed in this bill, let us hear that reason.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I ask the honourable senator who moved second reading of the bill (Hon. Mr. Lambert) if the Parliamentary Librarian and the Associate Parliamentary Librarian are appointed by the Civil Service Commission, as I presume the rest of the staff are.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Honourable senators, I do not wish to evade the question that has been asked, but I should like to point out that the appointment of personnel to the library or any place else does not concern us in our consideration of this bill. That is a responsibility of the executive branch of Parliament and of the Government. The bill provides a desirable and advisable change in the set-up of the Library of Parliament, namely, that there be one head instead of two. The Chief Librarian will ordinarily be in charge, and the Associate Librarian will act in his place when the Chief Librarian is ill or absent for any other reason.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Honourable senators, there are two classes of persons employed in the Library of Parliament. The Librarians have the status of deputy ministers, and as such are appointed by order in council and do not come under the Civil Service Act; all other employees of the library function under the Civil Service Commission.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Thank you. That is what I wanted to know.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I am sorry I did not fully answer the question asked by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). I should like to say that the library personnel is composed of thirty-five temporary clerks appointed jointly by the Speakers of the two houses and twenty-seven permanent civil servants who come under the Civil Service Act. That is, of a total staff of sixty-two, twenty-seven come under the Civil Service Commission, and the rest do not.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I did not understand the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) to say that the bill could not be referred to a committee, but rather that he saw no reason for doing so since the purposes of the bill were set forth clearly in the bill itself.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: And that the report of the joint committee was adopted last session.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not see how the question of when the library building will be finished comes up for consideration under this bill. Certainly the bill does not provide funds for completion of the building, nor has it anything to do with that. I quite agree with the honourable senator from Ottawa, that the bill sets forth its purposes quite clearly and it is not necessary to refer it to a committee.

I shall inquire from the Department of Public Works when it is expected that the library will be finished, and give this information to the house tomorrow.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the second reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Library of Parliament Act. Is your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

Hon. Mr. Haig: On division.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: On division.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time, on division.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Next sitting.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I would point out, honourable senators, that without the consent of the house it cannot receive third reading tomorrow, and I refuse to give my consent.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, by Thursday I shall endeavour to have information from the Department of Public Works as to the possible date of completion of the library, and any other general information I can get on the matter.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN QUESTIONS OF CRIMINAL LAW—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons in the following words:

Resolved, that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that the name of Mr. Johnston (Bow River) has been substituted for that of Mr. Shaw on the special joint committee of both houses of Parliament appointed to inquire into and report upon the questions of capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, it has come to my attention that in a news broadcast today with reference to the Library of Parliament Bill, it was stated in part as follows:

Under the new establishment there would be one Librarian in charge, with an associate. The bill provides that when one of the two current joint librarians retires, the remaining one becomes the Chief Librarian and a new appointment is made representing the other official language as associate.

General Librarian now is Felix Desrochers, who is expected to retire soon. The present Parliamentary Librarian is F. A. Hardy, who would become the new Chief Librarian.

May I point out that I do not know of any reason for believing that Mr. Felix Desrochers is expected to retire soon. A short time ago the other librarian, Mr. F. A. Hardy, was very ill and it was expected that he would be the librarian to retire first. So it is not known which of the two will retire first.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Nor who will die first.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Nor who will die first. That would be a compulsory retirement.

Then the report goes on to say:

Hardy's assistant, R. M. Hamilton, a veteran of the library staff, would not move up, however, because of the language division defined in the new bill.

May I also say that the new bill does not define the language division though, as the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) explained, it is expected there will be a language division. But it is not set forth in the bill.

Then the report goes on:

Guy Sylvestre, Desrochers' assistant, who would be in line for the Associate Librarian's job, is a newcomer to the staff and was formerly Mr. St. Laurent's private secretary. Under the bill he would become the new Associate Librarian when Desrochers retires, moving up ahead of Hamilton.

Well, there is no provision whatever in the bill that either Hamilton or Sylvestre would move up. The bill provides that when one of the present librarians retires the remaining librarian will then be the Parliamentary Librarian and an Associate Librarian will be appointed by the Government. This report suggests that the bill is being presented so that Sylvestre can automatically move up to be the Associate Librarian. There is nothing in the bill to that effect, and nothing can be read into the bill to that effect. It is all surmise whether the next Parliamentary Librarian will be of the French language or of the English language. The bill has not been drawn up or contemplated or presented to this house with a view to appointing any one person of either language or who held any former position to the position either of General Librarian or of Associate Librarian.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable leader a question? Would it not have been nice if we had had that information in the Banking and Commerce Committee this morning? I think it would have been very nice. I want to say right now, on a question of privilege, that I feel very keenly the rebuff the house gave me last night. I will not get over it quickly. I have a bad disposition, I admit, and in future I am going to try to see that everybody in this house sticks to the rules.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Speaking to the point of privilege, I think the honourable leader on this side—

Hon. Mr. Haig: My honourable friend also cannot speak on the same matter of privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) spoke to a question of privilege, and I assume that, with the consent of the house, the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) may also speak at this time.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I ask the privilege of being allowed to refer to the report to which the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has alluded on a point of privilege. A great disservice has been done to this house, and to the public as well, by this, the most mischievous, false and garbled report that has come to my notice since I have had anything to do with Parliament. The report is completely unfounded, and has nothing to do with anything which was said in our debate last night. It is a diabolical attempt to misrepresent what was said here last night. It is completely unfair to my honourable colleague, the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), because it implies that he opposed the bill on the ground that its purpose was to catapult to the top position in the Library a former private secretary of the Prime Minister of this country. In past years a report of this kind would have been sufficient basis, in the other house, for the writer to be summoned to the Bar of the house and asked for an explanation of the matter. I personally repudiate the report, for which the British United Press is responsible, root and stem, and I would expect my honourable leader who represents the government in this house to do the same, because, as I have said, there is not a word of truth in it. Today it will be broadcast from twenty-seven private stations whose news service is furnished by the British United Press. The reporter of that press service was in the gallery last evening, recording our proceedings. These objectionable statements have already been made over the radio; they will go also to the newspapers which use the B.U.P. service; and undoubtedly before this time tomorrow some of my honourable friends will have had the doubtful pleasure of reading these misstatements in public print. So I trust that they will understand my feelings and will share at least some of the indignation which prompts me now to refer to this matter.

SUBSIDIES ON FEED GRAINS

ANSWER TO INQUIRY

Hon. J. Adelard Godbout: Honourable senators, I have been requested by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to give a word or two of explanation in answer to an inquiry by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) concerning the reduction in assistance given by the Federal Government on transportation of feed grains from the three Prairie provinces to other parts of Canada. The payment of these subsidies was, I imagine, Government policy for the purpose of inducing farmers in other than the Prairie provinces to buy surplus grain for which there was no export market. An order in council was passed this year to reduce the assistance, and I think the reduction was justified. As is well known, there is a surplus of grain in the Prairie provinces, but there is now a large movement of feed grain from those three provinces to the rest of Canada.

The reduction in subsidies is based on new freight rates to different parts of the country, and the Maritime provinces will in future receive the same assistance as in the past. The assistance to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario on feed grains will be reduced by $1.50 per ton.

Until the Order in Council became effective, British Columbia received higher subsidies than eastern provinces did on the transportation of feed grains from the Prairie provinces, for the special purpose of developing her dairy farming, poultry production and hog breeding operations. Under the new arrangement, after the deduction of the federal subsidy, the part of the freight rates payable by the farmers of the Maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia will be the same, namely, $5.

The purpose of the original subsidies has been achieved, namely, that of moving surplus grain from the Prairie provinces to other parts of Canada. True, the reduction in assistance seems to bear more heavily on British Columbia, but, as I have said, that province formerly received more generous assistance, for the reason I have stated.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Aseltine moved the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

He said: I crave the indulgence of honourable senators while I attempt to explain this rather important bill. At the outset may I say that I am not unaware of the fact that in this chamber there are a number of honourable senators who are absolutely opposed to divorce in any form. I appreciate their view, but I should like to point out that this is not a bill having to do with the institution of divorce. We have divorce in this country, and have had for many years. The bill now before us has to do with the grounds which the courts of our country shall consider to be grounds for the dissolution of marriage. Therefore, during the debate I should like honourable senators to keep in mind that we are discussing whether the grounds for divorce should be extended, and not the principle of divorce.

This bill would be twofold in its effect. As honourable senators know, in Canada we really have no general law of divorce of our own except that which we have adopted from the English law. We have, however, passed two or three statutes dealing with divorce, which statutes I shall discuss later. If Parliament passes this bill it will constitute the divorce law for the dominion of Canada. That would be one effect.

The second effect would be this: that in addition to the present ground for divorce, namely, adultery, there would be three other grounds, which I shall discuss at greater length later in my remarks.

I should perhaps give honourable senators and the public at large some historical background of this subject. I would refer honourable senators to the explanatory notes opposite page one of the bill, most of which I should like to incorporate in my speech, so that members of the public who read the report in Hansard will have these facts before them. These explanatory notes are as follows:

The only courts in Canada to which the Act applies are the courts which now have jurisdiction to decree divorce.

A court in Prince Edward Island has had that right since 1835 as the term "divorce" was then understood.

A court in Nova Scotia has had that right since 1758.

A court in New Brunswick has had that right since 1791.

No court has that right in Quebec.

A court in Ontario has had that right since 1930.

A court in Manitoba has had that right since 1870.

Courts in Saskatchewan and Alberta have had that right since 1905. Before then the right was inchoate in the N.W. Territories. Hence the right of Saskatchewan and Alberta, although these provinces were only formed in 1905, is to the divorce law of England as of 1870.

A court in British Columbia has had that right since 1858.

No court has that right in Newfoundland.

Prince Edward Island now exercises its right under its own act of 1835 by virtue of section 129, B.N.A. Act.

Nova Scotia, under the same authority, now exercises its right under its own act of 1866.

New Brunswick also operates under its own preconfederation act of 1860.

Ontario operates under dominion act, chapter 85 of the Revised Statutes of 1952.

Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta operate under the terms of the respective acts of 1870 and 1905 which erected them into provinces. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has confirmed their right, which extends to the divorce law of England as of 1870.

British Columbia—

This is a somewhat peculiar situation.

—yet operates under a proclamation of Governor Douglas made in 1858, which, it has been held, extends to that province the divorce law of England as in force in 1858.

I should like, honourable senators, to present some further historical background. It will be remembered that prior to 1857, when the English divorce law was passed, divorce applications were made to the Ecclesiastical Courts, which had sole control over such matters, and granted divorce a mensa et thoro—that is, from bed and board. A petitioner who was successful in obtaining a judgment of this kind from the Ecclesiastical Courts was then obliged to sue the adulterer in court for damages; and if he succeeded in securing a judgment for damages he made a petition to the House of Lords for a decree. That was the procedure prior to 1857.

However, the Matrimonial Causes Act, which was passed in England in 1857, provided for only one ground of divorce, namely adultery. Under that act a woman could not secure a divorce from her husband unless besides proving adultery she could also prove cruelty on the part of her husband. It was not until the present century that women were placed on the same footing as men as regards grounds for divorce.

That law of England remained in effect until 1937, in spite of the fact that a Royal Commission which was set up in 1908 to investigate the whole matter of divorce recommended to the British Parliament in 1912 that in the future adultery should not be the only ground, but that there should be four additional grounds.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator how residents of Ontario secured divorces before 1930?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In 1930 Parliament conferred divorce jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court of Ontario, and since then Ontario has been carrying on under that act.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And before that, Ontario residents came to Parliament to petition for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. Prior to 1930 all divorces granted to residents of Ontario were parliamentary divorces.

The next step in Britain was the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1937, which was introduced by Colonel A. P. Herbert. Many senators have no doubt read his book Holy Deadlock, which illustrated better than anything else I ever heard of the farce that persisted in Britain as regards grounds for divorce prior to the passing of that act. It was the public reception of this book which encouraged him to introduce his bill in 1937. I would like to read the preamble to that bill:

> Whereas it is expedient for the true support of marriage, the protection of children, the removal of hardship, the reduction of illicit unions and unseemly litigation, the relief of conscience amongst the clergy, and restoration of due respect for the law, that the Acts relating to marriage and divorce be amended: . . .

The bill did not meet with any serious opposition in either house of Parliament. It was approved by members of the House of Commons and of the House of Lords, including bishops, and by others.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Would the honourable senator qualify the word "bishops"?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Bishops of what denominations?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think they were Anglican bishops. I will read later from a statement made by the Lord Bishop of Birmingham to the House of Lords, to illustrate what I have been trying to say.

I would like to point out to honourable senators at this stage that the British North America Act, section 91, gives the federal Parliament full jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. In 1925 Parliament passed an act which gave the wife the same grounds for divorce as the husband. In 1930 the Divorce Jurisdiction Act was passed, and under that act if a husband has deserted his wife for two years or more and has acquired domicile in another province she may sue him for divorce, provided that immediately prior to the desertion he was domiciled in the province in which the proceedings are commenced. Also in 1930 Parliament passed the statute which gave Ontario the right to set up its own divorce court.

As I said before, Canada has enacted very little divorce legislation of its own. This Act of 1925 and the Acts of 1930 are the only ones which deal with divorce law at all in this country.

Now I come to another historical fact. In 1938 the late Senator McMeans introduced into this house a bill entitled the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill. If I remember correctly, I seconded the motion for second reading of the bill. I suggest that during the continuance of the present debate, honourable senators should read the debate on that bill. It will be found between pages 84 and 346 of the Senate Hansard of 1938. Other matters also are dealt with between those pages, but I am just indicating the opening and closing pages of the debate.

That bill was introduced on March 8, 1938, and the debate on the motion for second reading took place on March 15 and 16. Quite a number of senators who are here with us today participated in the debate. There was the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert), the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the late Senator McMeans and many others.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The late Senator Dandurand took part also.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You are mentioning some who are not still with us.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is so. I did not intend to include any who are not with us today.

On March 16, 1938, the bill was given second reading in this chamber, by a vote of forty to twenty-nine, and was then referred to a special committee. I may say that if the present bill should receive second reading I shall propose that it be referred not to a special committee, but to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, by which matters of law are usually dealt with.

The special committee reported the 1938 bill without amendment. There followed quite a long debate, which resulted in the return of the measure to the special committee for further consideration. The committee proposed certain amendments, which were adopted by this chamber on May 11. Thereupon, on the motion of the then junior senator from Winnipeg who is now the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole, on May 12, and a number of amendments were adopted. Third reading was given to the bill on May 18, and it was sent to the House of Commons late in June.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Was the bill then passed by this house substantially the same as that which the honourable senator is presenting today for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The bill now before the chamber is an almost exact reproduction of that which passed this chamber on May 18, 1938. A little later I will explain why so long a period has elapsed between the two measures.

I have already stated that the bill went to the House of Commons. It did not obtain second reading there, but was killed on June 14, just prior to prorogation. In my opinion it did not receive adequate consideration at that time.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Was there a division in the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand that, following a very brief debate, the honourable member for Fort William, Mr. Dan McIvor, moved that the bill be not then read the second time but be read the second time six months later, and his motion was adopted.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Was there a division?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not remember, but I think there was a division.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am pretty sure that the bill did not get much consideration, because I was there and I do not remember it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) asked whether this bill is similar to the one which was passed by this house in 1938. I stated that it is in effect a reproduction of that bill, and I said I would explain why no attempt was made since then until the present time to bring it again before this house. It will be remembered that in 1939 we entered World War II, which lasted until 1945; that, following the close of hostilities, a number of matters of great importance, including reconstruction, needed attention. I decided to delay action on this matter until these other problems had been dealt with. But I do not think it should be put off any longer.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Copies of the bill were distributed on Saturday last, and, I believe, will be found by honourable members on their desks.

First I would refer to section 3:

(1) This act shall apply to and in those provinces of Canada wherein there are now constituted and maintained courts of divorce and matrimonial causes having jurisdiction to decree dissolution of marriage, and to and in such provinces only.

(2) In each of such provinces this act shall apply to and confer jurisdiction upon the court described in subsection one of this section (subsequently in this Act termed "the court") and to and upon that court only.

The application of this bill is restricted to provinces which have divorce courts, so that it would not apply either to Newfoundland or to Quebec. There is no attempt to impose divorce laws on any person or province that objects to divorce.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable senator allow me a question? According to section 2, paragraph (a),

"Court" means any of the courts described in section three and includes a judge of such court.

And subsection (2) of section 3, which the honourable senator has just read, states:

In each of such provinces this act shall apply to and confer jurisdiction upon the court described in subsection one of this section . . . and to and upon that court only.

Is there not redundancy in that wording?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Section 2 is the definition section, I do not think there is any redundancy.

Hon. Mr. Farris: In any event, that could be straightened out in committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable senator too frequently, but I think we should clear up as many points as possible as we proceed. I am just asking for information. Will the provisions of this bill, if enacted, not apply to petitions for bills of divorce which are presented to parliament?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am advised by the Law Clerk of the Senate that they would not. These provisions will apply only to those provinces which have courts within the meaning of the act, and Parliament is not a court in that sense.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that if this bill should become law an application to Parliament for divorce could be granted only if adultery were established?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not say that, for Parliament has the power to grant a divorce on any ground or on no ground at all.

Hon. Mr. King: And to receive divorce petitions from any province?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As a result of his years of experience would the honourable gentleman expect that, if this legislation is enacted, petitions for divorce to Parliament on the grounds set forth in the bill would obtain approval of Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Parliament has had the right since 1867 to grant divorces on any ground, but has never exercised that right. I think, therefore, that there would be no change whatsoever in that respect if this bill became law.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certainly.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Section 2(b) reads:

> "Cruelty" means legal cruelty as now interpreted and construed by the High Court of England in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Could the honourable senator give us a definition of legal cruelty as it is defined in the High Court of England?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall be coming to that.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: I thought that as my honourable friend was dealing with section 3 it would be an appropriate time to give the house this definition.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall deal with it when I come to it.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I may say that that definition of cruelty was adopted in 1938, after a long debate in this house, for it was impossible to define cruelty in words that might or might not fit every case. Will that explanation do for the moment?

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: For the moment, yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I would refer honourable senators to section 5(1) which reads:

> No petition for divorce shall be presented to or entertained by the court until a period of three years shall have elapsed since the date of the marriage unless the court, upon application made in accordance with rules of court, shall otherwise allow.

That is a new feature, and I do not know that it pertains anywhere in the world at the present time, except in Great Britain. There is, however, one exception. If the ground on which the divorce is sought is adultery, the petitioner would not have to wait for three years following the celebration of the marriage.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Why was a three-year period chosen rather than some other number of years?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know that. The object was to prevent hasty marriages which might result in hasty divorces, and some period of time had to be fixed. Furthermore, I believe that was the number of years stated in the British act and that we followed suit in this country.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I suppose that is the reason, that it is the period fixed in the British act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: There is no such provision in effect in Ontario at the present time, is there? A couple married in Ontario last year, say, could apply for a divorce without waiting for the expiration of the three-year period, could they not?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Would this bill change that situation?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is a new departure.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It provides for a longer period.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I understood my honourable friend to say that if adultery were set forth as a ground the three-year period would not apply.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, that is right. I would point out that section 5(6) provides:

> This section shall not apply in the case of a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery.

But it applies in every other case, and the court would take every factor into consideration before it would make any order allowing the petitioner to proceed with his case.

Honourable senators, section 6 of the bill is the important section, for it sets forth the grounds upon which a petition for divorce may be presented either by the husband or the wife. The old ground of adultery is set forth in subsection (1) (a). Subsection (1) (b) provides a new ground, namely, where the husband or the wife has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years immediately preceding presentation of the petition. Subsection (1) (c) provides another new ground, namely, that the respondent, since the celebration of the marriage, has treated the petitioner with cruelty. Finally, subsection (1) (d) provides a third new ground, namely, that the petitioner's spouse is incurably of unsound mind and has been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

In brief, if this bill is passed it will provide four grounds for divorce: first, adultery; second, desertion for three years; third, cruelty; and fourth, incurable unsoundness of mind.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I dislike to interrupt the honourable gentleman—

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator may do so only with permission.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: If I have my honourable friend's permission, I would like to ask a question.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: My honourable friend has spoken about the English procedure and has told the house that Colonel Herbert introduced a bill in 1937; but we have not been told whether that bill was passed and, if so, what provisions it made with respect to grounds for divorce. Would my honourable friend mind giving the house that information?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I will answer the honourable senator in this way: I remember distinctly that when the 1938 bill was drawn up by the Law Clerk of the Senate, Mr. O'Connor, we had been discussing the law of England as it stood after the act of 1937 was passed. We then decided to have an act of our own which, if possible, would not make reference to the law of any other country, and we instructed the Law Clerk to draw up a bill and to make the grounds the same as those in England.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: What are the grounds in England?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The same as are contained in this bill.

The honourable senator from Vancouver (Hon. Mr. McKeen) has reminded me that the bill provides for a ground which I did not mention. That is a ground for a petition by a wife only. It is to be found in section 6(2), which reads:

> A petition for divorce may be presented by the wife to, and it may be entertained by, the court, on the ground that her husband has, since the celebration of the marriage, been guilty of rape, sodomy or bestiality.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the honourable senator mind referring me to the clause in the bill which states, as I understood him to say, that where adultery is the ground an action may be commenced before a period of three years has elapsed since the date of the marriage?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is to be found on page three of the bill, section 5(6).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certain provisions are set out in section 8, which I do not intend to read, giving the court power to dismiss a petition where there is unreasonable delay in proceeding with the petition, or cruelty towards the other party of the marriage, or where the petitioner also has committed adultery, or where wilful neglect or misconduct has conduced to the adultery or unsoundness of mind or desertion, as the case may be, that is pleaded. Those are just safeguards which the court has discretion to consider on the hearing of any case which comes before it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does the word "cruelty" mentioned in section 8 mean corporal cruelty?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: When the bill was introduced in 1938 nobody was able to give a definition of cruelty, because we had had very little litigation in this country where cruelty had been alleged. After a long debate, and after long consideration of the question in committee, the committee decided on the definition which appears in section 2(b) of the present bill:

> "Cruelty" means legal cruelty as now interpreted and construed by the High Court of England in divorce and matrimonial causes.

There was considerable argument at that time as to whether the word "now" should be inserted or not, but the clause was finally amended and the word "now" was inserted. So that no matter what might happen in England in the future to change our ideas of the definition of cruelty, the term would mean only what it was construed to mean at that time by the High Court of England in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Can the honourable senator tell me if the proceedings of that committee were printed?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think they were; in fact, I am sure they were not.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, the proceedings of the committee were not printed.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: May I ask the honourable senator if one of the bills introduced did not specify habitual drunkenness as a ground for action? I have a recollection that it was included as a ground.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, it was not included.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: It was considered, though, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It was included in legislation of some other countries—Australia, New Zealand and the United States—but not in this bill. The present bill introduces only three new grounds, and then it goes on to deal with "presumption of death." Certain provinces have a law with respect to the presumption of death, and others have not. It was thought that the question of presumption of death should be included in this bill, so that if the bill is passed the one law on this matter will apply to all provinces.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Would the honourable senator permit a repetition of my question? What is the British definition of legal cruelty?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot tell you.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Well, it is very difficult to judge this—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is legal cruelty as interpreted by the High Court of Justice in England. All kinds of cases involving cruelty have been tried, and I would not attempt to define the term. If we had been able to do so, it would have been defined in the bill.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: In the bill it is used in a rather broad sense.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Does it mean that each senator will have to define it for himself?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No; the courts will have to define it .

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I be permitted to ask a question, following the question put by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges)? If this bill were passed in its present form, would the courts of this country be in duty bound to follow the decisions of Great Britain in regard to cruelty?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As they exist at the time this bill is passed, if it is passed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It will become the law here then.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, it will become the law here then.

Hon. Mr. Horner: The judge in each court would do the interpreting?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And the courts here would be bound by that interpretation.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: On the basis of those decisions as they exist today?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As they exist today.

The bill also deals with judicial separation, avoidance and alimony. Then there are three sections under the heading of "General", the first of which sets out that clergymen shall not be compelled or bound to remarry persons where a former marriage has been dissolved and one of the parties has a former husband or wife still living. Section 16 deals with domicile when a husband deserts his wife.

Honourable senators, as I said earlier, if the bill is passed and becomes law we shall have a divorce law of our own.

Unless I am compelled to do so, I shall not go into the sections under the heading "Avoidance". A debate on the question in this house lasted for several hours, and as a result these clauses were redrafted and amended in their present form.

The objects of this bill are the same as those of the English act. I submit to honourable senators that the bill if passed will prevent hasty marriages, for under the proposed change in the law no divorce petition from either spouse could be heard, unless adultery is alleged, within three years after the celebration of a marriage. As I have said, this is a new departure which applies nowhere else in the world but in England. The addition of three new grounds for divorce would, I think, be of considerable benefit to the poorer classes. Honourable senators who have served on the Divorce Committee of this house know that adultery is perhaps one of the weakest grounds for divorce, because not in one case out of fifty is there actually an eye-witness to the commission of adultery.

Hon. Mr. Haig: It is presumed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In a great many cases brought before the Divorce Committee desertion is the true ground for the break-up of the marriage; but since desertion is not a ground for divorce the petitioner has in some manner or other to try to produce evidence showing that adultery probably has been committed. In my opinion, a large number of cases in which there has been a long separation, desertion could easily be proved and there would be no necessity for one party to commit adultery or to bring false evidence indicating that adultery has been committed.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: May I ask my honourable friend a question? What precisely does he interpret to be the meaning of paragraph (b) of section 6 (1), which uses these words "has deserted the petitioner without cause"? Surely there must be some cause for the desertion, however ridiculous or trifling it may seem. As that paragraph is at present worded, it means nothing.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does it not mean without justification?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Or without cause on the part of the petitioner?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: It may have that meaning, but it does not say so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If for instance a woman is deserted by her husband who takes up with another woman, she may not be able to prove adultery but she can prove desertion.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: Yes, but the husband no doubt had a cause for deserting her.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: My honourable friend from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) is going a little too far.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: I am quite serious. The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is introducing a bill which must mean something, and I am suggesting to him that the paragraph I have mentioned, as drafted, means nothing whatever.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If that provision is not satisfactory to the committee to which this bill is referred, it can be amended. I am unable at the moment to suggest what better words could be used in a redrafting of it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the honourable senator intends the words to mean that desertion has taken place without cause on the part of the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what I thought they meant.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do they not simply mean desertion without justification?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes.

I was dealing, honourable senators, with ways in which the objects of the bill would be attained, and I had suggested three. In the fourth place, the increase in the number of grounds for divorce would give greater power to the courts to inquire into collusion, connivance and condonation. In the fifth place, the bill would clarify the law with respect to presumption of death, and in other matters incidental to marriage and divorce. That is all I wish to say on that phase of the subject at the moment.

I should like to read to honourable senators the words of the Lord Bishop of Birmingham spoken in the House of Lords on the second reading of the English bill, in 1937. I may say that the bill was supported by clergymen, lords and commoners, and received a large majority in both houses.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Would the honourable gentleman please give the page from which he proposes to read from the records of the House of Lords?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not have before me the official records of the House of Lords. Instead, I shall read from a previous speech I made in this house, as recorded in our Hansard of 1938, at page 89, in which I quoted the words of the Lord Bishop.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For my own information, may I ask the honourable senator if I correctly understood him to say that all the bishops and all the clergymen voted for the bill?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No; I said the measure was supported by clergymen, lords and commoners.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And I suppose it was opposed by some of them too.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not intend to imply that all the clergy had supported the bill, but I say it was supported by a large majority of the members of both houses.

On that occasion the Lord Bishop of Birmingham said:

> I intend to vote for the second reading of this marriage bill. There is in my opinion nothing in it which can encourage our people to regard marriage lightly. It is, I am convinced, a careful attempt to bring our marriage law into harmony with opinions now held by an overwhelming majority of enlightened Christian people in this country. One of the great merits of the bill, as it seems to me, is that it will promote morality by lessening the number of irregular unions among working people. I hope that it will lessen the number of collusive divorces among our fellow-citizens of less narrow means. Some legislation as to divorce is urgently needed at the present time, for people generally—is it not so?—are made profoundly uneasy by present circumstances. It seems to me that the bill is carefully balanced. No practical alternative to it has been proposed.

May I interject at this point that in Scotland desertion has been a ground for divorce for more than three hundred years.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Desertion for how long, three years?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know, but in general desertion has been regarded as a ground for divorce for more than three hundred years. Surely no one would say that an undue number of the homes of Scotland have been broken up because desertion has been included in the law as a ground for divorce during all that time.

I want to give an example of what happens in this country right now. Let us take the case of a soldier who married a girl in England. The girl either refuses to come to Canada with him or, if she comes to Canada and does not like things here she returns to England and refuses to live with her husband in Canada. That is desertion, no matter how you look at it. In England, there is a law whereby she can get a divorce from her Canadian husband after three years of living apart. She gets it on the grounds that the husband has deserted her, but the poor husband in Canada, notwithstanding that divorce granted in England, is still tied to his wife because her English divorce does not release him.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You are sure of that, are you?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is my understanding. I took it up with a lawyer in Scotland and that is the understanding I have of it.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I know that is a fact. I know of a case very similar to that.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I have one case of that kind in my office right now. The wife, living in Scotland, is taking action for divorce there, and we have come to the conclusion that the husband will not be released and will not be able to remarry in this country, because so far as he is concerned the divorce will not be binding on him.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I think it is well recognized that the only divorce legally recognized in this country is one granted in accordance with the law as to the husband's domicile.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is one reason why I would like to see desertion included in this bill as a ground for divorce.

Furthermore, I should say that there are at least 20,000 cases of deserted spouses in this country. Some people claim that there are as many as 50,000, but I think that estimate is a little high. I could cite other cases. For instance, about twenty years ago a man in Western Ontario was married and he and his wife lived together for about a year, and then she left him and went to California. He has no evidence that she may have been unfaithful to him and he has been living a lonely life ever since. He has met somebody else whom he is anxious to marry but he cannot do so. I could go on and give many other examples. Since 1949 I have kept a file on this subject; in fact, at the present moment I have three files, each about three inches thick, containing letters received from people all over Canada, and I should say that 99 per cent of them are in favour of what I am trying to have enacted by this bill.

I said before that the only ground for divorce in Canada at the present time is that of adultery, but there is one exception to that. In Nova Scotia cruelty is recognized as a ground for divorce, but I do not know that cruelty is defined in the Nova Scotia statute; I think its interpretation is left to the court. In the United States of America divorce is granted on many grounds for divorce, including the ones mentioned in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or on no grounds at all.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I took the trouble, for the information of honourable senators, to find out what the grounds for divorce are in New Zealand. At present there are eleven grounds for divorce in that country, as follows:

(i) Adultery.

(ii) Wilful and continuous desertion for upwards of three years.

(iii) That the respondent has for four years or more been an habitual drunkard, and has either left his wife without means of support or habitually been guilty of cruelty towards her; or, being the petitioner's wife, has for a like period been an habitual drunkard, and has habitually neglected her domestic duties and rendered herself unfit to discharge them.

(iv) Conviction, and sentence to imprisonment for seven years or more for attempting to commit the murder of, or wounding or doing bodily harm to, the petitioner or any child of the petitioner or respondent.

(v) Conviction of the murder of a child of the petitioner or respondent.

(vi) That the respondent is a person of unsound mind and is unlikely to recover, and has been confined as such in New Zealand or in any British country for a period or periods not less in the aggregate than seven years within the period of ten years immediately preceding the filing of the petition.

(vii) That the respondent is a person of unsound mind and is unlikely to recover, and has been continuously a person of unsound mind for the period of seven years immediately preceding the filing of the petition, and during the final three years of the said period of seven years has been confined as such in an institution in New Zealand or in any British country.

(viii) Failure on the part of the respondent to comply with a decree of the court directing the respondent to return to the petitioner and render conjugal rights.

(ix) Separation for three years pursuant to an agreement for separation made between the parties.

(x) Separation for three years pursuant to a decree of judicial separation or to a separation order made by a magistrate, or to any decree or order of any country to the effect that the parties are not bound to live together.

(xi) That the respondent, being the husband of the petitioner, has been guilty of rape, sodomy or bestiality since the celebration of the marriage.

Some time ago I had occasion to inquire what the law was in Sweden, and I found that in that country divorces are granted by agreement. If the parties cannot get along together they just enter into an agreement and submit it to the proper court, which will make an order separating the parties for a time; and later if they cannot agree to cohabit once more the court makes a final order and distributes the property between them in accordance with the laws of Sweden in that respect.

What I am asking the Senate to do seems to me not such a very serious matter after all, when you consider the grounds that exist for divorce in other countries. In the circumstances, the fact the bill proposes three additional grounds should not disturb anybody at all. I think passage of the bill would tend to make people in Canada much happier and would not, as some would lead us to believe, be a cause of breaking up of homes. In my opinion, our divorce law is antiquated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: A man on the street said to me the other day that Canada is 500 years behind the times. I said to him that we are not 500 years old, and he replied that what he meant to say was that we are away behind the times in our divorce law, and that some revision is necessary.

I have received many letters. Honourable senators will pardon me if I read one, a very short one. Dated February 18, 1955, and addressed to me at the Senate here, it says:

My dear Senator:

May I wish you the best of luck in your efforts to bring a sane divorce bill to the people of Canada?

The writer has been waiting since 1929 for such a measure in order to relieve himself of a domestic tangle caused by War No. 1. So here's wishing you God-speed and may the good Lord bless you in your efforts.

I have received many, many letters of that kind.

Hon. Mr. Vien: For the purposes which the honourable senator has in mind would it be sufficient if the provinces which have divorce courts were given jurisdiction to determine the causes for divorce?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is a constitutional question, on which I do not want to commit myself.

Hon. Mr. Vien: In 1930 we made the divorce law of England applicable to the province of Ontario. Instead of having the divorce law of a province governed by English law, could not the province concerned be empowered to enact its own laws?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand the honourable senator's point, and it is worthy of consideration.

Hon. Mr. Vien: May I be allowed another question? Included among additional grounds for divorce specified in section 6 is, that the respondent "has since the celebration of the marriage committed adultery". What if the offence has been condoned and the couple have resumed cohabitation?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, well, that is part of the law of divorce.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Not in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Everybody knows what "condonation" means. It means forgiveness, taking the party back, resuming cohabitation as man and wife. All those acts would be condonation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: See section 7, subsection (1).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: A provision as to condonation is in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Then that is all right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Several organizations for the reform of divorce law have been formed in Canada. One, in the province of British Columbia, has been in existence since 1942. It is called "The Divorce Reform League of British Columbia", and its objects are as follow:

1. The addition of the following grounds for divorce:

(a) The desertion by a spouse of the petitioning spouse without cause for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the petition for divorce.

(b) The treating with cruelty by a spouse of the petitioning spouse.

(c) Incurable unsoundness of mind of a spouse after continuous care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the petition for divorce.

(d) Reasonable grounds for supposing that a spouse is dead.

(e) Habitual commission of criminal acts by a spouse.

One of the members of this association, which has been active since 1942, is Rev. C. Bernard Reynolds, M.A., B.D., formerly for many years a lecturer at the Anglican Theological College of British Columbia. He wrote a book, "Canada's Need for Divorce Reform". I presume that some honourable members have seen and read it.

I attended the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association which was held in Winnipeg last September. There was a discussion of the subject of divorce on the last day of the meeting, and although some delegates thought that the association should not pass any resolution on this subject, a resolution was presented and was passed by quite a large majority. The motion was presented and supported by the Bar Association of British Columbia; and whether or not the convention was the right place for such a resolution to be discussed and adopted—I think it was—there is no doubt that the matter can be properly studied and dealt with in the Senate of Canada. I should like to read an extract from the resolution:

Be it resolved:
That Parliament grant to the courts in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and such other provinces and territories as desire it, power to dissolve marriages upon the following grounds (in addition to those already available) and being grounds adopted in England in 1937:
(a) Desertion without cause for at least three years;
(b) Cruelty; and
(c) Incurable insanity which has required care and treatment for five years.

I spoke on that resolution—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is why it was passed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: —in fact, I was the last speaker; and I then said that if the convention passed the resolution I should feel obligated to bring before the Senate at the next session a bill embodying its recommendations. That is one of the chief reasons why I am here today.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Which provinces desire the passing of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I cannot answer that specifically. I know that a vote was called, and I assume the vote was 5 to 1 in favour of this resolution. Representatives from nearly every province were present.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Representatives of the Bar Associations of the provinces which desired it?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, from the provincial Bar associations to the general meeting of the dominion Association.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Suppose that those provinces which have courts within the meaning of the act wanted to enlarge the scope of the grounds for divorce, could they do so without coming to Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, no. The federal Parliament has full and total jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, to illustrate the trend of thinking amongst Canadian adults I would refer you to a report of a Gallup Poll of Canada on this subject. Sometimes Gallup Polls give an accurate reflection and sometimes they do not, but frequently they are almost right. This report claims that 75 per cent of Canadian adults want the following additional grounds for divorce: infidelity, desertion, insanity, physical cruelty, drunkenness, mental cruelty and inability to get along. Of course, the last three grounds are not mentioned in my bill at all.

Honourable senators, I have talked longer than I intended. I should like to close by expressing the hope that this bill will be considered very carefully by the Senate and that it will be sent to a committee of this house. We pride ourselves on being an independent body. We also pride ourselves on our good sense, judgment, knowledge and experience in legislation and other matters, and I think this legislation is a challenge to the Senate to take some action. I hope that we shall forget our politics and everything else and give this legislation the consideration it merits.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: Do not the provinces have the right to pass their own divorce laws?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No. The Parliament of Canada has full and total jurisdiction in this matter.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: Except for Quebec and Newfoundland, the provinces now have courts within the meaning of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable gentleman from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) a question? He has dealt fully with the various grounds for divorce under this bill, but has said nothing with regard to the section headed "Presumption of Death". At the present moment the Criminal Code allows a person to remarry after his or her spouse has been absent for a period of seven years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The law does not allow it; it is just that there can be no conviction for bigamy.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The second marriage is not validated.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is what I was about to say. If a spouse has been absent for seven years without the other spouse knowing where he or she is and without receiving any communication—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think there has to be a presumption of death.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is a presumption of death. That is the basis of the provision, although not so expressed. The absent party is presumed dead and if the deserted person marries seven years or more after the disappearance of his or her spouse there cannot be a conviction for bigamy.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is a clause in this bill to which no reference has been made.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes, I referred to it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I did not hear any reference to it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I said that one of the objects of the bill was to unify the law in all the provinces with respect to presumption of death. For instance, Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan have their own acts, but they are all different. The idea is to make one law applicable to the whole of Canada's marriage and divorce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand that if this bill becomes law and a presumedly dead husband or wife appears à la Enoch Arden, he or she is no longer married?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certainly.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Gershaw, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BONAVENTURE AND GASPÉ TELEPHONE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard moved the second reading of Bill P-6, an Act respecting The Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is much more a matter of fact than the one we have just heard about.

Hon. Mr. Horner: But not so interesting.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: On the other hand, it will not take so long to explain.

This bill has to do with a telephone company which was incorporated in 1907, and which does business in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure in the province of Quebec and in the counties of Restigouche and Gloucester in the province of New Brunswick.

When the company was incorporated its authorized capital stock was $100,000, and provision was made whereby this could be increased by an additional $150,000. Since its incorporation the company has doubled the number of its subscribers, but there has been no increase in its authorized capital stock. Needless to say, it is absolutely necessary for the company to increase its capital stock now if it wishes to improve its facilities and extend its services.

At the present time, the company has committed itself to an additional expense of $800,000 over the period of the next four years. One of the main purposes of the bill is to ask Parliament for authority to increase the authorized capital to $2 million, and to divide this into shares of a par value of $25 each. The par value of the present shares is $100, and the proposal is that existing shareholders will receive new shares in the proportion of four for one. The proposed changes will make it easier for the company to finance its operations and to get new capital.

The bill also provides the name of the company in French as well as in English. The reason for this is that the company does business in both the provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec.

A further effect of the bill is to change the date of the annual meeting, which at present is fixed for the first Thursday of September in each year. The bill repeals section 8 of the act of incorporation and thereby makes the date of the annual meeting conform with the company's fiscal year, which ends on December 31.

The bill would also give effect to the company's desire that amalgamation and acquisition or sale of property may be carried out with the consent of the majority of the shareholders, and under the supervision of the Board of Transport Commissioners. Since the present Act was passed, Parliament has given the Board of Transport Commissioners jurisdiction over telephone companies. The bill provides that all matters pertaining to this company shall come within the jurisdiction of the board.

Finally, the bill would give the company the right to furnish radio and television services and other improved means of communication, in line with the right enjoyed by other companies.

Honourable senators, I fail to see anything in this bill that is outside of the powers of any other telephone company, but if the bill is accepted by this house and read a second time, I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications for more detailed study.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

DIVORCE PETITIONS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 206 to 214, dealing with petitions for divorce, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

RECONSTRUCTION

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, on Tuesday evening last I undertook to obtain information as to when the reconstruction of the Parliamentary Library will be completed. Upon inquiry I find it was originally intended that the reconstruction would be sufficiently near completion to allow of the use of the library in the fall of 1955. However, the condition of the structure, particularly the walls and the upper portion of the building, and including the whole of the roof, has necessitated a great deal more rebuilding than was at first supposed to be necessary. In consequence it is now anticipated that the contractor will have completed his work about a year from now, around the month of April, 1956, and that by that time the Librarian and his staff can move from their present quarters in the House of Commons reading room to the library proper. It is estimated that to have all the books replaced in the library, and the reorganization completed, will require another six months. This additional time for the reorganization of the library, once the Librarians and their staffs are installed there, is accounted for by the fact that it was necessary to store many of the books elsewhere than in this building.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators. I beg to move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until Tuesday next at eight o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Hon. A. Neil McLean moved:

That the Standing Committee on Canadian Trade Relations be empowered to inquire into and report on:

1. What, in their opinion might be the most practical steps to further implement article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty whereby the signatories to that document agreed that: "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

2. That notwithstanding the generality of the foregoing, the committee be instructed and empowered to consider and report upon how, in their opinion,

(a) any project for developing economic collaboration specifically between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty can be co-ordinated with the trade policies of other countries of the free world;

(b) any project for developing economic collaboration between the countries which are signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, might have the same degree of permanence that is contemplated in the twenty year military obligation under article 5 of the treaty whereby "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all."

3. That the committee be empowered to extend an invitation to those wishing to be heard, including representatives of agriculture, industry, labour, trade, finance and consumers, to present their views, and that the committee also be empowered to hear representatives from business interests or individuals from any of the NATO countries who might wish to be heard.

4. That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to secure such services as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry.

The motion was agreed to.

NARCOTIC DRUG TRAFFIC

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

1. That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and report upon the traffic in narcotic drugs in Canada and problems related thereto.

2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Baird, Burchill, Gershaw, Grant, Hayden, Hawkins, Hodges, Horner, Hugessen, Leger, McDonald, McIntyre, Quinn, Reid, Stambaugh, Turgeon, Vaillancourt, Veniot and Woodrow.

3. That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

4. That the committee be instructed to report to the house from time to time its findings, together with such recommendations as it may see fit to make.

He said: Honourable senators, for some time there has been a growing awareness, both among members of this house and the public at large, of the need of an examination of the law restricting the sale and the distribution of drugs and narcotics. This need was emphasized in the Senate last year during the debate on Bill K-13, an Act to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and that debate quite properly received wide publicity. Early in the present session, when speaking on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I stated that I proposed to suggest to the Senate that a special committee of this house should be set up to inquire into this problem. Accordingly, I am now moving the motion which is before us for deliberation.

(Translation):

During the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the throne, the honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) had a word of praise for me and I wish to thank him sincerely for his kindness.

He stressed the evil effect of obscene literature on our youth. I am fully in accord with him, but I do not think that the matter can be discussed at the same time as the subject of drugs which should be looked into by a special committee. Hence, I have not included obscene literature in my motion which deals solely with an inquiry into the narcotic drug traffic.

(Text):

From certain reports which have appeared from time to time in the press, the impression might be gained that the problem of the sale and distribution of drugs and narcotics is out of hand. In fact, this is far from the case. In the year ending March 31, 1954 the actual number of cases of arrest reported by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was only 12 more than in the year 1953. The figures are: in 1953, 495 arrests, and in 1954, 507 arrests. In mentioning these figures, I would remind honourable senators that the number of arrests must be related to our total population of about 15 million people. Of course, the figure for the current year is not yet available, as our fiscal year ends on March 31, but I am reliably informed that there is a reduction from last year's figure.

Before proceeding to discuss the problem itself, I wish to remind honourable members that in undertaking this work we should be primarily concerned with devising ways and means of controlling the actual traffic of drugs and narcotics, as this is a federal responsibility. The treatment of drug addicts is a matter which, of course, falls within the ambit of provincial jurisdiction. Nevertheless, it may be, and we certainly hope, that out of the findings of this committee may emerge not only recommendations to the federal Government respecting control, but also many helpful suggestions which the provincial Governments might possibly find of some assistance in facing the phases of the drug problem falling within their jurisdiction.

I said earlier that last year the R.C.M.P. had reported 507 arrests. The estimated number of persons in Canada addicted to the use of narcotics is approximately 3,000; and while the majority of them are located on the West coast in and about the city of Vancouver, the problem is a very real one in the large centres of Toronto, Montreal, Hamilton, Windsor, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary. There is very little or no problem in the Maritimes, and as we all know it is virtually unknown in the rural areas.

Drug addicts may be broken down largely into three classes. First, there is the addict who suffers from a chronic medical disease and requires the administration of drugs. A man or woman in this class is not really an addict in the ordinary sense of the word, because the drugs are administered legally and the dosage is supervised by medical authorities. These people are not a problem for enforcement authorities. The second group comprises certain professional personnel who have ready access to narcotics and find them helpful in facing their problems. These are very few in number, and really do not require anything more than a passing mention. The third group, and the one which causes the authorities in this country most concern, comprises those who do not need drugs for any medical condition. It is recognized, however, by social and medical authorities that drug addicts are, for the most part, mentally disturbed and emotionally insecure people. They are people who have had such problems as broken homes, or who face difficult personality factors, or within whose experience a number of other elements have contributed to making them drug addicts.

It will be seen, therefore, that the solution of the drug problem requires, in addition to the criminal law enforcement feature, all possible suitable measures for removing the cause of the addiction and for effecting treatment and rehabilitation. It is not enough merely to imprison these people, if the causes of the addiction have not been removed or to some extent reduced, for they will become addicts again almost immediately upon discharge from an institution.

A great many drug addicts are primarily social and community problems. It must be admitted, unfortunately, that many of them have never been responsible and useful members of the communities in which they have lived. Because each one of them represents an individual problem, it is difficult to outline a program for the treatment of addicts generally. However, from time to time a variety of proposals have been made including the provision of free drugs in a limited quantity for the addict. Some people suggest that if this plan were adopted the crime of robbery, which is so prevalent in certain parts of Canada, and which many addicts commit in order to obtain money for the purchase of drugs, would possibly be done away with or greatly lessened. However, I may say that the experience of this country and others is that this plan has not proved as successful as had been hoped. In fact, it has often resulted in worse and more problems than it was intended to reduce or eliminate, and the authorities strongly oppose it.

There is in this country a belief that the man who traffics in drugs pursues a deliberate policy of recruiting unaddicted persons, particularly those in the teen-age group, in order to provide himself with a larger clientele. However, the enforcement officers in our country do not support that view, and I also find that it is not generally supported by our officials. I was interested to read an article on this subject by R. E. Curran in the January 1955 number of the Canadian Bar Review, beginning at the bottom of page 126 and continuing to page 127. The article reads:

> The reported prevalence of drug addiction among school attending juveniles and teen-agers in other countries has caused the situation in Canada to be most carefully examined. There is, however, no evidence here of drug addicition among this group. The records of convictions of persons under the age of twenty-one for narcotic offences show that almost invariably they were not attending school and, moreover, had long records of juvenile delinquency and were well known to the enforcement authorities before they became addicted to the use of drugs.

Honourable senators will therefore see that the work of the committee will largely be to consider the causes of this unfortunate problem with which this country is faced, to hear expert witnesses and to determine in what way the Government can make its most valuable contribution in resolving this unfortunate condition. The report of this committee, based upon an objective, cautious and factual assessment of the problem, may well become a document of the utmost importance and have far-reaching consequences in helping to found policy upon which the successful solution of this problem can rest.

I am sure that honourable senators who are not members of the committee will attend its meetings whenever possible and give every possible support to the members of the committee in carrying this important project to a successful conclusion. And may I add that thereby this house will make a very valuable contribution to the welfare of our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, I first want to congratulate the Government on bringing in this resolution. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that it is the most important item we have had on our program so far this session. I want to pay my sincere respects to the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) and the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). I do not know what effect their remarks had on other members of this house, but they made me realize as I had never realized before the seriousness of this problem. If good comes out of the work of the committee these two members can take a good deal of credit in their quiet moments for having urged consideration of this matter.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Now, I think there is no more important contribution—and I say this advisedly after long experience in this chamber and in other legislative places—I think there is no more important contribution that this house can make to the welfare of Canada than a proper investigation of this whole problem from start to finish. Let us spare no effort, nor time, nor expense, in getting at the facts of the matter. The result of this committee's proceedings will, I am sure, compare very favourably with that which accrued some years ago from the work of a committee of this house on the income tax problem. Certainly if we can help the law enforcement officers of this country to get at the causes of and to eradicate the illicit peddling of drugs it will go down in history as one of the great achievements of the Senate; and the people of Canada will be more grateful for this achievement than for anything else we have done in a long time.

Now, honourable senators, there is a little sidelight that I would like to focus on this committee. As you all know, I come from the province of Manitoba. Well, apparently my province must be considered to have no drug addiction problem, for not a single senator from Manitoba has been named to the committee. And Manitoba is the only province not represented in the proposed list of members.

Hon. Mr. Howden: Anyone who thinks we have no drug addiction problem in Manitoba does not know the facts.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Quite so. I know about the problem, as a lawyer. What I am pointing out now is that not a single senator from Manitoba has been named to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that the omission drawn to our attention by the honourable Leader of the Opposition is an oversight. It is an important one, though. I would second an amendment if the honourable Leader of the Opposition moved one, that the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) be added to the committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He is the best representative from Manitoba that we could have on that committee, and I would heartily move an amendment to that effect.

Now, to come back to the general subject. I hope the committee will devote a good deal of time to this inquiry, because a very distressful situation exists in this country today. Whether what they write is true or not, a number of magazines published in this country are carrying articles to the effect that the present trouble in Vancouver, outside of the trouble that ordinarily exists in a seaport, arises out of a struggle between two powerful elements to control the illicit drug traffic in that city. They are fighting it out for the purpose of determining who will control the illicit drug market in British Columbia. It is rather startling that a periodical would even suggest that such a condition of affairs exists, and I feel as did the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) when she said she would like to see the higher-ups hanged. I agree with her, and I will promise to be there when she does the hanging. It is terrible what can happen to people who become victims of the illicit drug traffic.

In my home town of Alexander, Manitoba, when I was a boy, a very able practising doctor, a graduate of Edinburgh University, an honours man, had this dreadful habit of taking drugs, and the results were simply awful. Even with all his ability and training he could not resist the temptation, and he would break down every three or four months.

The proposed committee, with the addition of the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden), is a good one. It will render a service that we will all be proud of. I for one will give every assistance within my power that the committee can ask for, and will do all I can to make its study of this problem as thorough as possible. Some senators while attending meetings of this committee may miss meetings of other committees, but on any such occasions we will try to arrange to have their views given expression to before those other committees. Let us give this committee on the narcotic drug traffic a wide open field in which to make a real contribution towards solving the problem.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Honourable senators, I would just like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald). He mentioned a figure of three thousand known addicts in Canada. Surely there are more than that. I noticed in the press a statement that there are two thousand known addicts in the city of Vancouver alone. I should think that, for the whole of Canada, ten thousand would be nearer the mark.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My information comes from a very good source. The honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) says there are two thousand addicts in Vancouver. He may be right: I am not sure of my figures in that respect. I know that there are a great many drug addicts in Vancouver. But the estimate of three thousand for all Canada comes from a very reliable source.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the honourable leader, because in one respect his resolution is a little ambiguous. Its purpose is to set up a committee to inquire into and report upon the traffic in narcotic drugs. There is a traffic in narcotic drugs which is perfectly legal: manufacturers sell to wholesalers; wholesalers sell to drugstores and hospitals, and drugstores supply doctors. I take it the intention is, not that the committee shall probe and inquire into these activities, which are perfectly legal, but rather that it shall direct its attention to the illicit or illegal traffic in drugs.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The reason for not limiting the inquiry in the way the honourable senator suggests is that, as he says, there is a legal form of traffic in these drugs, namely through doctors and drugstores. But I think the committee might like to follow that up to find out how the supplies are obtained from drugstores. Presumably the distribution is carried on legally: I am not suggesting anything to the contrary, but possibly there may be some illegality in the way of connivance. From time to time, as I mentioned it before, proposals have been made to widen the legal basis of sale. These suggestions are not approved by the experts with whom I have spoken. No doubt that matter also will come before the committee.

Hon. Mr. King: The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has referred to the legal trade in drugs through the medical profession, but I do not favour the exclusion of this matter from the inquiry. As I understand it, there is in existence an international agreement relating to manufacture and sale by manufacturers. I believe we should try to arrive at some plan to more effectively control the international sale of drugs and enable proper supervision of distribution from the manufacturing centres. If this business could be controlled internationally, I believe the sale of drugs in Canada and in the world at large could be limited through proper safeguards. One of the most important things this committee could do is to impress upon the world at large the serious effects which the indiscriminate sale of certain drugs has in general, not merely in the city of Vancouver. Years ago, when I was in New York, the drug traffic was rampant there, and today it is operating in all the large cities. So I hope the committee will do something to impress upon our own nation and other countries the necessity for proper control of manufacture and sale.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: May I briefly explain to the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) why no representative of Manitoba was nominated for the committee. I had something to do with the selection. The member for St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden) was not nominated because he is very busy in the Divorce Committee; and he will be even busier next session if the bill introduced yesterday by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) passes into law. I understand that another Manitoba senator, the senator from Provencher (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), is occupied with duties which prevent him from acting on this committee. If at any time any honourable senator who is not on the committee desires to be appointed to it, all he need do is to notify the honourable Government Leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) or myself, and it will not be long before his name is added.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved in amendment by the Honourable Senator Haig, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, that the name of the Honourable Senator Howden be added to the list of members of the special committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question, honourable senators, is on the motion as amended:

1. That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to inquire into and report upon the traffic in narcotic drugs in Canada and problems related thereto.
2. That the said committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Baird, Burchill, Gershaw, Grant, Hayden, Hawkins, Hodges, Horner, Howden, Hugessen, Leger, McDonald, McIntyre, Quinn, Reid, Stambaugh, Turgeon, Vaillancourt, Veniot and Woodrow.
3. That the committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.
4. That the committee be instructed to report to the house from time to time its findings, together with such recommendations as it may see fit to make.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT BILL

ORDER FOR THIRD READING STANDS

On the Order for the third reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Library of Parliament Act.—Hon. Mr. Lambert:

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I have been asked by one honourable member of this house to request that this motion shall stand until Tuesday next. The honourable senator from Ponteix (Hon. Mr. Marcotte) cannot be here today, and he would like to speak on the third reading. If he could have that privilege I would appreciate it very much.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands.

PRIVATE BILL

LONDON AND PORT STANLEY RAILWAY COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. William H. Taylor moved the second reading of Bill Q-6, an Act respecting the London and Port Stanley Railway Company and the Corporation of the City of London.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill probably requires a brief explanation on second reading, and I have been requested by the Corporation of the City of London to make this explanation to the Senate.

The London and Port Stanley Railway Company was incorporated in 1853, some fourteen years before Confederation. By 1903 this small railway of 24·5 miles ran from the City of London, Ontario, through St. Thomas to Port Stanley, a lakeport on the north shore of Lake Erie. The sidings and terminals extended about forty-seven miles.

The financing of this line of railway was guaranteed by a bond issue from the municipalities through which the railway passed, but by 1903 the City of London had become the holder of all the bonds issued for the construction of the railway. The railway has never been able to pay any bond interest or any part of the principal, all of which is long overdue.

In 1913 the City of London entered into an agreement with the London and Port Stanley Railway Company to take over the operation of the railway for ninety-nine years from January 1, 1914. The Statutes of Canada, 1914, Chapter 96, confirmed the lease and authorized the city to carry on the railway operation by electricity or steam, and either by itself or by a statutory agent to be known as the London Railway Commission.

Under the terms of the lease the cost of electrification was to be a lien and charge against the railway company. In 1954 the city's investment by way of bonds, accrued interest on bonds and for electrification was in the neighbourhood of $7 million, which is acknowledged to be greatly in excess of the value of the railway. The city also by this time had acquired over 95 per cent of the outstanding shares of the company. The city is the company's only creditor, and by reason of the charge against the assets for outstanding bonds and for electrification the shares have no possible value.

In order to simplify the operation of the railway and to enable the city to plan for the future, an agreement was entered into on January 10, 1955, between the railway company and the city for the transfer of all the company's assets to the city, in consideration of the city releasing the company from its obligations to the city.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the proposed legislation is to confirm this agreement and to make such other amendments in the legislation as have become necessary because of the transfer of the assets of the railway to the city as owner. I might review the sections of the bill very briefly.

Section 1 confirms the agreement. Section 2 is necessary because in the interests of economy it may be decided to operate the railway by diesel power instead of electricity or steam, as provided in the earlier legislation.

Section 3 is necessary in order to correct an omission in earlier legislation which failed to provide as to qualifications or disqualifications of commissioners of the London Railway Commission.

Section 4 is necessary to more clearly define the powers of the London Railway Commission. Section 5 is necessary because the Railway Act, while providing for the sale of the assets or undertakings of railway companies, does not contain legislation specifically covering a railway owned by a municipal corporation. If at a future time it appeared desirable to lease or sell the railway operation, section 5 would provide the machinery.

Section 6 of the bill provides for the machinery to end the corporate existence of the London and Port Stanley Railway Company. The company has no debts or liabilities except to the City of London, and on parting with its assets there is no need to continue the existence of the company.

Honourable senators, I believe that is a general explanation of the bill in principle. If the bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and I have an assurance that the solicitor for the City of London is prepared to appear before the committee to provide honourable senators with any information they wish.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Would the honourable gentleman be good enough to inform us, in respect to section 2 of the bill, whether the railway is at present being operated by steam and, if so, from whom it procures its coal? I am wondering from what part of the country the coal is obtained.

Hon. Mr. Taylor: In 1913 the line was electrified. Prior to that time the railway had an agreement with interests in Cleveland, Ohio, to supply the coal by boat service across Lake Erie. The railway was able to obtain its coal from this source much more conveniently and cheaply than from anywhere else. If the railway continues to operate, it is hoped that diesel power will be used.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Taylor the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. F. W. Gershaw: Honourable senators, first, I wish to congratulate the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on bringing this bill before Parliament, and also to commend him for his great contribution as Chairman of the Committee on Divorce for so many years.

I am voting for the second reading of this bill, because I believe the present practice in regard to divorce is not the best that can be devised. I have listened to the evidence in about a thousand divorce cases, and I am firmly convinced that some couples obtain divorce in Canada who should not be divorced, and that others who cannot obtain divorce should, in the interests of all concerned, be able to do so.

In 1912, a royal commission which was appointed in England for the purpose of studying this whole problem, reported as follows:

> Divorce is not a disease, but a remedy for a disease. Homes are not broken up by the courts but by the causes referred to.

This indicates that homes are hopelessly broken up before the parties ever come to the divorce courts.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: The report goes on to say:

> No law should be so harsh as to lead to its common disregard. No law should be so lax as to lessen the regard for the sanctity of marriage.

What is harsh about our present divorce practice? Simply this, that no matter how intolerable the marriage life of the spouses may be, no matter how horrible the example to the children in their tender years, no matter how acute the suffering, there is no release unless the crime of adultery, or the crime of perjury, is resorted to. Honourable senators, I suggest that adultery is a crime, although not so recognized by the laws of our country. It is so regarded by the law in the province of New Brunswick. It is rather shocking to see men and women stand in the witness box and, under oath, without a blush or without emotion volunteer the statement that they had committed adultery. I feel strongly that adultery should be a crime according to our laws. It is, indeed, a moral crime. If it were a crime by law, there would be fewer co-respondents, and not so many hotel-room cases brought before the divorce committee.

We all sincerely regret the breaking up of family life. The family, of course, is the foundation of our society, and children are our greatest national asset. We realize that everything possible should be done to prevent a family from breaking up. Instruction should be given to young people about the sanctity of marriage, and if friction occurs a proctor or some wise counsellor should attempt to bring the parties together. However, this malady does exist in our midst, and we must take a realistic view of the matter, because it is right before us. I say that it is an obligation on the part of this High Court of Parliament to take whatever steps its members feel should be taken in the interests of those involved in homes that are wrecked. In undertaking that obligation, should not the real reason for failure in a marriage be considered and inquired into? Of course, adultery is one disaster; but other disasters also come to the home, and I think that they, too, should receive careful consideration throughout Canada.

It has been said, from time to time, that divorce cases are hastily considered and carelessly recommended by the Divorce Committee. That is not so. When a petitioner comes before the committee, the committee is careful to make sure, first, that the marriage occurred and that it was a legal marriage. Domicile is then determined, and that is a very important factor. The committee then makes sure that the offence alleged is proven beyond doubt. More than one witness is required for proof. Every accused person has the opportunity of clearing his or her honour. Money is provided, if necessary, for a woman defendant who wishes to come and plead her case. Notice of the time and place of the hearing is issued, so that all the parties will know about it. The chairman, or judge, makes sure that no collusion, connivance or condonation exists. In cases where it seems that unduly heavy expense to the parties is involved, the usual parliamentary fee of $210 may be reduced to as low as $75 or $50. It will be seen, therefore, that every opportunity is given for a case to be heard and to ensure that the real facts of the case are brought out. A recommendation for divorce by one of our committees is almost always unanimous.

Honourable senators, I have mentioned those facts to indicate that if this bill is passed—because I believe it will be passed at some time—the same care as in the past will be taken to provide justice in these domestic tragedies. Lawyers who appear before the committee carry out their duties very well, but no member of a committee is influenced by the pleading of a lawyer, because no pleading is permitted. Each member of the committee must make up his or her own mind.

May I say here, honourable senators, that no member who hears evidence in these cases does so without having an urge to do the very best possible for those involved in a family break-up. There is something about the atmosphere that impresses one and creates a desire to do one's duty and help the innocent in homes that are blighted.

Honourable senators, I think that some urgent consideration should be given to those unhappy cases for which at present there is no relief, so that people will not find it necessary either to pretend to commit adultery or to actually commit adultery in order to get a divorce.

Generally speaking, the bill before us simply suggests three new grounds for divorce. The first with which I will deal is cruelty. Everyone knows that in some homes in this country women are treated with great cruelty and receive violent beatings from time to time. This may come from hatred, bad temper, cruel mentality, or from one or more other causes. For that reason, I think that the plea of cruelty should receive some consideration. It may be difficult to give a legal definition of cruelty, but I would say that the ground should not be mental cruelty, or incompatibility, nor should the offence be flimsy or frivolous. Perhaps the ground of cruelty should be constituted not by a single offence, but rather by repeated acts of inhuman treatment whereby a woman lives in constant danger of bodily injury or death. Then, surely, some relief should be given.

I hope that in committee "cruelty" will be sufficiently well defined so that we shall not have to rely for its interpretation on judgments of the Hight Court of England.

The second ground, that of desertion, when it is complete and permanent, might well be considered a cause for divorce. I do think, however, that absence for a term of three years is too short a period to constitute desertion within the meaning of the bill.

The third suggested ground, that of mental illness, is one to which I have given a great deal of thought. Married couples are bound together in sickness and in health, and the term "insanity", as used in the bill, is a sickness of the mind. I believe, however, that insanity should constitute a ground for divorce only in extreme cases. To illustrate, may I cite such a case?

About thirty years ago a couple, then about twenty years of age, were married. After a baby girl was born to them the mother became hopelessly insane and was committed to a mental hospital, where she still is. She never knew that she had a child; she never recognized her husband again; she has no mentality whatever. Her husband looked after the girl until, in her late twenties, she married. He, now in his early fifties, wishes to marry again, but he cannot do so.

That seems to me to illustrate the type of extreme case to which I referred, involving hopeless insanity. It is quite well defined in the bill, and I think shoud be accepted as a ground for divorce.

I turn now to the subject of avoidance. Section 12, on page 6 of the bill, reads in part as follows:

> Subject to section 13 . . . a marriage shall be voidable by the court on the grounds . . .
> (b) that either party to the marriage was at the time of the marriage . . . subject to recurrent fits of insanity or epilepsy.

The word "insanity" is pretty well hedged around with qualifications so that no hasty action would likely be taken. But, in the case of avoidance, I think the term "epilepsy" should be more carefully defined. There are, as honourable senators know, many forms of epilepsy: For instance, grand mal, petit mal, Jacksonian seizure and psychical disturbance. Some of them are curable, and nearly all can be controlled. It is my hope that the committee to which the bill is referred will see fit to recommend some amendment to this section.

Honourable senators, I feel the introduction of this bill is a good thing, and I hope that when it does become law, if it does, it will contribute to the wellbeing of Canada and the increase of human happiness.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Hodges, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

VICTORIA INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill B-8, an Act to incorporate Victoria Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is in the usual form for the incorporation of a company, and is similar to many others that have come before us. The purpose of the company seeking incorporation in this instance is to conduct various types of insurance in this country, under the name of Victoria Insurance Company of Canada.

The substantial shareholder of the company would be the Insurance Company of Turin, Italy. I am advised that the companies associated with the parent operation in Italy enjoy high standing in the fields of insurance and finance in the northern part of that country.

The bill, which is not unusual in any of its aspects, provides for an authorized capitalization of $1 million—the amount usually asked for in such instances—a subscribed capital of $500,000, and a paid up capital of $360,000 before the company is permitted to carry on certain named types of insurance business, the principal ones being fire and casualty.

The bill also provides for substantial additions to capital in each year for a period of five years; and further, that additional amounts of capital must be subscribed before the company may venture into those classes of business set out in subsection 2 of section 7.

Honourable senators, I have dealt with the more important aspects of the bill, and if additional information is required it can be secured when the bill is considered in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILL

CALEDONIAN-CANADIAN INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-8, an Act respecting Caledonian-Canadian Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is another bill by which certain persons are seeking to be incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of insurance in Canada. I am sure the very sound of the name of the proposed company will strike a responsive and supporting chord in many of the honourable senators present.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Don't make me blush!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: And may I for that purpose emphasize the name by which the company desires to be known in the conduct of its business in Canada—Caledonian-Canadian Insurance Company.

The Caledonian Insurance Company of Edinburgh is an old and very well-known insurance company. It has been carrying on business for, I think, 150 years, and for at least seventy years in Canada. Up to the present the business in Canada has been carried on by what is known as Caledonian-American Insurance Company, with the management being provided by the Caledonian Insurance Company of Edinburgh.

If this bill is approved by Parliament, a separate Canadian company will be set up under the name, Caledonian-Canadian Insurance Company, and that company will carry on the classes of business in Canada prescribed by this bill; and in addition the bill provides that it will take over the present operations carried on by the Caledonian-American Insurance Company.

Honourable senators will note that the bill contains the usual provision with respect to capital: authorized capital, $1 million; subscribed capital, $500,000; and, in this case, paid-up capital of $400,000. In other aspects this is the usual form of bill for purposes of this kind. If the Senate sees fit to approve the bill on second reading I will move that it be referred to committee, where any questions in the minds of honourable senators can be answered.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL ARCHITECTURAL INSTITUTE OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill D-8, an Act to consolidate and amend Acts relating to The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Is that title approved?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. If the honourable senator wishes, we can have some discussion on that point.

This bill is for the purpose of amending and consolidating statutes which up to the present time have governed the operations of The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. Before any question is raised about one of the words in the title, may I say that the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada was originally incorporated by statute of the Parliament of Canada in 1908. At that time it was known as "The Architecutural Institute of Canada". There were subsequent amending statutes, one passed in 1912, another in 1929. These facts, I think, establish not only a precedent but a sort of hoary antiquity for the title under which the institute operates, for it was in 1912, by virtue of the amending statute, that the name was changed to "The Royal Architectural Institute of Canada". So the problem which may be lying somewhere forward or back of the minds of some honourable senators since their promiscuous reading of the past week has not the foundation it might otherwise have.

The purpose of this bill is to amend and also to consolidate the three statutes under which this organization has functioned. The institute is a body superimposed so to speak on the governing bodies of architects in the various provinces of Canada. These organizations are provincially incorporated, and this bill like the act under which the institute operates, does not interfere with or intrude in any way upon the powers of the provincial organizations in relation to their governmental functions or with the practice and the schooling related to the profession. In order to qualify for membership in the Royal Institute an applicant must be a member of what is called a component association. This component association is the provincial organization and the governing body within the province in its particular field.

Time teaches, and sometimes educates, and as a result of this process the objects as originally stated have been redrafted and broadened to satisfy the concept of what should be the Institute's function today. Also it has been wisely decided to introduce more flexibility into the methods whereby persons can become members of the Royal Institute; and instead of placing a fixed formula in the statute, a more elastic formula, which may be varied by regulation, is proposed.

The Institute is ambitious, as all organizations should be if they are to go along and get anywhere. Years ago provision was made to limit the funds which it could accumulate and hold in expectation of the day when it might erect a building proper and suitable to house its activities. At that time the estimate of an adequate sum was $200,000. Now its members feel—and I do not know any group in a better position to know—that this sum would not produce the kind of edifice which would be worthy of their occupancy; and it is proposed to vest the Institute with authority to set aside and hold for building purposes a larger amount, namely, $500,000.

Briefly, these are the purposes which it is sought to accomplish, and the respects in which earlier legislation is amended, by this bill. Otherwise the purpose is to consolidate existing legislation.

If the bill should receive second reading I shall move to send it to committee.

Hon. Mr. Farris: In a general way, what are the objects of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The objects, which are set out very generally in the bill, are to promote a better relationship between not only the component associations and other architectural groups with which an affiliation exists—for instance, in other countries—but also to endeavour by education and other appropriate means to set higher standards for the architectural profession and activities incidental to it.

The bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 24, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Nancy Hodges: Honourable senators, I should like first to congratulate the sponsor of this bill on his courage in bringing it in. Apparently it requires courage, as I notice that seventeen years have passed since a similar bill was introduced. Also, may I congratulate the honourable senator who seconded the bill on his able presentation of his views on the subject.

I want to make it quite clear at the beginning that I am supporting the principle of this measure. It may be that some of us will take exception to small details, but these matters can be hammered out in the committee to which, I am sure, the bill will be referred.

But let me make it equally clear, honourable senators, that my support of this bill does not mean that I believe in divorce. I do not believe in divorce. I am against it; but one has to be practical and realistic. One hears it frequently said that an ideal marriage is made in heaven. But when one has lived as long as I have, and has served on our Divorce Committee, as I have, for even a short time, one is forced to the conclusion that a good many marriages are made far from that place, in another place; and when I say "in another place", honourable senators, I do not mean the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: As I said before, one has to be realistic. I agree with the honourable gentleman from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) that divorce is not the cause of broken homes, for homes are broken long before the husband and wife get to the divorce court. We all know—at least, anyone who has served on the Senate Divorce Committee knows—that under our present laws adultery is the only recognized cause for divorce, except in the province of Nova Scotia. At this juncture I want to say that I am not advocating easier divorce, by any means. I think that broadening the grounds for divorce would not mean easier divorce, for frankly I do not think there is any easier way of getting a divorce than under our present law, which merely requires proof or so-called proof of a single act of adultery.

I should like to say without any reflection upon anybody connected with the Divorce Committee or the work of the committee that at times I have suspected there have been stage settings of a certain kind to permit divorce being achieved. As honourable senators know, adultery is one of those causes concerning which one usually has to accept circumstantial evidence, since it is very seldom that the parties are actually caught in the act. In my estimation the divorce laws of our country tend to be brought into disrepute by present practices which recognize marital infidelity as the only ground for obtaining divorce. To illustrate what I mean, I would refer honourable senators to an article appearing in the Montreal Gazette of February 19 of this year. It is date-lined Ottawa, Februry 18, and reads as follows:

> Last Nov. 24 two Montreal private detectives were sentenced to 15 months when convicted in Ottawa for trying to set up a phony love nest to gather evidence for a divorce case.
> Maurice Pichette, 36, and Paul Santerre, 35, were convicted of attempting to fabricate evidence and of operating as private detectives in Ontario without a licence. They pleaded guilty to the latter charge and were fined $200 apiece.

Apparently they were convicted on the latter charge but not on the former. The report goes on:

> They were arrested after police alleged they installed a 25-year-old Ottawa waitress in a hotel room here and then tried to arrange a rendezvous between her and a city man. The intended victim became suspicious, however, and police kept the rendezvous instead. The waitress was fined $50.
> Passing sentence, Magistrate Glenn E. Strike said: The waitress gave evidence that she was to go into the hotel room, muss up the bed, open a bottle of liquor and make the situation appear as she said, "bad", before the private detectives walked in. An innocent man caught in such a trap might suffer greatly.

Honourable senators, that illustrates what I mean when I say that our present system of recognizing adultery as the only grounds for divorce leads to easy divorce. I want to make it quite clear that I am not condemning all private detectives or all divorce cases brought before the Divorce Committee. It would be utterly absurd to do so, but this practice of depending on marital infidelity alone as a ground for divorce lends itself to what I would call shady testimony.

As I said before, I am not advocating easier divorce. But I am glad to see that the bill introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) makes provision for divorce on the additional grounds of cruelty, desertion and incurable insanity. I am particularly pleased that the bill stipulates that no petition for divorce on any of these grounds shall be entertained until a period of three years shall have elapsed since the date of the marriage. I am also glad to note that where incurable insanity is alleged as a ground, it will be necessary to prove that the respondent has been under continuous treatment for at least five years.

The reason why I am pleased that the bill includes incurable insanity as a ground—and this is particularly what I want to speak about tonight—is that I know a number of instances where incurable insanity has created a great deal of hardship and suffering in homes. And when I say incurable insanity I mean just that. The science and study of mental illness have advanced to such a point that there is very little likelihood of someone who is in fact sane being called insane. That may have been a possibility a few years ago, but the possibility has passed now, because most of our institutions—and I am speaking particularly of those in British Columbia—have advanced to such a scientific point that many people who once might have been considered hopelessly insane are, after appropriate treatment, cured and discharged.

I should like to read to honourable senators a letter I received from a woman in Victoria.

It was sent to me on December 16, 1953, the date that I was appointed to the Senate Divorce Committee. It reads:

> Dear Madam: May I bring to your attention and also those members at Ottawa concerning myself and husband, as he has been confined to a mental hospital since the year 1926. We were married in 1922 in Victoria, B.C. I have two daughters, the oldest one was not three years of age . . .

That was at the time the husband went to the institution.

> . . . and the baby at that time was four months old. Now they are both married and I have three grandchildren. I myself am now 51 years old in May. At the time that my husband was first confined to the mental hospital he was working in Colfax, California. Myself and children were still in Victoria, B.C., and I had a letter from the doctor at Stockton State Mental hospital that my husband had a positive case of syphilis which he must have contracted while in the U.S.A. as I had several tests of myself here and both I and the children did not have it.
> I have tried to get a divorce here, but as the lawyer says cannot prove adultery as to him having committed it and contracting syphilis although we had a very short time of married life together as he was working in California most of the time. My husband did go out with other women in Victoria right from the start of our marriage. He also did not send me any expense money to live on while he was away and I had to get groceries and milk for the babies from what was then known as the "Friendly Help" in Victoria. Later I went to the Chief of Police, John Fry, in Victoria and he contacted police in California and my husband sent me ten dollars per week until he was confined to mental hospital. Later he was returned to British Columbia and is in Colquitz Mental Home.

I would point out that the Colquitz Mental Home is an institution for the criminally insane and the incurably insane.

> I myself hope that something can be done for such people placed in my position. Surely we are entitled to a few years of happiness, and some security, by being given the chance to marry again, as I wish to marry again a man I met several years ago. Surely something can be done about the divorce law, or are we still living in the dark ages? I myself was born in Victoria, lived here all my life, but the more I sit and think about some of our laws the more disgusted I get with our law-makers. I myself think that it is laws like ours that drive people to do things that otherwise they would not. My health at present is not of the best, as a few years back I worked all night at nursing, then did my own work at home, and looked after the two girls. So, Mrs. Hodges, all I ask is that something can be done and soon, I hope, for everyone placed in the same position as myself.

This lady signs her name, but adds at the foot of the letter:

> For the happiness of my family, I hope my name will not be used in public.

Honourable senators, I maintain that a woman who has lived like that for thirty years, under conditions beyond her control, should be entitled to some redress. If she had not been a decent woman she would have gone off and lived with the other man whom she met a few years ago. Why should she be penalized for being a decent woman? Why should that woman not have redress from what is obviously an unhappy marriage, when other people can get a divorce by going out and simulating—yes, simulating—an act of adultery? I feel that in the interests of fair play and justice people like her should be entitled to relief.

I know that some honourable senators will say, "Oh, if we start doing that sort of thing, there will be no end to it." But in these days of stress and world tension and—we may as well face it—the lowering of moral standards, a great many people are not prepared to do as this decent woman is doing, but are likely to say, "Well, I can't get along with my husband, so I will get along with another man." Until we do something to broaden our divorce laws we shall continue to contribute to the number of people who are determined to—let us be perfectly frank and call it by the right name—"live in sin."

Honourable senators, I am not going to say any more. I did not intend to speak at any length, but I wanted to put forward this point about which I feel so strongly, and to make it clear that I will support the bill when the time comes to do so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Barbour, the debate was adjourned.

NARCOTIC DRUG TRAFFIC

COMMITTEE QUORUM REDUCED—AUTHORITY TO PRINT PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Thomas Reid, Chairman of the Special Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the traffic in narcotic drugs, presented the report of the committee.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the traffic in narcotic drugs beg leave to report, as follows:

The committee recommend:—

1. That its quorum be reduced to seven members.
2. That it be authorized to print 800 copies in English and 200 copies in French of its proceedings, and that Rule 100 be suspended in relation to the said printing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Reid: With leave of the house, I move that the report be adopted now.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

BONAVENTURE AND GASPE TELEPHONE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill P-6.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to whom was referred the Bill P-6, intituled: "An Act respecting The Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited", have in obedience to the order of reference of February 23, 1955, examined the said Bill, and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 3, line 46: delete the word "ordinary"
2. Page 3, line 48; delete the word "ordinary"
3. Page 3, line 49: delete the word "ordinary"
4. Page 4, line 22: delete the words "either ordinary or perference, or both",
5. Page 4, lines 39 and 40: delete the words "ordinary stock" and substitute the following word therefor: "shares".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave of the Senate, I move that the report be concurred in now. Perhaps I should add that these amendments are all of a comparatively minor character, and merely improve the draftmanship of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

FURTHER AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, in the interests of good drafting, I would suggest that an expression which occurs three times in this bill be struck out. I am sure it would have been deleted in committee this morning if attention had been focused on the point. I discussed the matter with the honourable senator who sponsored the bill (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), and he agrees with me that the deletions should be made. In one part of the bill there is the expression "majority in value of the shareholders". What is meant is "majority of the shareholders."

In another place are the words "two-thirds in value of the issued ordinary shares"; and on the next page the words "two-thirds in value of the subscribed ordinary stock". All the shares are of the same value, so obviously what is meant is, respectively, "two-thirds of the issued ordinary shares" and "two-thirds of the subscribed ordinary stock".

Therefore I move, with leave, that the bill be further amended, as follows:

P. 1, line 21. Leave out the words "in value".
P. 3, line 48. Leave out the words "in value".
P. 4, line 39. Leave out the words "in value".

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Honourable senators, the amendments proposed by the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden) are perfectly agreeable. They will further improve the draftsmanship of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

LONDON AND PORT STANLEY RAILWAY COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

Hon. Mr. Hugessen, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the report of the committee on Bill Q-6.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Transport and communications to whom was referred the Bill Q-6, intituled: "An Act respecting The London and Port Stanley Railway Company and the Corporation of the City of London", have in obedience to the order of reference of February 24, 1955, examined the said bill, and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendment:

Page 1, line 22: delete line 22 and substitute the following therefor: "the force and power of electricity, steam, oil, fuel or other energy".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: With leave, now.

Honourable senators, the amendment which has just been read is of comparatively small import. The bill provides for the taking over and operation by the City of London of the London and Port Stanley Railway. One of the provisions in the bill was that the City of London could operate the railway by electricity, steam, oil or other fuel. In committee the observation was made that the possible use of atomic energy had been overlooked. The amendment is suggested, therefore, for the purpose of allowing the use of atomic energy, if it becomes necessary and possible.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Taylor: With leave, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

PLAINS EASTERN PIPE LINES LTD.—
REFUND OF FEES

Hon. Mr. Wood: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move:

That the parliamentary fees paid upon a proposed bill of the 1952 session of Parliament intituled "An Act to incorporate Plains Eastern Pipe Lines Ltd.", be refunded to Messrs. Stalker, Howard and Stalker, Montreal, Quebec, solicitors for petitioners, less the sum of $25 to apply on printing and other costs.

I might say that the petitioners paid $150 on account of parliamentary fees and did not proceed with the petition or the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

ST. MARY'S RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY

FIRST READING

Hon. Mr. Farquhar presented bill N-8, an Act to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be placed on the Order Paper for second reading?

Hon. Mr. Farquhar: Tuesday next.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Norman P. Lambert moved the third reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Library of Parliament Act.

Hon. Arthur Marcotte: Honourable senators, I will not make a speech. I will just say a few words. First of all I want to thank the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) for the courtesy which he has shown to me in this matter. I thank him. I had a chat with him last night in which he told me that he was very anxious to have the bill voted upon this afternoon, and he asked me if I was ready to speak. I said I would try. Owing to unfortunate circumstances, honourable senators, I was denied the time necessary to get ready to present to you something worthy of you and, if I may say so, worthy of myself. As some of you know, I have been sick, very sick. For months my doctor has been urging me to keep away from this chamber. I said: "Doctor, do you want to kill me? It is not the role of doctors to kill patients. Let me go there. It is my home; I want to be with my friends; I want to be happy." Here is where I work; and I am not able to keep away from work. I am always here at eight o'clock in the morning; I leave at ten o'clock at night; I am busy all day. But this has nothing to do with the matter. The subject before us is very important, and I would have been only too pleased to gather my notes together and address you in a proper way. But I cannot do it. I am told to rest myself: I will rest myself.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question is on the motion for the third reading of Bill B, an Act to amend the Library of Parliament Act.

Hon. Mr. Marcotte: Hold a minute. I would like to have a recorded vote on this bill. I understand that five honourable senators must rise to ask for it.

Some Hon. Senators: Two.

Hon. Mr. Marcotte: My leader, will you stand up with me?

Hon. Mr. Haig rose.

The Hon. the Speaker: The bill has been read the third time, on division.

Hon. Mr. Marcotte: No, I want a recorded vote, not "on division". I want to know how honourable members vote.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Lambert was agreed to on the following division:

WINNIPEG AND ST. BONIFACE HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Arthur L. Beaubien moved the second reading of Bill D, an Act to amend the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very short bill. The Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commission was incorporated by chapter 55 of the statutes of 1912, and the act was amended in 1938. At the present time the corporation consists of seven members: three appointed by the City of Winnipeg, two by the City of St. Boniface, one by the municipality of East Kildonan and one by the municipality of West Kildonan. These commissioners serve without remuneration.

Under the existing provisions of the act the quorum for the transaction of business is six. The corporation has reported that because the members have a variety of business interests it is frequently found impossible to arrange for attendance of the present quorum. In the circumstances, the Corporation is desirous of having its act amended to provide that the quorum shall be simply a majority of the members. This would place the corporation's attendance requirement on the same basis as that of the other harbour commissions.

The bill would amend the act in accordance with the request of the commissioners. If the bill receives second reading and any member of the house desires to have it referred to committee, I will move that this be done.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I do not rise to object to the bill, but I should like to be clear as to whether the honourable senator from Provencher (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) said the number of commissioners was to be increased to seven, or that there are seven commissioners now.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: There are seven now. The bill simply provides that a majority of the commissioners will constitute a quorum at business meetings. As I said before, the commissioners have various business interests to attend to besides their work on the commission, and frequently it is impossible to obtain the present quorum of members at commission meetings. Therefore it is desired to change the quorum, so that instead of a fixed quorum of six, the majority in attendance at a meeting will constitute a quorum.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I wish to assure the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) that no ships have been lost in the harbour since it was opened many years ago, and it is not expected that any will be lost there within the next few years, so it appears likely a quorum of four will be able to carry on the business. If an inquiry were made as to the volume of freight carried on the river, I think it would be found that about one boat of lumber passes down the river in a year, and the same boat returns next year.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I understood the honourable senator from Provencher (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) to say that a majority of the commissioners attending a meeting will constitute a quorum. What will constitute a quorum is not a majority of the commissioners attending a meeting, but rather a majority of the commissioners, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: That is what I intended to convey to honourable senators, and I thought I had done so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I wanted to be sure that I understood correctly.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: What will constitute a quorum is simply a majority of the commission.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: If a majority of the commissioners are present at a meeting, there will be a quorum.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Next sitting.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 1, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), the promoter of this bill, has a long and honoured experience in this chamber and in the Senate Divorce Committee. Also he has had in his own province an extensive practice in divorce cases, and, no doubt, has received many letters from married people who are separated and are looking for some source of relief. In his kindness, and from his genuine interest in people, he has sponsored the bill which is now before us.

I have every sympathy for married people who cannot get along together and find it necessary to separate; they may feel that it would be a bit of hell on earth to continue to live together. But very often the husband or wife sows the seed that eventually reaps a completely unhappy marital harvest.

An old institution, marriage is the foundation of everything that should be good, wholesome and holy. In my opinion, there is nothing on this side of heaven to equal the happy family home. I am sure that a parent who helps to create such a home would find much more enjoyment in the homecoming visits of his children than in having a seat in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Marriage is a red-letter day in the lives of most people, and its importance is also recognized by the press of our country. I hold in my hand the Social and Personal News page of this morning's edition of the Montreal Gazette. It shows several pictures, one being a portrait of an attractive mother with her four lovely children. Two other photographs show two fine looking young couples who are announcing the dates of their coming marriages. This is only one newspaper, but this kind of news is to be found in every paper throughout Canada, and it illustrates the importance of marriage and the home.

Honourable senators, I should like to turn now to the subject of divorce. I believe the sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), said that a similar bill was presented in this chamber in 1938, and although it was passed by the Senate it did not pass in the other house. However, we in Canada have got along fairly well since that time—our population has increased at a reasonable rate and our gross national product has trebled—and it is quite conceivable that we might be able to get along pretty well in the future without much change in our divorce law.

I should like to give the house a few statistics to show how the divorce rate in Canada has increased over the years. In 1900 there were only 11 divorces, distributed among the provinces as follows:

Prince Edward Island	0
Nova Scotia	1
New Brunswick	1
Quebec	1
Ontario	2
Manitoba	1
Northwest Territories	1
British Columbia	4
Total	11

Proceeding to the year 1917, we find there were still only 54 divorces during the year in the whole of Canada. But by 1952, the last year for which I have figures—which I procured from the Canada Year Book for 1954—the number had jumped to 5,562.

In Ontario, during the 19 years from 1900 to 1918, there were 166 divorces. In Quebec, from 1900 to 1929, there were 185 divorces.

The Senate Divorce Committee, when it rises tomorrow, will have dealt with 248 petitions this session.

Honourable senators, this bill, if passed, would in my opinion do nothing to prevent divorce. True, it would open the way to relief for some persons who, a great many feel, should obtain divorces; but at the same time it would open the way to many more divorces.

I think we are doing little or nothing to stop the main cause of the breaking up of homes, and that is excessive use of liquor. I want to read from an article in the Montreal Gazette of January 27 last:

> Liquor is becoming more and more the cause of domestic troubles, according to a senior Criminal Court judge who during one arraignment session yesterday was told by the wives of several accused that their husbands were "good men" when sober but "dangerous" when drunk.
> Judge T. A. Fontaine told The Gazette that at least 60 per cent of the crimes he had studied during the past few weeks had their roots in too much drinking.

The time has come when all Governments, provincial and federal, rely heavily on the sale of liquor. The last year for which I have national figures on this matter also is 1952. During that year the total value of the liquor sold in all the provinces combined was $143 million. I also have a record of the liquor sales in New Brunswick for one year. In that province, which has a population of 536,000, the sales by the Liquor Control Board during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, amounted to more than $17 million, and the net profit was $6,464,150. It may be said that tourists buy a lot of this liquor. On the other hand, I think the record indicates that when the drinking people of a province leave it to visit another province or another country they continue to buy liquor.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he wishes to imply that the province of New Brunswick is worse than any other province?

Hon. Mr. Barbour: No, I do not. New Brunswick is the only province for which I have a record for 1954. Others may be as bad.

Honourable senators, this is a serious matter, because it appears that the sale of liquor is increasing from year to year.

There is another point that I wish to make. The Criminal Code, while it is wide in its scope, does not cover everything. For instance, a man who leaves his wife and gets "married" again, can be charged with bigamy and given a prison sentence. On the other hand, a man who leaves his wife and goes to live with another woman and raises a family, cannot be punished by any law that I know of.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Apparently you want that kind of thing to continue.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: No. On the contrary, I would like the Criminal Code to be amended so as to provide a penalty for that. If such an amendment were brought in, I would support it.

Honourable senators, I have been making decisions—not very hefty ones, perhaps—for more than 60 years. They have not all been good decisions, neither have they all been bad.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Better be careful!

Hon. Mr. Barbour: If my decision to oppose this bill is as good as one I made 48 years ago, I will be quite satisfied.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: Forty-eight years ago I felt that I could pretty nearly make a living for myself, and that it would be a poor woman who would not help a little, so I decided to get married, and my decision proved to be all right. I see some honourable senators in this chamber who made a similar decision several years before I did, and by their appearance, and from what I see of them, I believe that if the good Lord will leave them here they will be carrying on for another 50 or more years. But that is in the hands of Providence.

Honourable senators, I think that the public is not so much interested in what we say in this chamber as in what we do here. I assume that we are here for a purpose. We are our own masters.

In closing, I should like to quote some words of Sir Winston Churchill, who the other day, in looking forward in his own lifetime to peace in the world, said we should "never flinch, never weary, never despair."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. James P. McIntyre: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to say anything today with respect to this bill. But, for reasons beyond my control, I have to leave Ottawa within about three-quarters of an hour, and as I will not be here when the bill is voted on I would like to make my position clear at this time.

I wish to congratulate my honourable friend from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour). He spoke about liquor, and although in his time he has had a good deal to do with it, I can safely say that he never drank a drop of liquor in his life. He was, however, Chief Preventive Officer for the Province of Prince Edward Island for many years, and in that position he did a splendid job.

On looking up the historical background of this divorce bill, I found that it was copied from a similar bill passed in 1937 by the British Parliament. If the British people think such a measure is a good thing, all well and good, but we are entitled to have the kind of legislation that we think best suits our people.

I listened with care to the speech made by my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), and I was surprised to hear her say that, although she was opposed to divorce, she was supporting the bill. Well, honourable senators, if I was opposed to something, it would take a lot of persuasion to make me vote in favour of a measure that would extend it.

In my province we do not believe in divorce at all, but, as in most other provinces, we must deal with certain cases, and a divorce court has been set up. Now, if Parliament passed a bill such as this one, which would broaden and extend the grounds for divorce, it would, I believe, have the effect of doubling and perhaps trebling the number of cases brought before Parliament and the provincial courts.

Canada has been getting along very well under its present divorce law. As we all know, the cases in eight provinces are dealt with by provincial courts; and those from the other two provinces, Quebec and Newfoundland, are heard by a committee of this house and finally dealt with by Parliament.

I have every respect for the sponsor of this bill, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), who in 1938 supported a similar bill in this house. That bill was passed here by a slim majority, just four votes.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: The motion for second reading carried by more than ten votes.

Hon. Mr. McIntyre: The records I looked at in the Library of Parliament showed that the bill was given third reading, on division, by a vote of 33 to 29. And among those who voted against it at that time were some six or seven honourable senators who are still in this house. After its passage here the bill was sent to the House of Commons, where Mr. Dan McIvor moved that it be given the six months' hoist, and his motion carried by a large majority.

I cannot forecast what may happen to the present bill, but I think the vote in this house will be close. As I have already stated, I will not be present when a vote is taken; and my chief purpose in speaking at this time is to say that if I were here I would vote against the bill. I might add that I tried to get an honourable senator to pair with me, but I was unsuccessful.

The honourable senator from Rosetown has every right to sponsor this bill, and if it fails to pass this time, he will be entitled to try again. I am reminded that the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) sponsored his bill with respect to margarine three times, and each time it was defeated. He was then able to place the subject-matter before the Supreme Court, and there he won out. Similarly, if this bill fails to pass at the present session, my friend from Rosetown may exercise his right to present it again.

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I have made no preparations to speak today, but there are a few observations I wish to make to the house. First, speaking as a medical doctor, I am in accord with the principle of this bill—a view which would be shared by almost every doctor who has been faced with the misery and suffering of mismated couples. However, there are in the bill certain features that I cannot agree to. There seems to be some confusion about the rules as to the point at which we adopt the principle of a bill, but I have been told—I need not say by whom—that if the bill is given the second reading we cannot change it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Howden: I am just repeating what I have been told.

It is my view that epilepsy should not be included in this bill as a ground for divorce, because very many epileptics recover entirely, and it is not a permanent disease that persists from day to day. A man may have a seizure, be unconscious for perhaps fifteen minutes or a half hour, regain his senses and probably be all right for the next week, the next month or even for six months. The condition known as petit mal is a minor illness. For instance, while talking to a person so affected, you may notice that his face suddenly becomes set, he twitches a little bit, drops down, but gets up in a couple of minutes and is quite all right again. That is the extent of petit mal.

With respect to the inclusion of insanity in this bill, I hold the same view as I do with respect to epilepsy. There are many forms of insanity that have latent periods of unknown length, extending for weeks and months, when a person will be quite normal. There is also the condition known as senile dementia—a disease affecting people of my age and older—which causes persons to lose their mentality and become completely unintelligent. Now, to separate couples because one of them suffers from senile dementia would inflict unfair hardship, and this condition should not constitute a ground for divorce. For example, my own mother-in-law, one of the loveliest women in the world, lost her mentality, and we had to restrain her. Finally, after the death of my wife, and when I was a practising doctor, away from home a good deal and with only a maid in the house, it was necessary to commit her to an institution.

I have said what I had to say, honourable senators, namely, that I am against the inclusion in this bill of any reference to insanity and epilepsy.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I had not intended to participate in this debate at this time, but after listening to the remarks of two of my colleagues from Prince Edward Island, whose hospitality it has been my good fortune to enjoy—even to the extent of travelling over some of the historic rum-running battlefields with which the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) had to associate in his duties as Preventive Officer—I am impelled to make some reference to the subject now under discussion.

I do not think the problem of divorce, as it is reflected in this bill, has any relation to the marriage unions which took place fifty, or even thirty or forty, years ago.

Most of us can look back quite a long time and visualize the conditions that prevailed in this country during the periods that my friend (Hon. Mr. Barbour) referred to when he spoke of those happy events. However, since that time Canada has become a "great" international power. We have been compelled to take our place and our part responsibly in two of probably the most serious wars that have been waged in the history of the world. In our contributions to those wars we have had to face the social problems that have followed in their wake—problems, by the way, which have followed in the trail of wars from the beginning of history.

My honourable friend from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) has referred to the abuse of the liquor traffic as one of the reasons for this state of affairs. That abuse, I am free to say, is due as much as anything else to the restrictions that were imposed during the war periods and to the subsequent reaction upon their removal after the wars had ended. Accompanying that condition have come far-reaching dislocations in the social and economic life of our country which have been accountable, in my opinion, for a great deal of the incompatibility and unhappiness of ill-considered and ill-advised marriages. In other words, and this is my point, so long as society in this country or in any other country finds it impossible to avoid active participation in war in which the youth of the country is sacrificed, there is bound to be an aftermath of disrupted social conditions, with an accompanying trail of divorces. To deny these young people the right of having a second chance and of regaining the freedom which they have dreamed about, would, I think, be the very antithesis of our profession in this country of decent government and decent living conditions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I was a member of this house in 1938 and in a very modest way took part in the debate on the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill which was submitted by the late Senator McMeans of Winnipeg, who was Chairman of the Senate Divorce Committee for a good many years. The debate on that bill was one of the best I have ever heard in Parliament, and if any members are interested in the subject at all I would recommend that they read it most carefully. It was approached with the greatest amount of seriousness and public spirit and it brought out the viewpoints of the ablest men in Parliament, and I think the results which followed in this chamber was a perfectly well justified conclusion of that discussion. While it did not reach its full fruition in the other house at that time, I believe it was a precursor of what may come in the near future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ross, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 8, at 8 p.m.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 3, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. George H. Ross: Honourable senators, the object of the bill under consideration is to widen the grounds for divorce in those provinces only in which the courts already have jurisdiction to grant divorce.

I propose to discuss briefly some problems relating to divorce.

First: I should like to see an additional section inserted in the bill before us to this effect:

> This bill shall not extend to or apply in any province unless and until the province requests it, whereupon the Governor General in Council would pass an order in council making it applicable in such province.

I believe my adopted province of Alberta would welcome it. On the other hand I doubt if my native province of Prince Edward Island would like to see its judges given the wider powers set forth in this bill; and there may be other provinces opposed to it. For these reasons I think the bill should be amended.

Secondly: "Cruelty" means legal cruelty as now interpreted and construed by the High Court of England in divorce and matrimonial causes. For my part I should prefer to see cruelty defined by statute. In the case of Evans v. Evans, some one hundred and fifty years or so ago, Lord Stowell said that in order to constitute cruelty in a matrimonial cause, the acts complained of must have caused "danger to life, limb or health, bodily or mental, or a reasonable apprehension of it." I think that definition is satisfactory, but if it is not, a definition should be inserted, so that it would not be necessary to refer to the English cases.

Thirdly, should a spouse be permitted to sue for divorce without leave? I do not think so. An application to sue might be heard in camera by a judge, a psychiatrist, a clergyman or some other competent person, or by one or more of them, with both the husband and wife present, and a chief aim would be an attempt to reconcile the married couple. The trier would have before him the complete family record, and his decision would be made with family welfare in mind. If he gave the applicant permission to sue, a judge or a Senate committee could then hear the case as at present. If dissolution of the marriage were granted it would be for real reasons, not for trumped-up ones. If a spouse had to obtain leave to sue before commencing action by filing a petition with the Senate or in court I believe a great many cases would never come to trial, but would be settled in advance. If such a change were made, a bringing of the parties together by the trier in attempting to bring about a reconciliation should not defeat an action on the ground of condonation if it later appeared that the parties could not "make a go of it".

Fourthly: under court rules in many provinces, and under existing Senate rules, the co-respondent or person with whom the respondent or person with whom the respondent is alleged to have committed adultery must be named in the petition. This may be useful where the petitioner is claiming damages from the co-respondent. But as the petitioner does not claim damages in any petition for divorce brought before the Senate, the reason for the rule does not exist in petitions for divorce to Parliament. I think the rule should be changed and the co-respondent should not be named. I have seen different cases in which the co-respondent was a married person. His or her spouse learned of the adultery through the public record naming the co-respondent, and this resulted in another action for divorce. This practice increases divorce. We should do what we can to discourage divorce.

Furthermore, should the co-respondent be named in the petition or should his or her name be disclosed during the course of a trial, whether before a committee of the Senate or before a court? I think the hearing should be adjourned, and the co-respondent should be served with a copy of the petition and given a chance to appear to defend his or her character.

Fifthly: I would like to see divorce actions transferred from Parliament to the courts. I wonder if it would be satisfactory to do this by making domicile in divorce Canada-wide. At the present time it is province-wide. If we were to enact a statute making it Canada-wide, persons domiciled in Quebec or Newfoundland could sue for divorce in a court in another province which grants divorces.

In Canada, as in most civilized countries, it is a prerequisite to the exercise of jurisdiction to grant a divorce that the parties be domiciled in the country in which the court sits. A divorce obtained in a country other than the domicile of the husband, even though the respondent has submitted to the jurisdiction of the court by appearing and contesting the action, has no validity in Canada. (Le Messurier vs Le Messurier, 1895 A.C. 517.)

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I interrupt my honourable friend to ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Ross: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does my friend state that a divorce secured in the United States, for example, after the proper legal residence has been established, and the laws of that state have been complied with, would not be recognized in Canada? I do not think that is so.

Hon. Mr. Ross: If the plaintiff, say the husband, leaves Canada and establishes domicile in some state in the United States, he can sue for divorce in that state and, if it is granted, it will be recognized in Canada. But, unless he acquires a domicile before suing, the divorce has no validity in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Euler: That is the point I had in mind.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is all a question of domicile.

Hon. Mr. Ross: As Canada was given by the British North America Act exclusive jurisdiction in marriage and divorce, excepting only the solemnization of marriage, and as domicile is such an important factor in the obtaining of divorce, lawyers throughout Canada were much surprised when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held, in the Cook case, 1926 A.C. 444, that domicile in divorce is not Canada-wide, but province-wide only. The law officers of the Crown apparently considered domicile in divorce to be Canada-wide too, as since Confederation all statutes granting divorce refer to the parties as being domiciled not in a province, but in Canada. The words used are, "domiciled in Canada."

A province-wide domicile discriminates against women. Let me illustrate: A married couple domiciled in Newfoundland disagree. The husband may abandon his wife, go to Vancouver, and acquire a domicile in British Columbia for the express purpose of obtaining a divorce. On making his domicile in British Columbia, he can sue for divorce there. (Baker vs. Baker, 49 Man. 163). It is not often that a husband will abandon his wife and go to another province for the express purpose of obtaining a divorce. But it is a common thing for a corporation to transfer employees from one province to another where a husband may acquire a domicile and sue for a divorce.

A wife cannot do that. Although her home, in the Newfoundland case to which I have referred, is still there, yet her domicile is in British Columbia, even if she has never been outside of Newfoundland. If she wishes to sue in the courts for divorce, she must go to British Columbia with her witnesses to bring her action or to defend any action brought against her for divorce. The only apparent exception is under the Divorce Jurisdiction Act 1930, which does not confer a separate domicile on a deserted wife, but only preserves any right of action which she may have had in the province in which she was deserted. As the courts of Newfoundland have no power to grant divorces, she is without remedy in the courts there.

Hon. Mr. Howden: Have we not jurisdiction here to recommend divorce in such a case?

Hon. Mr. Ross: Yes, of course.

Hon. Mr. Baird: In other words, the wife does not have to go to Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. Ross: If she wants to get a divorce in the courts she must go to Vancouver. Of course, she can come to Parliament if she prefers.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: Will the honourable gentleman permit me, with great respect, to put a question to him? Would he give us a definition of "domicile"? As long as we have no definite understanding of what domicile is, we are really not in a position to talk about it.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Domicile is the place where the husband chooses to make his permanent home without any intention of leaving it and making his home elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: I do not wish to provoke a lengthy discussion on this point, but may I be permitted to pose a further question? Suppose a man whose wife and family live in Newfoundland, and whose business is located there, moves to Vancouver, does his domicile change from Newfoundland to Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. Ross: If he goes to Vancouver to spend a year, or to visit for a reasonably short time, his domicile will remain in Newfoundland, but if he intends to move to and live permanently in Vancouver, that will become his domicile.

Hon. Mr. Howden: If he goes to another place for six months, his domicile changes.

Hon. Mr. Ross: There is no definite period of time which affects domicile.

Hon. Mr. Fournier: A man may be in a place for as long as ten years and never have his domicile there, because he never had the intention of staying there.

Hon. Mr. Howden: How are we to know what is the intention of a person?

Hon. Mr. Fournier: That depends on the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Ross: It is not time, but intention, that governs domicile.

We could carry out what was possibly the intention of the Fathers of Confederation and at the same time place women on an equal footing with men in divorce by making domicile Canada-wide. I realize that there are objections to it which will be apparent to all. For that reason I do not suggest that Canada-wide domicile be incorporated in the bill now before us. I have simply discussed it as a means of transferring divorce actions from Parliament to the courts which might be resorted to should applications for divorce continue to increase in the future as they have in the past.

I hope the bill now before us will receive second reading and be referred to a committee.

Hon. Charles B. Howard: Honourable senators, before I discuss the subject-matter under debate, may I be permitted to express, on behalf I am sure of every honourable senator in the house, our heartiest congratulations to the honourable senator from Ponteix (Hon. Mr. Marcotte) on having today reached his eighty-second birthday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: My remarks with respect to this bill, honourable senators, will be short.

In brief, the measure proposes to widen the grounds for granting divorce. I have listened to arguments from outstanding doctors and lawyers, all of them members of this honourable house, and I have listened as well to a discussion of the subject by politically minded people. In spite of all I have heard in favour of the bill, I would tend to take another view, based on the respect that a man must have for the marriage vows he takes when he marries.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I am sure each one of us remembers well the vow he took when he got married. This is the language of the vows:

> . . . to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health . . . till death us do part . . .

Every honourable senator could undoubtedly cite extraordinary cases where a husband whose wife has been bedridden for many years has taken care of her, even to dressing and feeding her, through a long period. For example, one of the leading members in the other house has suffered such an experience, and we all respect him for the way he has carried his burden.

Hon. Mr. Howden: May I ask the honourable senator a question? What are we, the members of the Divorce Committee, to do in cases where neither the husband nor the wife desires to respect the vows you have just referred to?

Hon. Mr. Howard: That is just too bad for them. But let us not forget that usually people do not enter into these vows lightly.

Hon. Mr. Howden: But what are we to do with people who have changed their minds?

Hon. Mr. Howard: I should like to go one step further, and refer honourable senators to St. Matthew, chapter XIX, verse 6 and also to St. Mark, chapter X, verses 6-9. May I make particular reference to verse 9, which reads:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Read what the Bible says about adultery.

Hon. Mr. Howard: Honourable senators, I am opposed not only to divorce on the grounds proposed in this bill, which I intend to vote against, but I am opposed to divorce on any ground.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, like the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, I oppose the principle of this bill. Consequently, I too feel I must vote against it.

If the proposals of this legislation were implemented by Parliament, the divorce law of this country would be changed by adding three, and possibly four, new grounds for the severance of the marriage bond. For the reasons which I propose to outline to you, I think that such a change in our divorce law would be a retrograde step.

I can agree with the honourable gentleman from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) when he says that homes are hopelessly broken long before the consorts ever resort to the courts. It is a condition which leads to divorce that cries most loudly for a remedy in this country, and we all agree to that. Some of these have been pointed out by the honourable gentleman from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) and the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert), and by other honourable senators. These conditions are a cancer in the body social. But I think also that divorce begets divorce, and that easier divorce begets more divorce. I think divorce is not only a symptom of a social problem; I think it can also be considered the cause of a social problem.

I will agree that there are grievous defects in the existing law and practice with reference to divorce in this country, but I think the remedy proposed should not activate another disease. I say also at once that Canadians generally want the lowest possible divorce rate to prevail in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Now it seems to me that the Senate of Canada should exercise the greatest of caution before it adopts the principle of this bill. In the first place, I doubt if Parliament as a whole has a mandate to pass it.

In 1938 a bill in almost identical terms was passed by this chamber but failed to get approval in the House of Commons. Since that time four general elections have been held in Canada and I think that no mandate for this type of legislation was given the Government elected at any of those elections.

There have been times in the history of the Senate when legislation from the House of Commons has not commended itself to a majority of this house. Examples are available to show that despite that situation the Senate has passed such legislation in the belief that a majority in the other place had a mandate from the country to pass it. But that is not the present situation. When this second chamber initiates legislation I believe we should be satisfied both that the legislation is for the betterment of the country as a whole and that the legislation carries a considerable measure of popular approval. I think those two tests were met in the margarine legislation and in the new Income Tax Act, to take but two recent examples. But I say they are not met here.

Now, honourable senators, I do not propose to found my argument against this bill upon any theological, doctrinal or dogmatic premise. but I do say at once that as Canada's Upper Chamber—a representative body and a body of great responsibility—the Senate cannot be unmindful of these factors. Church and state have a mutual interest in matters of public policy affecting such fundamentals as the family, marriage, divorce, education, inheritance, crime and many other facets of life in society. Even the ancient patriarchal institutions of pre-Christian times—of the Hebrews, of the Greeks, the Romans with their idea of paterfamilias and patria potestas, and the Chinese too—testify to the fact that both the civil side and the religious side of life and society have a contribution to make to social problems. This view has been reinforced by the Christian dispensation. No responsible body of legislators can afford to ignore it, and I think that the Senate of Canada would not dream of ignoring it.

But before proceeding I would like to refer to and re-echo the words expressed here earlier in the session by the Leader of the Opposition, (Hon. Mr. Haig), when he commended the members of our Standing Committee on Divorce for the exceptionally high quality and the judicial character of the work they do. We all recognize that Parliament and the country are their debtors for the high capacity they bring to their deliberations and for the manner in which they discharge their duties.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: The periodic reports that are made on the work of that committee by the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) emphasize this, and I for one do hope he continues to present such facts to Parliament and to the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Unfortunately the work done by that committee has been subjected to unwarranted criticism from poorly informed quarters. I do hope that we always point out the importance and the value, particularly the judicial quality, of the work they do.

This session the committee is going to have to deal with some 475 cases; all of them involve domestic unhappiness, many of them involve tragedy. I know it is a very heavy burden for the members of that committee to sit as frequently and for as long hours as they do.

Frankly, I must say that I regret the circumstances which require so many capable members of this body to spend so much time and energy on that work which is of a judicial character. Members of the Senate are primarily legislators and I think, with all respect, I can say that if that time and that energy could be devoted to the more constructive work that this body can and does do, the country would be better for it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I would like to add this too, that I know the honourable gentleman who sponsors this bill and those who support it do so out of a deep conviction that it will improve the lot of Canadians generally. While I take the opposite position, I do respect their point of view.

Now, it might be helpful if I stated a few propositions which I consider to be fundamental to the argument I would like to make to this chamber. None of them are new.

The purpose of marriage is to beget and educate children. By entering the married state consorts assume a triple responsibility: first, to each other; second, to their issue actual or potential; and third, to society. And I say further that this responsibility is a personal responsibility and duty on the part of each consort.

But in my view divorce reverses the purpose of marriage. I think it completes family disorganization. I think it is the final demoralizer for the consorts and the children in the home.

The family is the true unit of the larger organization, which is society. And it is natural for men and women to live in society. Since divorce strikes at the family, the basic unit of society, divorce is alien to the welfare of society as a whole, and so in my view divorce offends against the natural law.

Apart altogether from the religious or the quasi-religious aspects of the divorce problem, I believe there are rational grounds for refusing this legislation, grounds which touch democratic considerations, grounds which touch sociological considerations and grounds which touch philosophical considerations.

The honourable gentleman from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and others who support this measure have given some, and I know they can give many other, instances of unhappiness, of tragedy and of human suffering resulting from hopelessly broken homes. No one with a heart in his body can fail to sympathize with many of these cases. The tragedy of broken homes touches many people, and all of us know of pitiful cases.

But the general legislation passed by this Parliament, we must always remember, should not be framed for the relief of some individuals or classes. The common good of the country must be the governing factor. Victim cases we shall always have—cases in which otherwise sound general legislation creates not only inequities but at the same time unfairness. Anyone who has dealt with tax legislation knows how true this can be. But in domestic cases they are more personal and more poignant.

If legislative relief can be supplied without doing general damage, such relief is good legislation. The trial and error method is always part of our democratic legislative machinery. But we are not justified in providing relief for "victim cases", if the damage we do is inimical to the common welfare. I would even say that many of the people who would take advantage of these new grounds for divorce are not people whom those who support the bill would feel should be helped:—I mean, those willing to shirk marital responsibilities as readily as possible.

In our approach to this problem much can be learned from the experience in other countries. Since the beginning of the century there has been an increased easing in the divorce laws of many lands. This unfortunate trend has been reflected in a mounting rate of divorce, as the following figures will show. I take them from Chambers' Encyclopedia, vol. IV, page 565:

In the United Kingdom in 1912 the divorce rate was ·26 per cent of the marriages of that year. In 1946 it had risen to 8 per cent.

In the United States it went from 9·4 per cent in 1912 to 31 per cent in 1945.

In France the increase was from 4·6 per cent in 1912 to 9·7 per cent in 1946.

In Denmark the rate was 3·5 per cent in 1912, and in 1946 18·6 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask: percentage of what?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Of the number of marriages performed in the given years.

In Norway it was 6·9 per cent of the marriages performed in that country in 1912, and 15·1 per cent of those performed in 1945.

In New Zealand it was 2·2 per cent in 1912, and 10·6 per cent in 1946.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is not that per thousand?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: No, it is the percentage of all marriages for the given year.

While I recognize that there are provisions in this bill which restrict divorce more than is the case in many jurisdictions in the United States, it may be useful to look at the divorce situation in that country. There the rate is higher than in any country for which I have been able to get figures.

Perhaps I might say something first about the grounds available for divorce in the various jurisdictions of the United States. In 48 States and in the District of Columbia divorce is granted upon proof of adultery—now the principal ground for divorce in Canada. In 44 jurisdictions in the United States divorce may be granted for cruelty; in 47 for desertion; in 43 for felony; and in 29 for non-support; and there are other grounds.

From the 1953 World Almanac I have secured the following figures as to the United States position:

Based on 1,000 population in 1890, the marriage rate was 9 and the divorce rate was ·5. In 1925 the marriage rate was 10·3, and the divorce rate was 1·5, or three times the rate in 1890. By 1950 the marriage rate per 1,000 of population was 11 and the divorce rate was 2·5, or five times the rate sixty years earlier.

Rates, however, can be misleading. Let us look at some figures.

In 1900 in the United States there were 709,000 marriages and 55,700 divorces; in 1925 there were 1,180,000 marriages and 175,000 divorces; in 1950 there were 1,667,000 marriages and 385,000 divorces. For the ten-year period from 1942 to 1951, 4,219,000 divorces were granted in the United States, an average of 400,000 divorces each year.

From Whitaker's Almanac I learn that just over 6,000 divorces were granted in the United Kingdom in 1938. This was the period when the divorce laws there were liberalized. In 1951 over 28,000 divorces were granted, and in 1953 the figure had risen to over 33,000. In this same period the population of the United Kingdom was 47½ million at its lowest and 50½ million at its height.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Did that increase of divorces result from the extension of the grounds for divorce?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: That, I think, is the fair inference.

Now as to Canada. The Canada Year Book for 1954 supplies reasonably accurate information about the position in this country. As the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) has said, in 1900 there were eleven divorces granted in Canada: in 1952 there were 5,562. In the ten-year period from 1943 to 1952 over 57,000 divorces were granted in Canada. In Ontario the total went from just over 200 in 1930 to just over 2,200 in 1950. In British Columbia the level of divorce was 222 in the year 1930. and 1,377 in 1950.

I apologize if I have wearied the house with too many figures. I would not want to draw any unwarranted conclusions from these statistics. But the inference seems inescapable that there is a definite causal relationship between the numbers and rate of divorce in a country on the one hand and the liberality of its divorce laws on the other. It is true that the real causes of most divorces are deeper than the divorce laws. It does appear to be true, however, that the easier the access to the divorce courts and the more numerous the grounds for divorce, the greater are the numbers and rates of divorce. In our own country the figures for Ontario and British Columbia seem to bear this out.

What are the effects of a high rate of divorce upon a country? We are concerned at times with the increase in juvenile delinquency, with the lowering of moral standards, with a demoralization in parts of our social structure. Without resorting to statistics again, it is fair to say that people concerned with crime prevention—the sociologists and the social workers—all condemn the increasing prevalence of divorce and they call it a major contributing factor to many of these undesirable social problems.

I wondered what the actual effect of divorce would be upon children, particularly in the United States, where there have been some very extensive studies made, and I found a report published by the Duke University Press, in Durham, North Carolina, in a periodical called Law and Contemporary Problems. The conclusions reached in that study were that from 150,000 to 200,000 children are affected by divorce each year in the United States. The peak year of divorce following the war—probably 1945 or 1946—its author claimed, would see as many as 300,000 children involved in divorce cases. With regard to the total number of children of divorced parents, the same writer gave the figure of 1,433,000 for the year 1940. It was admitted that this estimate probably errs below rather than over the actual number.

Several decades ago, when the divorce rate in the United States was much lower than it is in that country today, President Theodore Roosevelt was concerned with the problem which is now engaging our attention, and he said this:

> Easy divorce is a bane to any nation. It is a curse to society and a menace to home, an incitement to married unhappiness, an evil thing for men and a still more evil thing for women.

Admittedly we do not take our social philosophy from the leaders of the Russian state, but it may be of interest to record what has happened in that country in relation to divorce. Engels taught that the family was based upon economics, upon private property. The Communist Manifesto proclaimed, following Engels, that the family would disappear with capital. Even inheritance was abolished.

The Matrimonial Codes of Russia in 1918 and 1927 both taught that all children belonged to the state. This included women between the ages of 17 and 32. Church marriages were invalidated and the rights of husbands were abolished. Admittedly these doctrines promoted great extremes of free love and family destruction. Izvestia reported some figures in 1935. In 1934 in Moscow it was found that there were 57,000 births that year to 154,000 abortions. In the villages the figures were over 242,000 births and 324,000 abortions. It was also believed that in this period there were some seven million homeless children in the streets of the cities and towns, bent on thievery and crime of all kinds.

Not on any moral grounds but because the authorities recognized the danger to their state, the Journal of the Commissariat of Justice had to reverse the former proclamations on the family, and affirmed the perpetuity of the marriage bond. I am informed that in Russia today divorce is very difficult. That is the other extreme.

Mr. Walter Lippmann, the eminent American political scientist and philosopher, has recently published a book called The Public Philosophy. It contains many wise and valuable statements upon government in general, and I am sure that most honourable senators would read the book with great pleasure and satisfaction. Many of Lippmann's views bear upon the argument I make here. He asks the question: "Is there a public philosophy . . . a body of positive principles and precepts which a good citizen cannot deny or ignore?" Lippmann is convinced that there is; that it is known as the natural law and that it is the premise of the institutions of Western society. He traces it from the ancient world through the Romans to the Christians, and he finds it to be the basis of British and American constitutional order.

It is not a body of law which can be enforced in our courts. It is a way of looking at things. In the simple society of the 18th century the natural law provided the principles upon which the free states were founded. But in the 19th century the idea was abandoned to the reactionaries. Now, Lippmann says, this public philosophy unfortunately is gone. And he continues:

> And all that the defenders of freedom have to defend in common is a public neutrality and a public agnosticism . . . Modern men have a low capacity to believe in the invisible, the intangible, the imponderable . . . To repair the capacity to believe in the public philosophy it will be necessary to demonstrate the practical relevance of the public philosophy—much as the Roman lawyers worked out the jus gentium—
> —the law of the nations—
> and related it to the jus naturale
> —the natural law.

Lippmann admits that the public philosophy cannot be popular. But its warrant is that the results of rational and disciplined government will be good.

This is the argument with which I would associate myself in my approach to this bill. The liberalization of divorce law offends against the principles of the natural law because it attacks the natural basis of the social structure—the family, the home.

In 1905 Mr. G. K. Chesterton, the eminent English journalist, wrote these words:

> The vice of the modern notion of mental progress is that it is always something concerned with the breaking of bonds, the effacing of boundaries, the casting away of dogmas.

I think that is another way of saying what Lippmann concludes in his new book. For my part, I do not become too disturbed to learn that we in Canada are 500 years behind the times. Five hundred years ago the men from whom we inherit the institutions and traditions of our Western culture based it upon an appreciation of the natural law. We cannot have it both ways. We cannot ignore the natural law, as we would by passing this bill, and at the same time promote our western and democratic traditions.

I think that the Parliament of Canada, and senators of Canada, can do better for the social problems of their country than to open escape hatches which will be used mainly to free the irresponsible from their duties to their spouse, to their children actual or potential, and, in a very special sense, to their country. I think the higher purposes of the cradle and the clan are more worthy of our earnest attention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bouffard, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

ST. MARY'S RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Thomas Farquhar moved the second reading of bill N-8, an Act to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to form a Company to build a bridge over or a tunnel under the St. Mary's River at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. The Council of the City of Sault Ste. Marie has had this question under active consideration for some years and has now come to the conclusion that definite action should be taken regarding it.

The two Sault's are often referred to as the hub of the Great Lakes, and the location supplies the only international border crossing between the Westerly end of Lake Superior and the Southerly end of Lake Huron, some 700 miles, and gives connection with great East-West and North-South arterial highways of the United States. As it is becoming an increasingly important link with the United States, the ever increasing need of adequate facilities for crossing the river by traffic of all kinds presents an urgent problem for solution; and in keeping with many other international boundary points a bridge seems the best and most natural solution.

I am informed that in 1927 the number of motor vehicles which crossed the river by ferry at Sault Ste. Marie was 76,000; and the number has increased, until in 1954 there were approximately 290,000. In heavy periods the traffic cannot be handled without considerable delays.

The present needs will grow very quickly and the growth rate accelerate by reason of many factors that are developing, including the Mackinac Straits Bridge at present under construction at the Straits of Mackinac, 60 miles south of Sault Ste. Marie, which will connect Southern Michigan with the upper peninsula of Michigan by the longest suspension span in the world. The four-lane highway on the bridge will have an estimated capacity of 3,000 cars each way per hour. Traffic experts estimate the bridge will carry 1,927,000 cars in 1958, as compared to ferry crossing of 900,782 in 1953; and that traffic will increase steadily year by year by an additional 100,000 cars, trucks and buses. The Sault has every reason to expect to share to an appreciable degree in this heavy increase of traffic. Preliminary estimates by the same traffic experts with reference to the proposed bridge at Sault Ste. Marie has indicated traffic, and increasing traffic, at this point sufficient to interest financial interests in the project.

We are informed that a four-lane highway from Southern Michigan to Sault Ste. Marie via the Mackinac Bridge is assured and will tap important transcontinental roads in the heavily populated States neighbouring on Michigan. This is bound to result in ever increasing traffic to the north, especially with no delays in crossing the Straits of Mackinac.

The Government of Ontario has indicated that the Trans-Canada highway around the north shore of Lake Superior will be completed within the next five years. This will give a tremendous impetus to tourist traffic and will add substantially to the inflow at this point of vehicles from the United States.

A bridge will give continuous, around-the-clock, dependable service throughout the year and will avoid any tie-ups in service from ice conditions. The great increase of heavy type transportation by truck is common knowledge and is becoming more and more an economic factor of importance to industry. A bridge accommodating such transportation will add important advantages to industry trading into the great markets of the Middle West of the United States.

The area around Sault Ste. Marie is recognized as vital in international defence matters because of the importance of the Locks located there; and important measures have been taken, and installations effected, towards adequate protection. This involves prompt movement of defence forces and heavy equipment between the two countries. A bridge would be of great advantage towards such defensive strength in that area.

Honourable senators, if the bill is given the second reading tonight I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for further detailed study.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: May I ask the honourable senator how many more miles are required to complete that North Shore road?

Hon. Mr. Farquhar: I cannot give the exact figures. I believe that up to the present time they have built close to 100 miles north of Sault Ste. Marie. The city council has the assurance of the Ontario Government that the road will be completed through to the head of the lake within five years.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Farquhar, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

CRIMINAL CODE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill O-8, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, this very short bill merely provides for the setting out in the statutes of the date on which the new Criminal Code shall come into force. I am pleased that the bill is being first introduced in the Senate, because it gives me an opportunity of paying a well-deserved tribute to the members of this chamber for the splendid work they did on the revision of the Code. The proposed revision was initiated in this house and received very careful examination by one of its committees. I hesitate to single out anyone, but I am given to understand that three honourable senators rendered especially fine service to the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And the Law Clerk of the Senate did too.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I would include the Law Clerk. The three honourable gentlemen to whom I would make special reference are Senator Roebuck, Senator Farris and Senator Hayden. Canada owes a special debt of gratitude to them for the time and effort they gave to this very important legislation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The bill as finally passed by Parliament provided that it should come into effect on a date to be fixed by the Governor in Council. A proclamation was issued fixing the 1st day of April, 1955, and it is deemed advisable that this commencement date be set forth in the statutes.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I very much favour the proposal to set out the effective date of commencement of the new Code in the statutes rather than by order in council. One reason for saying so is that failure to issue an order in council in similar circumstances once caused me some trouble. A client who had a claim against the old Grand Trunk Railway came to me on the last day of the period within which he had a right of action against the railway and asked me to sue. I very hurriedly issued a writ and prepared a statement of claim against the Canadian National Railways, with which the Grand Trunk Railway had then been amalgamated by statute. However, I soon learned that an order in council proclaiming the statute had not been issued, and of course the time within which I could start another action had expired. I consulted the then Minister of Railways, and he advised me that he would not allow counsel for the railway to raise that technical defence. I was in that way able to get over an awkward situation which would never have occurred if the effective date of the railway legislation had been printed in the statutes, as is now proposed to be done with respect to the new Criminal Code.

Honourable senators, I heartily support the second reading of the bill, and if it is the wish of the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) to ask for the third reading tonight, I will not object.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave of the house, now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No. I object to a bill being given second and third readings in the same sitting, when there is no reason for such haste.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am quite agreeable that the motion for third reading should stand until tomorrow.

WORLD HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIP

TRIBUTE TO VICTORIOUS CANADIAN TEAM

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the house adjourns tonight, may I pay tribute to the Penticton V's, the winners of the world hockey championship.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I should like to place on record our pleasure in and appreciation of the great victory which has been won for Canada. The team has brought renown not only to its home province of British Columbia, but to Canada as a whole. Anyone who listened to a broadcast of the games by radio could not fail to appreciate the extensive and valuable publicity that it gave to this country. We are indeed proud of the victorious team which is returning the world hockey trophy to Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

HONOURABLE CAIRINE R. WILSON

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY AS A MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, it gave us great pleasure this afternoon to attend at the House of Commons when a bust was unveiled to the first lady commoner, the late Miss Agnes Macphail. We in the Senate are more fortunate: we still have with us the first woman senator, the honourable lady from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson). Our honourable colleague recently completed her twenty-fifth year of service to Canada as a senator. This fact first came to my attention because of an interesting article which appeared in the column "Ottawa Scene", a weekly feature of the Toronto Globe and Mail, in which reference was made to the five Alberta women who in the 1920's started a movement to have the word "persons", as used in the British North America Act, interpreted to include women. I quote from the article:

> This group of five, to whom Canadian women owe a larger debt than many today realize, were Irene Parlby, one-time cabinet minister in the Alberta Legislature, and sole survivor of the group; Mrs. Nellie L. McClung, Judge Emily Murphy, Mrs. Henrietta Muir Edwards, who as convener of laws in the National Council of Women became thoroughly versed in the legal position of women, and Mrs. Louise McKinney, a national president of the WCTU.

It is most interesting to note that the honourable senator from Rockcliffe was summoned to the Senate on the recommendation of the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister of Canada, on St. Valentine's Day, 1930.

I am sure all honourable senators join with me tonight in extending our best wishes to the honourable lady senator on her twenty-fifth anniversary as a member of this house. To the dean of women senators we wish good health and many more years in which to participate in our deliberations and to serve her country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I too would like to say a few words on this interesting subject. I join with the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) in extending congratulations to the honourable senator from Rockcliffe (Hon. Mrs. Wilson). This afternoon we heard some splendid speeches on the occasion of the unveiling of a bust in memory of the first woman member of the House of Commons, Miss Agnes Macphail, who passed away not long ago. We are, however, fortunate, as the leader stated, in having an opportunity to pay tribute to the first lady senator while she is still with us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: She owes her appointment to this house, as has been mentioned, to those five women in Alberta who believed that the word "persons" as used in the British North America Act included women. Their view, however, received no judicial recognition in Canada. In fact, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the word as used in that act meant members of the male sex only. Fortunately for our honourable women senators there was at that time a right of appeal, which we no longer have, from the Supreme Court of Canada to the Privy Council in England. The decision given by the Privy Council, upholding the view of the five Alberta women, has benefited this chamber and Canada as a whole. Since that time five women have been summoned to this chamber, all of whom have become very valuable members of it. I wish heartily to congratulate the honourable senator from Rockcliffe not only on having been the first woman to be summoned to this chamber, but also on having attained her twenty-fifth anniversary as a senator. We join in the hope, as expressed by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that she may be with us for many years to come.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, this is just a little bit overwhelming, but it is very delightful to have these gracious tributes paid in my hearing.

Having heard the words of commendation and praise paid to the late Agnes MacPhail this afternoon, I should like to say to my colleagues in this chamber that I have always been well received here. I did not feel that the all-male Senate showed any sense of resentment at my entrance here, although I imagine that inwardly there might have been a feeling that their sanctum was being invaded. Miss Macphail once told me that she would not like to see any other woman go through what she had to go through when she first came into the House of Commons. I repeat, that from the outset I have been treated in this house as one of the family, and for that I am very grateful.

When I heard the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) refer to the 82nd birthday of the honourable senator from Ponteix (Hon. Mr. Marcotte), I was reminded that he is my junior in the Senate. When the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) said they would like to have me here for a long time yet, they were careful not to mention another twenty-five years. It is nice to be received so cordially, and I thank you all for your very kind words.

I confess that this year I was rather pleased that both my birthday and the anniversary of my appointment to this chamber fell on days when the Senate was adjourned for a long week-end; however, they apparently did not go entirely unnoticed.

Incidentally, I notice that the article to which the honourable Leader referred states that my youngest daughter was five years old when I entered the Senate. Inadvertently, a year was added to her age, but she may be grateful for it when the time comes to claim her pension. At any rate, I have not heard any protests from her yet.

I would like to point out that the famous five women from Alberta first took their case to the Supreme Court of Alberta, which decided against them. They appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, where the decision went against them, with only Sir Lyman Duff, later Chief Justice, dissenting. Then, with true feminine persistence, they appealed to the Privy Council in London. May I add that they did so with the full support of the then Minister of Justice, the late Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe, who seemed to have a high regard for women's capabilities, and to whom, I am sure, the other women in this chamber are grateful. Incidentally, I notice that the article draws attention to the rather curious fact that the late Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, having recommended one woman for appointment to the Senate, never recommended another. I do not know if that was because of any failing on my part, or whether, as he said, it was his first and only experience of proposing, and he did not wish to repeat it.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Paul H. Bouffard: Honourable senators, the bill which I propose to discuss at this time is surely one of the most important ever to be introduced in this chamber. Highly divergent opinions have been expressed by those who have already dealt with it. Beyond any question, those who have discussed the matter have done so in perfect good faith and with a view to serving the interests of the Canadian nation. I would, however, point out something which, to my mind, is important. Nearly all those who have spoken so far on broadening the grounds for divorce have admitted that, in principle, they are against divorce and that they approve of it only in exceptional cases, in order to avoid a greater evil.

I want to say, at the outset, that I do not intend to consider this bill from the religious point of view; on that score the opinion of Catholics is well known. Freedom of creed is a precious freedom for all of us. I respect the opinion of others, as much as I insist that mine shall also be respected. The social standpoint is the only one which I shall consider.

The general and unconditional broadening of grounds for divorce is generally considered as a great evil. That is why even those who are most in favour of it accept it only with the gravest reservations. They seek to relieve the parties in what they call the extreme cases, for whom the continuation of the marital bond involves greater hardship than divorce. It would appear therefore, and beyond doubt, that all of us recognize divorce as a social evil, as a wound to be treated with the greatest care, or as a remedy to be used in very particular and exceptional cases only.

Let us not forget either that this plague is not particular to Canada. Nearly all countries in the world are afflicted with it; and the experiment which it is proposed to make in Canada is not the first one of its kind. It has been tried in many countries, under the leadership of legislators who were as convinced as are some members of this house that divorce should be approved in order to avoid a greater evil and to untie a bond which, in fact, no longer exists.

Unfortunately, however, the experience which these various countries have had is not encouraging. It should, on the contrary, convince us that if divorce has in fact settled some especially unfortunate cases, it has given rise to most serious abuses. By granting freedom in several cases these countries have opened wide this wound which festers and decays, to the point that many countries have adopted the opposite stand and others are seeking solutions which are difficult to apply once bad habits have become too deeply rooted.

Canada, far from making similar experiments, should rather, in my opinion, draw from them the most serious lesson and put them to account, not by broadening the grounds for divorce, but by restricting them more and more and by being more and more exacting, even in the case of adultery, which has so far been about the only accepted ground for divorce throughout Canada.

The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) did not fail to deplore the admission of simulated adultery as evidence upon which the judgments of our courts and of the Senate are so often based. I entirely agree with her. However, I fail to see how the remedy for this already enlarged and festering wound can lie in broadening the grounds for divorce.

A more painstaking inquiry, less trust in these sham adulteries, closer questioning of the parties requesting divorce and of the co-respondents, would appear to me a better way of correcting abuses than a broadening of the grounds for divorce, which would have no other effect than to increase the number of cases based on such simulated evidence, which is all too frequent at the present time.

There are some who claim that the people from Quebec and Newfoundland are not interested in this question, since it does not affect them. Let us not forget that all senators, whatever part of the country they may belong to, are bound to examine all federal legislation carefully and to consider the interests of each and every part of Canada when a bill as important as this one is brought before Parliament. It is the duty of every member of the Senate to study the measure in detail and to express an opinion on the good or evil which it may bring to a certain part of Canada, and it is the duty of every senator who thinks that it will affect some more or less extensive part of Canada to express his opinion.

The bill before us is a social measure of capital importance. Those of us who are convinced that it endangers the very foundations of our Canadian society are bound to oppose it even if the part of Canada in which we live is not affected. We represent here the whole of Canada, not only one locality or one province.

But Quebec and Newfoundland are affected. In so far as petitions from these two provinces are concerned, Parliament has up to this time considered no other ground for divorce than adultery; but I am firmly convinced that if this bill were passed Parliament would, less than a year later, be recommending and granting divorce on the same grounds as were then accepted in the rest of Canada.

I will attempt to prove later on that those who imagine that this bill would not affect Quebec or Newfoundland are mistaken. I am afraid, and I think rightly so, that once Parliament accepted this bill it would be bound to extend the measure before long to all parts of Canada. A striking example of this was the bill which established divorce courts in eight of the ten provinces of Canada. It was not supposed to affect Quebec or Newfoundland. However, in every session in recent years a bill has been introduced in the House of Commons for the sole purpose of imposing divorce courts upon those two provinces.

The bill defines the word "court" in section 2 (a), which refers to section 3. Section 3 states:

> This act shall apply to and in those provinces of Canada wherein there are now constituted and maintained courts of divorce and matrimonial causes having jurisdiction to decree dissolution of marriage, and to and in such provinces only.

Such is the definition of the word "court". The definition establishes the jurisdiction of the courts in each province, and the act would apply in all provinces where such courts exist.

Are there in the province of Quebec courts of matrimonial causes having jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage? There is no doubt in my mind that such courts exist in the province of Quebec. The Superior Court has that general jurisdiction. Has this court jurisdiction to annul a marriage? Undoubtedly. One has only to review the provisions of the Civil Code to find in what circumstances the Superior Court in the province of Quebec can declare a marriage null ab initio voidable and that it should be dissolved.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I interrupt the honourable senator? Can those whose marriage is declared null in such cases remarry?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Certainly. I am not talking of separation from bed and board, I am talking of a full dissolution of marriage, and the Civil Code specifies several causes for dissolution of marriage. I will cite a few examples. Nullity can be decreed if natural or accidental impotency existed when the marriage took place. That is one cause. Nullity can be decreed when the marriage has been contracted by a minor without having obtained the necessary consent. That is another cause. Nullity can be decreed if the marriage is between close relatives whether in a direct or collateral line. That is a third cause. Nullity can also be decreed if there is a religious obstacle resulting from relationship, whether natural or by affinity, and affinity there means by marriage. That is a fourth cause. I could cite some more. Under the Civil Code there are cases where the marriage is null ab initio and consequently the marriage has never existed, and there are others where the court can decree an annulment. Such a case would be where the marriage was contracted without the free consent of husband and wife.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I do not like to interrupt, but may I ask if the same provisions apply in the other provinces? Can their courts declare marriages null and void?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I am not sure.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I think so, yes.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It must be so. I do not know exactly what legislation on marriage there is in the other provinces, but the federal Parliament having legislated on marriage, I am inclined to believe that the other provinces must have courts which are able to declare marriage either null or voidable.

A marriage can also be dissolved if it was contracted without the free consent of husband and wife. Any marriage which was not contracted publicly or before an authorized official may also be annulled. This enumeration leaves no doubt as to the existence in Quebec of courts with jurisdiction over matrimonial causes, and, therefore, it is possible to question the exclusive application of this measure to provinces other than Quebec and Newfoundland. It would be very unfortunate to find that it applies to Quebec and Newfoundland, even if all the members of this house do not think it should apply to either of these provinces. I would suggest that all provinces to which the act applies should be named specifically, in order to remove any ambiguity on the point.

Such are the serious reasons why the members of the Senate who come from Quebec and Newfoundland should take an active interest in this question and try to foresee the difficulties into which the bill would soon involve the two provinces which are not supposed to be affected by it.

As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to divorce, both from the social standpoint and as a means of correcting or relieving an error, and I propose to vote against this bill. A study of the experience of some of the countries we know best will easily show to what extent it has been unfruitful, not to say frightful. In France divorce was not recognized before the Revolution, but apparently that did not prevent France from developing into or from being at that time one of the most important and powerful countries. Because of her artistic and literary achievements she was then the most admired country in the world. The Revolution thought it could rebuild France. I do not believe it was a success. Of course, this was not entirely due to the recognition of divorce. Divorce was one of the novelties inaugurated by the Revolution. Only a few years later France, though still revolutionary, had to reconsider its decision and prohibit divorce entirely. The divorce law was first established in France in 1792, that is to say three years after the start of the revolution. It was dropped in 1816, and for a period of almost seventy years France refused to recognize divorce on any ground. She has, unfortunately returned to her former legislation and is now suffering, as are all other countries going through the same experience, from the disastrous results which divorce brings to any country which opens its doors to it. Mr. Mailhé—and I am talking about not a great Catholic, but a man who did not practice at that time—in reporting to both houses of the French Parliament, could not refrain from saying:

> You cannot soon enough put a stop to the torrents of immorality let loose by these disastrous laws.

In Paris, during the Revolution and for a few years thereafter, there were more divorces than marriages. The act of 1884 and the amendments enacted thereunder were drawn up in very much the same terms as those of the measure now before this house. The terms of the French law were even stricter than those of the proposed bill, in that, in 1884, a woman could not marry before the expiration of a certain interval. The act provided for the care of the children and attempted to control the financial position of husband and wife. The arguments advanced in France in 1884 in favour of a divorce law were exactly the same as those put forward in the Senate at the present time.

The French law was designed to correct certain pitiful situations, to settle certain specific cases, to break bonds which the abuses of one or the other of the parties had already irrevocably broken. As a French writer so aptly put it:

> In analysing the various arguments advanced, one is brought to the conclusion that if the arguments of those who urged divorce had been true, the problem would no longer exist. But the terrifying increase in divorces now endangers the institution of marriage itself. Trumped-up charges of desertion and cruelty are more often resorted to than sham charges of adultery.

In France, divorce is a mere formality. The court of the district of the Seine has granted more than 270 divorces in a single day. Such are the results of a law very similar to the measure now before this house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Exactly the same. There is not in the French law a single ground which does not appear in the bill before this house. I admit that at the beginning, before things went the same way as they have gone in France, the law might be applied more strictly here.

Now let us consider the situation in England. Until 1937 there was an average of 3,000 to 4,000 divorces per year. Immediately after the coming into effect of the new law, in 1938, the cases totalled 7,500; and in 1946 and 1947 they climbed to 50,000 a year. A commission appointed a few years ago recommended the enlargement of grounds for divorce. Its recommendation was approved by the British Parliament and has been in force for more than twenty years. The number of divorce cases has increased to such an extent that England has revived its Royal Commission, under the chairmanship of a distinguished personage, Lord Morton of Henryton, for the purpose of considering the effects of the law during the last ten years and of trying to find some solution less disastrous than the present one.

Let us now glance at the United States. The situation there is simply terrible. The grounds for divorce are just about the same as those proposed in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: In practically every state.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No, that is not correct.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I repeat that in practically every state the law is about the same as that which we are asked to enact, except that in some states there is the ground of "mental cruelty", which is not a ground included in this bill, although if the bill in its present form is adopted it may well be admitted by our courts.

These grounds—and I do not refer to the laws of Nevada, which I am not considering —have given rise to disastrous conditions. In one state, one in every three marriages ends in divorce. A well-known American who was both socially and financially prominent told me ten years ago that in the state of New York conditions were most deplorable. He mentioned that, of twenty-two graduates of a well-known and highly reputed convent, at which his daughter had studied, twenty had married within two years of leaving the convent, and after three years nineteen of them were divorced.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask the honourable senator whether in New York State the sole ground for divorce is adultery?

Hon. Mr. Euler: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I am giving an example of what may happen when divorce is restricted even to one ground. My informant had no personal interest in telling me of this experience. His daughter was living in New York, and the family is one of the best-known in the state. This happened ten years ago. I cannot give a precise statement as to the number of divorces in New York at the present time, but I have information as to what is happening nowadays in the United States, and in a moment I shall give some figures which relate to twenty of those states.

Hon. Mr. Wood: It does not necessarily follow that all the divorces to which the honourable senator has referred were granted in New York State.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: Perhaps not. In many cases New York residents obtain divorces elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Some Canadians do, too.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: But with this difference, that most divorces obtained outside Canada by Canadians are not recognized in this country, whereas in the United States a divorce granted in one state is recognized in another.

Hon. Mr. Farris: In many cases Americans go to Mexico and obtain decrees of divorce there.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: But in Canada, except under very special conditions, we do not recognize divorces obtained by our citizens in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That does not deter them.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: No, but such cases are not very numerous. What I am pointing out is that any state of the United States recognizes a divorce which is granted in any other.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Since it is a fact that the ground for divorce is the same in New York State as in Canada, what conclusion does my friend seek to draw from the fact that, in the incident he mentions, nineteen marriages out of twenty resulted in divorce? What does he expect to prove by these figures?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I pointed out that this New York gentleman was to a certain extent interested in a situation which, to him, was very deplorable, namely, that nineteen out of twenty girls who were married after leaving the convent were divorced after three years.

Hon. Mr. Euler: And the ground is the same as is recognized in this country.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: That is so. But I do not know whether all these decrees were granted in the state of New York. It may very well be that some of them were granted in other states and not necessarily on the ground of adultery. My honourable friend has only to look at what is going on in Canada, where adultery is the only ground for divorce. Just look at the number of divorces which have been granted in Ontario and British Columbia alone since the establishment of divorce courts in those provinces—and they have been granted on the ground of adultery only.

Hon. Mr. Euler: What does that prove?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: That those who want to untie the bonds of matrimony will take whatever means they can. I am not the only one here who holds that view. When taking part in this debate the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), in deploring the present situation, stated:

> I should like to say without any reflection upon anybody connected with the Divorce Committee or the work of the committee that at times I have suspected there have been stage settings of a certain kind to permit divorce being achieved.

The activities of the American divorce courts are about to "bury the family unit", to use the words of John C. Fitzgerald, Dean of the Law Faculty of Loyala University. Since 1867 the American population has increased fourfold, but the number of divorces has increased sixty times. In 1948 there were in the United States more than 20 divorces for every 100 marriages. I do not know where Mr. Fitzgerald found his statistics, but he states that from 80 to 90 per cent of the divorces are prearranged by mutual consent, and that 75 per cent of the cases involve perjury.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what we are trying to avoid by this bill.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: According to what has happened in the United States, this proposed legislation would not have that effect. Some people might not perjure themselves in testifying on a charge of adultery, but they might be less scrupulous about perjuring themselves in testifying on a charge of cruelty or desertion.

It takes an average of fifteen minutes to obtain a divorce in the United States courts. The experiment has proved an absolute calamity in that country. The number of divorce cases rose from 2,950 in 1886 to 32,557 in 1921; and, in 1951, to 100,000 in only twenty states.

I need not repeat the statistics quoted by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) in regard to Canada. What are we aiming at? Is not the record of other countries sufficient to prevent Canada from trying similar experiments? Adultery will not be simulated any more; a less shameful ground will more often be simulated. This is indicated by the fact that out of 100,000 divorces granted in twenty American states, only 1,400 were granted on the ground of adultery, but 56,000 were on the ground of cruelty.

Ella Winter reports in Collier's magazine another painful example, in the case of Russia, where in the first days of the Soviet Revolution a divorce could be obtained in ten minutes, abortions were performed by the thousands, sexual education was taught all over the country, and the home was cast aside and children were entrusted to the state.

Today Russia has abolished co-education; girls' schools are teaching cooking, sewing and embroidery; and it has become more difficult to otbain a divorce in that country than in many capitalistic countries. The marriage ceremony has also become more solemn. Family life is praised, encouraged and even rewarded. Stability has become a password—stability in marriage, in family relations and in relations between the sexes. To obtain a divorce in Russia it is necessary to appear before two courts of justice and to publish a notice in the newspapers, and the cost of divorce is very high. I found this information in the book Ella Winter published in 1945, entitled I saw the Russian People.

It seems quite clear to me that it is neither because of moral or religious principles that Russia has changed its family code and its divorce laws. Having seen how seriously divorce endangers the security of the nation, it has taken the means of checking it. It was force of circumstances which compelled Russia to return to the Christian notion of marriage.

In this debate few honourable senators have dealt with the welfare and education of the children. I was impressed by the statistics which the honourable gentleman from Ottawa West gave us last night on the number of children whom divorce deprives, to all intents and purposes, of any family life. It is estimated that the total number who have been so affected in the United States is 4 million—a terrifying number. What will it be in Canada? Human nature is the same everywhere, and the results of divorce in the countries we have reviewed will be repeated in Canada. In a few years we shall have more than half a million children who, from the practical, educational and family points of view, will be abandoned or placed in institutions which the state will have to provide to look after them. Are we willing to accept such consequences, merely to afford a few unfortunate people a second chance in life?

Unfortunately, if this bill is adopted it will settle very few cases, but will rather open the way to the same abuses and the same sad results that have been experienced in other countries.

Indissolubility surely causes some difficult situations. There is no institution on earth which is free from pain and suffering. These are individual and accidental evils which cannot be remedied by an act creating general unrest and producing disastrous results of the kind experienced in the countries I have mentioned. Legislation is not meant to safeguard the happiness of the individual at the expense of the common weal. That is the principle which should underlie this proposed legislation, just as it underlies, in fact, any other legislation. Duties and taxes, expropriations and sanitary measures are striking examples of this.

States more concerned with individual happiness than with the common good, are not in general successful. On the contrary, their legislation has, every time, loosed torrents of scandal, of discord and of injustice and, if it has untied a few unhappy marriages, it has also sown doubts among good ones and opened the way to the systematic destruction of the family. Under such conditions people turn away from marriage as a duty and look upon it as a mere source of pleasure.

If the question is considered from the point of view of the birth rate, it will be seen that divorce gives rise to the gravest results. A nation cannot afford to lose interest in its birth rate, for it is too closely connected with its security. The birth rate is in direct proportion to the stability of the home, just as instability of the home inevitably causes a fall in the birth rate. I need not go outside of Canada to prove that. In the province of Quebec, where the number of divorces is among the lowest, the birth rate is 28 per cent; in Ontario, in 1942, it was only 20·1 per cent, and in British Columbia, where the proportion of divorces is the highest in Canada, it was 19·3 per cent. The story is the same everywhere.

Most advanced sociologists have accepted the following theory: where the number of divorces is lowest, the gross birth rate is highest.

The highest birth rate is not to be found in the states where there are the most marriages, but in those where there are the least divorces. Such facts, it seems to me, should make us pause. As far as I am concerned, they place upon me a responsibility which, from the strictly social and national point of view, I cannot escape.

Moreover, where does the pressure come from in Canada to have this bill passed? As far as I know, not a single province has even considered passing a resolution to that effect. The only public body that I know of which has taken a stand in this matter is the Canadian Bar Association. I recognize that its opinion may be quite authoritative, but it is far from representing a majority opinion of lawyers in Canada. Neither is it specially competent to express an opinion in the social field. No one has quoted a single social body, a single important political group, or a single province which has expressed an opinion either way. The Senate, which is par excellence an independent body should not be swayed into passing legislation which has produced such harmful results elsewhere, just because a small minority of our lawyers have seen fit to recommend such a measure.

Some senators, among them the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross), have suggested that this law should apply only in those provinces that want it. I am entirely opposed to delegating our authority to the provinces. The Fathers of Confederation entrusted us with a jurisdiction within which we ourselves must exercise our authority. If they had wished to grant this authority to the provinces, they would not have failed to do so. It is our responsibility, and Parliament must exercise this power. It is Parliament which is entrusted with the responsibility of defending the indissolubility of marriage in the interest of the family and of society.

How would the views of a province find expression? It is readily realized that pressure groups may attempt to arouse public opinion. Indeed, pressures become easier to exert as the size of the unit wherein they are exerted becomes smaller and less populated. Personally, I would frown upon delegating our powers to the provinces. We have been given authority, and it behoves us to exercise it. Divesting ourselves of some of our authority would surely not tend to diminish our responsibility.

Honourable senators, it seems to me quite obvious and beyond any doubt that this bill would open the door very wide to abuses which have really occurred in all the countries where a similar experiment has been made. Human nature has been tried; it cannot stand such temptation. Because of a few exceptional cases which might deserve consideration, there are created thousands of unfortunate situations which from the social point of view affect hundreds upon hundreds of women, who are oftener the victims of divorce than men, and thousands of children whose home life is broken beyond remedy. Auguste Comte very aptly said:

> The mere notion that a marriage may be dissolved is an incentive to divorce.

And Mr. Planiol added:

> The matrimonial union will not attain its fundamental end unless it is both exclusive and indissoluble.

Is not the experience of those countries conclusive? It should give food for thought to those who, in perfect good faith, want to broaden the grounds for divorce in order that some individual cases may be settled. Unfortunately, if this bill is adopted, it will settle very few cases, but rather will result in the worst abuses imaginable.

I will now consider the more important details of the bill.

The grounds for divorce: Section 6 of the bill mentions adultery as the first ground of divorce. In this instance, the man and the woman are placed on the same footing. Is it necessary, from a strictly legal point of view, to mention adultery as a ground for divorce? Out of ten provinces, eight have already recognized the right to obtain a divorce on the ground of adultery, and this under old English laws, which the sponsor of the bill is very anxious not to tamper with. The other two provinces have no divorce courts.

In order to grant a divorce to a resident of either of these provinces, it is necessary in each case to pass a special act of Parliament. Everybody recognizes that Parliament, having supreme authority, has the power to pass any special act which it deems desirable and to grant a divorce on any ground whatever.

I wonder why this bill mentions adultery as a ground for divorce, since it stipulates clearly that it does not modify or amend existing laws which provide for the granting of divorce in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island? Does it not seem that this bill would be interpreted as giving to certain courts of Quebec and Newfoundland the right to grant divorces on the ground of adultery? From a legal standpoint I believe so and, accordingly, I submit that the word "adultery" should be entirely omitted from this bill, which as a matter of fact could in this respect affect only the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland.

As far as this ground for divorce is concerned, does it not imply that only Quebec and Newfoundland could benefit from this bill, since the other provinces have no need of it in order to consider adultery as a ground for divorce? If this bill is adopted, I would suggest that, from a strictly legal point of view, in order to clear up any misunderstanding, adultery be deleted from the grounds for divorce.

The second ground for divorce under the bill is desertion. Desertion has no doubt painful consequences for the spouse who has been deserted and for the children, if any. Desertion especially reveals the little consideration the husband and wife have given to the most important act of their lives.

Racial and religious differences, temperaments and customs, are the most frequent causes of desertion, which is often the aftermath of marriages contracted after an orgy. I do not feel that for such unimportant reasons we should apply so drastic and so dangerous a remedy as the dissolution of marriage. If we accept such a ground for divorce, we immediately open the door to hasty and ill-considered marriages, because whenever one does not work out, desertion can easily be involved to obtain a dissolution.

One is often inclined to look upon married life as a temporary state that could be called a matrimonial venture. But for more than eighty years our laws have not allowed, and our legislatures have refused to consider, desertion as a cause for dissolving a marriage. Such a record impresses me. Our lawmakers did not want a breaking-up of marriage through divorce based on desertion, and I respectfully urge our present legislators to think seriously before introducing into our statutes provisions that for more than eighty years our predecessors have constantly rejected.

Is it not a fact that both world wars were to blame for many cases of desertion which aroused our sympathy but which remain nevertheless exceptional cases? These are not the only misfortunes that the wars have brought to many families; indeed, desertion is not as hard to bear as some other types of misfortune that are the lot of many families in Canada as a result of war.

In other countries where desertion has been accepted as a ground for divorce, abuses have proved to be numerous. Let us, therefore, think seriously before following the modern trend, and let us reflect that by approving desertion as a ground for divorce we would be encouraging serious misbehaviour that would lead to a larger number of cases of collusion than we have at present.

The third proposed ground is insanity. Divorce is no longer a sanction in this case, since neither party has failed in his obligations, but it is a remedy. If divorce is granted for a cause that is totally beyond the control of the party against whom it is decreed, there is a breach of contract based only on the risks covered by such a contract. The solemn promise of mutual help in time of sickness is put aside, and the contingencies related to the frailty of life become involved. There is no doubt about it, a sick spouse cannot fulfil his or her obligations. But that is not the only type of illness that married people risk. There are many diseases which render them absolutely incapable of fulfilling the most important functions of family life. For instance, many diseases are a constant danger to the wife and children; many diseases compel either the husband or the wife to leave the home for ever, or permit them to come back only at infrequent intervals. Often on account of the illness of husband or wife the other spouse is obliged to provide for the ordinary financial and educational needs of the family, without any assistance from his or her mate. If marriages were to be dissolved on account of those hazards of life, there would be no end to it.

Insanity is a disease which at present is treated more efficaciously than formerly. Many patients considered as incurable are recovering gradually through operations and drugs that produce cures where formerly they could not have been expected.

But there are many other diseases quite as specific and sad, and if we consider as a ground for divorce any disease, however distressing it may be, we shall open the door very wide to the worst abuses and the worst and most unforeseeable consequences. Besides, insanity is a mental disease that assumes a a great variety of forms which are extremely difficult to recognize and define. Let us not be the judges of those human misfortunes that God inflicts upon only a few individuals, and let us not break the most sacred contract to alleviate accidental circumstances.

Moreover, if we examine the laws of each country in the world, including those of each province of Canada, we find that insanity or any disease, even death, cannot annul a contract of a purely economic and financial nature. Notwithstanding the hardship involved, economic and financial contracts must be complied with by those who have entered into them. There is all the more reason for maintaining this position with regard to a contract which is held to be the most indissoluble and most sacred by all countries in the world.

The fourth proposed ground is cruelty. In France it is called abuse, mistreatment or serious injury. Cruelty is accepted in France, in England and in the United States as a ground for divorce. However, it is recognized everywhere as the cause of the worst abuses. If we already complain, and rightly so, that collusion exists in the matter of adultery, how much easier it will be to sham cruelty, even physical cruelty? In certain American states, I dare say in most of them, quarrels that happen rather frequently, rather bitter reproaches, moods that change from day to day, an unpredictable disposition, too great an interest on the part of the husband in his business, early retiring, early rising, snoring, reading a newspaper at breakfast, are all daily grounds accepted in the courts as grounds for divorce. It is called mental cruelty.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is not true of England.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: England has a tendency to enlarge the ground of cruelty, and today mental cruelty in certain forms is accepted as a ground for divorce. True, in England mental cruelty does not yet include such things as snoring or reading the newspaper at breakfast, but if that country continues its present course it will soon come to that.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I ask my honourable friend what has been the result of the inquiry made by the Lord Morton commission?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: That commission is still sitting and has not yet made a report. Consideration is being given to what should be done in England to prevent the abuses committed since 1937.

Do we want to expose ourselves to this sort of thing in Canada? Do we think that we are more immune to such abuses than are the English, the Americans or the French?

Hon. Mr. Farris: The Nova Scotians seem to be immune to it.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I do not know how far cruelty has been accepted by the courts of Nova Scotia as a ground for divorce, but if I accept the version given to me today, I take off my hat to that province, for it is the only place in Canada where no abuse has resulted from a long-standing law allowing cruelty as a ground for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And cruelty is not defined in their provincial act.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: One conclusion we could come to is that Nova Scotia is the most moral province in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Better than Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: In Quebec we do not grant divorces on any ground.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What!

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: In 1951 or 1952 Parliament granted only approximately 74 divorces to every 10,000 marriages in Quebec, and in Newfoundland the ratio was approximately one divorce to every 400 marriages. But Quebec and Newfoundland have no divorce laws and no divorce courts. My honourable friend knows very well what has been the result of the establishment of divorce courts in Ontario and British Columbia—the number of divorces has increased tremendously.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But British Columbia has since 1858 had the right to grant divorce on the grounds of adultery.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: But can it not grant divorce on the ground of cruelty, under the law of England as adopted in 1857?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In British Columbia the only ground for divorce is adultery.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: To what would my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) ascribe the increase in the number of divorce cases handled by Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is less costly and much simpler to sue for divorce in a court than it is to petition Parliament. Does that answer your question?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I do not think my honourable friend grasps the point I am trying to make. If Quebec and Newfoundland, the two provinces from which Parliament receives petitions for divorce, had courts similar to those in British Columbia and Ontario, obviously the number of petitions to Parliament would not be so large.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I am not so sure of that. I know that in every province in which divorce courts have been established the increase in divorces has been very great.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Maybe that is because the causes are greater.

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: It is notable that divorces began to increase immediately after the courts were established. As I said, it is much simpler and less costly to sue for divorce before a court, and the case is concluded in less time than it takes to pass a private bill through Parliament. The provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland do not want courts which can grant divorce, even for adultery, because they fear an increase in the number of divorces would result. I do not say that the people of the province of Quebec are immune to the temptations that would accompany the establishment of a divorce court, but if we do not have divorce courts we will not be tempted.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: To follow up that argument, I would like to ask the honourable senator another question. How does he account for the fact that in the last twenty years the number of petitions to Parliament from the province of Quebec has increased tremendously?

Hon. Mr. Bouffard: I would say that the increase in population has had something to do with it. Also the large immigration into Quebec of peoples from Eastern and Western Europe has had something to do with the increase. The people of Quebec are following the modern trend, and although on religious grounds Catholics are forbidden to seek a divorce, nevertheless many of them do come before the Senate Divorce Committee. I repeat, we do not want to be led into temptation, for if we are we shall surely fall; so it is best not to place temptation in our way by making it possible to secure divorce within the province. Our Lord exhorted us to pray: "Lead us not into temptation". I am not praising those provinces which have no divorce courts or divorce law, nor am I suggesting that they are better than other provinces.

It seems to me that we should profit by the actual experience of others. Let us therefore not pass a law whereby we run the risk of undermining the very basis of this fundamental institution of our society which is the family.

Let us not fear that our society will be weakened if we keep within the bounds of reason. Are we not rather sorry for those errors that have so strongly shaken and are still shaking society in countries where special laws were passed in order to give relief to individual cases which have now become so numerous that they are no longer exceptions? I have enough faith in our legislators, in their experience and in the consideration which they have for the Canadian family to know that they are not, without long and serious thought, going to weaken the basic law aimed at preserving our families when, as a matter of fact, this law should be strengthened.

If our aim is to reduce the number of divorces in Canada, if we want to protect our families, if we wish to prevent abuses and collusion, then instead of broadening the grounds for divorce, let us place obstacles in its way. Let our inquiries into charges of adultery be more thorough, let the married parties and the co-respondents in every case be examined, let us set a long period during which both parties to a divorce would be forbidden to remarry; let us look after the children of divorced parents by providing under the act for their education and care; let us leave with parents the same obligations that they assumed towards their children at the time of their marriage; let us make provision with respect to the financial support of each of the parties that are going to be separated. In this way, and in this way alone, we shall be able to control and perhaps eventually to cure the plague of divorce which is so deeply regretted in those countries that have applied the policy proposed in this bill.

The second part of the bill deals with presumption of death. It provides that a spouse absent for seven years may be presumed dead. This is no longer a question of divorce or of desertion, it is a decision made by law, and the bond is annulled. Therefore, this is not a ground for divorce; it is rather an acknowledgment that the marriage is dissolved. It is a presumption that after an absence of seven years a person is dead. Just as I am opposed to divorce for desertion, I am opposed to divorce on the ground of presumption of death after an absence of seven years. This woud open a new door that could easily lead to collusion. After all, marriage should be dissolved by nothing but death. It is sometimes necessary to presume death for purposes of administration of an estate, but this should not be done in order to dissolve a marriage.

In my humble opinion, this question does not come within the jurisdiction of Parliament. The death of a person is a matter of civil law and comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Presumption of death after an absence of seven years is provided for in each provincial law dealing with the distribution of estates. Our legislatures did not see fit to enact that from all points of view a person absent for seven years should be presumed dead. The presumption was provided for only in the very limited field where it is required for the administration of an estate. It falls solely within the powers of our provincial legislatures to provide, if they deem it advisable, that the presumption should apply to all contracts.

Under the British North America Act our federal Parliament has the right to legislate on marriage and divorce, but not on demise. To legislate that after an absence of seven years a person may be presumed dead is not to legislate on marriage or on divorce. The terms of this part of the bill before us are, in my opinion, unconstitutional, and in legislating upon the results of a more or less prolonged absence Parliament would be overstepping its constitutional rights. It is quite possible that the federal jurisdiction, having the right to consider an absence of seven years as a ground for annullment of marriage, might add a new ground for dissolution of the conjugal bond. However, that is not what the bill now before us provides. It establishes a presumption of death, which is a purely civil matter, the result of which is the dissolution of marriage. The presumption created by the bill before us affects not only marriage but also the civil rights of husband and wife and those of the children, and allows for the opening of the estate. These are matters over which the federal Parliament has no jurisdiction. In other words, it is a presumption which is used as evidence of a civil fact, which is death. The sections of the bill concerning separation from bed and board are also matters which do not constitutionally come under federal jurisdiction. Such provisions are, in fact, to be found in the legislation of each and every one of the Canadian provinces.

The right of the federal Parliament to legislate on marriage in no way involves the right to legislate on the rights of the spouses during marriage, on the division of property between them, and on the duties of husband and wife toward each other and toward their children. Parliament is no more entitled to legislate on judicial separation than on the duties of parents towards their children, on the property of husband and wife, or the different agreements under which they may choose to marry.

A later part of the bill relates to annulment of marriage. It provides that in certain cases the marriage may be considered as null ab initio. Frankly, I admit that I see no great difference between divorce and annulment of marriage. Both have the same consequences. The federal Parliament undoubtedly has the right to legislate on the capacity to marry, as also on the cases wherein it may be declared that the marriage is null ab initio or that it could be annulled. I find, unfortunately, that the bill omits to deal with the main grounds for annulment so far recognized by provincial legislation, such as the age at which one may marry, the cases in which an error or misrepresentation may be such as to cause annulment—for instance, in the case of physical impotence at the time of marriage—or the degree of relationship between the parties. From that point of view, there are certain shortcomings in this bill.

The bill provides four new grounds for annulment.

First, non-consummation of the marriage owing to the wilful refusal of the respondent to consummate it. This may be a legitimate ground. It is recognized by the Church to which I belong, when such refusal to consummate stems from serious reasons.

Second, that either party to the marriage was at the time of marriage in a state of mental unbalance or disease or subject to recurrent fits of insanity or epilepsy. In my opinion, mental disequilibrium or insanity should not constitute a ground for annulment unless the condition was such that the party affected could not give a valid consent. The theory that marriage may be annulled by reason of mental disability or fits of epilepsy is inconceivable. The existence of a disease, however serious, cannot be accepted as a cause for annulling a marriage. The party affected may not even be aware of its existence. Medical data on such diseases is too vague for an accurate diagnosis of their causes to be made at the time they can be detected. Adoption of this proposed ground would give rise to very great abuses.

The third new ground is that the respondent was at the time of marriage suffering from contagious venereal disease. There are many causes of venereal disease. Often such diseases are hereditary: they may be the result of the misbehaviour of former generations. Moreover, usually they can now be cured; and however disgusting they may appear to the other party, it seems to me that they do not constitute sufficient grounds for annulment.

The fourth new ground is that the wife was at the time of the marriage pregnant by a man other than her husband. This ground is evidently based on the fact that the husband must not be compelled to support a child who is not his own. If the child is born more than 180 days after the marriage, he cannot disclaim it: there is then a presumption de jure that the husband is the child's father. Therefore, in order that this ground may be invoked, birth must have occurred less than 180 days after celebration of the marriage. In these circumstances, although I think that the husband could have been aware of his wife's pregnancy at the time of marriage, he may disclaim the child, and is not compelled either to keep or to support it. The real reason for seeking annulment might be that he does not wish to live with a woman who deceived him before his marriage. To grant annulment for this reason would, it seems to me, broaden the grounds for annulment to a greater degree than anybody would wish. If we were to annul all marriages where the wife had had relations before marriage with a man other than her husband, the percentage of annulments would be far too high.

These are the remarks I wished to make about this bill. I believe they are important and thought-provoking. I am sure that all members of this house will give them serious consideration before voting on the principle of the bill, and I am confident that as a result the majority will be convinced that, far from improving the social conditions of our population, it would weaken the morals of our nation and have most disastrous effects upon its development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, in introducing the bill we are now discussing, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon Mr. Aseltine) has raised an issue of far-reaching importance; and the bill, if passed, will mark a change in our historic attitude towards divorce.

This is an era of change. It is not surprising that new conditions and ways of living in an age of apartment houses, with both husband and wife as wage-earners, additional leisure, and above all, the social upheavals occasioned by two world wars, have called for an overhauling of laws which were designed for an entirely different society. I can well understand that the long experience of the honourable senator from Rosetown as Chairman of the Divorce Committee has made him aware many times, in many cases, that the present legal machinery is inadequate, or does not apply, or is made to apply by the use of questionable practices; and evidently he feels that the time is overdue for a more realistic law.

My own, more limited, experience as a member of the Divorce Committee has made me realize also that in many cases the grounds alleged in the complaint are not the real reasons for which the divorce is sought, but are used as the only means of escape.

Further, I was much impressed with the views of the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw) and the honourable senator from St. Boniface (Hon. Mr. Howden), eminent members of the medical profession whose lives have been devoted to healing physical and mental distress, and both of whom have testified that they favour a change in the law of divorce. The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), in her able address, spoke not only as a representative of her section of the country, but also, I think, as a woman urging a broadening of the grounds for divorce, which this bill seeks. I thought the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) also made a very valuable contribution to the debate, as did others. At any rate they impressed me, and made me feel that the subject is a very important one and that the situation they described warrants our most sympathetic consideration.

I am trying to approach the subject with an open mind. I am quite aware that the religious denomination to which I belong frowns on divorce, but I want to convince myself of the right course I think it is fair to say that our national attitude—if I may use that expression—towards divorce has been definitely negative, although over the past quarter century there has been a change which we must recognize. I recall that when I was a young man a divorced person was not very graciously received in society, while today divorce is not only tolerated, but indeed in many circles it is quite generally accepted.

In approaching the subject one has to take into consideration the view of those who are altogether opposed to divorce on religious grounds, and who look upon marriage as a divine institution; the view of the sociologist who looks at marriage as a social institution with its influence on society generally; and the view of the lawyer who feels that in many cases the law is not applicable and who is concerned with the economic and legal aspects of the institution.

It is interesting to note here that in our Western civilization divorce passed from the hands of civil law at the time of the Roman Empire to Canon law during the Middle Ages, but that in England after the Reformation divorce became a civil law responsibility and there was only one ground for divorce. In 1912, after four years of study, a Royal Commission in England recommended that five grounds be added, but the influence of the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches prevented any change until 1937, when a bill similar to the one we are discussing was passed by the British Parliament.

I am inclined to the view that if this bill is passed, divorce in Canada will be increased, notwithstanding the view expressed by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). I think statistics on this point showing experience elsewhere cannot be overlooked. I start with the year 1938, which was the first year after the bill liberalizing the grounds for divorce was passed in England, and I want to compare the experience since then in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

In Canada in 1938 there was one divorce in every 40 marriages. In 1952 there was one divorce in every 22·8 marriages. In the United States in 1938 there was one divorce in every 5·4 marriages, while in 1952 there was one divorce in every 4·6 marriages. In England in 1938 there was one divorce in every 59 marriages, while in 1952 there was one divorce in every 11 marriages.

While making every allowance for other factors which are reflected in these figures, such as the legacies of war and changed social conditions, I think the evidence is very strong and hard to contradict that an increase in the grounds for divorce brings an increase in the number of divorces. In the state of New York, for example, where there is only one ground for divorce, namely, adultery, the number of divorces granted is much smaller than in states where other grounds are recognized.

However, that is not the chief reason why I think we should go slowly on this measure. I have been unable to discover any substantial public demand for this legislation, and in our system of democracy I think legislation of this kind especially should reflect a demand on a part of the people. Personally, I have never received any communication from my constituency or province and I have not noticed in the press or heard on the radio any resolution or expression of opinion from any group of any kind asking for legislation of this character—and goodness knows there are people suggesting better ways of doing almost everything. To my knowledge the only professional group which has expressed an opinion and recommended legislation of this character is the Canadian Bar Association. However, I take it that, from the public viewpoint while many people feel all is not well as things are at present, the matter is not a pressing problem, and I think that we are just a little ahead of public opinion.

Honourable senators will have noted from these remarks of mine that I have been feeling my way along. My conclusion is this, that I want some information on the subject from people who know more about it than I do. I want to hear from judges of divorce courts and from members of the legal profession. I want to hear from social service workers and representatives of the medical profession and all and sundry who can contribute anything to this subject, which is of such great importance to the future generations of Canadians. We are building in this new country the fabric of a Canadian culture, and a few years is a short time in the life of any nation.

My recommendation is to make haste slowly. I would welcome the appointment of a special committee, as soon as convenient to make an exhaustive enquiry into the whole subject, and, if they think it wise, to bring in recommendations upon which legislation can be based.

Divorce is an evidence of failure, always to be deplored and avoided. If any means of success can be achieved even over what may appear to be insurmountable obstacles, the welfare of children, of the family and of society must never be ignored or minimized. To meet the situation here in Canada in the Canadian way it seems to me is a challenge to legislation, and the solution will not be found without our practising those virtues of tolerance and respect for the viewpoints of others. Tolerance and respect for the opinions of others have been the basis upon which has been built our Canadian unity. Therefore, because I feel we need more opportunity to study the question and weigh public opinion, and because under the rules I am forbidden to move an amendment on second reading, I regret that I shall be obliged to vote against the bill on the present occasion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Davies, the debate was adjourned.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS AND FREIGHT RATES

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

On the Notice of Inquiry by Hon. Mr. Isnor:

1. What is the average cost per bushel of shipping grain from (a) Winnipeg; (b) head of Great Lakes; to Liverpool via (a) Vancouver; (b) Montreal; (c) Halifax; (d) Churchill?
2. What amount of grain was shipped in the current year of 1954 through each of the routes (a), (b), (c) and (d)?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Stand.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I wonder if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) could give some indication as to when we are likely to have a reply to this inquiry? FOREIGN AIRCRAFT THIRD PARTY DAMAGE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved the second reading of Bill F, an Act to implement the Convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface.

He said: Honourable senators, I think this bill requires some explanation. Its purpose is to ratify a convention agreed to at Rome, by representatives of a number of nations, for the purpose of making uniform as far as possible the rules applying in the various countries to compensation for personal injuries and property damage caused by foreign aircraft flying over one of the countries. For instance, if a plane from the United States were flying across Canada—assuming that the United States was a signatory of the convention—and an accident caused the plane to fall on this building and kill a number of senators—which might cause some satisfaction in some quarters—

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I don't know where!

Hon. Mr. Farris: —under the bill compensation would be payable to the persons injured and to the proper representatives of the persons killed. The bill also provides for compensation for damage to property.

This question was first dealt with in a convention at Rome, in 1933, but nothing came of it. After the war the need for an international agreement on the subject became obvious, and the convention which we are now asked to approve was agreed to at Rome in 1952.

The bill itself consists of only one page, and I might read the substance of it. Section 2 gives the following definitions:

2. In this Act,

(a) "Convention" means the convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface, set out in the schedule;

(b) "Contracting State" means any state that has ratified or adhered to the Convention and whose denunciation thereof has not become effective; and

(c) Other words and expressions have the same meaning as in the convention.

Section 3 reads:

(1) The convention is hereby approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada.

(2) This Act and the convention apply only in respect of damage contemplated by article 1 of the convention caused in the territory of Canada by an aircraft registered in the territory of a contracting state other than Canada.

The increase in transportation and traffic by air makes the necessity for this measure obvious. The present bill provides for compensation without proof of negligence; it fixes the proportion of liability of the offending aircraft operator; and makes provision for the collection of damages under the convention.

At the 1952 meeting in Rome thirty-two countries were represented, fifteen of which signed the convention at that time. Britain and Australia signed it in 1953, and in 1954 the Honourable Mr. Chevrier signed on behalf of Canada. However, the mere signing of the convention is not sufficient, for two reasons. First, article 33 requires that the convention be ratified by a nation before it can be made effective therein. Secondly, it does not have the force of law in this country until it is ratified by Parliament.

Honourable senators are sufficiently familiar with treaties under the British and Canadian system of government to know that Canada, for instance, can bind itself internationally with another government by a treaty or a convention. In the United States a treaty does not become effective until it is ratified by, I think, a two-thirds vote of the Senate of that country, and once that is done it becomes law. That is not so in Canada. Here, a treaty is made by the sovereign, and a convention may be secured in a less formal way; however, as I have said, it does not bind the citizens of the country until it is ratified by parliament and thereby becomes the law of the land. Subsection 1 of section 3 reads:

The convention is hereby approved and declared to have the force of law in Canada.

Now, while a large number of nations including Britain, Australia and Canada have signed the convention, up to date only one country, namely Egypt, has ratified it. It is necessary for at least five countries to ratify the convention before it becomes operative. Then, of course, it will only be operative as between those five countries, but thereafter, as each country does ratify it, it will come under the convention. I am told by Mr. Matthews, the Chairman of the Air Transport Board, that it is expected other countries will follow our example, and that it will not be long until a number of other countries, perhaps all the signatories, have ratified.

This convention has been recommended unanimously by the Air Transport Board. It has also been recommended as in the public interest by Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Pacific Air Lines, which are the only Canadian international air transportation companies affected by it.

I feel I should explain this bill in some detail because of article 39 of the convention which provides:

No reservations may be made to this convention.

So it is a case of take it or leave it. Ordinarily provisions such as there are in this convention would be referred to a committee and investigated, and probably some changes would be made. If I were in charge of the drafting of this convention I can see several provisions that I would perhaps suggest should be made a little plainer, but we cannot do that. As I say, it is a case of take it or leave it. So I feel I should explain here now in a general way what these provisions are, and it will be up to this house, without bothering with a committee, either to accept the convention in whole or simply reject it.

A detailed examination involves certain considerations. First, to whom is compensation payable? This is covered by article 1, section 1. I will read that. The convention itself is attached as a schedule to the bill.

Article 1.

1. Any person who suffers damage on the surface shall, upon proof only that the damage was caused by an aircraft in flight or by any person or thing falling therefrom, be entitled to compensation as provided by this convention. Nevertheless there shall be no right to compensation if the damage is not a direct consequence of the incident giving rise thereto . . .

Honourable senators will see from that provision that all an injured person has to prove is the damage and the fact that an aircraft was the cause. There does not have to be any proof of negligence.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the honourable senator whether this provision is not contrary to the practice of the civil courts? For instance, in an automobile accident the burden of proof is upon the automobile owner. Under this bill, unless I misunderstand it, the burden of proof is transferred to the private individual.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My honourable friend is quite right. His statement applies also to the common law. But this Convention was established, as my honourable friend will fully appreciate because, for instance, if an accident happened in the night, an airplane crashed, and damage were done, it might be almost impossible to prove negligence; and it would be equally difficult to recover damages afterwards. It is in the light of these two facts that the burden has been shifted. Contrary to existing law in the common law provinces and in the province of Quebec, all that an injured party will have to do is to prove the fact of damage and who caused it.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Does the expression "on the surface" cover the case of anyone who is damaged in a house or other building?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Oh, yes; "surface" would include even a basement. The term is a very general one.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: The reference is not to the "surface" of the person only?

Hon. Mr. Farris: It is the surface of the earth.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is the case covered of a foreign aircraft which collides with another aircraft in this country?

Hon. Mr. Farris: No: on that point there is another provision, which I will read to my honourable friend when I get to it: the one I am discussing is not applicable to an accident of that kind. If two airplanes collide, and both go down, and both are from a country signatory to the convention either of them may be fully liable. It is not intended to deal with collisions in the air so far as the damage is done in the air; its application is to damage done to persons on the surface of the earth.

There are three exceptions to liability. First, under article 5, where the damage arises out of armed conflict or civil disturbance.

As defined in Article 2, "operator" means the person who actually operates the plane or who has authorized and directed the operation of the plane. A man who owns a plane may employ somebody to operate it, but nevertheless the operator is the owner.

The second exception, contained in article 6, is where the operator proves that the damage was due entirely to some improper act or negligence of the person who claims compensation. At the moment I do not see clearly how that situation could arise; but should it arise, the operator would be excused.

Although article 6 places the burden on the operator, if he can show that the person injured was partly to blame, the doctrine of divided responsibility, which exists in the common law provinces and, I believe, is to be found in the Quebec civil law, will apply. For instance, under our contributory negligence statutes, damage would be apportioned in relation to the degree of negligence of the person who claims the contribution.

With regard to extent of liability, full recovery may not be granted, but the provision is a fair one, for this reason: If negligence is proved the claimant may get 100 per cent and collect his damages to that extent, but where the law of negligence has no application some limitation must in all fairness be placed on the quantum of recoverable damage. Honourable senators who are familiar with admiralty law, of which I know a little, will recall that in claims resulting from damage done by ships there is quite frequently a limitation on the total liability of the defendant. I believe this holds good in admiralty cases even where it is necessary to prove negligence and negligence is established.

Under "extent of liability", article II deals with currencies of foreign countries, which, to be understood, must be translated into our own currency. I shall therefore read from a memorandum given me by Mr. Matthews and put it in the record, rather than attempt to interpret the clauses of the article:

> The limits of liability are such that full compensation will be paid except in very exceptional circumstances. The maximum amount payable in the case of a small aircraft weighing a thousand kilograms—that is 2,200 pounds—would be approximately $37,000. The indemnity increases progressively with the weight of the aircraft, with no fixed maximum.

As the next paragraph indicates, that statement is not quite correct.

> In the case of an aircraft weighing fifty tons or more, the limit is approximately $775,000—

It will be seen that the limitations I have alluded to do not reduce the liability to any trifling amount.

> —increasing by 100 gold francs (approximately $7.37) for every additional kilogram.

I looked this up, and find that a kilogram equals two and one-fifth pounds, or 1,000 grams.

> In case of death or personal injury the maximum indemnity for each victim would be 500,000 gold francs, or about $37,000. The carrier is entitled to the protection of these limits of liability except in the case of a deliberate act or omission done with intent to cause damage in which case liability is unlimited.

So much for liability. The next question that comes up for consideration concerns the forum or court and the rules of procedure and limitation of actions, found in articles 19 and 20 of the convention. Article 19 reads as follows:

> If a claimant has not brought an action to enforce his claim or if notification of such claim has not been given to the operator within a period of six months from the date of the incident which gave rise to the damage, the claimant shall only be entitled to compensation out of the amount for which the operator remains liable after all claims made within that period have been met in full.

That is a rather slight penalty to ensure that claims will be promptly made.

Article 20 starts off as follows:

1. Actions under the provisions of this convention may be brought only before the courts of the Contracting State where the damage occurred . . .

So that if an aircraft from, say, Italy crashed on the surface in Canada and damaged property belonging to a Canadian, any resulting action would be brought in this country.

Article 20 also sets out provisions for execution. They are rather detailed and I do not propose to read them, but among other things they provide that judgments delivered in one contracting state can be executed in another contracting state without further litigation.

Article 21 provides that actions under the convention shall be subject to a period of limitation of two years from the date of the incident which caused the damage.

The final provisions to which I wish to refer are the important ones dealing with insurance, and they commence at article 15 of the Convention. I admit they are rather complicated, but it must be remembered that they were drafted by representatives of some thirty nations, so undoubtedly they are not framed in the same way that perhaps a Senate committee would frame them. However, I think all I need do is refer the house to article 15 and point out that provision is made therein whereby registered companies may be required to take out insurance of some kind. It may be with an insurance company that would be satisfactory to the member countries, or it may be a bank guarantee or a guarantee of the nation itself. I do not think it is necessary that I read these provisions in detail. They are regarded by all these nations whose representatives assembled together as providing a reasonable and satisfactory way to give protection to persons who are injured by a foreign aircraft.

I think that is all I need say about the bill, but I would be glad to try to answer any questions. I do not see any object in referring this bill to committee, for we are not in a position to change anything in it, and I do not believe honourable senators would learn much more about the bill. However, the question of referring it to committee is up to honourable members.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Could the honourable senator give the house a definition of operator?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes. I would refer the house to article 2, which starts off in these words:

1. The liability for compensation contemplated by article 1 of this convention shall attach to the operator of the aircraft.

2. (a) For the purposes of this convention the term "operator" shall mean the person who was making use of the aircraft at the time the damage was caused, provided that if control of the navigation of the aircraft was retained by the person from whom the right to make use of the aircraft was derived, whether directly or indirectly, that person shall be considered the operator.

There is one question I do not know the answer to—whether that excludes the person actually operating the aircraft or whether it makes both persons liable. Off-hand, my opinion would be that it means both.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is a provision in provincial motor vehicles acts which makes the owner of the vehicle liable if it is involved in an accident while being driven by someone with the owner's consent. Is the provision in this bill similar to that?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I take it that it is. The language is not quite "consent". It says that "operator" shall mean:

The person who was making use of the aircraft at the time the damage was caused, provided that if control of the navigation of the aircraft was retained by the person from whom the right to make use of the aircraft was derived, whether directly or indirectly, that person shall be considered the operator.

I think that is more of a limitation than you would have in the motor vehicles acts provision. Under the convention a person must retain control. That is to say, he can order the other person where to go, but if somebody took a plane for a joy ride merely with consent of the owner of the aircraft it might be doubtful whether the owner would be brought in under the convention, but the person operating the aircraft is liable anyway and if you get judgment against him, even if he is judgment proof, you still have the insurance provision to fall back on, which covers the operators in those countries. Does that answer my honourable friend's question?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Yes. I am also a little bit worried about the insurance fund. How is that set up?

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is provided for in article 15 of the convention. I thought I might be able to escape reading it, but I will read it.

Paragraph 1 of article 15 reads as follows:

Any contracting state may require that the operator of an aircraft registered in another contracting state shall be insured in respect of his liability for damage sustained in its territory for which a right to compensation exists under article 1 by means of insurance up to the limits applicable according to the provisions of article 11.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The article employs the use of the word "may". It is not compulsory.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Canada is not compelled to require it, but if Canada does require it then it is compulsory that the insurance be provided. The word "may" applies only in the case of the nation which has it within its own power to seek the protection. I think that is all right.

Then subparagraph (a) of paragraph 2 says this:

The insurance shall be accepted as satisfactory if it conforms to the provisions of this convention and has been effected by an insurer authorized to effect such insurance under the laws of the state where the aircraft is registered or of the state where the insurer has his residence or principal place of business, and whose financial responsibility has been verified by either of those states.

Of course, that puts it in the power of the other state, when these are joint contracting parties—and one must assume good faith on the part of the other contracting states—to see to it that any sanction given to the financial reliability of the insurance company will be reasonably satisfactory.

May I draw attention to subparagraph (b):

(b) If insurance has been required by any state under paragraph 1 of this article, and a final judgment in that state is not satisfied by payment in the currency of that state, any contracting state may refuse to accept the insurer as financially responsible until such payment, if demanded, has been made.

That is a little like locking the stable door after the horse has fled. However, there is a similar provision in some of our motor vehicles acts: a driver of a motor vehicle is not required to take out insurance, in the first instance, but if he has an accident, and is judgment proof, he is required, before driving a car again, to take out insurance.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: One more point, while we are on that subject. I understand that the country from which the airplane flies arranges for the insurance?

Hon. Mr. Farris: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Does that mean that a country, say the United States, insures all aircraft which leave the United States and fly over Canada against liability for damage, whether they are private planes or corporation planes, or whoever owns them?

Hon. Mr. Farris: So far the United States has not signed this convention. I think my honourable friend and I misunderstood each other. The state does not insure, in the first instance; the state merely gives sanction to the financial reliability of the company which gives the insurance.

Allow me to read subparagraph (a) to my honourable friend again:

(a) The insurance shall be accepted as satisfactory if it conforms to the provisions of this convention and has been effected by an insurer authorised to effect such insurance under the laws of the state where the aircraft is registered or of the state where the insurer has his residence . . .

So that all the nation does is to put a blessing on the company doing the insuring, and for that you must accept the good faith of any nation which is a party to this convention.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, a private plane flying over Canada might not be insured, and if it crashed in this country we would not have an opportunity to collect damages.

Hon. Mr. Farris: It is the duty of every nation to see that all planes going out of its own country are insured. I do not know of any other way it could be worked out. The provision is not 100 per cent foolproof, but it is about the best that can be made, and is much better than no provision at all.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It seems to me that our chance of collecting damages would depend on what arrangements had been made when the owner of the aircraft obtained his licence to fly.

Hon. Mr. Farris: He must register in his own country, and I take it that every country bound by this convention would see—at the time of registration, as my friend says—that one of the incidents of the registration was the taking out of proper insurance.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I know that our requirements in Canada are very strict, because on several occasions I have tried to obtain a licence to fly planes in Canada to spray crops to destroy weeds, and on applying I have had to go through a lot of detail—answer a thousand questions, and give all the security in the world—before getting a licence at all. I assume similar regulations are in force in all countries.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Well, good faith of the contracting nations is essential.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to criticize this proposed legislation in any way. The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) has given us a very good general explanation of the purpose of the bill. I wish, however, to offer a criticism on another point. Here, obviously, is a very important convention, to which by this bill we are asked to give ratification and adherence. We know from article 39 that certain plenipotentiaries from certain unnamed countries met in Rome in the year 1952, and that as a result of their deliberations this document comes forth. But why was some brief explanation not given on the blank pages of the bill as to the history of the convention? I feel that the names of the countries which took part in the deliberations should have been stated, as well as the general purpose of the convention and what is proposed to be achieved by the various articles set out in the convention which we are asked to ratify—and which I think we should ratify. My complaint is that there is not a single word of explanation given, and it would have been a simple matter to provide it. An explanatory note of the purpose of a bill, or of the amendments to an act, if there are amendments, is of considerable assistance to members of both houses in studying proposed legislation and trying to pass intelligent judgment on it. Most bills are accompanied by an explanatory note. When a matter of this kind comes before us again for consideration, I hope an explanatory note of the purposes of the bill will be provided.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I point out to my honourable friend that the signatures attached originally to the convention in 1952 are listed at the back of the convention, and I have added to those which do not appear there, Great Britain, Australia and Canada. Those three countries signed the convention subsequently. The United States has not yet signed. My honourable friend will find the list of signatures on pages 18 and 19, at the very back of the schedule.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Well, there must be something lacking in my copy. Page 16 is the last page I have.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Perhaps I have been especially fortified in that respect. The signatures on behalf of the various countries appear at the end of my copy of the schedule. If honourable senators wish me to read into the record that additional information, I shall be glad to do so.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is no objection to your reading it.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think it would be of assistance to us.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The countries are these: The Argentine, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Spain, France, Israel, Italy, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, the Netherlands, Portugal, the Philippines, Switzerland and Thailand. And now, as I have stated, there should be added to the list Great Britain, Australia and Canada, all of whom have signed but have not yet ratified the convention. Further, it is open now to other countries to come in at any time they want to.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, I am sure we are all greatly indebted to the honourable gentleman from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) for the thorough explanation he has given us. However, when the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) was speaking, it occurred to me that the sponsor of the bill might agree to having it referred to a committee, not for the purpose of attempting to change the convention, which of course cannot be done, but to give additional information which honourable senators might require. I offer that purely as a suggestion.

I would be interested to know, as perhaps other members of the chamber would, in what court a claim under this bill could be made. Would it be one of our provincial courts or, because of the intervention of the Dominion of Canada, would it be the Exchequer Court of Canada? Neither the convention nor the bill appear to indicate in which court claims could be heard.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I shall be glad to answer that question to the best of my knowledge. My opinion is that claims could be heard in the regular courts which try cases between individuals in respect of injuries or damages, namely, the provincial courts. The Exchequer Court, I may say, is usually reserved for the hearing of issues having to do with the affairs of the Crown. If a person were injured by a foreign aircraft, on the surface in, say, British Columbia, his claim would be heard in the Superior Court of that province. One could not expect the convention to set out for twenty or thirty countries the respective courts in each country having jurisdiction in the matter; that must be left to be determined by the countries themselves.

My opinion, therefore, for what it is worth, is that the provincial courts could hear such claims.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Thank you very much.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I too would like to thank the honourable senator from Vancouver South for the excellent interpretation he has given of this bill and of the convention which we are asked to ratify. May I ask one question of him?

Article 30 on page 14 says in part:

> "Person" means any natural or legal person, including a state.

I should like to know whether a Canadian who was injured on the surface by a foreign aircraft while travelling in another country, say Brazil, could claim damages.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Do I understand my honourable friend's question to refer to a Canadian who was travelling in a plane flying over Brazil?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: No; a Canadian person travelling as a tourist in Brazil, or any foreign country.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The bill is no respecter of persons by reason of their nationality. I would assume, therefore, that any person, whether from Canada or any other country, who was injured on the surface by a foreign plane in Brazil would have the same rights as a citizen of that country, regardless of nationality. The article says:

> For the purposes of this convention:—"Person" means any natural or legal person including a state.

That is all it says. Now if, for instance, a Canadian were riding in a motor car in Brazil, and a foreign plane flying overhead dropped a golf bag on his automobile and smashed it, my opinion is that he would have the same rights as any citizen of Brazil, which is a contracting country.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Could he sue in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Farris: No; he would have to sue in Brazil.

Hon. Mr. Howard: Would a person of a country or a state which was not a signatory of the convention have the right to make a claim in circumstances such as those mentioned by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson)?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would think so. My understanding is that it would apply to all persons in the signatory country, with the possible exception of persons who had entered the country illegally and were there in violation of its immigration laws. In other words, for the time being the Canadian would be a person of Brazil.

Hon. Mr. Howard: I understand.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Connolly) raised the question as to whether the bill should be referred to committee. Perhaps I was flattering myself, but the necessity for this had not occurred to me. If it is the wish of the house, I am sure the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) would have no objection to consideration in committee?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think we have time to consider it in committee, and in doing so we might satisfy the members of the house on any points that are of concern to them.

Hon. Mr. Farris: There is the further advantage that Mr. Matthews, the Chairman of the Air Transport Board, from whom I have received most of my information, could be there to answer any questions asked.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask a question regarding the status of this convention? It has been approved internationally between the various parties represented at the convention, and I presume that our Department of Transport, or our Department of External Affairs, was a party to that approval.

Hon. Mr. Farris: The Honourable Mr. Chevrier signed the convention while he was a member of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: But my point is that is a prerogative of the Crown, and the matter of ratification by Parliament is really only a custom?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I would not agree with my friend in that respect, for two reasons. First, the convention itself requires not only the signature of a country, but ratification by it; and secondly, the Government of Canada cannot by order in council make the citizens of this country subject to any law in a convention or treaty—only Parliament can do that.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: We have had before us other conventions for ratification, such as one concerning the immunity of diplomatic representatives, and a more recent one concerning trade with Japan. In those cases the Crown was quite in order in binding the countries according to the international agreement, and ratification by Parliament afterwards was just a custom.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My friend is wrong there. As I said earlier, in the United States after ratification by the Senate a convention becomes part of the law of that country, but in Canada no solemn treaty is binding on our citizens until it is ratified by Parliament. It is binding between the countries, but the only way in which one country could enforce its right against another would be by going to war. In Canada, if individual citizens are to be under a legal obligation to carry out the terms of the treaty, ratification by Parliament is necessary.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I ask the honourable senator another question? In the last paragraph of article 39 I read this:

> This convention shall be deposited with the International Civil Aviation Organization where, in accordance with article 31, it shall remain open for signature, and the Secretary-General of the Organization shall send certified copies thereof to all signatory and adhering states and to all states members of the Organization or the United Nations.

Would the honourable senator explain how those words "or the United Nations" come in. I have not noticed a reference to the United Nations elsewhere in the convention.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Honourable senators, why not send the bill to committee and get there all the information that is needed?

Hon. Mr. Farris: I see that article 38 contains similar wording. It reads:

> The Secretary General of the International Civil Aviation Organization shall give notice to all signatory and adhering states and to all states members of the Organization or of the United Nations:

Well, it merely requires the giving of notice. I suppose it was considered by the assembled nations that a notice to all states members of the Organization or of the United Nations would be sufficient, but I cannot read the minds of those who wrote that provision into the convention.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the bill going to committee but it does occur to me that the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) has answered fully all the questions that have been asked of him with regard to this matter. He has already pointed out that the convention has been agreed to and that we cannot change it in any respect, although of course we may reject it entirely.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Is it customary for the minister concerned to sign such documents before they come before Parliament?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is the custom. The documents then come before Parliament for ratification, and in this instance it is set forth in the convention that it must be ratified by Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: It would seem to me that we only rubber-stamp it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn) suggests that we only rubber-stamp it. I might remark that if we do not ratify it, it will not become effective.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: We cannot amend it or change it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, we must either accept it or reject it.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I see no object in referring this bill to committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Next sitting. The reason why I ask to have the third reading put over is that my leader (Hon. Mr. Haig), who is absent today, will be here when we meet again.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think the third reading should go over to the next sitting. The reason why I did not propose this was that a reference to committee had been suggested.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, this bill has been before the Senate for about three weeks now and we have had a number of very enlightening addresses on it. I am not going to speak at great length on the bill, but as I am going to vote for it I would like to explain my reasons for so doing.

Before touching on the bill itself, however, I would like to compliment the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on introducing it, and also on the very exhaustive and informative speech he delivered on that occasion. I am quite sure he did not introduce this bill lightly, knowing as I do that he has been turning it over in his mind for several years. As a member of the Senate's Standing Committee on Divorce for some twenty years, during ten of which he was its Chairman, the honourable senator has dealt with several thousands of divorces. As a result of that experience he feels that the grounds for divorce in Canada should be widened; hence Bill O-6 which is now before us.

I am glad for a more or less irrelevant reason that the senator from Rosetown introduced this bill. It deals with a live subject, one that is of great interest to the people of Canada. The very high order of the discussion that has so far taken place on this bill is just one more Senate-made opportunity for this honourable body to demonstrate to the people of Canada how carefully, how tolerantly and how intelligently the Senate deals with important matters affecting their welfare.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I had intended to speak yesterday afternoon, but after listening to the brilliant and scholarly address of the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) and the well-reasoned, fair and logical remarks of the honourable senator from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill), I felt it might be wise on my part to postpone what might be termed my "disagreeing remarks" until today. I can quite understand now how the honourable senator from Grandville reached the high position at the Quebec Bar which he occupies today. He demonstrated clearly yesterday that he possesses three of the qualities so necessary to success at the Bar: a well-stored mind, a tremendous capacity for hard work, and a very forceful delivery. I confess that as I listened to him I felt once or twice just a little like King Agrippa of old.

As I said, it is something of a task to follow the two senators who spoke yesterday, especially when convinced, as I am, that the bill is a good one—with one or two reservations which I shall deal with later—and that it is long overdue. My views will, I fear, not please some senators, but all I ask is faith in my sincerity.

The reason I am supporting the bill is that I believe we should try to bring as much happiness as we can into the lives of the Canadian people. I am one of the fortunate ones who have had a very happy married life. For that reason I want other people also to have a happy home and family life.

Thomas Jefferson in his original draft of the Declaration of Independence, said that "all men are created equal, and independent", and "among their inalienable rights are the preservation of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness".

I am not one who believes that misery and suffering are good for us. Nor do I believe that by enduring misery and suffering in this life we are preparing ourselves for a happier time in the life to come—whatever and wherever that may be. I believe that we should do everything we can to make people happy here on this earth. I hate misery! I like to see people smile and laugh and enjoy life.

I believe that if this bill passes through Parliament it will make for happiness and better citizenship to as great a degree as, if not a greater degree than, it can possibly make for misery, and suffering, and immorality—to which some reference has been made.

Perhaps I should apologize to the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), and also to the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), for not being convinced by them. The senator from Ottawa West made an excellent speech on Tuesday night. It was well prepared and full of statistics. I should have liked to agree with him if I could, for our friendship goes back some fifteen years, but some of the figures he quoted, instead of depressing me, made me feel good. I am afraid he did not intend them to.

You see, honourable senators, I am one of many Canadians who feel that divorce can do good, as it might possibly do harm.

Prior to 1930 I wrote many articles in my newspaper urging proper divorce courts for Ontario. I felt that there was a demand for divorce courts, and I was glad when they were instituted. The results, in my opinion, have been good.

Let us look this question fairly and squarely in the face. A couple get married. They are young; perhaps money is scarce; they may not have very strong characters. Bickering starts. Bickering becomes quarrelling. Quarrels lead to blows; love flies out the window, and we have a broken home. Under our present laws, in order to get a fresh start in pursuit of a useful and happy life, which Thomas Jefferson felt was the inalienable right of individuals, one or the other of these two young people has got to commit adultery. That, unfortunately, is the law.

I am not a lawyer. I spent thirty years of my life as the active editor of a daily newspaper published in a small Ontario provincial city. In that capacity I was pretty close to the people. I took an active part in community life; I saw all sides of it. I read many newspapers every day: it was part of my job. As a result of that reading, and the reading of the daily press today, and as a result of that close contact with the people, I cannot agree with the senator from Ottawa West that there is no demand for more liberal divorce laws in this country. I am convinced there is. I am borne out in my contention by the Gallup Poll referred to by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) in his speech in introducing the bill. He told us that the poll reported that seventy-five per cent of the Canadian adults interviewed wanted infidelity, desertion, insanity, physical cruelty, drunkenness, mental cruelty, and incompatibility added to the causes for which a divorce can be granted. The honourable senator from Rosetown also told us he had in his office a file of letters three inches thick, every one of them asking for the changes proposed in this bill.

I know all about the marriage vows. I have repeated them after a clergyman on two occasions. But surely we are not sincere if we base our objection to this bill on the verse from the Gospel of St. Mark, chapter X, verse 9, quoted Tuesday night:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

Are we not putting asunder every week of every session of Parliament men and women whom God hath joined together? Did we not put asunder legally in this chamber yesterday afternoon about twenty-five couples, in about three minutes?

What we are saying to the people of Canada today is that we will not legally put them asunder unless one or the other of them goes out and breaks the Seventh Commandment.

That, to me, is the rotten part of divorce today. I, personally, know of couples who could not get along after trying hard, and one or the other of whom has hired some woman to go through the phony bedroom scene so common in so many divorces, in order that they could make a fresh start. Also, I know many couples who have made a fresh start after a while, have raised nice families, and have lived happy and useful lives.

In my own life I am very thankful that I have never had to question the verse quoted Tuesday night. But being a Presbyterian, I know something of the Bible, and I confess freely that my favourite verse is that one from the seventh chapter of Matthew, "Judge not, that ye be not judged."

I am very fond, too, of the lines from Joaquin Miller's poem on Lord Byron, the great English poet:

> In men whom men condem as ill,
> I find so much of goodness still;
> In men whom men pronounce divine,
> I find so much of sin and blot,
> I do not dare to draw a line
> Between the two, where
> God has not.

I am glad that this bill has been introduced. I hope it is given second reading, and is sent to committee, where we can discuss it and perhaps amend it. If it does go to committee, I hope that an extension of the time for desertion will be considered; and I would like to see the time stipulated in subsection 1(d) of section 6 increased from five years to ten years. The honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw), who has had experience with mental diseases, recommends an amendment. I agree. I feel ten years is short enough time to wait for a loved one to recover. I would also like to see the word "cruelty" in subsection 1(c) of section 6 clearly defined. I am not in favour of using "mental cruelty" as a cause for divorce in Canada. I think, as the honourable senator for Grandville said yesterday, it is too liable to misuse.

I do not want to see in Canada what I call "licensed loose-living", which is what I am afraid some courts in another country are condoning. However, I have faith that if we pass a good bill such things could not happen in Canada, because of the high quality of our judges and of the members of the Senate Divorce Committee.

I would like to see this bill pass second reading. If it does it will enable us to treat all Canadians more fairly. Today we say to one group: "Go out and commit adultery and we will give you a divorce." To another we say: "No matter if your husband has turned out to be a drunken beast; no matter if he beats you, half starves you, refuses to provide you with enough food and decent clothes to wear; no matter if he has taken the dignity out of your life and made your life miserable, you must just put up with it. We will do nothing for you." To still another group, said to number 20,000, we say: "If your spouse has deserted you and left you to shift for yourself, we can do nothing for you. You must make the best of it." That, honourable senators, does not strike me as the proper Christian attitude. I feel it is the very antithesis of Christianity.

It is true, where divorce laws have been widened divorces have increased. It happened in England; it happened in Ontario. That to me was a natural process. Many who were probably living in misery, and perhaps sin, were able to legalize their positions.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: But the British people are a fine people. I visit them every summer. I meet them in all walks of life—decent, law-abiding, God-fearing people. The increase in divorce has most certainly not made them into criminals, nor has it, in my opinion, lowered their standards of morality at all. About Ontario I shall not comment. I live in this grand old province, and divorces or no divorces, there are no finer-living people anywhere.

In conclusion I have only this to say, honourable senators. I am going to support this bill because I sincerely believe it is a step in the right direction. Divorce is here. We cannot push it away from us by refusing to recognize it. It is here to stay. Then let us make a start on liberalizing our divorce laws to some extent, and make life brighter and happier for the large numbers who today are caught between the upper millstone of an unhappy home and the nether millstone of forced adultery.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. A. B. Baird: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest, and, I must confess, with more or less amazement to the progress of the discussion of this bill.

Comment has, it must be admitted, wandered pretty far afield—indeed all the way from opposition to the bill for fear of disrupting the honoured institution of marriage, to quibbles about some of the proposed additional grounds for divorce, and even to a long discussion of the evils of liquor, and so on.

The question as I see it is simply this: shall we permit a lessening of the hardships now unfortunately imposed upon couples who have found they have made a mistake, a big mistake, which has already marred their lives and which if not rectified will continue so to do?

Now, make no mistake. I do honour the institution of marriage, but I can see no sane, unbigoted reason for our insistence that legitimate grounds for divorce shall be so limited as to encourage illegal methods of obtaining "divorce evidence". Even now this is causing great damage to our people, in that a growing disrespect for all law results from any evasion of the strict letter of the law. I believe this body should implement the proposals in the proposed legislation before us. I believe the people of Canada do not require the strict divorce regulations that we now have, and that for the small percentage of our people who have made a mistake in their marriage we can do a really good service by providing a reasonable easing of the restrictions and making the grounds for divorce more in keeping with the day and age in which we live, and more in line with the conditions and problems of modern life.

Years ago, general conditions were such that life was more leisurely and people were not always in a hurry. Marriage was entered into only after careful consideration by both parties. When it did not work out too well both parties had to make the best of it; and they tried and tried, for divorce was hard to get. So, regardless of the hardships of the small percentage of our people who even considered or needed divorce, we had a very small divorce rate in Canada. I find that, in fact, before 1900 only 20 divorces were granted a year; in 1913, there were 60; in 1918, 114, and in 1926, 608. But times have been changing. Life has speeded up, and with it marriage has not had the careful consideration it had in years past, so that the divorce rate is much larger and growing year after year. There is a demand from the public for "easier divorce", a demand that must be met. I for one believe that it should be met and that the proposal before us should be enacted.

I believe that a man or woman who makes an honest mistake is entitled to a second chance and should not be forever penalized. So honourable senators, as an act of human kindness, I plan to vote for this bill, and I trust that it will pass.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Farris, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 15, at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN CURLING CHAMPIONSHIP

TRIBUTES TO COMPETING TEAMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I wish, first, to apologize for being absent at the last four sittings of the house; and secondly to call attention of the house to what I think was an important event.

It was my privilege to attend and help to direct the Canadian Curling Championship playoffs held last week in the city of Regina. There were eleven rinks entered in the competition. All ten provinces of Canada were represented by one rink each, plus an additional rink from Ontario, because in line with a custom that has existed for a good many years there was a rink representing Northern Ontario as distinct from the rest of that province.

I am sure that if every senator in this house had been at Regina with me they would have formed the same opinion I did: what a great country Canada is and what fine young men we have in this country!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I can pay that tribute to every province in Canada, without any exception at all. All the players were gentlemen from start to finish, on the ice and off the ice. There was no over indulgence in liquor, no abusive language. All in all it was a very great pleasure to me, as one who has been with the organization since the first national curling championship games, in 1927—I am the last member of the original organization—it was a great pleasure to see those fine young men step on the ice on Monday afternoon to begin the great fight for the title of champion rink of Canada.

I want to emphasize this: I never saw a better outfit in all the twenty-six years that we have had the competition than I did on this occasion—never. This time a Saskatchewan team won the championship of Canada, and I want to congratulate them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There are more curlers in Saskatchewan than in any other province—more men, more women, more boys and girls are curling there than in any other part of Canada. It is especially pleasing that after twenty-seven years of competition, that province should come through and win the championship in its jubilee year.

There were some astonishing features. Last year Alberta could not be beaten, but this year it was pretty close to the bottom. Two or three years ago New Brunswick was one of the great provinces of this dominion as far as curling is concerned, but this year it was pretty well down.

It was interesting to note that when the Quebec team used the French language to the rocks they got the same result as the fellows who used the English language to them. The rocks did not change their course a bit. If a fellow had the broom and the right weight he got the shot, but otherwise he missed, no matter what he may have said to the rock in the meantime.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Haig: As a Manitoban I offer to Saskatchewan my most heartfelt congratulations. As I said before, it is a great curling province. A few years ago it won the junior championship and now, in its jubilee year. it has won the senior curling championship of the world.

Just let me try to describe for you the last end between Saskatchewan and Manitoba. They are coming home seven to six in favour of Saskatchewan. They have the last rock. It comes to the Saskatchewan rink to play. The Manitoba rink are laying two rocks inside the white centre. The Saskatchewan skip has only three inches to use, and he cannot hit them, because the lay prevents that. He drew cold to an inch from where he ought to be. I never saw a more thrilling finish in my life, and I have been following curling for more than fifty-seven years. The winning team comes from Avonlea, a little town of 350 people. It was said that they were not all at the game—but 400 people from the town were present, and I do not know where the other fifty came from. We had an attendance of 51,275 people at those four days of curling. That is another record.

It made me feel very proud that I should live to see in our country such a great game. It used to be said that curling was an old man's game, but that is not so today. The skip of the Saskatchewan rink is twenty-eight years old. The third man on the Manitoba rink is twenty-three years old.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: He should have been skiing.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I do not think there is a player on any of the rinks, outside of the skips, over forty.

In conclusion, I just want to make an aside, which is not for the press. In Regina, where the people did not know me, except that I happened to be addressed as "Senator", I found out that they think quite a lot of the senators of this country. I had a very fine reception, not because I was Jack Haig, but because I was Senator Haig. I felt very happy indeed that these prairie people, of the stock of our pioneers, so clearly recognize that the Senate is a significant part of Canada, and I made up my mind that when I returned east I would tell my fellow senators what great people we have on the plains, as well as all over this country. I believe that the forty-four young men who represented Canada in these games cannot be excelled anywhere in the world. They are a great credit to all our provinces.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I should like to join the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in congratulating the Saskatchewan rink on its outstanding victory. We are all indebted to him for his vivid description of the last end. As it was impossible for all of us to be there, we are glad that he has told us of that great play. His description was so vivid that, in spite of the red carpet under our feet, we could almost imagine ourselves on the ice.

In complimenting the Saskatchewan team I think I should also congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on the interest he has taken over the years in this sport.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When the Macdonald Brier trophy was first presented for competition there were appointed a number of trustees, of whom the only survivor is our dearly beloved Senator Haig. The trophy is entirely safe in his hands. I am sure that all of us will join in extending to him our thanks for what he has told us this evening, and in hoping that for many years to come he will remain the trustee of the trophy and a representative of the Senate at these great matches.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Marcotte: Honourable senators, the enthusiasm shown by my honourable leader over the years in the curling championship matches which he has attended, I found rather amusing, for to me it is no matter of astonishment that we men of Saskatchewan are champions. In my younger days, in my field of sports, I was taking on all comers from every quarter; and I was, and still am, undefeated amateur billiards champion of Canada.

FOREIGN AIRCRAFT THIRD PARTY DAMAGE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Farris moved the third reading of Bill F, an Act to implement the Convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 10, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate may I first join with the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) in congratulating the Saskatchewan rink which recently won the Canadian Curling Championship at Regina. As one who represents a province which recently distinguished itself in another form of ice sport, I feel that we champions can join together.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Honourable senators, I approach with considerable diffidence a discussion of this very serious and important question, for I have been somewhat conscious of my deficiencies, if not senility, after having read some comments from other places, including the newspapers about old and incompetent senators.

Some years ago at a cocktail party, where sometimes persons speak rather freely, I was discussing with two recently-graduated college men the question of public affairs. They laid it down to me that as the old men had made such a mess of the world they, the young men, were going to see that things were changed. I said to them, "You boys must feel very discouraged." They looked at me in wonderment and asked me what I meant. I replied, "Well, you must be discouraged when you realize you can never be any wiser than you are now."

Honourable senators, there is another reason why I have some regrets about this discussion at this time. I refer to the fact that there are twenty-one vacant seats in the Senate which, according to our constitution, should be filled. I exceedingly regret that the obligation imposed upon the Government of this country under our constitution has not been fulfilled.

Honourable senators, before proceeding further I should like to extend, as many others have done, congratulations to the honourable gentleman from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), who introduced the bill now before the house. It was a timely introduction, and the discussion that has taken place and will take place amply justifies the introduction of this measure, whether or not it carries.

I come now to the issue of this debate. The first thing that we should direct our minds to is the principle embodied in this bill, for I am afraid there have been many wanderings afar from that principle. The principle of this legislation is not concerned with the issue for or against divorce. The law of divorce is the law of Canada, established in every part of this country, and I want to take a few minutes to call attention to that fact.

The law in Nova Scotia is that a person may secure a divorce on the grounds of adultery or cruelty, and this has been the law of that ancient province since 1761. I shall have more to say about that later on. Incidentally, a well-educated reporter asked me today, "How is it you have provincial divorce laws when divorce is within the jurisdiction of the dominion?" I explained to him that while the divorce law has been conferred on the dominion since confederation, the provinces brought their existing divorce laws with them when they entered confederation and these laws were to continue in effect until changed by the dominion Parliament.

The divorce law in the province of New Brunswick has existed since 1791, and the grounds for divorce or annulment are frigidity, impotence, adultery, or prohibited consanguinity.

The divorce law in Prince Edward Island, which is the same as that in New Brunswick, has existed since 1835. In Prince Edward Island the court originally was the Governor in Council. I have been reading the leading text-book in Canada on divorce laws, and the learned author writes that the law in Prince Edward Island was a dead letter from the time of confederation until 1949, when the procedure was amended and a new act was introduced making special provision for a new kind of court to deal with divorce on the grounds I have mentioned. It may be interesting to honourable senators to know that the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour), who made such an appealing and effective argument against this bill, was a member of the Cabinet in Prince Edward Island which introduced those new provisions for divorce. I looked up that information in the Parliamentary Guide. I do not think he has explained his reasons for his change of heart.

Then we come to deal with British Columbia and the three Prairie provinces, where divorce laws have existed since Confederation. Prior to the passing of a federal act, in 1927, the grounds for divorce in British Columbia and the three Prairie provinces were as follows. A husband could secure divorce by proving adultery on the part of his wife. But a wife in order to secure a divorce had to prove not only adultery on the part of her husband, but in addition, incest, rape, sodomy, or adultery and cruelty or desertion for two years. In 1927 the Parliament of Canada passed legislation providing that in any province in which there was a divorce court the wife could secure a divorce on the same grounds as the husband, namely, for adultery.

I come now to the next province. Ontario had no divorce courts, and a person domiciled in that province could not obtain a divorce except by coming to Parliament, until 1930, when Parliament passed legislation conferring jurisdiction in divorce on Ontario for the same grounds that applied, as I have already stated, to British Columbia and the prairie provinces, and Prince Edward Island.

Turning to the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland: Newfoundland entered into Confederation recently, so I will confine my remarks chiefly to Quebec. It is the practice to secure decrees of divorce in both these provinces by act of Parliament. I understand that approximately 500 divorce petitions from Quebec will be dealt with by Parliament this session.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not quite so many.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I said "approximately." It is somewhere between 400 and 500.

I am indebted to the honourable member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) for his contribution to this debate. He is not here tonight, but I intend to quote from what he said. I shall have quite a lot to say about his speech. But I would not like honourable senators to think that I was discussing his speech with a sense of security arising out of the fact that he has gone over to the Old Country.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Farris: As a matter of fact, I think my criticism of his speech will be a tribute to the strength and force of what he said. His speech invites reply from anybody who disagrees with him, not because of its weakness, but because of its strength. I say that also of the speech by my honourable friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). However, I think I shall pick on the absentee senator a little more than on my friend from Ottawa West.

Honourable senators, at this stage I am indebted to my honourable friend from Grandville for what he said about the jurisdiction of the courts in the province of Quebec—more in regard to nullity than divorce. It will be recalled that he was discussing the wording of our act referring to the conferring of jurisdiction on the courts of the province of Quebec in regard to divorce, because of their existing jurisdiction. I quote from the report of his speech in the Senate Hansard, at page 259:

> I am not talking of separation from bed and board, I am talking of a full dissolution of marriage, and the Civil Code specifies several causes for dissolution of marriage. I will cite a few examples. Nullity can be decreed if natural or accidential impotency existed when the marriage took place.

Now, that would be declaring the marriage void ab initio.

May I point out to honourable senators who are not lawyers that there are two kinds of nullity. There are cases in which the marriage is just void. There are other cases in which the marriage is voidable. That means that the marriage is good if it is left alone, but the parties may make an application in court and have the marriage declared void ab initio. It is voidable but not void until so declared. That is a very important distinction when we are considering this question of the jurisdiction of the courts in Quebec in comparison with the jurisdiction of the courts in the other provinces. As I understand it, a voidable marriage might be so declared void after there were children. I do not know what the law is in the province of Quebec, but a voidable marriage so declared—that is, void if in any of our other provinces—would bastardize the children.

> Nullity can be decreed when the marriage has been contracted by a minor without having obtained the necessary consent.

That is, without the necessary consent of the minor's parents.

> Nullity can be decreed if the marriage is between close relatives whether in a direct or collateral line. That is a third cause. Nullity can also be decreed if there is a religious obstacle resulting from relationship, whether natural or by affinity, and affinity there means by marriage. That is a fourth cause. I could cite some more.

I now refer to my friend's remarks on page 267:

> Frankly, I admit that I see no great difference between divorce and annulment of marriage.

You see, honourable senators, I am supporting my proposition that in principle divorce is the law of Canada, practically without any exception, and while in the province of Quebec divorces as such are obtained in large numbers only in Parliament, there is, as my honourable friend from Grandville pointed out, a process by which you can take a marriage which is good until it is interfered with, and cause it to be rendered void. To repeat what my friend from Grandville said:

> Frankly, I admit that I see no great difference between divorce and annulment of marriage. Both have the same consequences.

As far as I can understand the situation, I quite agree with my friend. I think he is right in that connection, particularly as to marriages which are only voidable.

I think, honourable senators, that by these references I have established the proposition that divorce law is the law of Canada, that it is the recognized law of Canada, and has been during our Confederation. I say that nothing in this bill challenges that principle. My reason for emphasizing this is that I think that too many of the speeches already made have not been shooting at the right target, but that they have been shooting at the target of the principle of divorce that has already been established, which is not the issue. We are not now debating the issue of divorce, but recognizing divorce as an acknowledged principle of law in Canada. The issue is: is there something the Senate of Canada can do in the public interest to improve the conditions under which divorce may be granted?

Honourable senators, I have written down what I conceive to be the issue, and the only issue, in this debate, and I will now read it:

> The issue involved on the second reading of this bill is neither to approve or challenge the principle of the divorce for cause.

That, I say, has been established.

> But, recognizing the established law, the only principle involved is to determine if it is in the public interest to modify and extend the grounds of divorce in order
> (1) to better serve modern social conditions,
> (2) to correct existing abuses, and
> (3) to treat with mercy, toleration and justice the innocent victims of broken homes and those suffering from the intolerable conduct of unfaithful or depraved husbands, or wives.

Now, honourable senators, may I repeat myself. I strongly urge the house to confine this discussion to the specific issue involved, namely, the matters contained in the bill now before us. Those honourable senators who are opposed to divorce in any form, and who are opposed to the law as it now stands, should have the courage of their convictions and say what they believe. They should introduce in this house a bill abolishing divorce on any ground and on that question their speeches directed to that issue would be in order.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I take it my honourable friend would not want to leave the matter with the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Farris: No; I do not think we want too conglomerate a divorce law, such as that of many states in the United States. I say again, if any honourable senator thinks divorce as a principle is wrong not only for Quebec, but for all of Canada, his proper procedure is to introduce a bill abolishing divorce altogether. Some of the speeches made on the bill now before us have served to becloud the issue in this case. Those speeches should have been made on a measure to abolish divorce generally, and not on a measure to improve the acknowledged, existing and continuing divorce law in Canada.

Now, honourable senators, I have had some experience in public life in Canada which makes me disposed to emphasize the need for improvement of our divorce law. In this connection may I turn to another subject-matter, that of liquor, to illustrate my point? During the First World War I was Attorney General for the province of British Columbia. The Government of which I was a member had a referendum on the question of prohibition, and later introduced a prohibition law into that province. It appeared that almost everybody was in favour of prohibition as a war measure, as long as it did not apply to himself. I speak with some feeling on this matter because as a young and inexperienced man on the liquor question, except to take a drink now and again, it was my duty to try to enforce this law. I suffered considerable criticism at that time which does not attach to me today, because in later years experience has proven the impossibility of running against the current of public sentiment. The Government held another referendum, in which it asked the people, "Are you in favour of the sale of liquor by the Government?" The vote was in favour of the referendum by a large majority. It then became my duty, with the assistance of Mr. Pineo, the legislative counsel, a very able man who came from Eastern Canada, to draft the law which was to follow the referendum.

While prohibition had been defeated, there were still many active prohibitionists in the legislature and particularly in our Government caucus. The result was that many of those men approached the drafting of that law in this frame of mind: we are prohibitionists; we are against the sale of liquor; we will make the act as unworkable as possible. Well, honourable senators, with all deference to my efforts and achievements, I think we succeeded in drafting such a law. It prohibited drinking in a public place or in a hotel; it provided for the establishment of beer parlours, in which you could only swill beer; you could not buy a sandwich or get a glass of ginger ale.

I am glad to say, honourable senators, that in later years that law was very much improved. However, it must be said that the law we enacted had the effect of creating habits of bedroom drinking. Mr. Pineo remarked to me, "My instructions are not to prohibit drinking, but to make sure it is done in secret." To indicate my attitude in the matter, I merely say that within a year I resigned from the Government.

Honourable senators, that is ancient history, but the principle involved there with respect to liquor can be related to the principle of divorce today. Let us not make the mistakes that those well-intentioned prohibitionists made some thirty or forty years ago. Let us not approach the discussion of an improved law with the attitude, "I am against divorce on any grounds." I appeal to honourable senators not to discuss this bill by challenging divorce on any ground. If they will recognize the existence and continuance of divorce in Canada, then let us join together and see if we cannot improve the existing law by some amendments which would be regarded by even those prejudiced against divorce as being reasonable and sensible.

I should now like to take up some of the arguments which have been made against this bill. The honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) made some emphatic statements about the evils of liquor as contributing to conditions which bring about divorces. As long as my friend stayed with that argument I agreed with him and thought he was on sound ground. He went on to say that because of these conditions there is divorce, and he gave liquor as the cause. I must disagree with him when he confuses cause and effect.

I turn next to the argument put forward by my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), who pointed out that in his opinion there were bad conditions arising out of the present divorce law which was confined to the one ground of adultery. No man can deny that there are abuses: in some cases there is perjury; in some cases there is connivance; in other cases I have no doubt adultery has been deliberately committed as the only ground on which a divorce could be secured, when the relationship of husband and wife has become absolutely hopeless. I agree with my honourable friend's proposition up to that point. But what is his cure? He advocated stricter enforcement of the law. Well, I think if my honourable friend has any ideas as to how we can better enforce the law he should become a member of the Senate Divorce Committee and assist the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck).

I would point out that in all nine provinces in which there are divorce courts they are presided over by judges of the Superior Courts, men appointed by the Government of this country and of whom we are proud. I challenge my honourable friend from Grandville, or any other senator, to prove by any evidence that these judges do not perform their duties just as sincerely and efficiently as do the members of our Divorce Committee. I say to my honourable friend from Grandville that as a practising lawyer of wide experience he should be more realistic and understand that the necessity for the present measure arises from one cause, namely, the absence of grounds other than adultery for people bound to have divorce at any cost. That is the explanation. You can no more dam the tide than you can improve the present situation without extending the grounds.

I say, honourable senators, that these conditions so far as they exist under the present law are a demonstration of a pent-up resistance against limitations that can only be cured by a sensible widening of the grounds to meet present-day realities.

Now, let us turn to the grounds in the divorce bill itself. The first is desertion. As lawyers we have an expression in our pleadings that you must condescend to particulars. Outside of the honourable member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), I have not heard a single senator speaking against this bill who has "condescended to particulars." But my honourable friend from Grandville did. The first new ground proposed in the bill is desertion, designated in the bill as second, and here is what my honourable friend from Grandville said, as reported at page 264 of the Senate Debates:

> The second ground for divorce under the bill is desertion. Desertion has no doubt painful consequences for the spouse who has been deserted and for the children, if any.

I would agree with that very strongly, honourable senators. He continues:

> Desertion especially reveals the little consideration the husband and wife have given to the most important act of their lives.

If I may use a slang expression: So what? Divorce has not been the cause of that condition. It is only an attempt as a last resort to give relief from a situation which has become intolerable and impossible.

> Racial and religious differences, temperaments and customs are the most frequent causes of desertion, which is often the aftermath of marriages contracted after an orgy.

Now, just think of that, honourable senators, as an argument against divorce. These people, young and irresponsible, indulge in an orgy—I suppose that means they become more or less "tight"—and get married and find themselves in an impossible condition. The argument is that there should be no relief for them, and that the possibility of getting a divorce would explain the cause of the orgy. With all deference to my honourable friend from Grandville it does not in my reasoning make sense.

He went on to say:

> I do not feel that for such unimportant reasons we should apply so drastic and so dangerous a remedy as the dissolution of marriage. If we accept such a ground for divorce, we immediately open the door to hasty and ill-considered marriages . . .

There you see his point, that the divorce is the cause of the hasty and ill-considered marriage. Now we men and women of the world—a great many of us professional—have had a good deal to do with the problems of people who get into these predicaments. I have been practising law for over fifty years, and although I do not specialize in the law of divorce I have had a good many people in such cases come to me for assistance. I have never had in my practice, and I cannot believe that any member of the Senate who is a lawyer has ever had a suggestion that the possibility of a future divorce was in the least degree a factor in causing those people to get married in an irresponsible way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Quite right.

Hon. Mr. Farris: My honourable friend from Grandville continues:

> Is it not a fact that both world wars were to blame for many cases of desertion which aroused our sympathy but which remain nevertheless exceptional cases?

Well, in considering the descriptions that were given, particularly by my honourable friend from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), of conditions in England, I do not think they are exceptional cases. It is a little hard for those of us who were not in England during the war years to get a full picture of the conditions there. They were very different from conditions in this country. Over on that little island were a lot of mighty attractive girls, and the fine young men in military training appealed to the imagination of every girl who saw them in uniform. There were men in thousands and tens of thousands from Canada, from Australia and from the United States of America, and those girls—we might as well look at things as they are—appealed to the normal instincts that existed under those conditions. Beyond that was the fact that a great many soldiers felt they probably would be killed in action, and they might as well have a little pleasant association before they left England. That was not the exceptional case; that was the more or less general situation, which has led to thousands of divorces since the war. Many have resulted from the lowering of moral standards at that time and ill-considered war-time marriages.

What in the world did the possibility of divorce have to do with those conditions? Not a single thing. I venture to say that you could not find one single case in a thousand in which there would be any evidence to support the proposition that ill-considered promiscuous relationships before marriage or hasty war marriages were influenced or contributed to by the possibility of divorce afterwards. I appeal to the practical common sense of every person here in submitting that that is right.

The next objection put forward is that there might be collusion. Now, honourable senators, we are discussing desertion, we are "condescending to particulars"; we are making not a general statement about the sanctity of the home life, but a cold-blooded analysis of a desertion where there is no home life. It is gone. This desertion is for three years or more without cause. Where does the home life come in? Where does the sanctity come in? It has gone.

Now the suggestion is that this ground of desertion would lead to collusion. When a man can get a divorce now by spending one night with a woman, is he going to abandon that simple process to fabricate desertion and wait for three years or more just for collusion's sake.

Hon. Mr. Golding: He certainly doesn't have to.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Honourable senators, make no mistake. There must have been an unhappy relationship of a most serious nature between husband and wife if they collude at desertion for three years. I do not think there is any ghost of a chance that there will be fraudulent divorces on the ground of desertion such as there now are for adultery.

Both my honourable friends from Grandville and Ottawa West discussed the question of children said we must protect our children from divorce.

They told us of the tragedy of the thousands and thousands of children in the United States and in Great Britain, of broken homes where the children of divorced parents are not looked after. I would refer honourable senators to what my honourable friend from Ottawa West said about this at pages 250 and 253.

For the time being we are considering divorce from the standpoint of desertion. For example: a husband, to whom his wife has borne two children, leaves her. He does not give her a cent; probably she does not know where he is, his absence extends over two years or more; the chances, nine out of ten, are that he has a mistress, although his wife cannot prove it. What harm, in those circumstances, will a divorce do to the children? This is one of the issues we have to face. Take the case which was mentioned by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges). Here are a man and a woman, honourable people, who want to be married. The woman has children, and the man would provide for them. Her husband has deserted her and been confined to a mental hospital for years. The law denies her remarriage, on the principle of the sanctity of the home —in this case a home which has no sanctity about it. It refuses her a divorce on the ground of a supposed unity of two persons who for years have had no unity, nor ever will have on God's earth.

Or consider the experience of the Senate Divorce Committee. I had the privilege a couple of years ago of attending a good number of hearings—I have since been occupied elsewhere—and in almost every instance the question was asked, "Is there any chance of normal home life being restored? That is something with which every member of the committee was gravely concerned—can the marriage be restored?—and I venture to say that in not one case of the five hundred or so which constitute a year's work has the committee decided, "We will not recommend a divorce because we believe the parties can be brought together again."

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In not a single case.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What is the use of talking about the sanctity of a home that has no sanctity, or stressing marital obligations which have been torn to shreds, or suggesting as a consideration the welfare of children whose mother has been left without a dollar by her husband? What is the sense of talking about the benefit to the children of preserving a marriage of this kind? The only earthly prospect of happiness they can have is that their mother may be able to marry some decent man who will be glad to provide a home for herself and her children, and perhaps raise other children who would be brought up respectably. Make no mistake about it; each one of us knows from his own experience that such things happen. I could name a great many cases in which, divorces having taken place, remarriages have followed and very happy homes have been established. But in all my experience as a lawyer and as a member of the Divorce Committee I do not know of one solitary case wherein the happiness of a broken home could be restored through denying to the parties concerned the right—in my opinion, legitimate and just—to a separation through divorce.

My honourable friend the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) asserts that divorce is a cancer in our social system. He is right about the cancer, but wrong about the cause to which he attributes it. The cancer is that condition which disrupts and destroys our family life. All that a divorce does is to attempt to cure that cancer. In my respectful submission, the honourable senator's argument directly confuses cause and effect. He told us that divorce begets divorce, that it will increase the number of divorces. Well, it is a catchy phrase, but I do not find anything in the speeches of either my honourable friend from Ottawa West or the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) in proof of the soundness of this statement. Divorce does not beget divorce; it is the consequence of some conditions of which I will treat more fully in a few minutes. The honourable senator who cited the English statistics in this connection did not disclose how many divorces were the result of desertion, which is the subject I am now discussing. The important point is to find out what were the causes of these desertions, and whether a pent-up condition resulting from the denial of relief has any chance in the world of improving the social conditions or the morals of the people or lessening the prospects of further divorces.

My desk-mate, the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) quoted the Gospel of St. Mark, chapter 10, verse 9:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

I understand, honourable senators, that many different kinds of people can quote scripture. I suggest to my honourable friend from Wellington that the tenth chapter of St. Mark should not be interpreted too literally, for in another place in that same chapter—

Hon. Mr. Howard: Then do not quote that too literally!

Hon. Mr. Farris: Oh, yes, I am going to read it. I understand that my honourable friend is not without worldly possessions; and the twenty-fifth verse of that same chapter reads:

> It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

I understand, of course, that there are interpretations of that verse which may reassure my honourable friend. And I would respectfully suggest that a proper understanding of the verse he has quoted, in its statement "Let not man put asunder", is that it is primarily directed to the husband himself.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why, of course.

Hon. Mr. Farris: When, for instance, there is desertion, it is he who puts the marriage asunder. Does the judge who grants the divorce put the marriage asunder? Not he, honourable senators, but the man who has left his wife and children in destitution; who, for two years or more, has caused his family nothing but suffering and sorrow, and has denied his wife the opportunity of improving her condition. So I repeat that a mere declaration by a judge that the marriage is dissolved, when in essence it is already destroyed, is not a violation of the Gospel injunction. I trust that this, which seems to me the evident meaning of the verse he has quoted, will change my honourable friend's views in this connection.

Both the honourable senator from Grandville and the honourable senator from Ottawa West laid stress upon the contractual obligation involved. Under the common law in our English-speaking provinces I know that no matter how formal a contract may be—it may bear a seal and the names of witnesses and so on—if one party breaks the essentials of the contract the other party is relieved in law from any obligation. There is no question about that. Why should that principle not apply so far as the contractual obligation of marriage is concerned? Where is the mutual obligation if a man deserts his wife for two years, perhaps leaving her helpless with children; or commits adultery with a mistress; or continually commits acts of cruelty upon his wife, making a hell out of the home? I am sure that every lawyer in this chamber who comes from a province which follows the common law will agree with me that under similar conditions any other kind of contract would be as dead as Julius Caesar.

Honourable senators, I strongly urge that we give this bill second reading and send it to committee where we may consider ways and means to improve it. Leaving aside for the moment all other grounds but desertion, is there not reason to show that we could improve our existing law by including desertion as a ground for divorce, trusting our courts not to stultify any new law in respect to desertion but to give to it the same honest interpretation and administration as they do all other law in Canada? If honourable senators agree with me that there ought to be some provision in our divorce law for desertion, that alone justifies sending the bill to committee even though we may throw out all its other proposals. Would fewer divorces lead to fewer desertions? I would challenge an affirmative answer to that question, and I have not heard a worthwhile argument to support it.

Let us come next to the question of cruelty, which in my humble opinion requires more consideration than that of desertion, where I think the argument is all one way. The honourable senator from Grandville quoted statistics from the United States showing that out of 100,000 divorces granted in twenty states only 1,400 were on the ground of adultery, while 56,000 were on the ground of cruelty. He went on to give illustrations, and I believe he said that in some states a wife could even get a divorce on the ground of cruelty because her husband ate his breakfast with a newspaper stuck up in front of him. What does that prove? In my judgment it proves nothing. That sort of thing does not reflect on divorce laws but rather on the social and moral conditions of the people, and on the judges who interpret the law in such a way. If there have been such cases as have been given in illustration, they reflect a wrong attitude of the courts. I say that with all deference.

In his address the honourable gentleman from Grandville told us about twenty-two graduates of a well-known and highly reputed convent. I presume the young ladies were beautiful and virtuous. He went on to say that within two years of leaving the convent twenty had married, and after three years nineteen of them were divorced. What does that prove? It might be a very persuasive argument to sweep a jury off its feet, but let us stop and analyse the story. What do we know about those divorce cases? We do not know the background or history of those girls. We do not know whether they got the divorces or whether their husbands got them; we do not know on what grounds the divorces were granted, and we do not know in what jurisdiction they were granted, whether in New York or some other state. I suspect those girls were so strictly brought up in the convent that every man looked good to them when they got out. There is a basic explanation of these hasty, ill-considered marriages. The mere unexplained statement of fact that has been given to us proves absolutely nothing in relation to what we are now discussing.

It is admitted, and we know it is true, that there are serious abuses in the United States in the matter of granting divorces on the ground of cruelty, but can we not safeguard ourselves against this mockery and at the same time provide reasonable grounds for divorce where the home is destroyed by cruelty? In my respectful submission the answer is yes. We have already had experience in this in Canada. Cruelty has been a ground for divorce in that good old province down by the Atlantic, Nova Scotia, since 1761. Has this law been abused in Nova Scotia? When this point was put to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), he said: "I take off my hat to Nova Scotia. It must have higher morals than the rest of Canada". Well, I went to college in Nova Scotia, and I doubt very much whether the people there were any better than my people over in New Brunswick or the people in British Columbia, where my new home is. But they are good people and there has not been any pitiable exhibition of mockery of that law by the citizens and judges of Nova Scotia. We can feel assured that our courts will never interpret any reasonable law in regard to cruelty so as to make a mockery of the law, as has been done in some of the alleged interpretations in the United States. Each one of us has enough confidence and faith in our judges to be satisfied with that fact.

But I am not entirely satisfied with the definition of cruelty as contained in this bill. We do not have to accept it; we can change it. I would suggest, first of all, that the word "repeated" be incorporated in our definition of cruelty. If a man comes home drunk some night and beats his wife up it should not constitute cruelty within the meaning of the act. But if the beatings were continued there would come a time when they would be considered habitual, and at that time I think the wife should be entitled to sue the husband for divorce on the ground of cruelty—at the stage where the home no longer exists, and where the sanctity of the home, which my honourable friend from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Barbour) so touchingly referred to, is undermined. I cannot see for one minute how one can talk about the sanctity of the home if there are real grounds of cruelty or of desertion.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I wonder how many nights the wife could stand a beating?

Hon. Mr. Farris: Well, I wonder, too, but according to my honourable friend she has to stand it for the rest of her life.

My honourable friend from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) has indicated that we should accept the definitions of cruelty as given by the High Court of England. I have not had time to read them, and I do not know whether we should tie ourselves to them, or whether we should make our own definition right now, with the benefit of the English definitions before us. But I would say first that the acts of cruelty must be repeated acts which include not only acts or conduct endangering life, limb or health, but also any course of conduct so intolerable that the petitioner could not be reasonably expected willingly to live with the offending spouse. This definition may not be drastic enough, but it is my suggestion for consideration in committee only. Honourable senators, conditions of cruelty can exist that make the home not a sanctified place but a hell on earth. And what good is it going to do to the moral conditions of this country to fasten on a man or woman a law which drives them out to seek what pleasures they may obtain out of life in other pastures? I cannot see any.

I come now to the question of insanity. It has been suggested that this ground would lead to collusion, deception and fraud. I submit that that is just out of the question, for we have competent courts and doctors with specialized knowledge to deal with such cases. May I point out that the bill before us specifies that insanity must be of at least five years' duration, and also must be incurable—not by old standards, but by modern standards of medicine. Now, if it is proven that insanity has existed for at least five years and is incurable according to modern science, how can there be any possibility of fraud, deception or collusion?

Some of my friends of the medical profession have mentioned curable insanity. That, of course, does not enter into our consideration, for cases that are curable according to medical science, as of to date, would not be within the jurisdiction of the courts under this bill. Others have said that, after all, insanity is comparable to other diseases. I dispute that assertion. I can understand and admire the husband or wife who has to bear with a spouse who is incurably ill but who nevertheless has a mind; but when the mind is gone, I submit there is really no difference between that kind of insanity, if it is incurable, and death. How can one conceive of any factor of union in a relationship which we all regard with such high reverence, if a man or woman is permanently insane and has no mind, and is not conscious of what is going on within the bounds of that relationship? But one honourable senator said, "Oh, but this relationship is to be 'in sickness and in health.'"

With regard to the obligation to support, in practically all the provinces the obligation to support an insane person rests primarily on the state, if such person is not able to provide support by his or her own means. In the province of British Columbia, at least, if an insane person is sent to the asylum the Attorney-General becomes ex officio his or her guardian.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Pater patriae.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes. If, for example, a wealthy wife gets a divorce from an unfortunate lunatic husband who has no means, the state has its choice, because it is fully within the jurisdiction of the province. The province, having the choice, can support that man out of state funds, or can pass a law, if there is not a law in existence, saying that, even if there is a divorce, the wife who has money must provide for the keep of her insane husband. What is wrong with that? And where does all this shaking of the head come in about the unfortunate lunatic? He does not know anything about it, he is not concerned, has no money and does not contribute anything more than if he were dead, physically as well as mentally.

Honourable senators, on each of these grounds I submit that once we have accepted the principle of divorce, as we have done in Canada, this bill ought not to be considered in the way that my prohibition friends would consider the law in regard to the liquor act.

The bill provides for a decree of presumption of death and dissolution of marriage; and provides that continual absence for seven years shall be evidence of death. My honourable friend from Grandville made an argument on the constitutional aspects, and I have not had time to study this. If there is any doubt on this point it will be an easy matter to redraft the bill so that it will show that absence for seven years shall in itself, without other consequences, constitute a ground for divorce. I intended to look it up, but my memory is that if a person is absent for seven years and the wife, say, marries, she is not guilty of bigamy. The criminal law has given her that relief. All the bill suggests is that, consistent with that principle, she should not be put in an unjust predicament. Suppose a husband has been continually absent for seven years. He may be a victim of amnesia, get cured and come back; or it may be that he has left his wife out of pure cussedness, and, discovering that she has remarried and has a child from the second marriage, he shows up. What kind of a law is it which exempts that woman from a criminal prosecution but leaves her in the impossible position that she has been living in adultery and that her child is a bastard? I cannot see the logic of that, nor can I see, honourable senators, how in any sense of the word a denial of her right to remarry is a contribution to the sanctity of the home.

A lot has been said and figures have been given to indicate that increased grounds would mean an increased number of divorces. Well, that is what I would expect and that is the reason why this bill is put forward. For instance, my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) cited the case of a lady who was not willing to commit perjury or adultery in order to get a divorce, and under today's law she does not get one. So her case is not numbered amongst the divorces of Canada today. If the law is amended to allow her to get a divorce on just grounds and to remarry, the total number of divorces in Canada will be increased by one; and each case of merit beyond those now granted will be an increase in the number of cases. Both my honourable friends, and perhaps also my honourable friend from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour), shook their heads and said "If you widen the grounds, you will have more divorces." Of course we will have more divorces, and if the principle is right that ought to be the result.

My honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) said in his argument that we have no mandate to pass this bill, that no province had passed a resolution requesting a change in the divorce law. My answer is, what business is it of the provincial legislatures? Divorce is within our jurisdiction, and a mandate must come from us, not from the provinces. If a mandate is necessary, what better could we get than one from the Canadian Bar Association? I was present at the meeting of the association at which the resolution to widen the grounds for divorce was passed, and Mr. John Hackett, and I, both of us past presidents of the association, spoke and voted against it. I took the position that although I was not against what the resolution asked for, it was not the business of the Canadian Bar Association; that within that association there were strong conflicting views arising from religious differences, and that the association should not pass such a resolution. A member asked where the question should go, to which John Hackett replied, "Send it to Parliament." Of course, that is the proper place for it. But notwithstanding the attempt by John Hackett and myself to block the resolution, it was swept through an almost unanimous vote—I think we were the only two who voted against it. I say now to the honourable senator who seeks a mandate, "You can't brush that resolution aside." True, all the lawyers of Canada were not at that meeting, but there was a mighty good representation.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: It will increase business for the lawyers.

Hon. Mr. Farris: No, it will not increase business. Divorce work is the last kind of business on this earth that any lawyer would want to engage in. I am surprised that my honourable friend would make that suggestion. He does injustice to and insults the lawyers of Canada when he says they have gone on record—

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: But I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes you did. You suggested increased business. If you did not mean by that, that the reason the resolution was passed was to get increased business, why did you interject?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I just made a statement.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Yes, I know you made a statement, but for what reason?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: You said the lawyers had no business to pass the resolution, so I thought they wanted to increase business.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Anyway, they did not agree with me about their right to pass the resolution. The resolution having passed, I may say that I know of no other group of men in Canada who have as keen an appreciation of the need for extended divorce grounds as have the members of the Bar association. I say that with deference to the doctors even, who see only one aspect of this problem. The lawyer has to consult the doctor and gets the whole social aspect of the problem before him. The lawyers are, therefore, the body from whom a mandate should come, if one is necessary.

My honourable friend from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill) made a very good speech in which he said he was in favour of divorce. But like the cow who gives a good pail of milk and then kicks it over, he ended his speech by saying he wanted more information. I would point out to my honourable friend that this question was discussed eighteen years ago, and it has been a live topic ever since; and if this bill now goes to a committee of the house it can be investigated thoroughly. The committee could do everything a special committee could do: it could summon representatives from the clergy, the medical and legal professions, social workers and many others, and thereby get the most complete information. I am most surprised that my honourable friend from New Brunswick would defeat the very thing which he first said he was in favour of.

In reply to my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) I would venture the opinion that if the bill is killed in this house it will not suffer that fate by reason of the votes of the majority of senators from the provinces to which the bill is to be applied. My honourable friend said there was no reason why the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, who are not directly affected by this measure, should not vote against it because, he said, we represent all Canada. Honourable senators, that statement has very wide implications. How would Mr. Duplessis regard that proposition, if the boot were on the other foot? I agree that, broadly speaking, all senators are concerned with the problems of all of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Howard: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Farris: But the other provinces, apart from Quebec and Newfoundland, have recognized that notwithstanding their feelings special provision should be made for these two provinces. The statement by the honourable senator from Grandville is inconsistent with that doctrine. In a country like Canada, with its extended territory, its differences of religion, language and customs, the doctrine suggested by my friend cannot be applied too strictly. For example, if I should introduce a bill into this house setting up a divorce court in the province of Quebec, outlining the various grounds, including adultery, and saying that I desired that the legislation should be imposed upon that province because as a senator I was looking after the interests of all Canada, there would be a just protest against such a high-handed move. I would not think of doing it, and I say it is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

A further argument advanced by my friend from Grandville was that the bill before us does affect the province of Quebec because Parliament is today granting divorces for certain people in that province, and in doing so Parliament is following the precedent of law in the other provinces. He concludes that if the grounds are increased in the other provinces, it will only be a year or two before Parliament will be granting divorces for the people of Quebec on the additional grounds provided for the other provinces.

I would answer my honourable friend in two ways. In the first place, those grounds will not be extended to the province of Quebec unless we find the results so favourable that we think they ought to be extended to Quebec. Secondly, if that appears to my friend to be a dangerous situation, I have prepared a resolution to cover it. If I were to move it here, I am quite sure Mr. Speaker would rule me out of order; my intention therefore is to propose it only when the bill goes to committee. I mention it now as an indication of what we can do in committee to relieve the apprehension of my honourable friend. This is the resolution:

> The grounds of divorce, as extended by this enactment, shall not be deemed a precedent or reason for extending the grounds of divorce in any case arising in Parliament on the petition of a person domiciled in the province of Quebec or the province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That will clear it up.

Hon. Mr. Farris: That will not make it impossible for a subsequent Parliament to legislate to the contrary, but it will be impossible to claim a precedent in an act which repudiated the very suggestion of that precedent.

That brings me, honourable senators, to my concluding point, which is on the question of justice, about which we have heard little. The honourable senator from Grandville, as reported at page 262 of Hansard said:

> Legislation is not meant to safeguard the happiness of the individual at the expense of the common weal.
> States more concerned with individual happiness than with the common good, are not in general successful.

My honourable friend from Ottawa West uses language not unlike that, at page 250 of Hansard. Now, honourable senators, these are sweeping statements which cannot be accepted without close examination. The case of taxes was cited as a case where the individual has to pay for the common weal. But, honourable senators, taxes are of general application and there is no injustice to the individual. The proposition here applied is: admitting that a woman is an innocent victim and that her happiness and enjoyment of a decent life are denied to her, not from any fault of her own but because others might take advantage of the law giving her relief, therefore, justice must be denied to her in order to protect those others from their own folly. I suppose it is on the policy:

> If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat.

That is not the whole of that quotation, but it suffices to express my idea. But even that policy does not require that I starve to death. My honourable friend's proposition—and it is not his alone—is that justice will be denied one person, not in order to do justice to another, but to lessen the danger of others doing a wrong to themselves. It is a doctrine that the end justifies the means. I cannot subscribe to any such doctrine. If it were a case of conflicting justices, that is one thing. But, if it is a denial of justice to the innocent to protect others from succumbing to temptation, I doubt the state's right to take such a position, at least unless there is no other solution.

Opponents have been free with their suggestions of a solution. My honourable friend from Prince suggests: curb drinking intoxicating liquor. I agree, and I think that will be a help. My honourable friend from Grandville says: enforce present divorce laws more strictly. I say that is all right if it can be done, but I do not think my friend from Grandville is any wiser than members of our Senate Divorce Committee or judges all over Canada.

I say, honourable senators, there is another suggestion: Look to ourselves that we take proper measures to prevent the basic causes of immorality and moral decadence. It is said that divorce promotes divorce, meaning thereby that divorce promotes the evils that promote other divorces. This idea is far-fetched and cannot be proved. What is seriously in evidence is that where both parties are true to the marriage vow and the sanctity of the home, they do not seek divorce. Why are divorces wanted? It is because one of the married persons no longer regards the vows. It is because of hasty marriages with no foundation of love and affection. It is because of drunkenness and adultery. Some of these conditions are the result of improper moral standards. In many cases the causes begin before marriage. Fornication and loose living before marriage lead to adultery after marriage. Lack of proper home influences, where there is no divorce, is a forerunner of divorce in the next generation. Causes antedate results—results do not antedate causes.

The influence of the church, of the home, of schools and of society generally should be directed towards strengthening the moral standards of our youth, and against drunkenness, fornication and adultery, and hasty and ill-considered marriages. It will follow that divorces will take care of themselves if these obligations prevail. It is for these reasons, honourable senators, that I say that not the state, nor society nor the church has the right to deny justice to an innocent victim of society-created conditions as a protection against society's own shortcomings and neglect. Especially is this so when the denial is not justified on grounds established by the evidence.

Honourable senators, this bill may not pass at this session, but in that event its consideration will not be delayed so long again.

> Time's glory is . . .
> To unmask falsehood, and bring truth to light . . .
> To wrong the wronger till he render right.

In the end justice will prevail and, in my belief, society as a whole will thereby be the better served.

I earnestly support the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE ESTIMATES

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956, in advance of the bills based on the said estimates reaching the Senate; that the said committee be empowered to send for records of revenues from taxation collected by the federal, provincial and municipal governments in Canada and the incidence of this taxation in its effect upon different income groups, and records of expenditures by such governments, showing sources of income and expenditures of same under appropriate headings, together with estimates of gross national production, net national income and movement of the cost-of-living index, and their relation to such total expenditures, for the year 1939 and for the latest year for which the information is available and such other matters as may be pertinent to the examination of the estimates, and to report upon the same.

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion is in form the same as one moved in 1951 when the estimates for that year were referred to the Standing Committee on Finance. Honourable senators will recall the splendid work done by that committee under the very able chairmanship of the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). I have read the committee's report, and I feel that the committee that session rendered very valuable service to Parliament and to Canada.

In 1950 the estimates were referred to a number of committees. For instance, certain estimates were referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I presume they were the estimates of the Department of Transport. The Standing Committee on Public Health and Welfare also was authorized to examine certain estimates, and the votes are mentioned. Presumably they were the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Similarly, our Standing Committee on External Relations was authorized to examine the estimates of the Department of External Affairs; and our Committee on Canadian Trade Relations to examine the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

However, it was found difficult to obtain quorums at these different committees when they were sitting at the same time, and it was necessary to have them sitting at the same time in order to get through with the examination of the estimates. The difficulty arose of course because quite a number of senators were members of more than one of the committees that were sitting simultaneously. In 1951 the difficulty was overcome by referring all the estimates to the Standing Committee on Finance.

It has been suggested outside this chamber that it is not necessary for our Finance Committee or any other Senate committee to examine the estimates because a new procedure has been adopted in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It has not been tried out yet.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My honourable friend from New Westminster says that the new system has not been tried out yet. It is being tried out at the present time. Probably I could just explain briefly what the new arrangement is. Previously in the House of Commons all the estimates were referred to the Committee of Supply and considered in the chamber. However, at the current session certain estimates, though not all of them, have been referred to a committee on estimates which meets quite frequently, and sits, not in the Commons chamber, but as an ordinary committee, usually at times when the house is not in session. At present that committee is considering the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

As I said, the suggestion has been made that, because of these recent developments in the other house, it would be unnecessary for the Senate to refer the estimates to its Committee on Finance. I do not agree. I gather, from reading the committee's report of 1951 that it considered the estimates rather otherwise than as they are dealt with elsewhere. It is natural that members of the House of Commons committee should attempt to make political advantage from any matters which they can raise, and I do not think they should be criticized for so doing. But we in the Senate do not approach our work in that spirit. We are not interested in the political consequences or in making political capital. I am satisfied that the Finance Committee will examine the estimates in a manner divorced entirely from considerations of advantage to one party or another. If I, as Government leader, did not believe this, I would not be moving this motion. But I am glad to move it, because of my confidence in the committee, and I hope the motion will receive the support of the house.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, it has been my good fortune to be a member of the Finance Committee since it was established, and I know something about it. But before I say anything as to the committee and its work, I want to pay a compliment to the honourable senator from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King), who was, I believe, Government leader in this house when the practice of referring the estimates to this committee was inaugurated.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I supported his decision at that time. Some people have blamed the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) for suspending the sessions of the committee during the year 1953. He is not solely to be blamed, because I had something to do with it. I suggested to him that, as there would be an election that summer, it would not be wise to give anybody an excuse to criticize us on the ground that the committee was more interested in playing politics than in getting at the facts. Not that honourable senators would be actuated by any such feeling, but others might suggest that they were. The committee has done important work. At least half a dozen newspaper publishers and editors have told me that the material contained in its reports is as valuable and reliable as anything they can obtain concerning the extent and cost of governmental services. It is a great compliment to the Senate that people connected with the press esteem our reports as more valuable to them than even the material they obtain through the services of their own reporters.

I am not to be understood as canvassing in advance, but I hope that the former chairman (Hon. Mr. Crerar) will be re-elected. He has such a persuasive way with departmental officials that they give information readily when perhaps the rest of us would get very little consideration from them. He seems to be aware of just what people are best equipped to furnish the information the committee wants. It is reassuring to know that the report which the committee presents to the Senate is based upon evidence obtained from the best witnesses available.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will be pleased to hear that the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has already been appointed chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I am delighted to hear that, and I thank the Leader of the Government for informing me. I want to assure the Leader that, in my humble opinion, he will not regret having the estimates again referred to this committee. There is a strong public sentiment in this country, although it is not too vocal, that when a Senate committee examines into any subject it will come to a reasonably sound conclusion. Examination of the estimates by the Finance Committee will help to perpetuate that feeling in Canada. I am a great believer in the British parliamentary system, with its two Houses of Parliament; and in my opinion Macdonald, Cartier, Brown and the other Fathers of Confederation, who probably were better politicians than we are, certainly used good judgment in establishing both an Upper and a Lower House in this country. As I said last night, I got quite a thrill at Regina last week when attending the Canadian Curling Championship playoffs to find just how much people respect the title of senator. It made me keenly aware of my responsibility as a senator, and I determined that when I came back to Ottawa I would urge upon my fellow senators that we should serve our country to the best of our ability. If we do this the people of Canada will respond to no end.

I am extremely pleased that the estimates are to be examined by the Finance Committee. I support the move wholeheartedly, and I am sure that the committee will produce a report that will be a credit to the Senate.

Hon Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, if I were a shrinking violet I would be completely overwhelmed by the kind references that have been made to myself and to the work of the Finance Committee in previous years. However, as honourable senators are well aware, I am certainly not that kind of a flower. Nevertheless I have appreciated what both the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) and the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) have said.

I am quite unchanged in the view I have always had that if an inquiry of this kind is to achieve any good purpose it must be wholly non-partisan in character and objective in its approach. That was the basis upon which the previous inquiries were carried out by the committee, and I am bound to say that that was largely responsible for any success attending the committee's efforts.

I do not think there is anything more important in the conduct of public business than the amount of money that governments take out of the taxpayers' pockets and what governments do with this money; and this touches directly upon these Government estimates. It would be very inadvisable for this committee to single out certain departments and dig into their spending activities. The committee tried to do this the first year it inquired into the estimates and it did not work out too well.

I am sure honourable members are familiar with the sheet that appears in the back of the Blue Book containing the estimates for the fiscal year. There is a wealth of information in this sheet for any member of Parliament who wishes to inform himself intelligently about Government spending. It gives a broad classification by classes of expenditure which are grouped into what are called "Standard objects of expenditure and special categories". There are twenty-two standard objects and twelve special categories, and the expenditures of each department of Government are given in these various groups. The net total estimated expenditures of each department are also given.

When our committee meets for the first time I shall suggest that we deal with some particular object of expenditure that has grown, and try to find out the reasons for this growth. I shall suggest that we examine it in a critical fashion so as to ascertain whether the growth has been fully justified. I mention this because it is a matter of serious concern that over one-third of the net national income is being taken by way of taxes at all levels of Government. We have been able to carry these heavy taxes because of the immense amount of new wealth we have been turning up, particularly since the end of the war. However, if we become committed to a certain process of expenditure, our gross national income and the very structure upon which our tax system is founded will be affected, should living conditions become a little more difficult: should crops become poor or should we be unable to get adequate prices for our newsprint, base metals or lumber. Therefore, I seriously think it is of some value and importance to try to carry out a critical, unbiased and fair examination of these expenditures and possibilities.

I am sure that the committee members will co-operate, as they have done in the past, to effectively study these matters. Incidentally, I think altogether too much credit has been given to me in the past as chairman of this committee. The credit should go to the committee members. I have had a great deal of experience in commitee work and I must say that I have never seen any committee members work more unselfishly and whole-heartedly to get the facts and reach the conclusions resting upon those facts. The work of the committee will be demanding, but that is the kind of work we are here to do. I am certainly looking forward with considerable interest to the hearings of the committee this session.

Hon Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Norman P. Lambert: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words by way of background in connection with the reference of the estimates to the Finance Committee. In past years, and especially during the war, there was a good deal of criticism of the practice of submitting the Supply Bill for approval of the Senate in the final days of the session. Strong protests were made that the members of this house had had no opportunity whatsoever to examine the details of the vast expenditures that they were being asked almost overnight to approve—amounts which certainly in the history of this country have not been equalled at any time. On the motion of my honourable friend from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King), who was the Leader of the Government in the Senate at that time, the estimates for one of the war years were referred to the Finance Committee for study, so that senators might be able to acquaint themselves with the character of the proposed expenditures before the Supply Bill was presented in this house, and that was done each session for some years thereafter. In 1950 the estimates were referred to various committees as mentioned by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), but in 1951 the practice of referring them to the Finance Committee was resumed.

I submit that the study of the estimates by this committee in past years has been of great value, perhaps chiefly in that it has enabled the members of the Senate to have a more intelligent appreciation of the expenditures provided for in the Supply Bill than they otherwise would have.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, the subject for discussion at the present moment is a bill that was introduced by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), the purpose of which is to widen the grounds for divorce. I wish to congratulate him upon his courage in introducing the bill. Its introduction is most timely—it is perhaps overdue, rather than appearing before being necessary.

The subject under discussion is of vast public importance. Many thousands of people in the dominion of Canada are truly interested, and some of them personally interested, in the measure that is before us for consideration. Countless persons may be affected if the bill is passed, and countless others will be affected if it is not passed. I submit that the honourable senator from Rosetown has done a great public service in bringing the matter before Parliament, on the floor of this house, where it can be discussed and analysed.

Someone has said—I am not sure whether it was said during the course of the debate or outside the house—that Parliament has no mandate for dealing with divorce. In reply, I would like to ask: What mandate has Parliament for refusing to deal with so important a matter as divorce? Honourable senators, we have been summoned here for the very purpose of revising and improving the legislation that is upon our statute books—abolishing some, changing others, and introducing new legislation. Our very purpose in being here is to improve the laws of Canada. It is not the philosophy of the people of Canada that what was good enough for our grandparents is good enough for our grandchildren. I would like to know by what process the law of divorce in Canada has become the law of the Medes and Persians which altereth not. I am sure that no one in this chamber will maintain that the law of divorce as it stands today is perfect in all respects. Who, then, has sanctified the imperfections of the divorce laws so as to set them aside in a different category from all other laws, which it is our duty to revise and improve from time to time? If we have no mandate to deal with the subject of divorce, there is certainly no mandate restraining us from dealing with the subject. Of course, it is taken for granted that it is not the function of Parliament to run counter to public opinion. There is no question in anybody's mind about that. Yet, honourable senators, is it not our duty to know the mind of the public of Canada? I submit that members of Parliament in both houses are the best qualified people in all Canada to know the mind of the public.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If we do not know the mind of the public, who does? And whose official job is it, if it is not ours? Not only should we know the mind of the public, but it is our duty to lead the way in matters of public opinion, and by discussion and other means within our power to aid in the formation of an enlightened public opinion. When an enlightened public opinion has thus been formed, it is our duty to crystallize it into legislation, and so allow the enlightenment to appear in our laws. That function of Parliament—and it is a high function—has been served, I submit, by the introduction of this bill by the honourable senator from Rosetown. His commendable action has led to the debate and discussion of a public question of vital importance to the nation.

Honourable senators, if I may presume to do so, I would congratulate every honourable senator in this house who so far has spoken in this debate. Some persons look upon us as old people—and none of us is very young—but I have marvelled at the great ability shown by my fellow senators, the senior statesmen of Canada, in this debate. I have been struck by the force of eloquence and moderation of tone with which opinions have been expressed, both for and against the bill, in every speech which has preceded mine. I am sure honourable senators will pardon me for singling out for special mention the magnificent and powerful address delivered last evening by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). After listening to his masterly marshalling of facts and arguments one wonders if anything is left to be said on the subject. Whether my honourable friends entirely agree with me in that, they will concur in my wish that the honourable gentleman will long remain to grace this chamber with his presence, to delight us with his eloquence and to guide us by his wisdom.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At the outset of my discussion of the bill, may I declare in no uncertain terms that I am in favour of marriage. I should like to see all the young people of marriageable age married and living happy lives. And, like the senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), I am opposed to divorce, because if our young married couples were living comfortable, proper, decent and happy lives there would be no need for divorce.

When I say that I am in favour of marriage, I mean that I am in favour of all those things involved in that splendid institution; first of all, that natural attraction between the sexes, which is just as beautiful and purposeful as the petals on the rose, and which serves the same purpose. One can scarcely express one's impressions on this subject, around which the sweetest and noblest of all sentiments cluster, without referring to what the poets have written about it. Honourable senators will pardon me if I quote briefly:

> I have travelled much this weary mortal round,
> And sage experience bids me this declare:
> If Heaven one draught of heavenly pleasure spare,
> One cordial in this melancholy vale,
> It is when a youthful, modest, loving pair
> In each other's arms breathe out the tender tale...

Obviously, honourable senators, the poet reserved for his rhapsody a youthful pair. I always rejoice and am happy when young people join their lives in the holy bonds of matrimony, for this is the natural order. In youth emotional impulses are strongest, and the physical side of sex, the power to reproduce, is at its highest level. I have many times advised young people to marry, and to do so early, for when people are young the reorientation that is necessary in order to pass from single to double blessedness is most easily accomplished.

You will also note that the poet reserves for his enthusiasm a loving pair. To my mind, marriage without love is a stark and ugly mask of the beautiful thing called marriage.

Let me discuss marriage from a practical point of view. It is much more than a contract; it cannot be called a contract altogether in law or in fact. In his speech last evening the member from Vancouver South quoted a senator who spoke earlier in this debate as saying that marriage was a contract and therefore it should be carried out with the sanctity of a contract. The honourable senator from Vancouver South aptly replied, that if it was a contract and subject to contract law, violation of the essential principles by one party would release the other from his or her obligation. Although perhaps contract is involved in a marriage, I say it is not a contract.

Marriage is a condition, entered into by agreement, usually publicly announced, and almost always impressively solemnized. Marriage has two phases which are important in our consideration of this bill. First, the confirmation of the spiritual and physical union, with its mutual love and helpfulness, the procreation of children and the maintenance of the family. That I would designate as true marriage. The second phase involves the legal consequences of entering into that condition, personal and property rights affecting the parties both within and without the contract, and public recognition. When our young people say, as they often do, that their marriage was contracted in heaven, I have no doubt they have in mind the first phase, namely the love, helpfulness, procreation of children, maintenance of the family and so forth, more than the mere legal relationship.

The great founder of Christianity is reported to have declared:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

I believe when He made that statement He had in mind the first phase that I have described, that of mutual co-operation and the procreation of children, rather than the second phase, based on the dusty law books or the cold formalities of the law. Further, I think He had in mind the spiritual and human things, the rights of the parties one to the other, and their effect upon the community as such. His whole life indicates to me the truth of that interpretation. Consider this:

> The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath.

Man was not created for the purpose of serving laws but laws were created for the purpose of serving man. Or again, let us recall that great saying:

> Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's.

There we have the clear separation between the things that are spiritual and human as opposed to the things that are merely legal.

Now, when I say that I am for marriage I do not mean only those things legal which we deal with sometimes here in this part of Parliament. I refer as well to the things that are human and spiritual. A union that is only legal should hardly be designated with the name of marriage, and when the things that are human have gone, as they so frequently have in our experience, then in my judgment the dead husk of the law can usually go along with it.

We have not in this country entirely forgotten that the injunction, "let not man put asunder", refers to the union of hearts, the joinder of bodies, the bonds of family as well as that of law, for witness the stern disapproval with which we regard the interloper between man and wife who disrupts and breaks a family. I want to join with my honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) in his statement last night that that command applies not only to those outside the family, not only to those in authority, to the law givers, but it applies also to those within the family, to husbands and wives themselves. But unfortunately at the present time those who disregard that injunction within the family have grown greatly in number and I am afraid a good many are guilty of breaching that injunction.

Now, if the question before us this afternoon was the total indissolubility of the marriage bond I might have a little more trouble in coming to an opinion as to what we should do. But that is not what is before us. Legal divorce has been in existence from the earliest times. St. Matthew, chapter 19, verse 9, in reporting the words of the founder of Christianity with regard to the matter of marriage and divorce, makes the special saving clause:

. . . except it be for fornication . . .

That is to say, even in those times—and now I quote the highest authority we have in Christian countries—in the words of the founder of Christianity Himself there was approval, at least toleration, of the principle of divorce.

The principle of divorce has been the law in every civilized country for at least a good many years and is now the law of all civilized countries of the Western world, at least in what we like to call the free world, including the dominion of Canada, and, as my honourable friend from Vancouver-South (Hon. Mr. Farris), said last night, including the province of Quebec.

Over the spiritual human ties that I have been endeavouring to indicate, the law giver, the law administrator, has very little power. We have some power, there is no question about that. We could do much, it seems to me, to make marriage easier, and successful marriage more likely. I mention for instance the lack of proper housing accommodation. I mention the very low wages that are paid under certain circumstances. I mention the slums of our great cities; yes, and the slums of the rural districts besides. There are many things that we could do to make marriages—at all events young marriages—more possible to those who engage in them and more likely to succeed. In the Divorce Committee just the other day we passed a case in which the husband told of the alienation of his wife's affections being due to the miserable salary that he was making. While I could not approve of the wife's attitude in the matter, I could nevertheless understand to some extent how it came about. Men are not machines, they are human and spiritual, and unfortunately the legal bonds which we do control are of very little avail indeed when the human and spiritual bonds have gone. And so the question is, not whether we shall have divorce in this country —we have it and shall continue to have it—but only when and under what circumstances we shall grant divorce to those who apply for it.

Up to the present time we have recognized adultery as the only ground for the dissolution of marriage, with such exceptions as have been mentioned earlier, particularly in the province of Nova Scotia. But in the main, and certainly in my province of Ontario, we have in the past recognized only adultery as a ground for dissolution of marriage, not as a punishment for the adulterer but as indicating to us a matrimonial condition that is intolerable to the innocent party. In our Divorce Committee and in our courts all over this country we consider the facts of the marital relations as well as the legal bonds, and regularly we ask about the other ties as well as the legal ties. We want to know whether the real marriage is still in existence before we will even consider dissolution of the legal marriage. We ask the parties whether they have continued sexual relation after the offence of one party has become known to the other, for if so the petitioner has condoned the offence—pardoned it, shall I say in explanation—and we will no longer entertain the application for divorce. We ask if there has been forgiveness, and we ask also if there is any chance of re-establishing the real marriage, that is by having the parties forgive one another, forget the past and live happily in the future.

Unfortunately, by the time these cases come to us the real marriage is a thing of the past. It has gone. I have not yet found a single case where we could defer action in the hope of re-establishing the true marriage. But it is only in cases where the marriage, in any proper sense, is no longer in existence that we will grant a divorce by cutting the legal bonds. We do so because in this country we regard adultery as a serious marital offence; because, honourable senators, it is a breach of the marriage vows, a breach of the undertaking—the very basis on which modern marriage rests—to remain faithful to the other party alone.

But what I want to call attention to this afternoon is that the pledge to keep to her or to him alone is not by any means the only marriage vow. What are the pledges to which the parties commit themselves? Thus far, in this debate, very little reference has been made to the vows which people make when they enter into the bonds of a legal or real marriage. May I refer to the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England in Canada, and turn to the section on Solemnization of Matrimony? I select this book because I was brought up in the English Church and was married according to its ceremonies. But, more important than that, as I understand the matter, all marriage ceremonies are in essence the same. There are changes of wording, but not many: all the forms follow pretty much the same lines; and as, of course, I cannot read them all I take one which I believe to be typical of the rest. What is this pledge, made by a husband to a wife and a wife to a husband, which is important to us in considering the matter of divorce? This is what is said by the officiating clergyman:

> Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honour, and keep her in sickness and in health; and forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?

The man says:

> I will.

I am giving only the version applicable to the man: that relating to the woman is almost the same.

A little later in the ceremony the man himself declares:

> I (John) take thee (Mary) to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth.

Let me now list the pledges which I find in these two eloquent and wonderful paragraphs Number one: to take the woman to wife (a) after God's ordinance, and (b) in the holy estate of matrimony. Observe that the pledge to take the woman to wife is not an unconditional pledge: it is after the ordinance of God, not after the ordinances of the devil—that is an important distinction—and in the holy, not the abominable, bonds of matrimony. Something is implied in these words; they cannot be brushed off as mere literature, having no meaning. The man vows, second, to love her; third, to comfort her, fourth, to honour her; fifth, to keep her in sickness and in health; sixth, to keep only to her, forsaking all others. Later in the ceremony the man repeats, as I have read it, this pledge in part, and adds a seventh pledge—to cherish.

Now, neither in nature nor in law can I find, in the ceremony itself or anything outside of it, any distinction between these various pledges which the parties make each to the other and to the public. All are stated together, and with equal emphasis, and all are to continue, as expressed, while both shall live and "till death us do part". Neither in Holy Writ, so far as I have been able to find out, nor in the law except as we are responsible for it, is there any distinction between any of these pledges. I find no reason whatsoever, in the words of the ceremony itself or otherwise, why the breach of one only of these pledges should be a sufficient ground for dissolution of the marriage, and that all others may be violated and breached with impunity, without the possibility of interference by the authorities of the state. I repeat that neither in the ceremony itself, in the law, nor in common sense can I find any justification for singling out one element and utterly disregarding the others.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend whether the pledges he has mentioned are included in the civil ceremony in use in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I cannot answer. I was not married that way.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Nor was I. But what is the fact?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I never thought of the point; if I had, I certainly would have looked it up. But I expect and hope that the civil ceremony which has now been introduced contains the same pledges. However, the number of civil weddings is small compared with the vast numbers which are celebrated according to the rites of the various churches.

Let us now refer to the bill itself. I turn to section 6, which lists the causes for divorce as proposed by the sponsor, the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I have condensed them somewhat, and perhaps I may use my notes rather than the legal text.

The first cause is adultery. The clause clearly declares the law as it now stands. No change is made and none is intended to be made; and if it were, we would see to it in committee, if this bill should be referred to committee for further consideration.

Subclause (b) specifies desertion without cause, which I read to mean without justification for a period of three years. I submit that a man who deserts his wife for a period of three years can hardly be said to be observing his pledge to keep and comfort her. If there could be a more pronounced and absolute violation of the marriage pledge, I would like to know what it is. It is certainly as clear, distinct and definite a breach of, shall I say, the agreement as is an act of adultery. Desertion implies intended desertion, mens rea, and certainly the man who wilfully deserts his wife for three years can hardly be said to cherish or to love her.

The next subclause in the section specifies cruelty. I have read enough cases to know what legal cruelty means in law. The man who treats his wife with cruelty as defined in the cases can hardly be credited with keeping his pledge to comfort her. The same is true of the wife if she treats her husband in the same way.

Section 6 (2) of the bill would enable a wife to petition for divorce on the ground that since the marriage her husband has been guilty of the revolting crime of rape, sodomy, or bestiality. Putting it mildly, if a husband is found guilty of any of these crimes he has surely breached the vow to honour his wife. Even if that is not the cogent pledge which he has broken, he certainly has not been living with his wife according to God's holy ordinances. As I have said, these words in the marriage contract mean something.

I submit that the provisions with regard to insanity are in a somewhat different classification. A person who becomes incurably insane has certainly suffered a terrible misfortune, for which he himself is not deliberately responsible. It might be said that in these circumstances the vow to love, comfort, honour and keep "in sickness and in health" is still binding. On the other hand —and the case was put most forcibly last night—what advantage is there to either the husband or the wife to be kept tied together by legal bonds when all other bonds under the marriage vows are no longer possible of fulfilment? What can society at large gain by imposing cruelty of this kind upon one or other of the married partners?

I do not mind confessing that I would be more comfortable in this debate if we had before us some general resolution rather than a specifically detailed bill. It is true that British precedent usually furnishes a good guide for Parliament when debating new legislation in Canada. It has served as a guide so often and so successfully that I do not need to argue the point. British legislation has been adopted all over the world; even its exact phraseology has been used in other countries. For example, the Bills of Exchange Act is law in practically every civilized country outside the Iron Curtain. But conditions in Great Britain, particularly in social matters like divorce, may differ from conditions in Canada, and it would be unwise to adopt British legislation holusbolus. I submit, therefore, that most serious consideration should be given to each of the active clauses in this bill as well as to the general principle of the bill. As honourable senators know, it is the principle of the bill to which I am addressing myself. I do not propose to discuss the bill in detail.

The honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) raised the question of the constitutionality of the second half of the bill, that is to say, the granting of divorce in the event of seven years absence of a husband or wife. According to the law of Canada as it is today, if one of the partners to a marriage has been absent for at least seven years, and the other has not heard from or of him or her, the deserted spouse may remarry and cannot be charged with bigamy. The fact that the remarried person cannot be charged with bigamy is a permission by statute law to the deserted person to marry again. That is a very important statute.

Hon. Mr. Davies: In order to remarry, must the deserted spouse obtain a divorce?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it is not necessary to obtain a divorce first. Although it is not so stated in the act, we have always assumed that a person absent for seven years is presumed to be dead.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Is it necessary for a court to state that the absent person is dead?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, it is not. I think there has been some tightening up in the province of Ontario in the issuing of licences for remarriage in such cases, but the departmental officials will grant a licence to be remarried without a court passing on it, and the individual—let us say the wife, for simplicity's sake—enters into the marriage upon her own responsibility, ready, however, to defend herself, on the grounds stated in the Code, should a charge of bigamy be laid against her. But the difficulty is that if the deserting spouse returns, no matter how long he has been away—whether seven or 27 years, the law is that the woman and her second husband are then married so to speak, out of wedlock.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Does that mean that the children are regarded as illegitimate?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is my understanding. I hate to admit it; the very thought of it is repugnant to my mind, but I think that is the law.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think that is a perfectly contemptible position for us to take in society against an innocent child or against an innocent wife who by permission of the statute has married again.

Honourable senators, I am all for this bill, and I am in favour of the provision that when one of the parties to a marriage has been absent for at least seven years the absentee shall be presumed to be dead, until the contrary is proved. I think that the deserted partner should then be regarded as no longer married, and that upon application a bill of divorce should be granted.

My friend the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) said that a declaration of death is a matter of civil rights and is, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and that usually the declaration is granted by the courts for the rightful disposition of property. I agree with him on that point. But, honourable senators, the British North America Act gave the Parliament of Canada legislative authority over "Marriage and Divorce." The Act laid down no conditions or grounds for the granting of divorce. We can grant a divorce for any cause we please, or for no cause at all. We should not go as far as that with our jurisdiction and powers, but we could do so. Therefore, although I have not studied this particular legal question carefully, I am of opinion that it is within our power to say that the courts may grant a divorce to a petitioner whose partner has been continually absent for at least seven years. I think that is clearly within our jurisdiction.

When the sponsor of the bill closes the debate, perhaps he will enlighten us further on this constitutional question, but it will not make very much difference to the general principle of the bill, upon which we shall be voting. If we have not the constitutional power to which I have referred, even if we passed the bill it would be of no avail. But be assured, honourable senators, that if the constitutional power is not there, according to the best advice that we can obtain, we will not pass that particular part of the bill in committee, but will strike it out; so it does not affect the question of the vote.

I wish to congratulate most sincerely the honourable member from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) on his forceful, eloquent and excellent address in this debate, and I commend him for his industry in gathering statistics on divorce from a large number of jurisdictions. The figures were impressive. I listened with friendly attention to what the honourable gentleman said, but I could not feel that the figures were much in point. Had the honourable senator been able to show that the increase in the number of divorces in all cases had followed adoption of the provisions of this bill and did not occur when the jurisdictions granted divorce for adultery only, his figures would have been very very cogent indeed. However, he was not able to show that. As a matter of fact, from reading the information he furnished, it is clear that the increases are universal, irrespective of whether the sole ground is adultery, or whether other grounds have been adopted.

For instance, take the field of jurisdiction with which we are most familiar, that of Canada itself. Canada has made no material change in its divorce laws in the past fifty years; certainly in the province of Ontario the situation has not changed for at least a half century. Yet, the senator from Ottawa West tells us that in 1900 there were only eleven divorces for all Canada, and in 1952 there were 5,562. Those figures show the growth of divorce without the adoption of any grounds proposed in this bill.

I say to honourable senators that these figures are hardly an argument for complacency on our part with regard to conditions as they exist today; rather, they are a serious indictment of the social and legal conditions which have existed through those years and have resulted in the increase which the figures show. But the figures have no cogency here, for they do not apply to the conditions we are discussing.

I have said, honourable senators, that I am opposed to divorce which cuts the bonds of marriage, because I am in favour of happy, healthy, normal marriages. But, honourable senators, I am also opposed to the use of the surgeon's knife; indeed, I shudder at the very thought of it. Yet there are times and circumstances in which I approve its use as applied to myself and to others.

The honourable senator from Ottawa West described conditions in Canada which lead to divorce as a cancer in the body social. That is a very good simile, because there has been an increase in operation for cancer in about the same ratio as the increase in decrees for divorce. But would the honourable senator treat cancer by abolishing the use of the surgeon's knife? Certainly there would be fewer operations, but would there be less cancer? True, even doctors make mistakes at times, and so do courts. I ask the same question with respect to divorce: Would the abolition of the divorce operation, or the restricting of its use in relevant circumstances, cure the social conditions which lead to it? Certainly, there would be fewer divorce decrees granted, but would there be fewer persons suffering from that social disease, or fewer broken homes and ruined families?

Each one of us will have to answer that question for himself, but for my part the answer is no.

The real question before us this afternoon is: Will the widening of the terms of divorce, as proposed by this bill, increase or decrease the percentage of happy, normal, healthy homes? Let me put it this way: Would there be more happy homes if we said to the man that he must keep his wife no matter how badly she treats him? Should we say to him, in effect: You were tied to this woman immediately the marriage noose was placed about your neck and irrespective of how grossly she neglects her wifely duties or how she abuses her marital associations, you cannot escape? Would that lead to better and happier homes? And should we tell the woman that for her there is no escape, regardless of whether her husband beats, abuses or deserts her? Or would it be more likely to lead to happiness if we told her that her husband could keep her only as long as he treated her decently, in accordance with the marriage vow and the law of the land, but should he violate them seriously by deserting or abusing her or being cruel to her, as defined by the law, she can escape from his unrighteous clutches? I rather think that freedom of that kind would tend more to happier homes than the policy of endeavouring to handcuff the parties one to the other.

It is admitted by my friends who oppose the bill that there are hard, sad and pitiable cases. One cannot sit as a member of the Divorce Committee without knowing the truth of that statement. But by what method are we to increase the number of happy families? Is it by maintaining the legal bond, irrespective of the suffering inflicted on the innocent party; or, when gross marital guilt is proved, by giving freedom to the innocent party and allowing that unholy state of slavery, called matrimony, to be dissolved?

My honourable friend from Ottawa West is very much concerned about the vast army of children of divorced people, and so am I. But, does it help the children if we force the continuance of unhappy homes? I think not. Rather, would it not be of greater help to the children to allow the parents to form more suitable family arrangements? There are, I know, cases where a mother and child might both be greatly benefited by allowing the mother to exchange a bad mate for a good one. Can there be any complaint about that? Extra-marital relations are not to be encouraged, but when parents do determine to make new arrangements, as unfortunately they frequently do, and when they enter into these extra-marital relations and form what they call common law marriages in a new home, is it of benefit to the children to refuse those people the regularity of law and society of the country in which they live? I do not think so. Indeed, I can fancy the child from an irregular home meeting difficulties from his companions at school; yes, difficulties which a little more humanity on our part might very easily ameliorate, if not altogether remove.

These are the problems, honourable senators, which we must discuss in the course of this debate, and they cannot be resolved by a puritanical approach; rather, our approach must be made with kindness, understanding and perhaps a little bit of courage. I willingly concede that all who take part in the debate and all who vote on the bill, whether they are in favour of the bill or opposed to it, are to the best of their judgment seeking the welfare of their fellow citizens. I mean that. And I appeal to you all to let this bill go to committee, where a thorough examination may be made of all its provisions, where evidence may be taken, where public opinion may be tested. I appeal particularly to the senators from the province of Quebec. The sponsor of this bill has most carefully provided that it shall not apply in that province, and if the provisions to that effect are not sufficiently strong now they can be strengthened in committee.

Now, the honourable senator from Grandville says that we are representatives of all Canada, and I agree with him in that. None of us represents any one part of Canada alone. But, regardless of what the law may be with regard to the matter, the fact remains that I am a representative of Ontario in this house. I think the honourable senator from Rosetown was right in excluding Quebec and Newfoundland from the provisions of this bill.

I hope that I will never be guilty of trying to impose my opinions and prejudices upon the people of a province not my own. I also hope that in discussing and voting on the bill the senators from Quebec will express the same sentiments toward the rest of Canada as I am expressing with regard to Quebec. I would not like to see this bill applied to the people of Quebec if they did not wish it. If they want to keep what I think is an antiquated law on divorce, I am all for letting them have it; but on the other hand I do hope that they will not impose their views, and their ideals with regard to religion and divorce, upon the people of the province from which I come. It works both ways. If Ontario wants to liberalize its divorce laws, surely my friends from Quebec should allow them so to do; and they can do so without any strain whatever, so far as representing all Canada is concerned.

In a general way, I favour this bill for my province of Ontario, and for all the other provinces to which it will apply if it is carried out in the spirit in which it has been drawn.

I would like to see it given second reading and sent to committee, where its every provision may be studied with great care, then referred to this house and considered again, if we see fit, in Committee of the Whole, and not read the third time until we have a complete and thorough grasp of all its actual provisions and their effects upon the community.

I will vote for the second reading of the bill.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, it was my intention simply to move the adjournment of the debate today, but if it is agreeable to the house I would just as soon make the few remarks that I have to make on the bill at the present time. I say this because we are due to meet in committee in a few minutes; but if I have the consent of the house I will proceed now.

Hon. Senators: Go on.

Hon. Mr. Horner: First of all, honourable senators, I want to say that I am in favour of this measure for broadening the grounds for divorce. I supported a similar bill just seventeen years ago, and during the intervening years I have gathered considerable experience, particularly while serving on the Divorce Committee.

I often thought that it would be a very good thing if a number of senators from Quebec were to sit in on the Divorce Committee, even if they do not wish to take part. They could gain more experience from attending its sessions than anyone can gain from reading the printed evidence. There they could see the agony on the faces of those people who appear before the committee praying for a divorce. All honourable senators who have served on the committee soon realize that by the time the parties reach that stage there is no question of breaking up their homes. The homes, as has been remarked, have already been broken up.

It is rather difficult for me to rise today after listening to two magnificent speeches by men of great ability, men trained in the law. I consider that a number of the other speeches made on this measure were also of a very high order. I admired the remark of the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) that he liked to see people happy. As I listened to the quotations from Scripture, I could not help but feel that the Bible contains many important lessons for us today. The parable of the Good Samaritan is perhaps meant to depict our passage through life. A certain man on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho was pounced on by thieves and left on the roadside. The priest and the Levite passed by on the other side of the road, but the good Samaritan stopped and assisted the injured man. To me, that is a grand illustration of how men and women who tread this life sometimes have their worries and troubles relieved. I would like to be worthy of being considered a good Samaritan.

For 47 years I have lived in a community where the Doukhobors settled many years ago. At that time they were given the privilege of solemnizing their own marriages in their own way. They have churches, but marriage ceremony generally takes place in the home. At any time within a year of the marriage it can be dissolved. You may call it a trial marriage if you will. That is a privilege which was extended to them when they immigrated here, and their form of marriage is legal in Canada. Now, the important point I want to make is, that after living amongst those people for 47 years I am convinced that their marriages and family life are just as good as those of any other people in Canada. I say that without reservation. I firmly believe that they are just as moral as any of us are, that their church teaches as high a course of conduct as does the church that I attend, including opposition to divorce. They are taught to consider the step seriously before taking a life partner. I am certain that such ideals are as thoroughly drilled into them as they were into me.

I was rather amused at the remarks of the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour). Of course, he comes from that little island garden down in the gulf where, I understand, anyone not born on the island is considered a foreigner. He states that the evils of over indulgence in liquor contribute to conditions which bring about divorces. Well, honourable senators, I agree with the honourable member from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) that prohibition drove liquor drinking into the homes.

I firmly believe that it is the duty of the churches to preach against divorce and the improper use of liquor. I am reminded of a story about the late Calvin Coolidge. One morning, after he had been to church, somebody asked him what the minister preached about. Mr. Coolidge replied, "Sin. He said he was against it". We, too, and the churches should be against sin. Figures have been quoted of the number of divorces granted in 1900. Recalling those times, I thought of some of the changes which have taken place. For instance, the honourable senator who quoted scripture reminded me of two of the commandments:

> Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.
> Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work.

Yet recently, in a supposedly God-fearing country, a national hockey championship match was played on Sunday with players from a godless state in which religion is declared to be the opiate of the people. No voice was raised in Canada to protest against that game having been played on the sabbath. Had such a thing happened in 1900, there would have been in this country something like a revolution. But in 1955 not a minister commented on the fact: all the radios were going, and everyone, instead of going to church, was listening to reports of the hockey game.

When my good-looking colleague from Prince was a boy, no doubt he did what he was told. When he grew up he came to the Senate and still, in my opinion, does exactly as he is told. Perhaps, away back in 1900, his parents had something to do with his courtship; probably he was told how the match should be conducted, when he was to go out walking—for in those days there were no cars—and I am sure he was a very good fellow and always kept his place according to the standards of the time. But today we are facing changed conditions in a different world. A divorce bill much like the present one was introduced here seventeen years ago, and in this respect, in spite of world changes, we have not advanced at all. I would like honourable senators to reflect that we, men and women of mature years, are here for a purpose. All of us know how much suffering—much of it needless—is going on in human society. If two animals were tied together and likely to fight and injure each other, we would interfere. Why should we be less concerned about human beings? Every day one reads in the papers of murders and suicides resulting from men and women being tied together in marriage until conditions have become intolerable.

With the permission of honourable senators, I shall briefly continue my remarks tomorrow.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Horner, the debate was adjourned.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS AND FREIGHT RATES

INQUIRY AND ANSWER

Hon. Mr. Isnor inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice of February 15:

1. What is the average cost per bushel of shipping grain from (a) Winnipeg; (b) head of Great Lakes; to Liverpool via (a) Vancouver; (b) Montreal; (c) Halifax; (d) Churchill?

2. What amount of grain was shipped in the current year of 1954 through each of the routes (a), (b), (c) and (d)?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The answer to the honourable gentleman's inquiry is as follows:

1. This question cannot be answered for the following reasons:

(a) Grain moving for export via Vancouver or Churchlil is not grain that is routed through either Winnipeg or the Lakehead.

(b) Grain for movement ex Eastern ports is bought and sold based on a Lakehead price. The local freight rate from Winnipeg to the Lakehead is not an element of cost.

(c) A bushel of wheat is 60 lbs. A bushel of oats is 34 lbs. There is, therefore, obviously no means of calculating an average cost of moving a bushel of "grain". Each grain is different.

2. The following table indicates overseas exports of Canadian grain by ports of loading in the current crop year up to February 23, 1955:

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

TRIBUTES TO IRELAND'S PATRON SAINT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Felix P. Quinn: Honourable senators, I need not remind you what day this is. It is the day on which Irish men and Irish people generally throughout the whole world do honour to their glorious and illustrious apostle and patron, Saint Patrick. The Irish people have a special love and reverence for their patron saint. Their devotion to him is different from that of people of other countries to their respective patron saints, because —for instance—while St. George, England's patron saint, never saw England, and St. Andrew never trod the soil of Scotland, St. Patrick spent the greater part of his adult life in Ireland, performed there his wonderful missionary work, and died there and was buried in its sacred soil. We honour his memory on the 17th of March. But I have learned that shortly after his death certain elements contended that he died on the 8th, others that his death occurred on the 9th. The parties could not agree, so, in the latter part of the fifth century, they called in an Irish priest named Mulcahy, who was noted for his wit as well as his wisdom, and asked him to settle the argument. He listened to the statements of the respective parties, and finally said, "You are both right—those who say the 8th, those who say the 9th; we will add the figures together and make it 17." So the date was established as the 17th of March, and it has so remained from the fifth century to the present time.

There is also considerable doubt as to the date of his birth, and while everyone does not agree as to the place, most writers believe it was in Dumbarton, Scotland.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I thought Scotland had something to do with it.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: That is how Scotland derived much of its virtue.

His father, whose name was Calphurnius, was a middle-class land owner and a minor Roman official. As honourable senators know, in those days Britain was under the rule of the Roman Government. Patrick was raised as a Christian, and at the age of sixteen he was seized by a band of Irish raiders and carried in captivity across the channel to Ireland, where he was sold as a slave to a Druid chieftain in the northern part of the country. There he spent six unhappy years engaged in the menial occupation of tending sheep. He prayed continually that he might be delivered from his captivity so that he might spend his life doing something more useful. Finally, he escaped and made his way to Wicklow, in southern Ireland, where a ship was being loaded with wolf hounds. Patrick was able to gain employment as the caretaker of the hounds and in this way he secured his passage to France. There he placed himself under the protection of St. Martin of Tours, who is said to be Patrick's uncle. St. Martin sent Patrick to the monastery at Lerins where he was educated and ordained to the priesthood. He later returned to Britain, where his thoughts often turned towards Ireland, and from time to time he was favoured with visions of unborn children from Focluth, by the Western sea, who cried out to him: "O holy youth, come back to Erin, and walk once more amongst us". Patrick prepared for his journey, gathering together a small band of missionaries to accompany him to Ireland.

The story is told that St. Patrick reached Ireland on the eve of the annual festival of the Druids. In those days the people of Ireland were all pagan and in the spring of each year they held a celebration. The kings and chieftains and Druid priests were gathered together on the hills of Tara to venerate their heathen gods, and it is said that Patrick arrived on the opposite hill with his little band of missionaries where, tired from their journey, they fell asleep. When Patrick awakened in the cold of next morning he lighted a fire. This was against the edict of the arch-Druid, who had ordered that no fire was to be lit on that day until he himself had set the torch to one. Patrick knew nothing of this, of course.

Patrick's fire was beheld with consternation, and the alarm was made. The chieftains were notified and they sent out a detachment, and Patrick was summoned before the court and asked to explain why he dared break the law. He told them that he was ignorant of any laws which compelled him to pay tribute to any gods—that he knew only one God, the Creator and Sovereign Lord of heaven and earth, the God who reigned in the heavens. He told them that his God consisted of a Trinity—Father, Son and Holy Spirit. His accusers were amazed, and Patrick could not make them understand. They asked him to explain how it was possible that there could be three in one. Gazing down at his feet, Patrick beheld a little shamrock, stooped to pick it up, and, holding it up for them to see, he said: "Oh, nature can explain what I have failed to make clear. There, you see how simple it is to have three in one—all on the same stalk". Patrick must have been given his freedom, because he was granted permission to speak—and we know with what wonderful success. Within a short period of time he converted the whole nation to Christianity, built churches, erected schools and monasteries, and raised the standard of learning. He was so successful, that he was able to send his followers and missionaries throughout the whole of the then known world, and Ireland became known as the land of saints and scholars.

That is the story oft told about Saint Patrick. Is it any wonder that the Irish people revere and respect his memory and honour his name on Saint Patrick's Day? Is it any wonder that we sing his praises?

All praise to Saint Patrick
Who brought to our mountains
The gift of God's faith.

Or is it any wonder that we sing of the dear little shamrock:

There's a dear little plant
That grows in our Isle,
'Twas Saint Patrick himself sure that set it;
And the sun on his labour
With pleasure did smile
And the dew from his eye often wet it.

This dear little plant
Still grows in our Isle,
Fresh and fair as the daughters of Erin;
Whose smiles can bewitch
And whose eyes can command
In each climate they ever appear in.

For they shine through the bog
Thro' the brake and the mireland,
Just like their own little shamrock of Ireland:
The dear little shamrock,
The sweet little shamrock,
The dear little, sweet little shamrock of Ireland.

That beautiful poem is set to music, and I wish I could sing it for you, honourable senators. If I may be favoured with your indulgence I will sing a few bars from a song which will be quite familiar to you, for it has become a modern song now. It is entitled "Galway Bay":

If you ever go across the sea to Ireland,
Then maybe at the closing of your day
You will sit and watch the moon rise over Claddagh,
And see the sun go down on Galway Bay.
Just to hear again the ripple of the trout stream,
The women in the meadows making hay,
And to sit beside a turf fire in the cabin,
And watch the barefoot gossoons at their play.

For the breezes blowing o'er the seas from Ireland
Are perfumed by the heather as they blow,
And the women in the uplands diggin' praties
Speak a language that the strangers do not know.
For the strangers came and tried to teach us their way,
They scorned us just for being what we are,
But they might as well go chasing after moonbeams,
Or light a penny candle from a star.

And if there's going to be a life hereafter,
And somehow I am sure there's going to be,
I will ask my God to let me make my heaven
In that dear land across the Irish sea.

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, whether we are fortunate enough to have come from the land where St. Patrick was born, or whether we are sons of men who did, I am sure we are all very happy today to join with the honourable senator from Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn) in paying tribute and doing honour to St. Patrick, the patron saint of Ireland.

We are especially pleased that the honourable senator has been with us over many years and has sung in this chamber at least once nearly every year. I heard him sing for the first time on St. Patrick's Day last year, and I can say that he is in just as good voice today as he was then.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is indeed a fitting tribute that has been paid to Ireland by our gifted colleague—a man who, though not young, is far from being old, and is blessed with a splendid memory and a delightfully melodious voice. Our wish for him, and for all Irishmen throughout the world, is that they will continue to be good natured and make the rest of the world happy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. George H. Barbour: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to rise on a question of privilege.

In his speech yesterday on the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) seemed to single me out for considerable ridicule. He began by saying that I come from a little island, and that people not born there, he understood, are regarded on the island as foreigners. Well, we never claimed that the island was large, but we are proud of our people, and I need not take the time of the Senate today to enumerate the long list of fine citizens who went from that island to other provinces in Canada.

The senator from Blaine Lake, as reported at page 306 of Hansard, said of me that as a boy I no doubt did what I was told. May I reply by saying that one of my most pleasant memories is that I did what I was told and did not cause my parents any trouble. The senator talked about 1900 and how I picked my wife. I should like to tell him that in 1896, when he was running around in short pants, I was working in the lumber woods of Maine for $18 a month.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think the honourable senator from Prince (Hon. Mr. Barbour) must state his point of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Barbour: I shall come to that point, Mr. Speaker, but first I should like to say that there is a gap between that early date and the time I came to the Senate.

The honourable senator from Blaine Lake used these words, in referring to me:

When he grew up he came to the Senate and still, in my opinion, does exactly as he is told.

Honourable senators, the statement that I do just what I am told is a reflection not only on me, but on every senator present. I would therefore ask the honourable senator from Blaine Lake to retract his statement.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sure the honourable senator from Blaine Lake, who is noted for his generosity of thought and mind, would not intentionally cast any reflection on the honourable senator from Prince, and if his statement carries with it that connotation, I am sure he will see fit to retract it.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Honourable senators, when I made that statement I was merely expressing my own opinion, but if it offends my honourable friend, I am willing to withdraw it.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. R. B. Horner: Honourable senators, it is very kind of the house to allow me today to complete the remarks I started yesterday. I believe I had reached the point where I had demonstrated beyond any doubt that vast changes have taken place in the world from the turn of the century to the present time.

I would mention some further instances of change. Back in the year 1900 scarcely any married women worked outside the home; there was not a motor car on the road; the man who had a horse and buggy was indeed fortunate. Today we ride either in a motor car or an airplane, and vast numbers of married women work outside the home. These changes are bound to affect our way of life and, as was very ably pointed by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), are quite likely to bring about more divorces. For instance, in the year 1900 only one divorce was granted in Nova Scotia, although cruelty, as well as adultery, was a ground for divorce in that province. The increase that has taken place in the number of divorces is due to the vastly changed living conditions.

As has been pointed out, the question in this debate is not whether we shall have divorce in Canada. Divorce already exists in Canada. The purpose of this bill is to widen the grounds for divorce. It might possibly be argued that if the bill were passed there would not be any more divorces, but that there would be a great reduction in the number granted on the ground of adultery.

I plead with honourable senators, to give this measure second reading, at least, and allow it to go to committee. I am sure that step would not in any way commit anyone to support the bill on third reading. Some senators have expressed the wish that it go to committee in order to clarify a number of points, such as whether cruelty can be more clearly defined. Suppose we were not able to agree on a satisfactory definition of cruelty this session, that might be put aside; and if we could widen the grounds for divorce to include desertion, that would be a progressive step.

While reading a certain pamphlet I ran across a passage that I thought was very applicable to the matter we are discussing. I will read a brief extract:

> What does the Christian religion say about it? The writer submits with diffidence the following for consideration of Bulletin readers.
> The general answer is, nothing directly. Christianity is the relation between God and man, and between one person and another, within the Kingdom and community. It is not a manual of political, economic or social action, though it has valuable by-products in those fields. Our Lord gave us the one great general principle, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." We are to so fit ourselves that in each generation we may be able to deal rightly with the changing circumstances of each age.

I thought those words were very appropriate to our discussion.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I ask what publication the honourable senator is quoting from?

Hon. Mr. Horner: It is from a pamphlet called The Bulletin, a church publication. The article I quoted from was written by Rev. T. F. Summerhayes, on "Capital Punishment for Murder". The extract I read expresses my own view better than I can express it myself.

There is another matter that I think we as elder statesmen, if you will, ought to give some serious consideration to. An act extending the grounds for divorce was passed by the British Parliament in 1937; and in 1938 a bill similar to the one before us was passed by the Senate, with a fair majority, but defeated in the other house. In the intervening seventeen years the world has continued to change. Now, I say this with all due respect, that there is a great deal of talk in the country about this chamber being very one-sided at the present time. Since 1938 it has become increasingly one-sided, and it is now composed almost entirely of members of one party. I would also point out that the same party has a huge majority in the House of Commons.

The honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) says he has received enough letters favouring additional divorce grounds to make a complete book. The people are looking to this house for leadership in this matter. I am somewhat concerned about this and I think every honourable senator should be. It seems to me that every opponent of the bill should give some thought to that phase of the question before voting against the bill and thus preventing it from going to committee for further study.

A resolution favouring the widening of the grounds of divorce was passed by the Canadian Bar Association at its convention last summer, but honourable senators who are members of the legal profession very modestly say that it was not the business of the Canadian Bar Association to pass such a resolution. Yet who else in this country is better qualified to express themselves on a matter of this nature?

The honourable senator from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill), in a very fine speech on this bill, wanted to know who if anybody had asked for a widening of the grounds of divorce. He wanted to know if any churches or other organizations had asked for such a measure. Well, honourable senators, I would like to say to him that he would never ask such a question if he belonged to any lodge, Kiwanis Club or Rotary Club or association of that nature. It is practically impossible to have a question like that discussed by the membership of any such body, because discussion of anything offensive to any one of the members is never permited. And surely he would not expect any church to advocate widening the grounds of divorce, because, as I said yesterday, it is the duty of the churches to preach against such things as divorce and excessive liquor consumption—or, if you want to put it the other way, to preach in favour of total abstinence.

I therefore submit, honourable senators, that the Canadian Bar Association is the only group that could be expected to take a stand on this question. Lawyers in their everyday work come to grips with family difficulties in the initial stages, being consulted by quarrelling couples about property matters and things like that. Often after consultation with lawyers, couples make up and go home, and sometimes they are not charged any fee for the good advice they got. That is why I submit that the Bar Association is the proper body to deal with the matter and to recommend it for consideration in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I must not delay the house. I think you all understand how keenly I feel about this matter. As a matter of fact, I am sure many of us feel the same way. I know of several cases in my own experience where couples have been separated on account of insanity, and there is absolutely no hope of these people ever coming together again. The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) mentioned a case where a woman's husband was afflicted with insanity and the doctors held out no possibility of recovery. Our present divorce law cannot give the woman any relief in these circumstances. Many a person finding himself or herself in a similar situation goes to live with another mate. I submit, honourable senators, that that is a greater indignity and a greater moral blemish on the community than a legal divorce would be.

I would like now to take the opportunity of repeating some words uttered by Lord Birkenhead, which are to be found in the Senate Debates of 1938, page 104. They were quoted in a speech delivered by the late Senator E. S. Little of London, Ontario, speaking on the motion for second reading of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill of that year. Senator Little said:

> Only on Sunday last I read in Winston Churchill's "Great Contemporaries" a quotation from a speech made by Lord Birkenhead on the Matrimonial Causes Bill in 1920—which, by the way, is considered to be the finest speech of his life. May I read an extract from that speech, which I quote from the Life of Frederick Edwin, Earl of Birkenhead, by his son, pages 131 and 132:
> "I, my Lords, can only express my amazement that men of saintly lives, men of affairs, men whose opinions and experience we respect, should have concentrated upon adultery as the one circumstance which ought to afford relief from the marriage tie. Adultery is a breach of the carnal obligations of marriage. Insistence upon the duties of continence and chastity is important; it is vital to society. But I have always taken the view that that aspect of marriage was exaggerated and somewhat crudely exaggerated in the marriage service. I am concerned today to make this point by which I will stand or fall, that the moral and spiritual sides of marriage are incomparably more important than the physical side . . . If you think of all that marriage means to most of us—the memories of the world's adventure faced together in youth so heedlessly and yet so confidently, the tender comradeship, the sweet association of parenthood, how much more these count than that bond which nature in its ingenious telepathy has contrived to secure and render agreeable the perpetuation of the species."
> "Those who have spoken in opposition to the present proposal say with the best motives but with malignant results: 'We deny you any hope in this world. Though an honest man loves you, sin shall be the price of your union, and bastardy shall be the fate of your children'. I cannot and do not believe that society, as it is at present constituted, will for long acquiesce in a conclusion so merciless."

I believe those statements to be true of conditions today; and I plead with honourable senators to allow this bill to go at least to committee, where amendments to it may be made.

Hon. Mr. Grant: Honourable senators. I would like to ask the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) a question. He quoted the words: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's". This answer was given by Our Saviour to some people who asked him whether it was lawful to give tribute to Caesar. Is it the opinion of the honourable senator that the sacrament of marriage belongs to God or to Caesar?

Hon. Mr. Horner: I may not be able to give the honourable senator a satisfactory explanation, but certain marriages of the gun-shot variety, in my opinion, may be said to be rendered unto Caesar.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. W. D. Euler: After the very notable, comprehensive and—to me—convincing speeches which have been made in favour of the bill, I rather hesitate to prolong the debate. If, in view of what has been said, I should be somewhat repetitious, I crave in advance the indulgence of the house. But my interest in this question of the amendment of the divorce law is so great, and is of such long standing, that I should like to make a few, brief observations, and stress some of the important matters which have been stated in connection with the bill.

To me there is only one real and very simple issue: shall I, as a member of the only body in Canada that has the power to do it, perform my part in bringing relief to thousands of my fellow Canadians who are living in misery, under conditions of cruelty and suffering for which they are not responsible? Can I, in conformity with justice, compel them to continue to be bound in a marriage which is no longer a marriage?

Something has been said about mandates. I am not particularly concerned about that. The only mandate I have in this matter is to try to rectify a glaring injustice. I have been in Parliament some thirty-five years. For a long period I served in the House of Commons, and for fifteen years, ever since I was called to the Senate, I have been a member of the Divorce Committee. Long ago I came to the conclusion that our divorce laws are antiquated and unworthy of an enlightened people.

Some speakers in the debate have declared themselves against divorce. I am not against divorce; I favour it if it is granted under the proper conditions.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Under those circumstances it could be a great boon to many innocent and worthy people.

The senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) termed divorce a great evil; the senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) called it a cancer. As the senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) said the other day, they are confusing cause and effect. The phrase is a good one; I had intended to use it myself. In my opinion divorce is neither a cancer nor an evil, it is a corrective. The evil consists in those immoral actions which make divorce justifiable.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is the answer.

Hon. Mr. Euler: The remedy is not to abolish or restrict divorce; the remedy is to use the influence of the church, school and press to bring about a restoration of old-fashioned standards of morality. But that is a pretty difficult job in this day and age. At least two of the opponents of this measure in the Senate have with prodigious energy and research produced statistics galore to prove that divorces are increasing. I am not questioning that fact, but as far as I am concerned the statistics were quite unconvincing and the research done was in the nature of love's labour lost. There is no doubt that divorces are increasing, and if this bill passes they will increase still further. That is one intention of the bill.

The thing which concerns me is not that there may be more divorces, but that divorces shall be given for proper reasons and that innocent people shall have justice done. It has been said that divorce begets divorce, but I have never been able to believe that. If we want some proof to the contrary we need only turn to Nova Scotia, where divorces have been obtainable on the ground of cruelty. Despite this fact the divorce rate in that province has not increased in any greater degree than it has elsewhere in Canada.

Yesterday afternoon a senator told me that he was opposed to this bill, saying that divorce begets divorce. I asked him why, and he replied, "I have two nieces who married, and when one of them got a divorce the other one got one too." I then said to him, "Well, they couldn't get divorces unless there was proper justification, which in our country means adultery on the part of their husbands". To this he replied, "But the divorces were granted in the United States."

There are three chief reasons why there has been an increase in divorce. The first is the common disregard for law and morals and general proprieties, and I think this has come about pretty largely as a result of the two world wars. The present disregard now for law and order did not exist before those wars. The second reason, which is not so strong, is that people are now "divorce conscious". Knowing that divorce can be obtained for the one reason, they come to the courts or to Parliament for relief. The third reason, which is based upon the first, is an increase in infidelity and a disregard for the marriage vows.

I may make one or two philosophical remarks, and while they may not bear directly on this question I shall not be too long. Marriages are not made complete merely by the physical or sexual adjustment of the partners. It takes a great deal more to complete a marriage. There must be genuine affection, consideration, compromise, kindness, good temper and an honest effort by both partners to make the marriage a success.

My friend from "the little island," as it has been called, (Hon. Mr. Barbour), made a very fine speech, and I was glad to learn that he has had an exceptionally happy marriage. I congratulate him on that, for I think he is more fortunate than some men. But the point is that this bill does not strike at the happy marriages. It is just the contrary. It strikes at the shackles that unite in the bonds of misery, cruelty, or desertion, men and women who, under our present law, with their marriage wrecked and hopeless, have no prospect of relief except in death; no opportunity of again having a mate and a family, which is the natural state of all men and women. That is my reason for supporting this bill. The senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) told us the other day that he likes to see people happy. I think it is our duty to do all we can to promote the happiness of people who are not responsible for the state into which they have had to descend in unhappy marriage as a result of cruelty, desertion or something of that kind. Does any intelligent person believe that any man permanently separated from his wife would not seek to satisfy his most urgent instinct, that which is given to him for the perpetuation of the race? And would it not be better to give that man the legal freedom which would enable him to form a happy union?

I was just a bit surprised at the remarks of my friend from Sherbrooke (Hon. Mr. Howard), whom I have known for a great many years. I believe he quoted practically the whole of the marriage service, concluding with the admonition:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

The senators from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) and Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), indicated that these words mean a marriage should not be put asunder by the action of the parties thereto. I shall content myself merely to say that I would hesitate to hold an "omniscient Almighty" responsible for some of the marriages we see in the Senate Committee on Divorce. I say with all reverence that they are no compliment to Him.

Civil marriage, which I believe is not at all religious in its nature, is now permitted in Ontario. Shall we say then that such a marriage comes within the scope of this admonition?

I have no real hope of influencing those who, on religious grounds, believe they have a mandate to oppose divorce on any grounds whatsoever. I have no quarrel with them, but what I do not understand is why, in the case of others, where a great injustice is being done to innocent people which only Parliament can rectify, we should deny them another chance to build a new and happy married life when their present marriage is wrecked beyond repair.

I congratulate the senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) upon introducing this bill. To my mind he is endeavouring to right a great wrong; and whether or not the bill carries on second reading, he has done a service to his country.

I have thought I could not quite agree with one section of the bill which I believe provides that if cruelty, desertion, and incurable insanity become grounds for divorce in Canada, they shall not apply to divorce petitions to Parliament from people of Newfoundland and Quebec. I am not sure, but I think the senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) made some reference to that.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: He suggested an amendment to that effect.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Well, if such an amendment were proposed, I would have to oppose it, for this reason: Today the people of Quebec can obtain a divorce only by travelling, in some cases a considerable distance, to Ottawa, and petitioning Parliament to pass an act, on the grounds of adultery only. If the grounds of desertion, cruelty and insanity were added, the people of Ontario, for instance, could secure divorces through their provincial courts on these additional grounds, but the people of Quebec would be denied the right even to petition Parliament on the wider grounds. That would be an additional discrimination against Quebec, and one to which I would object.

Honourable senators, I wish to advance a submission, with some hesitation, in connection with what I have just said, and I hope my friends from Quebec will understand that I do so in good faith. I have never been able to understand why there should not be in that province courts to deal with applications for divorce. I have no quarrel with the people of Quebec, whether they are Roman Catholics or members of any other sect—for I think some other sects also are opposed to divorce—but I cannot see why other people in that province who may have just ground for divorce under the law of Canada should not be permitted to obtain a divorce as freely as people in other provinces can.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Do you want a definite answer now?

Hon. Mr. Euler: I prefer to continue.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: We in the province of Quebec do not want to break up the family and the hearth and the home.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I have heard that explanation before; in fact, I heard it the other day.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Well, that is the answer.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Your answer will appear in Hansard, and perhaps someone else's reply to it. My point is this: people who are opposed to divorce on religious grounds would not use the courts; but why should other people in Quebec be denied a privilege possessed by their fellow Canadians in eight provinces?

I have nothing more to say, except to sum up my reason for supporting the bill. If courts and conscientious judges can prove that a marriage has resulted in misery, cruelty or desertion, then it is the duty of Parliament to give relief and to provide the parties with a lawful opportunity to find a new partner, to remarry and live decently, respectably and happily. That is denied to them under our present law.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Cairine R. Wilson: Honourable senators, it is very difficult for me to follow in debate so many distinguished lawyers and others who have had long experience as members of the Senate Divorce Committee, but I feel that I would be lacking in duty if I did not voice some support for a bill of which I thoroughly approve. May I say that I took part in the debate in this chamber on the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill of 1938.

In opening the present debate the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) mentioned that desertion had been a ground for divorce in Scotland for more than 300 years, but that there had been no greater number of divorces in Scotland, on that account, than in any other part of the United Kingdom. As a Scotswoman—or at least a descendant of Scots—I should like to believe there were fewer.

Honourable senators, I think it is unfortunate that this bill has had to wait 17 years for its reintroduction here. We owe a debt to the honourable senator from Rosetown for his courage in sponsoring it. The honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly), paid tribute to the hard work and self-sacrifice of the members of the divorce committee. But if he felt that their opinions were of value, I think perhaps he should have shown some respect for this measure, which was introduced first by the late Senator McMeans, of Winnipeg, and lately by the honourable senator from Rosetown, ably supported by the honourable senator from Medicine Hat (Hon. Mr. Gershaw). The honourable senator from Ottawa West referred to certain ancient institutions—to "other times, other manners". While he was doing so, I could not help thinking of an article that I had read many years ago on the status of women, and from which I would like to quote briefly:

> Woman today demands a goodness of her own making, based upon a new set of values, for she realizes that since the early days of patriarchal society, morality laws have been framed for her subjection.
> Among the Jews woman was placed in the same category with a man's ox, ass, and other property, and later with the Christian ecclesiastics she became a temptress and a curse.
> King Ethelred's conception of woman is a good index to the English attitude towards the feminine sex. To him she was a piece of property, to be bought or sold at the caprice of the owner. If a man seduced the wife of another, Ethelred required that the guilty one pay the husband a fine and provide him with another wife. The exact wording of the law is interesting and curious:
> "If a freeman have been familiar with a freeman's wife, let him pay for it with his wergild and provide another wife with his own money and bring her home to the other."

Like the honourable senators from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies), Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck), and Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), I want to see people happy. One of my earliest recollections is of a hard-working woman who used to visit my mother's home from time to time. This woman had been abandoned by her husband and left with several children, but managed to scrape a little money together to support them. The husband would re-appear periodically, beat her up, and go on his way quite happy. Conversely, we had a man in our employ for a very long time who, uncomplaining, endured a virago of a wife. He was an old man before we realized what he had suffered. In those days I do not think it entered anybody's mind that divorce might be a remedy. We felt, rather, that marriage was a tie for all time. Personally, I am among the fortunate ones who enjoy a very happy married life. However, that does not prevent me from understanding the misery which others have endured. Also, honourable senators, I have seen many happy second marriages.

The senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), in his reference to proposals made by the senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross), seemed to think there was a certain merit in the fact that a man or woman from Newfoundland has to come to Ottawa to seek a divorce, even on the present ground. I could not but think that this procedure gave an undue advantage to persons with means over those without means.

Soon after I was appointed to the Senate a woman from Montreal called on me. She had not seen her husband for eighteen years, and she wondered what she could do. I consulted members of the Divorce Committee, and was told there was no help for her unless she took the recourse of submitting a petition for divorce and charged her husband with adultery. This she was loath to do. I had letters from her over a period of some months, but what she eventually did, I do not know.

It has been said there is little public support for the proposed amendments. I should like to put before the house the views of the National Council of Women, which represents a considerable body of public opinion. In 1933 the Council passed the following resolution:

> Resolved, that in the opinion of the National Council of Women all divorces should be registered in the same way as births, marriages and deaths and record of such registration to be available on search as are vital statistics.

In 1947 the Council passed this resolution:

> Whereas under existing laws of the Dominion of Canada a divorce can be granted on the grounds of adultery only; and
> Whereas by virtue of the Criminal Code of Canada, section 308 (3) (b), it is provided that the continual absence of a spouse for a period of seven or more years, during which period the other spouse has not had knowledge that the absent wife or husband was alive during those seven years, constitutes a valid defense to a charge of bigamy;
> Be it resolved that the N.C.W. petition the Governor General in Parliament to pass legislation enabling a husband or wife to obtain a divorce where the plaintiff can establish facts which would constitute a defence to a charge of bigamy in accordance with the provisions of section 308 (3) (b) of the Criminal Code, thereby protecting the legitimacy of the issue of any subsequent marriage which, although not bigamous, would nevertheless under existing law be null and void in the event of the absentee spouse being still alive.

It was moved, seconded and carried that this resolution be sent to Councils for study and consideration at the Spring Executive.

In February 1948 the resolution of 1947 was amended and sent to the Right Honourable Mr. Ilsley, then Minister of Justice, in the following form:

> Whereas under existing laws of the Dominion of Canada a divorce can be granted on the grounds of adultery only; and
> Whereas by virtue of the Criminal Code of Canada, section 308 (3) (b), it is provided that the continual absence of a spouse for a period of seven or more years, during which period the other spouse has not had knowledge that the absent wife or husband was alive during those seven years, constitutes a valid defense to a charge of bigamy;
> Be it resolved that the National Council of Women petition the Governor General in Parliament to pass legislation amending the divorce law in Canada to give the courts, in addition to such grounds as already exist, the power to grant dissolution of marriage upon legal presumption of death.

I recall that in 1938 the present honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) mentioned that he as a young lawyer in Winnipeg had brought to him many cases of blackmail, where one party had been absent for some years and the other party had in good faith remarried, only to have the absent one show up and claim his rights.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to say, except that I endorse what has been said in support of the bill and I hope that it will receive second reading.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Reid, the debate was adjourned.

EXPORTATION OF POWER AND FLUIDS AND IMPORTATION OF GAS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Gray Turgeon moved the second reading of Bill 4, an Act to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas.

He said: Honourable senators, as I was advised this item would not be proceeded with until next week, I am in the position of attempting to make an explanation of the provisions of the bill without the benefit of notes, which I left in my office when I came down to the chamber this afternoon. However, after listening to the glorification of St. Patrick by our honourable friend from Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn), honourable senators may find it in their hearts to overlook any mistakes that I may make. In any event, my lack of notes will serve to shorten my remarks. Incidentally, it occurs to me that if anyone ever presented a bill to provide for the divorcing of a member from the Senate, the most appropriate ground would be cruelty by means of the imposition of long speeches.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Honourable senators, although the explanatory notes in the bill are quite lucid, I should like to make a few general observations.

The bill is designed to revise and consolidate the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act. I may say that the regulation of the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas is in no way concerned with the waters flowing down a river, and therefore this bill is not related to the subject matter of Bill No. 3, which is the subject of some dispute in the House of Commons. The interpretation section of the bill defines "export" as meaning:

(i) with reference to power, to send from Canada by a line of wire or other conductor, and
(ii) with reference to fluids, to send from Canada through pipe lines or other like contrivances;

Among other important changes that will come about if this bill becomes law, is one requiring a licence for the importation of natural and similar gases which, up to the present moment, has been unnecessary.

Another change which the bill would bring about is the removal of the authority, now held by the Canadian Government, to impose export duties with respect to exports of gas, oil and other fluids. When this bill becomes law export duties could be imposed only upon electric power.

During the debate on this bill in the House of Commons, the Right Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that, in the discussions before the Federal Power Commission at Washington having to do with the proposed importation of gas and oil into the United States, the point has been raised that Canada could impede such exports by the imposition of export duties. Well, honourable senators, this bill if it becomes law will take away that authority from the Government of Canada and it will no longer have power to impose an export duty on oil or gas leaving Canada. I sincerely hope that this point will be brought to the attention of our good friends at Washington, through their foreign office and their office dealing with trade and commerce, and particularly to the attention of those responsible for implementation of the provisions of article II of the North Atlantic Treaty. It is of extreme importance that the impediments suggested and actually proposed against importation of oil and gas and other fluids into the United States from Canada should not be put into effect. I think, as was pointed out by the Right Honourable the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the other house, that the elimination of this authority to impose certain export duties will have some material effect upon Washington.

In dealing with this bill the Minister of Trade and Commerce made several potent references. He pointed out that because of the great improvement in the transmission of electric power at higher voltages, potential power formerly inaccessible in far-away areas, such as the Yukon Territory, could soon become accessible. As a matter of fact I take a great deal of pride, as do other senators from British Columbia, in the recent statement made by the Minister that there is now under construction in British Columbia a line that will soon be transmitting at nearly 350,000 volts. He stated that this will be the highest transmission voltage on the North American continent.

There are two matters I would like to bring to the attention of the house in connection with proposed exportation of our natural gas into the United States that could be brought about by action of the Federal Power Commission at Washington. The first is, that there is now under immediate consideration at Washington the importation of gas from Western Canada through Winnipeg, by the Northern Natural Gas Company, to supply certain parts of the United States, decision on which matter is being delayed because of a doubt in the minds of the members of the Federal Power Commission as to the certainty of having that gas ready for export through Winnipeg. Secondly, there is the question of the export of natural gas from the Peace River District of both British Columbia and Alberta into the United States. I sincerely hope that when this question comes up again the passing of this legislation taking away from the Government the ability to impede export of gas from Canada through the imposition of an export duty will have an effect, and make it more certain that the Westcoast Transmission Company will secure the right to have its product sold to American companies and sent across the boundary.

Honourable senators, there is nothing further that I need say, except that if this bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to a committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If the bill is to be referred to committee, I have nothing to say on it at this time. I want it to go to committee, because I would like to hear the experts give their ideas about it and explain its details. As I understand it, the bill received practically unanimous consent in the other place, and my advice from friends there is that it is entirely satisfactory. However, I still would like to have the experts come and tell us exactly what it does, because these are very touchy questions just at the present time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Turgeon moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Honourable senators, could this bill not be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications? Some honourable senators seem to think that the Senate has only one committee, Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: It might be referred to the Natural Resources Committee.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: There is no transport problem involved in this bill—it deals with the right to export.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: It deals with the right to transport gas and fluid.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: No, it deals with permission to export.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he has any suggestion on the matter?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Far be it from me to amend the motion of the honourable senator who explained the bill (Hon. Mr. Turgeon).

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS

WESTSPUR PIPE LINE COMPANY—
SECOND READING

Hon. James A. MacKinnon moved the second reading of Bill N-9, an Act to incorporate Westspur Pipe Line Company.

He said: Honourable senators, the development of oil production in the four Western provinces has resulted in the discovery of oil fields which straddle provincial boundaries. In addition, production of oil has been and will be obtained from two or more fields on both sides of and in close proximity to provincial boundaries, and their location will require the construction of pipe line gathering systems crossing provincial boundaries. Furthermore, branch lines leading from the pipe line gathering systems in the fields may cross provincial boundaries en route to main trunk pipe lines, such as Interprovincial Pipe Line and Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line. The main trunk pipe line companies operating in Canada presently do not and perhaps would not find it desirable in the future to construct and operate such pipe line gathering systems and branch lines. Their construction and operation is usually carried out by smaller companies formed by the producing interests in the oil fields served thereby.

It is anticipated that a number of such pipe line gathering systems or branch lines crossing provincial boundaries in the four Western provinces will be required in the near future. One immediate possibility is the construction of a pipe line from Alida, Saskatchewan, to the Interprovincial Pipe Line system at Cromer, Manitoba. A secondary possibility in the future is the construction of a pipe line across the British Columbia-Alberta provincial boundary to accommodate deliveries from the Peace River area.

Section 10A of the Pipe Lines Act, which was enacted by Parliament on December 16, 1953, prohibits any person, other than a person having authority under a special act, from constructing or operating an extra-provincial pipe line, which is defined in section 2, subsection (cc), as meaning a pipe line for the transportation of oil or gas connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces or extending beyond the limits of a province. By reason of the above section the proposed special act company is therefore required for the purpose of constructing and operating small pipe line gathering systems or branch lines which cross provincial boundaries.

The draft bill substantially follows the pattern of the act incorporating Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, 13 George VI, chapter 34, which received royal assent on April 30, 1949, and all other subsequent acts incorporating pipe line companies.

If this bill should have second reading, I shall propose that it be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 22, at 8 p.m.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

TERRITORIAL LANDS BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh moved the second reading of Bill E, an Act to amend the Territorial Lands Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the Territorial Lands Act has to do with the Crown lands in the Yukon Territory, as well as the Northwest Territories. This bill would repeal subsection (2) of section 5 of the act, which reads as follows:

No territorial lands shall be sold until a plan of survey thereof has been approved by the Surveyor General.

The purpose of this amendment is to permit sales of territorial land prior to a survey having been made. It has been found that after an application to purchase has been made, the usual minimum time for the making of a survey is approximately two years, and it has often been as long as three or four years.

Hon. Mr. Howden: How is the purchaser going to know his own land if it is not surveyed?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: He will stake it out as he would a mining claim, by putting a stake in each corner, if it is rectangular or square, and if not by putting a stake at each point, so that a line can be drawn from one stake to the other signifying the boundaries of the land which he wishes to purchase.

After the applicant has staked the land he proposes to buy and has made application to purchase it, the agent in charge of that area will send an appraiser to look over the land and value it. An agreement of sale can then be drawn up and a tentative price set. As soon as possible a surveyor will go over the land and survey it. If any change in the boundaries results from the survey the price may have to be adjusted, but no patent will be issued until after the survey is made.

If the bill passes and subsection 2 of section 5 of the present act is repealed, section 4 of the present act will govern. That section reads as follows:

Subject to this act, the Governor in Council may authorize the sale, lease or other disposition of territorial lands and may make regulations authorizing the minister to sell, lease or otherwise dispose of territorial lands subject to such limitations and conditions as the Governor in Council may prescribe.

The effect of the bill would be to speed up the process after an application to purchase land has been made.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator a question? After a person or company has made application to purchase a piece of land and has staked it out, would anybody else have a chance to buy it?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: If the amount at which the land is valued by the appraiser is satisfactory to the applicant, he has the first chance to purchase the land.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask a question? Is the Government obliged to sell land that has been staked out, or may it refuse to sell the land to anybody?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Under the regulations the Governor in Council does not have to sell any land; however, the regulations state that certain sections of certain territories are subject to sale, if a price can be agreed upon.

If there are no further questions, honourable senators, I think that is sufficient explanation. If I may, I would suggest that it is unnecessary that this bill be considered in committee.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask the honourable senator if he has any idea of the number of acres of land which are subject to sale in the way he has described?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Well, actually most of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon are available under certain conditions for mining or otherwise. At the present time the main reason why there are so many applications to purchase land is that people are searching for oil.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Does the sale of lands there carry with it oil rights and mineral rights?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: It may, and the Governor in Council may set the amount of royalties that will be charged.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Is it the intention of the honourable senator to move that this bill be sent to committee?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Not unless some honourable senator thinks that is necessary. It seems to me that it is quite easy to understand the purpose of this bill: it is simply to speed up the sale of lands. The bill would make no change in the regulations governing the sale of lands, except to provide that sales can be made prior to surveys of the lands. But stakes would have to be driven in and lines drawn, so as to have the lands clearly defined. In most cases the price is set at so much per acre. Under certain conditions the price charged for some lands could be so much per square foot, or on a frontage basis; but generally speaking, the price is set at so much per acre.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Perhaps some explanation could be made in committee of why it should take two or three years to survey a piece of land.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I think I can explain that. The way it was explained to me is that there is a shortage of surveyors and it is not customary to send a surveyor to survey just one piece of land. The surveyor generally waits until he has several pieces of land to survey in a certain district. As far as the government is concerned, the purchaser must pay for the survey, and honourable senators will realize that to send a surveyor to survey land in this territory is quite an expensive proposition.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Can the land be used before it is surveyed?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman from Bruce (Hon. Mr. Stambaugh) has explained the bill very fully and we appreciate the trouble he has taken to familiarize himself with its details. I feel, however, that honourable senators would like to ask more questions and also to have an opportunity of getting information from departmental officials. In the circumstances he will perhaps suggest that it should go to committee.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Stambaugh, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 17, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, it is with great hesitation that I rise to speak on this bill. I had not intended to speak when I heard the explanations made by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) on the motion for second reading, but after listening to the speeches that have been made, and after hearing some innuendoes going around the corridors that those of us who are against the bill are against it because of some command from somewhere or perhaps because of favouring some church, I decided to come boldly before the Senate tonight and give my own views. I am bowing to no one when I say right now that I intend to vote against the bill.

I have heard charges of inconsistency. Well perhaps I am one of the old fashioned kind, as I am trying to be consistent. When the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill came before the House of Commons in 1938 I was one of the sixteen who are now in this chamber who voted against the bill in that house.

I was rather surprised that in all the speeches that have been made on the bill before us no mention whatsoever has been made of a bill introduced by the honourable senator from Vancouver-South (Hon. Mr. Farris) in 1943. Also I was not a little surprised when the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert), in speaking on the bill now under consideration, said he was going to vote for it, since the Senate Debates of 1943-44 show that on April 13, 1943, he voted against that bill introduced by the honourable senator from Vancouver-South, by which it was proposed or intended to open the grounds for divorce a little bit.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Would my honourable friend state the title of the bill that the honourable senator from Vancouver-South introduced in 1943? It had no relation whatever to what is being considered now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was a bill to widen the grounds for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: No, it was a different bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It was a bill to widen the grounds of divorce a little bit, and the record shows that you voted against that bill.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: It is not fair at all to make a comparison between the two bills.

Hon. Mr. Reid: You may say it is not fair, but I am drawing the comparison and I am entitled to my opinion.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: There is no basis for such a comparison.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I have read the record. So far as I am concerned I am being consistent, because in 1938 I voted against the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill in the House of Commons, and I intend to vote against it here when it comes to a vote.

May I say, honourable senators, that I do not stand on the same platform as those connected with the Roman Catholic Church, because I am in favour of divorce for the one act laid down in Holy Writ: that is, for adultery. I realize that there are clerics and others who may take the opposite view from mine, but since the days of my youth I have read carefully the words of Christ.

Divorce is not a new matter. If you look up Deuteronomy and read the laws laid down by Moses concerning adultery and man's attitude toward woman, shall I say, you will find that the problem then was just the same as it is today. As a matter of fact, I am one of those who hold strongly to the belief that although we have airplanes, television and all sorts of wonderful things in the world today, man and mankind are just the same as in the days of Moses—exactly the same, with all the loves, all the hates, the good points and the bad points. Generally speaking, people have not changed one iota.

And that is where I think many of the speeches have gone wrong. Some splendid speeches have been made here, but I was a little surprised by the position of the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I really thought he was going to vote against the bill, because he had such a nice story to tell about love and the home—the home being the foundation of the country—yet when he came to the end of his speech he said he was going to vote for the bill.

I have been looking up Hansard and burning the midnight oil, and I find it was nothing unusual for senators in 1938 and 1943 to get up and talk about holy matrimony and the home being the foundation of the country, and yet vote contrary to what they had said. One very nice speech, which was made on March 15, 1938, is worth repeating here. I wonder if you can guess who made these remarks:

> The home is the whole basis of civilization. Without it we cannot survive. One country has made a trial—

That was Russia.

> —and has been compelled to retrace its steps. Therefore all who feel that they are at a very sacred point when dealing with legislation which invades the home are going to be very careful of the exact steps they take. In a word, you cannot get a law which is fair to the individual and is not going to result in the disintegration of the home. If we make our laws broad enough to cover all cases—to provide fair and just treatment for the poor woman who is deserted, for the poor woman whose husband is a drunkard, for the poor man whose wife has run away, for the poor man whose wife has become insane—we get to a point where the fortifications of the home are gone.

I agree. But who, do you think, made that speech? No less a person than the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen. The strange thing about it was that when the bill came to a vote, he voted for it. That is something difficult to understand.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I understood him to say that bills to amend the divorce law were before the Senate in 1938 and in 1943.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Was the bill of 1943 concerned with divorce, or merely a change of domicile?

Hon. Mr. Reid: So far as my reading of it goes, it was a divorce bill.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I think not. According to my remembrance, it dealt with change of domicile.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Just a matter of procedure.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The bill was called the "Presumption of Death and Dissolution of Marriage Bill".

Hon. Mr. Lambert: It did not seek to broaden the grounds for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I differ from the honourable senator. I think it did. If marriage may be dissolved because of the disappearance of one of the spouses, and that is not a divorce proceeding, I would like to know what it is. To contend it is not is just quibbling. Speaking also as a layman, I assert that to permit dissolution of marriage on this ground is to widen the scope of this country's divorce laws. I have not had time to read the entire report of the debate in 1943, but I notice that the bill was presented by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris).

A good many Bible quotations were presented in 1938. The honourable senator from Vancouver South presented a number of others in his speech of 1943, and we have heard one or two more in the course of the present debate. I took it upon myself to interrupt the honourable senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. Howard) when he quoted the passage:

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

I asked on that occasion, and I ask again, why he did not quote from the Gospel of St. Matthew, chapter 5, verse 32. Christ said:

> But I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery.

Does that strengthen the case for what we are asked to do under this bill? From the days of my youth that passage has been interpreted as supporting the law as it stands in Canada and the Presbyterian Church has stood firm on that ground and the maintenance of one of the laws of Moses. In the days of the Mosaic law, and all through subsequent ages, people have realized that man is polygamous by nature. Perhaps some honourable senators will not admit that, but it is a fact, and because our ancestors recognized it they provided safeguards for the home. In the days of ancient Israel rapists were not taken to court, they were stoned to death: there was quick action in those days. Separations of various kinds were allowed, but the outstanding separation was a bill of divorcement for adultery.

Hon. Mr. Horner: When a woman was taken in adultery, she escaped because Our Lord said "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her."

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is another incident, which has no bearing on the point. The evidence on that occasion was different from the proceedings nowadays, because there the woman was caught in the act. In those days they were up to date,—very much so. They knew better how to handle erring members of the human race than we do. I was rather astonished at some of the remarks of the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner), because they contrasted with the excellence of his closing remarks about conditions of life today and evidences of decay in the home.

Hon. Mr. Horner: I merely mentioned that, as the Bible was quoted to the effect that man should not put asunder whom God had joined together, it should be remembered that we are also enjoined to keep the Sabbath day holy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) has the floor. He must not be interrupted except, with his consent, to be asked a question.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Let him quote me correctly.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, although I do not mind interruptions. However, the Senate's rules must be maintained.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) made reference to the fact that cruelty is a ground for divorce in the province of Nova Scotia. Two other honourable senators referred to Scotland. I think they overlooked the relevant facts in this connection from both Nova Scotia and Scotland. There are in Scotland moral laws which, though not on the statute books, are far stronger than any written law. At one time, if a man intended to marry, all he had to do was to say, before two witnesses, to the woman of his choice, "Will you take me for your lawful husband?" and if she said "Yes" they were married. Somebody may ask, could they get divorced with equal ease? They certainly could not, because the unwritten moral laws of my native land would not allow it. I do not know as much about Nova Scotia as do the honourable senators from that province, but I would hazard a guess that there are unwritten moral laws there which are as effective in preventing people from doing certain things as are the unwritten laws of Scotland. It is the effectiveness of these rules of conduct, not embodied in any statute, governing marriage and the relations of men and women, which should be seriously taken into consideration when the broadening of divorce jurisdiction is recommended. I recall a time, in the days of my youth, when if a Scotswoman entered a public house she would almost have to leave the city because her reputation was destroyed; she was looked upon more or less as a harlot. Another rule in effect when I was young was that if, when a man was courting a girl, it was found that tuberculosis existed in the family, the engagement was broken. And no one, in my young days, would have dared to parade the streets, as some street-walkers we know of are doing in this country.

I join with those who have pointed out there are many things done nowadays that were not done years ago. However, some people call this a new age, an advanced age, and are inclined to say that people like myself are old-fashioned. Nevertheless, I abide by my early faith, realizing that the human race is just the same as it always has been and that men and women still have the same basic weaknesses. They say we are living in a new age. Well, I would not be at all surprised to hear of even more alarming developments in our divorce laws, for I have just been reading that women are now claiming a certain right. I was rather surprised to read that women have given birth to test-tube babies.

An Hon. Senator: To what?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Test-tube babies. In other words, it has been reported that women have given birth by means of artificial insemination, and married women giving birth to these babies claim they are not committing adultery. That is just an illustration of what a fast age we are living in. The latest statistics show that Canadian citizens spent some $870 million on alcoholic beverages last year yet in face of this sort of thing we are being asked to widen the grounds for divorce and, in effect, make it easier to untie the bonds of matrimony.

Honourable senators, I do not feel I can go that far. Is the law the only place where we should look for guidance or help? I am not ashamed to say that I intend to continue taking my guidance from the Good Book. I think people of this generation would be better off and would have happier homes if they were to pay more attention to the Good Book and spend much less time indulging in the merry life that some of them are leading. Some honourable senators have said it is the duty of the Church and our educational systems to foster happy homes, but parents are leaving too much to these institutions and are not doing enough themselves to control their children. There is a definite lack of discipline in the modern home, and the members of the Joint Committee on Capital and Corporal Punishment and Lotteries have been told that many parents no longer believe in giving youngsters the strap. Nevertheless, I think the old adage, "Spare the rod and spoil the child" applies equally to the children of today.

Honourable senators, the people of Canada should give serious thought to where they are going, especially when they spend what amounts to $58 per capita on alcoholic beverages. Surely that must cause some distress.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What has that got to do with this bill?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am glad my honourable friend has asked that question. He has served on the Senate Divorce Committee for a long time and I should like to ask him if it is not true that quite a proportion of those who come before the Senate Divorce Committee are alcoholics?

Hon Mr. Haig: No.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am glad to hear they are not. If they are not helping to consume some of that $870 million worth of liquor, who is?

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Where does it come from?

Hon. Mr. Reid: The $870 million?

Hon. Mr. McKeen: No, the Scotch.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Honourable senators, I have little further to say, but if a vote takes place on the second reading of this bill it is going to be interesting to see how certain honourable senators vote. I refer to those who, as members of the other house, voted as I did on the divorce measure sent by the Senate to the House of Commons in 1938. Were they right in 1938 when they helped to throw that bill out, or will they be right if they vote in favour of the present bill? On that occasion I took a certain stand and when I went back to my constituency for re-election I had no trouble; the proposed changes in the divorce law could not have been an urgent demand in my constituency, and I do not think they were anywhere throughout the length and breadth of the country. I doubt if there is any great agitation for the present bill. There is no doubt that all kinds of pitiful cases can be cited. We all know of them, and some of the most pitiful cases I know of involve approximately 1,000 soldiers who brought back wives from Korea and the Orient. There is little doubt that many of those marriages will have to be dealt with in days to come. These soldiers and their wives may be in love to begin with, but when the children born from these mixed marriages are growing up and find themselves isolated, perhaps the husbands will not feel so keen on living with their Korean or Japanese wives as they did when they were in Korea or Japan.

I am taking my stand against this legislation now, and I do not want anyone to accuse me of catering to any church or party whip or say that I am fearful that the issue will have to be turned down in the other house. As I said before, I voted against a similar measure in 1938. I take my moral code from the Good Book and from the words of Christ:

> But I say unto you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery.

I know I am on safe ground when I say that I intend to stand by that injunction from Holy Writ and Christ himself.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I would infinitely prefer not to speak on this controversial issue, particularly as I find myself in disagreement with many honourable senators whose opinions in most matters seem to me very sound, and whose judgments I value highly indeed. After the powerful and learned speeches that we have had on both sides in this debate I certainly hesitate even more to take part in this discussion, and I am sure that I shall not be able to hold the attention of honourable members as the last speaker has done.

Honourable senators, I also intend to vote against this bill, and I hope that when you have heard my reasons you will realize I am voting from conviction. I would like to state some of the reasons why I have come to my decision. To state them all would repeat some of the arguments already made, and to reply to all the statements made in favour of the bill with which I do not agree would be very tiresome for all honourable senators. I propose to deal with only the reasons why I cannot support the principle of the bill at this time. I do not intend to deal with any particular sections, although there are many arguments I could advance against individual sections, which I will bring forward if the bill is given second reading and referred to committee.

May I say first that this bill has caused me much heart searching and many wakeful hours, owing to the fact that I realized the sincerity of the belief of the honourable gentleman from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) that this bill would improve the situation in Canada in regard to divorce. Because I believe in his sincerity I would have liked to give him my support, but on account of my own personal beliefs, I cannot do so. My own personal beliefs regarding marriage and divorce are, I suppose based on the long and happy marriage of my parents, and my own equally happy, if shorter, one, as well as the teaching of the Church of England, to which I belong. Those beliefs have made me feel that the vows taken at the altar, when two people plight their troth for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health until death shall part them, are only really dissoluble by the death of one or the other.

Honourable senators, I had not intended to refer to religion, but I am somewhat confused about the application of the quotation by the honourable senator from Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner). If he believes that the Christian religion has nothing to say on this matter, I would tell him that he should read the bulletin of the Council of the Social Service of the Church of England in Canada regarding marriage and divorce, and not only its bulletin on capital punishment, to which he referred, and he would learn that the Church of England has much to say on the subject of divorce. To quote the words attributed to President Coolidge in the story that the honourable gentleman related, the church is "against it."

The statement of the honourable senator from Rosetown that the Anglican bishops supported the Matrimonial Causes Bill of Britain, in 1937, rather startled me, and I did some research on the matter. I find that some bishops did support the bill, while others abstained from voting. May I read a statement regarding this made by the Lord Archbishop of York, in a debate in the House of Lords, on November 23, 1950? The debate concerned a bill to enlarge the divorce laws of England so that divorce could be granted on the grounds of seven years absence, or separation of the parties, even though there had been no marital offence whatever. A number of excellent speeches were made. During the course of the debate the Lord Archbishop of York referred to the Matrimonial Causes Bill of 1937, and he said:

> The atmosphere today is very different from what it was when the so-called "Herbert Act" was passed. At that time, undoubtedly, in the country there was a strong demand for increased facilities for divorce. The demand was so strong that I do not see how any Government, to whatever party it belonged, in a democratic country could have refused it.

May I interject, honourable senators, to say that I do not think the situation in Canada is analogous to that at all at the present time.

The Lord Archbishop continued:

> We on these benches regretted the demand. We recognized it, and we felt that it was unreasonable to expect that the laws of the church should apply to a nation which very largely rejected some of the fundamental views of Christian faith. Therefore, we did not offer from these benches any very strong opposition to these facilities for divorce, provided that we were allowed to administer our own discipline to our own members under our own rules.
> Today, however, the position is entirely different.

It must be remembered that he was speaking some years after the Matrimonial Causes Bill of 1937 had been in effect.

He went on to say:

> Today, the country as a whole is shocked at the very large number of divorces, and the large number of broken homes. Not even the most pessimistic opponent of the Herbert Act would have ventured to suggest that there might be something like 50,000 divorces in a year. The anxiety in the country today is not how to increase the grounds for divorce, but how to decrease divorce. We have been told again and again lately that a large number of our social problems today arise from the broken homes: report after report on delinquency goes back to the broken home. I agree with much that the noble Lord said. I agree that divorces are not in themselves the cause of the broken home, but that the divorce is the result of the broken home. But when there are easy facilities for divorce, then the whole idea of marriage becomes weakened and undermined, and marriage is no longer regarded as a sacrament, as a lifelong union, but as a contract which may more or less be easily broken. When once we have that atmosphere in the country, then divorces are bound to increase—and that is what is happening at the present time.

I agree with the distinguished senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) that we are not discussing whether or not we should have divorce in Canada, because divorce on the ground of adultery is now the law of Canada. However, with the beliefs and the convictions that I have on this matter, I hesitate to support a bill to enlarge the grounds beyond those in effect unless I am convinced that such a bill would improve the present unsatisfactory situation in Canada regarding divorce, and I am still not convinced, despite the very persuasive arguments by the proponents of the bill.

The honourable senator from Vancouver South said, as reported at page 288 of Hansard:

> I have never had in my practice, and I cannot believe that any member of the Senate who is a lawyer has ever had a suggestion that the possibility of a future divorce was in the least degree a factor in causing those people to get married in an irresponsible way.

A little farther on he said:

> It is a little hard for those of us who were not in England during the war years to get a full picture of the conditions there.

His reason for saying that was that there had been so many divorces in England, and apparently it had been suggested that easy divorce was responsible for the growing number of divorces. The honourable senator continued:

> They were very different from conditions in this country. Over on that little island were a lot of mighty attractive girls, . . .

He goes on to give a very pretty picture, although he had first said that it was a little hard for us to imagine what was happening over there. Finally, the honourable senator asked:

> What in the world did the possibility of divorce have to do with those conditions?

Well, although the honourable senator from Vancouver South is very persuasive, I feel that a statement by Lord Iddesleigh, who was in England at that time, is better evidence. I should like to read from a speech he made in the same debate in which the Archbishop of York spoke.

Lord Iddesleigh said:

> I believe that the existence of cheap and easy divorce has done a great deal to undermine the foundations of marriage in this country. During the war my Staff duties compelled me to see a certain amount of the correspondence which was sent to the War Office in substantiation of divorce procedure under the services scheme. Much of that correspondence—which fortunately I did not have to deal with, but merely to forward—made one deeply pitiful. Also, I formed the impression, from reading a number of letters, that a substantial number of our fellow countrymen were contracting marriage with no intention of its being permanent.

I am sure they would not have been able to enter into a marriage contract without any intention of its being permanent, had the laws of England not permitted divorce for desertion and on other grounds which the bill now before us sets out.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Why not?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Well, if that had not been the law, they would not have had easy divorce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is hardly what you said.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I am sorry, but that is what I intended to say. May I make it clear? Lord Iddesleigh said that after reading many letters he formed the impression that a substantial number of his countrymen were contracting marriages with no intention of their being permanent. I say they could not have done so had there not been provision for easy divorce.

Hon. Mr. Farris: What would those persons have done?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Probably they would not have married at all.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Let her make her speech.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Am I permitted to speak?

The Hon. the Speaker: With permission of the honourable senator who has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: With the honourable senator's permission, I should like to ask this question. If I understood correctly, the quotation from Lord Iddlesleigh's speech, it was to the effect that certain marriages were undertaken without an intention of their lasting. I would ask the honourable senator if she is satisfied that Lord Iddesleigh was justified in saying what he did.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I am a little confused by the question.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: If I may say so, I think the statement made by Lord Iddesleigh at that time was entirely unjustified and carries no conviction whatever.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: My honourable friend may be quite right, but to my mind the statement by Lord Iddesleigh, who was in England at the time and who dealt with these cases as part of his work, carries more weight than does the statement by the honourable senator from Vancouver South who only imagined what conditions were like over there.

Honourable senators, my short experience on the Divorce Committee of the Senate has been a very illuminating one. It has made me aware of many sad cases which have come here for consideration. I would be less than human, and certainly undeserving of the name woman, if I were not touched by the pity and pathos of many of these cases. I know there must be an equally large proportion of sad cases coming before the provincial divorce courts.

However, I do not believe that without what I would consider adequate study we should, in an effort to alleviate individual cases of hardship, enact laws that may create worse conditions than those they were designed to improve. Anyone who has administered or enforced public laws—and I have done both—cannot help but realize that with even the best laws and the most careful and fair administration possible there are always some cases of hardship resulting from them. Even under the excellent administration of the Old Age Security Act, many cases of hardship may be found. As was so often said in the debates in England that it was regarded as a cliché, "Hard cases make bad law". Honourable senators, although my pity is aroused by many cases we hear, I cannot be so blind as not to realize that there are always two sides to a case, and that in all probability the so-called innocent party should bear some, and at times a very large, share of the blame for the break-up of the marriage. I recently read a most interesting essay under the title "The Myth of the Innocent Spouse".

Honourable senators, there are two outstanding reasons why I cannot support this bill at the present time. First, at page 214 of Hansard the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) is reported as stating that after the English bill was passed in 1937 the Law Clerk of the Senate was instructed to draw a bill for Canada and to make the grounds the same as those in England. I would ask the honourable senator if I am correct in that summary of his statement.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The bill was to be similar to the one passed in England, but I would not say exactly the same.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I understood you to say the Canadian bill was to be the same as the English bill, and in my study of them they appear to be the same.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: They are practically the same.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: The English bill, known as the Herbert Bill, which became the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, implemented recommendations made by a royal commission that took evidence from 1908 to 1912. Its report was made in 1912, some forty-three years ago. The bill was not passed until 1937, or twenty-five years later. True, this matter was debated in the House of Commons between 1912 and 1937, but so far as I could learn—and I have done considerable research on it—no evidence was taken between 1912 and 1937.

In 1950, after the English act had been in force for thirteen or fourteen years, Lord Mancroft moved in the House of Lords for a commission to inquire into the confused state of the law regarding marriage, separation and divorce. Other demands had been made in the House of Commons for changes in the law, and in July, 1951, as the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) told us, a royal commission, whose chairman is Lord Morton of Henryton, was appointed to inquire into the matter. That commission has not yet made its report.

Great social and economical changes have taken place in Great Britain since the Royal Commission of 1908-1912 made its report in 1912, and great changes have taken place over there even since 1937, particularly since the war. I think it is quite understandable that the recommendations made at that time may not be suitable for the 1950's, and it is quite reasonable that before the British Parliament decides upon any changes in the divorce law an investigation should be made in the light of present conditions.

But, honourable senators, have not similar social and economic changes taken place in Canada since 1912 and since 1937? And should we not take such changes into consideration before we alter our laws regarding such basic and important matters as marriage and divorce? I do not believe that we should adopt without a very thorough investigation a bill which is actually based on recommendations considered by a Royal Commission as suitable for Britain 43 years ago. Particularly I feel we should pause before doing so in view of the fact that after the act had been in effect in that country for thirteen years the Government, on considerable pressure from members of both houses who complained that the law was confused, has appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into it. Honourable senators, do you not think it is a step in the dark for us to accept as suitable for Canada an act the suitability of which for England is now under investigation.

I would like to point out to honourable senators that before any change was considered in the law of Canada relating to capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was set up to study these matters and to hear evidence. This committee sat for one session and is sitting now for its second session. I hope it will be the last one, because I am on it. As I say, the committee is hearing evidence now for the second session, in spite of the fact that there were available recommendations of a British Royal Commission on capital punishment which presented its report to the Government as late as September 1953. There was also a British Royal Commission on corporal punishment that made recommendations in 1938. Also, a British Royal Commission on betting, lotteries and gaming made recommendations to the Government in March 1951. These recommendations, which are certainly reasonably up to date, have taken into consideration social and economic changes over the past forty years. Yet their conclusions and recommendations were not considered acceptable for adoption by Canada without further investigation. Now I admit that the matter of changes in our laws regarding capital punishment, corporal punishment and lotteries are very important, but I do not think they are nearly so basic as changes in the laws regarding marriage and divorce.

The honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) stated that we often adopt English laws. He mentioned, as reported on page 302 of Hansard, that we adopted the English Bills of Exchange Act. I looked up the speeches made when that bill was before our Parliament, and I would like to read to honourable senators from the Commons Hansard of January 28, 1890, when Sir John Thompson moved the second reading of Bill No. 6 relating to bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes. He said:

> The House will remember that this bill was introduced early last session, and that considerable progress was made with it. Before its introduction, even then, it had been fully distributed throughout the country, among institutions immediately connected with commerce; not only to the banks, but to chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and to any person who manifested interest in the subject. That distribution resulted in a number of suggestions, more or less valuable, emanating from banking institutions and persons connected with trade and commerce. Those amendments and suggestions were eventually incorporated in the bill brought before the House...

I do not think I need to read all the particulars. The statement goes on to say that after these suggestions had been incorporated the bill was again circulated to a large number of people and when no further suggestions were made it was decided to adopt that bill.

Well I submit, honourable senators, that we have done nothing similar to that in relation to the divorce bill we are now considering. We have not asked any organizations, welfare groups, or any people who deal with divorce cases what they think of our bill, so I submit that the analogy is not very good. I thought the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity was going to correct me?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: No, you are entirely correct. But may I ask a question? Would it not be a good idea to let this bill go to committee, where we could make whatever inquiry we wished?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: That is not my idea, and I think if the honourable senator will let me continue he will see what I have in mind as an alternative.

I cannot agree with the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris), when he says, as reported on page 293 of Hansard, that we have had ample time to study this matter because a similar bill was passed by this house in 1938 and has been a live topic ever since. Many of us who sit here today did not know until the present bill was introduced that such a bill had been passed in the Senate eighteen years ago. From the records it would appear, if I did not make a mistake in counting, that only sixteen of the present members were members of the Senate at that time. The honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), who was a member of the House of Commons in 1938, is reported on page 213 of Hansard as stating that he did not remember it coming before that house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There was only one speech made on that bill in the House of Commons, and it lasted about ten minutes.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I do not doubt that is true, but he did not remember it. It would scarcely be expected that senators who had not been members of either house would recall the matter. Certainly I for one had not been studying the problem before this bill was introduced, and I am sure others are in the same position.

It would seem to be logical that before we decide on changes in the law of divorce we should either have a committee or commission take evidence and investigate the undoubted inadequacy and possible improvement of our divorce laws. If we do not wish to do this it would seem at least reasonable that we should take no action until we have studied the recommendations of the Royal Commission appointed in England in 1951.

Honourable senators, I would like to make some reference to what is being done in the United States.

In 1944 a national conference on family life was set up. In 1947 it had a noteworthy meeting at the White House, in which 135 organizations, representing some 40 million people, participated. They came from every field of social work,—education, religion, medicine and psychiatry, child care, labour organizations, law and legal aid. The American Bar Association accepted responsibility for the legal section of this meeting, and a report, known as the Smith Report, was prepared by the Bar Association's committee, headed by Reginald H. Smith of Boston.

The book from which I am reading is called Children of Divorce by J. Louise Despert; the page is 224. It states:

> The Smith Report minced no words in characterizing the present state of the divorce laws:
> "(1) That our present divorce laws are producing widespread evils and (2) that our laws in the field of domestic relations, instead of constituting a bulwark, are themselves a continuing threat to the stability of marriage in contemporary America."
>
> The primary change recommended by the Smith Report is in the approach to divorce: The premise should be not punishment but prevention.
> To this end the report takes a leaf from the juvenile courts, which first recognized that with child offenders against the law punishment presents more problems than it solves. The juvenile courts function on the principles of prevention and therapy, and use the resources of the social and psychiatric sciences to deal with the conditions which contribute to delinquent behaviour. Says the committee:
> "We suggest handling our unhappy and delinquent spouses much as we handle our delinquent children. Often their behaviour is not unlike that of a delinquent child, and for much the same reasons. We would take them out of the quasi-criminal divorce court and deal with them and their problems in a socialized court . . . Instead of determining whether a spouse has misbehaved and then 'punishing' him by rewarding the aggrieved spouse with a divorce decree we would follow the general pattern of the juvenile court and endeavor to diagnose and treat, to discover the fundamental cause, then bring to bear all available resources to remove or rectify it."

And at page 227:

> In the Smith Report the American Bar Association spoke out for the first time as a body on the problem of divorce in our courts. Its recommendations were both sound enough and conservative enough to win public support. A vast mass of publicity in the press of the nation greeted the report—all of it favourable, according to Chairman Smith.

One of the committee's recommendations was that the President appoint a commission. However, President Truman declined to do so. Then the American Bar Association Special Committee, with the co-operation of a group of national welfare organizations, organized the Interprofessional Commission on Marriage and Divorce Laws, of which Judge Alexander is chairman.

Judge Alexander wrote:

> The research upon which it is expected to base a model act is going forward under the guidance of Dr. John S. Bradway, of the Law Faculty of Duke University, which has been made research headquarters for the entire project . . . The various phases of the research have been or are being farmed out to law schools throughout the country.

I like that approach to the problem of our divorce laws and the present unsatisfactory situation. Either, I think we should have a commission or a committee, or await the report of the English Commission. If a commission or a committee should be appointed to investigate the matter at the present time, it might well take into consideration, among other things, the newer concept, that divorce be made a matter of conciliation. This idea, it will be found, runs through a great many of the books and essays dealing with this subject. No doubt such a commission for the investigation of the matter would take into consideration the idea that divorce be made a conciliation matter, and that the first hearings, in any case of marital troubles, should involve consultations between social workers, psychiatrists, lawyers and other professional workers who would form a tribunal to attempt to rehabilitate the family. Only after adequate time and adequate efforts had been made, and failed, would a petition for divorce be permitted.

It seems to me that the procedure might follow somewhat that which is provided for under other statutes. One which comes to my mind is the Farmers Creditors' Arrangement Act, under which the Official Receiver was only an arbitrator between the parties, having no power to enforce rulings, but the parties had to make an attempt at agreement before him prior to having recourse to a court. Some of my friends who are much better versed in the law than I am may claim that this is merely a matter of procedure, but I submit that it is the sort of procedure which should be included in any law relating to conciliation procedure in divorce which we are asked to pass. I would infinitely prefer to see Canada strike out on a new method of approach to this problem, which we all recognize is a serious one, than follow recommendations made for another country about forty years ago, and implemented about eighteen years ago; the more so as they have not worked out too satisfactorily in the country which adopted them.

The suggestion I have made of a tribunal is not the only one which could be considered. Many other ideas might be brought forward if there were some body to whom they could be presented. I believe, honourable senators, that if we have patience and give the matter sufficient study we can find a better and more modern way to treat the divorce problem than through the bill now before us.

I was rather intrigued by a simile used by the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly). He said that the conditions which lead to divorce are a cancer on the body social. I was also interested to hear the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) say that he considered the simile a very good one. He added, however, that in certain circumstances he would welcome the surgeon's knife. Presumably, as this was the simile which had been presented, he had in mind a case of cancer. In the case of cancer I too would welcome the surgeon's knife if I thought that were the only possible treatment, but if I thought my cancer would be cured by radium treatment or some other newly-developed treatment I would choose to avoid the surgeon's knife. Perhaps the cancer on the body social can be cured by less drastic measures than the surgeon's knife of divorce.

I do not entirely agree with those who state that none of the marriages which come before the Senate committee could have been salvaged. By the time they reach us it is true that they seem hopeless, but most people on seeing their marriage deteriorating would gladly seek help if it were available. If conciliation were required before a petition could be presented, I venture to suggest that many cases would never reach the committee or the provincial courts. I feel that we need much more investigation and that we should find out what is being done in other countries before we decide to change our divorce laws in Canada.

My second reason is based on the fact that for years I have spoken at women's meetings urging them to take a greater interest in government at local, provincial and municipal levels. I have pointed out that the governments require such interest so that they can determine what laws the people want. I have said that in a democratic country governments try to implement the wishes expressed by the people. I have quoted again and again Burke's maxim—"To follow, not to force, the public inclination is the true end of legislature"—pointing out that unless they show their inclination toward any legislation they cannot expect action by government.

Like the honourable senator from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill) I have had no requests from the people of New Brunswick nor from the people of any of the Atlantic provinces to support this bill, but I can tell you that I do get many letters asking me to support or oppose current legislation. I have seen only one editorial in our New Brunswick papers on this matter. It referred to the fact that this bill was before the Senate, but I could not determine whether the editorial supported or opposed the measure. It appeared to be on the fence.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I shall read some for my honourable friend tomorrow.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: That is fine. I would be very glad to hear them. Even if the honourable gentleman from Rosetown has editorials from New Brunswick, I cannot see that there has been any great demand by the people of Canada for this legislation. The honourable gentleman may have many letters; I do not doubt it. But I read in the Debates of the British House of Commons that when it was proposed to change the divorce laws there, between the time when a bill was introduced and came up for second reading a petition was produced signed by 100,000 people. I do not know of any petitions that have been received here, and if there are any I would be glad to know about them. So far as I know there has been no demand in Canada like the demand for similar legislation in England, such as was mentioned in the excerpt I read from the speech of the Lord Archbishop of York, in which he said the Government could not refuse to pass the legislation because in a democratic country the Government had to do what the people wanted, even though it might be what he considered un-Christian.

Honourable senators, a Gallup Poll was taken in January, 1955, on the question: if only one law could be passed in the coming session what should that law be? I found from the replies that only one per cent of the public voted that the law considered should concern divorce, and one per cent was divided between those who wanted a change—that is, between those who wanted the law tightened and those who wanted it relaxed.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Was that Gallup Poll conducted in Canada?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes. It was carried in the Montreal Star under date of January 5, 1955.

Honourable senators, how could I justify myself to the women's groups to which I have spoken if, upon becoming a legislator I supported—and without any indication of interest or approval from my constituents—a bill that makes such a drastic change in one of the laws which many people in this country consider is basic to our society?

There are a number of points I would be glad to argue. I do not believe divorce is good for the children of our country. I have been very much interested in welfare of children for many years, and I think I have the right to express an opinion. If it were not so late I would be glad to argue that I do not think the marriage contract can be compared to a business contract. One reason is that in most business contracts there is a clause whereby the contract can be terminated on agreement between the parties upon the giving of a certain notice. There is nothing to that effect in the marriage contract.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to elaborate on other points, but I think you will realize from the two points I have covered that my convictions are that we should not pass this bill at this time. Therefore I am not going to vote for the bill on second reading.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Has the honourable senator received many letters asking her to oppose this bill?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I have not received any letters at all.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Question.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Haig, the debate was adjourned.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Gordon B. Isnor moved the second reading of Bill 181, an Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the main purpose of this bill is to change the personnel of the Board, increasing its membership from three to four. The other amendments to the bill are consequential upon the first. The present subsection dealing with the membership of the Board reads as follows:

> There shall be, under the direction of the minister, a board to be known as the "National Harbours Board" consisting of three members, namely, a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman and a third member, who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during good behaviour for ten years.

The general wording of the subsection remains the same, except to provide that the board shall consist of ". . . four members, namely, a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman and two other members".

The Bill would further amend the act by providing that three members, instead of two, shall form a quorum. Subsections (8), (9) and (10) of section 3 of the present act read as follows:

> (8) In all proceedings of the board the votes of the majority of the members shall govern.
> (9) In any meetings of the board, where only two of the members are present, all questions upon which an agreement cannot be reached shall be referred for decision to a full meeting of the board.
> (10) In case of a vacancy on the board, the presiding member may, notwithstanding the provision of subsection (9), cast an additional vote.

The proposed new subsections read as follows:

> (8) In all proceedings of the board the decision of a majority of the members present is the decision of the board, and in the event of a tie the presiding member has a casting vote.
> (9) A vacancy on the board does not impair the right of the remaining members to act.

I do not think I need to say anything further about the bill. I would, however, remind honourable senators that the National Harbours Board Act became effective in 1936, and that seven of our harbours are under its administration. I think all honourable senators are familiar with the seven harbours. May I say, with all due deference to the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), that these harbours go all the way from Halifax to Vancouver and include those two very important ports.

The first board was headed by the present Minister of National Defence, the Honourable Ralph Campney, who in turn was followed by Mr. R. K. Smith, and later by the present Chairman, Mr. B. J. Roberts. The board has done exceptionally good work—and I say this notwithstanding that I took an altogether different view in 1935, when I felt that the board was not really energetic and did not add to the economy of Halifax. However, I have to recognize its excellent work, and because of the large increase in the administrative duties I think these two minor amendments to the act are necessary.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask one question? Has experience not proved that ten years is a long time for members of the board to hold office?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I would answer my honourable friend by saying that ten years in the life of administrators on so important a body as the National Harbours Board is a desirable term, and not too long. Continuity of administration results from long association. We have found that ten years in office pass very quickly.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: That is the same term that the members of the Board of Transport Commissioners serve, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Next sitting.

CANADA-IRELAND INCOME TAX AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill 124, an Act to implement an agreement between Canada and Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to approve an agreement made between the Government of Canada and the Government of Ireland, dealing with the subject-matter of income tax. The object of the agreement is to avoid the incidence of double taxation resulting from income tax provisions in both countries in relation to business and professional operations by residents of one country in the other country. Bills of similar character have been considered by this house in the past. At the present time we have tax conventions resulting from the ratification by Parliament of similar agreements made with the United States, United Kingdom and France.

Generally, the principle of the bill, as contained in the agreement which the bill proposes to approve, is to tax in each country only the industrial or commercial profits of an enterprise of the other country being carried on in the first mentioned country through a permanent establishment. It is not necessary to deal with the provisions of the bill, but I will explain some of the articles of the agreement.

Article II defines the various terms which occur therein, the most important being "permanent establishment." That term, when used in relation to a trade or business in the nature of a commercial or industrial enterprise of one of the countries, means a fixed branch or place of business in the other country. The incidence of taxation, in connection with the carrying on of such an enterprise, would apply to a permanent establishment. The definition and the various exceptions are set out in article II.

Article III deals with the incidence of tax liability of an Irish enterprise or of a Canadian enterprise, when business is being so carried on in the territory of the other country. Generally, the incidence of tax is exactly in line with the principle of this agreement.

Article IV provides methods for correcting the possible understatement of profits in one territory or the other as the result of the operations of associated or inter-related companies in the two jurisdictions, whereby by virtue of the control of the companies in both territories it is possible to shift the profits by the prices that are charged.

Article V provides that profits from the operation of ships and aircraft are to be taxed only in the country of residence.

Under article VI provision is made that the withholding tax on dividends earned in Canada by an Irish resident shall not exceed 15 per cent; and, if the company earning those dividends in Canada is what may properly be described as a subsidiary of a corporation in Ireland the return shall be not more than 5 per cent. In return for that consideration Ireland gives up any right to collect taxes in respect of dividends in the reverse situation, where the operations are carried on in Ireland by a resident of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It would seem as though the good rule does not apply both ways. Why is that so?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, it does work both ways. Of course, which side will get the greater benefit depends on where the balance of payments occur. For instance, if a resident of Ireland earns dividends in Canada, we collect a withholding tax of 15 per cent; but if, in the situation, a subsidiary company operating in Canada pays dividends to its Irish parent company, the provision is for a 5 per cent tax. Ireland, on the other hand, exempts from surtax income arising in Ireland and payable to a Canadian resident, other than income of the nature which arises out of industrial or commercial profits.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Are there many parent companies in Ireland operating subsidiaries in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Frankly, I cannot say. However, I can say that on the general state of business operations as between Canada and Ireland, the balance would be in favour of Canada.

Article VII exempts from taxation,

> Copyright royalties and other like payments made in respect of the production or reproduction of any literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work . . .

If these are the property of a resident of Canada and are being used in Ireland, and royalties are accruing there, Ireland exempts such royalties from taxation; in return Canada makes payments for royalties exempt from tax in the reverse situation. The only exception to the exemption in either country, in circumstances covered by the agreement, is with respect to motion picture film.

Article VIII has to do with an individual who renders services. For instance, a resident of Canada who is in Ireland for the purpose of discharging temporary duties for the Canadian Government, pays no tax to Ireland on his remuneration from the Canadian Goverment, although he receives it in Ireland. In the reverse situation, income received in Canada by a resident of Ireland representing the Irish Government would not be subject to Canadian income tax. There is an exception, as you will see, where the relationship is that of a business representative working for a Crown company. For instance, if the relationship were that of a Crown company carrying on trade or business for the Government, for a profit, the exemptions allowed in either country would not apply.

Article X provides for the exemption from Canadian tax of any pension or annuity derived from sources in Canada by an individual who is a resident of Ireland. If a person who is a resident of Ireland for tax purposes is in receipt of a pension or annuity from a source in Canada, that income is exempt from Canadian tax; in return, where the reverse situation prevails, a resident of Canada is exempted from income tax in Ireland.

Articles XI and XII deal with promotion of cultural interests in the two countries. Specifically, article XI covers the professor or teacher who may go from one to the other country and work there temporarily as a teacher at a university, college or other educational institution. The income he receives is taxable only in the place where he is a resident and not the place in which he receives his income. Article XII extends those provisions to students and apprentices. If, for instance, a student from one country is attending full time in the other country for educational purposes, the payments he receives from his home country for the purpose of maintaining himself are not subject to income tax in that other country.

Article XIII provides for reciprocity in tax credits for taxes paid in the other country on income earned therein. For instance, if you are a Canadian citizen who earns income in Ireland, or if, in the reverse, you are a resident of Ireland who earns income in Canada, there is a reciprocity with respect to tax credits. In other words, if you have income from the other country which is regarded as part of your income for taxation purposes, you may offset your taxation in the country of residence by that part which you have paid in the foreign jurisdiction.

Article XIV is the type of provision one inevitably finds these days, particularly in tax legislation, which covers the exchange of information between the contracting countries in relation to the subject matter of the agreement.

Article XV provides for the time and the manner in which the statute shall come into force; and article XVI provides for its termination. The agreement shall continue indefinitely unless one party or the other before June 30 in any year, indicates its wish to terminate it. In that event a certain formula is laid down in article XVI, setting out the basis for and the time at which termination will be regarded as having become effective.

Honourable senators, those are in outline the provisions of the agreement. It contains no provisions which could be described as unusual, having regard to the tax conventions which we have made with the countries already mentioned, namely, the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Honourable senators, I should like to ask one question. In the case of a ship, is the place of residence that of the port of registry or the head office of the company?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The agreement provides only that ships and aircraft are exempt from income tax other than in the place of residence of the company.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: It is the residence of the company?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, I do not wish to enter into a long discussion of the bill at this late hour. First, I assume it is based to some extent on the agreements Canada has made with the United States and Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Davies: In those circumstances I am hopeful the bill will be referred to committee for discussion there, because obviously it omits to mention many things.

Hon. Mr. Howard: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Davies: For instance, many Americans have summer homes in Canada, and spend perhaps two, three or four months in this country, and we never bother them. Fortunately, or unfortunately, I am one who has a small place in the Old Country. There they interpret our Income Tax Act to suit themselves, and I am without recourse. I have discussed this matter with one Deputy Minister of Finance and officials of the Department of National Revenue. I have also tried to get some information from the High Commissioner's office here, without success.

Honourable senators, this agreement contains nothing that in any way helps a man who might be classed as an ordinary resident in Ireland. In the United Kingdom there are two classes—resident and ordinary resident. If you maintain a small place in England, be it only a hovel, and you visit there regularly, you then become an ordinary resident and liable to pay income tax. They require you to submit your income tax papers from Canada and they go into them in detail. Using your income in Canada in the previous year as a basis, they translate that amount into sterling at the British rate of exchange, and assume that to be your income. If you have not paid as much in Canada as you would have paid under the British rate, then you must pay the difference to them. It is a very complicated question. They say to you that you can bring in free all the money you like so long as it is capital, but if you bring in any income we must tax you on it. When I asked them "What is capital?" they replied that capital is inherited money. I pointed out that capital is money which over the years one has saved, after taxation, and invested, and that it includes capital gain. They claim that because twenty-five or thirty years ago it was income, therefore it is still income.

I do not know whether this agreement with Ireland will affect many people, but I feel that in this bill we should try to protect Canadians as much as we can and not fail them as we did in the United Kingdom agreement. I would like to see this bill go to committee and be discussed at length there.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If this bill is given second reading I shall move that it be referred to a committee. I should point out that the agreement has been negotiated with the Governments of Ireland and of Canada, and Parliament is now asked to give approval. If there is no approval of the agreement then of course it is an ineffective document. In approaching the question of approval or no approval I suppose one should decide whether it is better to refuse to approve at this time, in the hope that we may make a better agreement, or to accept the agreement as it is with its hardships, difficulties and iniquities. So far as the United Kingdom agreement is concerned, with all the problems that have risen there, the convention has passed into law and the only way we can deal with it now, as I see it, is by agitation along the lines suggested by the honourable senator.

Hon. Mr. Davies: But we cannot amend this agreement in committee.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Why does the Government submit to Parliament agreements that have already been entered into? It seems to me ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The Government has negotiated and signed this agreement. If Parliament approves of it and ratifications are exchanged, the agreement will become effective; otherwise there is no agreement. But as I see the function of the Senate in this matter, and also the function of the House of Commons, we either accept the agreement or we do not.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Then Parliament has nothing to do with making agreements with another country.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Except to disapprove or approve them.

Hon. Mr. Davies: To ratify an agreement with another Government without discussing it?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We can turn it down.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: As I understand the situation, when agreements are made between a foreign country and Canada, they are signed by the officials of both countries and are then brought before the House of Commons and the Senate only for the purpose of being approved or disapproved?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Well, that is a strange situation. Why do we have a democratic Parliament if arrangements can be made with other countries without the approval of Parliament? We cannot even amend this agreement?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not saying that no amendment can be made by either country. What I am saying is that Parliament, in considering this bill and the agreement attached to it, either passes the bill or does not pass the bill. We cannot by ourselves amend the agreement attached to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask the honourable senator if this bill and agreement follow a pattern which has been adopted? We had agreements with Sweden and Denmark a couple of years ago. Are this agreement and bill along the same lines?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: And these agreements are negotiated between Canada and various countries on an approved pattern of agreement between our country and another?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: They are individually negotiated. Canada has agreements with the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the Scandinavian countries, in which there may be some differences in terms and language owing to various methods of taxation in the different countries, but the basic pattern on the essential matters is the same. For instance, in regard to a "permanent establishment" the basis of taxation of a Canadian operation in another country runs through all the bills.

Hon. Mr. McKeen: Honourable senators, if in this basic pattern there have developed things that we have found are wrong, should we continue to use this basic pattern? If Parliament turned down the agreement, would it not be the function of the Government officials to negotiate another agreement along the lines that Parliament would suggest or approve?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I would expect so, if both sides were ready to make such an agreement.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Mr. Hayden the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

CANADA-IRELAND SUCCESSION DUTY AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill 125, an Act to implement an agreement between Canada and Ireland for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to succession duty.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is designed to establish an agreement for the avoidance of double taxation in the field of succession duty, as Bill 124 was designed to implement an agreement in the field of income tax law.

Article II gives the definitions of the terms used in the agreement. This bill, like the previous one, provides only for approval of the agreement which is attached as a schedule.

Article III, which is an important article in the agreement, determines the agreed situs of all kinds of property. Paragraphs (a) to (o) of article III, set out a series of rules for an agreed situs for all kinds of property as between the Government of Ireland and the Government of Canada, and the agreed situs would be the rule governing the application of succession duty taxation in both countries.

Article IV provides that any deductions or credits that up to the present moment have been allowed by either country in relation to the other are continued, notwithstanding whatever additional taxation may be provided for by this agreement.

Article V provides for credits by the country of domicile in respect of duty paid to the other country on the same assets. The purpose, of course, is to eliminate the exact imposition of a double succession duty.

Article VI provides for the period within which a credit or refund may be claimed by a person in one of these countries, as against the other country, by virtue of the provisions of this agreement; and there is a time limit within which, in the circumstances, such claim for credit may be made.

In article VII we find the inevitable provision for exchange of information between the two countries.

Article VIII provides for the method of ratification of this agreement after the parliaments of this country and of Ireland have approved it, by the exchange of the signed documents; also, for the date on which the act shall come into force, and for the estates to which the agreement shall apply. Generally speaking, it applies to any estates which fall in on or after the date on which the ratifications have been exchanged and the agreement has the force of law.

The duration of the agreement is for three years; and there is provision for its termination.

In broad outline that is the scope of the agreement. The really important article is number III.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

REPRESENTATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. G. Percival Burchill moved the second reading of Bill 194, an Act to amend the Representation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a very simple bill. It seeks to avoid the confusion which exists at the present time because there are two electoral districts in Canada having the name of Northumberland; one being in Ontario, and one in New Brunswick.

By this bill it is sought to distinguish the constituency in New Brunswick by adding the name "Miramichi". This is the name of the river which flows through that constituency, and is the background of the economic life of the whole district, and honourable senators will quickly recognize that "Miramichi" is one of the earliest of Canada's historic names.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: I could say more on this subject, honourable senators, but because of the lateness of the hour I shall not detain you. I only want to add that the river today is as noble and grand as it ever was. By many who know it, it is termed "The Rhine of America". To my mind it is very fitting that our constituency in New Brunswick should bear the name of that great and historic waterway.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

ST. MARY'S RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to Bill N-8, an Act to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen moved that the amendments be concurred in.

He said: This bill, honourable senators will recall, provides for the building of a tunnel or a bridge across the rapids at Sault St. Marie. Two interests, other than those which were supporting the bill, appeared before the committee. One was the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has a railway bridge across the rapids at that point; and the other was the existing ferry company, which operates a ferry where the bridge or tunnel, it is expected, will be built. At their suggestion, and without opposition from the promoters of the bill, we inserted an amendment to provide that there should be no expropriation of the lands and properties of either of these parties, that is the Canadian Pacific Railway and its bridge, or the ferry company, without the approval of the Board of Transport Commissioners.

The second amendment we made to the bill had relation to the time for payment-off of the bonds or denbentures which are to be issued to pay for the project. The bill provides, in substance, that the work is to be financed by the issue of bonds or debentures, which are to be paid off in a certain period, and that at the end of that period the bridge shall be owned, half by the Dominion of Canada, on the Canadian side, and half by the State of Michigan, on the American side. Similar legislation passed by the State of Michigan provides for a period of forty years within which the bonds are to be paid off, and also that the toll shall be sufficient to allow of the payment of the debentures or bonds within that period. So we have inserted a similar clause in this bill.

The third amendment is not of very great importance. In the bill as submitted to us it was provided that the maximum rate of interest on the bonds or debentures should be 7 per cent. That, the committee thought, was rather too much, and it has been reduced from 7 to 6 per cent.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Farquhar: With leave, I move the third reading now.

THE ESTIMATES

AUTHORITY TO PRINT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. T. A. Crerar, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented the second report of the committee.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Finance beg leave to make their second report, as follows:

In connection with the order of reference of March 16, 1955, directing the committee to examine the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956, etc., the committee recommend that it be authorized to print 800 copies in English and 250 copies in French of its day to day proceedings, and that Rule 100 be suspended in relation to the said printing.

EXPORTATION OF POWER AND FLUIDS AND IMPORTATION OF GAS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, presented the report of the committee on Bill 4.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to whom was referred the Bill (4), intituled: "An Act to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas", have in obedience to the order of reference of March 17, 1955, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 3, line 17: after "fine" delete "of" and substitute therefor "not exceeding"
2. Page 3, line 19: after "fine" delete "of" and substitute therefor "not exceeding"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that the amendments be concurred in now.

Honourable senators, may I give an explanation? The amendments have to do with the cash penalty. The language of the bill as drawn forced the conclusion that the amount of the cash penalty was the minimum, whereas it was intended to be the maximum, that is, that the penalty should not exceed the amount stated. We changed the language, therefore, with the approval of the department concerned, so as to make it coincide with the intention.

The motion was agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, now.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why now? Is there any hurry to read this bill the third time? I think it is far better to observe the usual rule which requires a day's notice of a motion for third reading. I have no objection to the bill, and I am not likely to take any objection when it comes before the house for third reading, but somebody might wish to object. I am more inclined to follow our usual rules, unless there is some good reason for doing otherwise.

The Hon. the Speaker: Next sitting.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING NEGATIVED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators, it is a little new for me to rise in this chamber and speak on a bill so far down on the list of speakers, and so I am somewhat at a loss. Usually when taking part in a debate I speak second, with the result that I have the whole world to roam around in; but this afternoon I am very limited, because so many able speeches have been made on both sides of the question. However, I will indulge in something that is not very popular, namely, some personal reminiscences. I admit it is bad manners to do so, but I think probably I can bring to the members of this house a glimpse of the problem as seen by me, a lawyer who has practised for many years in one of our large cities.

First of all, however, I want to congratulate the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I did not know that he could draw such a good bill, or that he could make such a fine presentation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: You know, when you are leader you always have to remember that there are other fellows coming up. The old policy used to be that when a fellow threatened to come up you cut off his head, and then you had a clear road until somebody else came bobbing along. Now, I am getting to the stage where I am inclined to clip off somebody's head, but I may not have to do it.

I want also to congratulate the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). If there is one member of the Senate—I am glad to say it in his presence—if there is one member of the Senate who is a great credit to this chamber, it is the honourable member from Vancouver South. He is known from one end of Canada to the other, especially by the legal profession, as one of the outstanding legal lights in our country. However, he must be approaching the stage in life when retirement will be required of him by the law of nature, for although I have been practising law for fifty years I have heard of him as far back as I can remember. I consider it a great privilege to be even associated with him in this chamber. I feel that I acquire some lustre just through being one of his fellow-members here.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: We produced him in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: He was improved in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I also regard very highly the fine speech made by the honourable senator from Toronto Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck). I do not always agree with the honourable gentleman, but I admire very much his speech on this bill. Honourable senators, I have been a member of the Senate for twenty years, which is quite a while, but I have never heard in any other debate three such outstanding speeches. In a single debate I have heard two that could be compared to them, but never three. I say that with no intention of flattering the honourable gentlemen. Canada requires such men in her public life. As the honourable senator for Vancouver South has reminded us, there are twenty-one vacancies in this chamber. I hope that they will soon be filled, and with men of the calibre of the three honourable senators I have named, because such men bring to this house the experience, the knowledge and the brains we require in the complicated times through which we are passing.

The other day I heard someone say that Canada now occupies one of the most important places on the stage of world affairs. Our country is not as great as the United States or the United Kingdom, nor as important as Russia or China. But we stand, as it were, between two nations, the United Kingdom and the United States. We are, in my judgment the only people whom both sides trust, and they trust us to the limit. We must never forget the obligations which go with our standing and our reputation.

What is the issue in this debate? I would point out that it is not concerned with divorce in the abstract: nothing is involved in the bill except the granting to women of a measure of freedom equal to that enjoyed by men. The greatest asset with which it deals is women; next in order of importance are the children; then, the men. I say that deliberately.

Let me refer to some personal experiences. A lawyer in practice in a city, be it great or small, gets to be known for what he is. For a time he may fool some of his clients, but sooner or later they get the measure of him; they know that he stands for certain principles, and by the time he has reached forty years of age his standing is pretty well fixed. I am not among the foremost ten lawyers of my city, and I think I can say that neither am I among the ten least; I am one of the run-of-the-mine variety—somewhere in the middle. Having been continuously involved in politics for forty-seven years, and repeatedly elected to public office by the people among whom I live, I have come to be known as a fellow who can be consulted: people say "Go to Jack Haig, he will tell you what he thinks; he will give you his straightforward opinion on what he understands to be the law." I have had as much to do with divorce proceedings as any man in Winnipeg, and in the whole fifty years of my practice I have been interviewed on these matters time out of number by women, and, be it noted, only by women.

What is the usual story? In essence it is very simple. For instance, here is a specific case. A woman came in and asked me, "Are you Mr. Haig?" "Yes." "Are you one of the members for Winnipeg?" "Yes." "Then you are the man I want to talk to." "What do you want to talk about?" "About divorce from my husband, who has run away and left me." "How many years ago?" "Three years ago. I have not heard from him since. My brothers and sisters have been helping my children and myself, but I am getting near the end of the road. The youngsters require more clothes. Things are not too good in the city. There is unemployment. People who used to give me some money cannot now afford to do so." After this, I told her that the thing to do was to locate the man and bring him to justice. I inquired where he was. The woman did not know; he might have gone to Montreal, or Toronto, or Calgary, or Edmonton. Finally, with tears in her eyes, she asked, "Mr. Haig, can't you help me?"

Well, I have children of my own; in those days I had a wife of my own; and I felt it was my duty to try to solve the woman's problem. After careful inquiries from this and that source I found that the husband was living in Montreal. I asked, "Can you raise any money?" She replied, "I could get $25.00, but that is all. Would that be of any use?" I told her that, though the amount was very small, I would send it to a legal friend in Montreal, give him all the particulars I could, and ask him to try to find the husband. In three or four weeks my agent replied to this effect: "I got your letter and the $25. I have spent it, and maybe a little more, but as you told me your client has no more money, and I shall not expect any further payment. The man she seeks is doing so-and-so, and is living with a woman." Now, what was I to do? The woman could not go to Montreal and hire a detective to get information. Nor could she petition the Senate for divorce, because it would cost her from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars, and she did not know there was that much money in the world. What did she do? She broke down, and cried. It was very hard for me to avoid doing the same. The only advice I could give her was to try to keep track of her husband's whereabouts, carry on as best she could, and maybe in a few years she would hear something about him, and pass on the information to someone in Montreal to keep on the lookout for him.

Not infrequently an absent husband may be seen by someone from Winnipeg who is visiting in the East. In that event, back like lightning comes the information, but it is of no value for the purpose of taking divorce proceedings in Manitoba. In such a case I may write to the man and urge him to act like a decent fellow. If he is a traveller, it may be within his power to make Winnipeg his headquarters and give his wife the chance to get a divorce locally. In even the worst of men one finds traces of better feelings.

In the case I have in mind, after two or three months, the husband telephoned me to tell me that he was in town, staying at such an hotel, travelling for a company, and having his headquarters at Winnipeg. I thanked him, called my detectives, passed on the information to them, and bade them keep their eyes open. Two or three weeks later they furnished the information the woman needed, with a bill for $50 expenses incurred in keeping track of the man over several days and nights. Of course the wife was unable to pay this account; the $25 she had already raised was the limit of her resources. I shall not mention what happened, but the detectives were paid, the case went to court, and the woman gained her freedom. Three years later she married another man.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What was the evidence upon which the divorce was granted?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Evidence of adultery, which consisted merely of this: when the detectives called at the hotel room they found a woman in bed after the respondent had answered the door dressed only in pyjamas. It was held that this evidence was sufficient to prove adultery. It was a case of fabricating evidence of adultery in order to obtain a divorce when the real ground was desertion.

As I have said, the divorcee remarried three years later. Two years after that I had occasion to travel to the Pacific coast with a curling party. Our train made a brief stop at a small village in British Columbia where this woman lived, and evidently she had read in the local newspaper that I was a member of the party. She came down to the train and said, "I want to shake hands with you, Senator Haig". I was surprised and asked her why, and she reminded me of her case and said that she was enjoying the happiest days of her life. She said that her new husband was manager of a local chain store, and that her son of nineteen had just graduated from the University of British Columbia. She also told me that her husband's daughter from his first marriage—he had been a widower when he remarried—was now happily married. That is a practical life story.

Honourable senators, let me relate an experience I had in the last year I served on the Senate Divorce Committee. Our committee was hearing a particular case where both parties were Roman Catholics, and the husband was suing the wife. In defending the action the wife admitted in the witness box that on one occasion she had been morally wrong. She insisted that it had happened only once. The couple had two children, five and seven years of age, and reminding the parents of their responsibility towards their children I said to the husband: "You are a successful businessman. Won't you take your wife back so that you can keep your family together?" He refused, so I then said: "You and your wife belong to the Roman Catholic Church. This is the middle of March and the Senate is going to adjourn for Easter next month. I want you to come back to this committee on a certain date in May, and in the meantime I want you both to visit your parish priest." Having a great respect for parish priests of the Roman Catholic Church I said to the husband, "I am sure your priest will do his very best to get you two people together again." I told them, of course, that the other two members on the committee could overrule me; but they did not do so, and the necessary arrangements were made. When the couple reported back to the committee in May the woman said she had gone to see her parish priest on the appointed day, but that her husband had failed to show up on that day and on subsequent occasions. The husband verified this, saying that he had never gone near the priest. He said that he did not have to, and that he wanted to get a divorce. "Well," I said, "not from this committee" and the case was subsequently dismissed.

That is the sort of thing we are confronted with. I maintain that 75 per cent of divorce petitions are filed on behalf of women, and that this percentage would be increased if more women could financially afford to sue for divorce. Many women must suffer because they cannot afford to pay for a divorce. Woe betide a nation which lets its women suffer and live in misery just because those responsible are too pig-headed—and I use the word advisedly—to bring the laws of the country up to date.

The honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson), who is a member of the Senate Divorce Committee, claims that we should have strong evidence of public opinion before we attempt to change such basic laws. Well, many practising Canadian lawyers are behind this legislation. In fact, the great majority of Canadian Bar Association members are behind it. They believe in it because they have seen what I have seen. They have had the experience of impoverished women coming to them to get a divorce, and if they have refused to help them these women have had to remain married and live in misery. Honourable senators who are not lawyers and who have enjoyed a happily married life cannot fully appreciate the plight of such women.

I warned the house that I might make personal references in my remarks today, and I must tell you what a delight it is for me to visit my three daughters who are happily married and have children. Sometimes I have thought what an awful thing it would be if my daughters were poor and were in the position of some of these women I have been talking about.

I remember some women of 55 or 60 applying to Parliament for a divorce after they had been separated from their husbands for as long as 25 or 30 years. When asked why they had waited so long before applying for a divorce their first reason was that they had never had enough money. Usually their second reason was that their children had now grown up and wanted nothing whatsoever to do with their father. I always did my best to give such women a divorce.

Honourable senators, I will now deal with the various grounds for divorce. In Canada at the present time the only way that a woman who has been deserted by her husband can obtain a divorce is by proving that he has committed adultery. In 1943 the honourable gentleman from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) introduced a bill in the Senate dealing with presumption of death and dissolution of marriage. The bill applied to either sex, and provided that if a man, say, had been absent for seven years and his wife had known nothing of him during that time, the court could, if satisfied, make a decree of presumption of death, and subsequently a decree of dissolution of the marriage. A continuous absence of seven years has legal effect in civil law, and in criminal law in the case of bigamy, but it has no legal effect in divorce matters.

Next I wish to deal with the ground of cruelty. During this debate the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges), asked for a legal definition of cruelty. Well, this matter can be left to the courts. I admit that our judges are only human, but we lawyers who practise before the courts, although we are on the side of our clients, have every confidence in our judges. We may feel that Mr. Justice X has not got as much ability as we would like him to have, but we do appreciate that he administers the law as he understands it. The question of what constitutes cruelty can be safely submitted to the courts for interpretation.

I am not too clear about the question of insanity. If this bill is given second reading and is referred to committee and somebody moves that insanity be struck out as a ground for divorce, I would have great difficulty in voting against the motion. I feel that insanity is really an illness.

I know the majority will be against me, but I just cannot bring myself to vote for that ground. Probably I should do so, but I am not quite as clear as I ought to be about it. However, I am positively clear about the first two grounds. I would rather have desertion or cruelty as grounds for divorce, than adultery, because we all know, without talking about it, that adultery is frequently used as a vehicle to prove some other offence not disclosed to the court.

I want to say a word or two about my honourable friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). I think this is only the second session that she has served on the divorce committee. May I ask if she has ever had occasion to try to reunite a husband and wife who have separated, and to get them to live together afterwards?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: No, I cannot say that I have.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No, I thought not. I tried it once, and got a slap in the face for my labours. You can't get any place with such people—it is absolutely impossible. The welfare organizations are able to supply money to the family, and they try to get them back on their feet, but they cannot give money to a woman to apply for a divorce. And in the United States they have a welfare problem in each of their 48 states.

With regard to the rights of a woman in divorce, I would point out that in Great Britain eight years ago an amendment to the divorce laws enabled a woman to sue her husband in that country even if he lived in Canada or elsewhere abroad. Great Britain granted domicile to the wife, because it was found that many women married to soldiers, for instance, were unable to sue their husbands, for they had left the country and often could not be found. So it was provided that the domicile of the wife should govern in respect of an application for divorce.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: After three years' desertion.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, after three years' desertion, of course.

Honourable senators, I have been surprised at the stand that certain members of this house have taken towards this bill. I had hoped—although I must candidly admit that I have now lost hope—that the bill would go to committee, so that each one of us would have an opportunity to express his or her ideas, and then that the committee could report to the house and we would have had a bill to satisfy the majority of members. Whether the house passed the bill or not after the report of the committee, is not so important, but it is important that the opinions of the majority of members be known. I think the proposed legislation should be allowed to go to committee.

I want to say something about the bill which was introduced in 1938. My honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Lambert) was present when the bill was debated, as were the honourable senators from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine), Blaine Lake (Hon. Mr. Horner) and Bedford-Halifax (Hon. Mr. Quinn). Not many of us are left.

Hon. Mr. Marcotte: I was there.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, my friend from Ponteix also was present. The bill of 1938, introduced by the late Senator McMeans from Winnipeg, included two sections which did not appear in the English Act. The Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the Leader of the Opposition at that time, objected to the two sections, as also did the honourable senator from Ottawa. Mr. Meighen said he would not vote for the bill if those sections remained in, and the honourable member from Ottawa took much the same stand. Two or three of us suggested that the bill be allowed to go to committee, where the offending sections could be struck out. That was done, and carried. Unfortunately, the late Senator McMeans was pretty angry because we took out the two sections, and he kept the bill standing for weeks on end without moving the third reading. We could not move it, because he was in the house at the time, but on the first occasion that he was absent I moved it, and the bill went to the House of Commons. However, it was too late. If I remember correctly, it was June before the bill was brought up in that house; and it could not possibly be passed there when the session was so far advanced.

Honourable senators, I have given the history of that bill to show the delay that took place. In the case of the bill before us now, however, it is not a case of delay. I hope the women of Canada, when they look at their newspapers tomorrow, will have their eyes open to see how the women members of this house voted on this bill, that is, whether they voted for the women or for the men. I am more anxious about the vote of the women than the vote of the men. I want the women of this country to realize what a wife has to put up with when she seeks a divorce and has to apply for it in the jurisdiction where her husband happens to be domiciled. I hope the women in my city will be able to judge the attitude of their representatives in Parliament on divorce. We cannot hide behind some religious denomination and say, "The church does not allow it." That is no excuse for a senator to offer at all. We are here as representatives of the people of Canada, whether they are members of the Roman Catholic, Anglican, United Church, Presbyterian, Baptist, Lutheran, or of any other denomination. That is not the guiding consideration when members of this house are chosen. The Government of the day summons men and women to the Senate because it believes they are representatives of the people of Canada. Whenever the vote on this bill is taken, there will be a chance to judge.

My honourable friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson) is a young woman, and I venture to predict that she will live to see the day when her vote will be reversed and the bill will be passed. She will have to reverse her vote, because otherwise the women of her part of the country will ask, "Why didn't you vote to give women the same right as men on the question of divorce?"

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Will the honourable gentleman permit a question? I am not a member of the legal profession, and know very little about the Criminal Code. My honourable friend gave as an illustration the case of a man from Winnipeg who deserted his wife in Montreal. Is there not some provision in the Criminal Code for prosecuting a man for desertion?

Hon. Mr. Haig: He can be sued for non-support, but his wife has to go to Montreal to sue him, and when she gets there she might find that he has skipped to New Brunswick, and that from there he has gone to Nova Scotia or somewhere else.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I ask a question? Would that wife not be able to get an order under the Deserted Wives and Children's Maintenance Act?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Even if she did, how could it be enforced?

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Well, I believe that reciprocal enforcement is provided for in practically all the provinces. It certainly is in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If you were to see the list of judgments in our courts ordering husbands to pay so much a month, you would find that they almost never pay the amount they are ordered to pay, and that when an order for payment comes along they get out of the province altogether. Experience shows that such a man will jump from one place to another and escape his responsibility. A man such as I was referring to would not stay in Montreal, but would jump to Toronto or Calgary, and you would never catch up with him. A lawyer who is also a good business man will never take a case like that unless the wife can pay the whole costs, for he well knows that he is without hope of collecting any costs from the husband. Indeed, this is what usually happens: a lawyer gets involved in such a case and, not wanting to drop it before it is finished, he personally pays half the costs. In such circumstances the lawyer is like the medical man who treats certain people knowing that he will never be paid. If my honourable friend from Fredericton were a practising lawyer she could not afford to take such cases, unless her other business was sufficient to maintain her office.

The honuorable lady pointed out that the royal commission which studied the question in England from 1908 to 1912 made its report in 1912, but that a bill was not introduced in the Commons until 1937. That was the Herbert bill. I would remind my honourable friend that during that interval Herbert wrote a book deploring the situation; and it was read by a large segment of the public and brought about a change of attitude towards divorce on the part of many people.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Honourable senators, may I point out that I did not say no divorce bill had been introduced between 1912 and 1937, when the Herbert bill was passed.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The bill was brought in by Herbert in 1937.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: Yes, but it was also brought in between those two dates.

Hon. Mr. Haig: My point is that Herbert's book was the real force behind the passage of that bill. He represented one of the universities in the House of Commons and with his masterly grasp of the subject he carried the bill through the house. Certainly there was no large body of public opinion about it. Because of the small percentage of people affected by divorce, there never could be any strong public opinion on the question. How many divorces were there in Manitoba, for instance, last year?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Two or three hundred.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is not enough to make people who are not especially interested in the subject talk about it. It is only those who come in direct contact with it, such as lawyers, who discuss the question at all. My honourable friend from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) made reference to the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association at its meeting in Winnipeg last year, and he told us that he and one other lawyer stood as the only opponents to it. Why was that association so strongly in favour of wider grounds? Because as lawyers the members knew from experience that there was no other practical way of meeting the problem.

I would go further than this bill provides, honourable senators, and give the wife the same right of domicile that the husband has. If a man deserted his wife in Winnipeg and went to live in Montreal, I would give his wife the right to bring her divorce action in Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I now have the divorce statistics, which indicate that in 1954 Manitoba had 374 cases and Saskatchewan 218.

Hon. Mr. Haig: And how many did Ontario have?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In 1953 Ontario had 2,346 and the next year 2,774.

Hon. Mr. Haig: If this bill passes, there will be a drop in the number of divorces on the ground of adultery, but a large number for desertion, cruelty and on the other grounds.

Honourable senators, for the reasons I have stated, I am hopeful that the majority of the house will be in favour of giving this bill second reading and allowing it to go to a committee—though from what I have seen and heard, I have my doubts—where it could be more fully discussed and the whole subject placed before the public in an intelligent way.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask a question?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: You cited a case where the wife admitted adultery. The committee, of which you were chairman, sent her and her husband away, in spite of his insistence on his right to get a divorce on the grounds of his wife's admitted misconduct. The couple later returned to the committee, and the woman was willing to go back to her husband, but he insisted on getting a divorce; and his application was refused. Have I summarized it fairly?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: My question is: Do I understand that where a husband has the proper proof of the accepted ground for divorce under the present law he is not given the same right as is given to a wife in similar circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let me explain further. While I was an active member of the committee I always felt—and I do not think I was an exception in this respect—that we should be most cautious in divorcing couples with children. In the particular case to which my friend refers, the woman admitted she was guilty of adultery on one occasion only. I am reminded that the Archbishop of Canterbury suggested in a recent speech that one isolated instance might be overlooked.

Hon. Mr. Euler: How many times does she have to commit adultery before her husband has a right to a divorce?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Let me finish stating the facts of the case. I suggested that there was a possibility of a reconciliation, and I thought it should be tried. I inquired as to their church and some other personal information, and suggested that as they were members of the same church they should return to their parish and see if they could not settle their differences.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But they did not agree.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Just a minute, please. They promised to do just that, but the husband would not go for it, so I said "Get out!"

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: May I ask the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) to quote me the statement which he says was made by the Archbishop of Canterbury?

Hon. Mr. Haig: It was referred to in this house just the other day.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: But can you quote the statement? I have been informed by a person high up in the church that on that occasion the Archbishop was misquoted.

Hon. Mr. Haig: He has not denied that he said it.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: I have here the speech of the Archbishop, and if my honourable friend could refer to the assertion he has in mind, I am sure I could prove that the Archbishop was misquoted.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, the church will be pretty hard put to it if Princess Margaret decides to marry Townsend.

Some Hon. Senators: Question, question.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: I would call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) sponsored the bill, and that when he speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I did not intend to make the closing speech in this debate this afternoon, and I am not fully prepared. I had intended to ask that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow afternoon, but upon learning at noon today that quite a number of senators who are here today could not attend tomorrow, I decided to proceed this afternoon. And as a matter of fact, I want to retain what little popularity I have left with the members of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You have lots left.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I trust honourable senators will make allowances if my remarks are not up to the demands of the occasion.

At the outset I want to say that I certainly appreciate the fact that so many honourable members have delivered excellent speeches on this subject—particularly those favouring my bill, of course.

Generally speaking, I think the subject is one of the most important that has been brought up in this chamber for many a year—at any rate this year—and it has created great interest throughout the country.

I want to refer briefly to the speech made yesterday by the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid). I am not going to say much about it, except that I fail to understand the reasoning behind his statement that because he voted against the 1938 bill he was voting against the present one. He knows as well as I do that in 1938 when the bill went from this chamber to the House of Commons, after receiving third reading here, the sponsor of the bill here did not arrange for a sponsor in the House of Commons, and the bill lay on the table over there for a number of days before it was picked up and sponsored by the late Mr. Woodsworth, who was the only person who made any speech on the bill at all. In other words, the bill was not discussed in the Commons. Therefore I doubt very much if the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), who was then a member of that house, had any opportunity of reaching a correct decision in the matter.

Now, I do wish to say something about the speech made last night by the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mrs. Fergusson). I gathered from her remarks that she was basing her objection principally on religious grounds. She said that she objected to the bill because of, among other things, the teachings of the Church of England, to which she belongs. I do not think that that is a very good reason at all. She also stated that she had enjoyed a happy married life, as her parents had. Well, as some other people are so unfortunate as to have a very unhappy married life, I do not know why she should not be willing to vote for such legislation as would help them to rehabilitate themselves and live happily afterwards.

The honourable senator said that a Royal Commission is at present inquiring into this very matter in England, and therefore she did not think we should pass this bill until that Royal Commission had made its report. But from what she said I doubt very much that any recommendation by the Royal Commission in England would have any bearing at all on whether she voted for this measure or not. Even if this bill went to some committee of the Senate, I do not think its findings would have any bearing on her decision. Or if, as I have advocated time and time again, a Royal Commission were appointed in Canada to discuss and consider this whole matter, I doubt very much from what she said that she would vote for this measure even if such a Royal Commission brought in a report favouring the widening of grounds for divorce.

I do think, though, that she made a good suggestion when she said it would be a fine thing if we had family relations courts in operation. I would agree that such courts might have a tendency to bring people together before the home was absolutely broken up and all chances of reconciliation were gone. But what would happen to all these cases where the homes have been irrevocably broken up, where there is no possibility of any reconciliation, where the husband and wife hate each other, yet are tied to each other for life, with no law to help them correct their position by getting a divorce so that they may start over again and bring up their children properly. I submit that even if domestic relations courts were in existence all over Canada legislation would still be required to take care of those cases which such courts cannot do anything with.

I noted that the honourable senator from Fredericton was somewhat critical of the qualifications of the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) to question what effect easy divorce had had on hasty marriages in England. The alternative to that question would seem to be this: What would have happened if those marriages had not taken place Perhaps the honourable senator could answer that question.

I next come to the speech of the honourable senator from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill). I have not very much to say about his speech, but he challenged me to prove that there was a mandate from the people for this kind of legislation. In other words, he wanted to know if the people of Canada desired to have this legislation passed. He said that he had no knowledge of a demand for anything of this kind. Well, I want to say to him that I have had plenty of evidence of such a demand over the years. I hold up some files for all senators to see. They contain letters that have been gathered since 1949 only. In one file are the letters which have come in just recently from all over Canada, and not one of them is opposed to this measure. Even people living in the province of Quebec who belong to the church of my honourable friends from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) and Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) want this legislation passed and applied to the whole of Canada, including Quebec. I have letters written to me to that effect, in French, and translated by the official translator of the Senate. More of that later on.

In my first speech on this bill I referred to the fact that I had received many such letters during the last ten years. I also mentioned the Gallup poll, which reports that 75 per cent of the people interviewed were in favour of this legislation. I referred further to the resolution passed on this subject by the Canadian Bar Association. I also referred to the resolution passed by the Divorce Reform League of Vancouver, British Columbia. I also referred to the resolution passed by the Canadian Legion on this same subject. All are asking for this legislation.

But at the time I made that speech I did not have the resolution addressed to Parliament by the Canadian Legion at their convention held in Toronto August 1 to 6, 1954. I propose to read it so that it will be on the record:

> Whereas the divorce laws in Canada are obsolete, and Canada remains the only progressive country in the world where adultery is the sole ground for divorce;
> And whereas, due to British legislation, many veterans are affected by this situation in that their war brides can return to England and become divorced, while in Canada the veteran concerned is still legally a married man;
> Therefore be it resolved that Dominion Command of the Canadian Legion make representations to Parliament with a view to modernizing our outmoded divorce laws.

In the March issue of Liberty, at page 58, I find a report, which I consider of great importance, of this magazine's national survey on the question before us. The article is headed "Canadians Say Divorce Laws Too Harsh"; and though it may take a little time, I would like to read it:

Most Canadians feel divorce laws are too restrictive, a nation-wide poll conducted for Liberty by Elliott-Haynes Survey Organization disclosed.

Forty-seven per cent of the 2,500 interviewed in 43 cities claim the laws are too restrictive; 23·7 per cent think they're about right, 11·6 per cent believe they're too lax; 17·7 per cent expressed no opinion.

Among male voters, 47·9 per cent feel the laws are too restrictive; 24·7 per cent say they're just right; 7·9 per cent claim they're too lax; 19·5 per cent gave no opinion. Women think they're too restrictive—46·1 per cent compared with 22·7 per cent who think they're all right; 15·2 per cent who say they're not; and 16 per cent who withheld an opinion.

Asked whether insanity, desertion, incompatibility or cruelty should be grounds for divorce (instead of present-day adultery), Canadians said:

Insanity—Yes, 53·4 per cent; no, 25·7 per cent; don't know, 20·9 per cent.

In the last category of uncertainty, my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Haig) is included.

Desertion—Yes, 60·8 per cent; no, 21·6 per cent; don't know, 17.6 per cent.

Incompatibility—Yes, 29·1 per cent; no, 43·3 per cent; don't know 27·6 per cent.

Cruelty—Yes, 56·9 per cent; no, 22·6 per cent; don't know, 20·5 per cent.

That confirms pretty well the results of the Gallup survey.

I now turn to the issue of Saturday Night of March 12, 1955, and refer to page 3 where there is a very fine editorial on this subject. The magazine is well known, and circulates to the extent of about 70,000 copies all over Canada. I will read the editorial:

DIVORCE BILL

With the introduction of a bill by Senator Walter Aseltine, the effort to put some sense into Canada's divorce laws has been renewed. It is doubtful if it will be any more successful than previous attempts but at least it serves to remind the legislators that they are doing nothing to cure a festering condition.

There cannot be a single member of either the Senate or the Commons who is so removed from reality that he does not understand how justice is being mocked and morality preverted by the present procedure governing dissolution of marriages.

Newspapers in the large cities carry daily lists of people who have obtained decrees of divorcement, and reading these lists, an outsider would be justified in concluding that adultery was one of Canada's most popular indoor sports, since this is the only legal reason for ending a marriage in seven of the ten provinces—cruelty is an added cause in Nova Scotia, while Quebec and Newfoundland dump the whole sorry mess in the lap of Parliament. Actually, of course, there is at least as much perjury as adultery; husband and wife agree that their union must end and one or the other fakes the necessary "evidence". It is a dirty, cynical business from start to finish, but at present it cannot be avoided.

Senator Aseltine would enlarge the grounds for divorce to include cruelty, insanity and desertion; no petition for divorce could be made until three years after marriage, except in extreme cases or for adultery; a wife could obtain a decree if her husband had been found guilty of rape, sodomy or bestiality. It is a good bill, even though it makes no provision for ending the absurd procedure whereby Parliament turns itself into a divorce mill for the benefit of mis-mated couples living in Newfoundland and Quebec. But there are too many parliamentarians terrified of embroiling themselves or their parties in a bitter, inter-provincial controversy to give such a bill as this a good chance of survival.

Reform of the divorce laws would probably be achieved more quickly if the provinces undertook the job themselves.

As advocated by the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross).

It would be a piecemeal method and would undoubtedly lead to legal complications, but at least it would mean that a start had been made on cleaning up a disgraceful situation.

To my mind that is a very strong editorial indeed, and proves that popular opinion, at any rate in the city of Toronto, is behind this bill.

My next quotation is from an editorial in the Brantford Expositor, published in the home town of the honourable Leader of the Government in this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald).

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It is a good paper.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The article is entitled:

UNDESERVED HARDSHIP

Commenting on the move in the Senate to widen the grounds for divorce in Canada, the Toronto Star, which is almost as conservative in this matter as it is Liberal in politics, concedes that when the matter of liberalizing the divorce law comes up there is much to be said on both sides. "The present law", it agrees, "certainly creates much undeserved hardship. Take the case of Canadian soldiers who married overseas but whose wives won't come to Canada, or have returned permanently to the Old Country. These men are tied to wives an ocean away from them, apparently for the rest of their lives. If divorce could be secured for desertion, the husbands could get their freedom and the right to marry again."

This is one special category due for consideration. There are many others. We agree with our Toronto contemporary when it says that nobody wants divorce laws as lax as they are in some states. (In one of them, the other day, a man trumped his wife's ace during a bridge game; the wife thereupon hit him on the head with a handy vase of flowers; whereupon the injured husband sued for and obtained a divorce.) But, as the Star points out, "a growing body of public opinion . . .

That is what I have been trying to show, that there is public opinion behind this measure.

. . . inclines to the view that the matter should receive thorough study . . ."

The matter has already had thorough study in England, where sensible and just modifications have been made, largely, be it noted, on the persuasion of high church and legal and sociological authorities. Canada lags unreasonably and inexcusably behind in this connection.

Is it any wonder that I introduced this bill? I have another editorial I should like to read. This one is from the Peterborough Examiner.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Honourable senators, I rise to a point of order. I think the honourable gentleman from Rosetown has contravened the rules of the Senate by reading editorials. I would suggest that he should not persist in doing so.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have been challenged to prove that public opinion is behind this measure.

Hon. Mr. Vien: My point of order is to the effect that it is not in accordance with the rules of the Senate to read editorials during the course of a debate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not know of any rule against it, and I should like to have permission of honourable senators to read this article.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I did not want to interrupt my honourable friend, but if he persists in reading editorials I shall have to insist that my point of order be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Well, I have only two or three more to read.

Some Hon. Senators: Proceed.

Hon. Mr. Vien: The honourable senator can summarize or give the gist of editorials, but he cannot read them and have them placed on Hansard in that way.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would suggest that the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) summarize rather than read the editorials.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Had I known that objection would be taken to this line of procedure I would have summarized the editorials beforehand.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Is the editorial which the honourable gentleman proposes to read in favour of or opposed to divorce? I think it would suffice if we had that information.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is not a question of whether the editorial is for or against divorce. That is not the issue in this debate at all. The honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) eloquently and thoroughly pointed out that the principle involved in this bill is not whether we should have divorce but whether we should widen the grounds for granting divorce. That is what we are debating now. I would point out that a considerable amount of latitude was given to speakers who have opposed this bill.

Hon. Mr. Horner: They were given every opportunity to get their points across.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I think the honourable gentleman from Rosetown would cover his point effectively if he were to inform the house of the names of publications that have also expressed the same point of view as those which he has already put on record.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The editorials I have not read are stronger still.

Hon. Mr. Vien: If the honourable gentleman assures me that he is almost through I shall not insist, but if he persists in reading the editorials in detail I shall have to press my point of order.

Hon. Mr. Horner: Go ahead.

Some Hon. Senators: Carry on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am advised by the Clerk of the Senate that the authorities hold the view it is not good parliamentary practice to refer in detail to editorial opinions on a matter that is immediately before the house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I bow to the ruling of His Honour the Speaker. I shall just say that in the issue of March 2, 1955, of the Peterborough Examiner there is an editorial on this very interesting subject, which in effect approves 100 per cent of the measure I have introduced. It goes on to say that if a measure like this is passed it will do away with a great deal of the perjury, connivance, collusion and all that kind of thing that goes on in our courts at present. I shall not read the editorial.

There is another editorial to the same effect in the Kingston Whig Standard. There are two more such articles in the Vancouver Sun, one entitled "Erase the Moral Blot" and the other "Divorce Sanity Sought".

At the present time a debate on this same subject is taking place in the Legislature of Manitoba. The provincial member for Winnipeg Centre introduced a resolution in that house calling on the federal Government to amend Canada's divorce laws to allow any province to widen its divorce grounds. An article entitled "Divorces do not Break Marriages," which appeared in a recent edition of the Winnipeg Tribune, deals with the debate now taking place on a resolution in the Manitoba Legislature.

I have another long editorial from the Globe and Mail, to the same effect. It also deals with the possible marriage of Princess Margaret, and says that a certain English bishop stated that if she wanted to marry and no one else would perform the marriage ceremony, he would do so.

Honourable senators, I am not going to read all the letters that I have here, but I want to point out that every one of them is in favour of this measure, and not one is against it. Most of the letters—this bears out what my honourable friend from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. Haig) said—are from women who are down and out and whose husbands have left them; and in some cases the women have even been driven from home. One poor woman wrote to me as follows:

> If this divorce bill of yours does not pass, I am going to live with another man, and I am going to keep my daughter with me, and if my husband ever shows up and makes any attempt to get that daughter away from me I am going to commit manslaughter, even if I have to go to jail for the rest of my life.

Honourable senators, this is a serious matter; it is terrible. These poor women are certainly in a difficult position—in a much more difficult position than an injured husband, as was explained by my honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Haig). These letters go on to say, in substance, that this is a great chance for the Senate to justify its existence, which it hasn't done up to the present time. I do not agree with the latter part of that statement, but I do agree with the former part: I think it is a great opportunity for the Senate of Canada to show that it is alive and up and doing, and that it knows what the people of this country want.

Honourable senators, in future when I get letters of this kind I will answer them, and tell every mother and son and daughter I hear from to write to their senator and member of Parliament, and to the Prime Minister, demanding that something be done. I would like the newspaper reporters to take notice of that and publish it so that this matter will be brought to the attention of the people who pass the laws of this country.

The first objection advanced against this bill was that public opinion is not behind this measure. I think I have shown conclusively that quite a lot of public opinion is behind it.

The second objection was that the measure would be detrimental to the children involved. Perhaps honourable senators do not know that more than 50 per cent of the people who apply to Parliament for divorce have no children at all. In looking through the petitions listed in the Divorce Committee's Orders of the Day for last Friday I noticed that 12 cases were set down to be heard, and seven of the petitioners had no children. I have often wondered if childless marriages were responsible for so many divorces. Of the remaining five petitioners on Friday, four had one child each, and only one had two children.

I have here some statistics with respect to England, in Appendix "B" to Memorandum from the Divorce Law Reform Union for the consideration of the Royal Commission. That is the Royal Commission which is sitting in England at the present time. From this document I have taken the following information: The divorce registry in London, for 1949, shows that out of 14,847 couples whose marriages were dissolved or annulled 6,052 were childless, and 2,516 had only one child. Out of 30,870 such couples in 1950 in the whole country, including Wales, 11,555 were childless, and 10,464 had only one child.

In Australia, in the year 1948, 38·9 per cent of the people who obtained divorces had no children, and 30·2 per cent had only one child.

The figures I have given show that the problem of whether or not the children suffer as the result of divorce is not so great as many people seem to think. In cases that I have dealt with in the Senate Divorce Committee in the last 21 years, I have always made it a point to find out before the case is disposed of if there are children; if so, how many, and who is looking after them; whether the husband is liable for their support, and if he is not, whether the wife, if she gets a divorce, will be able to take care of them, bring them up properly and educate them. In no case have I been worried at all about the fate of the children. The father must take care of his children, whether his wife divorces him or not, if the law declares that he must do so. If the husband divorces his wife he is usually able to take care of the children himself, because he is the breadwinner, and he can get married again, or have the children placed somewhere to be properly brought up.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is it not so that such children are already fatherless, their father having abandoned the family?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Not in so far as the law is concerned. If the father abandons them he is still liable for their support.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But if the father has abandoned the children, that means he is living separately and is not taking care of them, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If the father disappears altogether, they are fatherless, of course.

A few moments ago I gave some figures from Australia. When I opened the debate on this bill I told honourable senators what the grounds for divorce were in New Zealand, but at that time I did not know what the grounds were in the Commonwealth of Australia. I have since learned that the grounds for divorce in that country are as follows: Adultery, bigamy, cruelty, cruelty and desertion, drunkenness, desertion and imprisonment for cruelty, insanity, failure to maintain, and separation for over five years. But our bill merely proposes three new grounds, the idea in mind being the rehabilitation of the people who have suffered and are living unhappily, and often in illicit relationship.

The third objection to this bill was raised by the honourable senator from Fredericton when she said she was against divorce on religious grounds. I have spoken on the subject of divorce at every session of this house for the past twenty-one years, and in all those speeches I have never brought in the matter of religion. However, I feel I should now say something about it.

When the vote on the motion for second reading is taken many votes will be cast against it on religious grounds, because certain senators belong to one or two churches which do not approve of divorce in any form. But I submit that this bill, which is a simple one, should be supported by every honourable senator regardless of the church to which he belongs. I would pause to point out that we have no state church in Canada; Parliament therefore is free to pass such legislation as it sees fit. But opposition comes, as I have said, from two churches: the one to which my friend from Fredericton belongs, and the one to which my friends the senators from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard) and Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) belong. It is a little difficult to understand why these two churches come out so strongly against divorce, because when one of their members finds his home broken up with no chance of reconciliation he does not hesitate to make application for a divorce.

During the last two or three years that I was chairman of the Divorce Committee I kept a record of the distribution of religious denominations among the petitioners. That record is as follows: 25 per cent of the applicants belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, 25 per cent to the Church of England, and the remaining 50 per cent consisted of persons of the Jewish faith, members of the United Church, Lutheran Church and other religious denominations. By way of illustration, I would now refer to the list of cases set down for hearing before the Senate Divorce Committee on Friday last: Out of a total of twelve petitioners, I note that five belong to the Roman Catholic faith. That bears out my point that when members of that faith find their homes broken up with no possibility of reconciliation, they seek a divorce either before Parliament or from one of our provincial courts; they get their divorce and they remarry. By whom the ceremony is performed, I don't know. I asked the honourable senator from Northumberland (Hon. Mr. Burchill) how divorced people who belong to the Church of England got remarried, and he said they were married in the United Church.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I suspect the Presbyterian Church.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I asked him directly whether the ministers of his church would not remarry divorced people, and he said, "Well, they do, but we don't say anything about it." This situation is true in all the provinces, right across Canada: regardless of the church to which people belong, if their homes are broken up they take the action necessary to rehabilitate themselves.

I shall deal next with the fourth objection to the bill, namely, that additional grounds lead to an increase in the number of divorces. May I say that the statistics presented by the senator from Grandville and the senator from Ottawa West in my opinion prove nothing except that there has been a world-wide increase in divorce since the horse and buggy days of the last century.

I have before me a copy of a bulletin issued by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company giving statistics on mortality, divorce, and many things. This is an authoritative document which I receive regularly. The issue I have in my hand, which is dated January, 1947—and that was Canada's peak year for divorces—shows that along with Canada all other countries in the world are experiencing a sharp upturn in the divorce rate. This publication also points to the fact that the rate in Canada has climbed much more rapidly than in the United States, where in many states there are more than one ground for divorce.

I also have the report of the Royal Commission on Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, in England, brought down in 1912-13. May I say at the outset, this is not an editorial. One witness who appeared before the commission was Mr. J. Arthur Barratt, whose qualifications are set out at page 175, as follows:

> . . . A member of the United States Supreme Court Bar, of the New York Bar, member of the Council of the International Law Association and of its Committee on Divorce Jurisdiction, one of the legal advisers to the Embassy of the United States in this country—

That would be in England. The report on the back of page 175 contains this paragraph:

> Mr. Barratt points out that, whatever the reason for increase or decrease in percentages may be, such increase or decrease cannot be accounted for by the number of statutory causes for divorce. He refers to the statistics of various states, and shows that, whereas in some states with numerous causes the increase has been slight, or there has been even a decrease, as in Connecticut, in other states, having few causes, the increase has been considerably greater, as, for instance, in New York, where adultery is the only cause.

What is our experience in the Senate Divorce Committee? When I first came here, in 1933-34, there were not more than forty-five or fifty divorces each session. Now, still with only one ground, we have more than four hundred, or an increase of some 800 per cent. It is obvious that this is a world-wide condition, which does not arise just because the United States happens to have more grounds and more divorces than we have. We are not in favour of the practices of the "bed-hoppers" of Hollywood, many of whom divorce and marry again and again just for publicity purposes. What we are asking for is a sane reasonable law—not that of Nevada or Hollywood and such places. It is my submission that the facts do not support the argument that additional grounds cause increased divorces in other countries.

I am not one of those who do not believe in divorce. Much as I dislike it, I believe it is the only cure for this disease—this cancer that the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) spoke of—and if we do not find a cure for it, the disease will persist and the people will have no relief from it.

I agree with the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) that if the bill passes we shall have more divorces. While that is certainly true, we shall not have as many based on the ground of adultery. More than half of the cases being heard here for adultery could be tried on the ground of desertion. When the great backlog of perhaps two or three thousand desertion cases have been cleared away and the parties have received their rights and have remarried, the divorce rate will level off. But that can never happen until we dispose of the backlog of desertion cases.

I think that people who oppose this bill overlook the fact that we have had two great wars in the world since 1914, and that they have upset the whole world and in the circumstances it is only natural that people have become separated and alienated. There has been a natural increase in the number of divorces, no matter what the grounds are. In Canada, we have only one ground, yet over the years our divorces have gone up by leaps and bounds, on account of the two great wars and the generally upset condition of the world.

Honourable senators will be glad to know that I am getting along with my remarks. I want to say something now about the bill itself.

I do not pretend that this bill is perfect at all. We did the best we could with it. In 1938 it was amended in committee, and further amended in committee of the whole house. If I recall rightly, I think that I brought in the amendment. The late Senator Murdock was in the chair at the time. The amendments were drafted by our Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. O'Connor, at the suggestion of the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) and the Right Honourable Senator Meighen.

I might say, honourable senators, that there is a wonderful debate reported on this subject in the Hansard of 1938. The bill was spoken to by Senator Sir Allen Aylesworth. I believe Senator Lynch-Staunton also spoke. There were several speeches by Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, and an outstanding one by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris). The outcome was that certain sections of the bill were redrafted, and they appear in the present bill in substantially the same form as they were when the 1938 bill passed the Senate.

As I said before, honourable senators, the present bill is very simple. It provides only three new grounds, plus the ground of presumption of death if one of the spouses has been absent for seven years without trace.

Some objection was taken to the ground of desertion. This could be pleaded only if the petitioner had been deserted without cause for a period of at least three years. It is a matter that can be talked over and dealt with in committee. Some people might believe that a three-year period was not long enough, that four years would be more proper. The honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) asked me the other day how many years' desertion were required in Scotland. At that time I told him that I did not know, but in the meantime I have found out that the period is four years.

The next ground is cruelty: In 1938 the same question which was raised by the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) came up, and we ended up by not formulating any definition of cruelty. At that time we studied the case of Russell versus Russell and all the other cases, and whether we were right or wrong the conclusion was reached that it would be better to leave the determination of cruelty to the courts. I might say that I have no objection whatever to a definition of cruelty such as the one given to us the other day by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris).

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) gave a definition.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There was a definition recommended by the Royal Commission in England in 1912-1913. It would suit me, even though it might not cover every case. This is it:

> Cruelty is such conduct by one married person to the other party to the marriage as makes it unsafe, having regard to the risk of life, limb, or health, bodily or mental, for the latter to continue to live with the former.

In the Herbert Bill of 1937, as it passed the British Parliament, no definition of cruelty was given. Cruelty is not defined in the Nova Scotia statute, where it has been a ground for divorce for many years. By the way, I was speaking to a prominent lawyer from Nova Scotia the other day and I asked him about the number of divorce cases that had been tried in that province. He told me that he has been practising for over forty years and a large number of divorce cases have passed through his office, yet during all that time only two of the cases alleged the ground of cruelty. Evidently that ground has not been abused in Nova Scotia, even though it is not defined in their statute. Maybe they have better judges there than anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: That is true.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Sometimes out West we say that all our judges are from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. What I mean by that is that all lawyers and judges in the Maritimes are of very high calibre.

The only definition of cruelty that I can find in any statute is in the Alberta act respecting judicial separation, and that definition would not suit this bill at all. I would say that a person can obtain a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty, even though the cruelty alleged may be, in my opinion, less severe than that required in an action for divorce.

I will not clutter the record by reading that definition because I think the one submitted by the honourable senator from Vancouver South and the one I read from the English Royal Commission's report are better.

I have not said much about incurable insanity. The very top letter in this file before me is from a man who says that his wife has been in a mental institution for nineteen years, with no hope whatever of recovery. He says:

> I am not advocating an easy divorce, but I feel that in a case such as this either party should be legally released. The case has brought a lot of hardship into my life for the past nineteen years.

He ends up his letter by saying:

> I hope you will do everything possible from your side to have this bill go through.

There are in this file dozens of other letters of a similar nature, which I shall not burden the Senate by either reading or referring to. I will merely say this: I am—rather like the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig)—a hard-boiled lawyer, but when I read these letters I cannot keep the tears from my eyes, because they tell very sad stories indeed. If the Senate of Canada is not broad-minded enough to pass this bill, I cannot help it. I have done my best. But at least I ask honourable members to give it second reading so that it may go to a committee and be studied there.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: Will the honourable senator allow me a question? I have heard it stated by several advocates of this bill that much of the increase of divorces is attributable to the two great wars through which we have passed in the last thirty-five or forty years. Is that so? If it is, can he state the percentage of cases in which one or other of the parties has served in the armed forces?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: No. The only record available to me relates to parliamentary divorces, and the Chief Clerk of Committees would have to examine every case in order to supply the information the honourable senator asks for. There have been many cases of girls having married men who were going overseas, with no other purpose than to obtain the soldier's allowance or a portion of his pay. But I cannot quote percentages.

When the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) was speaking the other day, a question arose as to the constitutionality of that portion of the bill before us which has to do with the granting of a divorce after seven years' absence of one of the parties. There is no question whatever that in that respect the passing of this bill is within the competence of the federal Parliament. The matter was studied very carefully by the late Mr. O'Connor, and more recently by our present Law Clerk, Mr. MacNeill; and in their opinion the provision has to do entirely with divorce and has no relation to property and civil rights. In various provinces there is legislation which permits a spouse to apply for an order that his or her partner is legally dead. The right to do so arises from the theory that such a declaration is concerned with property, and if the application is granted the estate or property of the person so deemed to be legally dead can be administered. That jurisdiction is wholly provincial. I affirm without hesitation that the legislation in this respect is constitutional.

Also, a question was asked with reference to avoidance, in section 12. This clause was framed in 1938, subsequent to the speeches to which I referred a short time ago, and it was drafted in its present form so that it should in no way affect provincial practice and procedure. It will be noted that as the section says that "in addition to any other grounds on which, in the province and in the court to which the petition has been presented, a marriage is by law void or voidable", the specified grounds shall apply. As far as the inclusion of epilepsy as a ground is concerned, I do not suppose that, if its elimination were thought to be advisable, there would be any serious objection.

Before resuming my seat I wish to make a few general remarks. I believe everyone will admit that our existing divorce laws are harsh. Lawyers at any rate, can vouch for the fact that on this account a great many people have left Canada and sought relief in the United States, Mexico, or some other foreign country. In my limited practice I have had to advise on many occasions that, under the law as it exists in Canada today, my clients could have no hope of relief; and when they asked me what they could do, my reply was: "You will have to leave this country, take up residence and become domiciled in a foreign state, and then you can get a divorce and marry someone else, provided that you establish a permanent home in that country." I repeat: thousands of people have left Canada for the United States because, as a result of our harsh laws, relief for them here was impossible.

There is in this country but one ground of divorce. It follows that much perjury is committed in our courts, and there is a great deal of collusion and connivance in connection with the proceedings. The newspapers have reported many cases of murder and suicide which, I believe, resulted from unhappy marriages for which no legal redress was possible. The couples found they could not get along together; they were without hope for the future; and finally one or the other went "berserk".

Honourable senators, if this bill is not passed, all these people I have mentioned will have no hope. What will they do? Well, they will do just exactly what they say in these letters—they will live in a common law relationship and perhaps raise illegitimate children. Would it not be far better for us to liberalize our laws a little, make them a little more sane? If they are not antediluvian, they are at least antiquated. Let us make them more human. Let us clear up this cancer, this disease, that is so harmful to the domestic life of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of the Honourable Senator Aseltine, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gershaw, for the second reading of Bill O-6, an Act respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine was negatived on the following division:

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 184, an Act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this legislation is to increase the salary of the Auditor General of Canada as of July 1, 1954. The present salary of this official is $15,000. I am sure all honourable senators know the very important work that he does, and will be surprised to learn that his present salary is the same as that which was received by the Auditor General thirty-one years ago.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In effect, his salary has been cut in two during the intervening years.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so. I am not an economist to that extent, but taking for granted what the honourable senator says, the proposed increase will not bring the salary of the Auditor General to the level it was thirty-one years ago. I will not vouch for that, but I thought I should mention the fact that this would be the first increase in salary for the Auditor General in thirty-one years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If this legislation passes, what will the salary of this official be?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If this legislation is passed the Auditor General will be paid a salary of $20,000 per annum.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave, next sitting.

PRIVATE BILL

FREDERICTON & GRAND LAKE COAL & RAILWAY COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Clarence J. Veniot moved the second reading of Bill F-10, an Act respecting the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is a short one, and the explanatory notes on the second page will be sufficient to give an understanding of its purpose. However, a brief review of the background of the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company might be of interest to members of this house. The company was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of New Brunswick in 1910. It was authorized to construct a railway line extending about 35 miles in length from Gibson, now South Devon, directly opposite the city of Fredericton on the Saint John river to Minto, New Brunswick, where large coal mines had recently been discovered. By other statutes of the province the Lieutenant Governor in Council was authorized to guarantee the payment of the principal and interest of bonds of the Fredericton company if certain conditions were complied with. One of these conditions was that the Fredericton company should give a first mortgage on its railway and appurtenances to the province and should lease its line to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a period of 999 years, the rental under the lease to be 40 per cent of the gross earnings, and to be payable to the Province of New Brunswick. It was also provided that the rental should be applied in payment of the interest of the bonds and that the surplus, if any, should be turned back by the province to the Fredericton company.

Construction of the line was commenced in 1912 and completed in 1913. It is a matter of record that the Canadian Pacific actually built the line at a cost of approximately $600,000, and received the whole issue of the bonds of the Fredericton company as part payment of the advances made.

To further comply with the legislation passed, by a lease dated November 4, 1914 the line was leased to the Canadian Pacific for a period of 999 years from that date. As required by the statutes mentioned, the rental under the lease was 40 per cent of the gross earnings of the line, and this rental was made payable to the Province of New Brunswick.

Steps are being taken at the present time whereby the bonds will be redeemed in full and the province will give a discharge of the mortgage which the company originally gave to the provincial Government. At the same time, the province will assign the rental under the lease to the Fredericton company. In order to enable the province to do this, an act of the New Brunswick Legislature will be passed at the present session specifically authorizing the assignment of the rental to the Fredericton company.

The line has been, and will continue to be, operated as an integral part of the Canadian Pacific Railway system.

The proposed bill will not affect the public in any way. The practical effect of the ownership by the Canadian Pacific of all capital stock and bonds of the Fredericton company, combined with the lease of that company's line to the Canadian Pacific for 999 years, is tantamount to an amalgamation of both companies. The act sought from the Parliament of Canada, and a complementary act being sought from the Legislature of New Brunswick, will provide for the eventual dissolution of the Fredericton company.

The purpose of the bill, therefore, is to effect a simplification in the corporate organization of the Canadian Pacific. It will eliminate unnecessary bookkeeping and accounting work which is now involved by reason of the existence of the subsidiary company in its present form. The procedure of vesting the assets and undertaking of the Fredericton company in the Canadian Pacific, and the assumption by the Canadian Pacific of the liabilities and duties of the Fredericton company, has been chosen because of its simplicity.

I think I may properly summarize this explanation by saying that this bill merely puts into legal form the ownership which the Canadian Pacific has had of the Fredericton line from the very beginning of the latter's operation, and does away with a lot of unnecessary bookkeeping and a lot of duplication of accounting.

In a nutshell, honourable senators, that is an explanation of the bill. If further explanation is desired it can be supplied by representatives of the two companies when the bill comes before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

NARCOTIC DRUG TRAFFIC

COMMITTEE'S PLANS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I rise on a question of privilege with respect to a news item which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of this morning. It reads:

Ottawa, March 23—The Senate's special 23-man committee on narcotics will become a travelling investigational body in a role akin to that of a royal commission.

Its first trip will be to Vancouver, hub of drug addiction in Canada. Hearings will start there April 18.

Later, the committee plans a visit to Kingston Penitentiary to see how addicts among the 88 women prisoners there are handled. Still later the committee will visit a big addiction treatment centre at Lexington, Ky.

May I point out to honourable senators that the committee has so far decided to travel only to Vancouver, and there only because of the large number of drug addicts in that centre. The question of going elsewhere has not even been discussed. As Chairman of the committee I feel that a decision to travel elsewhere than to Vancouver is one that must be made by the committee itself. Meanwhile, I think that the suggestion that it is to become a royal commission roving all over the country, should be corrected.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. James A. MacKinnon moved the second reading of Bill C, an Act to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

He said: Honourable senators, although this bill is a short one it is quite important to those concerned—manufacturers, retailers and consumers. It has been suggested that I give a rather extended explanation; however, I shall try to make it as brief as possible.

The Precious Metals Marking Act deals with articles of gold, silver, platinum and palladium, and articles plated with gold or silver.

Under the act, it is not mandatory that articles of, or plated with, precious metals be marked as to content. The act does, however, provide that where reference is made to the precious metal content, then that content shall be shown in a particular manner. For example, a gold ring may be sold as just a plain ring, but if reference is made to gold, then the gold content must be indicated. If it is represented as being of carat quality, say 10K, then it must be 10/24ths by weight gold. In addition, where such quality mark—that is, the precious metal content—is placed on an article, it must also carry a registered trade mark or a trade mark for which application has been made.

The present bill provides for two amendments. The first deals with the method of applying quality marks to gold-filled or rolled gold plate bracelet wrist watches which have base metal parts. The difference between gold-filled and rolled gold plate lies mainly in the thickness of the gold. In the former, it is 3/1000 inches, and in the latter 1½/1000 inches of gold which is at least of 10K quality. Under the act as it stands, where all parts of the bracelet watch case have gold content, the quality mark and trade mark can be applied to any part, but it is usually applied to the back. Where some parts of the case are plated or filled, and others are of base metal, the quality markings must be applied to those parts which are plated, and the words "base metal" to those which are base metal. With the present size of wrist watches, it is difficult to place marks on the plated parts without damage; further, if they are put on, they are often so small as to be indecipherable. As a result, few wrist watch cases carry any quality marks, and any quality declaration is on an attached tag. To provide informative marking, it is proposed that the manufacturers be permitted to indicate on the outer side of the base metal back the quality mark of the other parts, with an indication of which parts are base metal. No change is necessary where all parts are gold-plated or gold filled. This additional method of marking has the approval of the Canadian Jewellers Association.

The second amendment, which is technical, results from the necessity under the existing act, of applying to precious metal articles a registered trade mark or one for which application has been made under the Unfair Competition Act. The Trade Marks Act, proclaimed on July 1, 1954, repealed the Unfair Competition Act. The new Trade Marks Act did provide that registrations under the Unfair Competition Act are retained as such, and applications for registration still pending under the old act are to be dealt with under that act. However, there is apparently nothing in the new Trade Marks Act to provide that trade marks or applications made under the old act shall be deemed to have been made under the new act. The view of the law officers of the Crown was, therefore, that the Precious Metals Marking Act should be amended to refer to trade marks as having been registered, and to applications for trade marks as having been made under either act.

Trade marks are required for identification of the manufacturer.

Honourable senators, if this bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the appropriate standing committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. MacKinnon, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 183, an Act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is clearly set out in the explanatory notes, and probably I should refer to them. They commence as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide
> (a) that a withdrawal allowance payable under the act will include any interest that has been paid on contributions under subsection (1) of section 8 of the act, and
> (b) to make it clear that in all cases where a withdrawal allowance becomes payable under the act, any amount owing under the act, except interest owing under subsection (2) of section 8, is, in effect, written off.

As honourable senators are probably aware, at the present time the members of the House of Commons contribute a total of $240 per annum into a fund. If they pay into the fund in respect of sessions for three Parliaments and then retire from Parliament, either voluntarily or involuntarily, they are entitled annually to a percentage of the money they have paid in. They are entitled to three-quarters of the principal amount which they have contributed to the fund. The maximum amount of principal payable into the fund is $4,000, so that the maximum retiring allowance is $3,000. However, if after a member has contributed in respect of sessions in three Parliaments he becomes a member of the Senate, he does not receive any benefit from the fund.

When the act came into force a number of members had been in the House of Commons long enough to qualify for the full amount of the retiring allowance. Under the provisions of the act they had to declare within one year whether they would claim the benefit provided by the act; and if so they then could elect to pay a lump sum into the fund or to contribute by way of regular payments. The lump sum payable by a member was arrived at on the basis of $240 for each previous session in respect of which he wished to contribute, plus interest at 4 per cent per annum from the date of the final payment of sessional indemnity in respect of that session to the date on which he elected to contribute for this prior service. It will be seen that in certain instances a member might elect to pay in the full amount of $4,000, together with interest over the years, which could come to approximately $1,000. Therefore, some lump payments were as high as $5,000.

Some difficulty has been encountered in administering the act where members have died and it has been necessary to recover from their estates. Let us take a case where one member has paid in a lump sum of $5,000 and another member during the same sessions has made only a small instalment payment; and then suppose that both members died. The estate of the member who has paid in the lump sum of $5,000 would get only $4,000 back, leaving the sum of $1,000 in the fund, that being interest; whereas the estate of the member who merely elected to pay into the fund by way of instalments would only be required to pay interest on the unpaid balance of $5,000 from the time of election until the date of the member's death. The purpose of the present bill is to provide that the estates of both members would be chargeable with only the interest owing. Of course, in the case where the $5,000 has been paid there would be no interest, but in the other case the estate would pay just the interest on the amount owing.

Hon. Mr. Reid: If a member died would his widow have to pay what is owing into the fund?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The estate would be chargeable for the amount owing, whether or not the beneficiary is the widow.

Here is another difficulty in the administration of the present act. Suppose a member has not paid any money into the fund in respect of prior service and retires from Parliament. In that case he might still have a withdrawal allowance, because he has returnable to him the contribution made for current service. Take the case of a member who has agreed to pay in $5,000, and retires from Parliament. At the end of the first year he would be entitled to $3,000; but he would not get it, because he would owe the fund the $5,000.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The $3,000 would go toward the debt?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, it would go toward the debt. On the other hand, if the member died just before the remaining $2,000 was paid off, then there would be a claim on the estate for the balance outstanding, plus interest; whereas if he had lived just one day beyond the date on which he would have become entitled to a direct allowance, the estate would have nothing to pay in, except some interest. The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that in such circumstances the estate would not be liable for the $2,000, but of course in any event the estate would be liable for any interest that was owing.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What would happen if the member were appointed to the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the member were appointed to the Senate, he might be entitled to an annual allowance, which is suspended while he is a member of the Senate, or he might be entitled to a withdrawal allowance.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Would he be entitled to any withdrawal if he had never paid in anything?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, he would not. If he were appointed to the Senate he would have to pay some interest, but he would not have to pay $4,000 or $5,000. In fact, I happen to be in that position myself, as probably some other senators are.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is why I asked the question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Members of the House of Commons who are appointed to the Senate and who have paid in, will get their money back.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is clear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If they have not paid in the full amount they may be required to pay some interest. If they have not paid in anything, there would of course be some interest to pay, at the rate of 4 per cent.

The purpose of this bill is to do away with claims for principal against estates of deceased members. The bill received the consideration of the House of Commons and was passed after an explanation of it had been given. However, I must say that from reading the debate in the House of Commons Hansard I did not get much enlightenment on the subject. I hope I have imparted a little enlightenment.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Can the honourable leader give the Senate any information on the number of members who are retired and receiving allowances, and also how the fund itself stands?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no information on how many members are retired and receiving allowances, but I understand there are not many. As to the fund itself, I understand that at the present time it is actuarially sound.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: May I inquire again as to the amount paid in yearly by the member?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: $240. When the act first came into effect, it was specified as 6 per cent of the sessional indemnity, which was then $4,000, so that the annual amount required to be paid by the member was $240. The indemnity is now $8,000, and at six per cent the annual amount payable by members would be $480; but an amendment to the act fixed the contribution at 6 per cent of the first $4,000 of sessional indemnity.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: And the maximum amount that a member will be required to pay in is $4,000?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, that is the maximum amount.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What is the amount of the benefit?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The benefit is 75 per cent of the amount paid in, and the member must pay in respect of three parliaments.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It occurs to me that when the original bill came before us we felt that as it principally concerned members of the Commons we should have very little to say about it or to do with it. Apparently the bill had some bad loopholes. It is unfortunate that we did not take a more serious view, and inquire into the details of the bill in one of our committees, as we do with other bills. It just shows what is lost when the Senate does not make its usual inquiry.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I think the bill was sent to a committee the last time.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, but it was given perfunctory consideration, because we thought it was purely a House of Commons measure. This is an instance of how a defective bill can "get by" if it is not given proper attention by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As his Honour the Speaker indicated earlier, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will attend at this chamber for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain bills at 5.45 p.m. I therefore move that the house now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell, at approximately 5.40.

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 284, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1956.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: With leave of the Senate, next sitting.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. In a local newspaper, on Thursday last, March 24, an article appeared entitled:

"Ganged up" to defeat Divorce Bill.

The article quotes the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine). I wonder if the honourable senator would like to comment on the article.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I should like to say that I was as much surprised as anyone when the article was shown to me, for I did not at any time make any comment for a publication. In this instance I have certainly been misquoted. However, if at any time I did say anything which offended any member of this chamber, I had no intention of doing so.

PRIVATE BILL

BONAVENTURE AND GASPÉ TELEPHONE COMPANY—COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

A message was received from the House of Commons returning Bill P-6, an Act respecting The Bonaventure and Gaspe Telephone Company, Limited and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with certain amendments to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendments were read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

Page 1, line 21: Strike out the words "a majority of the shareholders" and insert the following: "not less than two-thirds of the issued shares".

Page 4, line 38: Strike out the word "subscribed" and substitute therefor the word "issued".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Stanley S. McKeen: Honourable senators, on behalf of the honourable senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Bouffard), I move, with leave, that these amendments be concurred in now.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: What are the amendments?

Hon. Mr. McKeen: The first amendment would provide that the capital stock of the company may be increased by a resolution of a two-thirds majority of the stockholders. The second amendment, having to do with the borrowing powers of the company, provides that sanction must be by a vote of not less than two-thirds of the issued shares, instead of two-thirds of the subscribed shares.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. W. D. Euler presented Bill H-10, an Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Before the bill receives first reading, may I ask the honourable senator if he will enlighten the house a little more as to what the bill involves, than is indicated in its title?

Hon. Mr. Euler: I am glad my friend asked the question, although I had not expected it, because it has not been the custom in this house to ask questions on first readings. The purpose of the bill is a very simple one; it is that it shall be made obligatory to fill vacancies in the Senate within a period of six months, or in some reasonable time.

The bill was read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Mr. Euler: May 4.

CANADA GRAIN BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill 245, an Act to amend the Canada Grain Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I presume that you will require some explanation of this bill—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: —which, I may add, is the customary practice. Before I come to deal directly with the proposed amendments to the Canada Grain Act, it might be of interest to take honourable members on a brief historical survey of the development of the act.

When settlers commenced to pour into the Prairies it was not long before the marketing of prairie grain became a serious problem. The Canadian Pacific Railway had been built through the West, branch lines were being established and settlers were coming into the country in large numbers. The open prairies were easy to plow and develop, and the large yields of grain even in the late eighties, and certainly during the period from 1890 to 1900, caused grave problems in marketing. Grain was already being produced in tens of millions of bushels. Hitherto, the settlers who had gone to Western Canada had marketed their small crops in Ontario, Quebec, or other eastern provinces where they had come from, but when individual farmers were producing as much as 5,000 bushels of wheat the difficulties of marketing became far greater. It was inevitable that these difficulties should raise serious problems. Elevator companies, patterned after those in operation south of the international boundary line, were formed. They were unregulated, and sometimes they did not treat the producer altogether fairly. There was considerable agitation, so much so that in 1899 a royal commission was set up to examine into the marketing problems of Western wheat.

Incidentally, that was the first royal commission to undertake such a task. Its chairman was Judge Senkler, from Ontario, assisted by three Western farmers. The report of the commission recommended to the Government that a grain act be passed modelled upon the lines of a similar act of the State of Minnesota. In the year 1900 the first grain act, known as the Manitoba Grain Act, was passed. I read the debate on the Act in the House of Commons Hansard the other day, and it was very interesting to read about the establishment of the initial piece of legislation. In the year 1899 a grain inspection system had been established and the late David Horn was appointed Chief Grain Inspector. That was simply an effort to classify wheat by grades, and to give the grades Government sanction, and thus afford a reliable index to purchasers in Europe or elsewhere of the quality of grain which was being offered for sale. The original Manitoba Act had 57 sections, and quite a number of schedules. The important part of the legislation concerned the duties assigned to the warehouse commissioner who was to be appointed by the Government under the act:

> The head office of the commissioner shall be at Winnipeg, and his duties shall be as follows:
> (a) to require all elevators, warehouses, mills, and grain commission merchants to take out an annual licence;
> (b) to fix the amount of bonds to be given by the different owners and operators of elevators, mills, and flat warehouses and by grain commission merchants;
> (c) to require the persons so licensed to keep books in forms approved of by the commissioner or by the Governor in Council;
> (d) to supervise the handling and storage of grain, in and out of elevators, warehouses and cars;
> (e) to receive and investigate all complaints made in writing, under oath, of undue dockage, improper weights or grading, refusal or neglect to furnish cars within a reasonable time, all complaints of fraud or oppression by any person, firm or corporation, owning or operating any elevator, warehouse, mill or railroad, or by any grain commission merchant, and to apply such remedy as is provided by statute;
> (f) to enforce rules and regulations made under this act, and to report to the Minister of Inland Revenue such changes therein as he deems advisable;
> (g) to institute prosecutions at the Government expense whenever he considers a case proper therefor.

That was the core of the first Manitoba Grain Act. It will be observed that by these provisions a control was imposed upon all dealers in grain, as a consequence of which farmers ceased to suffer losses from defalcations. Prior to these provisions, sometimes a farmer shipped a carload of grain which when sold would not be accounted to him. That was overcome, first, by licensing the dealer and the commission merchant, and, secondly, by imposing upon the dealer or commission merchant a sufficient bond to afford the necessary protection to the producers. The first warehouse commissioner was Mr. C. C. Castles, who was also a member of the first grain commission which I have mentioned. I recall Mr. Castles very well. He was a very efficient and able commissioner.

In spite of the provisions of the act, not all of the problems were solved. In 1906 it was deemed necessary to appoint another royal commission, the chairman of which was Mr. John Miller, of Indian Head, who had associated with him two other gentlemen, Messrs. McNair and Goldie. As a result of the commission's report further amendments to the act were made.

In 1912 there was a somewhat extensive revision of the Grain Act. The position of warehouse commissioner was abolished, and the first Board of Grain Commissioners was provided for. The board was given the supervision and administration of the act, and this system continues to the present time.

In 1923 another inquiry was undertaken, presided over by Mr. Justice Turgeon, who was then a member of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan. That was an exhaustive inquiry covering all phases of the trade, and it resulted in further improvements to the legislation.

In 1931, when the late Lord Bennett was Prime Minister of Canada, another royal commission was appointed, of which Sir Josiah Stamp—an economist from England—was chairman, assisted by two other commissioners, namely, Mr. Justice Brown, of Saskatchewan, and Mr. Sanford Evans, of Winnipeg. That commission was authorized to inquire into and report upon what effect, if any, the dealing in grain futures had upon the price received by the producer. At that time there had arisen a great deal of criticism in the prairie provinces in connection with the dealing in grain futures by what were popularly called "options", which it was claimed operated against the interests of the producer. In passing, may I say that I have never been convinced of that, and I think the reverse is the case. However, that is beside the point. The Stamp Commission made a very thorough but rather rapid survey of this single matter referred to it. The commission's report confirmed the impression held by many people, that while the method of dealing in futures in grain that was purchased in the country might be improved, the underlying principle of futures trading was sound and operated to the benefit of the producer.

In 1936 another royal commission was set up, again under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Turgeon, and a lengthy inquiry was conducted. It is interesting to note in passing that the two commissions headed by Mr. Justice Turgeon and the Stamp commission reported in favour of the maintenance of the futures market as an aid to the Western producer in the selling of his grain.

Many inquiries were conducted also by Parliamentary committees on agriculture; but it is unnecessary to deal with them, and I do not propose to do so. I would again remind honourable senators that it is just fifty-five years since the first Manitoba Grain Act was placed on the statute books and became what the Western farmers later claimed to be the great charter of freedom in the marketing of their grain.

The proposals in the bill before us are few and simple. The first amendment would increase the salaries of the Chief Commissioner and the other two commissioners. My recollection is that at the present time the Chief Commissioner receives an annual salary of $13,500, which would be increased to $15,000.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: His present salary is $14,000.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Thank you. I was a little conservative, as I usually am.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But liberal in your proposed increase.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The second amendment would provide for one additional assistant commissioner. At the present time there are three: one resident in Alberta, and one each in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The proposed new assistant would be located in Saskatchewan, which produces more grain—certainly more wheat—than the other two provinces combined.

An idea of the scope of the business of marketing grain is suggested by the fact that there are more than 5,000 country elevators in the three prairie provinces; and that in addition there are terminal elevators at the head of the lakes, in the cities of Vancouver, Saskatoon, Calgary and one or two other places. Therefore, the appointment of a fourth assistant grain commissioner would appear wholly justified.

The existing law provides that in the weigh-up of terminal elevators, surplus grain may under certain circumstances be taken by the Government; and hitherto such grain has been disposed of, under the law, by the Board of Grain Commissioners. My recollection is that the proceeds therefrom were paid into the consolidated revenue fund. It is now proposed to change the method of disposing of the surplus so obtained. Hereafter, if this legislation passes, the surplus will be turned over to the Wheat Board for disposal, instead of to the Board of Grain Commissioners. In that case, I presume the receipts therefrom would become part of the funds of the Wheat Board and be available at some future time for distribution to the producers. I am not at all clear as to the reasons for this change, and I did not attempt to learn why it is being proposed. This bill, I think, should go to a committee, where we could ascertain the reasons for this.

There are one or two minor amendments: one, dealing with the grading of Durum wheat, results from the experience gained in the marketing of that product. As honourable senators know, Durum wheat has now become an important part of the wheat production of the Prairies. I have no doubt that the recommendations made in the bill in this respect carry the judgment of the Board of Grain Commissioners and all interested parties, including pools, and that the recommendations are in the right direction.

Provision is also made for changing the grading of soybeans. It is interesting to note that this product is becoming of some importance from the farmer's standpoint and, consequently, provision is made to place the marketing in line with the general marketing legislation establishing proper grades. That, honourable senators, covers the amendments proposed in this bill.

I have one or two general observations to make. It was a matter of regret to me that some criticism was directed against the existing Board of Grain Commissioners. The present chief of the board is Mr. Donald McKenzie. I am sure the honourable senator from Edmonton (Hon. Mr. MacKinnon), who at one time was Minister of Trade and Commerce and had to do with the board, will confirm me when I say that in Mr. McKenzie we have not only a man of ability but a man of outstanding integrity, who enjoys to a remarkable degree the confidence of everyone associated with the marketing of grain.

There has also been some criticism in certain places as to the appointment of a new grain commissioner. I do not propose to deal with that at the moment. The suggestion was made that the western wheat pools should be consulted as to the proper person to fill the vacancy created by the lapsing of Mr. Vallance's term of office by reason of his retirement through having reached the retirement age.

I have always believed—and I have said this before, if not in this house, certainly in the House of Commons—that it is a fallacious and mistaken principle, in the appointment of responsible public boards and commissions, to seek nominations from persons or bodies directly interested in the functions which such commissions have to discharge. It would not be reasonable to give railway companies the right to name members of the Board of Transport Commissioners, or allow the banks to have the final word in the appointment of the Inspector General of Banks—who is a very important official—or to consult the Manufacturers' Association with a view to having them nominate or designate members of the Tariff Board. So, I repeat my conviction that it is wrong in principle, and ultimately subversive of good administration, to seek appointments through the agency of bodies which have a special interest in the administration with which such boards are charged.

I have no hesitation in recommending the amendments to the house. If the bill should receive second reading it will be sent to the appropriate committee.

The story behind this measure is a long one. Fifty-five years is quite a lengthy period to look back upon; and what astonishes me is that, with relatively so little knowledge and experience, the originators of the Manitoba Grain Act, in venturing upon new ground, produced a piece of legislation which in its main essentials has stood the test of more than half a century. It is interesting to read the report of the debate when that measure was introduced. Its sponsor was the then Minister of Inland Revenue, Sir Henri Joly de Lotbiniere. The licence fees which were collected in pursuance of the act were channelled at that time into the Ministry of Inland Revenue, and it was not until much later that the administration of the act came under the Department of Trade and Commerce—the department which, I think, is the proper one to administer it. In reading the report of the debate on the introduction of the bill, I could not but be impressed with the fact that a group of men drawn from both the political parties actively participated in the discussion, with a quite obvious desire to produce the best legislation possible. The result, as I said a moment ago, was an act which in essence has successfully passed the test of fifty-five years; and I venture to say that it will be in existence fifty-five years hence, and that when, at that time, further amendments may be introduced and considered, those who take part in the discussion will say, looking back on the history of the statute, "Those who founded the Manitoba Grain Act built wisely and well".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I ask the honourable senator from Churchill one or two questions about the bill? I notice that "western grain" and "eastern grain" are mentioned. To what areas or provinces do these respective designations refer?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: As a matter of fact, eastern grain comprises a very small part of the total grain movement.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does "eastern grain" cover grain grown in Ontario and Quebec?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That would be eastern grain.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Why is the word "Mindum" substituted for "Durum" in clauses 5 and 6 of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The probable reason is that Durum is very frequently referred to as "Mindum" wheat". I cannot say more than that I think the two names are interchangeable.

Hon. Mr. Reid: By reference to the schedule relating to soybeans it will be noted that, in relation to grade No. 1, the standard of quality is stated to be "cool, of natural odour, well-screened, of good natural colour". The word "cool" appears all the way down the schedule. I should like to know what it means.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am bound to say that my knowledge does not extend to that particular point, but I have no doubt that when the bill gets to committee we shall have a satisfactory explanation of the meaning.

Hon. John T. Haig: I shall not take much of the time of the house. I rose only because some bitter words have been said elsewhere about the Chief Commissioner and one of the deputies who are connected with the administration of the act, and both of whom I personally know very well.

If anyone here supposes that my knowledge of grain does not extend as far back as that of my honourable friend from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), I want to disabuse his mind of that idea at once. I can remember when we used to pile grain on sidings in bags, for there was nothing else to put it in. The bags would be piled along the right of way for perhaps a quarter of a mile. At many points there were neither elevators nor warehouses. I can recall driving a horse which pulled the scantlings to the site of the first elevator which was built at Alexander, Manitoba, and which was, by the way, one of the first elevators in that province. I also remember that when my father was the grain buyer at that point he discovered, when he weighed out the grain in the spring of his first year's operations, that he was short a thousand bushels; and the company made him pay. I can remember him saying to my mother, "I'll not be short next year." He was there for nineteen years and I think that was the only shortage he ever had. I was a young fellow at the time and I think I heard the country point of view far more forcefully than did the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). He was in the country too, but I do not think this was as active an issue in his day as it was in mine. I can remember my father saying, "It's a cruel world. I gave the farmers what I thought was fair and just weight." As you know, when the grain was weighed the handlers made an allowance of two or three pounds a bushel for dirt and weeds, and he allowed only three pounds when he should have allowed about four. As a result he lost money, but the next year I think he allowed five pounds. The only objection he raised during all those years was this. He said, "You know, when I was behind I paid for it, and when I was ahead they profited by it."

Quite a feeling has been built up about the Grain Board, with the real question concerning grading. In my day there was very little difference between grades 2 and 3, and a person did not have to put a great deal of grade 1 into grade 3 to make the equivalent of grade 2, and you made a profit or otherwise according to the prices of grades 1, 2 and 3, the contract grades. But this sort of thing has been cleared up by various amendments that have been made to the Canada Grain Act throughout the years.

Honourable senators, the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Grain Commissioners, Mr. D. G. McKenzie, is a neighbour of mine in Winnipeg. I knew his family in Brandon as far back as September, 1895, when his brother and I went to school together. I want to assure you that Mr. McKenzie is still the same honest, upright, smart farmer that he was in those days, and it is a credit to Canada to have such a man at the head of our Grain Board. I also know something about Mr. R. W. Milner, one of the commissioners, who I believe is an expert in ironing out the difficult problems that arise with respect to the distribution of freight cars. Mr. Milner is one of the most experienced officials in our whole grain set-up.

I make this speech for the purpose only of supporting the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). I entirely agree with what he says about the appointment of members of the Board of Grain Commissioners. The Government should always appoint the men it thinks are best fitted for the job, whether they be lawyers, farmers, artisans or anything else.

I must tell honourable senators a little story about our system of marketing grain. The first member of this house, His Honour the Speaker, sometimes holds receptions to which the representatives of foreign governments are invited. At one of these receptions a year ago a gentleman representing a European country asked me where I came from. When I told him I was from Winnipeg, he said, "That is where we get No. 1 Manitobas." I advised him that although Manitoba produced a fair amount, most grain came from Saskatchewan and Alberta. He went on to tell me that his government liked to buy Canadian grain because there never was any doubt in their minds that when they paid for grade 2 they would get it. He said that the year before they had bought from Russia some wheat which was supposed to be grade 2, but in every carload there were as many stones as there was grain. I thought he paid a fine compliment to the Board of Grain Commissioners.

I am pleased that the honourable gentleman from Churchill intends, if this bill is given second reading, to ask that it be referred to committee for study. Grain is one of the great basic products of our country and has a tremendous effect upon our economy. It is all right to talk about the oil industry of Alberta, the fishing industry of the Maritimes and of the Pacific, the manufacturing industry of Ontario and Quebec, and so on, but for many years grain has been one of Canada's basic products. Damage caused by rust, rain and frost has brought about a general cut-back in prosperity right across Canada.

I would like to see every member of the chamber show a genuine interest in this legislation. If we can acquire a good understanding of the marketing of grain we shall be in a position to deal intelligently with any ideas that are put forth in connection with grain problems in general.

Honourable senators, I have great pleasure in supporting this bill on second reading; and I especially wanted to say a few words about the two commissioners whom I know.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Honourable senators, with great respect I submit that the appropriate committee for consideration of this bill is the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. The bill relates to a marketing problem and has nothing to do with the basic reasons for the existence of the Committee on Natural Resources. This is essentially a Trade and Commerce matter and should be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. Without any invidious references to personnel, I submit that the membership of the Banking and Commerce Committee is better acquainted with this subject than is the membership of any other standing committee of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: I disagree. I think the Standing Committee on Natural Resources is better equipped to deal with this matter.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: Why?

Hon. Mr. Stambaugh: This bill has to do with agriculture. Natural resources and agriculture are closely associated.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: The bill has nothing to do with that at all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question is on the motion of Honourable Senator Crerar, seconded by the Honourable Senator Euler, that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Lambert: On division.

The motion was agreed to, on division.

PRIVATE BILL

SHARP & DOHME (CANADA) LTD.— SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill G-10, an Act respecting Sharp and Dohme (Canada) Ltd.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to grant an effective filing date of July 20, 1950, to Patent Application No. 672,036.

It might be helpful if I said something about the prior history of this matter. On September 4, 1947 a patent application was filed in the Canadian Patent Office, bearing No. 564,079, the subject-matter of which covered certain chemical compounds for use in antibacterial therapy. I am informed that these compounds, together with others to which I shall refer later, are to be used for the treatment of gout and gouty arthritis and to increase the effectiveness of penicillin. The inventors of the material covered in the patent application were two gentlemen by the names of Sprague and Beyer.

In 1950 a new discovery was made for certain chemical compounds, including one described in the patent application already on file. The new material, which was also used for the same general purposes, is sometimes called by the trade names of Benamid and Remanden. The applicants claimed that these new discoveries were based upon an extension of the research work done for the material for which the original patent application was filed. However, the inventors of the new compounds were two gentlemen by the names of Sprague and Miller. Sprague, of course, was associated with both inventions, but Miller was only connected with the second branch of the research work, while Beyer was engaged on only the first branch.

When the new invention was made, the applicants could have proceeded in one of two ways: they could have filed a new patent application for the new material, or they could have filed a supplementary disclosure and added the new material to the existing patent application. They chose the second method, but the Commissioner of Patents decided they were wrong in adopting that method.

On November 18, 1950, the Commissioner issued a ruling to the effect that the adoption of the method of adding the new material to the pending application was an improper step. He gave as his main reason that the same inventors did not invent both sets of material. The applicants were dissatisfied with the decision of the Commissioner and appealed to the Exchequer Court of Canada; and on March 2, 1954, Mr. Justice Cameron of that court issued a seven-page judgment on the issue confirming the Commissioner. By this date, namely, March 2, 1954, it was too late for the applicants to file a patent application on the new material by reason of the fact that there had already been a patent granted in the Union of South Africa on the same material on November 13, 1950. Under section 28 of the Canadian Patent Act they would have had to act within a year of that time, but they could not do so.

Honourable senators, the argument of the applicant is this: Rule 63 governs supplementary disclosures in the Patent Office. The applicants say there had been no practice and no experience under that rule on the point at issue here. They also say that there has been hardship. Therefore, they come to Parliament—as I think is their right—to ask for relief. The Commissioner, on the other hand, says that he has the judgment of the Exchequer Court to confirm his opinion, and he feels that he is right. I must say to honourable senators that if this bill should go to a committee representations will be made there not only by the applicants, but, I believe, by the Commissioner of Patents.

The only other point that I should add to complete the history of the case is the fact that after the judgment of Mr. Justice Cameron was handed down, on March 2, 1954, the applicants did file another patent application, bearing No. 672,036, which is the number referred to in the bill. What they ask for is that that patent application, which was filed on August 27, 1954 be given an effective filing date as of July 20, 1950, the date on which they filed their supplementary disclosure. The material in the patent application filed in 1954, I am informed, is the same material as in the supplementary disclosure filed some four years earlier.

Since there is some contention about the bill, I suggest that if the Senate passes the motion for second reading its action be considered no more than a tentative adoption of the bill for the purpose of a reference to committee so that the allegations contained in the preamble can be inquired into. If they are not proven to the committee's satisfaction, the committee can so report.

Hon. Mr. Farris: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? Are there any conflicting interests?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: So far as I know, honourable senators, there are no conflicting third party interests now. However, the situation, as I understand it, is that between the time of the filing of the supplementary disclosure and the time that the present pending patent might issue there could be conflicting interests in Canada if manufacture is commenced. I think the honourable gentleman would be able to get much better information on that point in committee.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I assume that this bill is in the nature of an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Cameron of the Exchequer Court. If that is so, why would this issue not go to a superior court instead of coming to this house?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I think the first answer to the question of the honourable senator is this: Probably the Honourable Mr. Justice Cameron is right. The second answer is: As the applicant's argument is that the practice under Rule 63 had never been properly developed, or that it was new, and that hardship resulted, a petition to Parliament is perhaps the only real remedy available to the applicant.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak on the bill, specially, and I hope no one will stop me on a point of order. I hope this bill will go to committee, because there is a rule over in the Patent Office that if you send in an application you must pay a fee of $25; and if they don't like it they kick your application out, but they keep the $25. It is all right for them to keep the $25 if they accept the application, because then a patent is guaranteed; but if it is not accepted there is no guarantee and they are not entitled to keep the $25. I have written in about it several times, and each time I get the same answer, "That is the law". Well, if that is so, the man who said "The law is an ass" would not be very far wrong. I am going to vote for this bill because I want to see it go to committee where I can discuss some of these points with the officials.

Hon. Mr. Farris: I hope there are some better reasons for voting for the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Honourable senators, I am of two minds as to the appropriate committee to which this bill should be referred. As can be seen, there are some complications. Normally, it should go to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, and under the circumstances I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I had expected two bills from the House of Commons to come to us for first reading today. One is the Supply Bill; the other is a bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act. It is quite important that they should be passed before the end of the fiscal year, particularly the Supply Bill. My recollection is that the War Veterans Allowance Bill will come into effect on the first day of the month following the day on which the bill is assented to. So if it were given the Royal Assent tomorrow, it would become effective on Friday.

These bills will probably be before us tomorrow, and they could be dealt with in all stages then if the motion that I have on the Order Paper for suspension of certain rules is carried. It occurred to me—and I have been in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig)—that if Royal Assent is to be given to the bills tomorrow afternoon it might be advisable for the house to meet at 2:30 instead of 3 o'clock. We could meet in the morning, except that three or four committees will be sitting then.

I would therefore move that when this house rises today it stand adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ARCHIBALD DIVORCE PETITION

REFUND OF FEES

Hon. Mr. Gershaw, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved, with leave:

That the Parliamentary fees paid during the session of 1950 upon the petition of Alberta Lomas McLeod Archibald, of Westmount, Quebec, for a bill of divorce, be refunded to the petitioner, less the sum of $25 to apply on printing and other costs.

He said: Honourable senators, may I explain that the petitioner paid the Parliamentary fee of $210 and did not proceed with the petition.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Can the honourable senator explain why so long a period elapsed before a decision to refund the money was made?

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: The request to have the refund made was received quite recently. Apparently the parties resolved their differences after the petition was filed.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved:

That Rules 23, 24 and 63 be suspended until and including 6th April, 1955, in so far as they relate to public bills.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Honourable senators, while I have no strong objection to the motion being passed, I would point out that the War Veterans Allowance Bill, which I understand proposes substantial changes by way of increased payments and a different basis for payments to war veterans, will come to us tomorrow when, if this motion passes, these rules will have been temporarily abrogated. There may be no serious grounds for objection to the motion, but I wish to make a protest, if I may call it that, against the sending of this legislation to us at so late a date. The bill could, I think, have been considered and passed prior to the day before it is sought to have it brought into effect. In my humble opinion the procedure adopted in this case is not a desirable one.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: Honourable senators, I think it only fair to say that this particular legislation had to be referred to the House of Commons Special Committee on Veterans Affairs, which naturally took some time to study the suggested changes. That, I think, was the main reason for the delay in our receiving the measure.

The motion was agreed to.

EMERGENCY SITTINGS

AUTHORITY TO CONVENE SENATE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald moved:

That for the duration of the present session of Parliament, should an emergency arise during any adjournment of the Senate, which would in the opinion of the Honourable the Speaker warrant that the Senate meet prior to the time set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Honourable the Speaker be authorized to notify honourable senators at their addresses registered with the Clerk of the Senate, to meet at a time earlier than that set out in the motion for such adjournment, and non-receipt by any one or more honourable senators of such call shall not have any effect upon the sufficiency and validity thereof.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2.30 p.m.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: I move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Reid: May I inquire whether this bill has anything to do with the Wheat Board?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: No, it does not make any change in the Wheat Board. The chief purpose of the bill is to increase the annual salaries of the Chief Commissioner and the other two commissioners of the Board of Grain Commissioners, to appoint an additional assistant commissioner, and to amend the statutory grades of soybeans and certain grades of wheat.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

On the Orders of the Day:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I draw the attention of honourable senators to the following:

On March 17, 1931, the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, issued and distributed to honourable senators the following instructions regarding the use of the Senate Gallery in the House of Commons on budget night:

Upon the occasion of the delivery of his Budget Speech by the Finance Minister, none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons. This step is taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible.

In past years many senators have been excluded from the gallery upon similar occasions on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

This practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills were read the third time, and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 305, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1955.

He said: Honourable senators will note by the title of this bill that it is for the purpose of granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the fiscal year ending today. I have in my hand a pamphlet which sets forth the various items under the heading "Further supplementary estimates". I may say that I was much surprised to learn today that some honourable senators had not received a copy of this pamphlet.

Hon. Mr. MacKinnon: The pamphlet came to some of us.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: As the honourable senator has said, some members of this house did receive the pamphlet. When I learned that unfortunately some did not receive it I gave instructions that this morning there was to be a general distribution of the pamphlet to every member. This document containing the supplementary estimates should be distributed to all honourable senators not later than one day after they are tabled in the House of Commons. I trust that in future the officials of this house will make sure that copies of the supplementary estimates are distributed in the same way as are the main estimates. However, in fairness to the officers of this house I should say that it was no fault of theirs that there was an incomplete distribution of the supplementary estimates this year. But in future it will be up to them to check and see that some other department does its work.

The bill before us provides for the payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of a sum not exceeding in the whole $53,934,585, the details of which are set forth in the schedule to the bill. This sum is to cover expenses that have been incurred since the regular estimates came down for the current fiscal year.

Honourable senators will notice that the schedule contains items of votes for the following departments and other bodies: Agriculture, Citizenship and Immigration, Civil Service Commission, External Affairs, Finance, Fisheries, Justice, Labour, Legislation, Mines and Technical Surveys, National Health and Welfare, National Research Council and Atomic Energy, Public Printing and Stationery, Public Works, Secretary of States, Transport, and Veterans Affairs. These votes are for additional expenses incurred during the fiscal year 1954-55, over and above the requirements estimated by the departments.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Does this clear off all the over-expenses?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes; this is supposed to take care of all the expenses incurred by the Government up to today.

Hon. Mr. Reid: But I said "over-expenses".

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: These items are over-expenditures in this respect, that they are in addition to the amounts the various departments expected to have to spend during the year 1954-55.

Honourable senators, these supplementary estimates, which are set forth in detail in the schedule to the bill, have received careful consideration by the members of the House of Commons, and I now recommend them to you for your favourable consideration.

Hon. Mr. Euler: May I ask my friend a question? This point may not be very important, but it is interesting to note that in a number of the estimates for certain departments an item of $1 appears. I am surprised that a department would ask for as little as $1.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is to keep the vote alive.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If the honourable senator from Waterloo will refer specifically to any items I shall endeavour to get some information on them.

Hon. Mr. Euler: On page 4 of the schedule, for instance, there are two items of $1, one at the bottom of the page and one at the top.

Hon. John T. Haig: Honourable senators will naturally expect me to raise the old question which I have raised so often, namely, the delay in bringing the estimates before us. While the Minister can say that later on the main estimates of the departments come up for consideration we shall be allowed to discuss the supplementary estimates, the difficulty is that some items now before us may not appear again during the coming year.

Secondly, I would point out that in one sense the supplementary estimates are really more important than the main estimates, for the supplementaries cover expenditures which the government itself did not anticipate when it prepared its main estimates. As this bill shows, the expenditures which the Government did not foresee a year ago, have amounted to roughly $54 million. Included in this sum is an item of approximately $28 million for the Canadian National Railways, set out under Transport on page 9 of the schedule.

Ever since I have had the pleasure of being a member of this house, and even long before that, the problem of financing the Canadian National Railways has been discussed in public during every election campaign, and frequently between elections. I recall that in 1936, soon after my appointment to this house, the government of the day brought in a bill respecting the Canadian National Railways, and some sixteen of us on this side decided that we would vote for the bill.

It was only about two sessions ago that Mr. Donald Gordon, President of the Canadian National, appeared before a committee of this house in support of a capital revision bill to transfer $1 billion of the Canadian National System debt to the backs of the Canadian people. At that time I asked him this straight question: "Mr. President, will this be your last request, or will you be coming back wanting more money from time to time?" He replied: "Senator Haig, if this bill passes and business remains normal, I do not think we will have to come back to you." Well, the Government and a great many business men who like to boost things have said that 1954 was a normal year, yet we have the officials of the C.N.R. back asking for a further vote of $28 million.

If I have correctly interpreted the press reports of Mr. Gordon's evidence before a committee of the other house, I gather that on the first day he appeared he refused to divulge the price at which four C.N.R. hotels were sold to private individuals, but the next day he decided to give the figures. I feel quite keenly about a situation of that kind, because you and I and all the other people who pay income tax in this country are shareholders in that railway, and we are entitled to know how its business is being conducted. For the life of me, I cannot see how the price at which those hotels were sold could effect the overall picture of the C.N.R., and why that information should be withheld from the people of Canada. I think it was just unadulterated nonsense for the President of our railway to decline to give the figures. As a matter of fact, as far as the Prince Edward Hotel in Brandon was concerned, I could have gone to the Land Titles Office in that city and searched the title. As honourable senators know, before the transfer could be registered an affidavit would have to be filed setting out the value of the building and what it cost.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: What about the chattels in the building?

Hon. Mr. Haig: It would depend on whether or not the chattels were included.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: But they would not be shown in the affidavit in the Land Titles Office.

Hon. Mr. Haig: I may not be a very good business man, but I believe that transaction had little effect on the overall financial position of the Canadian National Railways.

Further, during his evidence Mr. Gordon was asked about the competition between his railway and the Canadian Pacific. He was a little uncertain as to what his road was going to do by way of competing with the fancy train the C.P.R. proposes to run between Montreal and Vancouver. His evidence left this impression on my mind—and I wasn't looking for such an impression—that the C.N.R. was not going to be able to compete favourably with the C.P.R. I am not at all anxious that that should be the case; indeed, I would be happy to hear him say that the Canadian National is just as good as the privately-owned road, and that his transcontinental train will give as comfortable and efficient service as will be obtainable on the other line. This is a very important matter to the people of Canada, and there is no reason why we should not call Mr. Gordon before a committee of this house. While he has no doubt gone into the situation thoroughly before a committee of the Commons, we too have a responsibility to look into this question.

I say to honourable members that in my opinion the request by the Canadian National for more money is something that will recur year after year. Indeed, I see no escape from it. The railway has suffered a terrific loss this past year, and Mr. Gordon has not given the reason for it. I may be wrong, but in my opinion the deficit was caused by the failure of the Government to sell our grain to the world, as it agreed to do; for as a result the railroad lost much of the revenue it expected to get. I think Mr. Gordon would stand in better light if he put that reason on the record. He does not need to be afraid of the Government; certainly, if he shows ability and judgment, they will not interfere with his position as President of this railroad system. I believe he has all the ability necessary, but he seems to fear something. What it is, I do not know. He hesitates to place before the people of Canada the cold facts about the railway and why it is now in financial difficulties. We did not have such bad times last year, and therefore there must be some good reason why he finds it necessary at this time to ask for another $28 million.

As I have said, this bill shows that the Government underestimated very materially the expenditures on certain items. It is very unfair to the Opposition parties to be confronted with total expenditures amounting to $4,500 million. That is what they will amount to, because we have to add this $54 million to the original estimate of $4,450 million.

Hon. Mr. Euler: My friend has made a comparison between the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have no particular brief for either of them, although in the past I have been friendly to the Canadian National Railways. I understood my friend to say he had the impression that the new train to be run by the Canadian National Railways between Montreal and Vancouver, April 24, will be an inferior type of train to that provided by the C.P.R.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is the impression I got from Mr. Gordon's evidence.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I must say that I never saw anything to that effect in his evidence.

Another point: Is it not a fact that the Canadian National Railways had a big decrease in revenues this year, and that the Canadian Pacific did also?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but the Canadian Pacific paid taxes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: But its revenues also were down.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The C.P.R. pays taxes, but the C.N.R. does not. There is quite a difference between the two railways. If your business is taxed and mine is free from taxation, there will be quite a difference in the end result.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think you will find that the Canadian National also pays taxes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, the C.P.R. pays taxes, and its stock is selling at $29 a share on the market.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Is it not a fact that the Canadian National pays taxes to the municipalities it operates in?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Only to municipalities, but not to the dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Canadian National does not make a profit. If it made a profit it would pay taxes.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Yes, but it never makes a profit. Last year I raised this very question. Last year it deliberately—I saw "deliberately" —put the accounting in such a way that as to show a surplus. There should have been a deficit budgeted for last year, but somehow or other it was transferred to the next year, and this is the way it comes out.

My argument is that, whether there is a profit or not, we, as members of Parliament, should have the C.N.R. officers before one of our committees and examine them as to the facts of the case.

Hon. Mr. Euler: There is no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. Haig: This bill should not have been brought in here on the last day of the fiscal year. It has to be passed today. It should have been before us two or three weeks ago.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is fair enough.

Hon. Mr. Haig: We are entitled to have these things explained to us.

There are a number of items in this schedule that I would like to discuss. I am not in favour of spending so much money as we are spending. For instance, though I may be a minority of one in the matter, I am not in favour of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to support the price of butter and other commodities. I do not think the way to do this business is to sell butter at 38 cents a pound when we pay 58 cents for it. You and I pay taxes out of which 58 cents a pound is paid for this butter, and somebody comes along and buys it for only 38 cents. A similar situation exists as to cattle. We made a deal for the sale of cattle to Great Britain, and as a result we are confronted with another $3 million loss. Representatives of the Government should be before us so that we could ask them why they made a deal of that kind.

We senators should look into this. We are paid a reasonably good salary, we have the ability and time, and we should do what we can to have such matters explained. But we cannot do that if the supply bill is brought in to us on the afternoon of the day when we are expected to pass it. I am not at all satisfied with this procedure. The other supply bill that we shall have before us a little later today is different. The items in it can be reconsidered when we come to deal with the main estimates, but there will be no opportunity to reconsider some items in the present bill. I refer especially to the provision of money for the Canadian National Railways and for the payment of a bonus on production. Why should the people be compelled to pay a bonus out of their earnings to enable the government to purchase a product and sell it elsewhere at a much lower price than it can be obtained for in this country? That is a question I would like to put to the minister.

These are matters which we should delve into. They interest more especially the senators from cities. I come from a city, and a decent city it is. The prices of the various articles of food form a very important part of the cost of living, of the labouring people, and they would like to know why out of their earnings they have to pay money to the government for the purchase of products which are in turn sold at a loss to Great Britain, New Zealand and other countries. Why, I would like to know, do the people of Canada have to contribute taxes to buy beef and butter so that people elsewhere can get these foods at lower prices?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: You can blame margarine.

Hon. Mr. Haig: No. All the government has to do is to leave the price of butter alone.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Isn't there unfair competition with margarine?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Quite honestly I did not look at it in that light. I have been brought up on butter and have used very little margarine, so I am not a good judge, but I do say quite candidly that I would rather pay twice as much for butter as for margarine.

The point I want to come back to is this: We have got to pass the bill today, because the Government has spent the money. I am not questioning the honesty of the expenditures; I do not think that enters into it at all. What I am complaining about is this way of dealing with supply, for we have no chance to question the people who are responsible for these expenditures. How can we do that when the bill comes here on the last day of March, the end of the fiscal year? I would suggest to the honourable leader of this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) that he urge upon the Government, of which he is a member, that next session the estimates be sent to us in February, so that we may be able to examine officials on the estimates in our Committee on Finance. We have not done very much work this session except on the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes bill. Had we been given an opportunity to study these expenditures we could have done a good job, and materially helped the Government in its administration.

Hon. Thomas Vien: Honourable senators, the question raised by the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) has many aspects, but I do not intend to deal with all of them this afternoon. However, there is one point to which I would like to draw attention. It is that the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway Company is appointed by the Government to administer the railway property in the interest of the public of Canada. Now, under our constitution the executive power is vested, not in Parliament, but in the Government of Canada. Section 9 of the British North America Act states:

> The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Therefore the Government is accountable—but only accountable—to Parliament. It is the duty of the Government to administer public affairs as best it can. When estimates are presented to Parliament, we may question the good or bad judgment of the Government, or ask for further information, but it is not our function to give administrative directions to the Government, or to the management of the Canadian National Railways, which is an agency of the Government.

If a Minister of the Crown in charge of a department determines it is in the public interest that some information should be withheld, and so declares under his responsibility, then under the rules of debate in the House of Commons and in this house, that ends the matter. Therefore, when an agency of the Government—in this case, the management of the Canadian National Railways—is entrusted with the administration of public property such as that of the Canadian National Railways, in competition with a privately-owned railway, and if in its discretion, on competitive grounds or otherwise, it concludes that it would be against the public interest to divulge certain administrative secrets or competitive factors that enter into the day-in day-out operations of its system, I hold that the management is justified in stating that it would not be in the public interest to divulge such secrets, and I believe it is the duty of members of both houses to consider the matter from that angle. I believe that the statement of the President of the Canadian National Railways to the Committee in the other place, that he would give certain information and withhold certain other information, cannot be discussed by legislators, who are invested not with executive but only with legislative powers. It is our right to inquire into the expenditure of moneys voted by Parliament for the operation of the Canadian National Railways, and in this connection, as well as in matters relating to sales or leases of properties which have been made by the company, to ascertain whether the management is trustworthy; but unless we are prepared to challenge the trustworthiness of the management of the Canadian National Railways it would not be fair, in my opinion, to require it to reveal competitive factors which enter into the execution of the functions entrusted to its care. The question is a constitutional one, and it has been frequently determined. In the House of Commons the decision of a minister that it would be against the public interest to divulge certain information has never, to my knowledge, been challenged; and if it were desired to challenge it, the only recourse would be by a motion of nonconfidence in the Government.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Or by withholding the money.

Hon. Mr. Vien: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Having reference to the new hotel which is being built in Montreal, and in view of the fact that the Canadian National Railways have asked Parliament to provide between twenty and twenty-five million dollars to build it, should we not have the right to ask the President of the company how the money is to be spent, and what interest he expects will be obtained on revenues from the leasing of hotels?

Hon. Mr. Vien: The matter of the lease of the Montreal hotel was debated earlier this session, and I do not want to enter now into that particular subject. If, in their managerial discretion, the administrators of the Canadian National Railway Company deem it expedient to lease the hotel instead of to operate it themselves, that is a question into which, I believe, Parliament should not inquire.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I do not agree with that.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I am merely submitting my own opinion on the subject, and with the utmost deference to that of any honourable member who may take a different view. If it were expedient to discuss at this juncture the situation with respect to the Montreal hotel, I would do so with pleasure. It was considered at the last session of Parliament before a committee of the Senate. At that time a number of people, including, I believe, the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), were opposed to the erection by the Canadian National Railways of a hotel in Montreal. Others—and I am one of them—believe that the decision of the Canadian National Railway management to build that hotel was a wise one; and I may point out that, at the request of the honourable senator from New Westminster, very extensive data as to the results of the operation of all these railway hotels were put on the record.

Hon. Mr. Howden: May I ask the honourable senator whether it is not the general belief that, with very few exceptions, the entire hotel system of the Canadian National Railways is operating at a loss?

Hon. Mr. Vien: If, by "loss", net loss is meant, I would agree with that view. But if the reference is to operating loss, I would say that in many cases there is no such loss. For instance, for years the Chateau Laurier at Ottawa has been operating at a very substantial profit.

Hon. Mr. Reid: In that respect, I think, it stands by itself.

Hon. Mr. Vien: If all fixed charges and overhead expenses are taken into account, it might be found that all the railway hotels, including the Chateau Frontenac at Quebec, are operated at a loss. But if only operating expenses are considered, the Chateau Frontenac, the Chateau Laurier and other well-known hotels are producing a net operating revenue for either the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hotels operated by the C.N.R. play an important part in the overall operations of this publicly-owned company. Much revenue is derived directly and indirectly from their existence. For one thing, they facilitate the services of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. If there were no Chateau Laurier in Ottawa for instance, many people who now stop over in this city would not do so, and thus substantial amounts of revenue now accruing to the C.N.R. would be lost.

It is the overall picture that must be considered and not just the operation of a single hotel. You cannot put the operations of a railway company into various watertight compartments. You might say that the engine of a train is a losing proposition because it does not carry any passengers or freight. Yet it pulls the cars which carry the passengers or freight. The same thing is true of the railway system as a whole. A small countryside station is not a revenue producer, but it is an essential part of a railway system, for it provides railway patrons with necessary facilities. It may be felt that a hotel run by a railway company does not in itself produce much revenue, but it is a different matter when you take into account the amount of business for which it is indirectly responsible.

Another factor has to be taken into consideration when dealing with the hotel being built in Montreal. It is a difficult thing for an independent hotel to get the same sort of patronage that is enjoyed by a hotel belonging to a hotel chain. The Hilton hotels have purchased the Statler organization, and now operate the largest chain of hotels in the world. A patron of one of these hotels in the United States intending to go to Montreal has only to go to the hotel's registration desk and make a reservation for hotel accommodation in that chain's hotel in Montreal. If the railway-owned hotel in Montreal is linked with Hilton, then all hotels belonging to this chain will direct Montreal-bound hotel traffic to this hotel.

One also has to take into account the various conferences and conventions held in these hotels. If, for instance, some important American association has held its annual convention in a Hilton hotel somewhere in the United States this year and proposes to hold its next convention somewhere in Canada, the Hilton people will do their utmost to direct the association to a Hilton hotel in Canada. This type of business is extremely valuable to any hotel.

Honourable senators, I am simply giving a few illustrations to support my point that as members of Parliament we are hardly in a position to challenge the managerial discretion of those who have been entrusted by the Government to administer the operations of the C.N.R. We are, of course, entitled to receive information as to how this publicly-owned company spends the moneys which are voted to it by Parliament, but I do not believe we should challenge these officials when they tell us they do not want to divulge information that would be useful to their competitors.

In performing our function as legislators we should be very careful to restrict ourselves to the legislative aspect of questions and not interfere with any executive power which, under our constitution, is vested, not in Parliament, but in the Crown and its agent.

Hon. Mr. Haig: May I ask the honourable senator a question? The first day Mr. Gordon appeared before the House of Commons Railways and Shipping Committee he said that for reasons of secrecy he could not disclose the price paid the railway for the four hotels sold last year, but the next day he gave the figure. Why did he change his mind?

Hon. Mr. Vien: It is very understandable that this sort of thing can happen when an official such as Mr. Gordon is called before a parliamentary committee. Could you expect an executive officer of any large corporation to have at his fingertips all kinds of information concerning the operation of an annual business of some $250 million?

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is not it. In the first instance Mr. Gordon refused to answer the question at all. Why did he change his tune the next day?

Hon. Mr. Vien: I do not know what particular question the honourable gentleman is referring to.

Hon. Mr. Haig: The price paid the railway for the four hotels it sold last year.

Hon. Mr. Vien: He may not have had the information at his fingertips.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That was not his reason.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I am not competent to answer my honourable friend, because I have not seen the report of what was said. In any event, I would say that nothing is scandalous about a man changing his mind. If a question is put to a public official and he feels the answer should be withheld, and if after due consideration he feels the information can be divulged without injury to the public interest, Parliament should understand. If my honourable friend were to appear as a witness before a parliamentary committee he might be taken by surprise by some question.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: May I interrupt? I understand that when the question was asked and he did not answer someone told him that the information could be obtained at the Land Titles Office.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: When he was told that, I think he answered the question. However, I do not think the information could be obtained at the Land Titles Office.

Hon. Mr. Haig: In Manitoba it can be obtained from the Land Titles Office.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: You can obtain information with respect to the sales of land. For a hotel that is sold, there is a price; if there is a sale of land, there is another price; if there is a sale of chattels, there is still another price; and for goodwill there is an additional price.

Hon. Mr. Haig: As a matter of fact, the Brandon paper contained the whole information of what it was sold for. I could have brought the information, if I had wanted to.

Hon. Mr. Vien: I am not familiar with the facts concerning the matter to which the honourable gentleman has referred. Also I should point out that I am not raising the question. It is being discussed in a committee of another place, and I do not think it is a proper subject to be discussed here. However, perhaps I may be allowed to say my information is to the effect that Mr. Gordon's first answer was that it would not be fair to the purchaser to reveal the price; but that later, after learning that the deed of sale had been registered he had no objection to giving the information.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I do not intend to discuss either the sale or the building of C.N.R. hotels, but I wish to make this observation: I suspect that the reason why the President of the Canadian National Railways did not wish to disclose the price received for the hotels was that he felt under an obligation to the purchaser. If my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) will take the trouble to examine the matter I think he will find that in the interval between two sittings of the committee Mr. Gordon obtained the consent of the purchaser to disclose the purchase price.

As to the hotel now being built in Montreal, it was under consideration in the Senate last session, when we approved an appropriation bill for the C.N.R.

Hon. Mr. Reid: The bill was not approved by all of us, for it was passed on division. I did not approve it.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I do not question that the bill was passed on division, but is my honourable friend suggesting that the minority vote should prevail?

Hon. Mr. Reid: I am trying to keep the record correct, that is all.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The bill may have been passed on division, but we approved it, and the Canadian National Railways were authorized to proceed with the building of the hotel. However it is not my purpose to discuss that.

I would like to draw the attention of the house to one or two items in the supplementary estimates. Of course, the big item is the amount required to meet the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, but I think other items invite comment. For instance, under Vote 554 $2 million is included for freight assistance on western feed grains. Honourable senators, it may be that at the end of the last session it was impossible for the Government to determine within $2 million the amount required for the movement of feed grains, but I think it is very important to maintain the principle, observed by Parliament since days long past, that when a government brings down its main estimates it should provide for everything that it believes to be reasonably required during the next year. Formerly, supplementary estimates were for relatively small amounts, in contemplation of a possible change of conditions, and were introduced towards the end of the session. As regards the supply bill that is now before us, the main estimates were known a year ago; extensive supplementary estimates were brought in before the close of last session; yet now, at the end of the year, a further amount of $53 million is required. In my judgment that is very poor estimating.

Reverting to the proposed subsidy on feed grains: I think the time has arrived when it should be discontinued. The provision for assistance in the movement of feed grains was a purely war emergency measure, with which I had something to do. If subsidies are given when they are no longer needed, the habit of asking for them will become fixed in our economy.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There was a change this year with respect to the payment of moneys for the movement of feed grains, and a few weeks ago my colleague (Hon. Mr. Godbout) explained the change in replying to a question which was asked by the honourable member from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid).

Hon. Mr. Crerar: The honourable leader may recall that the change was a reduction of the amount of the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: But the principle is unchanged. We continue to subsidize the movement of feed grains; and the fiscal year ends tomorrow.

Honourable senators, I ask, is this necessary, and is it equitable? We pay the freight on feed grains from the head of the lakes to say, Sudbury. That helps all the feeders in eastern Canada. If the western farmer were put on a comparable basis, the movement of his hogs and cattle should be subsidized, so far as freight is concerned, for a corresponding distance, because his prices are governed by prices in eastern Canada. I merely want to point out that it is so easy for Parliament to fall into the habit of accepting these things, and that once accepted they become fixed and you can never get rid of them. I do not think this is in accord with sound principles.

The same reasoning applies to Vote 555. That item represents the loss that the Agricultural Products Board has sustained, and which, I believe, has something to do with the importation of New Zealand butter. The amount under this item to be provided from the taxpayers' pockets is $278,494. Surely the time is near when we should get away from price supports, otherwise this practice will spread and infiltrate our whole economy. If a vote to support the price of butter is justified, why not a vote for lumbermen, or a subsidy for base metal or, as a matter of fact, anyone else? The same arguments apply to the Fisheries Prices Support Board, whose operating losses last year amounted to $744,000.

But I come back to the distinction I made earlier in my remarks. These estimates should be properly prepared in the first instance. It is easy, but not commendable to keep the main estimates down and come in with supplementaries at the end of the year to get what is needed.

There are, of course, occasions when supplementaries are necessary and I will give one instance to illustrate the argument I am trying to make.

Vote 562 contains an item of $600,000 for the welfare of Indians. Now, I cannot conceive that any new circumstances have arisen during the year which could not have been foreseen, at any rate when we passed the supplementary estimates before the end of last session. The Indian Affairs Branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration knew in advance the requirements of our Indian population. What happened is that without having obtained the approval of Parliament, the department went on and incurred this further expense, and now comes along and asks for $600,000 to meet it.

On the other hand, a vote which quite properly comes within the ambit of supplementary estimates is item No. 581, for the relief of the distress caused by that distortion of nature known to us as Hurricane Hazel. That event no one could have foreseen, and on the basis of the principle I am discussing, Hurricane Hazel vote is entirely justifiable.

I have drawn the attention of the house to these matters because I believe that we should not depart very far from the traditional methods which have always been associated with the practice of democratic government.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I would like an explanation of item 556, page 2:

To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment—Further amount required, $100,000.

Hon. Mr. Euler: The honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt) can explain that item.

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt: Honourable senators, some fifteen years ago the importation of maple products into the United States was prohibited, and any shipments in transit were stopped at the border. The United States Government took this step because of the presence of lead in the maple syrup. On learning of this condition, the industry made an investigation and discovered that the maple sap when coming in contact with the tinplate of the sap buckets picked up some lead, which, it was supposed, got into the syrup. Knowing what importance the health authorities of various countries attach to the presence of lead in food products, we in the industry realized that we were faced with a serious situation. Honourable senators must know that no longer may tea be packed in lead foil, nor can chocolate bars be wrapped in lead foil, and similar precautions are taken in the packaging of other articles of food.

The solution of our problem lay in the use of a different type of sap bucket. This meant a very heavy loss for the farmers who were faced with discarding their present type of maple sap buckets. Discussions were held with the governments of the United States, Canada, Quebec and Ontario as to what steps should be taken to avoid contamination of the maple sap by lead from the buckets. After discussions lasting two years, the conclusion was arrived at that it would be absolutely necessary to replace the present type of buckets with buckets made of some other material.

Experiments were conducted with buckets made of different materials, including plastic, paper, and so on, and as a result it was decided that the best course was to replace the tinplate buckets with buckets made of aluminum. To have made that change immediately would have worked great hardship, and so further conferences were held with the governments of the United States, Canada, Quebec and Ontario and it was finally decided that the change-over would have to be made within a period of ten years. The Government of Canada agreed to pay one-third of the cost of the aluminum buckets, and the provincial Governments agreed to pay one-third, so the farmers whose buckets are being replaced have to pay the remaining third. The vote under discussion is to provide the Government with money to pay its share of the cost of replacement.

In the past the farmers did not take full advantage of the money voted by Parliament for replacement of these buckets. If they had done so the Government would have paid out $1 million additional. As honourable senators will realize, the farmers cannot be expected to change over from a long-established custom in two or three years. It is very difficult to convince them that they should replace their tinplate sap buckets. As a matter of fact, in order to obtain complete replacement it will be necessary for the Government to extend the ten-year period by another year. Since financial assistance was provided by the federal and provincial Governments, some 17·5 million buckets out of a total of 21 million have been replaced, and if a subsidy is provided next year I think the situation will be entirely corrected. Then there will be no more lead in the sap and consequently no more lead in the bodies of consumers.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Are the tin buckets being turned in, to be exchanged for the other type of buckets?

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: No, we are destroying the old buckets.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what I thought. Every farmer is replacing his old type tinplate buckets with aluminum buckets and the Government is paying part of the cost of these new buckets.

Hon. Mr. Vaillancourt: Yes. The federal Government is paying one-third of the cost, the provincial Governments are paying one-third, and the remaining third is being paid by the producer.

It is exactly the same principle as is followed by the Government in providing funds for the purchase of butter at a floor price and for its storage. The Government also contributes to the cost of cold storage plants for apples, cheese and other products. But the maple products industry is not asking the Government to fix a floor price: all that is required is the provision of one-third of the cost of new buckets. When yields have been low this industry has never asked the Government to pay it a subsidy. All that it has asked for, and all that is being given in this vote, is a grant to help in replacing unsuitable maple sap buckets.

Hon. Thomas Reid: Honourable senators, I am very sorry that a few senators who spoke to us a short time ago are not now present, because in reply to their remarks I wanted to say a word or two.

First, let me comment on the remarks of the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien) concerning the Canadian National Railways hotels question. I realize, as he no doubt realizes, that there are certain questions that it would not be good business for the railroad management to answer. For instance, they might be embarrassed by inquiries as to the salaries that are being paid to the staff. But on this question of hotels I think Parliament would be well advised to watch the attitude of the President of the C.N.R. In many men holding high office one sees a tendency to refuse to members of Parliament information to which, in my opinion, we are entitled. It is a fact that last year I opposed the vote for the construction of a Canadian National Railways hotel in Montreal. I differ in this matter from the honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien). I am one who believes that hotel ownership by railway companies is no longer justified, because it does not fulfil the only purpose which would warrant the building and running of hotels, namely the provision of more business for the railroads. There was a time, in the early days of this country, when a railway-owned hotel existed in practically every town or city of any size. But today people travel by bus and car and airplane as well as by rail. I wonder how much revenue will be obtained by this hotel from the travelling public. And if the purpose in building it is not to make revenue, in Heaven's name let us know why $25 million of the people's money is to be spent in this manner. It may or may not be the fact that the management is responsible to the Government, but, after all, we members of Parliament are responsible to the people, and I think the people are entitled to some information about so large an outlay of public funds.

Let me point out—whether or not the information may be divulged later—that no one in Parliament has at this time any information as to the terms of the lease to a United States company. My thought in this respect is, if the hotel should fail to make a profit, what guarantee will the Government or the Canadian National Railways have that interest will be paid? And if the return on the principal is less than three per cent, the project must be regarded as a dead loss. So I repeat that as the people of this country are putting up $25 million for the hotel, they are entitled to know what security the Government has for the payment of interest on the property. Mr. Donald Gordon has taken the stand that this information should not be disclosed. I differ from him, and I am sorry that the estimates now presented to us cannot be sent to a committee, where we might ask him this particular question.

Reverting to some remarks of the honourable member from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), I must admit my astonishment that anyone from the prairie provinces objects to subsidies on wheat. Not much objection was heard to a subvention of some $65 million a short time ago to the prairie provinces, although I am sure that people living in other parts of Canada did not much relish the transaction. I think the policy of the prairie producers should be to make it easy to market their wheat. I serve notice now that at the proper time I shall be very critical about a condition of affairs under which men who run turkey and poultry ranches cannot use their own wheat in their own business. We have set up in this country the greatest combine Canada has ever known, yet very little is said about it. As a result, a man who grows wheat in one of the prairie provinces cannot use it to feed his poultry elsewhere, and the Canadian National Railways will not haul it until a permit is received from the Wheat Board. I know of cases in which men have been prevented from obtaining wheat in payment of a debt. As a matter of fact, to my knowledge at least half a dozen people in British Columbia who had sold their prairie farms, and had undertaken to take wheat from the purchasers to feed flocks of turkeys as large as five or maybe ten thousand—and one British Columbian carries a flock of something like 20,000—have been forbidden to draw wheat from their own farms for feed purposes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I wish to say a word in justice to my desk-mate, the senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar). I believe he has just been criticized in connection with a subsidy of $65 million to the farmers of Western Canada. Does not the senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) know that the honourable senator from Churchill voted against that contribution?

Hon. Mr. Reid: Well, my reference was not personal; I did not direct my remarks at him.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: He was in the minority.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Just think what a great combine this is. I well remember that, when members of British Columbia poultry associations wrote to me, as a member of Parliament, to the effect that unless I supported the control of wheat marketing by a federal board, at least 5,000 of their members would vote against me. I told them that they would regret their attitude, that they were being led up the wrong path by some very fancy speakers. Last year I had the doubtful pleasure of speaking on this matter to some poultrymen who are now complaining that they are required to pay a very high price for a very inferior grade of wheat. However, I will enlarge on these remarks at the proper time.

I rose particularly to protest, on behalf of the poultrymen of British Columbia, against any interference with the subsidy from which they are now benefiting. After all, what was the reason for it? It began during the war. All of us recollect the conditions. The Government wanted an increase in the production of eggs, poultry, and every agricultural product; and subsidies were provided to encourage the production of wheat and the supplying of feed grains to the West and clear across as far as the Maritimes. Of course, when people have come to rely on a crutch of that sort it is hard to withdraw it. One could instance a dozen items of the same kind. But we in this country have reached a very serious position when the Liberal party, the party of free enterprise, commits itself to the maintenance of such combines as we find in the three prairie provinces. The whole thing is wrong, and needs a great deal of investigation.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I believe there is a test case at present before the courts.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is so, but I am speaking in generalities because I do not want to seem to interfere with any case on which a judgment may be pending.

I should also like to know whether the $58,000 included in the estimates of the Clerk of the House of Commons has to do with our elevator service. The service in fact is nothing to boast about. In my opinion the new elevators are slower and less efficient than the old ones. Would the honourable leader explain that item?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I had intended to answer all questions when I close the debate.

Hon. George H. Ross: Honourable senators, a year ago we voted a subsidy of $17 million for freight assistance on western feed grains. Today we are being asked to vote another $2 million for the current year, and for the next year commencing tomorrow we are being asked to vote a further $15,500,000 subsidy on feed grains. I agree with the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) that in the interest of economy this subsidy should be done away with.

During the last war many controls were introduced and the payment of many subsidies provided for. They were necessary during the war and were intended to be of a temporary nature. Since the war many of them have been discontinued. In my opinion, in the interest of economy more of them should be discontinued; for example, the payment of freight assistance on western feed grain.

In giving my reasons for believing that these payments ought to be discontinued I think I should state the circumstances under which the Government decided to pay freight on feed grains shipped from Fort William to the Eastern provinces and from Calgary and Edmonton to British Columbia.

In the year 1941 we had in Canada a surplus of wheat and a shortage of meat and dairy products. In that year farmers were bonused to the extent of $4 an acre for each acre by which they reduced their wheat acreage. We were then engaged in a hot war. Throughout the war, as at present, the Government kept a close check on agriculture right across the country. The bonus of $4 an acre was paid to maintain a balanced diet, particularly for the armed forces and those actively engaged in producing munitions. I will quote the words of the Minister of Agriculture, the Right Honourable Mr. Gardiner, in sponsoring the bill:

> There are certain products that ought to be produced this year to greater volume than you have been producing them before. We want more butter; we want more cheese; we want more hogs; we want more cattle, and if we are going to be able to produce these products in Canada we must have more feed grain . . . Wheat is a product which will keep for a long term of years. It will be just as good as a food three or four years from now as it was when it was grown. 1941 Hansard, p. 3512.

The bonus was accordingly paid. As a result of this policy, dairy and meat products rapidly increased. The Minister of Agriculture was also authorized by Order in Council P.C. 5434, passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act, to pay freight assistance on western wheat, oats, barley, rye and mill feeds transported from Port Arthur, Fort William and Armstrong to any part of Eastern Canada for use exclusively as feed in Canada for livestock. Shortly afterwards a similar provision was made under P.C. 6387 for shipments from Calgary and Edmonton to any part of British Columbia. They were introduced as temporary measures. Under these Orders in Council, Canada has been paying freight charges on such shipments. Up to the end of the last fiscal year, ending on the 31st of March, 1954, Canada paid $207,165,850 freight on such shipments or approximately $6.16 a ton. The reason for paying this subsidy was stated by Mr. Gardiner in these words:

> Last winter the eastern provinces, particularly the Maritimes, asked us to give some assistance in the bringing of feed grains from Fort William. A little later on, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario became involved in the discussion. In the first instance we did agree to pay half the freight on feed grains from Montreal to the Maritime provinces, but that was not considered satisfactory. The other two provinces were brought into the discussion, and we finally offered to pay the freight on feed grain from Fort William to all the five Eastern provinces. After we had made that offer, much to our surprise, the only province that took it up was Ontario, which perhaps needed it the least. 1941 Hansard, p. 3520.

At a later date he said:

> We are paying the freight from Fort William east to points in all the provinces east, and on grains going west from Calgary and Edmonton to British Columbia to be used for feeding purposes. 1942 Hansard, p. 3036.

For the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1955, the subsidy is reduced from $19 million to $15,500,000, as shown in the Estimates, p. 122. Now that the hot war is over it seems to me that no further freight assistance should be voted and that the item should be deleted from the estimates.

The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) has suggested that the payment of this subsidy is providing a market for our grain. It is not helping the prairie farmers one bit in so far as the price of grain is concerned. The farmers have to sell their grain on the world market. If the Government wishes to assist the farmers of the prairie provinces let them pay the prairie farmers a similar subsidy—that is, $6.16 a ton—on grain they feed to livestock. If it is necessary to raise more livestock let the Government pay the farmers of the prairie provinces that subsidy, and they will produce more livestock. They can do it just as well as the farmers of the other provinces. Furthermore, all farmers in Canada are being taxed to pay this subsidy.

Hon. Mr. Euler: All Canadian citizens are taxed for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: My friend said "all farmers".

Hon. Mr. Ross: All Canadians are being taxed to pay this subsidy. The farmers of the prairie provinces are being taxed as well as the farmers of the other provinces, and it is not sound economic policy to tax an industry in one province in order to pay a subsidy to its competitors in another province. That is in effect what this tax is doing. We are taxing the prairie farmers to pay a subsidy to the farmers in the other provinces who are competitors in raising livestock.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is not one class of farmer that is being taxed. Everyone in Canada is contributing.

Hon. Mr. Ross: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is not the farmers alone.

Hon. Mr. Ross: The farmers are being taxed as well.

Honourable senators, in the interests of economy, I submit that this subsidy should be done away with.

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette: Honourable senators, when the honourable senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Ross) and the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) say that the subsidy on western feed grains is of no assistance to the farmers in the West and should be abolished, I do not know on what basis they can support their argument. About four years ago there was no kind of crop in the northern Ontario clay belt from Hearst to Cobalt; the grain was left on the ground and we could not gather it for harvest. It is hard to visualize the seriousness of the situation as it existed then. We have been trying to widen the scope of agriculture in northern Ontario for some years, and with that purpose in mind a delegation, of which I was a member, went to the Department of Agriculture. We tried to impress the department with the fact that we should get the same help as the western provinces were already receiving, but that there was no legislation to provide for it. We also asked for a further reduction in freight on grain going to the coast, so as to relieve our serious situation, but the request was not granted.

Like most members of this chamber, I think subsidies should be done away with as quickly as possible, but when they are necessary it is vital to retain them. When subsidies are discussed we must think nationally and not parochially. It is a fact that when the farmers of northern Ontario or northern Quebec suffer a bad crop situation the rest of the farmers of Canada to some extent also suffer the consequences. I am of the opinion that this subsidy is one of the best ever voted, and that it has helped our farmers and stimulated the growth of industry both in northern Quebec and northern Ontario. Western producers of coarse grains and feed wheat have been provided with a profitable market in the eastern provinces and also in British Columbia. I venture to predict that if the assistance they now receive were removed, a good domestic market would be lost.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, this debate seems to be on the question of whether the farmers of western Canada are getting too much, or whether the farmers of northern Ontario are not getting enough.

As a humble citizen of Ontario, representing citizens of Ontario, I would like to have a word to say, because, after all, subsidies come out of the taxes which are paid by the people of Canada, and I think the greater proportion comes from the people of Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Euler: In principle, I am absolutely opposed to subsidies. I am opposed to even the Crowsnest Pass Agreement, which is really a subsidy to reduce freight rates. However, I am in favour of carrying out the terms of an agreement. I think the western farmers should realize that they are getting a great deal of money because the C.N.R. have to charge rates so low that we in the eastern provinces have to help pay the losses.

Hon. Mr. Ross: It is a profitable business for the railways.

Hon. Mr. Euler: It would be more profitable if they were able to charge proper rates across the country. I do not like discrimination between one class and another. I have every sympathy for the farmer, but I do not think farmers have any more right—except in an emergency—to a subsidy than people in any other line of business have. There is distress in our manufacturing industries in Ontario, and I think also in Quebec. Sometimes our manufacturers—for reasons I will not discuss here—are unable to export their goods because costs are too high. Must we subsidize all our manufacturers for that reason?

Hon. Mr. Ross: We are doing it with high tariffs.

Hon. Mr. Euler: I think the principle of subsidies is absolutely unsound. They are given to favoured people. I may get into hot water for saying this, but I think governments are unduly given to subsidizing the farmer. I have nothing against the farmer, but I think he has become the "favourite boy" in this country, and perhaps in other countries as well. I do not like favouritism as between one industry and another. I realize that in time of war we have to adopt measures that are abnormal, but as soon as possible after the war ends all such measures should be dropped. Except in an abnormal situation, I think we should wipe subsidies clean off the map, because to grant them is an unfair discrimination against the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: What about a tariff, is that a subsidy?

Hon. Mr. Euler: No.

Hon. John P. Howden: Honourable senators, I am in agreement with the honourable senator from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler). I was born in the east, but grew up in the west, and I consider myself to be a western man. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the interests of western Canada. I think we should get the right idea about this subsidy. The western farmer grows a great deal of barley, wheat and oats, but particularly barley and wheat. Barley is used in Canada for certain purposes, and the Government saw fit to pay a subsidy of 15 cents a bushel on the freight rate from western to eastern Canada, because the eastern farmer was not able to even feed his own pigs and cattle for market. The western farmer greatly resented that subsidy, and I think he had a right to do so. It is senseless to say there should not be animosity between eastern and western groups in Canada. The basis of business is competition, in every activity or industry. The western farmer has been at a decided disadvantage in the matter of subsidies. Therefore, I am not in favour of them.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: The subsidy of which you spoke did not cover the whole of the freight charges.

Hon. Mr. Howden: It was actually 15 cents a bushel on the price of barley.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: No, it does not work that way.

Hon. Calvert C. Pratt: Honourable senators, not being from either Ontario or the prairie provinces, may I, nevertheless, say a word or two on this delicate subject of subsidies? I wish to refer first to what has just been said about subsidies as a general policy. It is very easy for a person to say—as was said a moment ago—"I am not in favour of subsidies." That could be logical thinking but illogical practice. In theory, my honourable friend might be right, but theories give a poor living. In practice, subsidies can be construed, and can be applied, as an equalization of opportunity by a payment for indirect benefits which others are denied. In geographical areas where people contribute proportionately more to other provinces than they receive, by trading with those other provinces, subsidies to equalize trade and opportunity are no doubt necessary. Then again, aren't protective tariffs on industry a subsidy? The only difference is in the form of payment made by the people. For instance, the province of Newfoundland, the province of Prince Edward Island, and maybe other provinces, are examples of what occurs when the preponderance of trade is one way only. Practically no trading benefits come to Newfoundland from the other provinces, and my province has to sell elsewhere in the competitive markets of the world to get the money required to pay for purchases made in the other parts of Canada. Such a situation, I think, requires subsidies of one kind or another, depending on the conditions. To say that subsidies should be wiped out may sound feasible in theory, but it is entirely wrong in ethical principle, as between provinces.

I should like to refer to one item in the supplementary estimates before us pertaining to the movement of coal, which appears on page 6 of the bill. The vote number is 591, and the amount is $1,604,000. It comes under the heading of "Mines and Technical Surveys," and is sub-titled "B—Dominion Coal Board." The item reads as follows:

Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council.

I realize that this item in the schedule was introduced as a protective measure for places in the central areas of Canada where United States competition in the sale of coal is acute and undoubtedly has a marked effect on the coal industry and labour situation in Cape Breton. The subsidy is therefore highest where coal is cheapest. There are some areas where coal is very, very cheap and where the subsidy, I understand, runs as high as $4.50 a ton.

Honourable senators, Newfoundland has been a buyer of coal from Sydney Mines as long as there has been a Sydney mine. The purchases have been running of late around 200,000 to 250,000 tons yearly. The condition of the coal as it arrives in Newfoundland is somewhat inferior to the coal that can be purchased from sources in the United States. This occurs by reason of the facilities for loading on board ships, during which the coal becomes badly broken, some of it being reduced to dust. The coal therefore is not as well screened as when delivered by railway cars.

Now it does not seem right that that subvention or assistance on coal should be cancelled out as applying to Newfoundland. The subsidy recently in force for a period amounted to $2.40 a ton.

The reason why it was eliminated, I believe, is that there appeared to be an absence of direct competition from outside and a feeling that, well, the Cape Breton mines might get the orders anyway.

Honourable senators, I am not too sure that that is a broad enough view to have on this issue, although I am aware that the primary purpose of the subsidy is to meet foreign competition. The areas of Newfoundland where this subvention is required most are where the price of coal is highest, and where the people can least afford to pay the highest prices. However, passing over that, I would say this, that there is a distinct possibility and a likelihood that vessels will be bringing in foreign coal to St. John's, and perhaps some other ports, and local vessels will be loading this outside coal, and as a result Sydney will be by-passed. That is a possibility, and I am told by people in the industry that it is very likely to happen.

In Newfoundland we have a different condition too because most of the coal, I think more than 50 per cent of it is handled by small freighting schooners and is taken from one place to another. These schooners can go to Sydney at the present time; in fact there is a constant flow of the vessels in and out of Sydney, but I can foresee the possibility that Sydney Mines will be by-passed and not continue making as substantial shipments as it has made in the past.

This $2.40 subsidy has suddenly been withdrawn and at the moment there is no subsidy whatever paid on coal from Sydney Mines brought into Newfoundland, although provision has been made annually in the estimates for something like $10 million susbidy for the movement of coal in Canada. I think that is a matter that should be more closely considered on its merits and in the light of the special circumstances involved. I am not speaking now to defend the principle of subsidies and subventions as a general policy, but it is a policy under which scores if not hundreds of millions of dollars are paid out, and while that is so justice should be done.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I would like to know if Newfoudland does not receive some benefit from item 584, which provides for the amount required to recoup the Fisheries Prices Support Account to cover the net operating loss on completed programs of the Fisheries Prices Support Board as at March 31, 1955, the amount required being $744,382.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: Yes, that is undoubtedly a payment which is made to assist the fisheries industry in Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But you would like to get a subsidy on coal that is consumed in Newfoundland?

Hon. Mr. Pratt: I would like to see proper consideration given to the matter of freighting coal to Newfoundland as to elsewhere. I would like to see the subsidy paid out fairly in the light of the circumstances involved, and not purely by the book of rules, which may not be applicable to the whole need and the special circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what I thought you meant.

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh: Honourable senators, as a western farmer I would like to make a few remarks with regard to these subsidies. One point that I wanted to make has been covered by the honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt). I agree with him that subsidies often provide just an equalization of opportunity.

Now, honourable senators, I know that many western farmers would like to see the freight subsidies on feed grains wiped out, because these special freight rates actually subsidize our competitors, the eastern farmers who are raising hogs and cattle. We in the west have to ship our stock to the east, because our market is there. In order for us to get similarly favourable treatment, we should have the benefit of special freight rates on our stock going east.

Speaking for myself, as a western farmer, I do not begrudge these subsidies to the eastern farmers. To repeat: they provide an equalization of opportunity. We can raise grain in western Canada more cheaply than it can be raised in the east. Most eastern farmers are dairy farmers, and I know they work very hard, and put in long hours.

The western farmers subsidized the people of eastern Canada in their food supply for over three years during the war. Every time that some of you overweight gentlemen down here in eastern Canada ate a slice of bread or a piece of pie or cake, one big bite out of that was given to you free by the western farmers, because we were held down to a price for our grain much less than we would have received had we been allowed to sell on the open market. At the time I did not even mind that, but when you same gentlemen get up and tell us about the way you subsidized us and made us a gift of $65 million, you add insult to injury and you make me think that perhaps we fed you too well in those three years. It has been fairly figured out that the western farmers lost upward of a billion dollars by not being allowed to sell their wheat on the open market. However, we are used to making our money the hard way. We do not mind too much feeding the people of Central Canada and preventing the grass from growing on their streets by buying their manufactured articles and keeping their factories going, but we do think we should be thanked for doing this, and not criticized.

So, honourable senators, I would say this. We are glad to allow our eastern friends these subsidies on feed grains. I know they need them and I believe they should be kept up. I realize that we in the West help to pay them, and that we are building up a market which to some extent operates against us.

In closing, I would like to suggest to honourable senators who oppose subsidies on feed grain that they should train their guns on other subsidies. For instance, we are giving millions to subsidize the operation of gold mines.

Hon. W. Rupert Davies: Honourable senators, I am not going to get mixed up in this fight. Many years ago I heard the Right Honourable Mackenzie King state, in the course of a speech at a public meeting, that Canada was a very hard country to govern. After listening to the discussion this afternoon, I assume that he was right. I simply got up to ask the honourable leader of this house (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) a question about a matter that I know something about, under "Public Printing and Stationery," items 598 and 599. Can the honourable leader (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) tell us, when he is answering the various questions, why a further amount of $55,000 is required for the publication of the Canada Gazette? Assuming there is a very able man in the estimates department of the Printing Bureau, he should be able to tell, at the beginning of the fiscal year, what it is going to cost to produce the Canada Gazette; and I am not quite clear why the additional amount of $55,000 is needed.

Again, under "Printing and binding the annual statutes" a further amount of $6,500 is required. The only conclusion I can come to is that the Bureau has had to face higher wage demands or something of that kind. Perhaps the leader will explain these matters when he answers the other questions that have been asked.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word before the debate is closed. Having been busy elsewhere, I am not in a position to argue this question of subsidies, but I could not allow the occasion to pass without stating my position, lest anyone should mistake it, with regard to subsidies. All my life I have objected to the granting of subsidies to the manufacturers in our cities. I come from a city; I am a free-trader; and I do not believe in charging people more than commodities are worth in order that one man shall pay profits to another. In the same general way I am opposed to subsidies. It may be that there are times when, on compassionate grounds, or under very special circumstances, such as in time of war, it is fair and honest and decent to ask the taxpayers generally to pay something to particular classes which are contributing in a special way to the common good. But to make a practice of taking from one business a portion of its profits to make up the profits of another business is, in my view, dishonest, uneconomic and disastrous; and if we go on doing it we shall run into serious economic and financial difficulties. The country can stand a little of this kind of thing without too much hurt, but if the process goes deep enough it will, beyond all question and with absolute certainty, run into disaster.

It is difficult to attack any one specific subsidy, because the beneficiaries, who depend on their profits on other business, will say "Look at this one; look at the other one." The farmer will tell us to look at the manufacturer. The manufacturer will point to favours to the gold-mining industry. The gold miners will ask us to look at some other interest. All of them have got their probosces in the public or the communal treasury. The use of the Government's power to interfere in the natural order of things works out badly all the time.

Let me recall one incident. It will be remembered that the Government interfered in the matter of the value of money. It was stated that our money should be worth so much in relation to American money, irrespective of the facts, and we poured a billion and a half dollars down the drain. And so we go on, poking the nose of the Government into places where it has no business to be, and with the same results—loss, and disaster, and the dishonest exercise of our powers over other people.

I want to add that I voted against the $65 million grant that has been referred to. I do not propose to argue this matter again, but I want it thoroughly understood that I have had no part in approving the payment of that grant.

There is one more thing I should like to say before I sit down. I am not really taking part in the debate; I am merely stating my position. The honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Vien), in his comments with regard to the constitution, read from the British North America Act to the effect that the Government of Canada is vested in the Queen, and he drew from that circumstance the deduction that the business of our country is to be transacted by the executive. That is true enough; and there is a special rule which allows a minister to say that it is not in the public interest to give certain information: it is out of order to try to compel him to do so. For instance, were a resolution passed that, notwithstanding such a declaration by a minister, he be required to give that information, the Speaker would rule it out of order. But in my judgment, that rule does not in any way curtail the rights of debate, the right of the individual to question an amount and to declare his mind with respect to it; and furthermore, to enforce his views by voting, if he so desires, against the appropriation. In this matter the supremacy of Parliament is involved, and that supremacy was in the first place acquired, and throughout the years has been maintained, by control over the purse-strings. So, although my honourable friend from De Lorimier is thoroughly acquainted with constitutional matters and the rules of the house, I cannot, because I am jealous of the rights of Parliament, agree with him when he says that such a statement by a minister in any way controls the limits of debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators,—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) speaks, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am sure that this has been a very helpful debate. Considering the very short time at our disposal, we have gone into the estimates thoroughly. The debate proves that honourable senators have studied the Supplementary Estimates before coming into the house today.

I quite agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig) that it would have been much better had we been able to have this debate two or three days ago. Last year, which was the first year I was a member of this house, the honourable gentleman reminded me that a similar bill had come to the Senate too late for thorough consideration. On that occasion I stated I would do what I could to have the bill come in earlier this year. Well, I think I started off all right. I saw the appropriate minister about it, and he introduced the bill in the House of Commons a week ago tomorrow.

From my experience I recall that this appropriation bill was usually introduced in the House of Commons on the last day of the fiscal year, which meant that the Senate had practically no time at all to consider it. The fact that the bill has not reached us until today is not the fault of the Government, but I am not blaming anyone. Probably next year the minister may be able to introduce the bill in the other house even earlier than he did this year.

Honourable senators, we have had a discussion about the operation of the Canadian National Railway and its hotels. I do not intend to deal with that subject any further.

There is no doubt that both the hotel management and the Government will be made aware of what has been said here today, and whether or not it will affect the administration of the railway I cannot say. In any event, I am sure that the Government will take notice of what has been said during this debate.

We have had a very interesting discussion on subventions, some honourable senators speaking in favour of them, and others against. There was a discussion on the subsidy of feed grains, during which one honourable gentleman from Western Canada advocated the subsidy be abolished, while another said that by all means it should be maintained. I am sorry that my deskmate, the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Godbout), is not here at the present time, for he is an expert on the subject of subsidies and made a very clear statement when replying to a question that was asked earlier in the session by the honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid).

I think it was my honourable colleague from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) who said he did not understand why there should be an increase in the subsidy on feed grains over the amount placed in the original estimates. The fact is that more grain was shipped than had been anticipated. It is very difficult to estimate these expenditures right down to the last dollar. My recollection is that the original estimate was $16 million, and this is for an extra $1 million.

Hon. Mr. Ross: The original estimate was $17 million.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And this is an extra $1 million.

Hon. Mr. Ross: $2 million.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, roughly speaking, that represents an increase of about 12 per cent. In some instances, although not in many, the original estimates were over the amount required. I am sure we are all agreed that the departmental officials who submit these estimates do so to the best of their ability, and that by and large they do a good job.

Reference was made to the floor price—one might call it a subsidy—on butter. The honourable Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Haig), thought there should be no floor price on butter, so perhaps I should remind the house that the farming population is one section of our population whose income has notably dropped during the past year. This has had an effect on our dairy farmers, and as a result the dairy industry is not in a sound position today. I am convinced that if the floor price were removed from butter it would be disastrous to many farmers and would bring about a chaotic condition in the dairy industry. It is true that some people might get butter a little cheaper, but do you think it would be in the best interests of Canada to put many dairy farmers out of business? I certainly do not think so.

The honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) referred to a further amount required with respect to operation and maintenance in the Indian Affairs Branch. The Government is endeavouring to do what it can to enhance the lot of Canada's Indians, many of whom suffer from tuberculosis, but before their health can be improved it is necessary to build them hospitals and improve their general living condition. This item was not foreseen when the Main Estimates were brought down, but I am sure we all approve of any effort made to better the lives of Canada's Indians.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: This is certainly a justifiable expenditure.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable gentleman from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) asked a question with respect to the legislative grant to the House of Commons. He wanted to know if the money was for the new elevators in the main building. The Main Estimates for the House of Commons for 1954-55 amounted to $1,250,777. There were additional Supplementary Estimates totalling $58,000, making the total amount required $1,308,777. The amount of $58,000 includes an additional $50,000 for the publishing of debates. By way of explanation, I suppose the officials of the house miscalculated the length of the debates, and there have probably been some wage increases. There are further additional requirements of $3,500 for office stationery, supplies and equipment, and $4,500 for committee expenses, for witnesses, etc. The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid), who is Chairman of the Special committee on the Narcotic Drug Traffic, will appreciate that as a result of the work of that committee there may be some unforseen expenses in connection with witnesses and so on.

The honourable senator from St. John's West (Hon. Mr. Pratt) referred to the subsidies which had been taken off coal movements to Newfoundland. I shall bring his representations to the attention of the government. My recollection is that while some ports could take advantage of the subsidies, other ports could not, and it was thought that to be fair the subsidies should be taken off altogether. However, as he has raised the question, I will see that it is again considered.

The honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies) asked me a question with respect to Votes 598 and 599. Vote 598 covers a supplementary estimate by the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the printing and binding of the annual estimates, in the amount of $6,500. The original estimate was, of necessity, conjectural, being dependent on the extent of the legislation, on the length and number of pages of the statutes enacted, and on the number of copies printed and bound. The costs incurred for the last session of parliament exceeded the original estimates and therefore additional funds are required.

Vote 599 would cover the supplemental costs incurred for publishing the Canada Gazette. The original estimate was, of necessity, conjectural, being dependent on the quantity of printed matter submitted and upon the number of regular copies printed each week and extras as required. A consolidation of Statutory Orders and Regulations increased a number of issues of the Canada Gazette to several times the normal size. Those are the reasons for the increased cost.

I hope I have answered all the questions honourable senators asked of me. I do not pretend to be an expert on this subject, but with the assistance of a book which contains the supplementary estimates from the various departments with an explanation for each item, I trust I have been able to give satisfactory answers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I am not going to speak on the third reading of this bill, for one reason. I spoke on the second reading, and I lost all my supporters; now, if I were to try to speak on the third reading I might even lose myself.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 284, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1956.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, may I make an interjection? Assuming that we will have the opportunity of discussing the provisions of this bill on the general estimates, I suggest that it be put through its various stages at this time and be ready to receive Royal Assent this evening.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There was no debate at all on this bill in the other house.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Carried.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I move third reading now.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable senators, I just want to make it clear that we have an undertaking by the Leader of the Government that these estimates can be discussed in the general estimates.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Such an undertaking has always been given.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am prepared to give an undertaking that the passage of this bill will not prejudice the rights of any honourable senator to criticize or discuss the items when they come before the house itself or any committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I have just been informed that the Veterans Allowance bill is still under consideration by the House of Commons. I am still hopeful that we shall receive it by 8:30 this evening. Would it meet with the favour of honourable senators if I suggested that the house rise now to reassemble at 8.30 this evening?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask the indulgence of the house for a moment? I was engaged on the Divorce Committee while the house was dealing with routine proceedings. May I now introduce some divorce bills?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BILL

FIRST READING

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 164, an Act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

The bill was read the first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, it is certainly very trying on the patience of the members of the Senate to wait several days for a bill, especially for a bill that we realize should be passed today in order that thousands of veterans throughout Canada may benefit from it just as soon as possible. If it were not for the provision that the bill will come into effect on the first day of the month following the day on which it receives Royal Assent, I would not suggest that it should be considered by us this evening. However, in view of that provision, and in view of the splendid service which these men and women have given Canada I trust that the Senate will see fit to pass the bill tonight.

The main feature of this bill is to increase the basic rate of war veterans allowances by 20 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Reid: I have no copy of the bill here.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The bill has just reached us from the House of Commons, and I do not think it has been distributed. It is possible that a number of senators have seen the bill while it was being considered by the Commons.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We all received a copy of it in the mail.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Were any amendments made to the bill in the Commons?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, there was one amendment, which I will refer to.

Then I take it that honourable senators have received the bill which was considered in the Commons, and which is now before the Senate with one amendment, to which I will refer.

As I said, the main feature of this bill is to increase the basic rates of war veterans allowances by 20 per cent. A veteran under the act who is single and is receiving $50 a month will now receive $60 a month. Similarly, a married veteran who is now receiving $90 a month will, under the provisions of this bill, receive $108 a month.

There is also a provision whereby the ceiling, that is to say the total income permissible under the act, is increased in the case of the single veteran from $720 to $840 a year, and in the case of a married veteran from $1,200 to $1,440 a year.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Is that in addition to the allowance?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, not in addition to the allowance, but including the allowance.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Does that permissible income include casual earnings?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No. Perhaps I might refer to casual earnings at this time. They are earnings by a recipient or by his wife, or by both of them for work of an irregular nature, commonly termed odd jobs—that is, small jobs complete in themselves for one or more employers. These casual earnings are allowed over and above the permissible income. There is also a provision that earnings by a recipient and his wife, or by both of them, from part-time regular employment—for instance, as the caretaker of a church or a school or a Legion hall, or a canteen attendant or a crossing guard, or self-employment at home on a part-time basis—are exempt up to twenty-five days at a maximum amount of $2 a day. That is to enable a war veteran to take a job such as I have described, and if he works twenty-five days a month—

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Is it a month?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Twenty-five days a month.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: He could earn $50 a month that way.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, he could earn $50 a month in that way. A veteran might work two or three days a week, and even if it is regular work throughout the year he may retain whatever earnings he makes.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Is there any other definition of casual earnings?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Casual earnings are also earnings from odd jobs.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Yes, but is there any other definition?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Well, they include earnings from small jobs which are complete in themselves.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: I ask the question because I happen to know of a case where a claim was based on small earnings, and the stand taken by the department at the time was that they were not casual earnings. I was wondering if there were any definition in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, there is no change in the act so far as a definition of casual earnings is concerned, but I think you will find that in administering the act the officers will be quite generous in their interpretation of that term.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Why the discrimination against a regular job?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is no discrimination in the case of part-time regular employment; it is regarded as casual earnings. But if the man had regular full-time employment which took him well beyond the income ceiling he would not be eligible under the act. I am informed that the widest possible interpretation is given to the term "casual earnings".

Hon. Mr. Davies: Could the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) tell us whether, if a married man gets the pension and also works twenty-five days in a month, he can also earn a certain amount by casual jobs? If so, what is the total of permitted earnings?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If he were in receipt of the full amount allowed under the act he could then work twenty-five days in the month at the rate of $2 a day, but that would be the total amount he would be permitted to earn on a casual basis. Should his earnings exceed that amount, there would be a reduction of the veterans' allowance.

As regards earnings by the recipient or his wife resulting from full-time temporary employment of limited duration, such as in summer camps, the provision may be explained in this way. It is possible that a veteran or his wife would get a job for, say, two or three months in the year by which he or she earned two or three hundred dollars. That would be regarded as casual earnings, because it would be allowed to him as on an extended basis throughout the year. The fact that the money was earned in a few months and that for the rest of the year he was unemployed would not be held against him in respect of, say, the few hundred dollars so earned. He would not be deprived thereby of his war veterans allowance.

As regards the remuneration which a veteran may earn from a single transaction: suppose he helped another person to sell a house, and received a commission for his services, so long as he was not a real estate agent and the incident was an isolated one, the amount so received would not have the effect of reducing consideration of his war veterans allowance.

Hon. Mr. Gershaw: What is the position of the man who is eligible for old age security payments?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The old age security payment would be the first he would get. If he were a single man it would amount to $40 a month, which is $480 a year. As a single man he is entitled under this act to $840 a year, so he would receive in war veterans allowance the difference between $480 and $840, which is $360. His war veterans allowance would, therefore, be at the rate of $30 per month.

Those are the main provisions of the bill, but if honourable senators wish me to do so I will go over the various sections and explain them.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Has the honourable the Government Leader particulars of the amendment to the original bill?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There has been one amendment. Probably, as we are not in a great hurry, I might explain the bill clause by clause.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I think it would be a service.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Clause 1 widens the meaning of the word "parent" to include an adoptive or foster parent or a step-parent. So, under this definition, if the parent should die, the child would be entitled to the payment of the allowance as an orphan. If the child is a girl it is to be paid until she attains the age of 17 years; if a boy, until 16 years. But if the child, whether a boy or a girl, is following and making satisfactory progress in a course of instruction approved by the district authority the allowance is to be continued until he or she attains the age of 21 years.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: These parents, I suppose, must be in loco parentis.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, in all cases they have been in loco parentis, although there may not have been an order of adoption made. Where there is one child, the amount payable is $40; if there are two children it is $70; if there are three children, $85. The last is the maximum amount.

Section 3 of the present act provides for an income ceiling on a yearly basis; and section 4, an income ceiling on a monthly basis. Under the act the provisions of the ceiling on a monthly basis apply to male veterans only, but under the amendment these ceilings will apply also to female veterans and to widows.

I come to clause 3 of the bill, whereunder the new section 5 provides that the widow of a veteran who is in receipt of war veterans allowance receives the allowance at the married rate for one year after the death of her husband. If a man who is in receipt of war veterans allowance dies, the allowance is continued to the widow for one year at the married rate. Similarly, if a woman who has served in the armed forces and is in receipt of war veterans allowance at the married rate on behalf of her husband, should die, the allowance is continued to the widower for a year.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: That is a good provision.

Hon. Mr. Reid: What happens after the year?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In the case of the widow, after the year, she would get, if she is eligible in her own right, the allowance under the act as a single person.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: And if she remarried?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Remarriage would affect the entitlement because of the income ceiling. It would depend on the income of her new husband as well as her own.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: If she married within a year of her husband's death would the amount of the allowance be affected?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: It would be affected if her income increased.

Clause 3 of the bill makes the increases applicable to those who are now getting the benefit of the act as widows or as widowers. Suppose a veteran in receipt of an allowance died last January. His widow would be receiving the benefits under the present act, and under this bill she would get the increase when it goes into effect.

Clause 3 of the bill has been amended by adding a new subparagraph 2, as follows:

Where any veteran or surviving spouse of a veteran was receiving or was eligible to receive an amount under section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the date of the coming into force of this Act, in respect of a period ending on or after that date, the district authority may, in its discretion and in lieu of any further amount under that section, award to such veteran or spouse

(a) in respect of the portion of that period that is prior to that date, an amount determined in accordance with subsection (1) or (2), as the case may be, of section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, and

(b) in respect of the portion of that period that is on or after that date, an allowance determined in accordance with subsection (1), (2) or (3), as the case may be, of section 5 of the said act as enacted by this section, less any amount received by such veteran or spouse in respect of that period pursuant to an award made under section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the coming into force of this act.

That means this. Suppose an application is pending and will not be determined until after this bill comes into force. If a person is entitled to the benefits of the act he will get them at the old rate up to this date, after which time he will get the benefits at the new rates.

Hon. Mr. Davies: If a married man in receipt of the allowance died, his widow would receive the same allowance until the end of the year. After that time would she benefit only from a single allowance?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Suppose she has two or three children?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In that case she can get additional assistance under the Act. Under this act there is no provision for paying an allowance to children if one of the parents is living, but if both parents are dead then there is a payment to the children as orphans.

Clause 4 of the bill is for administrative purposes only. Under the present act it has been necessary for a widow or a widower, upon the decease of his or her spouse, to make an application under section 5 of the act. This amendment will enable the board to make a grant immediately upon notification of the death.

Clause 5: Under the present Act a veteran cannot get the benefits of the married rate if he enters into what is generally known as a "death-bed marriage". The purpose of this clause is also to make it impossible for the widow of such a veteran to obtain benefits under section 5 of this act.

Section 6 provides for an increase in the salary of the Chairman of the Board from $10,000 to $11,000 per annum, and in the salary of each of the other four members from $8,500 to $9,500 a year.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there any definition of a "death-bed marriage"?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, I think there is. I have heard of a death-bed repentance. Section 11 of the present act reads as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, no allowance shall be paid to a widow of a veteran who dies within one year from the date of his marriage . . .

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Surely you do not call that a death-bed marriage? The average man does not spend a year on his death bed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If a veteran gets married and dies within one year I think that marriage would come within the classification of a death-bed marriage, unless at the time of the marriage, the veteran was, in the opinion of the Board, in such a condition of health as to justify his having a reasonable life expectancy of at least one year.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: What if a veteran died from a heart attack within one year of getting married, although he had shown no signs of having any heart trouble? It would seem very unfair to me that his marriage should be considered a death-bed marriage.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That would not be considered a death-bed marriage, for probably he would have had a reasonable life expectancy of more than one year.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Certainly.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Who decides these things?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Board; and I think the Board has always acted most fairly. No question has been raised if a man is likely to live for a few years. I do not think there are many women in the world who, for the purpose of getting certain benefits would marry a man just because he was about to die.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There were such cases after the Civil War in the United States.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators must remember that this act does not apply to men only. There are women who served in our armed forces and are entitled to benefits.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: It is not only women who contract a death-bed marriage then?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Supposing a woman veteran eligible for the benefits of this act became ill. I hope there are not any men who would marry her just so that they could benefit under this act after her death.

Subclause 1 of clause 7 simply spells out the definition of a Canadian forces veteran, instead of referring to the definition in the Veterans Benefit Act. There is a small change in subclause 2 for the purpose of clarification in the meaning of World War II. The present act states that World War II commenced in September 1939, and the amendment specifies the date as September 1, 1939.

Subclause 3 deals with a common-law widow, or the widow of an irregular union. Under the present act, in certain circumstances the common-law wife of a veteran may be deemed to be his wife for the purposes of the act. The amendment makes it clear that if the veteran dies she is also deemed to be his widow.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Suppose he marries her on his death bed so as to make an honest woman of her, does she not benefit under the act?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Considering the provisions of this act, I would say that if he could have married her previously he should have done so.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: Yes, but supposing he didn't?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Then she would not be recognized as a common-law wife. The department only recognizes common-law wives where one or the other cannot marry.

Hon. Mr. Reid: It is not as clear as all that. I was turned down in a case last week on account of the fact that the man had died before it was drawn to the attention of the authorities that the woman he had lived with was his common-law wife. I have been dealing with a case like that for six years. The woman has raised three children, and she has been denied an allowance. It is not as clear as the leader's explanation makes it appear.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have been trying to explain it as well as I can.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The man who died might leave two widows.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. The honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) asked what the woman's position would be if the man married her within a year prior to his death. I replied that if he was in a legal position to marry her before that time he should have done so.

Hon. Mr. Isnor: I understand that the purpose of the amendment is to provide for a case such as the honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) just mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That may be so. I am not familiar with the case he spoke of, but if this bill is passed I suggest that he renew his representations to the board.

An Hon. Senator: I did not hear what the honourable senator from Victoria (Hon. Mrs. Hodges) asked. What was her question?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from Victoria asked me this question: If a man were living with a woman in a common-law relationship and he married her on his death bed, would that be considered a death bed marriage? My answer was that if they could have got married a year before they should have done so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Supposing his true wife died just before he was about to pass away, and he then made his common-law wife an "honest woman", as the saying is, would the fact of the marriage cause the woman to lose the right she might otherwise have had as a common-law wife?

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think that is a very good point, and I hope the board will take note of that situation which might arise. I am satisfied that she would not lose the benefits of the act.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That question was put to one of the commissioners the other day by the honourable senator from Rosetown (Hon. Mr. Aseltine) and myself, and he said, "Yes, she would get the allowance."

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I feel sure that a wide enough interpretation would be given to the act in order to ensure that she would get the allowance.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is right.

Hon. Mrs. Wilson: You have been speaking of the widow in all cases, but I suppose the widower is equally entitled to an allowance?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Oh, yes, a widower would be entitled to an allowance if his wife had been in receipt of a war veterans allowance on his behalf.

Hon. Mr. Davies: But there would be no pension in addition, would there?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are cases where a veteran receives a small pension under the Pension Act, and that is considered as part of his earnings.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Nothing can touch it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Nothing can touch it, because he gets it as a matter of right. Anything he receives under this act will be in addition to that.

Honourable senators, subclause 4 is a little complicated. It is a direct result of the subclause wherein the common-law wife of a veteran is, after his death, deemed to be his widow. There are cases where a veteran living with a common-law wife has a legal wife still living, and if he dies he leaves a legal widow and a common-law widow who has been recognized under this act.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Is it clear, then, that the common-law wife of a veteran receives the benefit of the allowance after his death?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Where there has been a divorce, the common-law wife would receive the allowance.

Hon. Mr. Reid: That is a question to which I have been trying for seven years to get an answer, but without success. I see the honourable the Minister in the gallery tonight. Perhaps I should refer to him the case that I mentioned.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Of course, the woman would have to qualify as a common-law wife.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Does she not have to live with the veteran seven years?

Hon. Mr. Davies: When there is a common-law wife and a legal wife, who gets the allowance?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Both of them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am about to come to the case in which a deceased veteran leaves a common-law wife and a legal wife. He may have been receiving payments of pension through the Canadian Pension Commission. As honourable senators know, when a pensioner is married he gets an increased pension and the increase may be paid direct to the wife. If the legal wife is receiving her portion of the veteran's pension and the veteran dies, she may continue to receive the pension payable to her as a widow under the Pension Act. The common-law wife is eligible under the War Veterans Allowance Act at the married rate. That is provided for under section 5 of the act. Therefore, under the act it could happen that two women would receive benefits on behalf of the same veteran, and that the aggregate payments made to the two "widows" on behalf of one veteran would be more than the maximum payable under either act on behalf of one veteran.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Would you call that polygamy?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would not call it polygamy, because when these benefits are payable the veteran is dead.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: May I ask a question? In the Divorce Committee and in a recent debate in the house we have heard a good deal of discussion about divorced people. If the wife of a Canadian soldier got a divorce in England on a ground not recognized in Canada, and he, being unable to get a divorce here, took up with a common-law wife, would his wife in England still be his legal wife?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I would not think so. If she has obtained a divorce, she has put herself out of the picture.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: But would that divorce be recognized here?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: If she has obtained a divorce she could hardly come and ask for benefits under this act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The marriage is already dissolved.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I return to the rather interesting case of the man who leaves a common-law wife and a legal wife. This bill provides that the total amount payable to the two women shall not exceed the amount provided for under either the War Veterans Allowance Act or the Pension Act, whichever is the greater.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Who loses out?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The amount is apportioned between the two women as determined by the War Veterans Allowance Board and the Pension Commission after a conference.

Hon. Mr. Reid: Do I understand that if the legal wife is living in England and she refuses to come here, the man in Canada is still married to her?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. Of course those circumstances would be taken into consideration by the Pension Commission and the War Veterans Allowance Board.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: That was the particular question I asked, and I understood the leader to say that she would not be considered in the matter.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable senator from New Westminster (Hon. Mr. Reid) referred, as I understood him, to the case of a man whose wife was living in England but had not obtained a divorce there.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: I understand.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In such a case the woman would not be divorced.

Hon. Mrs. Hodges: And the man in Canada would be legally married to her.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. However, I am satisfied that a woman who obtained a divorce in England could not come back to Canada and claim benefits under this act as a veteran's widow.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The marriage would have been dissolved, as far as she was concerned.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Honourable senators, I must say that in the light of the explanations I have heard from the honourable leader I do not think too highly of this bill. My sympathy is with the widows. Do I understand correctly that when a veteran dies his widow is entitled to an allowance of $50 a month?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Under the bill, she would get $60.

Hon. Mr. Davies: All right, let her have $60, and also let her have the family allowance for, say, three children. She is still not going to have more than about $20 a week to live on. Where is she going to get the money to rent suitable accommodation, and dress and feed herself and the children? I am quite sure that she would have great difficulty living on that kind of money in Kingston or in a larger city like Ottawa.

Despite all the improvements we have made, we still appear to be quite niggardly with the widows of war veterans, especially those with children. I do not think we have done very well by them.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There is also what is known as an assistance fund out of which an additional amount can be paid to a widow, to bring her total income up to $840 a year.

Hon. Mr. Davies: But does she benefit from that fund as a right or as a privilege? And can she get assistance under any provincial legislation? I know that in Ontario we have what is called the Mothers' Allowance Act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is a similar act in Manitoba, and I believe in all of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I know only about Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I doubt if she could get an allowance from two Government sources, even if one were federal and the other provincial. I think other income would be taken into consideration when her case was being considered.

Hon. Mr. Davies: I must say that I am sorry we have not had opportunity of discussing this bill in committee. A widow with three children is placed in an unfortunate position, because she cannot take casual work.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I sympathize with the point of view expressed by the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). This bill would provide allowances for men who were not wounded but who have been burned out because of war services and are considered unable to work. Of course, quite apart from this act there is the Pension Act.

Hon. Mr. Davies: That is for disabled veterans.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Veterans disabled by war service.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Does the act not make provision for children?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes, the act does make provision for widows with children. Perhaps I should have emphasized that point. A widow with children who qualifies under section 3 of the act will get the allowance at the married rate.

Hon. Mr. Davies: That is quite a different situation.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes; she would get a larger allowance than I indicated to the honourable member from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Davies). I am sorry that my explanation in that respect was not entirely clear.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

I am sure that thousands of veterans throughout the country will be grateful to you. Honourable senators may be interested to know that approximately 44,000 veterans will benefit from the provisions of this bill.

DIVORCE PETITIONS AND STATISTICS

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 298 to 318, dealing with petitions for divorce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these reports be considered?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: With leave, I move that the reports be concurred in now.

Honourable senators, at this time I would like to make a brief statement. The other day the honourable senator from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) was kind enough to commend the committee for making fairly frequent reports on its progress in dealing with the large number of cases before it. I was encouraged by that chance remark, and since we shall be adjourning tomorrow for the Easter recess, I take this opportunity to report the progress of the committee to date.

So far this session 307 petitions have been heard and recommended, four have been rejected, six have been withdrawn, and four have been partially heard. The number of petitions pending is 152. This makes a grand total of 473 petitions presented, which is one more than I reported on a previous occasion. Of the 152 petitions still remaining on the docket for this session, I think it is a fair estimate that probably 100 of them will be proceeded with after the Easter recess.

It is for the purpose of assisting the Committees Branch in its work that I am asking that these reports be concurred in tonight.

The motion was agreed to, and the reports were concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when this house rises this evening it stand adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 2.30.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill 189, an Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall try to be as brief as I can in explaining this bill, which has already been passed by the House of Commons. The bill contains some thirteen sections.

The present Public Service Superannuation Act, Chapter 47 of the 1952-53 Statutes, which replaced the Civil Service Superannuation Act, was passed at the session of 1953 and was proclaimed on January 1, 1954, so it has been in existence about a year and three months.

In April and May, 1953, the Public Service Superannuation Bill was debated at great length in the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce not once, but twice. It was amended in order to give the Senate and the House of Commons certain control over the retirement of some of the employees of both houses. That debate was interesting and illuminating.

Honourable senators, while much of the information about the act is already known to many of you, it still may be helpful to give some general information on the conditions underlying the existing legislation. In the first place, under the Public Service Superannuation Act pensions are provided as a matter of right, whereas under the old Civil Service Superannuation Act pensions were given as a matter of grace.

Under the Public Service Superannuation Act, which is the legislation this bill seeks to amend, some 67,000 temporary employees of the Government of Canada became eligible to contribute and so to qualify for pensions. At the present time a total of about 130,000 civil servants, both temporary and permanent, can take advantage of the legislation. Before this act was passed only some 63,000 could take advantage of the act and become available for pensions. I am informed, and perhaps honourable senators may be interested to know, that 93 per cent of these 130,000 people are paid through the Central Pay Office here in Ottawa.

Under the 1953 legislation, the 67,000 temporaries who wished to qualify under the act and to contribute for their past service had to exercise an option to do so before December 31, 1954. At that date some 35,000 applications had been handled, or a little more than 50 per cent of the total. Obviously the volume of work was very great, and I am informed it is essential that this option period which expired on December 31, 1954, should be extended in order that the applications of the remaining 50 per cent of the temporaries who wished to qualify can be handled.

According to information which I have received, each election involves special attention and the processing of these applications against a background of a rather complicated piece of legislation is sometimes slow work. Therefore, it does seem to me to be reasonable that the time should be extended by one year. It is proposed that if a further extension is deemed necessary it will be handled by regulation.

I might say something about contributions. One aspect covers current service and the other aspect covers past service. For current service the contributions required to be made by male employees is 6 per cent of current salary, and for female employees it is 5 per cent of current salary; and for past service the same rates apply to the appropriate salary.

The Government matches these contributions except where the past service was not in the Public Service of Canada, in which case the contributions for past service must be made entirely by the employees themselves at the same rate. Therefore, in effect, their rates are doubled. At the present time some 34,000 employees of the Government of Canada are not eligible to qualify for benefits under the Public Service Superannuation Act. These include such people as prevailing rate employees, seasonal employees, casual employees, new employees and sessional employees. It is obvious that a great many of these are temporary employees. I am informed that there is a considerable turnover within this group.

In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954, 17,317 people drew pensions amounting to $16,517,000.

One of the purposes of Bill 189 now before us is to qualify certain sessional employees of the House of Commons and of the Senate for benefits under the Act. Some 365 people could be affected, 50 of whom are employed in the Senate, and 315 in the House of Commons. To qualify under the act a sessional employee would probably be required to establish a record of some 60 months service. I understand that the requirements with reference to qualification are prescribed by policy, and that an order in council ultimately determines the entitlement of an employee to participate in the benefits provided by the act.

The purpose of sections 3 and 10 of the bill is to extend the application of the act to certain former employees of the Government of Newfoundland who were transferred to the Public Service of Canada at the time of union. These persons are known as "unestablished" civil servants under Newfoundland law. About 25 persons are affected, and their right to pick up past service would be determined by their entitlement as it existed under the Newfoundland act before union. At that time those civil servants were entitled to pick up 50 per cent of their past service. That is the entitlement that they will have under this act by the amendments proposed.

I should say something about the actuarial position of the superannuation fund, because in 1953 that was discussed at great length. The capital deficit of the fund at that time was $189 million, and I am informed that the present capital deficit stands at the same amount. However, I should add that no interest deficit has accumulated in the meantime, because the government has paid annually into the fund four per cent on account of the interest on the $189 million capital deficit. So that while the capital deficit remains the same, the fund is not running behind in so far as further annual interest deficit accumulations are concerned.

Honourable senators, I am also informed that the Government made a capital payment of $38 million into the fund at the time of the general Civil Service salary increase in December of 1953, and that again was for the purpose of maintaining the corpus of the fund and leaving the deficit at $189 million. I may say that the capital shortage, which was reported at $189 million as of March 31, 1953, remains the same.

If honourable senators are interested in the actuarial position of the fund, I would direct attention to a report containing pertinent information which was tabled in the House of Commons in March, 1952. I may add that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has tonight tabled in the Senate the report to the Minister of Finance on the Public Service Superannuation Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1954. This document, which was tabled in the House of Commons on March 31, contains some useful and illuminating information on the workings of the act up to the present time.

This bill also contains a few consequential changes, mostly of an administrative nature, to which I might refer briefly. Section 5 of the bill would allow the right to amend or revoke an election made under the act with respect to benefits for past service. The purpose of this amendment is to relieve from hardship persons who elected to pay up for past service and then found that the calculation of the amount they were required to pay was inaccurate. I understand that this happens occasionally, and that as the legislation is at present framed there is no relief from it. It seems only reasonable that some relief should be provided in cases of hardship. I am informed, however, that the adminstrative policy in dealing with this particular power will be one of caution, so as not to imperil the position of the fund.

Section 6 of the bill would preserve the rights of a common-law wife who marries a pensioner after his retirement. Under the act as it stands the dependents of a pensioner who marries after retirement are shut off from benefits under the act. Section 7 would preserve the rights of children of a first marriage, and any other persons who were dependent upon the pensioner at the time of his marriage after retirement. In other words, the rights of the dependents of a pensioner who were lawful dependents at the time of retirement are not, under these amendments, to be adversely affected by the marriage of the pensioner after retirement.

The necessity for certain other administrative changes arises out of cases in which employees leave the public service, take their superannuation, and later are re-employed by the Public Service. I am informed that certain inequities emerge in such cases, particularly by reason of accumulated leaves of absence without pay. It seems advisable at this time that in the cases where injustices arise provision should be made to deal with them.

Section 9 provides a period for the making of an election to pick up past service within a certain time after a medical examination has been held. Obviously this is an administrative change too, and I think it would commend itself to the judgment of honourable members.

Finally, section 11 provides for certain arrangements where there has been an interval between services in the armed forces or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the one hand and the Public Service on the other. I understand that the amendments in section 11 will make it easier for a person covered by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act or the Defence Services Pension Act to come under the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Honourable senators, I must confess that I find it rather difficult to explain this type of complicated legislation, and I regret that the explanation was so confusing.

Hon. Mr. Pratt: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question? While his explanation has been clear, the subject is an involved one. Section 10 of the bill, which deals with Newfoundland civil servants, uses the term "unestablished civil servant". Under this legislation have the federal civil servants in Newfoundland the same rights and privileges as those who were members of the federal civil service prior to the date of union?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I think the answer is yes, so far as current service is concerned. So far as past service is concerned, the employees you have in mind are in the same position as any other employees of the Public Service who qualify under the provisions of this act. They would be entitled to pick up fifty per cent of their past service. In other words, their entitlements under Newfoundland laws are to be recognized under the measure now before the house.

Hon. Mr. Hugessen: We are indebted to the honourable gentleman from Ottawa West (Hon. Mr. Connolly) for the explanation that he has given of this bill, though I must confess that, clear as his explanation has been, some of these sections are rather complicated and difficult to understand. The honourable senator said that one of the purposes of this bill is to provide that sessional employees of the Senate may become contributors to the superannuation fund. I believe this is covered by section 1 of the bill.

My only purpose in rising is to suggest that it would be wise to send this bill to committee. I feel we have a duty to our Senate employees to find out just what is involved in this proposed legislation and to ascertain what their position will be if they are brought under the superannuation account. I therefore trust that if the bill is given second reading its sponsor will move that it be referred to a standing committee of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Connolly, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION BILL

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred the Bill (189), intituled: "An Act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act", have in obedience to the order of reference of April 5, 1955, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same without any amendment.

THIRD READING

Hon. Mr. Gouin moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

SHARP & DOHME (CANADA) LTD.—COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN

Hon. A. K. Hugessen, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, presented the report of the committee on Bill G-10.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant as follows:

The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, to whom was referred the Bill G-10, intituled: "An Act respecting Sharp & Dohme (Canada) Ltd.", have in obedience to the order of reference of March 29, 1955, examined the said bill and now beg leave to report the same with the following amendments:

1. Page 1, line 3: after the word "Office" insert the words "on the 27th of August, 1954,"
2. Page 1, line 7: after the word "disclosure" insert the words "to a pending application"
3. Page 1, line 11: after the word "conferring" strike out the word "the" and insert the words "an effective"
4. Page 1, line 23: after clause 1 add the following as clause 2:

"2. If any person has, before the 24th day of March, 1955, commenced in Canada the manufacture and sale of the invention described in the said application serial No. 672,036, such person may, notwithstanding the issue of any patent pursuant to this Act, continue such manufacture and sale in as full and ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these amendments be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hugessen moved, with leave, that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, before the motion passes, may I say that when this bill came before us for second reading some honourable members were concerned about two points: first, whether or not passage of the bill would in any way prejudice third parties or the public generally; and secondly, whether by passing the bill the Senate would create an undesirable precedent.

We had a very good discussion at the committee meeting this morning, under the chairmanship of the honourable senator from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen), when we had with us not only the proponent of the bill but also the Commissioner of Patents. I think it fair to say the members of the committee were satisfied on both points, namely, that an undesirable precedent would not be established by referring the bill back to the Senate with some fairly substantial amendments, and that there would be no prejudice to the public or to third parties if the bill as amended were passed.

As this is a private bill perhaps honourable senators would consent, in view of the impending Easter adjournment, to give the bill third reading this afternoon in order that it might be dealt with in the House of Commons before the Senate reassembles.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendments were concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: With leave of the Senate, I move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 3, at 8 p.m.

The House of Commons is adjourning today until April 18, at which time, I understand, it will resume consideration of the budget. One reason for suggesting that we adjourn until May 3 is that by then that house may have passed the budget and sent over some bills for us to deal with. I think one would be an optimist to expect the Commons to pass the budget in less than two weeks. In any event, even if nothing has come over for our consideration when we resume, there will be certain other work with which we can proceed at that time.

Another reason for suggesting that we adjourn until May 3 is that our Special Committee on the narcotic drug traffic, which will commence holding sittings at Vancouver on April 18, will likely continue sitting there all that week and possibly run into the following week.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I take this opportunity to call attention to the fact that the Standing Committee on Divorce will meet on May 3 at 10.15 a.m. Although the Senate will not reassemble until 8 o'clock that evening, it is hoped that the members of the Divorce Committee will be present in the morning.

The motion was agreed to.

NARCOTIC DRUG TRAFFIC

COMMITTEE SITTINGS IN VANCOUVER— QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Gray Turgeon: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a question of privilege respecting certain articles appearing in the press with reference to the hearings to be held at Vancouver during the Easter recess by the Special Senate Committee on the traffic in narcotic drugs in Canada. While the articles are undoubtedly well meant, they might create a wrong impression in the minds of the public with respect to this phase of the committee's operation. I am sure the public would be interested to know that this undertaking is not being made at great public expense. On the contrary, these hearings at Vancouver will materially reduce the cost of the investigation.

Twelve of the 23 senators comprising the Senate Drug and Narcotic Committee will attend hearings at Vancouver. The hearings will begin on April 18, and it is expected that they will continue until April 25, depending on circumstances.

Members of the committee are contributing both their time and effort during the Easter recess in order to assist in the elimination of the social hazard caused by addiction to narcotic drugs. In reaching its decision to hold the hearings in Vancouver the committee took several factors into consideration. It was felt that inasmuch as most of these twelve senators lived in the West and would be spending the Easter holidays there, this was an opportune time to hold the hearings and thus eliminate the expense of bringing witnesses to Ottawa. Of the members designated, the Honourable Senators King, McKeen, Hodges, Reid and Turgeon will be spending the Easter recess at their homes in British Columbia. The Honourable Senators Gershaw and Stambaugh will attend from Alberta, Horner from Saskatchewan and Howden and Beaubien from Manitoba. The only Eastern members to attend the hearings will be the Honourable Senators Vaillancourt from Quebec and Leger from New Brunswick. Inasmuch as senators enjoy the privilege of free transportation on the railways, it was felt that the cost of this investigation would be insignificant compared with that of bringing to Ottawa the 25 or more witnesses who it is expected will be called during the visit to Vancouver. If they were brought to the capital an expenditure of well over $10,000 would be incurred.

A further value to be derived from this project lies in the fact that inasmuch as approximately 75 per cent of the drug addicts of Canada reside in and about the city of Vancouver, members of the committee will be able to appraise the situation more accurately for the preparation of the committee's report.

Costs of the undertaking have been reduced to a minimum by procuring reporters on the West coast instead of using the members of the Senate reporting staff who would normally cover the proceedings of the committee.

The decision to meet in Vancouver was made by the committee as a whole. It was based largely on the demand by various groups in the West wishing to make representations. A wide variety of views are held on the best way of meeting the drug addiction problem, and the suggested remedies are so wide in scope and so vigorously supported that opposing factions wish to be heard. It will, therefore, be the duty of the committee to decide which witnesses can make the greatest contribution to the study of the drug traffic problem.

For the above reasons it is felt that invaluable evidence may be obtained at a minimum of expense, and certainly in an amount far less than that which would be necessary to bring witnesses to Ottawa.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Joseph A. Bradette moved the second reading of Bill 190, an Act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Honourable members, I beg to move the second reading of this bill, the purpose of which is to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and to extend its application, subject to certain modifications, to the years 1955 and 1956.

On March 30 last year I had the honour to move the second reading of Bill 376, which also was for the purpose of amending the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, and I appreciate the fact that this year the honourable the Government Leader in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) has requested me to move the second reading of the present bill. Before I proceed with my remarks, which may be rather lengthy, may I say that I believe this honour has been extended to me because it was my great good fortune and great honour to represent for many years in the other place one of the greatest gold-mining areas of Canada, namely, the Porcupine section in Ontario, which is adjacent to the Kirkland section and also to Rouyn Noranda, on the Quebec side. To some extent, therefore, I am familiar with what the gold and silver mining industries have done, particularly for the province of Ontario, since the end of the last century, when great silver deposits were found at Cobalt, and later, when the railways were extended into Northern Ontario, including the Porcupine section, and some great gold mining districts were opened up.

I should like to make a few remarks by way of presenting reasons why this legislation is being introduced at this time.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was inaugurated in 1948, effective for a period of three years, to assist Canadian gold mine operators in meeting greatly increased costs of production. Unlike the situation in respect of other primary mine products, no compensating increase in the price of gold has been granted for many years. The present measure was designed primarily to assist the high-cost or marginal mines to continue in operation over a difficult period and to maintain their dependent communities. Because of the high cost of production of gold, in relation to a fixed price, the gold mines made strenuous efforts to increase their efficiency and to keep their costs at a minimum.

In this they have been very successful, but in spite of these efforts the upward trend of costs has continued. This trend has been aggravated by the appreciation in the value of the Canadian dollar, the effect of which, so far as gold mines are concerned, is that they receive less for their product. The recent change in the exchange rate will be welcomed by the industry, I am sure.

The original act would have expired at the end of 1950, but it was renewed and continued to the end of 1954. In the formula as originally designed there were two parts. The first was the rate of assistance. The second factor was the part of production to which the rate of assistance applied. These two factors have, from time to time, been modified to meet current conditions. It is an advantage to the gold mines, in order to allow adequate planning, that the extension should be for a longer term than one year. As the economic conditions which necessitated the passing of the act continue to exist, it is now proposed to extend the act for 1955 and 1956, on a somewhat reduced basis.

As indicated, the proposal to extend the act is based on a new formula which still maintains the two main factors on a revised basis. Under the new formula the rate of assistance is two-thirds of the amount by which the average cost of producing an ounce of gold from the mine during the year exceeds $26.50 per ounce. But the rate paid per ounce will in no event exceed $12.33.

In the old formula the number of production ounces to which assistance applied was dependent on a base year which had been defined by the act. The new proposal does away with the base year. The rate of assistance will now apply to two-thirds of the total production of the current calendar year. This in effect simplifies the assistance calculations and maintains an equitable distribution of the payments to the mines receiving assistance.

It will be noted that the rate of assistance will not exceed $12.33 per ounce. This means in the application of the formula that the maximum allowable cost for the production of an ounce of gold under which payments will be made must not exceed $45. This is the same maximum allowable cost which was in effect in 1953 and 1954. In the new formula, raising the factor in the rate of assistance from $18 to $26.50 makes some of the lower cost mines ineligible for assistance, and distributes a proportionately greater part of the payments to the higher cost mines.

There has been some change in the policy here. Personally I would like to see what was done in previous years maintained. However, I believe this is a step in the right direction, and at least it should be given a fair trial.

It is hoped that by this distribution of payments the higher-cost mines will be able to continue and employment will be maintained. Payments under the act vary according to the cost of producing an ounce of gold in each mine. The new formula has been designed to aid the communities which are dependent on gold mines for their existence.

I am not going to elaborate on the question of subsidies. I have always been open-minded on that great problem. During the last war, for instance, I was in favour of subsidies that were placed on some foods and commodities. I was absolutely in favour of their abrogation immediately after, or not long after, the war ended. The same principle would also apply to the gold mining industry. If the day should come when gold receives the same consideration, as far as price is concerned, as any other mining or industrial product, I would be the first to ask for abolition of such a subsidy.

Honourable senators, I would like to speak for a brief moment on the present price of gold, which is the crux of the existing situation, and the problem that the gold mining industry is working on at the present time. When the question of subsidies to assist the gold mining industry first came up I was then a member of the other house, and I told the members of that branch of Parliament that, based upon the experience of the district which I had the honour to represent, assistance had to be given to the industry. It seems to me parodoxical, if not ironical, that gold, which is synonymous with wealth or opulence, should require assistance in its production. Gold is different from any other metal produced in this country. It is the only metal universally accepted for monetary purposes, and by reason of that fact it plays a large part in the national economy of many countries.

How has the price of gold fluctuated over the past 24 years? In the year 1931 the Government of Canada asked gold producers to send all their gold to the Mint, and by the Gold Export Act of 1932 gold mining companies were compelled to comply with that request. That was done at a time when Britain went off the gold standard, and when the price of gold was just over $20 an ounce. Bear in mind, honourable senators, that this was in the year 1932. During the period from 1930 to 1933 the average price of gold increased each year, until in 1933 it reached $28.60 an ounce. That was the maximum price the Canadian producers could obtain, regardless of the effect of the supply of and demand for gold on the world market. While all other metals and commodities have increased in price tremendously since 1941, the price of gold has remained rigidly pegged. On January 31, 1934, President Roosevelt announced that the price of gold would be pegged at $35 an ounce, and the price has remained the same since then.

Honourable senators, I took it upon myself personally to make two journeys to the United States—not in an official capacity, but because my section of the country was so vitally interested in gold mining production and the situation was becoming more and more precarious—and I discovered that it had been definitely decided, so far as the authorities were concerned, with the Government of the United States, that there would be no increase in the price of gold for the time being, at least, and probably for some time to come. The stock argument used at the time was that if the price of gold were increased it would be inflationary. The only answer I could give was that if this were true of the price of gold it must also be true of the prices of all other products, including all metals, as well as other necessities of life. Another argument advanced was that a certain country had been holding a tremendous amount of gold which had been taken away from satellite countries—from Spain, for example, and other nations—and that the said country was producing a large amount of gold by slave labour. Some of the high officials felt that if the price of gold were suddenly increased, the American market would to some extent be flooded by gold from one country in particular. Whether that prediction was well founded or ill founded, no one can say. It was argued at that time that if the gold were ear marked the United States treasury would know precisely the country from which it had come. It was said, and I believe it was right, that it would be impossible to find out exactly the country from which the gold came.

During the debate on this bill in another place there was some criticism, and I believe it was unfair criticism, concerning the situation as to the disease of silicosis in the gold mining industry. Every honourable senator realizes that hard-rock miners are exposed to silicosis, which is occasioned by silicose dust, and that it is a disease about which the provincial Governments and the federal Government have been fully seized ever since it became known to the medical profession. For instance, today and for many years past, no employee is hired as a hard-rock miner until he has passed a thorough physical examination in order to assure his employer that he is unlikely to contract silicosis readily.

I am reminded that the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) while he was Minister of Mines in the federal cabinet, visited my section of the country on several occasions and left a profound impression on the people of that area. Other honourable members in this house have also visited Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec on several occasions have viewed the extent of the great development which has taken place in that part of our country and have become familiar with the problem of silicosis amongst hard-rock miners.

Perhaps it would be in order for me to take a few minutes to inform the house generally about what has been done to reduce the incidence of this dreadful disease. I believe something should be placed on the record to show what has been accomplished in this field. With your permission, honourable senators, I will read to you a review of the experience with silicosis in Ontario as it appears in the records of the Workmen's Compensation Board:

A review of the Ontario mining experience from the Compensation Board records:

(1) The number of cases of silicosis developing each year has been decreasing at a rapid rate.

(2) The average age at which silicosis develops has increased from 41·5 years (1926-1930) to 56·5 years (1951-53), or by 36 per cent.

(3) The average number of years of dust exposure required to develop silicosis amongst the few who contract the condition has increased from 15·4 years (1926-30) to 24·8 years (1951-53), or by 60 per cent.

(4) Only forty-five cases, or less than 4 per cent of the 1146 known cases of silicosis in the industry, have occurred amongst those men who commenced mining after 1928.

(5) The average age at death has increased from 44 years (1926-30) to 62·2 years (1951-53), or by 41 per cent.

(6) Life expectancy after silicosis develops has increased from two years (1926-30) to 11·6 years (1951-53), or by six times.

(7) The proportion of cases who died of silicosis, or silicosis plus tuberculosis, has decreased from 91·8 per cent (1926-30) to 55·1 per cent (1951-53).

(8) The average number of silicotic cases from 1926 to 1953 was 40·9 per year, whereas the average from 1950 to 1953, inclusive, was 14 per year. There were only 7 new cases in 1953.

Honourable senators, I have also a short table, consisting of some thirteen lines, which gives some silicosis statistics over a five-year period, which, with the consent of the house, I would now place on the record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Bradette: Thank you. The table is as follows:

Deaths of persons with silicosis by five-years periods, 1926 to 1953, in which they occurred, showing average age, elapsed time from silicosis to death, and proportion of total deaths due to silicosis or silicosis plus tuberculosis.

Five year period	Total number of deaths	Average age at death (Years)	Average elapsed time from silicosis to death (Years	Percentage of deaths from silicosis and silicosis with tuberculosis
1926-1930 ..	49	44·0	2·0	91·8
1931-1935 ..	90	47·9	5·4	81·1
1936-1940 ..	105	50·7	7·2	69·5
1941-1945 ..	119	54·4	8·6	75·6
1946-1950 ..	162	58·9	9·8	58·0
1951-1953 ..	98	62·2	11·6	55·1
Totals ..	623	54·4	8·2	68·9

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics report shows the death rate among all males in Canada at 56·4 years. This figure is not quite fair as a basis for comparison because it includes males under the age of eighteen years; figures were not available for the mine-age group. However, it does indicate the great improvement in the control of silicosis.

With your permission, honourable senators, I shall now give some detailed information of the important changes and improvements which have taken place in Ontario from 1926 onward.

1926—Silicosis was made an industrial disease for compensation purposes. (At industry's request). When the act was passed, in 1926, making silicosis a compensatable industrial disease, provision was made to include deaths from tuberculosis in the presence of silicosis. (Presumably because one suffering from silicosis would be more prone to develop tuberculosis after contacting the tubercular virus.)

1928—Legislative provision was made for compulsory pre-employment X-ray examination and certification for dust exposure occupations. (At industry's request).

1925 and continuing—(a) Dust prevention; (b) Dust collection; (c) Design of machines to avoid making dust. Improvements in mine ventilation have been such that in many mines a greater tonnage of air is now pumped underground than the tonnage of ore hoisted.

1944—General application of aluminum powder prophylactically in Ontario's gold mines.

I recall that many honourable senators present tonight visited the McIntyre mine only a few years ago and saw some of the work that was being done to prevent silicosis.

I should like to say a few words about what is known as "ore blocking", and about which there has been, I think, some unfair criticism. We have all read press dispatches from British Columbia and the prairie provinces containing rumours to the effect that large and effective oil and gas producing wells had been blocked and that the people would not get the benefit of their production. The same kind of rumours exist with respect to "ore blocking" in gold mines.

A gold mine must of necessity know for years ahead how much ore is available for treatment and where it is located, so that the management will be able to decide just what ores are to be used in a certain period. This applies to all mines. Those senators who went on the trip to Noranda saw the plans and profiles of the various ore bodies that had been blocked out by the Noranda Company, through which the management was able to determine far in advance what ore bodies they would work on during the next ten years.

Similarly, those engaged in the mining of gold must know the extent of the various ore bodies in the entrails of the earth, and they must have this information to work on many years in advance.

It has been suggested that gold mining companies have been making changes in the milling grade of their ore to suit changed conditions. We must remember, however, that the product of a mine is a wasting asset. There is no way possible to replace what has been taken from the earth. Certainly it will never come back; it has gone for ever. I am in a position to say this, knowing the situation first-hand, that if tomorrow the price of gold were to be increased by $20 or $25 an ounce, the effect might be to prolong the life of many mines for perhaps fifty or a hundred years—yes, almost indefinitely. This is understandable, because a good many mines at the present time must of necessity work on their high grade ore only. They certainly cannot touch their low grade ore, because the recovery would mean a loss to them. That alone, I am sure, will make honourable senators realize what effect the price of gold has on the life of a mine. I might say that when you speak in terms of gold mining you always have to visualize a tremendous amount of investment before there is any initial production.

Without in any way trying to pose as a geologist or as a prophet, I may say that the life of the mines in the Porcupine section will be secure for many many more years. From personal inquiry I found out that over a ten-year period, from 1942 to 1952, there was only a small variation in the amount of gold produced per ton of ore. The figures are as follows:

Ounces of fine gold produced per ton of ore.

Year	Amount in ounces per ton
1942	·240
1943	·240
1944	·230
1945	·230
1946	·230
1947	·240
1948	·230
1949	·230
1950	·230
1951	·220
1952	·240

In this ten-year period the maximum variation has been only two one-hundredths of an ounce of gold per ton of ore. It might be easily said that there has been no ore selection, because again I repeat it is up to the management to see that they have enough ore blocked out ahead so that there will be no stopping of the activities in the mine.

I believe these figures show conclusively that the ore mined has not been affected by the amount of the payment under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the ore mined under other conditions. As I said before, the product of a gold mine is a wasting asset.

I was also surprised to notice that in the other place an honourable member in making reference to the mining industry in general expressed the opinion that every man working in a mine should be taken from underground and the mine shafts sealed, stating that a mine was no place to earn a living in, and hoping these men could some day be employed in factories and plants where they could enjoy sunshine and fresh air and work at producing something useful to mankind. In answer to that I would say that I do not think there is any industry in Canada that is more fundamental to our prosperity and progress than is the mining industry. I am sincerely convinced that those engaged in that industry are of the very best class of people, and they are at that work from choice, not because they are forced to be in that industry. I would venture the opinion that total automation will never be realized in the gold mining industry, or in the mining industry in general. In fact, I would venture to say that it will even be a long time before total automation will be reached in our manufacturing plants.

If you will allow me, honourable senators, I will make a few comments concerning an interim report of a committee set up a year ago by the Ontario Government to study the economics of the gold mining industry, and I will give a summary of the conclusions arrived at by that body. The report, which is signed by Professor F. A. Knox of Queen's University, Professor E. E. Reilly of the University of Western Ontario and Professor H. R. Rice of the University of Toronto, was released last week. No doubt most senators have received a copy by the present time.

Premier Frost at last year's session of the Legislature of Ontario announced the appointment of a committee to examine and report on conditions affecting the position and prospects of the industry, causes underlying trends in employment, wages, working conditions, profits, dividends and so on, and the effect of these developments on communities in the northern part of the province. The report said known ore bodies will eventually be exhausted, but that prospect is not imminent.

I will read from the report:

> In a few years the growth of the north itself may save these communities even if the gold industry declines. The last ten years have brought a spectacular expansion in population and wealth throughout northern Ontario. This growth will be continued with the uranium and base metal developments, perhaps even close to the towns.

Looking to the future, the committee said agricultural land in a clay belt would support a large population, providing nearby markets which would lead to manufacturing. The arrival of natural gas would give many advantages to the communities and improve their prospects of diversifying industry. Industry was needed to provide alternative opportunities for the miners.

I quote again from the report:

> There are always possibilities of better times for the gold industry itself. Great improvements in cost of production may yet occur; new ore bodies may be discovered; the price of gold may even be raised.
> Any one of these would help to ease some of the strain of the present problem in the gold mining communities.

In the concluding observations of the 52-page report, the committee said gold mining is a striking example of industries caught in a tightening "cost-price squeeze" against which it struggles by resisting increases in wages and striving to improve their efficiency. A "great investment" in more productive tools and machinery and an improvement in mining methods have greatly retarded the rise in the cost of mining. However, costs have risen considerably and most mines have made lower profits. Some mines have only six or seven years of life left. Some mines have closed, and others might have done so had not the federal government extended emergency aid to gold mines since 1948.

The report states that at the present time it is not clear when or how the present cost price situation in the gold mines in Ontario will change, but there is no ground for writing the industry off.

Although the United States has shown no inclination to raise the price it pays for gold, it is buying gold as it is offered. Production is still at high levels in the province, many workers are employed, and important communities are depending on their earnings.

I quote again:

> In a country growing so rapidly as Canada is, and in a region with the prospects which seem ahead for Northern Ontario, it would be a hardy pessimist indeed who would firmly deny the gold towns a future.

The committee state further:

> Before too long the steady increase in productivity now going on in the mines might make it possible for all but those which are near their end to pay higher wages without aid.
> In the meantime, the Federal Government aid now being given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act should be continued. The mining communities now receive payments from the provincial Government, not only through the regular grants for education, health and welfare, but also by special grants.
> Since standards in the public services of the province constantly improve and the cost price situation in the mines is likely to change, both the federal and provincial governments should keep under review the levels of aid required to assure health and education of youth and the maximum mobility of labour.

Since this report appeared some negotiations have been going on between management and labour in the gold mining sections of the community, and particularly in the Porcupine. I take this opportunity to make an appeal that management and labour shall find it possible, by means of the conciliation board or through a round table conference and all the present machinery at their disposal, to come to an agreement without having recourse to a strike. As I mentioned in the first speech I made in this honourable assembly, there was a strike two years ago, and I know that it hurt everybody in the section—indeed, everybody in Canada. I believe that the idea of a strike is not in the minds of any of the negotiators at the present time, and I have implicit confidence in the good judgment and good Canadianism of the labour unions and also of the gold miners and the management.

No doubt some honourable senators are wondering what has been the cost of the present subsidy. The details are contained in a tabulation which, with the consent of the house, I will put on the record:

Summary of gold assistance received by all gold mines in Canada:

Year	No. of mines	Total ounces produced	Total assistance paid	Average assistance per oz.
1948	117	3,164,370	$10,546,315	$3.33

1953	70	3,048,904	14,621,176	4.80
1954	Estimated	3,000,000	14,000,000	4.67
Total	7 Years	22,488,843	$82,355,874	$3.66

For seven years 1948 to 1954 inclusive the total production of gold was 22,488,843 ounces. The assistance paid was in the sum of $82,355,874, representing an average assistance per ounce produced of $3.66. The cost to the country in those seven years was substantial. I think it is proper to suggest, however, that the net cost is something else, because if all those mines paid income tax, not only on the assistance but on other profits, estimated at from 60 to 75 per cent of the gold assistance, the net cost for the seven-year period would be reduced from $20 to $33 million, which is not a very large sum of money when one considers the results obtained.

I shall not refer at length, because honourable senators know the facts as well as I do, to the value and the meaning of our gold mining industry in the Canadian economy. We all realize that at least 20 to 25 thousand persons are directly employed, and each, in turn, keeps four more people engaged in serving the requirements of these mine activities.

Of course this industry is of particular interest to the 130,000 Canadians living in cities, towns and mining centres—some thirty in number—in Ontario, the Maritimes, Quebec, Manitoba, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Moreover, honourable senators, we should not forget that the livelihood of many farmers, settlers and lumber operators established on lands in the vicinity of mining centres in the parts of the country that I have just mentioned depends almost exclusively on the gold mining industry. These people are greatly concerned, because the survival of the industry is of vital importance to them. All of us recall the horrible forest conflagrations which, in 1911, devastated the Porcupine, Matheson and Cochrane sections, and resulted in the loss of many lives. Since then, new mines have been developed, like that at Golden City—which is non-existent at the present time—in South Porcupine, and Timmins. We asked at that time what was going to happen to the clay belt settlement of Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec, one of the finest pieces of agricultural land which can be found anywhere on this continent. We all took heart and hope when the McIntyre, Hollinger, Dome and several of the other producers decided to resume operations. It was quite a struggle at the time to find sufficient capital to get started, but in very large measure the great developments which have occurred in the northern Quebec clay belt and in Ontario have resulted from the enterprises which have been carried on in that great mining section of Canada. It is difficult to estimate what it means to the Porcupine, the Kirkland Lake and the northern Quebec districts. For example, in the fine centres of population of Timmins, South Porcupine and Schumacher, all located in the Porcupine mining area, the future of many thousands of people is closely linked with gold, and there an agglomeration of 50,000 people has developed on account of that industry, and the investing public have placed many millions of dollars to bring huge enterprises like the Hollinger, the McIntyre, the Dome and many others to their present state of production.

I speak very feelingly on this problem. What I have said applies to Kirkland Lake and Rouyn-Noranda on the Quebec side, and also to the other centres I have mentioned, and even more forcibly to northern Canada generally, because we must remember that most of this area is not suitable for farming or other settlement or for agricultural purposes generally, and the greatest factor in the development of most of the great Cambrian shield—that great treasure house—is the search for mineral wealth, which means a lot at the present time to Canada, and will mean much more as the nation continues to grow.

Before I came into the chamber this evening, one of the honourable senators on the opposition side remarked to me that he had never made much money from his ventures in gold mines. The same observation holds good of most classes of mining, and it is true as far as I personally am concerned. Very, very few men, even those who were "in on the ground floor", have made very much money out of mining of any kind, but let it never be forgotten that it was the investing public who made possible the developments to which I have referred, and which have meant so much to great centres of population like Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal. The investing public will always be needed.

Honourable senators, I am very thankful to you for having listened to what has perhaps been a too lengthy presentation of a subject in which I am deeply interested, and with which I have been associated most of my life in my northern section of Canada. I leave it to the decision of the members of this house as to whether or not they desire this bill to be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I am positive that all senators realize the necessity and urgency of voting for the continuation of this measure, and I hope that it will be passed unanimously by the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Could the sponsor of the bill inform us how many gold mines were in production in Canada in 1954?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: I do not have the statistics with me, but this information can be found in detail in the Hansard of the other house.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Can the honourable senator tell us how many mines carry on operations at less than $26.50 an ounce?

Hon. Mr. Bradette: I do not have that information at hand either. Perhaps it would be well to refer the bill to committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I have quite a few questions to ask, and I am wondering if this bill is going to be referred to committee.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, before the bill is given second reading there are one or two things I should like to say. First of all I want to thank the honourable senator from Cochrane (Hon. Mr. Bradette) for the information he has just given and to congratulate him upon the knowledge he has displayed of the mining industry, particularly the gold mining industry.

I feel that the Government has shown wisdom in continuing the policy of emergency gold mining assistance. At the moment I am not prepared to express an opinion as to whether the curtailment that is involved in the method proposed in this bill is too drastic for the well-being of the gold mining industry. I do not have enough information to pass such an opinion now, but it appears to me that this legislation works in the following way. The value of this act becomes very considerably lessened as the costs of gold mining increase beyond the $26.50 level and approach more closely the more or less fixed price at which the product can be sold. Therefore, it seems to me that two results will inevitably flow from implementing by legislation the formula contained in this bill. One is that the marginal properties, the high cost operations, whose costs press up pretty closely to the price that can be realized for the product, will go out of business. Nobody would carry on a gold mining operation solely for the purpose of earning his costs of operation, for he would be dealing with a wasting asset and he might as well leave the gold in the ground for a better day and a stronger sun.

The second result will occur with respect to these properties whose costs are such as to qualify for some assistance, but yet which do not come too close to the price that can be realized. In order to get any real benefit out of the operation of this formula it will be necessary for them to try to reduce still further their cost of operation by a process of selection or a mixing of their millheads so as to mill a higher grade of ore. As you know, a mine tries to strike an average in its milling during the year by drawing low grade ore from certain areas in the mine and mixing it with high grade ore that is drawn from other areas in the mine. In that way a standard of production and earnings is achieved during the year and the life of the mine is prolonged. Now, in order that more mines may be able to continue to operate and to get any benefit from the formula in this bill, it will be necessary for them to reduce their cost of operation by increasing the value of their millheads. This means they will have to put more high grade ore in the millheads in the year, and that will cause a definite shortening in the life of the mine.

Many things are dependent upon the maintenance of a standard or average life of a mine. For instance, other industries and businesses in the community are dependent upon the earnings which come out of the mines. If the effect of this bill will be to shorten materially the useful life of these mines, then it will bring that much closer the serious question of what is going to happen to the dependent communities and their people.

At the same time, we should not consider gold mining solely on the basis of the amount of money involved, which runs into some millions of dollars, translated in terms of an average subsidy of $3.66 per ounce during the years in which this act has been in force. Do not let us become too terrified of that. I can recall that during the war years we were thankful to have a gold mining industry which produced a substantial amount of gold. It helped Canada materially in maintaining balances in its foreign trade, an exceedingly important thing to this country at that time.

It has been said that gold mining is of more value to a country when conditions are bad than when conditions are good. That may be so, but do not let us get wrapped up with the idea that we can abandon or water down our gold mining industry until it becomes a mere shadow, for in the long run Canada would have to pay a price for just that kind of situation.

Until such time as other countries are prepared to get on the basis of a commodity dollar, when gold would have no value in international trade or exchange relations, it is very definitely of real value to Canada to have a gold mining industry operating even if it has to be subsidized. While I am not a lover of subsidies I am prepared to translate subsidies into a picture of national benefit. Do not let us start picking on the gold mining industry as the one whose so-called subsidies should be shut off or cut down to a basis where they have no significant value. If we are going to debate the question of subsidies or no subsidies we should put all businesses and industries, even natural resources, on the line and analyse them all in the same way.

Honourable senators, I commend the Government in principle for continuing this legislation, but I say this with some hesitation, for I am not sure whether the proposed formula goes far enough to give real benefit to enough gold producers at this time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I do not think it does, but would the honourable senator give the house his opinion as to whether it would be better to increase the price of gold from $35 an ounce instead of making a subsidy such as this?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I thank my friend very much for flattering me by suggesting that my view on what the Government policy should be might have any particular value. The price of gold is regulated by many circumstances. Under the present Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, mining companies which do not wish to enjoy the benefit of the payments under the act do not have to sell their gold to the Government, but are at liberty to sell it wherever they can in the world market. As to whether that is a good or bad thing may be judged from the fact that very few gold mining companies have availed themselves of the opportunity. Whether or not an increase in the price of gold would be the answer to the problem is a matter on which I have no opinion at the moment. However, I will say this, that if the price of gold were higher, this so-called subsidy, or assistance, would become unnecessary for the time being, and more gold mining companies would come into production and remain in production. I say "for the time being", because of course the old story remains true in this industry as in any other: as soon as profits start to grow, costs of operation go up, the labourer wants more for his hire, and so on. I am not critical of that, but you have to face that situation. The Government, I assume, decided to approach the matter on the basis of reimbursing the companies with a percentage of the costs so as to get away from any suggestion that this was an overly profitable kind of business, which it might be regarded as being if the price of gold itself were raised.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. Hardy: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with may I make a gentle appeal to the Senate members of the Joint Committee on the Restaurant to use their influence to have the heat in the restaurant moderated. It is anything but pleasant to dine there at the present time, and I would ask the members of that committee, including His Honour the Speaker, who is joint chairman, to endeavour to have conditions made more comfortable.

Perhaps a similar request could be made with respect to the temperature in this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: For one thing, the doors of this chamber can be opened now.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 179, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators, you will notice that the first two items on the Order Paper have to do with the Northwestern part of Canada. The first is for the second reading of Bill 179, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act; and the next is for the second reading of Bill 180, an Act to amend the Yukon Act. I intend to deal with both of these bills today, as they apply to one section of the country. This is indeed a section which is rapidly growing, and its potentialities must fire the imagination not only of the youth of Canada but of all our people. Those who possess the spirit of adventure can find there openings offering the widest possible scope. That part of the country is developing so rapidly that it has been found necessary to amend the legislation affecting the local government.

The bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act is a simple one. Section 1 increases the sessional indemnity of elected members of the Northwest Territories Council. The Northwest Territories Act of 1951 provided a daily indemnity of $50 for each day of attendance at a session of the Council, but the total amount payable to a member in any one year was $1,000. It was provided in that act that it would come into effect on a day fixed by proclamation, and it was proclaimed to come into effect on April 1, 1955. The reason for not bringing it into effect in 1951 was that the former act contained penalties for certain criminal offences which were not included in the 1951 act. It was anticipated that those offences would be provided for in the revised Criminal Code, which honourable senators will recall came into effect on April 1, 1955. As the Northwest Territories Act of 1951 did not contain these provisions with regard to criminal offences, it follows that if that act had been proclaimed to come into force in that year there would have been a period of four years without legislation covering crime in respect to the sections referred to in the act.

However, provision was made by other legislation to increase the sessional indemnity of elected members of the council to $50 a day, with a maximum annual payment of $1,000. Honourable senators will appreciate that the work of members of the council has increased, with the growth of the Northwest Territories. The bill proposes, therefore, to increase the indemnity to $100 a day, with an annual maximum of $2,000. If a session continues beyond 20 days no additional payment will be made. Perhaps I should say that it is seldom that the sessions run beyond that time. These indemnities are paid out of revenues received from permits and licences of different kinds, and from grants under a tax rental agreement between the Northwest Territories and the dominion Government.

The act provides that the Commissioner in Council may make payments from territorial revenues. Section 2 of the Bill deletes the words "territorial revenues" and substitutes therefor the word "money", so under the bill it is clear that moneys received under the tax rental agreement will be available for distribution by the Commissioner in Council.

Section 3 of the bill states that the act shall be deemed to have come into force on April 1, 1955.

To summarize, honourable senators, the bill provides, first, for an increase in indemnity of the elected members; secondly, for clarification of the words "territorial revenues", and thirdly, for the coming into effect of the act as of the 1st day of April, 1955.

The Northwest Territories are governed by a commissioner and a council consisting of four elected members and five members appointed by the Governor in Council. I may say that the four elected members come from the District of Mackenzie, where most of the people of the area live, although there are two other districts, Keewatin and Franklin.

The Commissioner is R. G. Robertson, Deputy Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. He receives no remuneration for his work on the council. The five appointed members of the council are the following:

F. J. G. Cunningham, of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who is the Deputy Commissioner. L. C. Audette, a member of the Canadian Maritime Commission. Mr. Audette was appointed because much of this territory extends along the Arctic Ocean; and it was felt that the Maritime Commission should have a representative on the council. C. M. Drury, Deputy Minister of National Defence, was appointed because of the great developments in national defence in the Northwest Territories. And in view of the fact that there are within this area a large number of Indians and Eskimos, it was felt advisable to appoint to the council a representative of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. He is Jean Boucher. Then it is obviously advisable that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police be represented on the council; hence the fifth appointed member is the R.C.M.P. Commissioner, L. H. Nicholson.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Are these members paid?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, none of the appointed members are paid.

Hon. Mr. Quinn: They all receive salaries from the departments with which they are connected.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: They received no pay in addition to their salaries as departmental officials.

Hon. Mr. Haig: That is what I meant.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: There are four elected members: Frank Carmichael, from Aklavik, is the representative for MacKenzie Delta; R. Porritt, of Hay River, for Mackenzie South; John Parker, of Yellowknife, for Mackenzie North, and J. W. Goodall, of Fort Simpson, for MacKenzie River. At the elections held last year the members for MacKenzie North, MacKenzie South and MacKenzie Delta had to contest their elections, but the member for Mackenzie River was returned by acclamation. Perhaps honourable senators will be interested to know the number of votes cast: in MacKenzie North, 1,222; MacKenzie South, 753; and MacKenzie Delta, 678.

Hon. Mr. Turgeon: Do the same regulations as to residence and other qualifications which apply to voters in other parts of Canada apply in the territories?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I think there may be some little difference. Canadian citizens who have attained the age of twenty-one years and have been ordinarily resident in the Territories for at least twelve months immediately prior to the date of elections are entitled to vote. The following however are not entitled to vote: Returning officers, judges and stipendiary magistrates, inmates of penal institutions, insane persons, and persons guilty of election offences.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Where does the council meet?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The council sometimes meets at Ottawa, but it can meet at Yellowknife or at Fort Smith. Honourable senators will recall that the act was amended in 1951 to provide for payments of travelling expenses of members who attend the meetings. I will probably discuss that a little more fully when I explain the Yukon Bill.

Hon. Mr. Bradette. What is the total number of voters on the voters lists of the different districts?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: In the MacKenzie North district, there are 2,052 voters on the list; MacKenzie South, 1,297; MacKenzie Delta, 1,019; and MacKenzie River, 904.

There was great interest taken in the election in the MacKenzie North constituency. Four candidates contested the riding, and 1,222 votes were cast, of which the successful candidate received 403. In each of the other two ridings there was a contest between two candidates.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Do they run as party candidates?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have no information on that point. I know they run as party candidates in federal elections, but I am not sure whether they do so in the elections we are discussing. I can, however, give the house this information, that when the council votes it does not divide on party lines. I was told that on one occasion when an important piece of legislation was before the council about half of the elected representatives voted one way and half of the appointed representatives voted the other way.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there any municipal organization?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I am not sure on that point but I am inclined to think that there is not.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is there any provision in the act for it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No, there is not.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: What relationship exists between that organization and the Hudson's Bay Company?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No relationship. It is possible that the Hudson's Bay Company get licences from the council. I cannot speak definitely as to that, but so far as the Northwest Territories Council is concerned the Hudson's Bay Company has no relationship with it.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Does the company take any part in the elections?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I presume the factors would be entitled to vote, and no doubt they would exercise their franchise.

I believe I have explained the main features of the bill. Considering the important part this section of the country is playing in our national development at the present time, and the large areas from which these representatives come and for which they are responsible, I think honourable senators will agree that the proposed increase in indemnity should be granted to them. Accordingly I move second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Hardy: Do the Indians and Eskimos have votes in the territories?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Some of them do, but not all of them, I am informed. Of course, many of them live in such outlying districts that it would be impossible for them to get to a poll to cast their vote.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, when this bill was before the Senate in 1951 I called attention at that time to this utterly undemocratic form of government, whereby five civil servants hold the majority over four elected representatives of the people.

True there was a time when the government of the territories was entirely appointive; so it was a step forward when provision was made for elected representatives. But this is an important and a growing part of Canada, as the honourable senator has just said, and at some time in the future it may be a very much more important part than it is today. Therefore, I would like to see some indication, some intimation, of a better form of government than now exists, whereby a little more democracy by way of self-government will be granted to these people. As I remember the act there is no provision for municipal organizations at all. If we gave the different communities an opportunity to form themselves into towns or villages or townships, or something of that kind, they could then govern many of their important local affairs themselves. But so far as I am aware there is no such provision, nor has the prospect of anything along that line been indicated by the sponsor of this bill. It is all very well to say that people are separated so widely one from the other and the districts are so sparsely populated that local government is difficult, but that is not a good answer. Difficulties are made to be surmounted; and democracy has always met with difficulties. I would like to see these civil servants gradually withdrawn from the council and replaced with elected representatives of the people living in the territory.

The proposed increase in sessional indemnity does not seem unreasonable. In these northern lands men are usually self-supporting; they have their living to make and their families to keep, and it is not to be expected that, without adequate pay, they will devote a great length of time to public service. But I question the limitation of $2,000. It may be that the subjects to be considered will require a little longer time than is allowed under the payments schedule; if so, the representatives should stay and finish the business. Were any limitation of that kind placed upon our provincial governments the consequences would be disastrous. Most of the legislatures sit for a longer period than is allowed for this council. I see no reason for an arbitrary limitation, under penalty of working for nothing after the expiry of the time they may sit. The increase I approve; the limitation I do not like; the form of government I deplore. At the same time we must pass this bill now, but I think it ought to go to a committee before it is given final sanction.

Hon. T. A. Crerar: Honourable senators, I think this is a bill we can support without reservations. As the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) explained in his introductory remarks, the area is a huge one. I have been over most of it, from Yellowknife to Aklavik and from Great Bear Lake to Fort Smith; and I know the intervening territories. One needs an experience of that kind to realize the vast extent of the area for which we are legislating in this bill.

I agree wholly with the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) in his desire that democratic ideals shall prevail. If I rightly understood his remarks, apparently he doubts that the bill goes quite far enough in the way of self-government, because, of the council of nine members, which is really a legislature, five are appointed and only four elected. In fact, the five are federal Government officials of one kind or another.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Civil servants.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: But notwithstanding my adherence—I trust, in full measure—to democratic ideals, I think that in these early years it is as well to proceed rather slowly. When, many years ago, the original Northwest Territories Council was set up, it was not endowed with full powers of self-government. As the members gain experience, and with experience wisdom, they are enabled to deal better with the problems of self-government which affect their various communities. If my memory serves me right, the present Northwest Territories Act gives the council pretty broad powers in legislating for the area it supervises. It is true that the federal Government reserves to itself the right to veto legislation or acts of the council; but it does so in much the same way as it reserves the right to veto provincial acts which it considers to be ultra vires or not in the national interest. As the trapper from Aklavik and other elected members sit in session with the appointed members and they become better informed on the problems with which they have to deal, they will realize the importance of sound measures of taxation and, I am sure, their duty to watch expenditures carefully.

The council will have substantial revenues. As the law stands, it can expend only revenues collected within its own territory, but, as the Leader of the Government has pointed out, it operates in conformity with an agreement modelled on the interprovincial agreements relating to monetary assistance. The bill would confer on the council authority to deal with revenues it secures in that way, as well as the money it obtains through its own modes of taxation or that it may get, for instance, from profits on liquor, from trapping and fishing licences, and the like. So I have no apprehension that we shall retard the processes of democratic self-government if we proceed, as provided under the bill, with cautious steps. It may be that some of us here, or those who succeed us in future years, will be asked to legislate to set up another province in that area. No one can tell. At any rate, I think, the legislation proceeds upon quite sound lines.

Regarding the remuneration of members of the council; as the honourable leader has pointed out, the per diem allowances apply only to the elected members. Of course, if the appointed members have to travel to Yellowknife or Fort Smith for a meeting of the council, their expenses will be paid; the elected members, when they come to Ottawa from their respective constituencies for meetings—and it is a good experience for them to attend once in a while meetings here at the capital——are similarly compensated. It seems to me that the proposed remuneration is on a fair basis. The maximum that can be paid any elected member in any year is $2,000. The scheme also gives effect to a very salutory principle, in that if a member fails to attend meetings he is penalized by the withholding of some of his indemnity.

Honourable senators, from my knowledge of the whole problem I have no hesitation in supporting this bill.

Hon. A. K. Hugessen: Honourable senators, like the honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) I have some recollection of the debate which took place when the Senate dealt with the predecessor of this legislation in 1951. As I recall it, the question was raised at that time as to why there was a nominated majority on the council with only a minority actually elected by the residents of the Northwest Territories. As I remember it, the answer which was given to that question, and which satisfied me, was this: A very considerable majority of the residents of the territories are Indians and Eskimos, most of whom are not entitled to vote for their representatives, and the dominion government, considering itself the guardian of the indigenous population, appoints members to the council who are expected to look after the interests of these people. I assume that is still the position.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) has referred to the amount of the indemnity. It is very difficult, of course, to determine what is a fair indemnity, but the Government has taken into consideration the indemnities paid to members of provincial legislatures. I admit there is no direct relationship and one cannot very well compare the work of a member of the Northwest Territorial Council to that of a member of, shall we say, the Ontario Legislature, but at the same time there is some relationship. Honourable members may be interested to know just what the indemnities of the members of the provincial legislatures are, and with the permission of the house I will place the following table on Hansard:

Honourable senators, it has been suggested that the bill be sent to committee. I have no objection to that. I think probably it should go to committee in view of the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Inkerman (Hon. Mr. Hugessen) with respect to the rights of Indians and Eskimos to vote.

The honourable gentleman from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) and the honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) mentioned the non-existence of municipal governments in the territories. Some municipalities are being developed there. For instance, Yellowknife is quite a centre at the present time. I do not know to what extent these municipalities have power over their local areas, and probably honourable members would like to obtain this information in committee.

Hon. Mr. Farris: Have there been any requests from these municipalities that they be given local powers?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I do not know of any direct request, but I understand that the question has arisen from time to time. I do know that the members of the council consult the inhabitants of these areas on questions affecting local matters. Just to what extent there is a demand for municipal government I cannot say, but no doubt we could also get that information from the minister or from an official of his department.

Hon. Mr. Farris: If there was much of a demand we would soon hear about it.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Probably. As I say, if the house wishes this bill to go to committee I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Can the honourable leader put on record how much it costs the federal Government to administer the Northwest Territories through the council?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have that information in a financial statement, and with the unanimous consent of the house I would place it on Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Could we have the total?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: For the fiscal year 1952-53 the revenue totalled $660,026.43, and the expenditure totalled $433,762.71.

Hon. Mr. Davies: Where does the revenue come from?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: From licences of various kinds. The honourable gentleman from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) has more knowledge of this than I have, and he referred to one very important source of revenue, the sale of liquor.

Hon. Mr. Euler: Apparently there is a balance. What becomes of it?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Revenue is derived from many types of licences which are granted in that large territory. For instance, there are mining licences and probably oil and trappers' licences.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: What becomes of the surplus of approximately $200,000?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable gentleman from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler) has just asked me that question. The surplus would go into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Hon. Mr. Haig: How much does the Government spend in the Northwest Territories in a year?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I have given the expenditure.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Well, the Government shows more than that in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The Government may show more than that in the estimates. My information is taken from the Statement of Revenue and Expenditure, Northwest Territories. If honourable senators want more information with respect to this they can obtain it from departmental officials in committee. In the meantime, I would place the following tables on Hansard:

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: Can the honourable senator inform the house whether the Indians in the Northwest Territories come under the direct control of the Indian Affairs Branch?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: My impression is that those who live on reservations come under the direct control of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. It may be that all of them come under the direction of this department. The honourable senator will recall that among the members of the council whom I named was a representative of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Hon. Mr. Dupuis: In consequence, these inhabitants would be considered as minors from the point of view of law?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: No doubt some of them would be, but I am not prepared to discuss the details of this. As honourable senators know, some Indians in Ontario have the franchise. I would prefer that honourable members obtain this information in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

YUKON BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald moved the second reading of Bill 180, an Act to amend the Yukon Act.

He said: Honourable senators, some of the remarks which I made with respect to the Northwest Territories Council, when speaking on the previous bill, apply also to the Yukon Council.

The purpose of this bill is threefold: to increase the indemnity of members of the Yukon Council; to provide for living allowances to members while in attendance at a session of the council; and to provide for payment of the indemnity to a member if he should become ill at the place where the council is sitting, and cannot be in attendance.

The bill provides for living allowances to members when the council is in session but not actually sitting. It also provides for the payment of travelling expenses.

The bill specifies that the date on which the Yukon Act shall be deemed to have come into force is the 1st day of April, 1955.

Payments are made from the Yukon Consolidated Revenue Fund, and the indemnity to each member is increased to $100 a day, up to a maximum of $1,000 per calendar year, if the total number of days in session is ten or less, or a maximum of $2,000 if the total number of days in a session exceeds ten. The bill further provides for travelling expenses from the member's home to the place where the council is sitting, and for an allowance for living expenses of $25 for each day of attendance at a sitting. The same allowance for living expenses is payable to members of the Northwest Territories Council.

I cannot think of anything which needs further explanation, but if there are any questions I shall try to answer them.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable leader for the names of the council members?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps I should say, first, that the five members of the council are all elected. The form of government is democratic, just as the honourable senator from Toronto-Trinity (Hon. Mr. Roebuck) desired it should be in the Northwest Territories. The Commissioner, W. G. Brown, resides in the territory. The electoral districts and the members elected on August 20, 1952, are as follows: Carmacks, represented by A. R. Hayes, total number of votes cast: 86; Mayo, represented by A. F. Berry, total number of votes cast: 199; Dawson, represented by James Mellor, elected by acclamation; Whitehorse East, represented by J. L. Phelps, total number of votes cast: 472. Whitehorse West, represented by F. D. Locke, total number of votes cast: 525. The total number of votes cast in the 1952 election was 1,282.

Hon. Mr. Lambert: I am not sure whether the leader stated the populations of the various districts in the Northwest Territories when he was explaining the previous bill, but may I ask if he has these statistics for the Yukon?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Yes. In 1951 the total population of the Yukon Territory was 9,096, of which approximately 1,500 were natives. I presume "natives" means Eskimos and Indians. The populations of the electoral districts in that year were as follows: Whitehorse, 2,548, plus about 1,500 military personnel and their families; Dawson, 773; Mayo, 236; Carmacks, 154.

The Yukon Council meets at Whitehorse. I am sure honourable senators will agree that an increased indemnity should be paid to members of the council, and that their allowances for travelling and living expenses should be similar to those of the members of the Northwest Territories Council. Accordingly, I would recommend this bill to the favourable consideration of the house.

Hon. W. M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I have listened with much interest to the explanation of these two bills by the honourable Leader of the Government. It occurs to me that it will be a long time before the population of these two areas will warrant their being made into provinces. When the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources Bill was before the house in December 1953 I suggested that the land comprising these territories should be incorporated into the four western provinces: that is to say, that the portions of the territories above British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba should become, respectively, parts of these provinces. My suggestion received wide publicity in the press at that time and, I may say, drew some criticism in the newspaper published in the Yukon Territory. But I still think it would provide the proper solution for the administration of government in that area.

I had occasion to read the record of proceedings of the Special Committee on the Estimates of the other house when the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources appeared before it and outlined expenditures involving many millions of dollars to take care of the territories. In my opinion all that area could well be administered by those provinces in close proximity to it.

I thought it might be worth while at this time, honourable senators, to renew my suggestion for the amalgamation of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory with the four western provinces.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Natural Resources.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING POSTPONED

On the Order:

Second Reading of Bill H-10, intituled: "An Act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1952"—Hon. Senator Euler.

Hon. W. D. Euler: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to say that it is not my intention to move second reading of this bill this afternoon; however, I definitely intend to proceed with it on Wednesday next.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands for second reading on Wednesday next.

PRIVATE BILL

S & M PIPELINE LIMITED—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Wesley Stambaugh moved the second reading of Bill W-11, an Act to incorporate S & M Pipeline Limited.

He said: Honourable senators, as there have been many pipe line bills passed by this house and more are on the Order Paper, one begins to wonder whether so many such bills are necessary. I believe there is a valid reason for the multiplicity of pipe line bills, and I shall explain the situation as I see it.

In 1953 Parliament passed a statute known as the Pipelines Act, section 10A of which prohibits any person, other than a person having authority under a special act, from constructing or operating an extraprovincial pipe line, which is defined in section 2, subsection (cc), as meaning a pipe line for the transportation of oil or gas connecting a province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of a province. By reason of the above section the proposed special act company is therefore required for the purpose of constructing and operating small pipe line gathering systems or branch lines which cross provincial boundaries.

I am informed, honourable senators, that Bill W-11 follows the pattern established by bills of a similar nature, and our Law Clerk tells me that it is in the form recommended by the government.

It should be said that as long as pipe line companies operate within provincial boundaries federal incorporation is unnecessary. However, as soon as a company finds it necessary to transport oil or gas by pipe line across a provincial boundary a special federal act, such as that proposed by this bill now before us, is necessary.

In the four western provinces there are numerous oil fields immediately adjacent to provincial boundaries. For instance, in the Peace River district of British Columbia, near Dawson Creek, there are a number of wells within half a mile of each side of the provincial boundary. Dawson Creek, which is in British Columbia, is supplied with gas from Alberta. In the Fort St. John area, where there are tremendous quantities of natural gas but very little oil, cost of transportation is so high that it is uneconomical to operate the wells already established in the area. However, since an Alberta firm is building a refinery at Dawson Creek this year, it is expected that the refining of oil and manufacturing of oil products will take place in the very near future, and oil will probably come from both sides of the provincial boundary.

The oil industry in Western Canada, and especially in Alberta, has developed into a major industry during the past two or three years. Development is also taking place in the other western provinces, particularly Saskatchewan.

In Alberta, at the end of 1954, there were fifteen large producing fields and about fifty small ones. To give the house an idea of how fast this development is continuing to grow, I would point out that six new oil fields and eleven new gas fields were discovered in the month of January this year. I might add, incidentally, that because of the moderate temperature and frozen ground conditions, January proved to be a better month to operate drilling rigs than July or August. Still referring to the end of 1954, there were more than 6,000 producing wells in Alberta, and their present daily production is about 300,000 barrels. It is estimated that in the present proven fields there are about 2 billion barrels of recoverable oil, besides which there is estimated to be between 100 billion and 200 billion barrels in the Great Athabaska Tar Sand field.

This oil industry has been a major source of revenue for our western provinces, and this is true especially of Alberta. Since the Leduc discovery—which, by the way, was in 1947—the Alberta provincial Government has received a total revenue from its various oil and natural gas sources of $350 million. The banner year was 1953-54, in which the Government received a record amount of $96 million.

Now the same of course is true to some extent of Manitoba, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, although from information I have I believe that the province of Alberta owns a larger proportion of its oil rights than does any other province, and that in this respect Saskatchewan comes next.

In the past two or three years there has been quite extensive exploration and development in the oil industry in Saskatchewan. At the present time there are slightly in excess of 1,000 wells in Saskatchewan capable of producing oil, and the production in 1954 amounted to 5 million barrels. I might say that within the last few weeks I saw an estimate made by the Saskatchewan Government that during this year the output of last year, would be doubled; that is, that this year the total production in the province would be about 10 million barrels.

Manitoba too has profited from the oil industry, though to a lesser extent. At the end of 1954 there were in Manitoba 300 wells capable of producing oil, with a total production slightly in excess of 3 million barrels.

British Columbia has not a great deal of oil, but it has tremendous resources of natural gas. According to figures issued by that province, its proven resources are estimated at something over 3 trillion cubic feet of gas. Alberta, it is estimated, has from 11 trillion to 14 trillion cubic feet of gas.

The pipe line company which this bill proposes to incorporate is interested in several fields in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, but at the present time it is particularly interested in what is known as the Frobisher field, in the southeastern corner of Saskatchewan. The company wishes to build as soon as possible a pipe line from the Frobisher field to Cromer, Manitoba, a point on the Interprovincial Pipe Line which, by the way, is the pipe line running from Edmonton to Sarnia.

If honourable senators see fit to give second reading to this bill today, I will move that it be sent to the Committee on Transport and Communications.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Stambaugh, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

PRIVATE BILLS

PETROLEUM TRANSMISSION COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. J. W. de B. Farris moved the second reading of Bill X-11, an Act to incorporate Petroleum Transmission Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a rather ordinary bill. As honourable senators know, the Pipe Lines Act, 1949, provides that no company can construct or operate pipe lines for the transportation of gas or oil unless it has been specially authorized by an act of Parliament. There are many precedents for the incorporation of companies of this kind—for instance, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, Westcoast Transmission Company Limited, Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company, and others—and I believe there are bills for incorporation of other such companies now on our Order Paper. Each bill has to be different from others merely as to the details of capitalization, sponsors, and matters of that kind. In form, this bill is the same as the others that have been passed.

I think in this case the high status of the company will be evident when I name the petitioners, who are officers of the company. They are George L. McMahon, William N. Graburn, A. Patrick Bowsher, of Calgary and Leonard M. Youell, all of Calgary; and Ronald C. Merriam, of Ottawa. These men are respectively the president, two vice-presidents and secretary of Pacific Petroleums Ltd.

Mr. Merriam, the solicitor of that company at Ottawa, is a well-known lawyer of this city.

Pacific Petroleums Ltd. is one of the great pioneers in the development of oil in Canada. I know something about its inception. The company was incorporated in British Columbia with power to do business in British Columbia and Alberta. Frank McMahon was the inspiring head of the company. For at least fifteen years he has been an outstanding personality in Canada, in my judgment, at all times showing great courage, and bent on one object—the development of gas and oil in northern Alberta and northern British Columbia.

I have here a memorandum containing some information which I think honourable senators would approve of hearing. Pacific Petroleums Ltd. of whom Frank McMahon is the real head, although his brother is the president, is approximately four years old. In four years that company and its associates have drilled 100 wells, and have been directly responsible for the proving up of more than 3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas in British Columbia. Significant oil strikes also have been made. The Pacific company and its associates, notably Peace River Natural Gas Co. Ltd., which is a subsidiary of Pacific Petroleums Ltd., and Canadian Atlantic Oil Company Ltd., and an American company, Sunray Oil Corporation, have shown great courage in putting up money to explore and develop the oil and natural gas resources of Northeastern British Columbia and adjoining areas in Northwestern Alberta.

Honourable senators, it is hard to believe that since the Pacific company drilled its first well the company and its associates and other major companies in that northland have spent approximately $30 million, and the rate of expenditure is today increasing rapidly. This makes the petroleum industry a major business in British Columbia, although there is as yet no market for the product.

I want to pay a particular tribute, although I do not think it is necessary in this case: no man in Canada deserves more admiration for his work and his courage than that British Columbian, Frank McMahon, in association with his two brothers George and John—all of them born in Cranbrook. The honourable senator from Kootenay East (Hon. Mr. King) was the attending physician when they arrived in this world. Recently we have heard some discussion about "immigrants",—whether it is better that they be drawn from outside Canada or come to us by way of the cradle. Personally, I hold with Mr. Pickersgill, and I am astonished at some of the critical comments which have been made. Nobody has objected to immigration, but surely there is no better way of adding to our population than the good old-fashioned way, and these men are a living demonstration of the fact. I know of no man who has gone ahead with more courage, more persistence and more inspiring insight, when all the odds were stacked against him, than Frank McMahon. Last year, it may be remembered, an application by these promoters was turned down at Washington, and to the casual observer it appeared as though they were ruined; but the set-back never fazed Frank McMahon. He had vision, ambition and courage; he went ahead; and within a few weeks, according to my information, the Westcoast Transmission Company, with its big scheme to bring gas from Fort St. John and adjacent territory down through the heart of British Columbia to the coast and on to the south, will be an accomplished fact.

The company for which I now seek incorporation desires to be invested with wider powers than its parent company, which is incorporated only in British Columbia, with powers limited to that province and Alberta. I may say that at the second or third subsequent sitting of this house another bill will be introduced for the purpose of enlarging the powers of the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited by increasing its capitalization, and for related objects. I would like to have the two bills considered in committee together, and the officers from Calgary will attend to give the fullest explanation on any matter as to which information is required. Meanwhile, as I am not particularly in the humour for making speeches today, I think I will say no more.

Hon. Mr. Haig: Honourable members, if, as the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) tells us, he is not in just the humour for making a speech today, I should hate to be in opposition to him when he was in the mood to speak. I admired his speech. Whether or not I might have been inclined, when I came into the chamber, to vote againt the bill, I now say quite candidly that I am going to vote for it.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Farris, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA—SECOND READING.

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-12, an Act respecting The Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill, the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Hayden), was not able to be here this afternoon to move the second reading, and I ask leave to do so on his behalf. It is a very simple measure: it affects the corporate structure of The Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

This company was incorporated by Act of the Parliament of Canada in 1874, so that it is almost as old as the country itself. At that time the powers conferred on the company were very broad: it was entitled to hold lands, to devote its revenues to the objects of the association, and to invest in certain types of securities. Two years later—in 1876—it applied to Parliament for an amendment which would permit it to make contracts of insurance on behalf of its members with accident insurance companies. Presumably after 1876 it carried out those purposes to some considerable extent. However, by 1882, apparently its funds became large enough to permit it to embark upon projects of this kind on its own behalf, so it again applied to the Parliament, and at that time was empowered to issue its own sickness, accident and mortuary benefit policies. At that time the general laws with respect to supervision of fraternal benefit societies were less strict than they are today. Accordingly one of the restrictions contained in the Act of 1882 required the approval of the Governor in Council for amendments of the by-laws with respect to the issue and regulation of its policies. Those by-laws were a schedule to the act of 1882.

Through the years since that time the insurance laws of the Dominion of Canada have been greatly changed in the interests of the policy holders of the company, and a detailed supervision is now conducted on behalf of the Minister of Finance through the office of the Superintendent of Insurance. It is therefore felt unnecessary for this company, when it amends its bylaws with reference to the policies it issues, to submit these amendments to the Governor in Council for approval. I have been informed that over the past few years every amendment made to these bylaws has in fact been approved by the Governor in Council. I have also been informed by the office of the Superintendent of Insurance that it is really a waste of the time of the Superintendent, of the company and of Council to require this procedure to be continued.

It may be of interest to know that the company has its head office in Toronto, that there are some 13,000 members in the association and that it enjoys a high status throughout the country, particularly in insurance circles.

Honourable senators, if this bill is given second reading I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do other insurance companies submit their by-laws to council for approval or are they required to do so?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: Perhaps I would be a little too quick if I were to say "No" to that inquiry. I think, generally speaking, they would not be required to do so.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I believe you are right.

Hon. Mr. Connolly: As honourable senators know, the supervision which is given at all times to the affairs of insurance companies in this country by the office of the Superintendent of Insurance is extensive. I am sure we all realize that one of the reasons for the stability of our insurance companies is that they operate in a manner prescribed by the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and under the careful and reasonable supervision of the Superintendent of Insurance.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the motion of honourable Mr. Connolly, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

TRANS-PRAIRIE PIPELINES, LTD.—SECOND READING

Hon. T. A. Crerar moved the second reading of Bill U-12, an Act to authorize Trans-Prairie Pipelines, Ltd. to construct, own and operate an extra-provincial pipe line.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill that I am sponsoring today is a comparatively simple one, and I am sure it will commend itself to the favourable consideration of the house. Before dealing with the precise provisions of the bill perhaps a word or two of general explanation would be useful.

Geologists tell us there is a considerable area known as the Williston Basin in which oil and gas will probably be found. This basin embraces a substantial area in southwestern Manitoba and southeastern Saskatchewan, and extends beyond the international boundary line into North Dabota and part of Montana. Over the past four or five years considerable exploration work has been carried out in the Manitoba part of the Basin, with quite substantial results. It may be of interest to know that the oil production in Manitoba is now running at the rate of 260,000 barrels a month. The February production alone amounted to 261,000 barrels, and at the present time there are 315 producing oil wells in that part of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is it light or heavy oil?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I am not sure, but if my friend is sufficiently interested in that we can probably obtain the information in committee. However, I think it is not the heavy kind such as is found in some parts of Northern Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is what I wanted to find out.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: It is the ordinary type of oil—decent oil.

It will be recalled that a few years ago an interprovincial pipe line was constructed to carry oil from the Edmonton area in Alberta to Superior at the western end of Lake Superior. This line has since been continued to Sarnia in Western Ontario.

Of course, when these oil fields were discovered in Manitoba the problem arose of getting the oil to market. The interprovincial pipe line passes close to a small village called Cromer, which is from 10 to 15 miles southwest of Virden. The growing town of Virden is about 75 miles west of the City of Brandon, and Brandon is 140 miles west of the city of Winnipeg. I mention those distances to give an idea of the location of the field. North of Cromer, an oil field known as the Daly field has been found. Another field north of Virden has been discovered, known as the Roselea field, and, indeed, in the town of Virden itself there are now several producing oil wells.

I now come to the purpose of this bill. A company was incorporated in Manitoba, under the Manitoba Companies Act, to build pipe lines within the province, to convey oil from these fields to where it would tap the interprovincial pipe line at Cromer. Since the incorporation of the company the area has been extended. Cromer is eight miles from the Saskatchewan-Manitoba boundary, but over the boundary in the province of Saskatchewan oil has been discovered at a point called Alida, roughly 25 miles from Cromer. Here are now 15 producing oil wells. This company seeks through this proposed legislation to get power to cross the interprovincial boundary line and build its line into the province of Saskatchewan in order to tap these new developing fields; and of course in seeking such power it necessarily comes under the general Pipe Lines Act.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Does the company have to incorporate in Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: No. Even if it incorporated in Saskatchewan it would need to come to Ottawa for authority for the interprovincial line under the general Pipe Lines Act. This bill merely gives the company power—subject to approval by the authorities under the general Pipe Lines Act—to extend its pipe line into the province of Saskatchewan, tap this oil producing area, and carry oil to these areas: that is, to Cromer, which is the nearest point at which it can tap the interprovincial pipe line, and where, in addition, the interprovincial pipe line has a pumping station.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is there any opposition?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: There is no opposition of which I know.

Hon. Mr. Davies: May I ask the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) a question A pipe line bill was introduced yesterday, and I notice that four pipe line bills appear on today's Order Paper. Can he tell us whether any of these pipe line companies conflict with one another in what they are trying to do?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I cannot see how they conflict in any way with Trans-Prairie Pipe Lines, Ltd. This is really a local company that is serving its own community, and as oil has been discovered and is now being produced in the province of Saskatchewan immediately over the interprovincial border the company seeks power to extend its line; but it cannot cross the interprovincial boundary to tap a well which might be only two miles within Saskatchewan without the approval of the authorities here, under the general Pipe Lines Act.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Would the company obtain that authority by virtue of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes, this bill would give it power to extend into Saskatchewan, subject to approval of the proper authorities, under the general Pipe Lines Act.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: The passing of this bill would simply give the company authority to apply to the Transport Commission.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Is this the first bill of its kind that has been passed by this house?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: I think so. Other bills with which we have dealt from time to time were much wider in their application.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, and they were bills of incorporation, were they not?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: The bill would give powers that are in the hands of the federal parliament to a provincially incorporated company. I have not seen that done before.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The purpose of the bill which was explained by the honourable senator from Vancouver South (Hon. Mr. Farris) was to incorporate Petroleum Transmission Company. The bill before us now does not seek an incorporation. I presume the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar), is not applying for incorporation through this bill?

Hon. Mr. Crerar: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I take it that he is applying to Parliament in order to bring the company within the provisions of the Pipe Lines Act.

Hon. Mr. Crerar: That is it, precisely. It is not a new incorporation.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I presume that the honourable senator from Churchill (Hon. Mr. Crerar) will move that this bill be referred to a committee, because it will require some thought.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar, the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

EQUITABLE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA—SECOND READING

Hon. Cyrille Vaillancourt moved the second reading of Bill V-12, an Act respecting Equitable Fire Insurance Company of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to extend the period of time during which the Minister of Finance may grant a certificate of registry to this insurance company.

The Equitable Fire Insurance Company obtained a federal charter in 1952, chapter 61. This federal company is to replace the company bearing the same name and which has operated since 1901, pursuant to a provincial charter. Therefore, the purpose is to transfer the operations of the Equitable Fire Insurance Company from its provincial charter to a federal charter.

Subsection 2 of section 4 of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act provides that the charter granted to an insurance company shall expire unless the certificate of registry is obtained within a period of two years after the charter has been granted. In the present case the delay is due to the fact that the company had problems to settle with federal and provincial income tax authorities, concerning the payment of the capital of the provincial company and the transfer of the surplus to the new federal company. These income tax problems were settled only recently, and the consent of the shareholders of the provincial company had to be obtained for this purpose.

The present bill is similar to other bills which have been passed under similar circumstances. Reference may be made to 11—12 George VI, chapter 86, and 14 George VI, chapter 58.

This bill is presented at the suggestion and with the complete approval of the federal Department of Insurance. If the bill receives second reading this afternoon, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.
