I have not talked about the contribution the reserve army makes and can make to our over-all defence when our regular forces are reduced. Our reserve forces are a source of trained men ready for action; they are ready should there be need to defend our borders, or to handle local disorders should they arise. The reserves are also a source of personnel for the regular forces. The cost of training and the time required for training a man who has had the benefit of reserve instruction is much less than that required for the training of a raw recruit. But how much money are we talking about in the cost of operating the reserve force? It is less than 2 per cent of the defence budget. We must weigh this cost against the achievements of the reserve force, its potential and its function, and once again I would like to place special emphasis on the part it plays and the interest it has for the youth of our country.

Some time ago an airline company came up with the slogan "Fly now, pay later". I think the endeavours of governments, led by the federal government, to reduce expenditures is commendable but there are areas wherein a variation of that slogan might apply. I suggest "Cut now, pay later". I also suggest that this is more a truism than a slogan when considered in connection with many of the programs concerning youth.

One of my reasons for focussing attention on youth was prompted by an event which took place in my home town of Oakville last week. It was Police Appreciation Week. The week was planned to give the public an opportunity to better understand the workings of the police department and, as might be expected, much attention was focussed on their work with youth. Police Chief Fred Oliver said in an interview that dealing with youth is not a cost but an investment. It is not true that teenagers are not good; the majority of teenagers are good. His opinion applied to more than 95 per cent of our youth.

At the same time Inspector Fern Alexander, one of Canada's few women police inspectors and head of the metro Toronto youth bureau, said that by the end of this year in metro Toronto 30,000 young people will have been in trouble with the law and 20 per cent of those will be around to haunt us for a long time. There will never be enough money to provide phsychiatrists, psychologists and other properly trained people to handle the situation. It is through participation that we can develop the full potential of our youth. Lowering the voting age to 18 gives them the opportunity to participate in government. Maintaining a vital reserve force gives the government an opportunity to participate in the building of character and the development of youth.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join those of my colleagues who have already expressed their congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau). These hon. members have set a fine example to those of us who were elected in 1968 and have provided us with a fine example in trying to equal their efforts.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to hon. members of the House who recently had new duties bestowed upon them, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) and the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), for their elevation to governmental rank, and the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) for their well merited promotion to the rank of parliamentary secretary. I would like in particular to extend my congratulations to my close neighbour, the hon. member for Windsor West who, as a result of seven years' assiduous service in this house marked by careful attention to detail in all the activities of government, has now succeeded in establishing himself as one of that select group of people who present policy to this house. The city of Windsor is fortunate in having two such able cabinet representatives as the hon. member for Windsor West and the hon. Senator for Windsor-Walkerville.

One theme of the Throne Speech, and the principal theme in subsequent discussion, has been the necessity of controlling inflation. The rate of inflation in this country has been running at about 5 per cent this year and about 4 per cent in the years immediately preceding. We are far from the worst off country in the world, of course. In Chile the rate of inflation is about 35 per cent and in Brazil it is over 20 per cent. The United States and most other industrialized countries of the world, except Germany, have a rate of inflation which is higher than that of Canada. But we cannot for this reason comfortably conclude that our inflation arises solely from external causes, that is, from world causes over which we may have very little control.

The very fact of the differing rates in the various countries of the world from a high of 35 per cent to a low of 2 or 3 per cent shows that native conditions and national governmental policies have a good deal to do with the rate of inflation. We therefore have the duty to examine our own government, our own society and our own economic structure to see if there are ways in which we in Canada can combat this very serious problem independently of the efforts which are also being made by countries such as the United States to deal with it. This is just what our government has been doing. Our attempts to control inflation have been based on fiscal and monetary policies, on the beginning of the operation of the Prices and Incomes Commission and on an attempt to combat the inflation psychology which some economists and many psychologists tell us in one of the most important aspects of the problem of inflation.

The government's austerity program is a very important part of the whole program of confining inflation to reasonable limits. What else can we do that we have not been doing up to this point? In my opinion the Prices and Incomes Commission should not be a mere fact finding body but should rather be a judgmental body. It should not be one which merely informs the people of what has been happening, but one which passes judgment on those events that have been happening. Of course, we have been distressed in the last few weeks by the large increase in the price of steel following upon, although not necessarily caused by, the wage settlement which was obtained by the United Steelworkers in the negotiations at Hamilton.

Dr. Kenneth Galbraith, our famous Canadian expatriot, last week, expressed the view in this city that one of the serious causes of inflation was the confrontation between the strong corporation and the strong union. Union demands are met by the corporation and then prices are raised to pass the increase in wages along to the consumer. The danger, as Galbraith and many other economists have pointed out, is that the corporation will use wage increases as an excuse for price increases which perhaps it had planned anyway, in order to raise once again the return on the corporation's investment.

I do not agree with one hon. member opposite who was speaking last week of corporate profits and said that because we have a continuing high rate of return on corporate investment this necessarily shows that something is wrong. After all, interest rates have been increasing in our economy generally and it is no surprise in such circumstances that corporate returns on capital have not been dropping and in some cases have been increasing. But at the same time we need to scrutinize very carefully price increases which are made by corporations, especially in industries where there is very little real competition between corporate giants, and again especially in industries which are very basic, bellwether industries if you like for our economy. In such industries we ought to have very careful examination, by a body such as the Prices and Incomes Commission, of any price increases which have occurred and, if necessary, of any wage settlements which have been made.

The Prices and Incomes Commission should feel free to look at all the economic events that are happening in our society which relate to prices and incomes, to inform us about them and to make judgments upon them, not as a substitute for members of this House but as an aid to the judgment of the members here. It seems to me that while this in itself might not prove sufficient to control completely the problem of inflation, it would be going considerably beyond where we are now and would be a step considerably short of that of complete wage and price control.

The second alternative that we have is the alternative of wage and price control. Hon. members know, Mr. Speaker, that in the Board of Commerce Act case decided almost 50 years ago by the Privy Council, that august but often mistaken judicial body decided that it was not within the power of the federal government of this country to have a prices and wages policy which would impose prices and wages on industry.

It may be that this was a wrong decision. Many legal authorities believe that it was. It may also be that the Supreme Court of Canada, now our highest judicial body, would be prepared at this point in our history to overrule that earlier decision because most of the law of that period, most of the dicta of the cases which limited the trade and commerce power and the peace, order and good government power in our constitution, has since been disowned either by later Privy Council decisions or by the Supreme Court of Canada itself since it became the final court of appeal in 1949. It may be that this earlier decision could be successfully challenged and that, strictly on legal grounds, we could begin now to have wage and price controls, but I would suggest this would probably not be the most fruitful way to proceed. This is a case which has stood for some 45 to 50 years. It has been relied upon by people in this country since that time. It would probably be much better if we were to attempt, as I believe government spokesmen have suggested, to bring about a political solution through a conference, seeking provincial agreement either to having the constitution of this country changed permanently to allow the federal government to set up real prices and wages control, or to work out some co-operative mechanism which would enable the two levels of government to work together to solve the problem.

From the comments of provincial governments and provincial ministers of finance it seems that the provincial governments are just as seriously concerned about this problem as is our own government, and I think we could anticipate that if we were to use political means we might work out a solution. But, Mr. Speaker, the fact that we could work out such a solution does not mean we should leap to this step. It is a very extreme step in a democratic society. It is one which is very hard to make work, and is especially hard to make work in the light of the frame of mind in our society which itself causes inflation.

We have inflation in part because people do not believe it is a time in which they are called upon to make any particular sacrifices for the government of our country. They see no reason why they should not demand higher wages, why prices should not rise when they are not being affected, and in their personal decisions it would seem they do not have uppermost the demands of the common good. With such a popular state of mind it would be extremely difficult to get the support that would be necessary to make a prices and wages board which would impose compulsory restraints on our society work very well. Whichever of these methods we choose—and my own feeling is that we will have to find other methods than the ones we are now using before this problem is fully controlled—I am confident we will succeed in controlling inflation, if only because we cannot afford to fail.

Now I am going to say a few words about the economic situation from a different point of view, from the point of view of what I would consider to be justified exceptions to the government's austerity program. The Speech from the Throne recognizes several of these. One is that programs to reduce regional disparities in employment opportunities and incomes will not be subject to the general austerity program. Indeed, the Speech says that governmental expenditure in this area will be increased because of the priority which the government rightly assigns to this very serious problem.

The Speech from the Throne also points out that the housing program to construct one million units over the next five years, combined with a recognition of the paramount importance of low income housing, will also be exempted from the general austerity program. I would like to suggest two further exceptions which I believe ought to be made to the general program of austerity. The first of these is with respect to superannuated civil servants. From time to time it has been said that these retired employees are in no worse position than retired employees under plans of private industry where those plans have been outdistanced by inflation. I think this is true, but I also think that the government has a particular responsibility with respect to those citizens who have been its employees. It cannot very well insist that employees of corporations have the right to receive from those corporations additional remuneration over and above that which is provided by contract under the original agreement with their employer. But it can, as an act of gratuity in the present inflationary circumstances, increase the amount of pension which its own employees are receiving, even at the cost of departing from the normal funded features of the plan.

Such payments would not seriously contribute to inflation. The figure of $5 million a year would deal very handsomely with the problem, and inflationary pressures would not be increased at all. That sum would represent an enormous contribution for the welfare of those citizens who have given, in some cases, a whole lifetime of service to their fellowmen by working for the government, people who once thought that their pensions would be adequate and have subsequently found, as a result of inflation which we have not been able to control, that their pension benefits have been eroded.

I also suggest that an exception could be made for pensioners generally. I am inclined to think that it would be very difficult at present to increase old age security pensions across the board in this country. I have not computed what the cost of increasing the guaranteed income supplement would be. Perhaps a strong case would be made for not paying additional benefits. On the other hand, I do not believe that any case can be made for not increasing, on a scale that is tied to the true cost of living, the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement. We have just received notice that as of January 1 the old age security pension will become $79.58 a month and the guaranteed income supplement will rise to $111.41 a month. These increases follow the pension index, which in turn follows the consumer price index. Unfortunately, the pension increase does not really follow the consumer price index because the increase is limited to an annual one of 2 per cent. I submit that this is a vicious and unwarranted limitation which, I believe, was unintentionally introduced. I understand that when these pieces of legislation were passed there was little expectation that the cost of living would rise at twice 2 per cent per annum and that this limitation would work hardships on those who are living on pensions. But this has occurred. Since it has occurred, I think the government has the duty to remove this limitation.

Of course, I realize that any pension scheme with benefits which are tied to a rising cost of living is open-ended. If you do not have a limitation in your scheme, it is open-ended. At the same time, however, the government benefits from a rise in the cost of living; its tax revenues increase. The government benefits when incomes rise. Since the government does benefit, it seems to me that on every January 1 there should be no reason for the government not to pass on a small amount of this benefit to those people who otherwise would be left in a very unfair position in our society vis-à-vis their fellow citizens. Since the government benefits from a rise in the cost of living I submit it should in this small way pay for the consequences of that rise.

I should like to say a few words about Indian policy. The Indian policy which was announced in this House in June by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is in my opinion a truly liberal statement. It provides for our Indians the goal of equal status instead of the goal of different status. It provides for equality and pledges the government's willingness to provide the means which are necessary if our Indian citizens are to achieve equality. While adopting this fundamental and philosophical principle, the statement elaborates six points and proposes five practical steps which the government will be prepared to take. Nevertheless, despite the undoubted merits of the document the response by the Indian community has been unfavourable. I think we are doing ourselves no service if we believe that the document has been received with anything like overwhelming or even majority support by the spokesmen of the Indians of our country.

It seems to me that Indians disagree little with the principles of equality enunciated in the statement, although no doubt some Indians prefer at present to retain what the statement calls "different" status. Some Indians prefer things to remain more or less as they are; they do not want to make changes. I hazard the opinion that that does not represent the majority view of the Indian community. We are beginning to find a great deal of unrest and what may be called agitation in the Indian community, which seems to indicate that our Indians are not satisfied with the status quo but want something better. I believe that Indian response to government statements is based largely on two factors. First, there is an attitude of distrust on their part, a distrust which I fear we have fostered too often in the past with our words and actions. Second, there is fear of a fait accompli according to a strict timetable. We can show rationally that these fears are unjustified, but that will not make them go away.

Recently, while talking with an Indian he expressed the sincere opinion that the white paper on Indian affairs proposed the automatic and immediate abolition of all reserves in this country. From a logical standpoint this is nonsense, because the statement does no such thing; yet this is what my Indian friend took to be the intention after reading the paper or hearing about it. He also believed that the fundamental purpose of the statement was to make Indians rich. He took the position that the aim of the Indians was not to get rich. Again, it seems to me that anyone reading the document would see that this is not so. The principal thrust of the document is this: it does not seek to make Indians rich but to make them free and equal citizens of our country. But because Indians do not trust us, this Indian read the white paper or heard about it and gained these misconceptions about it.

I suggest that we have the responsibility of breaking this deadlock. We, the stronger community, must introduce new elements into the situation which will upset the unfortunate, existing equilibrium. On the one hand we have the policy that is outlined in the government's statement, and on the other we have the response, based on fear, which to a large extent the Indian community has expressed toward the statement. I suggest that we should not push forward our entire plan at this time. We should not urge an over-all approach when we know the Indians have not adopted our philosophy. Instead, we should approach this matter from the other end of the scale.

We should take a piecemeal approach. We should work on individual projects. Undoubtedly by working on them we would be taking steps which would lead toward the goals we have outlined in our white paper. I do not believe we should ask the Indians to accept this philosophy. People may do the same things for different reasons and we should not necessarily expect them, even though we are working on a project co-operatively, to do so for our reasons. We should take a pragmatic rather than a philosophical approach.

I believe the government is beginning to do this. In the last month we have given funds to the Indians to assist them in developing and strengthening their own organizations. This is for our benefit because it ensures that we will talk to people from the Indian communities who will be representative of the views of their communities. But the more direct benefit will accrue to the Indians themselves. It will enable them to set up structures according to their own desires which will enable them to advise us more fully regarding what they want to do. We should continue to give them funds, if necessary even to prepare their own statement on Indian affairs.

I suggest we should proceed with all haste to appoint the claims consultation commissioner mentioned in the government's statement in June. This is very important because the claims consultation commissioner will work with both ourselves and the Indians, advising both groups how to best proceed with regard to Indian treaty and other claims which while not strictly treaty claims have at least a moral status. This appears to be the priority of the Indians.

We take as our priority the philosophical principle of equality, perhaps the basic principle relating to the relationship of the government to the people, the people to the government and generally of man to man. This is not the way in which the Indians approach the problem. The Indians begin by saying: You made certain promises to us and we want to talk about what you will do for us in terms of what you promised. If you do not live up to what you promised in the past, how can we believe anything else you may promise? This view should be placed very high on our priority list. We should proceed as quickly as possible to appoint the mediator between the Indian and white communities to try to solve this very difficult problem and to make concrete suggestions to the white and Indian communities.

The government statement suggests that this commissioner should proceed on a political rather than a legal basis. I believe this is the soundest approach because regardless of the legal technicalities it is not a subject we can approach strictly in legal terms. That certainly would not satisfy the Indians and probably would not satisfy us.

We are establishing policy for the future; we are not just talking about past treaties. The claims consultation commissioner should have a wide-ranging mandate which would enable him to negotiate and not merely to report on the legalities of Indian treaties. The Indians fear that we mean to suppress them. They need reassurance through deeds and no longer just through words. I believe this is the policy which the government has not only announced but is actually following. I commend the government for its initiative in this area and I urge it to proceed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but his time appears to have expired, unless he has the agreement of the House to continue beyond his allotted time. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacGuigan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be brief. I wish to say a few words about Parliament. During this Parliament the government has moved effectively to expand executive power, reorganize the cabinet and reorganize a number of departments. It has carried out internal reorganization and is now tightening the administration of departments through its austerity programs. Above all, we see the growing supremacy of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office within the government structure. I applaud all these developments, Mr. Speaker.

However, it is also important to strengthen the legislature, not only as a counterbalance to the executive because of the fear that power may corrupt but for a positive reason. There must be increased participation in government, participation of the public as well as of members of parliament. The public of course cannot always participate directly; they have only rare occasions on which they may do so. They can participate if they are allowed to appear before a parliamentary committee either by being summoned to Ottawa as a witness or by reason of what I hope will become more common, that is, parliamentary committees touring the country and hearing what citizens in different parts of the country have to say about present problems which concern their committees. The same result is achieved through the use of royal commissions, but I believe the government is correct in deemphasizing royal commissions in favour of the full use of parliamentary committees.

In addition to members of the public appearing before parliament through its committees, they also participate symbolically when they see their member of parliament participating in the House or in committees and when they see real dialogue taking place. This is especially true when constituents have expressed their views strongly to their member of parliament and perhaps persuaded him of the urgency of something which he did not previously believe to have high priority. They have the opportunity to see their member make the point in the House or in committee. If they see the representation of their member become policy through legislation or a white paper, they feel a real sense of accomplishment. Even when not all these steps are taken and they see only the process, I believe they are able to share vicariously, through their member of parliament, his participation in government and therefore feel they are participating in a real sense in what is happening in Canada's Parliament.

I am happy to say that the present government has been working strongly in this direction, but there are many more steps which need to be taken. The government has established a legislative committees system in which committees have a genuine, creative, active role in legislation and in studies which lead to legislation, but there is more to be done. Committees need wider-ranging terms of reference. The status of chairmen of committees needs to be upgraded. Committees need a budget for research and for travel so that there may not always be doubt as to the kind of projects in which they can engage. I envisage this as being a small rather than a large budget; if a committee needs more money it should certainly have to come before parliament on each occasion to seek it. There needs to be a reduction in the number of committees and in the membership of committees. There might well be an improvement in the scheduling of committees, perhaps a system of grading into major and minor committees, so that an hon. member serving on a major committee and a minor committee would not have more than one demand made on him at any moment.

Most important, there must be a relaxing of discipline as it affects members of all parties in committee. I realise that members of the opposition point their fingers at the government and suggest it should relax its discipline. It seems to me they do not always bear in mind the effect of discipline in their own parties on members who serve on committees. I suggest that discipline as it applies to members of all parties should be relaxed.

I am confident this is the direction in which the government is moving, and I urge my hon. friends to move rapidly because these are times of rapid change in society and parliamentary institutions themselves are in danger, not only in Canada but in other countries. There is a danger that our policy, our laws for the future, may be made in the streets if they are not made adequately in our legislatures. If they are not made in such a way as not only to be just but to appear manifestly just, they may not be made well enough for the times in which we live.

This is an age in which authority no longer commands respect merely because it is authority. Laws are not respected by reason of their authority so much as by the authority of their reason. I use the word "reason" here not in the more restricted sense in which it was used in the past by philosophers who talked about right reason and doing things properly; it is reason in a manifesting and persuasive sense. We must not only perform well; we must let the people see that we are responding to their needs and deeply-felt aspirations.

I join those who have previously expressed their support for the ideas contained in the Speech from the Throne. I believe it contains a viable and even an exciting program for members of parliament this session and I am sure that with the co-operation of all hon. members we can look forward to a fruitful session of parliament.

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, having heard my colleague's so eloquent words, I wonder whether I might not call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It is my pleasure to comply with the member's request and to call it 10 o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are right.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with Standing Order 40 a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved. The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle).

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I believe this motion has been withdrawn for the present.

Mr. Speaker: Is it my understanding that this question has been withdrawn for consideration tomorrow or later? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow in the forenoon.

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INFORMATION SERVICES

TABLING OF TASK FORCE REPORT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on August 30, 1968, I announced the appointment of a task force to study federal information agencies and make recommendations as to ways and means of increasing the efficiency and coordination of government information.

I now have the honour to table the report submitted by the members of that group.

The relevant authorities are now studying the recommendations put forward in the report and I expect to be able to make a statement regarding the action the government intends to take by the end of the year.

AGRICULTURE

TABLING OF REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS OF CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL CONGRESS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, in English and in French, the report of the proceedings of the Canadian Agricultural Congress which took place in Ottawa from March 24 to March 27.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF ONTARIO MINISTERS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of the Treasurer of Ontario and the Minister of Trade and Development of Ontario.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

ORAL QUESTIONS

THE AUDITOR GENERAL

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF STAFF

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he feels there is any justification for the suggestion made to Mr. Henderson, the Auditor General, who is a servant of Parliament, not of the government, of a reduction in his staff at a time when it is quite apparent to most of us that what this Parliamentary watchdog requires is sharper teeth rather than a filing down of those teeth?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts as to the form in which the Leader of the Opposition is asking his question. Perhaps he would put the question in another way.

Mr. Stanfield: I am not sure as to the nature of your objection, Mr. Speaker. If the minister would like to make a statement at some length on motions at a future date I would be happy to hear him do so. At the same time he might inform us whether the government proposes to introduce legislation, which the Auditor General has been requesting for some time, designed to increase the independence of the Auditor General and to define his office in a more formal and satisfactory way.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): With respect to legislation, consideration is being given to this question. I would hesitate at the moment to enunciate a firm decision or opinion on the legislation itself. As to the question of staff, I think the House would like to know that provision has been made for the Auditor General to engage staff each year in excess of the number he has actually been able to recruit. This, I understand, is the case. The numbers and kind of staff that the Auditor General can obtain and usefully employ will continue to be provided.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Who forms the judgment as to what kind of staff the Auditor General can profitably use? Is the decision made by the Auditor General or by the President of the Treasury Board and members of the government?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, up to the present it has been made by the Auditor General.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. Is it correct that the Auditor General has been requested to reduce the size of his staff?

Mr. Drury: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Has any thought been given to allowing the Auditor General to recruit staff from outside the public service criteria?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what is meant by recruiting his staff outside the public service criteria. He recruits his staff either from inside or outside the public service. The definitions, the work or job qualifications, are established by the Auditor General.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether the establishment approved by Parliament for the Auditor General was 250, and has Treasury Board suggested that this number be reduced to 239?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the establishment is, and will continue to be, that approved by Parliament. This approval is obtained through the Appropriation Acts.

Mr. Baldwin: As suggested by Treasury Board.

Mr. Drury: In spite of the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River, it is not dictated by Treasury Board.

Mr. Baldwin: I said "suggested".

Mr. Drury: I hope the hon. member will agree that Treasury Board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Drury: —is empowered to make suggestions for the improvement of productivity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether at any time instructions have been given to the Auditor General in regard to whether or not he should reduce the amount of work he is doing?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, that is a large question. For all I know, the hon. gentleman may himself have made suggestions to the Auditor General, and I cannot answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board, who in response to a question told me a moment ago that he had no knowledge of the Auditor General being requested to reduce his staff, whether he will look into this matter in view of the reported statement by the Auditor General himself that such request had been made to him?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that up with the Auditor General.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he will give an assurance that a similar check will be made on the growth of the Prime Minister's staff?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEEL PRICE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the size of the Prime Minister's staff I should like to ask him a question arising from the announcement by Dofasco that it is going to increase steel prices by, I believe, 5 per cent, following an announcement by Stelco that it is going to increase its steel prices, again followed by an announcement by Westinghouse that it is going to increase the prices of its appliances. In view of the fact that the increased price of basic steel is bound to have a multiplying effect throughout the economy since industry will have to pay more for steel, would the Prime Minister undertake to request the Prices and Incomes Commission to hold public hearings into steel prices instead of merely limiting itself to private discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question last week.

Mr. Lewis: I was not here last week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: But I did—

An hon. Member: Read Hansard.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen opposite will behave as politely as they always do—

An hon. Member: They are.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I was not here last week but I did read Hansard and, with great respect to the Prime Minister, he did not answer this question. I am asking him whether he will speak to the commission requesting it to hold the inquiry on steel prices in public rather than in private.

THE AUDITOR GENERAL

AUDIT OF CROWN CORPORATION BOOKS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Since in his various annual reports the Auditor General has been asking for some time that he be empowered to audit the books of several Crown corporations, does the government plan to implement his recommendations instead of having this work done by private firms?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this matter is now under review, but no decision has yet been taken.

FLAX—REPORTED LOSS OF SALES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio who answers for the Wheat Board. In view of the statement over the weekend that Canada has lost sales of two million bushels of flax because of failure to have this oilseed in forward positions, does the minister know whether this is a fact?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is certainly not in order, but in spite of the procedural difficulty the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have had discussions with the Wheat Board following the report in a Winnipeg newspaper about the loss of sales. Certainly the information from the Wheat Board is that there is no foundation whatsoever to these stories. Flax is available on the market according to demand. There is a regular procedure in this regard, and I understand that members of the Grain Exchange support the fact that flax is in fact available as required.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps hon. members will remember that under the rules it is not in order to ask a minister either to confirm or deny the contents of a report.

MEASURES TO OFFSET DECLINE IN RAILWAY FREIGHT TRAFFIC

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the volume of railway freight traffic, which is an accurate indicator of the state of the economy, is running 10 per cent below what it was a year ago and steadily declining, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, since he learned of this fact a week ago from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics report of October 28, he has instructed the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to prepare measures to stimulate the economy so we do not gradually head into a recession from which it may be very difficult to extricate ourselves?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been briefed about this matter since last week; perhaps I should seek to increase my staff so as to be better briefed.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in order to bring the Prime Minister up to date on matters with which he should be familiar, perhaps I might suggest that his staff is the only one exempt from cut-backs on expenditures.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO ASSIST FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a couple of questions to the Minister without Portfolio. The first I directed yesterday to the Prime Minister with regard to whether the ministers of the government, following their pilgrimage to Mecca, had decided that some action should be taken to meet the serious situation in which farmers find themselves with so much of their crops under snow and with little or no hope of being able to thrash them this fall?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, following the initial question yesterday I believe subsequent questions were put to the Minister of Agriculture. Indeed, a similar question was put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce last Friday. It was indicated in both answers that various measures were being considered to deal with these problems, the lack of cash on the part of farmers who do not have sufficient grain for cash advances, and other problems of which the department is aware.

INQUIRY AS TO ROYAL COMMISSION ON MARKETING

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio another question following that full, ample and innocuous reply. In view of the widespread self-examination that is taking place in western Canada concerning the Wheat Board and the fact that there has been a loss of markets and so on, may I ask the minister whether or not the government is giving any consideration, while approving in every way of the Wheat Board, to setting up a royal commission for the purpose of going fully into wheat marketing operations to ascertain exactly who is responsible for the present state of affairs and to ascertain what action might be taken to remedy it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I appreciate the right hon. gentleman's predilection for royal commissions, but we think there are other ways of determining facts and solving problems. We have the problems in hand with this in mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the hon. gentleman himself now a self-constituted unitary task force?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

REPORTED CHANGE IN WHEAT BOARD PROGRAMS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt this question. In view of reports that the minister stated in Saskatoon that the Canadian Wheat Board would be relieved of certain agricultural programs, would he inform the House what programs he was referring to?

Mr. Speaker: The question is irregular as asked. The hon. member knows he cannot ask a minister about statements made outside the House. The hon. member might rephrase the question and ask it directly of the minister.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Is there under consideration a change in the programs for which the Canadian Wheat Board is responsible?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Many questions in the area of the grains industry, including the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, are under discussion. It is my hope this matter will be discussed very fully both with the farmers concerned and by members here. It certainly is possible that some things can be done to improve the ability of the Wheat Board to act as the salesman for Canadian wheat and to perform its central function as a marketing agency. That is certainly one of the questions which has been raised. I did ask in Saskatchewan over the weekend whether some programs with which the Wheat Board is burdened should perhaps be considered again to see whether they could be done by someone else, simply to free the Wheat Board to do its own job better.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the fact there was an undertaking by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the Canadian Wheat Board would appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture, would the Minister without Portfolio have the Canadian Wheat Board come before the committee so that these matters might be discussed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL DELIVERY QUOTAS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister without Portfolio. Has the Wheat Board yet authorized any further quotas on grain deliveries on the prairies and, if not, when are such quotas anticipated?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): At the present time my latest information is that the unit quota is in effect except where special deliveries for special grains have been authorized. The Wheat Board is very much interested in attempting to give everyone an opportunity first of all to deliver the unit quota and to move grain accordingly.

I am sure that when that objective is nearer being achieved, further quotas will be opened.

POLICY RESPECTING OVER-QUOTA DELIVERIES

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I also have a supplementary for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday in his absence I asked a question about the reversal of the policy whereby wheat could be traded for flour for the producers' own use. Having reversed this policy, is the government prepared to advise the Wheat Board to allow the exchange of wheat for certified and registered seed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): There have been discussions with the Wheat Board about this issue. The Wheat Board has not yet announced over-deliveries for registered or certified seed partly because of the hope to move first of all the unit quota deliveries and relieve congestion but also because of the need for some discussions about abuses which have been associated with the over-delivery policy in the past. The Wheat Board is having discussions with the Canadian Seed Growers Association about this matter and it may be possible for some announcement to be made before too long.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY LINE FROM MATAGAMI TO HUDSON BAY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

I would like to ask him if the government is contemplating the construction of a railway branch-line from Matagami to Hudson Bay in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that his question could profitably be put on the order paper.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION OF CITÉ DU HAVRE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question to the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for housing and who has jurisdiction over the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

As the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will give up as of December 31 next the administration of Cité du Havre and as a confidential and comprehensive plan regarding the future of the site was submitted to the federal government last May, could the minister inform the House what measures the government intends to take in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question should normally be answered through a statement on motions and the hon. member might wish to ask his question accordingly.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I shall state my question again. Will the minister make a statement on motions soon with respect to the future of Cité du Havre in Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there are internal meetings going on between CMHC and the National Harbours Board, and when a decision about this matter is taken I am quite sure we will make it known to hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us whether he has gone through the over-all plan submitted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and whether he intends to advise the House of that confidential or secret plan?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any secret plan in those terms. There are several reports and recommendations about Cité du Havre. I do not know specifically which plan the hon. member is referring to, but I am examining all of them in consultation with my colleagues and when a decision is taken on one of them we certainly have no intention of keeping it secret. We will make it known to the House.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE PACT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

When will the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions or in some other form on the state of the negotiations that are now taking place on the auto pact?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is to be a meeting with the United States authorities on the auto pact, not for its renewal but rather to study a suggestion by the United States that some changes could be made. Consultations have been going on on this subject between my department and the industry. We are now developing our position. I think it would be rather unwise for me to announce what that position will be, but I will of course report on the negotiations when they take place.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether the government is pressing the automakers to make some firm commitment on the matter of price parity?

Mr. Pepin: In the coming weeks I am to meet the presidents of the automobile manufacturers and this will be part of our conversations, that is, trying to assess if they cannot do better than they have already done.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether the trade unions directly involved are being kept abreast of the negotiations?

Mr. Pepin: I am known to be easy of access. If there are points that they would like to make rather strongly, I will be available to meet with them.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF WATER ACT

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When does the minister expect to introduce the Canada water act?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be introduced this week.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Following the reported reluctance of the detergent industry to discuss alternatives to the use of phosphates at the conference this week, is the minister's department having discussions with the detergent industry?

Mr. Greene: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am having discussions with the presidents of the larger companies involved in the sale and distribution of detergents.

POLLUTION

RECOMMENDATION AGAINST USE OF PHOSPHORUS IN DETERGENTS

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): While I am dealing with the question of phosphates, Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to answer a question by the hon. member for Kootenay West, asked on October 30, in regard to the International Joint Commission report. The report referred to by the hon. member was submitted to the International Joint Commission by the advisory boards established by the commission to investigate and report on water pollution in Lakes Erie and Ontario and the international reach of the St. Lawrence River downstream from Lake Ontario.

I am advised that the I.J.C. will follow its customary procedure of examining this report and forwarding its recommendations thereon to the governments of Canada and the United States through the respective Secretaries of External Affairs and State. I understand the commission will be holding public hearings on this matter early in the new year prior to reporting to the two governments.

In the meantime the interim interdepartmental committee on water is studying this matter and will present its recommendations as to appropriate federal government action thereon to me as soon as possible for consideration by the cabinet.

AIRPORTS

NEW BRUNSWICK—STUDY OF SITE

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of urgent representations by the Maritime Provinces Board of Trade and other organizations, is a study being made to determine the site for an international jet airport to serve the major cities of New Brunswick?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The first step has been taken, Mr. Speaker. In the last week a study was launched to determine traffic patterns and future trends in the Atlantic provinces over the next 20 to 25 years. This information will be necessary in order to determine precisely where the airport site should be located.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the engineers now working on the study of air traffic needs in the Atlantic provinces have agreed that there is a need for a new airport in the province of New Brunswick, would the minister broaden their terms of reference so that they could report on the most suitable site for this important airport?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think the location of the airport will be self-evident in a general way once the study of traffic patterns has been completed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to bring in legislation to abolish capital punishment in respect of the murder of policemen?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have not been considering that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Noble: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government alarmed by the increase in murders in Canada from 220 in 1966 to 314 so far this year, and does it plan any remedial action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is slightly irregular. The hon. member is asking whether or not the government is alarmed, and I would think that a question asked in those terms is not proper.

TRADE

RADIO AND TELEVISION TUBE IMPORTS—THREAT TO CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Imports of radio and television tubes from Japan appear to be presenting a serious threat to the Canadian tube industry. Can the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce confirm this, and what is it doing to relieve the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I would think this question is irregular. I would suggest that if it is a matter of urgency the question might be considered at the time of adjournment.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS OF FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Has a decision yet been reached with respect to the matter of the government paying all or a portion of the medicare premiums of federal civil servants and federal superannuates in the light of the problem created recently by the action of Ontario?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker. We have been having extensive consultations with the National Joint Council on this question and I would expect a conclusion would be achievable in the fairly near future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a supplementary question, might that be achieved before pay and pension cheques are issued at the end of this month?

Mr. Drury: The decision might be achieved, Mr. Speaker, before the end of this month, but I am not sure whether it would be in time to get it into the machinery for the issuing of pay cheques.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland has repeatedly shown great courage by accepting some responsibility for the election of the Prime Minister as leader of the federal Liberal party, is the Prime Minister willing to accept any blame for what happened in Newfoundland last weekend?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER—ADVANCE INFORMATION TO PROVINCES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Have the provinces or provincial premiers been given any advance information on the contents of the white paper on taxation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of a statement by Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan last Friday that he had reason to suspect that the federal white paper on taxation would include mineral industry taxation measures "not as stiff as those recommended by the Carter report"?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, lots of people are speculating.

B.C. APPLES—ASSISTANCE IN SHIPMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the urgent need to move a shipment of British Columbia apples destined for New Zealand by the November 6 contract date, what assistance has his department been able to give to the B.C. tree fruits industry in order to ensure the loading and shipment of this cargo which is crucial to the welfare of the B.C. economy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have been in daily communication with the B.C. Tree Fruits Co-op and, indeed, with other people in British Columbia respecting this shipment, and my information is that all of the preparations and so on respecting the shipment are on time.

COMMUNICATIONS

METHOD OF PUBLICIZING POLICY STATEMENTS BY MINISTER

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Communications. In reference to the dial-direct plan to make the minister's utterances and audio press releases easily available to the radio stations throughout the land, are he or any of his task forces making plans to extend audio-visual services to users of the television media so as to avoid serious discrimination between these two elements?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Burton.]

FISHERIES

PROTECTION AGAINST OPERATIONS OF RUSSIAN TRAWLERS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Have permanent surveillance measures been taken in order to ensure that Russian fishing activity off our coasts will remain outside our 12-mile limit?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the increase in Russian activity off our coasts and the phasing-out of United States naval activity in Newfoundland, has the Minister of National Defence taken any steps to increase our national defence effort on the east coast in order to fill the void left by the Americans?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have no reason to increase the national defence effort because we believe at present it fits the requirements. Neither are we diminishing it. So far as the American operation is concerned, we expect to take account of it in our study of the situation.

Mr. Lundrigan: As a further supplementary question, can the Minister of National Defence indicate whether the statement by the Prime Minister last year that there would be an increase in "DND" effort to protect our own sovereignty was just a lot of Liberal hot air and false teeth?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

URBAN RENEWAL, VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for reporting to the House on housing matters. Because of the importance of urban renewal or redevelopment in Vancouver East, affecting some 1,300 acres, can the minister say when he expects to make a policy announcement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that a substantially similar question has been asked during the last few days and answered by the minister.

Mr. Winch: Mine is very specific, Mr. Speaker, relating to my own constituency.

Mr. Speaker: To that extent it should be placed on the order paper or discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Winch: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—ONTARIO'S USE OF FEDERAL PAYMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of the information he gave to the House that we have in the gallery as distinguished guests the Treasurer of Ontario and the Minister of Trade and Development for that province. I should like to ask the minister whether he is discussing with the provincial treasurer the use which the government of Ontario has decided to make of the $175 million or whatever amount was paid to that province for the purposes of the medicare plan?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to welcome the member back after his retreat from Winnipeg and to indicate that the Treasurer of Ontario and I are discussing a great many matters of mutual concern.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase or repeat my question. I want to ask the Minister of Finance to tell us whether he is discussing the propriety or desirability of the government of Ontario using the money allocated for medicare in ways other than payment for medicare?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, of all the things we are discussing, the propriety of the government of Ontario is not one.

TRANSPORT

CARIBOU-WOOD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE—IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has he held discussions with officials or ministers of the province of Nova Scotia regarding the possibility of improvement of facilities of the Nova Scotia-Prince Edward Island ferry service between Caribou and Wood Islands?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been a considerable exchange of correspondence and the matter has been resolved satisfactorily, although I am not sure that the final acceptance of our most recent proposal has come in from the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacEwan: Could the minister advise whether consideration has been given to adding an additional ferry to this service?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, that is one of the matters under consideration now.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is proud of the position taken by Mr. Jean Lesage in the National Assembly last week and will he show the same courage with regard to Mr. Lesage's position as he did concerning that of Messrs. Drapeau, Saulnier and Bertrand?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order on many counts, I am afraid.

GRAIN

BOXCAR DISTRIBUTION—OPPORTUNITY FOR OPPOSITION MEMBERS TO MEET RAILWAY OFFICIALS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the meeting called by the Minister of Transport with Canadian Pacific and Canadian National management concerning distribution of boxcars to grain shipping points in southern Saskatchewan, to which only Liberal Members of Parliament and Senators from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba were invited, would the minister now arrange a similar meeting for opposition M.P.'s and Senators in order that we may tell railroad management the problems in our constituencies as well?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to query the question of the hon. member.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, could I put this question on at ten o'clock, because this is rank discrimination on the part of the government?

INTEREST RATES ON FARM MORTGAGES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting

Inquiries of the Ministry

Minister of Justice or the Parliamentary Secretary. In view of the fact that thousands of people are concerned and many millions of dollars are involved, when does the minister intend to advise the Minister of Agriculture that interest rates on farm mortgages are subject to the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangment Act and must be reduced accordingly?

HISTORIC SITES

ARTHABASKA—RESTORATION OF THE SIR WILFRID LAURIER MUSEUM

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Following our correspondence in connection with the restoration of the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Museum in Arthabaska, I should like to ask him whether he will ask the Historic Sites and Monuments Board to speed up that study, in order to give the citizens of Arthabaska satisfaction in this connection?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that the hon. member's question is really urgent and I think that it could be put on the order paper. If I am wrong and there is real urgency, the House will be pleased to consider this question at the time of adjournment.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PATROLLING OF ARCTIC BY ARMY

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Does the Canadian Army make regular patrols in Canada's Arctic and if not, why not?

POLLUTION

LAKE ERIE—EFFECT OF DETERGENTS

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is it true that Lake Erie will be completely dead in one year if the use of detergents is not stopped immediately?

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member's question refers to a situation which may not happen for a year, the question might be placed on the order paper.

REVISION OF DAIRY POLICY

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question I was asked last week by the hon. members for Bellechasse and Lotbinière (Messrs. Lambert and Fortin) about the number of times the Canadian Dairy Commission met with the C.F.U. and the milk producers association, I would like to say there were nine meetings. Detailed reports of the meetings can be found on pages 86 and 91 of the 1968-69 report of the C.F.U.

ADDRESS DEBATE

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Jack Cullen for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, coming into the debate on the last day and having reviewed the speeches made throughout the debate, I would not wish to speak on matters that have been dealt with but would bring to the attention of the House a question that has recently arisen in connection with Parliament and this institution.

I have a very deep affection for this place. I have been away now for a week and it seems to me that one would not know Parliament was sitting except for a few desultory references in the newspapers—I am sure this has been the experience of other hon. members who have been out west—to the minister reviewing the grain situation on the prairies. It is a distressing fact and one that concerns me greatly that this institution, because of our own action and because of the attitude of the government of this country, is gradually being relegated to a position which is not in keeping with our heritage and our responsibilities.

It is a serious situation when I read in the press or in Hansard that there are some who would have speeches tabled instead of delivered, a course permissible in the United States House of Representatives. It distresses me to think that this institution would be asked to adopt a system which does not permit of that freedom of debate, that exchange of information, that clash of ideas which is of the essence in the preservation of Parliament.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might have remained. I know how busy he is—after all, I held that position myself. But during the course of an important debate it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister, as far as possible, to be in the House in order to secure the views of members in all parts of the House. This cannot be secured by reading Hansard. When the Prime Minister speaks it is not spontaneously but after some task force has placed the facts before him. Therefore I take it that his remarks on the last day of the session represented his considered opinion and regard for private members of parliament. I was not here that day—

An hon. Member: Where were you?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but I read what was said and I regard it as one of the most caustic and unjustified statements ever made by a Prime Minister concerning Members of Parliament. This is what he said of the Creditistes:

> Give them holidays and they vanish out of the picture. They become nobodies—they are just nil.

There is no member in this House of Commons who is a nobody or just nil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He dealt further with what this institution means a little later in that debate when he said:

> They do not have to govern, they have only to talk. The best place in which to talk, if they want a forum, is, of course, Parliament. When they get home, when they get out of Parliament, when they are 50 yards from Parliament Hill, they are no longer hon. members—they are just nobodies.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That, to me, was shocking in the extreme.

An hon. Member: Arrogance!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Arrogant? The words in the book of synonyms are not sufficient to describe it! I would have expected the Prime Minister to say at the earliest possible moment that those observations might well have remained unsaid, but they stand. That is his view, and it shows a contemptuous attitude to this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No matter in what part of the House a member sits, he is entitled not to be referred to or considered a nobody. He was sent here by the people. It was a statement that will haunt the Prime Minister for a long time to come.

In the current issue of Canadian Time there is a cartoon of the Prime Minister and he is sewing up and silencing a mouse or a rat.

Mr. Crouse: It is a beaver.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has tied it up with a great deal of thread or heavy cord. He has it tied up. As far as I am concerned, that represents his attitude to Parliament. We are tied up. We are nobodys. We sit, we speak, we are unheard and referred to as nobodies.

I have some satisfaction in knowing that about the same time as this happened Marshall McLuhan, who is often regarded as the conscience of this government, when speaking of Armstrong and Aldrin having arrived on the moon, said, "They are nobodies". The Prime Minister said that when we get 50 yards away from the House of Commons we are nobodies. It took Armstrong and Aldrin years of training, 7,000 scientists to work on the problem, and they travelled 235,000 miles into space to become nobodies. You and I can do it by going 50 yards away from the House of Commons!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What should I speak about? First, I will speak of this institution. I have read all of the contributions. I think we overdo it when one after the other and perfunctorily, as it were, we congratulate the mover and seconder. After the various leaders of the parties have done so, I think that is sufficient.

There have been some remarkable contributions. There has been information advanced, study and research revealed and, above all, there has been dedication. There have been complaints about the press gallery not reporting what takes place in the House of Commons. This is an institution that is avoided by this government. They have a perambulating system of ministers on a kind of musical chairs basis. Ministers are supposed to be here except when it is necessary to be absent. The Minister without Portfolio

(Mr. Lang) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) have had important duties which caused their absence in the last few days. Others have duties as well. Ministers should not be on a roster basis because if they do not want a question to be asked that comes within the particular ambit of any one minister and the question is directed to the Prime Minister he says in effect: Wait until the minister gets back. That is not Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said earlier that this institution has been degraded. I say it again and I say it with deep sorrow. I miss this House when I am away. I do not care on what side of the House members sit, there is something about this fraternity, its relationship and the recognition that those who sit opposite are entitled to the fullest consideration. All are trying to do something for their country, but the leader of the nation has said they are nobodys. It did not affect me, but the fact is that the people will regard this institution no higher than the regard the leader of the country has for this institution, in respect of which he holds the highest prerogative position.

What should I say of international affairs? I am not going to deal with that question except to refer to it in passing. All over the world people are laughing at Canada chasing after Mao and saying: "Won't you allow us to recognize you?" I can just hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) saying, "Here am I, Mao, take me."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a most preposterous position. If the Prime Minister were speaking about it he would say, "Me and Mao". That is a position being taken by this government. They are talking about recognition of Communist China at a time when in the U.S.S.R. there is a deep fear on the part of the people. Communist China intends to go to war. You cannot find a Chinese student in the U.S.S.R. or the Ukraine today. There used to be many Chinese students there. I asked where they were. I was told they were there until five o'clock one day and the next morning they were gone. The Soviet Union is afraid of that vast boundary line between their countries.

Last night President Nixon spoke. I hope his message hit home. It is easy to tell the United States what it should be doing. If their men were not dying in Viet Nam, our men in Canada might well be in the same position. The United States should not have gone in there in the first place, but they are in there and they cannot get out. To get out would mean a loss of prestige and bring about the greatest upheaval in Southeast Asia that has ever taken place.

I want to emphasize that recognition today by the government of Canada will be taken as approval of communism by those who have stood against communism in Southeast Asia throughout the years. We made a mistake in not granting recognition in the 1950's. Then it would have been a juridical act. It was not done. It was not done under Mr. King. It was not done under Mr. St. Laurent or Mr. Pearson or me. When my period as Prime Minister came, I reviewed that situation thoroughly; that was one of my reasons for being in Asia in 1958. And over and over again I found people in those Asian nations who have stood; while you and I have talked they have lived in the shadow of threatened communism which would destroy them. Their message was: "Do not recognize. Don't do it."

Again, after my recent visit to the U.S.S.R. and after speaking to some of the heads of that nation, I impress once more the danger of taking the course which the government seems bent on taking. What for? What will they get from it? I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he was over in Stockholm trying to get the Maoists to accept him, to enfold him, to take him in—that is exactly what was happening—what he was saying to them about wheat sales. He replied in effect: We are not discussing that. I can understand that, because the wheat sales which are being made to communist China, the recent ones, are from Australia, a country which is indirectly fighting against Communist China today in Viet Nam.

We hear about an economy drive. What drive? On one hand they are saving money by closing a number of missions, while at the same time the Speech from the Throne talks about establishing closer relations throughout South America. How much will be saved? How much more will they save than they lost when they caused the windows in this building to be removed, broke them up and put in new ones—several hundred thousand dollars worth, I understand? The windows in my office were perfectly acceptable, Mr. Speaker. I could see through them as clearly as I can see through this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But away went the windows. They smashed them up.

The Prime Minister said a while ago that he would add to his staff. He cannot. He cannot get any more people into that part of the building. They come from everywhere. I understand they are starting to wear badges so that one may not make the mistake of giving advice to another belonging to the same staff. What a ridiculous proposition is being heaped on the Canadian people by announcing that this government is engaging in economy!

I could deal further with this subject of economy and I could deal also with a government which has so little to do that it is starting to abolish lawyers. All lawyers, apparently, are crooked according to one of the ministers. Another minister is abolishing tobacco. And so they go on. And while they are doing these things the cost of living goes up to the highest point in history; interest rates are on the way to the moon; people are finding it difficult to live.

The Minister without Portfolio in charge of wheat has now left. Had it been otherwise, I would have addressed some remarks to him. One minister pleaded today that the government be given a little time; "we are looking into this; we are examining it". We ask what the government intends to do about the wheat situation, and the reply in effect is: We shall let you know in due course. While this is happening, tens and tens of thousands of acres in western Canada are under snow. Farmers are without any money at all to enable them to carry on. They cannot borrow from the banks because the banks have closed down in most cases as far as credit is concerned. I asked the government what it intends to do and the answer is given that the government is looking into the matter.

Sir, there is deep perplexity among the Canadian people. They are worried. They are concerned. They wonder what is going to happen next. There has been a kaleidoscopic series of things done outside Parliament and despite the views of Parliament. Nobody knows what will come next. This brings me to a matter with which I intend to deal in some detail.

I have said on occasions that this government seems determined to abolish the monarchy. Let no one deny that this is their purpose and objective. I should not be speaking on this subject today but for the fact that yesterday I examined certain books. In 1968, on December 13, I said:

> Some advocate a republic. I think if we had a republic in Canada it would end Canadian independence. The monarchy cannot be abolished except by constitutional amendment. But lo and behold, Time magazine has come out with a story this week, and this magazine always has its ear close to the government. I quote:
> "Last week, thinking aloud in the Liberal caucus, the PM said the government hopes to "Canadianize" the monarchy by quietly "depersonalizing" the Queen's role in favour of more emphasis on the constitutional position of the Governor General—by, for example, replacing the name of the Queen with that of the Governor General on all official documents."

There were some who said there could not be any basis for that. It was explained that the Prime Minister was thinking out loud; he did not mean anything by it. It was one of those statements which had been made but it should not be regarded too seriously. Let us take this document called the Speech from the Throne. But where is the Throne in this speech? What does it say about Her Majesty the Queen who is part of the Parliament of Canada and cannot be removed except by a constitutional amendment at the wish of the people of Canada?

These words would not have been spoken a few years ago by General Vanier or by the Right Hon. Mr. Massey. I can just imagine what they would have said if they had found this speech placed before them in its present wording. They believed in the monarchy. They realized what the record of the monarchy had been. They recognized that had it not been for the monarchy French Canadians would have no rights today and would long since have been absorbed by the United States. They realized that it was under the monarchy that our freedom was built, that it was under the monarchy in Canada, many years before it took place in the United Kingdom, that slavery was abolished, that it was here in Canada, by action of the parliament at Westminster, that freedom was brought about, that the French language and religion were protected. What happened to those from our country who went across the line to Massachusetts or Rhode Island or New Hampshire or other states? All such rights disappeared.

What does this Speech say?

> I was also pleased to make a goodwill tour of the four Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean . . . These visits abroad were made on the advice of the government and with the encouragement of Her Majesty.

I must say Her Majesty did not have much opportunity to give encouragement, because a week before the journey was made they did not even know they had to secure her consent before her representative left on the journey.

Yet the decision as to the journey had already been made. Mr. Speaker, the proper description of this government, as of every other government under the monarchical system, is "My government". It has always been the description used until this time. Now, it is out.

• (12:10 p.m.)

The Speech continues:

May I say, too, that Her Majesty's interest in Canada, and in Canadians and their affairs, will bring the Queen—

To Canada during the coming summer. What colossal effrontery ever permitted the government to use the words "Her Majesty's interest in Canada"? Her Majesty is part of Parliament, Mr. Speaker.

I now bring to your attention the changes that have been brought about during the last few weeks. First let me begin by referring to the British North America Act. Section 9 provides:

The Executive Government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

There is no question whatever about that. That has been accepted by every Prime Minister from Macdonald up to and including Pearson. That is what the constitution provides.

Then section 17 provides:

There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

So, first, executive authority rests with the Queen. That is definite, final and clear under the constitution and has always been so accepted. Indeed, it was accepted by this government in January, 1969.

Ever since 1958 there has been published each year a book that is regarded as the bible of the Canadian public service. It is entitled: "Organization of the Government of Canada". This is the official guide to Canadian governmental operations, and I should like to inform the House how this Government has rewritten this book, which is now published in loose-leaf form.

The first decision the government made was that the constitution was wrong. I have already read to the House what the constitution says about the executive power. In the January, 1969, edition of this loose-leaf book section 3 provided:

Executive power in Canada is vested in the Queen by the British North America Act, 1867. It consists of (a) statutory power, which is derived from that Act and from legislation of Parliament and (b) prerogative power, which may be described as a residual authority of the Sovereign as head of the State. The Governor General is the Queen's representative in Canada. The Governor in Council exercises executive functions on behalf of the Queen.

That is what the record has shown throughout the years, and it is in accordance with the constitution. But we now see the handiwork of one of the triumvirate that joined the Liberal party, namely, the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). When the question of a republic for Canada was presented to the Liberal meeting in the city of Montreal two years ago, they made their views known in regard to the monarchy. The Secretary of State voted for abolition. The Prime Minister did not vote because he said there were other, more important things. One statement he made, which has never been denied, was that he considered this matter of lesser importance than skiing or even snowshoeing. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said he did not vote because he did not want to interfere with the trend.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what has now been produced? No longer, as in the constitution, is the executive power in Canada vested in the Queen. The new section 3 provides:

Executive power in Canada is exercised by the Cabinet and carried out in the name of the Governor General who acts formally on the advice of the Privy Council. Cabinet ministers who make up the government of the day are, therefore, all Privy Councillors and as such take collective responsibility for giving advice to the Governor General, advice which by convention he is bound to accept.

Thus the government changed the course of years in July, 1969. It has altered the constitution. This new wording is contrary to what the constitution provides. The constitution has been wiped aside by a bureaucratic directive. Added to the directive are the words: "Previous pages are to be destroyed." I will come to that in a moment.

What must be destroyed is dealt with in summary in this book. As to the executive, it is perfectly clear that the former section is to be destroyed or removed. The directive is: "Remove and destroy papers." The change in the constitution has been made by illegal methods, by evasive and subterranean conduct on the part of this government.

Then other sections to be destroyed, such as various named documents. Reference is also made to legislation. The legislative situation is dealt with as well and the wording changed once again. The old pages that have been with us for years and years and years are now to be destroyed.

With regard to the next matter I hope a mistake has been made in the description, because no replacement has been provided. There are not many ministers present in the chamber who are following me with the attention that ministers usually display. Section 1-SO-2 deals with the Parliament of Canada. The heading is "The Sovereign" and the subheading "Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II." It provides:

> Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II is the Queen of Canada, the Royal title being "Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith".

Then the Governor General and Commander in Chief, His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener, is dealt with as the Queen's representative. As I say, I do not know whether a mistake has been made here, but it is of interest to note that that page is no longer in the current book on the organization in the Parliamentary Library. The instruction was that this among other pages was to be removed and destroyed. I would ask the government whether a mistake has been made in removing from this volume reference to the fact that there is a Queen. No reference is made to her except in a passing way on one or two occasions, when she is described as the Sovereign.

This represents to me, Mr. Speaker, the epitome and essence of what has been going on in this country as this government and its immediate predecessor have chiselled away, undermined and reduced to innocuity, as far as it is possible for government to do so, our cherished traditions. I venture the opinion that not even three ministers of the government realized that this had been done by the instructions of July, 1969.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but I must bring to the attention of the House that the time accorded to him under the rules has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: With the consent of the House, the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the government why it has done this. In January of this year the government stated that the Queen, almost in the words of the statute, was the person in whom the executive power rested. Why has this provision been deleted? Why do they substitute the government or the cabinet for the constitution, putting the cabinet in the position that they believe that they can get away with anything? That is just an example of one of the most serious things that has happened today. The government is now determined to take the step that will ultimately bring about this result.

Let me digress for a moment. Among other things I am concerned about the fact that Her Majesty the Queen is not to broadcast her traditional Christmas message. I hope this will be changed. I hope the Canadian government will make it clear that we would welcome this message. This is one occasion in the year when the Queen, either as the head of state or as the head of the Commonwealth, speaks to her peoples everywhere. We remember those dark days of December, 1939, when many of us wondered what the next year would bring forth, and when King George VI made that speech which is immortal. He quoted the words of an almost unknown poet.

So far as the Throne Speech is concerned the Queen's name has been brought into it in a shabby and discourteous manner. She has been given a kind of Judas kiss. She was left out of last year's Speech and I think out of the Speech the year before. In the present speech she was restored as though she were some person from some foreign land who has shown some interest in Canada. I repeat, there shall be one Parliament consisting of the Queen and Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons, with an executive government with authority of and over Canada declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

I am concerned over the degradation of Parliament. The members of the press gallery are condemned because they do not report Parliament. This institution will die if the government continues to operate as it does at the moment. At the moment there is only one minister here. Surely they are not too busy to attend. This is a very contemptuous way of treating an institution which today has become not the Queen's government but the Prime Minister's government.

An hon. Member: There are two ministers over there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let me make this perfectly clear. I should like to see some government members stand up and say to the Prime Minister of Canada that they believe in their hearts in the monarchy and are not going to be pushed along in this way any farther. This is what is being done. They are nobodies. If we are nobodies over here, I refrain from using the expression that the Prime Minister might apply to you if he was sitting here.

Sir, I have concluded. What has taken place through this directive is an effort on the part of this government, or three or four members of it, to bring about the end in this country of the monarchy and to establish a kind of republican system of government wherein the Prime Minister will be the head. He is not the head now, but in giving this instruction contained in the Speech from the Throne, as they still call it, he has reached the position where he can say, like Louis XIV: "L'état, c'est moi." As long as this institution stands and exercises its rights and privileges, that sort of view cannot be accepted.

If we are to bring about a republic—I am opposed to it but that does not mean other people are not entitled to their views—this shall not be decided by some bureaucratic outfit or several ministers who say, by administrative direction, burn, destroy and get rid of these institutions that have been acceptable throughout the years. Why change everything between January and July? Let the people decide. You members over there dare not deny the people of Canada the opportunity to vote on whether or not they want to be in a republic. Instead, by clandestine and secret means you are trying to bring about what you know in your own hearts—and the government knows—would not be acceptable to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to offer you my congratulations on the dignified and equitable manner with which you preside over our deliberations and I express the wish that you will continue to do so for a long time.

I also want to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both of them on this occasion made speeches that show a real concern for public affairs, a deep knowledge of Canadian politics and a sincere determination to take a full part in the development of constructive and efficient policies.

I may not be as amusing or interesting as the previous speaker, but I shall try to be more serious.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), as well as the leaders of the other parties and the hon. members who have spoken during this debate have done so with great dignity and generally without any bias. They made a general survey of the political situation inside and outside Canada.

I noticed that there was general agreement as to the alarming situation brought about by such problems as inflation, price increases, the cost of living, international insecurity, starvation in the world and the impatience of the young in face of our inability to solve their problems quickly.

Finally, I have noticed a general consensus to the effect that we should all work together very hard to seek and find solutions.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government proposes to call upon the House to study various papers, as well as legislative proposals intended to lower the voting age to 18, devise measures to fight pollution and general inflation, and reform social security to build a strong and productive country.

The Prime Minister, in the course of this debate, has referred, among other things, to Canada's human and material resources, constructive criticism on the part of the opposition, the needless pollution of air and water, the participation of the young people in our country's political life, inflation, the increase in the cost of living, the inequality of opportunities for well-being in the world, threats to the human race in general, the Arctic regions, Canada's sovereignty and many other subjects.

During the debates which will take place in this House about the bills or problems that will be considered, I hope that I shall have the opportunity to take the floor as often as possible. However, in case I could not do so in due course, I take this opportunity today to give my impressions about a few points in which I am particularly interested, namely the very serious situation prevailing at present in the Middle East, the recognition of the People's Republic of China in opposition to Nationalist China, the problem of prisoners' rehabilitation and of expunging criminal records and finally, of bail in general.

In the Middle East, Mr. Speaker, we all know that peace has practically never prevailed there since the end of the ice-age, when ice receded toward the North, Europe woke up to life from its lethargy and the green and fertile countries at the extreme end of the Mediterranean sea, well irrigated by then magnificent rivers, with rich pastures and thick forests, were scorched by the sun and became a desert.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the desert, the sun, solitude, and undoubtedly the recent discovery of huge oil fields have turned the Middle East into a hell where hatred and cupidity are the most prevalent feelings.

Christ came on earth, and so did Mohammed, the prophet, warrior and poet.

Today, the influence of great empires has almost completely disappeared in that region of the world and has given way to the exploitation of oil, but the desert still exists and so do hatred and cupidity.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) will soon visit the Middle East. I hope that through his good offices a solution will be found to this problem, because I believe that the cease fire which now prevails will soon end. With the present escalation, we are on the road to a world war, and that is very serious. I hope he will find the arguments able to convince all parties to accept a permanent cease fire until a solution acceptable to all is worked out.

In the first speech I had the honour to make in this House, in 1963, I proposed that we recognize Communist China. I am glad to see that this government entered into negotiations with the authorities of that country in view of this recognition which would permit Communist China to be represented in the United Nations. It is no use hiding like an ostrich while we sell that country wheat and seek other opportunities to trade with it.

It seems illogical to me not to recognize it. The recognition of that government as the real authority in that country does not indicate approval of such a system of government.

However I am anxious when I see that recognition of the People's Republic of China could perhaps bring about automatically the non-recognition of Nationalist China, Formosa.

It seems to me that we are not entitled to decide the political option of the citizens of the People's Republic of China or Communist China. I think it would be an error if our recognition of Communist China were conditional upon our severing of relations with Nationalist China.

I have already had occasion in the past to speak in favour of the rehabilitation of prisoners in our penitentiaries. In the meantime, the Ouimet Commission has presented its report and I hope the government will take steps as promptly as possible to implement the report's excellent suggestions.

We must make the public service accessible to those who have paid their debt to society. I believe courses can be set up in the penitentiaries for the purpose of preparing those prisoners who wish to enter the public service to do so, this without in any way suggesting that prisoners released from our penitentiaries should have immediate access to top positions. I feel that a probation system should also be set up so that those people would have to report on a regular basis and so that they could fully know that their cases are under constant study.

But how can we ask private industry to try to make it easier for a prisoner to rehabilitate himself if the government and the civil service do not set the example?

Of course, this proposal is related to others which I intend to make, such as, for instance, the destruction of criminal records. I shall not discuss this subject at length because a bill to that effect has been introduced and we shall certainly have every opportunity of discussing it.

Still, this measure does not go far enough and I believe that we must do our utmost so that criminal records be destroyed after a certain time, so that individuals who have paid their debt to society can again hope to rehabilitate themselves fully and contribute to Canada's productivity.

Now I should like to deal with the problem of bails in our courts of justice, with which I am particularly familiar since I had the opportunity to represent for some time in Montreal the attorney general of the province of Quebec. I always loathe seeing a person under arrest having to prove his right to be freed on bail. It is not up to the accused to prove that, but rather to the Crown.

It is amazing to see that the individual who, for instance, is arrested for having beaten his wife, upon a mere statement sworn very often during the night, has to spend the night in a prison cell, and that the next day, he is required to post a bail which he is often unable to provide.

I know of an individual who was arrested in Montreal two years ago—I do not want to give too many details as people might identify him—put on a plane by the provincial police, and sent to one of the western provinces, because he was charged with plotting to set up a book-making business. This is obviously a criminal act, but certainly no criminal act can justify that the accused be sent 2,000 miles away and forced to post a $10,000 bail on real estate. The individual in question knew no one in the western city who could bail him out and he had to spend five days in a jail cell while his father was lying on his acquitted.

I do not accept, Mr. Speaker, that a person be held on the mere statement of police authorities. Nobody should be arrested and forced to prove he has a right to freedom. If we recognize the principle that a person is deemed to be innocent until he has been proved guilty, I think the onus of responsibility for deciding whether or not bail is necessary should lie with the Crown and not with the individual.

Nobody should be forced to prove his right to freedom and if law enforcement officers fear that the individual might escape—which is impossible, since the world is too small—just let him run. A good riddance. But I do not believe that anyone charged with being a member of a betting syndicate will try to jump bail.

In my view, Mr. Vallières and Mr. Gagnon should not have been kept in jail for three or four years. I do not share their political opinions, but our system is such that individuals have to prove that they deserve to be set free. Should an individual not fulfil the obligations that bail entails, the Crown could always ask that such bail be annulled.

I find it totally unacceptable that an individual be deprived of his freedom during three or four years without having been found guilty. Our judicial system is badly organized in this respect. In the United States, a person may call upon an insurance company to put in bail for him. Here, it is just the opposite. It is quite difficult to find bail. Many individuals rot in prison cells while awaiting trial.

I have talked about Messrs. Vallières and Gagnon. They are lucky to have several friends or so-called friends to help them. What about all the unknown who have nobody to help them and who are kept in jail for the most trivial offence before their trial.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the entire bail system should be reconsidered keeping in mind that the burden of proof and the need of bail are the responsibility of the Crown and not of the individual.

Man may have conquered the moon and the world generally, but at the rate he is going, he will lose the earth. It is true that Canada cannot keep the peace throughout the world but we must redouble our efforts to deserve the wealth that we possess.

[English]

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the distinguished hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) I was reminded of an echo of yesterday, of the unregenerate critic of progress and reform. I could not help but wonder whether this man on his recent trip to Russia discussed tub-thumping techniques of a previous encounter. I am referring, of course, to the famous occasion when in the United Nations in New York the right hon. gentleman was supposed to have caused Mr. Khrushchev to have taken off his shoe and thumped the table. I was reminded that empty barrels give out most sound.

In his opening remarks he referred to the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not present in the House. I wonder if he was aware that his own leader was not present in the House and I wondered whether he spoke for the Conservative party.

It seems to me that he showed no understanding of the world for what it is. He criticized the program of this government because it was trying to reform Parliament. He referred to the roster system, and he referred to the degradation of Parliament. If he had his way, he would suffocate Parliament. He spoke about wheat sales but offered no suggestions. It was an eloquent and distinguished performance of professional opposition. He spoke of economy drives and showed that he had no understanding of economy. After all, what man who uses so many words so generously could understand the word economy? He referred to windows, and I think inadvertently tipped his hand by demonstrating to all of us something I long suspected, that he is far more concerned with windowdressing than with the substance.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillespie: He spoke of the monarchy. He seems to have forgotten that the constitution is a living thing, something which the Queen's husband reminded all Canadians about not very long ago. And he referred to the picture on the cover of Time magazine.

He called it a rat. I think if he looked more closely he would discover it was a rather battered beaver. Further if he looked closely I think he might also observe the true symbolism of the picture. Surely this was the battered beaver reclaimed by the Liberals and nurtured by them under the Pearson government, and which is now being restored to health under the Trudeau government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillespie: And that, Mr. Speaker, is what the Speech from the Throne has indicated to us all.

In speaking in this way about the Speech from the Throne debate you may detect a certain impatience in some of my remarks. I feel this debate has gone on too long. I think we may all be slightly weary with what may be described as our eight-day diet. It has not been the quality of the speeches which caused this feeling of weariness but more their quantity and their generality, the fact that there was no clear aim, no concerted purpose to the speeches.

Few of the speeches have been reported in the press. When we think about it, how could they have handled this veritable deluge, this bonanza of Parliamentary opinion, even if they were interested? Are they right that the people of Canada are not interested?

I suppose we could rationalize this occasion by saying this talk-fest has therapeutic value, rather like a psychologist's couch. It may even help to tranquilize our tensions, but there is an equal possibility that it may do no more than raise a yawn. Why not, then, four days next year?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillespie: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about two aspects of reform, the need to experiment with new mechanisms in federal-provincial-municipal planning, and the need to extend Parliamentary reform to include the important area of a Member of Parliament's productivity and the method by which he is compensated.

Recently a good deal of attention has been focused on the problems of the city. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens), in his stirring speech two nights ago, emphasized the importance of the city and of the planning and the environment of the city to the citizens of the future. He pointed out that a very large proportion of Canadians are living in cities now and that even more will be living in them within a few years.

I think we need to ask ourselves this question: How much are the cities of Canada going to have to say about the kind of cities they will become? After the agonizing events of recent years in the United States this is no idle question. Are our cities to be no more than passive bystanders as others unfold their grand designs for the benefit of the citizens of those cities?

The question that more and more people are asking today is simply this: How can the federal government ensure that its plans and programs for the city are in fact taking account of the needs of the city and, more particularly, are they in harmony with the future plans of the city itself? Is not the existing practice by Ottawa of consultation with a provincial government department or, worse still, with several separate provincial government departments, too indirect, cumbersome and inefficient in an age when the rate of change is accelerating enormously? Is it not time to consider new mechanisms to plan our growth and protect the quality of life in our cities?

By way of example, Mr. Speaker, the great metropolitan area of Toronto will expand in population in the next ten years by about the same amount that it has expanded and increased its population over the previous 150 years. I am saying, then, that I think there is a real urgency, particularly in the larger city systems, to consider new ways of relating the federal presence to those most concerned with planning the shape and the form and the enjoyment of the city, and I would like to use several examples to show the kind of problems that have occurred within the last year within the Metro Toronto region.

A year ago last summer an announcement was made about the expansion of the international airport at Malton. This expansion was planned with absolutely no local consultation of any kind. There had been consultation between the federal government and Queen's Park but not with the planning directors or elected officials of the municipalities most directly affected. As a result much of the planning had to be withdrawn because it simply did not reflect the aspirations of those who were going to be most affected.

More recently the provincial government at Queen's Park has recognized the need to plan for the future of this area. In a press release issued on October 9 they refer to a new series of zoning regulations for the Toronto International Airport. These regulations divide it into six zones, and certain compatible land use zones are associated with them. In their press release they indicate that they have been involved in this process of planning the urban environment around airports since 1957. But it took them 12 years to do anything about it. It took them 12 years to provide the municipalities that were going to be most affected with guidelines that would enable the municipalities to determine the kind of communities they should build.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to review briefly one or two of the remarks I made before we adjourned for lunch, so that the remainder of my speech will appear in context.

What I was arguing for was a new mechanism to reconcile the interests of the federal-provincial and municipal authorities in planning the urban environment and I stated that I wished to cite some specific examples of failure in this regard. I referred to the planning and the expansion of Malton airport and perhaps I should just review quickly one or two aspects of that plan and the areas where I feel it failed.

Almost immediately after the plan was announced a year ago last summer, there was an outcry from those most affected. Plans for schools, a community college, a hospital, and public housing, all had to be reconsidered. Private housing projects on lands zoned for residential use were put on ice. Plans for parks and recreation areas were hoisted and newly developed traffic pattern figures became obsolete. Subsequently, the airport proposal was modified to accommodate local views and the decision was taken to build a second airport which decision, let it be said, would have had to be taken within a few years in any event because the air space over Malton was expected to reach capacity by the mid-1980s.

The point is, had the local levels of government been directly involved with the federal and provincial governments from the start of the planning process, these mistakes would not have occurred. It is likely that the modified expansion could have begun six months sooner to the advantage of three million passengers and, just as important, local projects affecting the whole area would not have been delayed.

This experience, together with the zoning which the provincial government announced within the last month, argues for the direct involvement on a consultation basis of the appropriate borough, city or metro planning groups when anything as important as an airport is concerned. If we continue to see the process of consultation in terms of a ladder that is to say initiative by the federal government, translated to the provincial level which in turn translates the interest to the municipal level, we will see a lack of real consultation about local interests.

As I pointed out in my remarks this morning, the paragraph from the provincial government's press release made it clear that there had not been very much meaningful consultation with the municipalities until recently. The press release also pointed out that the provincial government had been aware of the problems of noise since 1957. I quote: "in January, 1969, it was found possible to initiate discussions between the Department of Municipal Affairs and the local municipalities on the one hand, and the federal Department of Transport on the other, regarding the affects of present and future aircraft noise on surrounding areas."

It is my contention that it would have been much better had the local authorities been involved from the beginning; that instead of being asked to react to a situation which was in large part created for them they should have been given an opportunity to participate, and to shape a plan. I say that the up and down the ladder approach to consultation between the federal and municipal authorities is not satisfactory in this day and age. We should be thinking about a round table discussion. Surely, this is the sort of arrangement we should strive for today when speaking of inputs and consultation.

In this regard, I should like to go a step further and cite a recent experience in Toronto concerned with the possibility of relocating the Island Airport. A number of editorials and press comments have appeared under such headlines as "Airport Arrogance", and I will quote from the Toronto Star of October 24:

> Despite representations from many quarters for a co-ordinated development of the whole harbour area, the city and Metro have been completely ignored. The Harbour Board, Queen's Park and the federal Department of Transport have gone their merry way without so much as consulting them.

There have been scare headlines as well. There have been those about fear of pollution from the lakeside airport, and others of its kind, affecting the whole quality of life of a major urban area. The time has come to consider a specific approach to this problem. Before I make my suggestion for the solution to this problem, I wish to say I am not talking about just one airport. I am talking about a system of airports. In the metropolitan region today there are five airports, Toronto Island, Malton, Downsview, Buttonville and Maple.

What we must think about is planning an airport system for this major developing urban area. It cannot be done on an ad hoc basis of first doing something with Malton and then a second airport to provide for the future after the limited expansion at Malton. Nor can it be done on an ad hoc basis by examining a possible new site on the lakeside to replace the Island airport. We must think in terms of a complete system which recognizes the various kinds of carriers, the commercial carriers, chartered aircraft and general aviation.

It is of some significance that in the metropolitan Toronto area 90 per cent of the air movements, that is to say the take-offs and landings, are accounted for by general aviation, that is business, pleasure and training aircraft, and not by commercial carriers. It is this kind of exploding growth situation with which we must grapple. We cannot do it just in terms of federal-provincial consultation. We have to provide for the municipal input where it counts. We have to provide an opportunity for the planners and the elected officials of the municipalities to participate in the planning of this system so that their plans for the future with respect to recreation areas, housing, transportation, schools and hospitals fit in with the over-all plan.

The time has come to consider an approach to the formation of a new institution which I would propose as a metropolitan region airport board. There is precedent for this sort of arrangement. In 1911 the federal government and the city of Toronto became joint partners in the Toronto Harbour Commission which, incidentally, is a very happy precedent and which has spawned at least seven other similar arrangements.

This was an opportunity for the federal and municipal governments to plan together for the benefit of this city within a national plan.

I think a metropolitan airport board should be formed. It would be a planning agency. Its powers would be those of a planner rather than an operator. It would be composed of federal representatives of the Department of Transport, provincial government officials, municipal representatives, and other interests involved including representatives from the Toronto Harbour Commission which is now part of the airport system. I feel the municipal representatives should be both officials and elected representatives, those accountable to the people of the city. As I indicated, there is precedent for this arrangement and I think that its urgency is now compelling.

The other subject I wish to speak about, Mr. Speaker, is an aspect of parliamentary reform which I do not think has received all the attention it deserves in this debate on the Speech from the Throne. I refer particularly to the productivity of members of parliament and their compensation arrangements. The new importance of the standing committees requires a new appreciation on the part of all hon. members and the community at large of the need to improve the arrangements of members of parliament in order that they can be more productive. They have less time to spend in their offices and their time, therefore, must be spent more effectively. I would like to see a general recognition by members of parliament that the present arrangements are not satisfactory. I recognize that we cannot change all of them now, and may not be able to for some years. I am referring specifically to the problem of space. We should extract a commitment that something will be done.

What self-respecting businessman, professional man, labour union leader or member of the community would try to carry on his work as we do within six feet of an over-active electric typewriter? What self-respecting person trying to serve the kind of constituents we are can operate with one telephone line? It is a little like building a single track railway system between two points without any sidings. You can go in one direction, but until you have completed that direction nothing can come back from the other. Surely, the time has come for all members of parliament to support the idea of two telephone lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillespie: Surely the time has come for hon. members to insist on having some kind of telephone answering service. This is the most important institution in Canada. If we are using our single telephone line and someone calls our office, there is no way that person can leave a message. Similarly, if we do not happen to be in our office and if our secretary for some good reason is not in the office and someone calls, there is no way that person can leave a message. It is now time for us to recognize these shortcomings and move to correct them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillespie: The area of compensation arrangements for members of parliament is a delicate one. It is time we told the Canadian public what the situation is. I think the professional paper prepared by Mr. Horst G. Wolff, published by the Canadian Tax Foundation and circulated to many, if not all, members is a very useful contribution to this whole question with respect to expenses and compensation arrangements for members of parliament. It is very useful in helping us present the case to the Canadian public. It traces the history and points out the inconsistencies and the lack of a single guiding principle. It attempts to distinguish between the confusions of salaries and expenses and traces how these came about. It points out that the Carter Commission recommended changes and it supports the principle the Carter Commission endorses. One of the recommendations reads:

> Members of Parliament should be treated on the same basis as other employees and so should be required to bring their allowances into income, and at the same time should be allowed to deduct their expenses of earning employment income including election expenses. We would expect that it would be accepted that the regular place of business of a Member of Parliament is in his riding, so that all expenses incurred while in Ottawa and in travelling to and from Ottawa would be deductible as long as they fell within the limits established for such expenses.

In other words, the Carter Commission proposal recognizes the dislocations which are occasioned by having two bases—a constituency base and an Ottawa base. This article points out clearly that the prevailing practice in business and the professions is for businessmen to deduct out-of-pocket expenses incurred away from their place of business. For instance, if a businessman or, indeed, anyone else, were to come to Ottawa to appear before one of our committees his expenses in coming to Ottawa would be deductible; they would not be added to his income as they are by inference to ours.

Let it be made clear that I am not advocating an increase for hon. members at this time. What I am saying is this: we have to change the system of which we have become captives. It seems to me the time is ripe. We are approaching parliamentary reform from many points of view, including that of concern for making our committees more effective. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the time to examine the aspect of parliamentary reform to which I have referred.

An appropriate way to do so would be by establishing a commission which would be given the task of determining what should be the appropriate level of remuneration for Members of Parliament by comparing the levels applicable in industry, the professions and the public service. More particularly, it is important that such a commission should recommend a way of providing for future changes in the salaries of parliamentarians. The present system was designed for part-time members. It is an ad hoc arrangement and in my view it is no longer appropriate since it no longer serves the cause which it espouses, that is to say, the health of parliamentary democracy.

Let there be no mistake about this: Members of parliament will be asked to do more, not less; legislation will become more complicated and more technical, and the effectiveness of members of parliament will become increasingly important to the operation of this system, not less. To point a finger at an example which may be useful in this context, I should like to remind hon. members that some time ago the United States recognized the importance of setting up a public commission to determine the appropriate levels and methods of compensating their members of parliament. I refer to the Kettle Commission which reported not long ago.

I think the commission should include members who are well-known in business life, in labour organizations and perhaps in one of the professions. I am thinking of a university president. Unless the system of public service is changed, good men will not serve in parliament in the future, not because they are unprepared to do so but because parliament and the people are not prepared to face a basic issue. Formation of such a commission as I have proposed would be an important step in the process of parliamentary reform, of bringing this institution up to date; of preserving the role of parliament in an increasingly complex age; of ensuring respect for this institution and for the quality of its representation; in short, of developing a strong and healthy parliamentary democracy in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): In rising to take part in this debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I feel that this occasion is intended to be a vehicle by means of which members of parliament try to survey the forest so that they may at a later date in the session examine the various trees which compose that forest.

To begin with I wish, of course, to congratulate the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) for their contributions as mover and seconder of the address in reply. Looking over the Speech from the Throne, which, of course, is provided for His Excellency by the government, one becomes somewhat disappointed. After going through a great deal of chaff one finds only the occasional grain of wheat. One of these grains of wheat, in my judgment, is the promise to lower the voting age of Canadians from 21 to 18. I believe that, on balance, this is a useful and forward step. Nevertheless, it seems to me there is something faintly fraudulent about the way in which it is presented. The Speech from the Throne reads, in part:

> A disturbing element in many countries of the world has been the rising tide of unrest, particularly among young people.

Then, this notion of lowering the voting age is put forward. The impression is also left that at the present time young people under the age of 21 are nobodies and that no account is taken of them under our electoral system. This, of course, is not the case. Under our system the unit of representation is made up on the basis of the population of a constituency, not on the basis of the number of voters. This means that even if everyone in a particular constituency were over the age of 21 their collective voting strength would be no greater than that of another constituency in which the vast majority were too young to cast votes. In arriving at the unit of representation, everybody is taken into account who was resident at the time of the previous census, even babes in arms. Those who have the responsibility of exercising the franchise do so on behalf of all. So, the question is not one of whether young people should have a voice in government or not, but solely one which concerns who should vote on their behalf. I agree that with the passing of time increasing numbers of young people are self-sufficient and independent at an earlier age, as well as being better educated. I believe it is appropriate that the voting age should be lowered on this account, especially when one recognizes that we are thinking in terms of a minimum voting age and that the average Canadian will cast his vote for the first time at the age of 20.

Going through this speech, one finds a paragraph which reads:

> History, geography and economics have placed certain of our citizens at a disadvantage. Under legislation enacted during the last session of parliament, the government is establishing programs to reduce these inequalities.

The speech goes on to refer to various plans which the government has entered upon together with provincial governments in those areas. This is too big a subject to go into at the moment. My only comment is that from my experience the promise of these development plans is much greater than any performance they have shown, up to the present, at least

Reference is also made to reforming the tax system, and a white paper is going to be brought down next Friday evening. I take special note of the word "reform". A little later on in the speech the government talks of reforming the rules of the House of Commons. The word "reform" is, of course, an overworked cliche, one that has been worn threadbare by every Liberal government I have seen. I presume it keeps them in good standing in the Reform Club, and this is the only reason I can think of for the use of the word.

I find its use in this context slightly objectionable; the implication is that reform is required because of delinquency. We may have delinquent taxpayers, but we have very few delinquent members of parliament. We may be delinquent in our attendance, but to look upon members of parliament as objects in need of reform, or to leave that impression, does this institution a disservice, I think. However, this point is not of major concern to me.

The speech also refers to inflation—I will defer my remarks on that score till later—and also to the very important problem of pollution. Then, near the end of the speech we find a very high level paragraph, one that looks as though it might have some potential:

> Our aim is a strong and productive country soundly equipped to face the future; but we are equally concerned with the individual Canadian, his rights and his interests. The Government regards national progress and individual fulfilment as indivisible components of its mandate.

Those are excellent sentiments with which I agree 100 per cent. However, the next paragraph is on a slightly lower plane and talks about the size, complexity and fallibility of the structures that technology imposes on modern societies, and so on. Then comes the punch line, the answer to this question which in my view is of overriding importance:

To this end, Criminal Code amendments will be submitted to you that would regulate wire-tapping—

I see nothing in the speech about our relations with Peking, though the Government did express some hope in this regard last year and negotiations have been conducted in Stockholm since that time. I think that if Confucius were alive today he would probably say: "He who wears his heart on his sleeve near Arctic circle gets cold shoulder"!

The over-all impression created by the Speech from the Throne is of flatness and insipidness; a speech just about as inspiring as some cold porridge. Worse still, it has the hollow ring of insincerity to it. In places it is reminiscent of the quack medicine man who is trying to look very wise, when in reality he has not got a clue as to what ails his patient, and much less how to treat him. Instead of providing the inspiration of national purpose, the speech has the faint but pungent odour of studied deceit. It is like the confidence man trying to lure new and gullible victims to a shell game. It has a wandering eye peeled for the gullible and the unwary, the young, the aged, the poor, the ill-housed.

I believe that if governments were to spend more of their time providing the environment and climate in which people could do the things they want to do for themselves, so that people can realize in a more reasonable way their own ambitions, then they would provide better government than those governments that pretend they have the magic answer to all the ills to which mankind is heir. The aim of politics, of course, as of all else, is the good life. But the good life is something that cannot be comprehended within some phrase or formula about any political or social order. Even if it could be so comprehended, it could not be brought about in the main by political means.

I, as a Conservative, contend that the most that a politician can do is to ensure that some, though by no means the most important, conditions in which the good life can exist are present. And, more important still, the politician must prevent fools and knaves from setting up conditions which make an approach to the good life impossible.

Many of the greatest evils of our time have been created by men who mocked and exploited human misery by pretending that good government—at least, their idea of good government—could offer Utopia. I believe that what Canada requires is a higher level of leadership than we have experienced during the last few years.

As for leadership that will inspire, stimulate and improve this great country of Canada, this government seems to be bankrupt and completely impotent. I think it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who some years ago said that the 20th century would belong to Canada. Almost three quarters of the 20th century have now passed, and for approximately 50 of these years the Canadian people have entrusted their future to the hands of Liberal leadership. Where now is this country that had such promise? We are floundering in a wilderness of inflationary spirals, in the quicksands of burdensome debt and ever-increasing high taxation. Worst of all, in the hearts and souls of increasing numbers of Canadians there is mounting dissatisfaction with life in Canada. In saying that I am in no way being disloyal to my country. I believe that Canada probably has the greatest opportunity of any nation on the face of the earth. But this opportunity will not be realized by accident or happenstance; we must apply ourselves to the task of bringing our hopes to fruition.

I believe governments have the responsibility to fix or to highlight national goals; not the national goals that they themselves, as individuals, would like to impose upon the country, nor even the goals that the Canadian people may think they desire. That may sound contradictory, but this requirement is very difficult and very complex. We, as Canadians, have to fix goals for ourselves. We must apply the intelligence and learning available to us at this time in order that in the future we may provide the best environment and the best conditions for ourselves and our children. When and if we, as Canadians, can arrive at an intelligent consensus based on facts and scientific research, combined with human considerations, as to what we want to be as a country and how we want to live, then the government should discover this consensus and make progress.

I am reminded of Flanders where you can go from one town to another for the most part through crooked and winding roads. Suddenly, you drive over a rise and find a church directly ahead of you. This is true of small towns and villages. The church sits right on the main street. From then on, the road is straight and direct. I inquired of the local people why this was so and was told that the churches were built before the villages. Apparently the roads were built on the paths used by pilgrims moving from one church to the next—from one centre of safety to another. They wandered on a very circuitous course until they could see their objective, then they made a beeline for it. It is this same sense of purpose we, as Canadians, need at this time. There is a great onus on all levels of government to direct us on our way to our goals.

This government seems to be the helpless victim of statistics, graphs and charts. It parades charts, graphs and other statistics in respect of urbanization, growth, inflation, trends of behaviour among the youth in our large cities and then cowers before these things like a terrified rabbit that has been suddenly caught in the stare of a cobra. I do not believe that we, as Canadians, need be victims of these trends. If we are, then they will destroy us. I believe we can change these trends.

Let us consider the important matter of pollution. It is not overpopulation that is causing pollution in Canada, but rather overcrowding in a few large metropolitan areas. Canadian people are crowding in a helter-skelter manner in a few large metropolitan areas which do not provide space for human dignity or even the minimal space requirements for mammals. This reminds me of the behaviour of insects; overcrowding without recognition whatsoever for the needs of our biosphere. This puts nature out of balance. We must realize that we are part of nature. We cannot separate ourselves from nature, from the food chain or anything else. We are part of it. We upset the balance of nature at our own peril. Overcrowding is one of our worst evils. It has been proven that overcrowding produces irrational behaviour on the part of mammals. There is increasing evidence to support the theory that overcrowding in our environment—in housing—contributes to crime, violence, drug addiction, mob violence and attempts at mob rule in our cities. This is a weighty subject with which I do not intend to deal further at the present time.

There was a time when the great fear of mankind was the fear of war, conquest, famine and death; the four horsemen of the Apocalypse. The sources of fear have changed. As far as Canada is concerned, the problems of prime importance are pollution, more debt than we can handle as individuals and governments, inflation and discontent. In some cases these problems result in a resignation to a feeling of futility in life itself.

I have spoken very briefly about pollution and the necessity for improved planning for our environment in the future. Let me now turn to debt, and I will not speak too long on this subject. It is obvious and should be self-evident that we, as individual Canadians, and at three levels of government, cannot continue to go deeper and deeper into debt at higher and higher interest rates with the resulting higher carrying charges. We must reverse this trend to recover our position. If we do not do so, then something must give. I am sure the result will be either a complete collapse or a galloping inflation.

In this connection let me quote from something said last year by the chairman of the Standard Oil Company. He said:

> The ability of each succeeding generation to improve its society is limited by what that generation is capable of producing and that applies to ideas as well as services. It takes the tangible fruits of somebody's work to support the philosopher in his ivory tower, and the student in his classroom.

I quote this to help us realize that there is no way we can provide plenty for ourselves in a meaningful way or in an economic sense through bookkeeping or by "jiggery-pokery" of some sort. The total wealth of a community, be it large or small, can only be in proportion to that which it produces.

In this connection it is the duty of the Canadian government to assist in restoring the dignity of work and production. We must stop eroding incentives to improve. I do not intend in any way to be anything but humanitarian, but the good Samaritan did not act in the way he acted because of any law, and one cannot create good Samaritans by statute. Those who cannot provide for themselves must be provided for, and wherever it is at all possible welfare assistance should be given in such a way it will help the recipient to walk rather than sleep on that bed of pain on which he must lie indefinitely.

In the case of inflation it behooves the government to set a good example. According to recent reports the government boasts of a surplus of $810 million in the first six months of this fiscal year. I think this is a good thing. But under those circumstances I wonder why the government felt it so necessary to borrow new money that they increased the effective interest rate on this year's savings bonds to 8 per cent. This, of course, will mean that all the savings bonds which were previously issued, and are still held, will be turned in on the new issue. In the case of last year's bonds alone, of which there were over $3 billion worth, the interest which will be paid out on those bonds for the last year will amount to about $185 million. Because the interest rate has been increased, the government will still have to pay back double the amount of money, if the coupons are not clipped of course. I am talking about these "double your money" savings bonds which the government is issuing at the present time I think this is a case where the government should have kept the interest at last year's level, provided they were not in a position of needing too much new money. In that way they would have gotten a little; but they are so desperately in need of new money, apparently, that it was necessary to go to these extraordinary new lengths to obtain it, and in the process contribute gas to the flames of inflation.

There will be a cost of roughly $185 million to the government this year and every succeeding year on this account. This is $185 million which will be going to the people who own bonds. I do not begrudge it to them. If anyone has saved enough that he can afford to buy government bonds, then from his point of view he is entitled to the best interest rate he can obtain. But these people are not the ones in this country who need this $185 million most at the present time. In addition, this surplus, of course, is caused by the fact that taxes on profit and income are up for the first six months of this year about $1 billion. Part of the increased revenue is made up by the 2 per cent social development tax which in the last six months amounted to $225 million. But the extra interest the government is now paying out for their new savings bonds will completely wipe out this revenue from the social development tax which was collected in the last six months. This, in my judgment, does not make sense.

Back on November 1, 1967, almost two years ago, Louis Rasminsky, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, said this:

> It is a hard fact, and not a political or social judgment, that over a period of time what we can consume depends on what we can produce. If this fact is not reflected in appropriate restraint and prudence on the part of government—all governments—management and labour, then we shall have to adjust to hard economic reality in other more painful ways.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada said that two years ago, but so far as the government is concerned it apparently fell on deaf ears.

Now, I said something about discontent. This is not a fully satisfactory word for what I have in mind, but it is the best word I can find to explain it—"discontent". There is a disillusionment and lack of morale, if you like, among the Canadian people at the present time. What are some of the reasons for this discontent? I think it is partly because of the fact that Canadians are led to believe and are told by governments that they are the inevitable victims of certain trend about which nobody can do anything, or else they are told by a government that that government has a simple solution for everything.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt to hon. member. His time has expired unless it is the disposition of the House to give unanimous consent that he continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacLean: I am very grateful to the House for extending this privilege and I hope not to abuse it unduly. I do not believe Canadians will take kindly to the suggestion that their hopes are to be foiled by the fickle finger of fate. They will not be satisfied if their aspirations are to be dashed. They believe with the poet that it matters not how strait the gate, how charged with punishment the scroll; I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul. Canadians feel they have a right to live in a country governed by a government which will provide the climate in which they can realize their ambitions.

Rural people are disillusioned and demoralized by the fact that they have an uneasy feeling they do not count as full citizens in this country. They feel that governments are not concerned about them and their way of life because of their own worth as citizens but are concerned with them only so long as they are producers of food—and the cheaper the food the better. This is not good enough. Rural Canada and the small towns in Canada have contributed disproportionately I believe to all the advances in leadership, the professions and learning in Canada. That fact should be recognized. Rural Canada is about as good an environment as one could hope to live in this modern day,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean: —provided the economic situation is such that living a rural life is possible.

One thing that I believe is distressing the urban people is the unsatisfactory condition of their environment. They move to the suburbs in an attempt to get some privacy and property of their own. They are overrun by the unplanned growth of our large cities. They fight traffic to get to work. There is no place to park their car when they get there. They have no quiet. Wages are eroded by inflation. They have no real privacy. The wage scales and so on which attracted them to the city, and which looked like gold, have turned to tinsel. They have no opportunity at their level of income to provide any solitude for themselves or their children. They do not have an opportunity to see anything of nature. Fifty years ago Canadian fathers took for granted that on a Saturday they would be able to take their sons fishing. Even that simple joy is far beyond the economic ability of most Canadians today.

The fact is that our modern cities which are growing without any rational plan are not providing an environment suitable for the development of healthy minds or bodies in human beings. Canadians who live in urban centres are frustrated because the things they try to get for themselves are removed from them sometimes by other individuals, sometimes by corporations, and sometimes by governments, and they seem to have no control over this situation. There is an unplanned and irrational sprawling of our large urban centres. Our economy and our tax structure is of such a nature that more and more Canadians are forced into these huge conglomerates of humanity for economic reasons but against their own will.

In this connection we, as Canadians, should be ashamed of the fact that we are at least 20 years behind the United States in the matter of city environment; we are at least 50 years behind the United Kingdom and 330 years behind Sweden. The city of Stockholm has had a city planning board for 330 years, and any one who goes to Stockholm realizes that immediately. Yet, we are still going on the false assumption that we, as Canadians, can just let things go as they will, that there is lots of space, of resources, of fresh air and water. This is not so unless it is handled and planned intelligently for the general good of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne opening the second session of the twenty-eighth parliament, which I greet with both enthusiasm and bitterness.

My enthusiasm derives from this unique parliamentary experience which provides me with an opportunity to express the opinion of the whole population on the legislative measures introduced by the government.

That experience of participatory democracy adds a new dimension and a new responsibility, although not always easy, yet exciting indeed, to the member's function. It entails serious thinking and the taking of a position for which he stands accountable to the population. That experience proves wonderful and I should like to thank my worthy colleagues most sincerely for it and for their kindness to me as well.

Mr. Speaker, I also view the opening of this second session with some bitterness. As a matter of fact, I was expecting the government to tackle the problem of the disintegration of our society, to act immediately and to include in its legislative program concrete measures for a balanced economy.

I was disappointed because the Speech from the Throne is remarkable more for what was left out of it than for what is in it, and that is tragic. Solutions are slow in coming. If the necessary steps are not taken today, tomorrow may be too late.

Up to now there has been too much delay. Society is disintegrating and we all see it.

During the recess every one of us spent his time usefully I guess, in his constituency or elsewhere.

As for myself I took this opportunity to get around my constituency very often in order to meet my electors and discuss with them present problems and matters of interest to them. In fact, many economic and social problems are now facing the population I have the honour to represent. From all these meetings, these discussions there emerges a common denominator, a governing idea that was always coming up to the surface as a leitmotiv, that is a deep concern for the future of their country, their province, their heritage.

Until very recently, the constitutional problems facing Canada were the concern of only a few intellectuals, civil servants or unknown experts. It was still the thing to do very recently, in fashionable circles, to develop great theses, quite often incomprehensible to the public, about the future of Quebec and Canada.

The people as a whole was not much interested and did not seem to care about Canada. The matter was discussed because it was the thing to do, but that was all. The great theses such as special status, autonomy, sovereignty-association, co-operative federalism, etc. were not taken seriously and created little interest among the people.

But today, and one is not quite sure why, the future of Canada and Quebec has become a major concern for each and every one of us. The citizens of the constituency of Lotbinière are no exceptions. They worry about the noisy and dangerous protest which endangers innocent lives and may ultimately turn out democracy into total anarchy.

I should like then to take advantage of the few minutes at my disposal to outline briefly what I consider the essential problems at the present time.

• (3:10 p.m.)

How far will the ever growing anarchy go? When will it stop?

Parents no longer know whether their children are in school or on the streets, whether they prepared a Molotov cocktail at lunch time, blew up the school buildings, picketed, marched or maybe even had a study session. In fact, those are the actions of professional agitators who, as the Quebec premier said recently, are interested in emptying our schools for any reason they can find, in making our children, inspired by deceitful and hate propaganda, come down into the street.

Right-minded people who favour order, authority and justice must and will have to get a consensus to end the underhand doings of some bearded and immigrant activists who left their country for fear of not being free and respected and who now want to impose their opinions in our country, without respecting anything, or anybody and foster anarchy. Those people wish to create here what they left behind when they fled their country. This points to a deficiency in the government's immigration policy.

The mother does not know any longer whether her husband will work tomorrow or if he will not return in the evening and tell her: "I am on strike."

The sick do not know any longer whether they will get the necessary basic care to which they are strictly entitled to recover at least part of their health.

Teachers do not know any longer whether they will be paid or if they will be provided with some kind of teaching material.

Students cannot tell whether they will attend school tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, we must not close our eyes to the fact that in our schools and universities, drugs and narcotics are flowing freely, and authority is being thrown overboard. Unfortunately, I find that few of my colleagues are interested in those questions.

The young unemployed despair of ever finding jobs in which they can make use of the skills they have acquired.

Wheat producers accumulate surpluses but they do not know what to do with them.

Milk producers in the East must pour their milk down the drain this year—I deeply regret that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is not in the house—not knowing what to do with their product when two thirds of the world's population are starving to death and are without the bare minimum. While people are starving to death, while some families do not have the bare necessaries, we are wasting our production.

Mr. Speaker, our rural community is becoming urbanized and this results in complete disruption. We are not prepared, nor are our governments, to cope with such changes.

All have questions to ask. However, few answers arouse interest.

As far as the Throne Speech is concerned, it is a vacuum. As a matter of fact, all those problems I have just listed—and I have only mentioned a few—have the same common denominator: social injustice.

The just society was not supposed to materialize yesterday and, according to the Speech from the Throne, it will not be for tomorrow either.

Personally, I had been building several hopes on the Throne Speech of this second session, Mr. Speaker, I bitterly realize, as many others, you may believe me, that nothing will be done this year except for rehashing the old bills and old ideas of the first session which brought no economical improvement for that matter.

Social injustice, that is what we must fight against. However, to fight it, we must first expose it, see it, grasp it. And to grasp it, we must go to its roots. We must go back to the source of economic injustices. That is the fundamental point I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a great number of other intellectuals of the same school speak forcefully of the just society and social justice which we must establish and in order to achieve that aim, the Prime Minister has developed a program which may be summarized as follows: to appoint task forces, to produce white papers, to organize study trips across Canada, to submit reports and more reports which will lie on shelves, to put the axe in the public service, to modernize the Criminal Code and give much importance to secondary bills such as those on abortion, homosexuality, etc., to impose credit restrictions to everyone except the rich, to increase interest rates on all loans granted by the Farm Credit Corporation, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, etc., to review all programs without ever changing them, and to tighten one's belt, because inflation is galloping, and it is necessary to save money.

So that is the program of the Prime Minister, since he became leader of the government. Those are the only solutions he has to offer.

In other words, we must deprive ourselves in the hope that poverty will dissappear, and that social disparities will become mathematical equations.

The government also tells us with much publicity: Buy Canada Savings Bonds, they are gold! But with what money? That is what the Prime Minister fails to say.

This amounts to deluding a whole population that wants order, justice, equality and efficiency.

This world, full of inequities caused by the inertia of governments which find satisfaction only in indifference and in provoking futile disputes between governments over red carpets or words, is the best breeding ground for protests, revolutions, violence and anarchy.

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent to tackle the real problems, because it is well known that every social inequality is very often the result of an economic inequality or inequity and that every economic inequality is very often caused by the want of balance between the forces of production and the forces of consumption. So long as there is not a more equitable distribution of products while political freedom is respected, protests will continue to grow and to submerge our country and Quebec.

It seems to me that a certain kind of protest is a rising tide which cannot be stemmed at present, carrying all before it, drowning those who are unwilling to follow the wave of violence unleashed by union leaders such as Michel Chartrand, Raymond Laliberté, Marcel Pépin and others.

That is why many people today have lost control of the situation and are at wits' end. Moreover, unless we face up to our responsibilities right now and our governments take concrete and immediate action, we will lose not merely our wits, but also our private enterprise, our liberty and our lives.

Tighten your belts. We will send the army in. We will take this or that community under our wings. If that is not enough we will impose price and salary controls. Such are the new proposals put forward by the Prime Minister in this session.

These are like band-aids on a wooden leg, they only aggravate discontent and everything will have to be done over again tomorrow. Why? Because we did not tackle and we are not tackling the real issue, which is a monetary problem. Time has come to act by taking concrete measures.

Mr. Speaker, here is one of many typical examples which really disappointed me last year. It will be recalled that, with great fanfare, the former Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) toured Canada with experts, held hearings with various groups and finally concluded that some measures were needed to solve, at least in part, the housing crisis in Canada.

The report has not only been differed indefinitely but the minister himself was forced to resign in the face of the inaction of the government of which he had been a candidate to the leadership.

This is an example among many which shows that we have now to bear with a government of retarded students who compile notes and decline action, and true commitment. In fact, what we need is a government of action.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I should like to deal with problems such as tight money, unemployment, and interest rates.

In view of the tight money and unemployment situation which we are going through at this time, several unbelievers of the past recognize today the urgent need for a monetary reform. With the Ralliement Creditiste, they agree that unemployment results obviously in economic stagnation. They agree that the great number of bankruptcies in Canada is due more to the tight money policy than to mismanagement.

Everyone realizes also the unfairness of the income tax which robs people, tortures with a shocking off-handedness the morale of those who built this country and who contribute to the development of our natural resources.

We also witness the impotence of the governments before those who control money and credit. Therefore it is important to delegate to our parliaments, representatives who have a greater concern for their electors than for the political party financed by electoral funds and high finance.

At the present time we are living in a deceitful economy. The prevailing economic conditions are unmerciful and cruel and, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), coming events will prove it.

In fact, if we look closely at the living conditions of many of us, we must admit without any reservation, that our system of government, supposedly democratic and alive, is really pitiful. An untold number of unemployed people and their families are living in poverty in the midst of affluence. Crimes, break-ins, are committed every day by young people who seem to have no place any more in our society.

Those same young people our federal leaders used to feed, to clothe, to care for and to pay all through the war years, they can no longer house them, clothe them, feed them, nor pay them in time of peace nor can they give then a job.

It is to those young people that they used to sing, with a quaver in the voice, the blessings of a war that would restore the human being to its democratic rights.

It is those same young people that our federal leaders are shamefully betraying today, after promising them during the war years an honest and happy in this rich country of ours. Our politicians cannot do anything now for those young people they deliberately sacrifice to finance and the chartered banks.

There is only room now for the dollar sign of finance in the heart of the federal government.

Must our Canadian youth be satisfied with decent living only when it must kill, and should it be starving to death afterwards with the return of peace?

Mr. Speaker, that is the serious question we are asking ourselves. It is all very well to shout that unemployment is international, that inflation preys on democracies, that money is too expensive and that the inkwells of the bankers are empty; it still remains that money is scarce. There are too many products of all kinds in our country. We must tolerate destitution within affluence. We must tolerate the fact that the rich grow richer and that the poor get poorer.

Thus, our governments, whether red or blue, restrain production. Factories are closed, good fathers of families are thrown out of work and our youth into a chasm of alarming uncertainty, when it is not into despair.

We suffer from economic anaemia, precisely because the blood that is necessary to the economic body, that is money, becomes increasingly rare through the fault of those who control it: bankers and high finance.

The federal authorities, Mr. Speaker, tolerate and allow the existence through legislative measures, of this anti-human and anti-social system which consists in the sad exploitation of the people, under the sympathetic eye of the present government. "Tighten your belts." That is all we hear.

Mr. Speaker, we need an active government and that may explain the move of protest. In fact, the governments are not moving. We owe it to ourselves to raise against this system which is rotten to the core. It is not brains that are lacking in the head of our people. Nor is it the heart that is lacking in the breast of Canadians, but rather money in their pocket-book, money which opens the doors to affluence in the country. Will not two wars and three economic recessions within 35 years be enough to open our eyes to the bad effects of a perverted finance that enslaves man. Money has always been lavishly spent on war, but it is hard to muster in the cause of peace. Bankers will readily extend their help in time of affluence but if we do happen to need them, then they put the lid back on their bottle of red ink. The tight money policy recently announced in the Speech from the Throne as a mean of fighting inflation gives us the measure of government enslavement to big business which provides the financing for the party's electoral fund.

Bankers, in Canada, are allowed to lay down the law in the economic field and our government has to fall in step, behind them, regardless of its responsibilities. It will lend you an umbrella when the sun is shining but come the first drops of rain and you are left in the street under the downpour. When a federal government, whether grit or tory, thus allows individuals to corner all the wealth of a country like ours without providing for a distribution system which makes allowance for everyone's freedom and safety through a national dividend and compensated discount, such a government deserves to be overthrown or openly questioned. The people themselves are bound to ask such questions.

If we want to put an end to the crisis conditions we are now experiencing, not only in Quebec but also in the other provinces—for the uneasiness now felt by the Quebecers also deeply affects every Canadian in every province—we have to take some kind of action.

Recently, I had the pleasure of going to Nova Scotia. Early in the spring, I had the pleasure of going out west. On those two occasions I was able to see that what Quebecers feel is felt in another language as deeply and with as much concern by the other Canadians.

All are now aware that we must tackle the water pollution problem, the lack of Canadian unity—which was the object of the bill on the official languages,—that the Criminal Code must be amended.

Canadians are pleased with the proposed legislation generally, while recognizing more and more that the problem does not lie there, that we delude ourselves in thinking that the problem exists at that level. The problem goes beyond that. It is a monetary problem and the time has come for us to come to grips with it.

Credit in Canada is the monopoly of the commercial banks despite what some of our colleagues may say. That monopoly was granted by the Bank Act of 1935. The right hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King said so himself in 1935—I am not putting those words in his mouth, as I was not even born at that time. I quote:

> Once a country has given up control of its money and its credit, it matters little who makes the laws of the land. Usury, once in command, will lead any country to ruin.

Mackenzie King, that great Liberal leader, said in addition, and I quote:

> Until such time as control over the issue of money and credit is given back to the government and recognized as its most obvious, most sacred responsibility, speaking of the sovereignty of parliament is nothing but idle talk.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In the same connection, I feel, to use the words of Mr. Mackenzie King, that it is unnecessary and useless to talk about the sovereignty and independance of Quebec as long as we do not have the tools needed to keep that independence under control

The same remarks could apply to Canada. This is why, in this as in anything else, we are deluding ourselves when we believe in those glib talkers who actually have no economic solution to offer.

Our present monetary system has most disastrous effects. Successive periods of sudden boom and sudden recession keep recurring much too frequently.

The cycle, due moreover to the action of the financial system supported by our country at the present time, is the following:

When peace supersedes war, surplus production accumulates and reveals the lack of purchasing power of the people. The shortage of outlets for our products brings about two results: first of all, unemployment, which, in turn, causes economic crises, and then follow the clashes that prompt some countries to wage war, and war, inevitably, involves increased borrowing, debt and inflation. To cope with the situation, governments, under the present system of administration, claim that they must increase taxes in all fields. Such levies snowball.

Then peace returns and the cycle referred to starts over again. On reading Canada's history, as well as that of many other countries, one can see that this is true.

Considering the fact that the control of the issue and withdrawal of money may determine the value and the nature of the production, it is when our fellow-citizens can exercise their sovereign right to control the monetary system through their parliament that the individual can be assured of financial security and freedom of action in the economic field.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I condemn the emptiness of the Speech from the Throne which does not offer any solution to the present problems, but only encourages people to become entangled in the system, thereby increasing their displeasure. I find it most unfortunate that instead of tackling the real problem, the real opponents of financial progress, we are satisfied, with the government's consent and under its impulse, to waste our time with secondary legislation while the financial problems only grow worse.

Mr. Speaker, I find unthinkable that the people should be so poorly informed. If they really knew something about the present economic system, instead of wasting their time protesting about a lot of secondary things, they would do so about the real problem which is a monetary one.

What is perhaps most unfortunate is that the Speech from the Throne does not recommend any action to solve the problem. Maybe it is an indication that this government is in no way different from the previous ones.

Mr. Jean-L. Rochon (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, like those who spoke before me, I would like first of all to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

During the last session, my colleague from Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) expressed some of his opinions but through the style and the assurance he displayed last week, he showed us in a subtle and entirely new way that we were right last year to foresee a brilliant and promising future for him. Having heard his speech, I am sure as are all my colleagues that his contribution to Canadian politics will do credit not only to his province but also to the whole country.

As for the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), he admitted that we were right when we were saying to his predecessor, Mr. Grégoire, that his separatist ideas were not shared by most of his constituents, but very few of them. Indeed, when he advocated that isolationist doctrine, he was forgetting that the federal and provincial governments had contributed the most to the development of that Quebec area known today throughout the world as the aluminum country.

Our colleague admitted that we were right when he stated his views and those of the people who voted for him at the last election. He made us understand, as we had told Mr. Grégoire, that in the riding of Lapointe as elsewhere in Quebec, people realize that Quebec cannot live and develop without the remainder of Canada and moreover, the remainder of the country needs Quebec to assert itself as a country whose advice is sought and followed.

Furthermore, I wish to congratulate our leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and to thank him for putting his intelligence at the service of the nation. Whatever you hear, he has become for us the members of his party, a source of inspiration, a guiding light in our action. God knows that the need for action is all too frequent in this century when what is essential today is already outdated tomorrow, in this century of the atom and of electronics when too often, alas, the machine takes the place of man, in this century when we have seen astronauts walking on the moon's surface.

Mr. Speaker, as my time is rather short, may I deal immediately with the subject of which I wish to speak and to express my views on some of today's problems.

I do not intend to pay attention to the criticism voiced by the members of the opposition. I know they did so without malice or spite, but rather to help the government. At least, it should be so.

I know that we, in this house, cannot all think the same way, but I know that all of us share the same ambition: to try and improve the welfare of the people. The only difference between us is in the way we see things. One wants to put one's own ideas forward and, without being fully aware of it, one slides towards partisanship, which is perfectly human. One unwillingly impedes the smooth running of the nation's business, instead of joining with others and helping others. One goes sometimes as far as to question the good faith of some who, more than opponents, would like to co-operate.

Everything should not be accepted straight away, for the government could make mistakes, errors and even blunders.

Moreover the opposition's function is to keep an eye on the government. If one were prepared to make constructive suggestions instead of blaming and criticizing, as is too often the case, the whole population would benefit and everyone would be happy to be efficient and understanding.

For a few years, Mr. Speaker, the throne speeches have been dealing mainly with federal-provincial relations with a view to assuring the welfare of each citizen in every province. The numerous pieces of legislation passed, both economic and social, stand as a clear evidence that federal authorities are always eager to co-operate in the best interests of the Canadian people, and that, in order to attain that goal, confederation has to be oriented in a very specific direction for us to become a big nation in a big country.

This year again, the same end is in view, but times have changed. In 1969, it has become difficult and extremely hazardous to tackle the problems in the same manner as before. We must have the courage to face facts and to bring forward up-dated solutions, because let us not forget that we have to take into account, on the one hand, the new needs of a large number of countries in full development, in the process of great economic expansion and, on the other hand, the rights of the provinces. Even with the best of intentions, one may appear to be meddling in fields where this would jeopardize autonomy and lead to conflict between authorities of which, sad to say, those who are steeped in a narrow and retrograde brand of nationalism take advantage to further a cause which has no justification in this century of emancipation in which we achieved maturity.

Last year, the main theme of the Speech from the Throne was the "just society". This year, the objective is to prepare the future by increasing the efficiency of present programs. What is announced is not the launching of major ventures, but rather the continuation of the fight against inflation. However, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which, as all are aware, has been created to do away with social disparities, will intensify its activity.

Numerous projects have been announced in the speech. Previous speakers have submitted a few to the House, in the public interest or in that of their riding. Some suggested that the unemployment insurance program be thoroughly revamped, others advocated certain changes in housing policies, others still showed us the advantages of certain reforms concerning the rights of the individual, with a concern for more respect for man, his person and what he represents. All these comments and analyses clearly demonstrated that the government is prepared to act, especially on domestic issues. This was pointed out in an article published in Montreal's La Presse, and I quote:

> Domestic issues are given precedence in the Speech from the Throne. Indeed, the few paragraphs devoted to foreign affairs merely recall a well known policy: the government's intention to participate in the establishment of a movement designed to bring about a reform of the U.N., increased assistance to developing countries, and the initiative from Ottawa to protect international waters from pollution.

And that newspaperman went on to say:

> Whether it is a matter of tax reform, of the revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act, or of different suggestions concerning consumer credit, packaging, identification of textile products and the security of motor vehicles, as well as of amendments to the Criminal Code, these different pieces of legislation tend to increase the security of the individual in the face of the growing power of the state and the complexity of the industrial society.
> Even in the economic field, the government gives high priority to its concern for the welfare of the individual; the paragraph of the speech devoted to housing, in which the government announces as an objective the building of one million housing units and homes in five years is designed to lessen the difficulties of the less affluent.
> Also designed for the individual are the following measures: the implementation of the official language bill, the fight against pollution, assistance for depressed areas, and lower income groups, the reform of social security, and also, the tax reform which aims at a more equitable distribution of the tax burden while favouring the economic expansion in the country.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, these few remarks about the Speech from the Throne, let me borrow this sentence from the Prime Minister. I quote:

> All these measures tend to develop the environment where Canadians work and live. Even if such an environment became idyllic, there still would remain a very important task to perform, a task that will never be completed: guarantee to every citizen a life protected against any undue intervention.

Mr. Speaker, I had the great honour, last June, to represent Canada at the NATO meetings in Brussels. As vice-chairman of the scientific committee, I was asked to submit my appreciation of the studies concerning the marine resources of the North Atlantic area. Those information documents dealt first of all with the deep-sea resources in fish and aquatic vegetation, including sea-weeds, and it said that in a not too distant future perhaps, the ocean would become the granary of the world, and that the culture of these sea-weeds would probably become an important source of raw material for the manufacture food and industrial products.

It said that although these questions have been discussed before by other international agencies, the FAO for example, it could be useful for these NATO countries to promote the study of the techniques that are particularly adapted to the situation in the North Atlantic area, which would allow for increased exchanges of information, so that each of the member countries could benefit from these studies and be in a position to fight with the greatest effectiveness possible against this calamity, which is pollution.

Like other members of the committee, I have been quite impressed with these reports and I have come to the conclusion that means had to be found at all cost to protect all that wealth and to check water pollution.

As mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, our water resources are immense of course but they are not inexhaustible, and if it is imperative to encourage their development, it is just as urgent to ensure their conservation. Lakes, rivers and streams, are befouled with rotting marine vegetation, the sad result quite often of our lack of foresight.

Aware of its responsibilities, the government has made known its views on this serious pollution problem and it has initiated consultations with the provinces. So much the better, and I shall make it my duty to send to Colonel Driscoll, the same gentleman who in October 1968 published in Foreign Affairs a most informed study on this serious problem, the part which deals with the subject.

During this tour, I had the opportunity to hear several guest speakers deal with the ticklish problem of pollution, at various NATO meetings. And one of the reports which impressed me most is, without doubt, the preliminary report on the United States reaction to the oil pollution off Santa Barbara, submitted by Mr. Peter Rondino, vice-president and reporting officer of the International Secretariat.

I shall not go into all the details of that report. I think it suffices to say that on Tuesday, January 28, 1969, an eruption occurred during drilling operations in a well of the Union Oil Company about six miles from Santa Barbara. The well was capped so as to prevent oil from flowing too fast, but oil slicks finally covered the sea and the American government had to step in so as to protect one of the most beautiful beaches in the world. In fact, on April 16, the House of Representatives passed the 1969 Water Quality Improvement Act, for the protection of public waters against oil pollution. The Act contains a provision as to the responsibility inherent to oil plants. While discussing such a provision—I still refer to the Rondino report—the members of the government favoured a concept of absolute responsibility. Besides, Secretary Hickel has already published regulations to that effect and one of the exploration conditions, under a contract signed with the American government, is that the operators' activities should not be harmful in any way to the environment and, should they be, the said operators would be responsible.

Furthermore, the American Senate is now trying to determine whether full responsibility for cleaning up, without any kind of limitation, could not be covered by insurance.

This, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps a drastic measure but if you consider the awful damage incurred, on the one hand, and public interest on the other, there can be no hesitation. Other countries, including ours, should do the same. I was very much interested in another report, that of a Dutch delegate whose name I have forgotten. It dealt with air pollution resulting from the chimney fumes from factories located on the shores of the North Sea, on the outskirts of the city of Amsterdam. Contact with the outside air changed these fumes into toxic gas and the resulting fall-out in the sea water was endangering the very life of the schools of fish living in those waters. The Dutch government, under the provisions of a bill passed by the legislative assembly, then compelled the owners of those plants, as well as any person potentially responsible for such mishaps, to use the necessary equipment in order to counter the danger of pollution.

Why could we not do the same thing?

Everywhere in the world, Mr. Speaker, people are rightly alarmed by this national threat. I am sure the government, together with the provinces, will find some way of doing something about it. If ever I am fortunate enough to go back to NATO, I would be glad to say that in Canada we also want to make a contribution to the well-being of man in this particular field.

• (3:50 p.m.)

To all the reasons that could be put forth in favour of adapting a national program for the control of water pollution, another can be added, quite personal perhaps, since north of Montreal where my riding is located a river flows whose waters are so polluted that the Health League in Quebec stated publicly, early last summer, and I quote:

> We hereby advise summer visitors, whether they live on the North shore, in Ville Laval, or on the South shore, in Montreal, along the Back River, that bathing is dangerous and that typhoid cases have been attributed to bathing in those waters.

I understand that sums were voted by the government, two years ago, when I was the member for Laval. Indeed, even at that time I asked for the Milles-Îles and Prairies rivers to be dredged and cleaned.

I know that in order to check inflation the government was forced to adopt an austerity program; I also know that, in that frame of mind, that work was postponed. But, might it not be indicated, as a start in the fight against that plague, to forbid bathing in rivers where there is danger of catching typhoid fever?

Since I have mentioned my riding, perhaps I could point out that our post office, on Henri-Bourassa street, is too small. For several years now, we have asked that a new post office be built, capable of serving a population of over half a million people in northern Montreal, from Crémazie street to Rivière des Prairies, and from Ville St. Laurent to Ville Montréal-Nord. I am merely mentioning this urgent need as I will deal again with the question when we consider the estimates of the Post Office Department.

Another question which I would have liked to discuss and which is of great interest to the Quebec members is what is taking place in our province. What is the meaning of all those protests which border on anarchy if not revolution? With the limited time at my disposal I cannot deal with it immediately, but I will surely find an occasion to come back on the subject in the course of this session. I will only say now that a few agitators have deceived too many people. The majority of the people are not separatists, far from it, as they are on the whole proud of being Canadians. These people desire mostly one thing: the fulfilment of the Canadian nation that they love and would like to be esteemed by the world at large

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I join with other hon. members who have participated in this debate in extending the usual perfunctory words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

May I also, with the indulgence of the House, avail myself of this opportunity to make an apology. When the House met last session to wind up its affairs on October 22, I rose in my place on a question of privilege and inadvertently misled the house by suggesting that the 13th report of the transport committee had omitted a very important part of its recommendations. I subsequently discovered, Mr. Speaker, that there was a 14th report and that this report contained the part that I thought had been omitted. Therefore, I should like to apologize to the House for having inadvertently misled hon. members. May I apologize in particular to the chairman of the transport committee, the hon. member for LaSalle (Mr. Lessard), for having cast his position in some doubt.

I have been listening with great interest to this debate on the address, as I did to the speech itself. I have since read it a number of times to try to find some glimmer of hope that the many problems facing the country, and particularly some of the special and peculiar problems facing the Atlantic area, will be dealt with.

I have also listened to the various ministers who have participated in the debate, and with special interest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). As a member of the House representing a Newfoundland constituency, to say that I was disappointed with the content of the minister's speech is to put it mildly. There was the usual fluency and eloquence, the usual sound and fury, but as usual nothing was said.

This was a great disappointment to me because I expected the minister, who sits in the cabinet as a representative of my province, to enunciate some of the solutions to the serious problems facing the Atlantic region. I expected him to outline what the government proposes to do about them and how it proposes to cope with them. But, as I say, I was greatly disappointed, as I am greatly disappointed by the minister's absence from the House today.

Mr. Peddle: Again.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, again, as my colleague for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador interjects. We have had to wait for other speeches to inform us whether new light was to be shed upon some of our serious problems. Again, we have been disappointed.

Yesterday the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) made a speech to which we listened with interest and followed closely. We have a great deal of sympathy for the minister; we have a great deal of support for some of the things we believe he is trying to do. The minister referred at great length to conservation and pollution. I should like to deal very briefly with the subject of pollution because it is a problem with which we are all concerned, one which is reaching crisis proportions in this country.

I believe that pollution in its various forms is one of the most serious problems facing Canada, but I should like to deal with but one aspect, an aspect that the minister of fisheries referred to in his speech yesterday, namely the effect of pollution on marine life.

The Government of Canada has recently finally recognized—I hope this recognition has not come too late—the severity of pollution in Canada. The pollution of our marine resources has taken on new aspects, and later on I should like to refer to them. A great deal of attention has been paid to the pollution of our lakes and rivers. Similarly, a great deal of attention has been focussed on the pollution of our major inland waters. I might say I am glad to see the minister, under whose jurisdiction this pollution problem comes, is in his seat. We have all heard a great deal about the disastrous effects that pollution has had on our freshwater fishing industry. In many cases marine resources in our inland lakes are lost to us forever because of pollution and, I am sorry to say, government mismanagement. They are lost to us forever because there is no way we can restore some of the species now missing from our inland lakes.

In this regard, we look forward to the Canada Water Act which at least will represent some government initiative or intention to do something about this situation. The House and the whole country will join in applauding the government because, regardless of our partisan considerations, we all realize the seriousness of the pollution problem. We were happy about the Prime Minister's statement yesterday. I am sure all thinking people were happy with his intention to drastically limit and regulate the use of DDT.

There is an aspect of this problem which in my view has not received sufficient attention from the government or the public. I refer to the oil pollution of the North Atlantic and the hazardous effect this is having on our Atlantic fishing industry. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) made a brief reference to this in his speech. We hope that he will perhaps have more to say about it.

We have seen dramatic evidence of the consequences of pollution in respect of our marine life. I have only to refer to the pollution of Placentia Bay to support this suggestion. That situation received national and international attention and occupied a great deal of the time of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter). In spite of the seriousness of that situation, we have a problem today which I think is even more serious. I believe it is even more critical and it is one which will continue. This problem has been with us for some time and we are only now beginning to fully appreciate the disastrous consequences it may have.

Oil pollution on the high seas usually takes one of two forms, a deliberate discharge of oil waste, bilge pumping, or accidental spillage. We live with this every day. We have evidence that the pollution from bilge pumping is killing marine life and having a disastrous effect on our marine bird life. There is a second aspect to oil pollution. I refer to accidental spillage by an oil tanker at sea or during loading or unloading. To appreciate the gravity of this problem I need place only one statistic on the record. About 50 per cent of the world's ocean cargo weight is composed of crude oil. According to the latest statistics I can find, some 700 billion tons of oil were transported by tankers in the year 1967. During that year there were some 3,218 tankers in operation on the high seas. To add to the enormity of this crisis one should consider the growing statistical evidence in respect of the increase in the number and size of tankers. We have a new problem with which we must deal. We did not have to contend with this problem before. It has now reached crisis proportions and we will have to deal with it whether we like it or not through international conventions or agreements. This new aspect compounds the problem drastically.

I have in mind the advent of the so-called supertanker, a vessel ranging in size from anywhere between 100,000 tons and 500,000 tons. Let us consider the recent, dramatic voyage of the Manhattan. Perhaps in this way we might grasp the impact of this development. There are may ships of the size of the Manhattan in the world and we will see many more oil tankers of 100,000 to 500,000 tons. They are now on the drawing boards. For the moment, let me draw the attention of the House to our coastal waters and what these supertankers mean to us in terms of a pollution threat.

It is now generally agreed that the Manhattan voyage was successful. We are told we can look forward to huge tankers successfully operating in the Northwest passage bringing crude oil from Prudhoe Bay and Canada's Arctic to the eastern seaboard. While current arguments center around our sovereignty in the area, and nobody would wish to play this down because it is important, in my view too little attention has been paid to the drastic and unimaginable consequences of one of these huge supertankers as big as the Manhattan loaded with crude oil being crushed in the ice in the Northwest Passage.

According to the best evidence I can find on the subject, and it is one in which I am vitally interested and concerned, such an accident could destroy the major part if not all of the Atlantic fishing industry. Certainly, it is not overstating the case to say that nobody can yet fully measure the consequences to marine life or the consequences to every living thing of the disastrous upsetting of the whole ecology of the area of Canada's Arctic and our northeast coast. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis), to his great credit, indicated in his speech yesterday that he is concerned with this matter. He made reference to the Torrey Canyon disaster. The House will remember the Torrey Canyon disaster a few years ago when this tanker, with a full load of crude oil, broke up on the rocks off the coast of England. It is interesting to note that even though this accident took place several years ago, the oil pollution resulting from it is still a major problem. Scientists are still, to this very day, trying to measure scientifically the disastrous effect this accident had on the marine life of that part of the world. As oil tankers go, the Torrey Canyon was not a large ship. As a matter of fact, by today's standards she could be considered a small ship.

If one were to compare the Torrey Canyon to one of the small supertankers or compare it to the Manhattan, one would find the comparison dramatic. The Manhattan is 106,000 tons with a carrying capacity of 38 million gallons of oil, enough I am told to fill 4,000 railway tank cars. According to an article in the trade magazine Oil Week for September 29, 1969 we can expect ships much larger than the Manhattan to operate in the Northwest Passage. According to this same article—and surely this must be considered as a good authority—we can expect anywhere from 25 to 30 tankers in the next 10 years, tankers of 250,000 tons or more, to be operating in the Northwest Passage. These are tankers capable of carrying in excess of 1.7 million barrels of oil. When one compares this to the capacity of the Torrey Canyon, one can realize the enormity of the pollution threat.

As I said, too little is known about oil pollution on the high seas. Practically nothing, however, is known about oil pollution in the Arctic. From what little scientific data there is available regarding the decomposition of oil waste on the high seas, scientists will agree that decomposition slows markedly as the temperature is lowered. It follows, therefore, that the oil waste dumped on Arctic ice must be preserved, according to the best scientific evidence I can find, from decomposition and hence would represent a continuing pollution threat. Perhaps this is the dawn of the "Silent Spring" unless something is done about it. The sinking or even the serious damaging of but one of these tankers in this area could and would have a serious long term effect on the whole Arctic and Atlantic coastal environment, not only for our marine living resources under the sea but also those over the sea.

According to a paper prepared for the Canadian Wild Life Service by Dr. Richard E. Warner of Memorial University, Canadian resources will bear the brunt of any such accident. I should like to quote the very important words of Professor Warner, a well known and learned expert in this field.

> In the present absence of even rudimentary data on the behaviour of oils in ice filled Arctic waters, no sensible contingency plan in case of accident can be developed.

That is a very serious statement made by a very serious and learned scientist. This, then, is a great challenge facing this government and facing Canada in this day and age. We cannot help but ask ourselves what the government is doing about it. We are not talking about something away off in the future; we are talking about something here and now.

We have heard from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) about his announced intention to bring in legislation known as The Northern Water Rights and Pollution Control Act. During his crusade across the country, we heard from the Minister without Portfolio about the Canada Water Act. None of us had anything but good will for the minister as he went across the country trying to prepare the people to do something about pollution. But this aspect of the problem, separated from the whole area of environmental pollution, in my view is one that requires immediate action today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: I shall not be critical of the government, because I realize how serious the problem is. However, I should like to make a suggestion to the government because this is something in which we are all involved. I would ask the Minister of Fisheries and the government to give serious and immediate consideration to having this matter of oil pollution at sea, and the possible disastrous consequences of oil pollution in the Northwest Passage on our marine resources, referred to an appropriate parliamentary committee. In this way, scientists and representatives of the industry could appear before the committee and all the evidence on this one aspect of pollution could be collated. The problem could be studied by the experts in the government, underlined and set out. It seems to me this is the only way we can deal with it.

So far as the continuing problem of oil pollution of the high seas is concerned, I think Canada should be pressing for stricter international controls. I am talking about the waste from tankers at sea and accidental spillage of oil at sea. I give the minister credit.

He referred to this in his speech. He is probably more concerned about it than any one of us, because he knows at first hand the consequences of it. I believe that our government should be pressing for much stricter and more meaningful international controls, notwithstanding the fact that it is a signatory to the international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil. I am told by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that a new agreement is being negotiated in Brussels this month to deal with accidental pollution of the sea arising from accidents at sea similar to the Torrey Canyon incident. I hope that our government will be firm in its resolve to deal with this matter. It must not lose sight of the new and serious threat to our environment, to our Atlantic coast and indeed to the waters of the Arctic. We already know the consequences of oil pollution on the high seas, arising from the practical impossibility of enforcing the regulations of the present international convention.

Unless steps are taken to obtain a meaningful and enforceable international agreement in the area of oil pollution and the related area of conservation, the Minister of Fisheries will find that all of his problems will be automatically solved for him because he will have no seal herd with which to concern himself every year. It will be wiped out. He will have no groundfish industry with which to concern himself because it, too, will disappear. This is the threat facing us today. Perhaps the minister will forgive me if I suggest to him that then he might be able to devote all his time to promoting sport fishing and to trying to satisfy the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by coming up with a humane way of catching fish and eliminating that ghastly hook.

An hon. Member: Such as the use of chloroform.

Mr. McGrath: This government, with its propensity for talk, might even be able to talk the fish out of the water. But I do not mean to make light of this because I know the minister is concerned. I can only hope that his government is concerned, and if they are, I challenge the minister today to have the matter of oil pollution at sea and the new problems posed by the opening up of the Northwest Passage to supertankers immediately referred to an appropriate committee of this House, perhaps even the Standing Committee on Fisheries. Then, we would be in a position to call witnesses, have scientific evidence presented to us, and correlate it. In this way, Parliament would be able to play a meaningful part in this most serious national problem facing the whole country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the house that I will try to be brief and not to abuse the privilege extended to me.

Before I resume my seat, I would like to make a few brief observations concerning the proposed legislation setting up the salt fish development corporation. Let me say to the minister and to the government that many of us in this House and in the country have waited a long time for this legislation. Indeed, we will not be satisfied until we see the legislation in the House, and perhaps even then we will not be satisfied. I know that successive governments down through the years—and here I make no exceptions—have been guilty, in my view, of grossly neglecting and ignoring the salt fish industry. As a direct consequence of this, we have seen many of our important and traditional markets lost to our European competition. As a matter of fact, one could almost suspect a conspiracy to abolish this ancient, honourable and important industry.

While the industry has been largely ignored by the federal government, the establishment has had a field day at the expense of the fishermen. Just let me illustrate what I said. Can you imagine a farmer taking his entire crop to a broker, getting from the broker an open receipt, going back to his farmhouse and waiting to see what the broker is going to pay him? He thereby places himself completely at the mercy of the broker who then sells the produce, names his own commission, and gives the farmer what is left. There is no farmer in the country who would put up with that kind of situation. Yet this ancient, feudal practice is still being carried on to this very day in the salt fish industry in Newfoundland. The tragedy of it is that our fishermen have no choice but to play along because for them there is no crop failure insurance, no government plan to advance some funds to buy gear when they set out to catch the fish in the spring. What little they did have, such as the salt rebate program, has been taken away from them.

The salt rebate program may be peanuts to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) because we all know he is affluent, but to the fishermen of Newfoundland who are salting and drying their fish for sale it represents a great deal because their income—and statistics prove this—is barely enough to keep body and soul together. The callous treatment handed out to our fishermen—for example to those who took part in the Labrador fisheries this year and who are suffering the consequences of the failure of that fishery—has already been referred to by my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). What does the minister say to that? He does not say: we will give you catch failure insurance. He tells them to go to their welfare officer and apply for dole. That is the substance of what the minister said in his statement on October 23. I am sorry to say that this has been typical of the attitude of the federal government down through the years with regard to fishermen who salt and cure their fish.

I have a great deal of faith in the present minister, a great deal of confidence in him, because I know he is trying to do a job. I know that even though he gave in to the sob-sisters of the world by abolishing the killing of whitecoat seals—I deliberately omit using the words "baby seal" because we do not refer to the baby lamb industry, the baby pig industry or the baby cattle industry, so when you use the term "baby seal" industry you are being taken in by these people—perhaps at long last the minister is prepared to do something meaningful for the fisheries. But let us hope it will be more meaningful than the action he has taken in respect of the seal industry. Notwithstanding the fact that as he admitted, there is scientific evidence to indicate that the club is the most humane way to kill whitecoat seals, he has made it illegal to do so.

Now, he says that more mature seals cannot be killed by clubs; they may only be killed by rifles, or perhaps even by bows and arrows. Considering the fur bearing value of seal hides, can you imagine the Prime Minister coming into this house wearing his otter coat with a bullet hole in the back of it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: If you want to talk about the humane aspect, I say that for every ten seals shot with bullets the shame of it will be that probably six or seven will get away to die a slow and lingering death on the ice. I hope that the S.P.C.A. and other humane societies all over the world will come to Ottawa and demonstrate outside parliament against this terribly inhumane way of killing seals.

The minister leaves this week to hold discussions in St. John's with members of the salt fish trades. He has taken upon his shoulders the formidable and unenviable task of breaking the centuries old feudal traditions that exist in this industry. We all know how hard tradition dies, but in God's name let these traditions die quickly because those men who catch our fish and salt it cry out for justice, for a fair return for their fish. If those barons, those fish merchants who have held this industry in their clutches so long, and who have influenced successive governments for so long, are not prepared to go along with the change, my advice to the minister is to tell them to go home and content themselves with clipping coupons.

We on this side of the house, many of whom are the sons of fishermen, speak for the fishermen. For them we demand nothing less than justice, and we say to the minister that if the proper safeguards are not built into the legislation setting up the proposed salt fish development corporation then my colleagues and I will oppose that legislation with every ounce of strength that we can muster.

Mr. Walter Smith (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with the hon. members who participated in the debate to congratulate my colleagues and friends the hon. members for Sarnia and Lapointe (Messrs Cullen and Marceau) movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Let me also congratulate and extend my best wishes to the two newly appointed ministers who will join our dynamic government.

I would also like to extend my best wishes to the two new Parliamentary Secretaries.

Representing here one of the most beautiful ridings in the Province of Quebec, is reason enough for me to be proud.

[English]

The City of St. Jean, which is the largest the county, is an industrial city where manufactures of several different descriptions are to be found, including chemical, carpet, cables, foundries, pottery and textiles. Just across the Richelieu River from St. Jean is the second largest city, Iberville, also in the county of St. Jean, where some industries are established. The county of St. Jean is bordered on the south by the great state of the United States, New York.

Many sections of Quebec have been designated as areas where manufacturers will be encouraged to build new factories. But somehow the region of the valley of the Richelieu, and more particularly the county of St. Jean in its entirety, have been omitted. It is hoped that the cabinet will reconsider this very important region of Quebec, some 25 miles from Montreal. There is a serious danger that our region may even lose some of the important industries established in it if some revision is not made soon. Unemployment there in these two cities is higher than the Quebec average of over 7 per cent. It is hoped that when a revision is made this section will be made a designated area.

In the county of St. Jean we have some of the best market gardeners in the whole of Canada. The rich black soil is very fertile, and with modern techniques and fertilizers record crops are being grown year after year. Nevertheless, farmers in this category must be protected by limitation of imports during the summer season when their vegetables have to be marketed, principally on the Montreal market.

Very often when the local vegetables are ready to be placed on our local markets huge imports of vegetables are coming into Canada by the carload and the truck load, which glut our markets. At times, some of our perishable vegetables lie rotting in the fields because of too many imports May I suggest that the cabinet take steps to prevent this happening in succeeding years.

Some of the best dairy farms in the province of Quebec are to be found in the county of St. Jean. I am very proud to mention that in our region south of Montreal we have without a doubt the largest dairy farm in Canada. On this farm you will also find a milk pasteurizing plant where milk is bottled in plastic containers and delivered to dairy product distributors, from whom the consumers can purchase fresh milk daily.

When driving through our region you will also find many poultry farms where broilers, both turkeys and chickens, are raised and shipped to markets across Canada. There are many hog farms to be found in several sections of the county.

It is my earnest opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers need the milk subsidies, hog premiums and freight assistance provided by the federal government. These things are vital to these farmers if they are to stay on the land. Perhaps more encouragement should be given to the farming industry through different forms of financial aid. The Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Farm Loan Act have been and will be very important factors in inducing our young people to remain on farms.

I was very pleased, Mr. Speaker, to learn that at the International Red Cross conference last month our government gained acceptance of a principle which it has long supported whereby the Red Cross will be permitted to provide relief to civilians on both sides during civil wars.

Knowing quite well that in Nigeria-Biafra, many poor civilians and especially poor, innocent children have died of hunger, while in Canada so much food is often wasted or thrown away, members on both sides of this House, I am sure, are hoping and praying that this war will come to an end in the very near future.

The objective of this government is to construct one million new housing units in five years. It is hoped the government will really keep in mind the low income families so that more families will be able to live in more pleasant and healthy surroundings. I strongly support the action taken in this field which will promote and stimulate employment as well as urban improvement throughout our country and the rest of Canada. One way of lowering the cost of moderately priced homes in this country would be to remove the 11 per cent tax on building materials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): I am convinced my constituents are also ready to support my views on the removal of this tax.

May I say just a word on pensions? It is my opinion that pensions for retired civil servants, war veterans—both disability and regular pensions—and their widows should be increased substantially because of the increase in the cost of living which has taken place over the past few years.

We all know that many pensioners are facing great difficulties in meeting their obligations and providing for necessities. Since all pensions are under review at the present time by our government, it is hoped some adjustment will be forthcoming in the near future which will allow them to live and enjoy a happier life.

The population of the county of St. Jean, which I have the honour to represent, is composed of several different nationalities with various cultural backgrounds. To mention just a few of the various ethnic groups, the German, Italian, Dutch are all a great resource in our region. We have lived together over the years in perfect unity and harmony, regardless of nationality or creed, I am pleased to suggest that our region is setting an example for Quebec to follow, where parents can choose to educated their children in either French or English.

I am confident that the separatists will have great difficulty in influencing our people who are among the most happy in all of Canada. Even if the member for Saint-Jean in L'Assemblée Nationale de Québec at the present time is thinking of joining the Parti Québecois, Mr. Speaker, it is hoped my constituents will continue to make suggestions and recommendations to enable this session and the coming sessions to work for the betterment of all Canadians.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): In rising to take part in the debate on the reply to the Address, I must extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder; first, because I am obligated to do so but more important because I sincerely wish to do so. At the same time, may I extend congratulations to the new members of the government and wish them well in their appointed tasks and responsibilities.

Since coming to Parliament I have never participated in either the Throne Speech debate or the Budget debate and my purpose in doing so today as we start into the second session of this Parliament, is to express to Admiral O'Brien of Maritime Command, the wives and families of those men who lost their lives in the recent explosion aboard H.M.C.S. Kootenay, the crew members who survived, the captain and all the officers and men on board that ship, first my sympathy and secondly some words of praise. While most of us in this House, Mr. Speaker, and indeed in the nation, are not yet aware of the nature of this very serious accident, nor the causes of it, many of us are nonetheless very interested and very concerned.

In private conversation with the distinguished Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, that gentleman advised me of some of the details surrounding the accident. This prompts me, Mr. Speaker, at this time to extend to the ship's crew the highest praise that I can as a layman, in terms of their professionalism. I extend the highest praise that I can, as a layman, in thought in a moment of great crisis, for the manner in which they conducted their normal procedures in combatting fire at sea and in securing the safety of those who survived the explosion and fire. I commend them most sincerely, although I must do so largely on the basis of second-hand reports and information. I commend them for the manner in which they brought their ship into port in England. It is my understanding that the Kootenay came into port in the finest tradition, notwithstanding the severe crisis it had just been through.

We all await with concern and sincere interest the outcome of the investigation. We trust that it was not necessarily an environmental accident; that is to say, an accident that is peculiar to ships. We hope it was an isolated incident and that the cause of it will not be such as will in any way curtail the exercises of, or cause concern for, her sister ships in our fleets both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. In connection with this tragedy, there is the question of the burial of those who died. It is my understanding four of the crew members were buried with full honours at sea and four have found a final resting place in England. The body of the ninth man was interred in Canada because his death occurred on board the Kootenay en route to Canada.

My concern in this connection, Mr. Speaker, is that in peacetime, having some regard for the feelings of wives and families, surely the bodies of these men could be brought home to their families for final services so they could rest in their homeland. I am aware of the difficulties in establishing a general policy of bringing the bodies of our servicemen back home, especially in times of crisis. I ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) to review the policy of our government in connection with the final resting place of our service people who die abroad, in order that some measure of comfort may be afforded their families.

I am concerned about what has happened, Mr. Speaker. I am as concerned as anyone would be who has lived next to the sea and grown up in an environment that has been surrounded by a maritime concept, a war concept and a fishing concept. I am concerned with the dedication of our men who serve on fighting ships. I hope this accident has brought forcibly to the minds of all Canadians the very serious nature of the work undertaken and very conscientiously carried out by the men serving under Admiral J.C. O'Brien, Commander, Maritime Command. I again pay tribute to that officer and to the men who continue to do the work that is their day to day responsibility.

Since I am on the subject of Maritime Command may I say that, while I do not necessarily regret the loss of the Bonaventure, I deeply regret the loss of what it represents for ASW capacity. I believe as long as we are in the ball park we must at least bring our own glove. Maybe somebody else can supply the bats and balls, but we must at least bring our own gloves and get on the team. We must be credible. One thing that has been very clear to me in the last four years is the loss of credibility in our Maritime capability, indeed our entire defence capability, in the eyes of not only our neighbours to the south but of our partners in the North Atlantic Alliance.

In the context of Maritime Command, it is important that we do not do anything to lessen the very real expertise we have built up in the field of anti-submarine warfare. I am not talking about our capacity to destroy enemy submarines or to chase them all over the Atlantic. What I am talking about is our capacity to detect and trap submarines and to provide assistance to SACLANT, the United States and the western world. This assistance can be provided in the form of knowledge of who the underwater enemy is at any given time and where he is from day to day, once we are aware of his presence in our contiguous waters. The only way to do this is by the maintenance of a viable and credible ASW capacity.

The loss of the Bonaventure, at least to my layman's mind, represents the loss of the strongest part of one-third of the capability which we can provide to meet the very minimum standard of surveillance necessary to enable us to contribute to the total input of intelligence. Surely, in this day and age we do not need to get into the nuclear race in terms of the capacity to kill. Surely, there is a role for us to play in detection and surveillance. I believe we can play a very meaningful role, a role that would be credible in the eyes of our partners. I believe this is very necessary. There are many ways in which we could accomplish our objective, but there is no way short of the acquisition of another aircraft carrier to replace the loss of seaborne aircraft for use in this ASW operation. Thus the loss of the Bonaventure is serious.

As one senior serving Canadian naval officer termed it, it is a bloody significant loss. I do not know that it is necessarily that, but it is certainly a very serious loss and one that we are not going to be able to readily overcome. I am not talking about the viability of our ASW operation the moment hostilities break out. I do not think we can afford to get into that type of role, but surely up to that moment, God forbid that it should ever come to pass, we can make a meaningful contribution to the total input of intelligence. I am certain that we can do our share in detection, tracking and general surveillance. There is no reason why we cannot maintain our standards. I am not asking for the world. Surely, we can maintain the minimum standards necessary to make our contribution useful.

Today's writers suggest there is a serious question about the validity of ASW operations, that there must be a meeting of minds, not so much on the technological methods involved but on the principles. We have for a long time assumed, without debate, the necessity and logic for a reasonably high contribution to this field of defence. I think there is a rationale. Most of the writings, outside the area where discussion is classified and secret, question ASW operations, but in the final analysis no suggestion is made that countries such as Canada should get out of ASW operations. Indeed, Professor Martin, a very distinguished international writer on the subject of maritime strategy suggested to the subcommittee on Maritime Command not more than two or three days ago that there is a very real need for the contribution countries like Canada can make and that it would be a shame if Canada were to let her ASW expertise spin out. The loss of the Bonaventure and the absence of a suitable replacement turn out maritime command effort in a direction in which a spin out and run down will be a natural consequence. There is a role we can play in this area, although a limited one.

The experts today do not talk about sinking the Russian Polaris-type submarines which have nuclear capability. They seem to think that the Americans, for example, will seek in future to shoot down the missiles once launched. I am not talking about our getting into that aspect of the defence role because it is too expensive for us. But there is a role we can play and it is a vital one. If I could give Admiral O'Brien a real Christmas present it would be a couple of true submersibles, for the only effective way of trapping lies under the water where these missile-carrying submarines are to be found. I could go on for an hour or so talking about maritime command and defence matters in general, but there are other subjects I should like to touch upon briefly. One of them has been adequately dealt with by my dear friend and colleague from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). I refer to the pollution of our northern and Arctic waters. Without repeating the points he made, I should like to associate myself with his remarks and add one or two comments of my own.

I am concerned, as everyone in this House is concerned, about the effects of pollution in the north and the upsetting of the ecological balance. Canada has a responsibility to do something about this problem and it is regrettable there is not a much more intense public dialogue on the subject. It seems to me that the problem is not only a massive one but it is multinational in nature; it is not restricted to ourselves, the United States and other countries which use or plan to use the north regularly. If we look at a map of the ocean currents in the Arctic and trace those currents down to the point at which they join the waters of the Gulf Stream, we can easily imagine the consequences of a major disaster happening to a bulk carrier in our north at any time of the year. Not only would we find the waters of Hudson Bay and Labrador polluted, but the waters of the Gulf Stream itself would be affected and the mess would wind up in Europe.

It is not hard to understand the multinational consequences of a disaster in our north. If a forum were to present itself I would support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Ahuntsic (Mr. Rochon) at the NATO meetings recently for dealing with the question of the pollution of the deep seas. I would support this proposition because, to use words which were handed to me just before I rose, elocution is not the solution to pollution. We need to involve multinational groups in measures which are immediately effective and tangible. I am a little concerned as to how far a country like Canada can go, bearing in mind that as yet we have not even accepted legal responsibility for such things as navigational aids in the north; we have not even cleared up the question of the ownership of these waters and whether or not we control them. It seems a little ambiguous for a country like Canada to assume responsibility for pollution when it has not yet accepted legal responsibility for these waters.

It is important that we should get on with our program of providing navigational aid in the north and assistance to shipping by way of an adequate icebreaker service. As suggested by other speakers in this debate and in other forums, we ought to move rapidly in the field of research into the consequences of disasters such as an accidental oil-spill in the north. In Dartmouth in my constituency there is one of the world's leading centres for studies of the ocean. It is a matter of regret that this institute for oceanographic studies has not been directed by the government to get on with the job in the area I have mentioned.

Another matter which concerns me a great deal concerns the position of standing committees of this House. Without going back too far, let me recall for all hon. members the fate of the former minister of transport who found it necessary to resign after his task force had returned from a cross-Canada tour delving into the housing situation. He felt obliged to take this course because of the government's treatment of the report of the task force. It will not stretch the memory of hon. members too far to recall the treatment accorded by the government to the reports of the Standing Committee on Transportation. Also, those of us who serve on the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence remember, with some injury to our pride, the treatment accorded us after we returned from a tour of NATO countries. It is a matter of record that we were home a few days before the government made its announcement about NATO and troop reductions, but the fact is that the government knew exactly what it intended to do before we even went to Europe. It was not the least bit interested in our hearings and in our report; it merely wanted to get us conveniently out of the way—

Mr. Hales: A shameful treatment of committees; a complete disregard of them.

Mr. Forrestall: Even in the past few weeks we have witnessed the action of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) in announcing the decision to scrap the Bonaventure, among other things, within moments of the arrival back in Ottawa of the subcommittee which had been touring maritime command.

• (5:10 p.m.)

These are three classic examples of the sort of regard held for committees by the government of this country. I for one consider the government has shameful disregard for our committees, committees that could play a useful and meaningful role. I suggest that if the government continues in this way it will find it increasingly difficult to staff standing committees, particularly in cases where there is the slightest suspicion that the government has already made up its mind on matters referred to committees.

I could go on and talk of the waste of the taxpayers' money, but may I make just one or two references to an editorial that appeared in the Dartmouth Free Press of Thursday, September 25, 1969, and which dealt with what I consider a matter of some seriousness:

The federal government's policy of forming a number of task forces to tour the country and investigate various problems of national and international importance is a very commendable one.

I agree with that.

However, the government's reception of the reports of these groups has, to date, been somewhat amazing.

The Hon. Paul Hellyer's housing task force made a very extensive tour of the country—

I have already indicated the sort of treatment the task force received.

The Defence and External Affairs Committee toured Canada, and Canadian NATO bases in Europe, and by all indications their recommendation to maintain a strong NATO Commitment was ignored.

All members of the committee know this is true.

A subcommittee of this task force recently toured maritime command, but its recommendations were obviously not yet in the hands of the government before additional cutbacks, including HMCS Bonaventure's disposal, were announced.

Mr. Comeau: It is a farce.

Mr. Forrestall: It is more than a farce; it is an insult to the intelligence of the men who served on these committees.

These parliamentary groups are not touring the country with money provided from the pocket of [Mr. Hales.] the Prime Minister, but with the very liberal use of taxpayers' dollars. This expenditure was justified by the committee members themselves, in most cases, for they appeared to make their investigationns in a most conscientous manner. It is insulting to the members of parliament, and to the Canadian electorate who chose them for office, to have their sincere investigations apparently ignored.

These are serious times in the economic outlook of Canadians, and we can offer sympathetic understanding to some of the Liberal government's more drastic measures to reduce expenditures. However, some of the present policies indicate a contempt for Parliament and parliamentary committees which should not long be tolerated by the Canadian people.

I am surprised that the Canadian people have tolerated them even to this point. As I have indicated, this contempt for parliament is a source of embarrassment. I am sure the members of the government are conscious of this, as are the chairmen of the standing committees. In addition, a great deal of money is involved. As the editorial indicates, members of parliament seriously pursue their responsibilities in parliamentary committees. But I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you I suggest to the government, that we have a lot more to do than traipse around the countryside on futile missions while the government sits on its rear end with its mind already made up.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by adopting the practice of other speakers in this debate and congratulating my colleagues, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), for their initiation of this debate on the Speech from the Throne. May I endorse the remarks made by both, but particularly those of the hon. member for Sarnia, that one is now better able to appreciate the full impact and development, the logic and planning that has gone into the program presented by the government since its election to office in June, 1968. One can see for oneself that the government is not operating on a month-to-month or on a year-to-year basis, but in fact has formulated a program that will encompass all of the power and strength that its majority position in this House enables it to do. I welcome this kind of approach to government just as much as I welcome a change that guarantees the people of this country a government that has sufficient tenure of office to enable it to plan ahead for a number of years in this fashion.

This situation can be contrasted with that of the past decade. The government of today enjoys a majority, and therefore the virtual certainty of a tenure of office extending over four or five years. On the other side of the coin are those less certain, hectic times when day-to-day government is imposed by a minority situation in the House—government of the sort that immediately preceded the last election. All parties in the House faced difficulties which were created by a minority government situation. It was a situation which was readily embraced by the third and fourth parties represented in the House, because truly under such circumstances can they maximize their power and position in the affairs of this chamber.

In examining the Throne Speech one readily appreciates it is a continuation and an extension of the program that was begun by the government in 1968 when the first session of this Parliament commenced. In addition to the government's attendance to the day-to-day needs of the country, it has had as its paramount objective during its first year of office the reform of this institution. It has changed our way of doing business so as better to enable the House to expedite its affairs in a manner more in keeping with the needs of a nation that is growing and changing so rapidly.

Having accomplished the objective of enabling this House to conduct its business more efficiently and productively, the Throne Speech that introduced the second session is, I suggest, a logical follow-up. Having reshaped our procedures here in order to enable members on all sides and of all ranks better to participate in a really meaningful study and examination of the governmental process, this administration is now turning its face inwards and is making a clear pronouncement of those domestic problems that should receive priority, and the manner in which they will be dealt with in the coming session and those to follow.

In the order in which these problems appear in the Throne Speech, they include equality, both on an economic and on a linguistic basis; our Indian population and the position of Indians; the forthcoming review of and white paper on social security, on labour and industrial relations; and also, of course, the most important problem facing Canada today, that of the inflationary trend in our economy. The Throne Speech deals with the forthcoming white paper on taxation. It deals with the problems of grain farmers. It deals with the problems of the fishing industry, water resources and Arctic sovereignty. It also deals with the position of the government in our society. It deals with our position in respect of the Criminal law and whether one should fight to protect the liberties of the individual. It also deals with the question of consumer protection, not only in respect of credit but in respect of packaging, labelling and processing. It deals with the question of housing and outlines the prospect of one million housing starts in the forthcoming five years.

The Throne Speech deals with the government's intention to review policies in respect of external affairs, defence, citizenship, social security and taxation. Therefore, it is my pleasure to support and endorse in every way possible the Speech from the Throne which began the second session of this Parliament. As I say, it is a logical extension of the program launched in the first session of this Parliament. I support it because I know that in the forthcoming years this administration will carry on with the same logical and progressive programming which it began in 1968. I look forward to the testing of the use of the time and facilities available to the administration at the conclusion of this parliament and to a repetition of the majority mandate that we received in 1968. I look forward to such a testing at the forthcoming election, whenever it may take place.

The Speech from the Throne deals with problems that face this country at the present time. It has reference to our views on the future. Basically it places a heavy concentration of effort in the coming year on solving the problems in the areas I have mentioned. It is occupied particularly with the practical aspects of solutions to the problems we face in this country.

There are a couple of aspects of life in this country to which I should like to address myself. I believe these are important and valid considerations above and beyond the practical things of our day-to-day existence. Let me deal first with the problem of strikes. As a representative of Sudbury I perhaps speak with some reluctance on the subject of strikes. My area occupies a position of economical, educational, financial and cultural importance in northern Ontario, and it is now entering the fourth month of economic paralysis inflicted by a continuing labour dispute between the Falconbridge Nickel Company, the International Nickel Company and their respective unions—the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers at Falconbridge and the union at INCO.

The sadness of the situation does not relate to the position in which the companies find themselves or the position in which the unions find themselves. These two companies, particularly INCO, represent the major producers of nickel and hold a virtual monopoly in the world. World markets will wait for the production of nickel, whether it be this year or next year. We have witnessed this situation in respect of Stelco. The speculators are at the present time greatly interested in and aware of the fact that at the conclusion of the strike the price of nickel will rise. The outcome will not bother them. There is nickel in the ground and these companies will eventually produce it. World speculators will obtain nickel this year or next year at a higher price. Indeed, this situation applies to a greater extent to the production of nickel than to the production of steel, because the one union involved is not as powerful as it once was in this country.

Dealing particularly with the United Steelworkers of America, that rich, strong and powerful union, let me say that it will weather this and other storms in which it is involved in Canada. In due course the members will return to work as a result of an undaunted membership. The union will perhaps increase its membership in the process. In any event, it will again begin to produce and revenues will be restored. It will become an even stronger and more powerful union through growth or amalgamation.

I am not concerned about the power struggle between the unions and the company, or which of them becomes more powerful. I am concerned about our society. We are still permitting demonstrations of hostility and war between management and labour. This seems to be the only way in which we can solve differences or disputes between these factions. The disputes involve a difference in conception of what is a fair wage. Tremendous expense is involved in this process. It is a primitive approach to arriving at a proper assessment of the value of a working man. There are differences of opinion as to how much an employee should receive in wages in order to enjoy a reasonable living.

Let me give an example of the cost of these disputes. The International Nickel dispute alone cost about 50 per cent of the total annual payroll of the city of Sudbury. That strike alone cost about $42 million. The cost in terms of material that was not supplied to buyers amounted to $20 million. The loss of capital investment by the company, investment which would ordinarily have been made had the strike not taken place, amounted to about $30 million. One can add to that sum of $92 million a further sum in the neighbourhood of $120 million, representing the loss to various governments in revenue, transfer payments and taxes. This loss is obviously borne by the taxpayers.

Perhaps one could multiply that figure by two. Let us consider the fact that the International Nickel Company and the Falconbridge Nickel Company employ 2,300 men. This is a working force capable of sustaining a city of between 75,000 and 85,000 people for a period of four months, which is exactly the period of time these companies have not been producing. One needs very little imagination to project the effect of a strike on a community which is supported by one industry, but that is another subject. The fact is that we in this country cannot understand the position of the working man because we have been unable to develop a sense of trust between management and labour. Obviously, therefore, we cannot come to any sensible understanding of the problem or recognition of the fact that the working man should enjoy a decent standard of living.

We cannot come to a sensible recognition of the fact that a working man should enjoy an annual increment by virtue only of his seniority. We cannot recognize that a man must not be paid in year 1 the same salary one would expect him to be paid in year 10 for doing the same job. Our failure in this regard, and our leaving the entire responsibility to the give and take of economic warfare, represents a staggering expense and a crippling economic inactivity in my community. We are not alone in this regard; it is happening all over the country.

It is not easy for me to throw out on the floor of this chamber the idea that we should be able to recognize that an annual increment must be paid to every working man from time to time, and that in addition to an annual increment for seniority and longevity of service there should be a periodic adjustment based on increases in the cost of living. We know that in a period of expanding economy inflation also increases rapidly. That is not to say expansion is a bad thing. It is a healthy thing so long as it is allowed at a controlled rate.

So we expect these fluctuations and we recognize that the working man should enjoy a share of an expanding economy. He deserves an increment and adjustment in relation to a rise in the cost of living. The plain truth of the matter is that in our country in this day and age we should be able to develop a sense of trust and responsibility between management and labour. There should not be a war between them, but there is. There should not be hostility, but there is.

An hon. Member: This is free enterprise.

Mr. Jerome: It is an aspect of free enterprise that is not working to the advantage of this country nor to the advantage of many of its participants. The man who gets the short end of the stick at every turn is the man who is punching the card and carrying the lunch-pail. Because of what he is doing to support this labour-management process, he makes a sacrifice by having to live on whatever savings he may have for as long as the fight continues. Let us take as an example the situation at Stelco. I have been told—this may be inaccurate but I believe it is close to the truth—that the difference between the offer last August and the settlement that occurred in October at Stelco in Hamilton was less than 10 cents an hour. In my opinion the price that was paid by those working people to gain another 10 cents an hour was simply not worth it. The price paid by the country was not worth it. But above all, the price paid by the working men was not worth it because they will never get back the price they paid during the life of the contract or during their lifetime.

So I say that this is one of the most important areas we must be concerned about in the future, if we are to see above and beyond the day-to-day practical necessities of this countries and our day-to-day problems. If we are to do more than simply carry out the basic functions of our job, and work for genuine progress, one of the matters to which we should be inviting the fullest attention of every member of this House is a solution to the situation I have described, namely, the primitive way in which we live, where hostility exists between the working man and his employer to the eternal detriment of the working man.

This morning I had the pleasure of listening to the remarks of the very distinguished right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Let me hasten to say at the outset of my reference to the hon. gentleman that I hold in my hand a copy of Hansard for Tuesday, July 15 this year. I have this copy of Hansard in my possession and I will keep it for a long time because on that day the hon. gentleman paid me a personal compliment in the course of his remarks in this chamber. I regard that as one of the greatest compliments I have ever had or probably ever will have. At that time the hon. gentleman said he felt I had a great future as a parliamentarian. That compliment came from a man who I am sure in the minds of all of us epitomizes everything a parliamentarian should be. I pay that compliment to him as best I can in return for the one he paid me.

I am also sure, great parliamentarian that he is and great lawyer that he was before he abandoned that career for this, he will not be in any way disappointed when I say to him that during the course of his remarks this morning, genuinely filled with admiration for him as I am, I realized the drastic difference that exists between us in just about every consideration that affects a member of this chamber. The hon. gentleman is a veteran of this chamber and has achieved its highest honour, and I am a fledgling. If my seat were any farther back it would be in the lobby. He, the veteran of many sessions of parliament and one of its most experienced and able orators, holds a seat in the centre of the stronghold of Conservatism in this country. I, in beginning my career in this chamber, come from a seat in the stronghold of Liberalism in this country, northern Ontario.

I suppose our differences should be obvious because of those facts. But only this morning, when I heard the hon. gentleman devote the majority of his time in this debate to a discussion of what he described as the clandestine, and indeed subterranean plot on the part of the government to abolish the monarchy, did I realize that the difference between us could not be characterized any more clearly than was demonstrated by his major concern that there was in the Speech from the Throne an indication that the Queen does not describe this government in terms of "my government".

It is not my concern, Mr. Speaker, whether Her Majesty the Queen, whom I hold in the greatest respect, refers to this government as her government. My concern is that the young people of our country care enough about what goes on in this chamber, in this capital city and in this nation to describe it as their government. The hon. gentleman interpreted the rule changes passed by the House last session as an attempt to adopt a system which would restrict or stifle the free exchange of ideas in this chamber. Presumably he was referring to the present rules regarding the allocation of time for debate.

I could not take a more opposite view than to say that in my view we do not have a restriction on the exchange of ideas, of intelligent opinion and of intelligent commentary, but rather a requirement that when an oratorical contribution is made to the subject under discussion speeches should be limited. This rule will force members to make intelligent, meaningful and comprehensive speeches rather than engage in a filibuster designed to do nothing more than frustrate the business of this chamber.

I was interested to hear the complaint of the hon. member for Prince Albert, that because of the intention of the government to recognize Red China we appear to be playing into the hands of those who have declared themselves avowed enemies of freedom and who remain a threat to the peaceful existence of this country and our part of the world.

Is it not a strange coincidence that the same hon. gentleman in 1961, when his administration made the first wheat sale to the U.S.S.R. to feed those people who I presume then had the same avowed intention to overthrow the free world, hailed the sale as a great achievement in the economic affairs of this country?

Mr. Aiken: The hon. member missed the whole point.

Mr. Jerome: Let us be reasonable. The danger we face is not communism that is out in the open and is recognized as a threat, nor in our doing business with the U.S.S.R. and giving diplomatic recognition to Red China. That is not the danger we need to fear. Nor should we let ourselves be deceived for one second that that nation will ever be dissuaded from its avowed goal of overthrowing the free world by whatever means it thinks fit. In this sense I agree completely with the right hon. gentleman. The danger arises when these countries and others like them who have the avowed intention of overthrowing the countries of the free, western world, create disruption from within, like a cancer growing from within our society. The danger is that by relaxing our vigilance we allow within our borders the growth of situations upon which those who intend to create disorder in our society can feed and nourish.

I do not have to cite examples. Disorder and the disruption of the right of our citizens to a peaceful and orderly existence have occurred on our university campuses and in our cities. All too frequently they have been too horrible for anyone in the nation to forget. This is the danger and menace of communism. When we allow this form of strife and disorder to take place within our own nation; when we fail to pay proper attention to it and to stand up firmly for our rights, organized groups trained to overthrow this country can take over. These are situations in which they thrive, and we must be alert to them. We must be on our toes to protect the freedom of our country. This is the area we must watch and in which we must fight the enemy. It is not the diplomatic recognition of Red China that presents a danger.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there agreement to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Jerome: I will be brief, if possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't worry about time allocation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jerome: If I may conclude, Mr. Speaker, the important thing is not that there exists in this house a symbolic or ideological difference between one member and another; it is not important that we are worlds apart in our thinking, for indeed it is the very essence of Parliament to come here and take widely opposite positions and confront each other through an intelligent exchange of views and debate—the question is how this chamber is going to conduct itself and how it will be regarded in the eyes of the impatient youth of our country.

The question is: Will we be able to retain the credibility of all the people of our nation, whether they come from the coast or from the prairies, whether they are from Ontario or Quebec, whether they are young or old, whether they speak French or English, whether they are in management or labour, whether they are citizens of our country by birth or immigrants who have become naturalized Canadians? We cannot retain that credibility if we are afraid of change and stubbornly resist change of every sort just for the sake of resistance.

If we cannot through the orderly and intelligent introduction of innovation and progress in the conduct of the affairs of this country give expression to the restless and revolutionary spirit that exists in our young people, we will have to bear the responsibility for that restless and revolutionary spirit finding its expression on the streets and campuses in the form of disorder, disruption, violence and anarchy.

The challenge is for those opposite who would resist change to stand up and say so, to tell their colleagues to go to the nation and say, as some of them have already said, that their avowed intention is to resist even the few rule changes that we have introduced in this chamber. Then resistance is at the cost of effectively carrying on the affairs of this nation. So I say, stand up and tell the nation that when the next election is called they will promise that if given the mandate and the right to govern this country, their first move will be to remove any limitation or restriction on our time for debate and everyone will under their administration be able to speak in the House as long as he wishes. If that is their position, let them go to the public and say they cannot accept the changes we propose, that they will resist them and fight them with everything they have. We have rearranged the business of this House to make it a place where business can be carried out meaningfully and expeditiously through co-operation. The few basic changes we have made will create a more productive Parliament than the Canadian nation has ever had.

I challenge hon. members opposite to co-operate in bringing about necessary changes. I ask them to consider the very important fact that attracted to this chamber in the last election were about 100 new members. I suggest that those members bear watching and examination, and they will not be found wanting in their contributions to and participation in the affairs of the House. I say to the veterans, to those who have come back time and time again, that if through their stubborn resistance to change they allow this House to stagnate in frustration, let them bear the responsibility for the actions of our young people—those with whom they broke faith—and for what happens to this country in the future

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member if I could have a copy of his prepared text and, second, would he give me the name of the efficiency expert in the Prime Minister's department who was active in preparing the document? I have never before heard so much talk about efficiency. I would like to have the name of the efficiency expert in the Prime Minister's department who prepared the bulk of the text for the hon. member's speech. In that respect it was outstanding and brought to our attention the need for efficiency in this House. Further, could he give us the kind of thinking and philosophy behind this efficiency?

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to attempt to answer that question as best I can. First of all, although inexperienced in this chamber I happen to be one of those who feel it is something of a desecration of the position of a member for him to come into the chamber with a prepared text. It is my view that when a member attempts to participate in debate here he should be prepared to get involved and participate in the interchange of ideas.

For that reason most of the remarks I made were in response to those made this morning by the right hon. gentleman to whom I referred. I had no prepared text; I still have none. I made some notes this afternoon, which are now on my desk—three pages of pencilled notes. My preparation for the speech to which the hon. member has given such adulation began at 11.45 this morning and went on this afternoon. I accept his compliments with the greatest appreciation. Unfortunately, however, I made no further preparation than that, and thus I am unable to provide him with notes.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the sort of speech to which we have just listened provides an introduction for mine. I am going to speak about narcotics. I have for some time been trying to get information from the government on the subject. If anyone has resisted change, it has not been on this side of the House. If the honourable and distinguished member who has just sat down will do me the compliment of listening to me he will learn that I have some recommendations to make. I believe the narcotics problem is a national problem. I believe we must have answers now from ministers. We cannot be put off from day to day with answers to the effect that the matter is being considered.

People who have been criticizing me during the last few days—and they are not all on the opposite side of the House—have said that I should have been asking my questions of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). But one of the big problems is that under the roster system he is not in the House each day to answer questions. Under this system sometimes ministers ignore Parliament and refuse to attend even when they are due to attend.

All of us know that the responsibilities of cabinet ministers are such that they cannot always be in the House. But, Mr. Speaker, ministers are making use of this system to avoid giving answers. Dealing with this narcotic question, I wish to read the answer given to me by the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) as recorded at page 405 of yesterday's Hansard. The other day I asked him whether he had done any research on the charges faced by young men and women in Calgary. I asked whether he had ascertained the ages of the young people involved and the nature of the charges. His answer showed that he was uninformed.

The Solicitor General has graced this chamber for a long time, but I say to him that as Solicitor General he is not carrying out the functions and responsibilities of his office if he is not prepared to answer our questions. I have no large staff behind me. He has a whole department behind him. If I ask a question about a charge, or about what took place in such and such a place, it is his responsibility to come forward with the answers. In this instance he shirked his responsibility.

The Solicitor General replied to my question on Monday, when western Canadians who had gone home on Friday could not get out of Toronto to be back here on Monday. I will answer the Solicitor General tonight, and I will also answer the previous speaker to show that I believe in reform. I believe drugs have become one of our urgent national problems. We cannot continue to bury our heads in the sand with respect to the problem. This is what the Solicitor General said on Monday:

> Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, as reported at page 350 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary North asked me several questions concerning the sentencing of seven young people in Calgary on charges involving marijuana. I have looked into the matter and I find that the charges did not involve marijuana; they involved hashish, trafficking in hashish.
> [Mr. Woolliams.]

This was the answer of the Solicitor General, who had all the necessary staff behind him to find out the facts. But he is not doing the job properly. He is not interested in giving answers; he is interested in arriving at the door of the Senate.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would call it six o'clock. However, before I sit down I would like to have permission to read tonight the charges laid in these cases; then we will find out who is setting out the facts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 6(1).

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes I had before the recess I introduced my subject, which is the defence and preservation of the greatest asset that we have in Canada—our youth. Although I was not in the House on Monday to hear them myself, I did make reference to the remarks of the Solicitor General. I should like to place on record what I actually said last week and then read the charges obtained from the newspaper. Perhaps we can determine whether the Solicitor General is just making perfunctory answers or is really doing his homework.

On October 28, 1969 I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister about the subject of drug use, because it is now becoming a grave national problem. I had hoped to see the Minister of Justice here. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to have his government consult with provincial Attorneys General and Ministers of Education so as to encourage the setting up of an education program in elementary schools, high schools and universities in order that the youth of Canada will be informed and become more knowledgeable about the use of drugs?

I used the word "drugs". The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) answered:

> Mr. Speaker, we share the hon. member's concern about the need to have information disseminated on this important matter.

For that answer I congratulate the Prime Minister.

> That is why we have set up a commission under Dean LeDain. We are not considering any specific action along the lines the hon. member has suggested until the commission has reported.

May I pause for a moment. While the commission is studying, society goes on. When we read the charges and the ages of the boys and girls who were convicted and sentenced we will find that the process of justice cannot wait for this government. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) accused us of being against change. I want change—and before I am through tonight I will ask the Solicitor General to get moving. I asked the following supplementary question of the Prime Minister:

I appreciate that the commission is now investigating this question. But since many high school students and young people in our universities are being charged with possession of marijuana and trafficking in the drug—

I want to emphasize that; I do not want to be misquoted and I do not want the Solicitor General to do a "snow" job.

—and many of them cannot afford bail and therefore remain incarcerated, will the government not consider measures to make the law uniform and to make certain that sentences meted out in this country do not vary from province to province?

At the moment sentences vary from province to province. Last week it would have been far better to have been charged in Toronto than in Calgary although it is still Canada, still one nation. The Prime Minister said:

Mr. Speaker, sentencing is not within federal jurisdiction,—

That may be true, but judges are appointed by the federal government. However, that is another field and I will not go into it at this time.

—unless the hon. member is suggesting that we embark on the unusual course of setting a fixed sentence from which a judge cannot depart and over which he has no discretion.

Then I asked another question, Mr. Speaker, as follows:

The Prime Minister must be aware that in some cases young people are charged under the Narcotic Control Act, in which case they are liable to sentences of 7 to 14 years, while in other cases they are charged under the Food and Drugs Act where the sentence called for is much less.

I will deal with that in a few minutes. The Speaker brought me to order and I said:

Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I had to give a preamble in order that the Prime Minister will be filled in on the law.

I will let it go there for the moment. I asked some further questions and found the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) most gracious. I would not have bothered the Solicitor General on this subject at all the other day, but under the roster system some ministers are here and some are not. Urgent matters cannot await the will of the Prime Minister or even the Solicitor General. However, on this particular day I was fortunate enough to find my ducks on the pond. The Minister of Justice was here, and naturally I put my questions to him even though the Solicitor General gives the impression that I am not supposed to ask him questions. The Minister of Justice is not supposed to answer any questions —

An hon. Member: He is going to withdraw.

Mr. Woolliams: On October 30, as reported at page 278 of Hansard I directed a question to the Minister of Justice as follows:

In view of the large numbers of Canadians held, while awaiting trial in various jails, during the July and August summer vacation—

To satisfy some of my Legal friends in Calgary, I was not referring to that city but to Canada. I hope that one particular Justice in Calgary reads that.

—when there is little activity in the courts, would the minister consider calling on retired judges, who are experienced, to assist the courts to clean up these dockets during the summer vacation? Many of these people are unable to get bail or cannot afford it.

I had read in the Globe and Mail that 50 or more young people had been held in jail over the summer because they could not afford bail. This government stands for change but this is going on whilst you are alive; you are governing the country, you are the responsible government. The Minister of Justice replied:

That is a very good idea, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that the administration of justice is constitutionally the responsibility of the provincial Attorneys General.

That is basically true, Mr. Speaker, but let us not hide from the facts. The Narcotic Control Act is directly under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are the responsibility of the Solicitor General. These ministers should not try to pass the buck or do a snow job by passing it on to the provinces. The Prime Minister is hiding under the protection of the constitution while trying to govern the country. He does nothing, protesting that the constitution does not permit him to make a move. I put another question:

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that many of these people being incarcerated are young men and women charged under the Narcotic Control

Act, which is a direct responsibility of the minister's department, will he contact these very special Crown prosecutors—

I could name some of them. They are only special because they are prosecutors and not because of any other function they perform.

—across the nation to see whether these people can be released on bail? Many of them are high school and university students.

The Minister of Justice answered again. Because he was there that day I do not complain about his answers. He said:

I will take that into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Now, compare the answers of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice with those of the Solicitor General who has had a lot to say about my charges, both inside and outside the House. Things come back to us in this place and we find out what is going on. He tried a snow job. There was even an emissary sent to speak to people in my party.

On October 31 I looked around for the Minister of Justice but he was not here, it was not his day. The Solicitor General was here. As reported at page 350 of Hansard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) asked a question about legal reform. I had read about this hon. member before I ever arrived in this House and I know he is one man who has always stood for reform. In that regard I back him 100 per cent.

I asked the question of the Solicitor General because his portfolio is closest to that of the Minister of Justice. I do not know whether he is above him or below him. The question is as follows:

I wish to ask a supplementary question dealing with criminal reform, Mr. Speaker. I direct the minister's attention to the Narcotic Control Act. In view of the fact that in Calgary, and the same thing is happening in other cities, seven young people ranging in ages from 16 to 21 yesterday received sentences totalling 29 years on charges involving—

I did not say "possessing."

—marijuana, is it the policy of the government to instruct federal Crown prosecutors to press for sentences up to five years so that this group of young people so incarcerated may be used as a deterrent against the use of drugs—

I did not use the word "marijuana"; I said "drugs." All drugs are included in the Narcotic Control Act. I do not want a snow job done in respect of what I said.

—in the universities and high schools, and is this not a misuse of the law?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Now we come to the perfunctory answer of the Solicitor General:

Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members wil recognize that it is quite impossible for anyone to accept the premises that were added to the question asked by the hon. member. I understand that this question was asked yesterday of the Minister of Justice,—

If the Solicitor General had read what I asked the Minister of Justice he would find I included all drugs under the Narcotic Control Act. However, he wanted to do a snow job because he will not face up to his responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: What he really wants to do, Mr. Speaker, is leave the impression that I am trying to misrepresent the facts.

Mr. McIlraith: So you are. You are doing just that.

Mr. Lundrigan: He finally woke up.

Mr. Woolliams: I will read on. I will let the record speak for itself because the record does not speak favourably for the Solicitor General. I continue:

A further supplementary question, since the RCMP comes under the minister's jurisdiction. In light of the answer given by the minister, would he at an early date give a full report to the House on the pressing for these sentences imposed on seven young people in Calgary? Is it also the policy of the minister to instruct the RCMP to act as stoolpigeons,—

I do not know whether that is correct or not. The newspapers said it is. The RCMP mixed with the young people. That is how they obtained their evidence. As a trial lawyer, I have always understood when the police did that sort of thing, whether they liked the name or not they were basically acting as stoolpigeons. They are getting in the cake-mix so they will know the ingredients of the cake. Having read my questions and the answers given by the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General knew that I was dealing with the broad question of drugs. The reason I asked the questions was that I did not have the court docket; I do not carry it around in my back pocket. It is the function of the Solicitor General to know what E.G. McCormick, Q.C., of Calgary is doing. He received a Liberal appointment as a special federal drug prosecutor. It is the Solicitor General's function to have this information available.

When I asked these questions I expected answers from the Solicitor General. If I was in error about the drugs in the charges, he could have stood up and stated so. Instead of that he implied that he had done some work on the question when in fact he had not. He just gave a beautiful, big snow job. I received my information from the newspapers; I have not checked the court docket. If I am wrong in this, it is because I have not checked the court docket. The courthouse has been closed whenever I have been home since this incident occurred. I shall read the sentences handed down to these young people in Calgary to whom I have already referred, which information I received from a leading Calgary newspaper.

The first one is Linda Wattie, age 20; 1½ years for trafficking in synthetic marijuana and 1 year concurrent for selling LSD. Allen James McGregor, age 21, architectural student from Calgary; 5 years for trafficking in hashish and 3 years concurrent on each of three counts for selling LSD. William Alberta Godfrey, age 16, student from Calgary; 2½ years for trafficking in marijuana. Yet the minister stood in his place on Monday in my absence and said they were not charged in connection with marijuana. I did not say there were not charged with trafficking in marijuana alone but other drugs. I know what is going on, and I hope the minister does. I repeat that Godfrey was 16 years of age.

With regard to Charles Arthur Gibbs, age 17, from Vancouver, B.C., the newspapers state his father is a retired Anglican minister. That cut me deeply because it runs into the roots of my religion. Gibbs received three years for trafficking in hashish. Ross Eric Gagnon, age 20, a welder from Ontario; 2 years concurrent on two counts of selling LSD. William Roy Crews, age 20, welder from Medicine Hat; 5 years for trafficking in hashish and 2 years concurrent on each of two charges of selling LSD. Murray Kenneth Christie, age 21, of Calgary; 5 years for trafficking in cannabis resin, which is hashish. Some of these charges involved marijuana and some involved hashish; yet the Solicitor General, as recorded at page 405 of Hansard, stated:

> Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, as reported at page 350 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary North asked me several questions involving—

Mr. McIlraith: You read the word "involving". Quote it correctly.

Mr. Woolliams: I don't intend to answer. The minister can make his own speech. I do not think he can stand the heat. He should stay out of the kitchen. I continue to quote:

> Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, as reported at page 350 of Hansard, the hon. member for Calgary North asked me several questions concerning the sentencing of seven young people in Calgary on charges involving marijuana. I have looked into the matter and I find that the charges did not involve marijuana.

I ask the Solicitor General to stand in his place and say that none of those charges involved marijuana. I am not the Solicitor General; I do not have his staff. Like most hon. members, I get my information from the newspapers. I do not have a large research staff; I have one secretary and sometimes I am lucky enough to have two. Let us get down to brass tacks in this regard.

The hon. member for Sudbury today spoke about the great, Liberal reform party. Let us see what the law says about these matters. I intend to read from the Narcotic Control Act. I suggest to the Prime Minister that we should now encourage a course of action in respect of drugs. I abhor the use of drugs as much as any member of this House of Commons or any member of society. I also abhor the fact the law does not distinguish between one category of offence of trafficking and another. I will explain what I mean by that in a moment. The Statutes of Canada, 1960-61, provide at page 212:

> (2) Every person who violates subsection (1) is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for seven years.

Cases involving possession of marijuana can be tried under the Narcotic Control Act. Persons convicted of being in possession of the drug are liable to seven years imprisonment. If they are guilty of trafficking, they are liable to life imprisonment. If we were dealing with those trafficking adults who selfishly destroy the moral fibre of the youth of Canada, the United States and all over the world, we would be dealing with the real traffickers. I agree that these people should be given a life sentence. I am sure we would all be happy to know that the real traffickers, the adults, the senior people who are making large profits selling drugs of all descriptions to our youth and are destroying the moral fibre of our nation, received this type of sentence. If we could catch up with those people and put them in jail, we could say a prayer of relief tonight and we would be able to sleep with satisfaction. This party stands for the youth of our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I give the government some credit. Section 32 of the Food and Drug Act was amended last year so that in cases of possession a person may be charged by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment. For a first offence by summary conviction a person may be ordered to pay a fine of $1,000 or six months imprisonment; or he may be sentenced to both. The fine may be $2,000, or two years, or both, on subsequent offences. However, it is still possible to proceed by indictment. I will have something to say later about that: The Crown decides the legal course to be taken.

What is happening to our youth? What is happening to the students in high school who are on drugs? I have been told by the youth that one student goes out, possibly a young fellow 16 years of age, purchases $25 worth of marijuana and brings it back. This person does not make any profit; he is merely buying it as an agent so that the others can get it. Next week perhaps another student will do this. That is a different kind of trafficking. It distinguishes from the trafficking wherein adult criminals are using the drug to make large profits and are destroying the moral fibre of our nation. The greatest asset we have is the youth of our nation. This is why I am concerned, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister agreed with me that it was an important subject, but not the Solicitor General. Can we wait on this government any longer for action?

I will now turn to the amendments to the Criminal Code. I hope I will be right in this regard because I had to do my research very quickly this afternoon. Section 622 of the Code was not changed. It is a pretty harsh section. An accused who is convicted of an indictable offence calling for punishment of imprisonment for five years or less may be fined in lieu of imprisonment. When liable for imprisonment of longer than 5 years he cannot be fined in lieu of imprisonment. So what happens? We come back to the Narcotic Control Act, and, if they are in possession, seven years is the maximum sentence. So section 622 cannot be used.

Several years ago I defended some fine young people, scholarship winners from Sanford University, California, in the United States. I shall not give their names, but they were Americans. One of them was the daughter of a very famous writer; the fathers of some of the others were in high places. This government talks about reform. Fortunately, in that case I thought the judge was a very reasonable man because he seemed to agree with me. He said to the federal crown prosecuter: These young people are not criminals; they were out getting their kicks. Actually, they had brought in marijuana from the States and passed it around among other university students, some of them from western Ontario, and they were caught. Fortunately, the R.C.M.P., used their discretion and laid charges of possession only. But under this law, before the Food and Drugs Act was amended the maximum penalty is seven years, so according to the law they would not be able to be fined. But I had a reasonable judge and I suggested he should give them one day in gaol and a $500 fine. He agreed with me and, as hon. members know, under our law from the British a sentence of one day's imprisonment is not actually served.

Today we are facing one of the great national crises of the time. I am no Kinsey who goes out and gets all the answers, but I am told by young people there are high schools and universities in Canada where 60 per cent of the students are on drugs of some kind. That is a high percentage. I shall not name the fellow who came to see me this week. He was 22 years of age and he had quit his job in an insurance company. He said to me: Mr. Woolliams, I have never taken drugs but I am now going to find out the facts because the government is too slow in finding them out. We must save the youth of the nation. I abhor the use of drugs. I wish I could be sure tonight that no one would take drugs in this nation.

An hon. Member: A drugged government, moved by hallucination.

Mr. Woolliams: What about Godfrey, 16, and Linda, 20? Time will not permit me to discuss the conditions which exist in most of the gaols of Canada, but I have been in many of the penitentiaries as a guest. Conditions have improved tremendously under several ministers of justice, not only Conservative ministers but Liberals. The fact remains that once a young person has been incarcerated in a penitentiary even for a short period while his application to a proper institution is being processed, he or she is forced to mix with the worst kind of adult criminals. No one can tell me that this is a program of reform or rehabilitation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not think anyone in this House of Commons or in the country really thinks that a lengthy service imposed on these young people will either rehabilitate them or act as a deterrent to other young people becoming involved in the use of all kinds of drugs. Young people have for months come to my house saying there is a heavy use of drugs. Some may exaggerate, but when there is a heavy use there will be people in possession; there will be young people buying drugs for others, and they are traffickers. I am well aware of the psychological, emotional and physical disturbances of mind and body of those engaged in the misuse of drugs. I have told hon. members what section 622 of the criminal Code calls for. It states that an accused person convicted of an offence punishable with imprisonment for more than five years may not be fined in lieu of any other punishment that is authorized. The new Bill C-157, chapter 38, of the 1968-69 Statutes relieves the situation by empowering our judiciary to suspend sentences under certain conditions.

I recommend that we should cause a study to be made and that on the basis of the best knowledge available today, scientific, medical and psychological, begin now in all the high schools and universities a compulsory course so that youth may be aware not only of the dangers of the use and misuse of drugs but also of the most horrible and terrible penalties which are presently prescribed by the law.

How many of them know what the penalties are? How many of you believe that a girl of 16, convicted and sent to prison for three years or five years, a girl who could be the daughter of any one of you, will be rehabilitated in an institution of that kind, or that her sentence will really serve as a deterrent to others? I cannot accept this. I do not believe it. Critics of my position might change their opinions if they understood what happens to these young people who serve terms in goal. There is the question of the confinement, the environment, the human atmosphere of which they will be part, which will in itself destroy our youth psychologically, emotionally and physically as effectively as the problem which put them there. In a psychological sense, high school and university students who have not suffered incarceration will find their own moral fibre destroyed.

Tonight, in the city of Edmonton, 200 law students are petitioning this so-called reform government. One student said to me: I am not taking part because I want to be articled with a big law firm and they are part of the establishment. But others have said: We are petitioning because we think the law is wrong. What happened to these youths in Calgary was wrong, and that is why I rise to speak tonight.

Someone must speak for the youth. I know there are hundreds of Canadians who would speak as I am speaking tonight, and that other members of parliament who are sympathetic to this situation. I must be fair to the minister and admit that my words in one or two of the questions addressed to him might have been more explanatory. But what does it matter whether marijuana, hashish or another similar drug is involved? Canadian boys and girls are on drugs. If the minister thinks harsh sentences will serve as a deterrent, I ask him to cast his mind back to the days of the bootleggers. What happened then? The political scientists tell us that we can legislate certain things but that we cannot legislate morals. Prohibition failed. And some of the people who peddled liquor across the border are sitting in high places today, Mr. Speaker. They belong to another generation. We who throw stones had better not live in glass houses. As Emerson said: We are part of all we have met. Each is needed by each one and nothing is good alone.

In the context of modern society, I say to hon. members: This is your problem. I did not come here to fight with the minister but I admit I was hurt that he should confuse the issue and do a snow job on me. My wife said: You must feel almost like a No. 1 criminal because of what he has said. Well, I am happy that I have enough integrity to stand in this House and defend the youth of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: I end on this comment, Mr. Speaker. One of the main reasons I am proud of my leader is that he thinks of our youth.

He has the same feelings I have. I have not discussed with him my comments tonight but I have confidence that he will stand with me to reform the law. We need an educational program for our youth so that we can save the best asset we have—the young people of Canada.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, before returning from Winnipeg I searched the newspapers during the course of last week for some news of the Throne Speech debate. It was quite remarkable what little coverage there was. I can conclude only that the dullness of the Speech from the Throne and its low profile militated against those good members who by their intervention deserved to be noticed. I have had the chance of reading Hansard and I should like to congratulate members on this side for their participation. May I also congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address on the other side of the House on their contributions, which were excellent; indeed, they were much better than the Throne Speech itself.

I listened to the speaker who preceded me generate some fire and express some concern about the future of this nation, a concern that was lacking in the Throne Speech. Looking at the Throne Speech one would think there are no problems facing this country; that this is the best of all possible worlds. Any historian who in the future looks back to this document and examines the situation in which this country finds itself will be shocked at the serious nature of our conditions. To read the Throne Speech is to be unaware that this country is in danger of cultural extinction; that there is more foreign ownership of industry in this country than in any other country in the world. And it is not only a question of foreign ownership; our culture is dominated by the mores and values of others, values that might have relevance to another civilization but not to ours.

For years some lip service at least was paid to the notion of establishing a Canada Development Corporation; yet there is not a word about this in the Throne Speech. Even that small concession to Canadian nationalism has been dropped. It is not as though we were winning our fight for existence. We are losing that fight owing to lack of policies on the part of the government.

To look at the Throne Speech is to be oblivious of the fact that two cultures, two peoples who need each other desperately, are reaching the point where they can hardly communicate with each other. The Throne Speech has nothing to remedy that situation. It has no solutions to offer to a serious crisis of our time. To look at the Throne Speech is to be blind to the fact that there is an outside world that needs our help, a world that should expect more from Canada than it has been getting. We in this country are in a position to make a significant contribution to underdeveloped nations of the world, but we are not doing so.

One is hurt by this kind of Throne Speech. One might have forgiven such a speech last year on the ground that a new government was feeling its way and should be given a chance. But that cannot be said this year. The government is showing a lack of idealism and a lack of concern for the future of this country. I and people like me are concerned about this attitude because we remember during the last election the hopes that were aroused among the young people of this country. I remember going into a polling booth, seeing a young girl clutching her check-off sheet and praying that the Liberals would win. She was praying that Mr. Trudeau would win because he was going to save this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: But he has not done this. Why do hon. members applaud?

Mr. Lewis: They are applauding you.

Mr. Saltsman: I happened to meet some of these people this summer. They came to me adopting a very defensive attitude inasmuch as they had worked very hard against me in the campaign. There was nothing personal; it was simply the way they felt. They said to me, "Tell me, Mr. Saltsman, what do you think of our Prime Minister? What do you think about what he is doing?" I replied, "Please don't ask me, because I do not want young people to hear the kind of language that I might have to use". I wanted to be kind to them. I did not want to tell them that their faith and trust has been betrayed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Saltsman: There is no cause for complacency or self-satisfaction. Hon. members opposite seem to think that this is a big joke. It is the government's Throne Speech that is the big joke, though it is no joke to the people of Canada. There are many jokers on the other side of the House. Some of them are smiling jokers, and some serious-faced jokers. One of the ministers of the government smiles beautifully. I refer to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). He charms all the ladies. One can only say with great regret that it is too bad that all the wheat buyers of the world are not ladies. However, the government has caught up with him now and have transferred the role of wheat salesman to somebody else.

The minister goes around the country giving lectures to people in industry. He tells them to pull up their socks, that we in this country have to be productive, that we have to export our products. But what kind of policy framework has he created for these industries? What kind of assistance does he suggest? He has no answers. He is a lecturer. Toujours le professeur. He gives beautiful lectures but has no answers. The reason he has no answers is that he has no commitment to Canadian nationalism.

A long time ago the minister made up his mind that the economy of Canada was going to be integrated with that of the United States, so why should he bother about policies. Policies would only get in the way of this kind of integration. So this very competent man—and I do not underestimate his competence—has simply given up on the job.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for St. Boniface rising to a point of order?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question, if I may.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is entirely for the hon. member whether he wishes to accept a question.

Mr. Saltsman: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I will accept the question.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member makes much of encouraging Canadian industry instead of our United States friends. I should like to ask him whether his party gave a lot of consideration to this matter, in view of the fact that the lapel buttons his party members were wearing at their convention in Winnipeg last week were printed in the United States?

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, that is typical of the picayune mind of hon. members on that side of the house. It is an affront to the intelligence of members of this house when questions of that kind are asked. Surely the hon. member knows that the badges he has referred to were merely printed in the United States. Even had they been printed in Canada we should not be narrow-minded about them. We do not believe that chauvinism should be carried to the extreme and that every badge should be printed in Canada. We believe in trade; we believe in good relationships with other countries in the world. To pick up a button and say, "My, what a terrible thing it is that you should wear a button that is printed in the U.S.A." is nothing more than a display of an attitude which I suggest is not worthy of the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Perhaps it is.

Mr. Saltsman: I prefer to think that it is not, and that it is merely a mental aberration due to the lateness of the hour. Let me return to the serious problem with which I was dealing before that somewhat irreverent and irrelevant interjection. There is a serious problem in respect of the nature of Canadian industry and we are in danger of becoming, not a second-class nation but a third or fourth-class nation unless something is done to make our industrial structure more efficient.

In France, Servan-Schreiber pointed out the great dangers facing Europe because of United States ownership. But he does not place the blame on the United States; he places it quite properly on European countries for not doing something about the problem. He pointed out—and he might have said the same thing about Canada—that the advantage in the future of computers, electronics and advanced technology will be to those countries which organize their industrial structure so as to create suitable companies which will take advantage of the inventions and technologies. We are not doing that; we are borrowing. We can borrow and live fairly well on the loan, but the future will not be ours. We will eventually reach the point where we will be so dependent that we will no longer have the opportunity to make a significant contribution as a nation.

When I look at the Throne Speech I find there is some emphasis on the question of individualism, individual rights and individual personalities. Let me suggest that there can be no personality out of the context of a nation. A person does not exist in a vacuum; he exists as part of a nation, as part of a country and as part of a culture. If that nation, country or culture is destroyed, I suggest that the individual will also be destroyed. He will have no opportunity to be proud of having a nationality. I do not want to see that happen in my country, and I do not think many hon. members of this chamber would choose this kind of solution to our problems. However, if the policies of this government are not changed, that will be the horrendous prospect.

In my riding I have seen a number of examples of the failure of the Department of Industry to offer any real assistance to companies. We have a sweater and a knitted-goods industry which is now virtually finished. I know it is a vulnerable industry which has been in danger for a long time. Having spoken to the people in this field I have been informed that they are not asking for protection or special favours. They want to know the policy of the government in respect of the industry. They want to know what we are going to do in the future. They want to know, if the government has reached the conclusion that the industry is expendable.

If the government has decided they do not want this industry any longer, they want the government to say so in order that they may make other plans and redirect their energies. That is not what has happened. They have been asking for answers, which have not been forthcoming. The government's attitude is that perhaps the industry will die gradually and the problem will disappear. That is not a fair or honest way to treat an industry. There is no program on the government side of this house—just lectures and little, moral homilies.

Electrical industries have complained about discrimination in respect of purchases by overseas companies and the fact that very little has been done to help them. Engineering industries are competing or attempting to compete in respect of projects which are being supported by government funds. They find themselves totally excluded. The corporations receiving government funds are going outside the country to do their buying; they are not even entertaining bids from Canadian companies. This is an unfortunate situation and the solution is not simple. A great deal of the problem is concerned with financing, much of which is being offered by foreign companies. Canadian companies have reason to be dissatisfied because of the lack of attention being paid to this problem.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

My area is a relatively affluent one. We in Waterloo are being asked to raise taxes to help the less fortunate areas of Canada. We do not object to this. As a matter of fact, we are pleased and proud to assist in this way. But when we do so I think we are entitled to ask that those areas being helped should attempt to provide opportunities for areas such as mine. If this is not done, the will to assist will not be strong and the program to assist designated areas in Canada will suffer.

We recently experienced a nickel shortage. There is still a nickel shortage in this country. In spite of the fact that manufacturers in Canada use a very small amount of the nickel produced in this country, some of them have had to shut their shops and lay off employees because nickel is not available. The policy of the government is that we should treat all customers alike. That sounds fine on the surface. The exporter gets his share, but the government intends that the Canadian manufacturer shall receive only the share he received in the past.

I suggest it would require a change of only 1 or 2 per cent to ensure that manufacturers in Canada do not suffer from a shortage of materials. Obviously it is not the policy of this government to assist Canadian industry. I have said in the past, and I repeat, that the policy of the government is oriented to the selling of raw materials to the United States. It has very little concern for the development of secondary manufacturing in Canada. Members of the government may stand up and deny this, as they have in the past, but I have never found their arguments very convincing.

The government made one feeble attempt at setting up a department of industry and the department collapsed; it did not work out. This did not occur because the idea was not worth while but because the government did not give it any direction. They did not give sufficient attention to the problems of Canadian industry and eventually they threw up their hands in despair and decided to put it back in the Department of Trade and Commerce where it was before. Now there does not seem to be a policy for secondary manufacturing in this country. There does not seem to be a policy that would change the direction of our economy from one of natural resource development to one of secondary manufacturing. Sooner or later, as rich as we are in minerals, those minerals will not be available.

What will we do then if we have not become a manufacturing nation?

This afternoon I had the unhappy experience of listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) when he appeared before the committee. He is an absolute disaster because he just talks. We have many talking heads over there. They talk a lot but do not do anything; they just lecture. The Minister of Finance talks too. He talks about inflation. His approach is that it can be talked away. He tells people they are going to get rid of it and he expects them to believe this. He talks about voluntary guidelines. He must know they have not worked in the past and will not work now. He seems to have a notion that people in business in this country are fools and will listen to the kind of things he suggests.

This country is experiencing a terrible economic situation. Despite the high-blown speeches the Minister of Finance makes we are having the worst of all possible conditions—high unemployment, slow growth and a rapid rate of inflation. What does he suggest as a way out of this situation? He suggests cutting back on a few government employees and cutting back on public expenditures. He will set an example for the private sector. There is just one thing wrong with that. The private sector is not paying attention to him. Every time he pulls in his belt they let theirs out and nothing is being accomplished.

When suggestions are made to the minister and it is pointed out that he cannot go on in this way and is living in a fool's paradise, he responds by making terrible speeches about communism and Cuba which have nothing to do with the suggestions made. If we tell the minister we must come to a point where some of the unjustifiable price increases in our economy are contained, he does not listen. He says, "Oh, you mean wage controls?" We say, "No, we do not mean that; we are talking about some price control". He says it is the same thing. It is not the same thing.

When one speaks of price control it is one thing to say there may be some element of wage restraint in it, but there also are many other elements in it. There is profit restraint in it as well. He does not acknowledge that. He simply refuses to face up to the fact that we are now living in an entirely different world. It is not possible any more to control inflation with the old weapons. To say we can control inflation by restricting prices and wages to productivity gains is no answer, either. Even if we were able to do this, such a situation would not take into account the fact that almost 50 per cent of our population is engaged in activities where the prospect for productivity increase is almost nil. I am talking about the service sector. How do you increase the productivity of a nurse, a doctor or a lawyer? There are very limited possibilities in these areas. It is very difficult to do this.

If there are productivity increases in some industries and wages rise there, surely it is unreasonable to expect that those in the non high-productivity industries will sit by and see their position even more eroded than it has been in the past. They will not accept that situation. This means that we have a built-in inflation in our system. We will have to live with it. We will have to do everything we can to minimize its effect, but until we realistically face up to the fact that there will be some inflation in our society we will never see justice done for those who are hurt by inflation.

As long as the minister says that we cannot increase old age pensions and attempt to do any of these things because we must control inflation first, he is in effect saying we will never be able to help that segment of society because we will never be able to control inflation in this country or any other country. The only reasonable and just approach to our problem of inflation is to compensate those who are hurt by inflation. There is no other way.

We cannot say to the old age pensioners that we will not help them until we bring inflation under control, because we will not bring it under control and the old age pensioner must be helped now. We have all had an opportunity to be back in our ridings this summer and talk to people with ordinary problems. To them, however, these are difficult problems. This experience restores my perspective concerning what is happening, because I see the effect government policies have on the ordinary people of this country. I see the effect the cutting back of these expenditures is having on the people. Mothers call me about their disturbed children. Some of these are children 11 or 12 years of age who are already in trouble with the law or are having difficulty in school. These children desperately need help. They may one day show up in our courts because they have killed somebody and then we will want to hang them. These children need help now. We know what is happening; there is restraint on them. The federal government set the example and the provincial governments are following it.

We are told that only so much can be done in one area. When I ask what will happen to the children when the quota is filled, officials shrug their shoulders and say they cannot do more because they do not have the money. It is incredible that we should stand by and watch this kind of thing happening to children who did not ask to be born, and whom we will condemn five years from now if they have committed a crime. We turn them away at a time when they plead for our help. If we look around we see old people living in tiny lofts above stores. These people may have only one, two, three or four more years to live. We built some good housing for older people in my area, beautiful accommodation. Those less fortunate look longingly at the people who were fortunate enough to get this public accommodation.

Mr. Lind: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Saltsman: In a moment, Mr. Speaker. They ask: Why cannot we have it? The answer is, of course, that the federal government has decreed that we shall have austerity. These people ask: If there is austerity, why are there so many hamburger stores going up all over the place? Are they more important than providing accommodation for these people? I say no, but this government says yes. The government is to be condemned for that kind of callousness and for its refusal to act. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) asks: What do you want me to do—interfere with the economy? That is communism. I say that is not communism, and if it means that we have to interfere with the economy in order to ensure decent housing for old people rather than setting up 700 more hamburger stands, let us interfere with the economy.

In my riding we have handicapped people. We pride ourselves on our manpower program. It is a reasonably good program as far as it goes. It does not go far enough because in order to take advantage of the program one has to be, first of all, three years out of school; one has to be unemployed for three years, which is the case with some of the handicapped people. They are told: Go to the province, which has a special program for the handicapped. This is all right except that the province does not have any money or any facilities, and it is doing what the federal government wants it to do, which is practising austerity. There are handicapped children who need help. They are born with these handicaps. They are not being helped by federal programs; they are being turned away from the provincial programs and simply discarded on some kind of human junk heap. It is too expensive and troublesome to try to train them; they do not fit into the pattern.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Lind: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. As the time of the hon. member has expired, the unanimous consent of the house is necessary to allow the hon. member to ask his question. I understand there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Lind: I was wondering if the hon. member would answer a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. There is not unanimous consent.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is traditional to commend those who formally participate in this debate, the mover and the seconder and the party spokesmen. This I do readily and sincerely. There have been some notable speeches in the course of the debate. I regret I was unable to hear the speech of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in its entirety this afternoon. I was pleased to hear that during his absence from the House of Commons he has become chancellor of the University of Saskatchewan and a patron of Canadian letters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: But I did have a rueful moment at the realization that one of the last grass root hold-outs had finally capitulated and become firmly entrenched as a member of the Canadian establishment. I also extend my commendation to members for the quality of the debate to which they contributed from all sides of the House. Hon. members are obviously concerned about their constituencies and their country, and while their diagnoses and remedies vary drastically and are sometimes contradictory, I do not think anyone can question the sincerity and dedication of those who have spoken in this debate. Perhaps I will be forgiven if I single out government backbenchers for special mention.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What a surprise!

Mr. MacEachen: It was evident from the tenor and content of their speeches that they as a group have a better appreciation of some of the problems confronting Canada and Canadians as we enter a new decade and have offered more constructive suggestions and criticisms than any member of the opposition parties. I think this is an encouraging trend.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps they should take the place of the cabinet.

Mr. MacEachen: It may be that so far as members of the opposition parties are concerned, the Address in Reply has become more and more of a ritualistic activity in which the sole preoccupation is with criticism and condemnation. If this is so, there is a hope that this atmosphere of obsessive negativism displayed by the opposition will be offset by the existence within the government party of an articulate and constructive back bench.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: During this debate hon. members have had a good deal to say about the relevancy of Parliament as it presently operates. I think the concern is that politics has taken to the streets and there is a danger that what we do and say in Parliament has more to do with past practice and protocol than with the real issues; that we are indulging in meaningless verbal posturing and pirouetting while the real concerns of the people pass us by. I believe that is the sense of the concern of members. If I sense also the correct nature of the criticism made of Parliament by its members, there is a feeling that there is not enough debate in the real sense; that the clash of ideas and convictions which we have so long cherished as one of Parliament's main purposes does not take place either in the atmosphere of immediacy or in the context of a current time frame. To this I say: Let us plug in Parliament. Let us connect the Commons to the wider community through the medium of television. I can think of no other action on our part which holds better hope of retaining or restoring relevancy in this institution and giving politics a place in the scheme of things in the 1970s.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEachen: The principal priority of the government, as has been stated in the debate, is to fight inflation. This priority coincides with the current concern of the majority of Canadians. We have stated the elements of the policy we have adopted to deal with this problem. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and others have put the elements of this policy on the record for examination, discussion and debate; and the governor of the Bank of Canada has made his views known. There has been a lot of criticism from the opposition and much verbal shrapnel has been flying about. To listen to the opposition, everything is wrong. Yet as I have listened and as I have read carefully the speeches made, I have noted that they have not put forward an alternative policy to that which is being followed by the government. Our analysis of the problem and our solutions have been totally uncontested by the opposition's financial spokesmen.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, instead of directly confronting the government on this main point, instead of contesting it on the main issue before the country today by a motion of non-confidence, the official opposition evaded and side-stepped that main point and resorted to vague generalities. In this connection I might mention that even the mighty thinkathon conducted at Niagara Falls failed to produce any policies deemed worthy of inclusion either in his speech or in the non-confidence motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). The opposition leader—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit a question.

Mr. MacEachen: If I have any time I will be happy to answer some questions at the end of my comments. The Leader of the Opposition in his peregrinations throughout Canada before the thinkathon at Niagara Falls gave us all the impression that he was going to go over the falls in a barrel, philosophically, so to speak. Now that the barrel has been opened we find it to be very empty.

The leader of the New Democratic Party in his speech—I must give him this credit—did mention the main problem of the day and attacked what he called the government's misguided anti-inflationary policy; but almost all of the counter proposals which he listed are either inapplicable, long-term,—suited to the 1930s or 1980s. No proposal made by the leader of the NDP could be regarded as applicable today, this month or this year in the current concern about inflation.

So, Mr. Speaker, my conclusion is that in this debate, in the motions made by the opposition and in the speeches made by the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of the NDP there has been no fatal flow or deficiency found in the current policy and solution of the government of Canada on the issue of inflation. I will return later in my remarks to the general question of the attitude of the opposition parties.

I would like to mention that a number of Speakers from all sides of the House have expressed interest in the larger question of social justice for all Canadians. I think it is appropriate that members of parliament should keep constantly in the forefront the conditions that are required to fulfil the aspirations and the opportunities that are so much a part of the essence of the just society. It is also appropriate to allude in this context to the Prime Minister's statement on the constitution and the people of Canada, delivered at the second meeting of the constitutional conference in Ottawa last February. He proposed as the third objective for a true confederation:

> To promote national economic, social and cultural development, and the general welfare and equality of opportunity for all Canadians in whatever region they may live, including the opportunity for gainful work, for just conditions of employment, for an adequate standard of living, for security, for education and for rest and leisure.

I am sure we all believe these are sound objectives of a true Canadian federation. We realize that to achieve this third objective of the Canadian confederation the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada must have sufficient powers to stimulate and expand economic enterprise, maintain high levels of employment, promote growth in each region of Canada and ensure reasonably equitable social and employment opportunities and income levels for all Canadians. But,

Mr. Speaker, the federal government carries only a share of the responsibility for the just society. Indeed the shape and substance of social justice are framed at many levels. It embodies most profoundly the condition of individuals and families. It embodies the interaction of persons one with another. Private citizens and corporate enterprises, as well as public institutions, have a responsibility to recognize the culture, dignity and the reasonable and legitimate economic and social aspirations of their fellowmen. Social justice takes on meaning through the actions of local associations and local governments, through school boards, property owners' associations and social service agencies. Of course provincial governments, too, play an integral role in the process.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that no single agency, no single person escapes this task. Each segment of society has a role to play, a burden to share. A just society is built upon the recognition of individual dignity, mutual tolerance, fair play and the democratic participation of all its members. I refer here not only to the men and women who are born in Canada but to those who bring their talents and cultural heritage to our shores.

Part of our rule as a Parliament, and certainly part of my job as minister, is to provide a just and hospitable environment for new Canadians. It is only two years since the government introduced new immigration regulations which for the first time based the selection of immigrants on principles of universality, non-discrimination and equality of treatment. These regulations removed the last vestiges of discrimination on racial, cultural, national or geographic grounds and ensured that equal standards of assessment would be applied to all persons applying for permanent admission to Canada.

A further expression of Canada's concern, of this Parliament's concern and of the government's concern for social justice on an even broader front was the special arrangements adopted for the admission of Czechoslovakian refugees in 1968. To date some 11,200 Czech refugees have come forward and have settled in Canada. My department has spent over $11 million on their behalf. Roughly $3 million have been spent on language training alone for over 7,000 refugees. We have been able to place roughly 80 per cent of these persons in gainful employment in Canada. Here, then, we have the happy combination of compassion and good economics.

Czech families who suffered so much in their native country are not only finding freedom and opportunity in this country but they are making a very substantial contribution to the cultural and productive life of the nation.

Another important step which we have taken as a country in the field of international humanitarianism has been the ratification of the International Convention on the Status of Refugees and its 1965 protocol. The convention and protocol represent the major international instrument for the protection of refugees throughout the world. It establishes a common definition of refugees, lays down standards for fair and just treatment in countries of sanctuary and contains safeguards against their expulsion.

We have initiated through my department a variety of measures designed to promote economic justice and full employment opportunities for Canadians in every part of Canada. Surely social justice means opportunity for self-expression at work and at leisure and security of employment to provide for one's family.

Throughout the country we have established Canada Manpower centres in many new towns and areas in order to bring a broader knowledge of jobs and training or mobility incentives to workers who seek new challenges and who might otherwise be unemployed or marginally employed. We have raised the professional level of Canada Manpower counsellors so that they may provide a better service to workers. We have streamlined our offices and information media in keeping with the dignity of job-seekers in pursuing a fundamental right. We have strived to protect human rights in the operation of all manpower programs. The department, without equivocation or exception, recognizes as illegal any discrimination in employment because of race, national origin, colour, religion or political affiliation. During that last fiscal year Canada Manpower counsellors placed roughly 700,000 Canadians in jobs in all parts of the country.

In his speech the Leader of the Opposition made a passing reference to my department and its activities. He asked: Whatever became of the excellent concept behind the Department of Manpower, which seems to be starving from lack of attention and interest on the part of the cabinet as a whole? The Leader of the Opposition is wrong, of course. That excellent concept is alive and well and progressing on increased funds and expanded activities. On the day following the speech of the Leader of the Opposition my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stated that in the government's view the steady expansion of the Department of Manpower is given a high priority. I want to back up that assertion with some facts and figures, although not too many.

In 1961 and 62 the federal government spent a mere $18 million on all training programs combined. Very few adults received any formal occupational training at all. Last year over 400,000 adults enrolled in the adult training program, and this year even more adults will take training. Indeed, in this current fiscal year our budget is about $250 million—13 times the total amount spent eight years ago. Mr. Speaker, the annual budget growth on training in Canada—

An hon. Member: Who started it?

Mr. MacEachen: —has been impressive. The annual figures are as follows: 1967-68, $160 million; 1968-69, $192 million; 1969-70, $250 million dollars. This is the current fiscal year, and as evidence of the priority we are giving to this aspect of government policy we expect to expend an increased sum of money on training in Canada in the next fiscal year. Until recently wealthier provinces got most of the federal money because they could better afford to put in matching contributions.

In 1965-66, for instance, about $177 was spent for training, per unemployed person, in Ontario as compared to $34 in the Atlantic provinces and $25 in Quebec. In short, the effort was uneven and it failed to meet adequately the needs of the poorer areas or the adult workers with family responsibilities. Social justice demanded a redressing of the balance.

The radical initiative of the occupational training program reflected the government's genuine concern for the needs of the poor and jobless, particularly those living in the less favoured areas of Canada. Expenditures now are directed to where the need is greatest. Where four years ago the vast bulk of expenditures were made in Ontario, in 1969-70 we estimate expenditures of roughly $765 per unemployed person in the Atlantic provinces, $607 in Quebec and $702 in Ontario.

Just for the interest of the Leader of the Opposition I might mention that in the last year that he was Premier of Nova Scotia, the expenditures on training for that province were $6.7 million and this year they have risen to $11.2 million. So we are making progress. We are attempting to follow up the work of these programs by surveys of works after they have finished their courses. The results are extremely encouraging. I know my hon. friends will be interested to know that.

An hon. Member: We are not.

Mr. MacEachen: They show, for instance, that whereas more than half the workers were unemployed when they began training—many more expected shortly to be laid off—over 80 per cent who returned to the labour market were holding down good jobs after training.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the minister a question. Would he indicate the statistics on the unemployment rate presently in Atlantic Canada, broken down by province?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with the first question the hon. member asked and this is a very important matter to members of this House and the taxpayers. In addition to successful returns to the labour market, the trainees also increased their incomes by about 16 per cent. I am very proud of the work being done by the adult training program. Every month we receive dozens of letters from those who have taken training, the vast majority of whom have been helped by the program. I should like to read an excerpt from a letter recently received from a worker in Newfoundland. I read this letter because it is very moving in that it outlines in the man's own words his experience on being liberated from the shackles of unemployment and illiteracy as a result of training.

Mr. Baldwin: Is that Joey Smallwood?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the House leader of the opposition would make light of the experience of this worker who writes as follows:

Before I attended the course, unemployment for periods of up to two years was not uncommon to me and employment was manual labour for short periods of time with constant lay-offs due to shortage of materials and weather conditions. As you can imagine life was morally and materially almost unbearable.

An hon. Member: He is now in the Prime Minister's office.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacEachen: The letter continues:

In September 1966, I was accepted at the Burin District Vocational School for a course in carpentry. When I entered the school, simple addition and subtraction represented the scope of my mathematic ability and although I could read and write, putting my thoughts on paper was almost impossible. When the course was finished we were familiar with trigonometry, algebra and geometry besides the knowledge of estimating for the building trades, we'd obtained a solid course in English and Science and blueprint reading plus our actual course.

I left school in June 1967 and haven't been out of work since and although the job I have now is not as a carpenter, it is a very direct result of my carpenter work.

Attending the Burin District Vocational School not only increased my job chances but has opened up a complete new life for myself and my family for which we are eternally thankful and grateful.

Mr. Speaker, this is the sentence that I think will move my hon. friends.

An hon. Member: Good old Mike Starr!

Mr. MacEachen: Whether it was a benefit derived from a former government or the present one, it is still a moving letter.

I was 33 years old when I first entered the school and I can honestly say that my life began at that time.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The letter is in the man's own handwriting. He knows the true measure of social justice. I think we all get a better appreciation of social justice when it is related to the concept of individuals who have mastered the difficulties of their environment and their careers. We attempt to assist workers through our manpower mobility program. We assist workers who move from one part of Canada to another, from one part of a province to another and from one part of an area to another in order to improve their job opportunities and their incomes. We have a mobility program in Canada at the present time which is the most generous in the world. Even Sweden, which is regarded as the model by some hon. members opposite, does not come close to the generous provisions of the manpower mobility program operating in this country. We have had substantial improvement in the operation of this program. Last year roughly 44,000 persons were assisted, at a cost of $4 million. We hope this year approximately 50,000 persons will be assisted, at a cost of $6 million.

With the occupational training program and the manpower mobility program we are in most cases touching the workers on the borders of the labour market. We are touching workers who are unemployed, sometimes employed, but almost always poor, through these two programs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to mention the fact that through these two programs, involving heavy expenditures for the people of Canada, we are touching those persons who are at inadequate levels of income and employment security. We are satisfied that for every dollar that we spend on occupational training in this country we will receive $3 in the form of increased productivity from the contribution that the worker will make in his working life to the economy of Canada. This is a very important aspect of our program because it makes good sense economically and it certainly makes the best sense from the point of view of social justice.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, there can be no better social form of investment than an investment in human resources. Manpower programs not only contribute to the quality of people and the pace of change but they set the preconditions for employment security and a better life. No government and no right thinking person in Canada can be unaware of the tempers and distempers of our times. If we are to meet the challenges that our young people are directing at us today; if we are to respond to their call for involvement in social action and social justice, we must find better ways of reaching the poor, disadvantaged and alienated. We as parliamentarians must make stronger attempts to break the barriers to opportunity, the barriers to unemployment and the barriers that are created by the vicious cycle of poverty, and social deprivation which inevitably lead to disenchantment with the bonds and structures with society.

My department is attempting to make that kind of outreach, to make an extra effort to reach the disadvantaged, the alienated and the poor. If the senior member for Halifax were here he would espouse with me the work that has been accomplished in our manpower centres in Halifax, in the Gottingen Street project, working out of a store office in a poor and black neighbourhood. We have helped people through that outreach program by employing those from among the alienated to find jobs and better employment opportunities.

We are working in Toronto with the Rotary Club which is attempting to find employment for young people who have been incapable of entering the labour market. We are actively working with a youth group in Montreal trying to find better ways of reaching and solving the problems of the poor. I do not predict that what I have been talking about will bring about the complete transformation of our society. We are all aware of the importance of a healthy, viable economy and adequate levels of labour demand to any antipoverty labour strategy. Nor will new outreach alone resolve the roots of selfish ambition and intolerance that breed social injustice. Perhaps these initiatives, together with vigorous pursuit of the other programs by the government, will mark a new beginning.

We have heard in this debate a good deal about social policy in general. The predominant theme of the criticism has been that as a government we had been more concerned with planning and individual rights than with social justice and social programs for the people. It is not very long ago, Mr. Speaker, that I sat here and listened to hon. members opposite bemoaning the initiative we were taking in the field of social justice. I can still hear ringing in my ears the criticisms of members opposite when we brought in the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, the Medical Care Insurance Plan and the guaranteed income supplement. The cry then was: Wait for spring. Why do it now? let us do these things in stages.

Canada has come a long way in the field of social security. Any member of parliament can understand what this costs the people of Canada. We still have a long way to go in some of the programs that have already passed this House. Medicare, for example, is still not universally applicable. There are features of the Canada Assistance Plan of which many provinces have not taken advantage, such as the work activity program. In the government's view, the need now is to carry out a careful review of the social security system we have created. What are the gaps? How can the program be improved? Are we getting the best value for our tax dollar? What should be the next step? Should it be new programs additional to those we now have, a refinement and extension of current programs or some radically new initiative such as the guaranteed annual income? Just what are some of the options open to us in the field of social policy? We have the option of improving and strengthening existing social insurance and social assistance programs. We have the option of combining with this an extension of the guaranteed annual income concept.

The development of the guaranteed income supplement has provided the government with expertise and experience in this field and has also alerted us to some of the problems in this approach. When looking at existing programs and discussing options, the question of selectivity—which has been discussed at length—must be examined carefully. In this examination the government must take into account our financial resources and the willingness or otherwise of the Canadian taxpayer to support additional programs. It must take into account jurisdictional realities as well as existing programs, because we cannot start as if nothing had happened or as if there were no programs in existence in Canada. Whatever system we adopt or whatever technique we devise, we must be aware that the first focus is on people and that ultimately the techniques exist to deliver incomes and services to the people of Canada. We are trying to answer these questions and determine our course of action. Our conclusions will be made public in the white paper on social security.

What of the opposition? What are their proposals? In his speech the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) attempted to explain why his party had voted against the subamendment of the Creditiste party. He quoted extensively from the Niagara resolutions to show that his party was in favour of the incentive society. What is an incentive society?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Don't ask me.

Mr. MacEachen: The official opposition guru in exile, Dalton Camp, claims that the Conservative Party is now left of the NDP. This was after Niagara Falls and before Winnipeg. Where "left of the NDP" is now, after the rhetoric and double-talk at Winnipeg, only God himself can tell the House.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) rose at the expiration of the minister's time. Quite properly, the minister was allowed to continue. Discussions have taken place between the house leaders which indicate that there are only a few minutes of formal business to be conducted after the question is put. On behalf of my hon. friend from Charlevoix I feel I must ask whether the House is prepared to allow him the few minutes of time he would normally have taken, provided we finish our business before ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, what we have just heard is the voice of the conscience of the Liberal party, of the government in power. Every time the government is in trouble, it invariably calls upon its trouble-shooter, the Minister of Labour and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) to come to the rescue.

I must say the minister has responded with his usual skill, but many a time he makes inconsistent statements.

Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Labour and Immigration attempts to ridicule the Progressive Conservative party's Niagara Falls meeting, he is out of order, because the purpose of this major meeting at Niagara Falls was not only the guidance of our party, but also a study of the problems now facing Canadians in order to find solutions for them. And if the minister has faith in the democracy of parties, I think he should be proud of the efforts made by the Progressive Conservative party at Niagara Falls to reach that objective.

Indeed, I think the Liberals will follow our lead in this field. They do so often because, on the first day of our Niagara Falls convention, the national chairman of the Liberal party announced in the newspapers that his party would hold sessions in Vancouver next fall in order to review its political programme and study the problems of Canadians.

The minister lacks sincerity when he tries to ridicule the serious meeting we had. Undoubtedly he merely wanted to joke about the solutions that the government itself should find to rectify Canada's present situation.

Mr. Speaker, this serious situation has not been corrected in the Speech from the Throne which, in my opinion, lacks aggressiveness. I think that two priorities should have deserved more attention: inflation and the way to fight unemployment effectively.

It is not by propounding the abolishment of 25,000 jobs in the civil service any more than by closing four or five embassies that this government will effectively and definitely deal with the problem of inflation.

If the government neither has the courage nor the possibility to convince union leaders and industrialists to co-operate with it in order to support its anti-inflationary measures, the suggestions contained in the Speech from the Throne are not worth anything to settle existing problems.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec with 140,000 unemployed finds itself in a serious situation. A recent study carried out throughout the province showed that with the exception of the Italians, it is the French Canadians who are getting the lowest wages.

We are amazed at the unrest now existing in Quebec. If action was taken—and I do not only accuse the federal government but also every other level of government—to settle the unemployment problem and economic matters, it would be easier to solve the cultural and linguistic problems.

As we have seen lately, Quebec is in a turmoil because federal politicians have failed to take seriously the options which the separatist movement offers to Quebecers. It was attempted to ignore the problem and to pursue an ostrich policy by saying: There are no separatists. Unfortunately there are many separatists in Quebec.

As for the separatism which was feared at a certain time but which was ignored, I think it has gone beyond reasonable limits. We do not witness mere excessive demonstrations of separatism and nationalism, but as could be seen last week, the explosion of a movement likely to cause a bloody revolution in Quebec.

May I ask that members be more quiet, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May we have silence in the chamber.

Mr. Asselin: Being nationalist scarcely one year ago, these movements have perhaps become sovereignist or independantist. All this has been stired up by professional agitators. In Quebec, some teachers who should educate our children have become professional agitators and had the students take part in protest marches against the authorities.

Will the speech recently given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Montreal settle the question? Indeed, the Prime Minister asked Liberal supporters to change the present Quebec government. Did the Prime Minister call on the Liberal militants to contest the policy of the Quebec government which is going to fight effectively the revolutionary movement that is beginning to be felt in Quebec? In my view the Prime Minister's statement had only one purpose: to fan the fire of the separatists, because these people have only one aim the dismemberment of the federal state.

It is not by using violence that we can check such movements as that, but rather by offering to the reasonable people of Quebec a new philosophy and a new orientation, by showing them that it is in the best interests of Canadians to live in a federal state.

How shall we achieve this? The responsibility in this regard does not rest solely with the members of the opposition, but also with the government members, especially with those from Quebec and also with the members of the Ralliement créditiste.

In my opinion, it is absolutely necessary to awaken within the adult population of Quebec a feeling of responsibility so that they may stand up to the young people who do not understand the problems now being discussed in Quebec.

I know that I have no right to criticize provincial legislation, but I wish to emphasize that three quarters of the young people who demonstrated recently in front of the Parliament buildings in Quebec had no understanding whatever of Bill 63 which was being discussed in the National Assembly.

How shall we achieve this, Mr. Speaker? By trying to awaken a sense of responsibilities among highly placed people in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada: union leaders, industrialists, directors of Chambers of Commerce, members of Rotary Clubs, in short, all those whose task is to support a legitimate government which introduces legislation for the benefit of the population.

Anti-gaullist demonstrations by French students stopped when responsible people told the government: We are with you and we will back you.

Then the revolutionary students returned home and the population listened to common sense and to reason.

As a Quebecker, I am deeply sorry to see that some people in Quebec who have certain responsibilities towards their community, although perhaps not actively involved in politics, witness such events as those of last week without uttering one word or showing some reaction.

It is now high time that the voice of common sense and reason be heard in Quebec. May I tell my colleagues from Quebec that regardless of their political affiliation, they must stand united with us and urge the responsible people in that province to support every legislative proposal aimed at saving the Quebec community, both French-speaking and English-speaking.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

BROADCASTING

EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION—STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on October 23rd, 1968, I announced that, in order to facilitate the development of educational broadcasting, a task force would be established immediately under my direction. I informed the House that the task force would also be charged with considering and advising on the necessity of interim action pending enactment of new legislation. On March 10th, the government introduced for first reading Bill C-179, an "Act to establish the Canadian Educational Broadcasting Agency, and to make certain consequential amendments to the Broadcasting Act."

Both the province of Alberta and the province of Ontario have indicated the necessity for interim action. In Alberta, a station partly dedicated to educational broadcasting is being set up in conjunction with the CBC. In Ontario, the department and provincial agencies concerned are presently studying means of fulfilling the requests of that province.

As a result of the studies undertaken by all concerned, it has become apparent that significant technological changes have occurred and advances can be expected to continue.

As a consequence, and because of the progress made in the development of interim measures designed to meet specific requests, interim measures designed to meet specific requests in the field of educational broadcasting, and the impossibility of arriving at a general approach satisfactory to all provinces in the field, the government has decided not to pursue the development of the Canadian Educational Broadcasting Agency for the time being, and therefore not to proceed with Bill C-179.

In order to meet the desires of provinces for educational broadcasting, the government has implemented the following measures: (1) The Canadian Radio-Television Commission will be directed, pursuant to section 22 of the Broadcasting Act, that in provinces where the provincial authorities desire cable transmission facilities, as a condition for all new cable licences, and for the renewal of existing cable licences, the licensees shall be required to set aside at least one channel for educational programming. By this action, the government assures access to this mode of transmission for educational broadcasting.

I should note, Mr. Speaker, that this policy is consistent with the policy statement of the C.R.T.C. on the development of cable as issued on May 13th.

(2) Furthermore, the government has decided that in certain situations, the C.R.T.C. may recommend to the government to direct the C.B.C. to act as its agent pursuant to section 39(2) of the Broadcasting Act, in providing, on a recoverable cost basis, the transmission facilities for educational broadcasting.

(3) Because of the importance of educational broadcasting, discussions with the provinces in this area, and in particular on the definition of educational broadcasting will be held under the aegis of the Secretary of State. In addition, the Department of Communications will be available to assist provinces that desire advice on technological changes, and will co-ordinate the necessary studies on transmission systems within the government.

The government has decided to continue its policy of not granting provincial governments or their agents broadcasting licences. The government intends to issue a formal direction to the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to this effect.

The purpose, Mr. Speaker, of this new policy is to recognize changes which have occurred in the technology and other related factors, since the initial discussions on educational broadcasting, in the white paper of 1966. This policy will assure provinces the maximum possible choice in transmission facilities.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for providing me with a copy of his statement in respect of this most sensitive and important field of educational television. If the minister had a seat on this side of the House he might fully appreciate this consideration which enables hon. members here not only to be concise but also constructive in replying. I intend to be both. Having made that general observation, I should like to say that the minister and his task force are apparently carrying on active discussions with the provinces in this field of shared jurisdiction.

There are two matters referred to in the statement which give us great concern. Is this decision not to proceed with educational broadcasting, as set out in Bill C-179, a retreat in principle or merely a review of the federal role owing to the pressures of provincial concerns and the low state of the federal pocketbook? If it is the former, then we must protest strongly about what might be classified as a further erosion of the federal role under this government. We on this side of the House support the principle that the federal government does have a part to play in providing the hardware for the educational television system, reserving always the right of the provinces to set up the software of the system, namely, content and circuits.

Quite frankly, one very good reason we on this side of the House are suspicious of the motivations behind this statement is the reason advanced by the minister that the change in policy as indicated by his statement today is being made on account of technical changes in the field of communications. Of course there are technical changes in this field and there will continue to be changes. It seems to me that since the task force was announced back in 1968 and introduced on March 10, 1969, several technological improvements and changes have been made. If these changes are to be used as an excuse for inaction and indecision in a field which has been combed and covered by the experts, let alone a parliamentary committee, then the thought that the federal government is going to play a meaningful role in this field in the future is even more remote than the moon once was, and individuals from the United States were able to go to the moon this year.

The other change which causes us on this side of the House concern is that portion of the minister's statement which indicates that whatever develops will be solely under the aegis of the minister. Apparently Parliament and the broadcasting committee will be shoved aside and left in the dark. Surely every member of the House should be concerned. We on this side of the House are justified in criticizing this course of action.

Often ministerial decisions, which are ever-increasing under this government, are remote and isolated. They very often affect Canadians more than many other government decisions, particularly in this case because of the effect on the education of children through the media of television. This is too important a matter to be left to the manoeuvres of the mandarins or the dictates of the minister. Matters of this kind must be considered by the members of this House during meetings of a parliamentary committee.

I said I would be brief, and I am always constructive. There is the question of how long this interim policy is to be continued, if it is an interim policy. There is the question of the criteria to be set out and established and there is the question of the position of school boards. Obviously there are many other questions but they cannot all be answered today. In summary may I say that this statement, as is the case in respect of perhaps most ministerial statements, provokes more questions than answers. We on this side of the House and the people across the land, I believe, are becoming impatient. We await with interest the answers to some of these questions, especially in the field of educational television which has been kicked around long enough.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in my first opportunity to reply to a statement on motions I shall attempt to be brief. Unlike the previous speaker I have not had an opportunity to read the statement of the minister. I heard it for the first time in the House.

First of all, I feel that this interim statement is one more example of the lack of any federal leadership in education. I think this is a particularly important problem. Recognizing the constitutional problem surrounding it, the fact is that the development of a cultural identity is one of the most important things we can do and should be doing. We should be extremely conscious of this. Arrangements for educational television are, of course, a part of this development. I believe we should be very conscious of this and should not proceed, as the ministers' statement would seem to indicate, on an ad hoc or piecemeal basis.

The withdrawal of Bill C-179 of last session is a recognition of the fact that technological changes will probably make broadcasting stations per se redundant and irrelevant. The inroads of cable television are likely to cause this to happen.

I think we must recognize the criticism levelled against ETV by educators across the country that ETV really is a national extension of the teacher on a one-to-one basis rather than an opportunity for individualization of instruction in education.

The non-granting of provincial licences is something we will have to consider. As mentioned by the previous speaker, I believe the Broadcasting Committee should be very conscious of the complete ramifications of this new departure.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): First of all, I want to thank the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) for sending us a copy of his statement.

I find it wise on the part of the government not to pursue its study on the establishment of the Canadian Educational Broadcasting Agency. As a matter of fact, the Aird Commission on Radio Broadcasting is quite clear on this subject, as reported on page 11 and I quote:

> Certain specified hours should be made available for educational work both in connection with the schools and the general public as well as the so-called "adult education", under provincial auspices.

On page 6 of the same report, it is clearly stated that this matter comes under provincial jurisdiction, and the following recommendation is made:

> the establishment and operation of stations by provincial governments.

In the light of this recommendation, it seems necessary that an agreement be previously entered into with provinces in order to do justice to one and all. I think, however, that the Secretary of State's remarks are not clear enough.

At the end of the statement, one can read the following:

> The government has decided to continue its policy of not granting provincial governments or their agents broadcasting licences.

And further:

> This policy will assure provinces the maximum possible choice in transmission facilities.

How can we have an option when no licence is granted to the provinces?

Mr. Speaker, Canadians can make nothing at all of such a shower of statements. And I remind the government that with regard particularly to telecommunications through satellites, Quebec will also have to enjoy exclusive rights in educational matters so that the French culture may be preserved in Canada—just as it is now the case for the English culture—in order that our country may become strong, by seeing to it that the educational field falls within the provinces' jurisdiction, as recommended by the Aird report.

I think that this temporary delay is only an excuse for the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications to assume rights previously granted to the provinces in the field of education and to build in 1971 receiving stations for satellite signals which will pick up programs only on the wavelengths allotted to the provinces by the federal government, even in the case of educational broadcasts.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I propose, pursuant to Standing Order 43 and in view of the fact that no statement has been forthcoming from the government with regard to the situation in the Pacific coast ports, to ask for unanimous consent to move a motion. I will exercise my right under that Standing Order to make a very brief explanation which I hope will move the House to let me move the motion.

The failure of the parties to arrive at a settlement of the industrial dispute involving the Pacific coast ports would now appear to have reached the stage where the public interest is involved, and it is essential that the government discuss with Parliament appropriate action to be taken leading to the resumption of normal activities without prejudice to the rights of the parties involved to continue their negotiations. The vital interests of the people of Canada are being jeopardized by a continuation of the present situation.

The motion I will move, if the requisite consent is given, will be:

That this House urges the government to take such immediate action as may be required to lead to the resumption of normal loading of ships in the Pacific coast ports without prejudice to contract negotiations being continued.

[Mr. Dumont.]

If the House in its wisdom sees fit to grant unanimous approval, I would be glad to discuss with the President of the Privy Council an appropriate time for debate some time later today.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, the Standing Order under which the hon. member for Peace River proposes to proceed with his motion requires the unanimous consent of the House and it does not provide for a debate. The duty of the Chair, therefore, is to ask the House at this time whether there is such unanimous consent.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I had been given notice of this motion when I spoke to the hon. member earlier today I might have been able to consider it, but under the circumstances I would have to refuse consent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You are afraid.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous agreement on the part of hon. members, the motion cannot be put.

An hon. Member: Hatchet-man.

Another hon. Member: No more tips for you.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, you anticipated me. Before we leave motions I should like to inquire whether the Minister of Labour intends to make a statement today regarding the situation on the west coast?

Mr. Baldwin: I waited until he refused to speak on it.

Mr. Mackasey: I had not intended to speak on motions, Mr. Speaker. However, I expect a series of questions which I think will cover the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: He has to be interrogated before he will speak.

Of course, my hon. colleagues will no doubt give me their support in that respect.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

WATER RESOURCES

PROVISION FOR MANAGEMENT INCLUDING RESEARCH AND PLANNING AND IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAMS

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-144, to provide for the management of the water resources of Canada including research and the planning and implementation of programs relating to the conservation, development and utilization of water resources.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to point out that after a delay of almost four years the government has finally got the water act running downhill.

Mr. Speaker: That is hardly a point of order.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE RESEARCH

Question No. 108—Mr. Mather:

1. Is Canada co-operating with the United States, Great Britain and Australia in a program of research in chemical and biological warfare, including a study of the development of Napalm and Iroquois, a type of flame thrower?

2. Is this research of a defensive nature?

3. What proportion of the research results are "classified" information?

4. If the research is defensive, are its findings published and made available for the protection of populations as in Sweden and, if not, for what reasons?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. Canada co-operates with the United States, Great Britain and Australia in the carrying out of scientific and technological studies in the defensive aspects of chemical and biological warfare with particular application to the provision of advice and protective equipment for the Canadian Forces should they ever be called upon to operate in an environment in which such agents are used. Flame throwers have not, however, been included in the inventory of weapons provided the Canadian Forces for some years and, consequently, since that time no research has been undertaken or required in flame throwers or flame thrower fuel.

3 and 4. Attention is directed to Hansard dated October 30, 1968 pages 2207 and 2208. When possible, the findings of defensive research are published. For example, during World War II, Canada developed a supply of vaccine against the destructive cattle virus, Rinderpest, and as a result the threat of this disease to livestock in North America has been practically eliminated, and it has been of inestimable value in Asia and India where Rinderpest in endemic. Other examples, are the development of detectors for monitoring ground contamination by chemical agents and gas, and improved gas masks.

CS GAS—PROVISION TO ARMED FORCES

Question No. 196—Mr. Lewis:

1. Are any elements of Canada's defence forces equipped with CS gas or the capacity to deliver it?

2. Are the Canadian defence forces aware of, or in possession of, U.S. Army publication serial number TC 3-16, which describes the use of gases, defoliants and phosphorus and the systems used to deliver them?

Questions

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. CS is a tear gas used primarily in the Canadian Forces for training personnel who are designated for overseas service, in the use of the protective mask and for testing masks for proper fitting. Some elements of the Canadian Forces, therefore, have CS gas in small quantities for this purpose.

2. Yes.

2. How many widows of Armed Forces personnel or of retired armed forces personnel are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

3. What is the total number of retired Armed Forces personnel and also the number of widows of armed forces personnel or of retired armed forces personnel presently residing in each province?

4. In respect of how many orphans of Armed Forces personnel are pensions being paid and what is the average amount thereof?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. (a) 15; (b) 70; (c) 250; (d) 299; (e) 334; (f) 321; (g) 540; (h) 756; (i) 924; (j) 3,964; (k) 4,861; (l) 4,664; (m) 3,267; (n) 6,040.

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States regarding the Iron Ore Company of Canada and its parent company Hanna Mining Company of Cleveland.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 67, 68, 92, 95, 102, 103 and 151. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the other notices of motions be allowed to stand.

"REPORT OF WORKING GROUP I—INDIANS TO THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE"

Motion No. 67—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the document, entitled "Report of Working Group I—Indians to the Executive Committee" which Working Group had its terms of reference set out in February, 1968 and which was formed to examine and outline the problems relating to Indians and to make recommendations concerning strategy, policy and programming.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, no document exists in the general form described in this motion.

The executive committee referred to is that of the Rural Development Branch of the former Department of Forestry and Rural Development. The report did not deal with Indian problems, policy and programming as such, but specifically with how area development problems are inter-related with Indian and Metis problems.

The study was prepared by identified individual officials for discussion with other officials of the federal departments concerned with area development and Indian Affairs, and subsequently with provincial officials, as part of the continuing process of program development at both levels of government.

It is not designed for publication. To do so would be contrary to the public interest, as well as unfair to the particular officials—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the explanation given by the hon. member goes beyond the narrow limits of the rules and practices of the House. I think the hon. member for Skeena must assume from the speech made by the hon. member that the government will not accept this motion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, when I put the motion down I did not realize that it would need clarification to this extent. However, I would be glad to let the motion proceed subject to the re-interpretation given by the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: My interpretation of the declaration made by the hon. member was that the motion was not being accepted.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I think, Mr. Speaker, that we had better debate the motion on another day.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO "GRANTS TO INDIAN BAND COUNCILS"

Motion No. 68—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of any document prepared in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development entitled, or relating to "Grants to Indian Band Councils" subsequent to the issuance of Circular No. 15, dated September 18, 1968, which is entitled "Grants to Indian Band Councils".

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no record of any document prepared subsequent to the issuance of Circular No. 15 dated September 18, 1968, entitled "Grants to Indian Band Councils". In view of this, would the hon. member for Skeena consent to the withdrawal of this motion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, did the hon. gentleman say that the department had no knowledge of such a document? I think we had better put it to the test because I can produce the document.

Mr. Speaker: Motion transferred for debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): But, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to transfer it for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member dropping the motion?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Not quite, Mr. Speaker. I should like to put it to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Parliamentary Secretary asking that the motion be transferred for debate?

Mr. Honey: In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena I would ask that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Motion transferred for debate.

ROSE REPORT

Motion No. 92—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Committee Report, headed by Dr. D. C. Rose, on the Queen Elizabeth II telescope, presented to the government in August, 1968.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Rose report is a confidential report sponsored by the Science Secretariat, in its role as part of the Privy Council Office, at the request of the government. It is under active study at the present time and consideration will be given to making the report public at a later date. Under these circumstances I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, obviously the government has not read the report on information tabled yesterday which calls for a freer distribution of information. I certainly will not agree to dropping my motion. I would ask that it be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

21362—35

COST-BENEFIT STUDY ON RAINBOW TROUT FARMING

Motion No. 95—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the cost-benefit study on rainbow trout farming referred to by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry in the June 23rd press release of the Fisheries Research Board of Canada.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, notes prepared for the use of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry when announcing the construction of the new Freshwater Research Institute in Winnipeg on June 23, 1969, referred to "other possible methods of commercial trout rearing" which "justify experimentation". To date no cost-benefit analysis of these alternative fisheries has been completed. Since there is no conclusive study or final report available on these "other possible methods of commercial trout rearing", the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I do not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Motion transferred for debate.

REPORTS REFERRED TO IN SUBMISSION TO SENATE COMMITTEE

Motion No. 102—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of each report referred to in the submission of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy on February 26, 1969, listed on pages 4385 to 4387, No. 31 of the proceedings of the Senate Committee.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, last May 14, 1969, under motion for the production of papers No. 105, most of the documents which the hon. member for Winnipeg North is requesting in this motion were tabled in this House. While some documents were omitted because they are now out of print, the member for Winnipeg North was informed that they are available in the Parliamentary Library. In the circumstances, I would ask that the member for Winnipeg North withdraw this motion.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I agree to the motion being withdrawn, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Motions for Papers

ARCHITECTURAL AND ENGINEERING CONSULTANTS' FEES

Motion No. 103—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all agreements and arrangements on consultant fees negotiated between the Government of Canada and the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada and provincial associations of the Professional Engineers of Canada as mentioned in reply to Question No. 1,256, Tabled on May 14, 1969.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this relates to an agreement made between the department and a professional body regarding consultants' fees. It was a verbal agreement so there are no written documents. If the hon. member wishes to press the matter, it would have to be a nil return. Perhaps he would like to drop the motion.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I agree, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF ELECTRIC REDUCTION COMPANY PHOSPHORUS PLANT

Motion No. 151—Mr. Carter:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada, Bedford Institute of Oceanography, and the Government of the Province of Newfoundland or any of its agencies regarding the establishment of the Electric Reduction Company Phosphorous Plant at Long Harbour, Placentia Bay, Newfoundland.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this motion, No. 151, is similar in content to motion No. 204 also put down by the hon. member during the last session. When the motion was called on October 22, the government's response was as follows: "Mr. Speaker, the correspondence requested in this motion which can be produced has already been approved by the acceptance of motions Nos. 198 and 199. In view of this fact I would suggest that the hon. member may wish to withdraw his motion."

At that time the hon. member withdrew his motion and since there has been no change in the circumstances surrounding the motion since that time, I would suggest that he may wish to adopt the same attitude at this time.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, the information requested in my latest motion was not contained in the reply to the original motion put before the House by the hon. member, so I must ask that the motion stand and, if necessary, be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Motion transferred for debate.

Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTIONS

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—FAILURE TO RATIFY SETTLEMENT—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Arising from the rejection last night by the British Columbia longshoremen of the proposed contract settlement, what action are the minister and the government now going to take?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I might say that I am rather disappointed that the unions on two occasions have rejected the recommendations of their negotiating committee. The last proposal which they rejected was the unanimous recommendation of their executive committee to accept the settlement proposed just the other evening. Since then I have been in touch with management and labour and a form of action has been agreed upon, but at the moment I am not prepared to reveal it publicly. I would only ask that the House be patient for a few more days. I will be prepared to make a statement not later than Friday.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the grave effects of this strike on the economy of British Columbia, the Yukon and western Canada generally, and in view of the minister's statement a week ago that if a settlement was not reached he would be forced to make use of legislation, for how long is he prepared to let the strike continue without recommending to Parliament some form of legislative action to re-open the affected ports?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman has raised a good point. In these matters there comes a moment of truth. Any Minister of Labour is guided in these matters by jurisprudence and what has happened in the past. I think the hon. gentleman ought to look at what happened in 1958 when the government of the day let a similar strike go on for 34 days. There was also another strike in 1958 affecting the steamship companies in British Columbia. At that time the government, in its wisdom, let that strike go on for 71 days. I think the people of British Columbia know how disruptive any strike affecting the wharves is. They also know that it is not quite as disruptive as a strike in the steamship area.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Without expressing any opinion about the minister's haphazard use of precedents, may I ask whether the statement made by the federal mediator, William Kelly, that there are to be no further mediation attempts by the federal government represents the minister's position?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, on two occasions, as the hon. gentleman knows, we have intervened in the mediation role. In both of our attempts we were successful in obtaining a collective agreement. Unfortunately, in both instances they were rejected by the union. The basic problem, as the hon. member knows and as other hon. members representing ports in this country undoubtedly know, is twofold. On the one hand, we have management wanting, quite logically, to introduce the highest degree of automation possible and, on the other hand, the longshoremen at the same time rightly concerned that this increased automation will substantially decrease the number of longshoremen's jobs. Since longshoremen are averse to any agreement which they think will mean the phasing-out of their jobs, the situation has become quite difficult.

It is not our intention at this time to interfere further in the mediation role. I understand that today and tomorrow management and labour will be holding informal talks in order to clarify the one or two issues which resulted in the rejection of last week. I am hopeful that the difficulties with respect to ratification this time will be considerably less than they were the first time around.

Mr. Harold Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I, too, have been in touch with Vancouver. Since I understand that both parties to the dispute are looking again at the remaining problems, does the minister not think it advisable that he or his chiefs of staff should proceed immediately to Vancouver in order to aid in removing the last remaining obstacles preventing a settlement of the dispute?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, perhaps on reflection I may wish I had stayed in Vancouver to see the agreement ratified. I do not wish to mislead the House. The parties to the dispute are reviewing the situation independently. If as a result of that review, which I think will be concluded shortly, they feel that our presence is necessary and can be helpful, then I or members of my department will travel to Vancouver. I would be happy to travel to a province where I know I am welcome. In the meantime, the unions have rejected the proposal but have promised to move grain and also other products for the B.C. lumbermen. I understand, too, that they have agreed to move an emergency supply of apples so that we do not jeopardize a new market in New Zealand.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Instead of waiting to be asked to go to Vancouver, does the minister not think that, to minimize any delay, he or his officials ought to go to that city so as to be on the spot?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is very eloquent and persuasive and is one of my favourite members. I am tempted to run out there now—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: I am glad that hon. members opposite have such confidence in my ability to settle this affair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: Contrary to the opinions of some, British Columbia is still part of the country, a very important part, and we are able to communicate by telephone with the province. The Prime Minister has stated on several occasions that transportation will be placed at my disposal if it should be necessary. The province is only five hours away by air and I do not think anything is being jeopardized by my presence here. However, I will certainly reconsider the hon. gentleman's request.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Babe Ruth of the bargaining table not realize that you cannot hit the ball unless you are standing at the plate?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I did not hear the hon. gentleman's remark, although I can imagine, to judge by the quality of the questions he has asked in the past month, that it was not really that important.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Bryce, you have struck out again. You are becoming a fanning fool.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the mandatory 12-hour overtime provision violates enlightened employment practices, does the minister not feel that he, personally, or members of his department could assist in overcoming what is probably the major obstacle preventing a settlement?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, that particular matter was settled on my last trip to Vancouver. Many of these rather unenlightened work practices have been eliminated. Quite naturally the longshoremen were afraid that they could be asked to work for 84 hours a week, which in theory was possible. That matter has been rectified. It is now a question of identifying how the various kinds of employees, casual, semi-casual and permanent, will be affected on the waterfront by the attempted change in the working rules, because management insists on certain rights. Once we can pinpoint this effect and assure the longshoremen that the collective agreement will not reduce their work force so drastically, I think we shall have gone a long way to reversing present opinions in the union. We are working to this end now.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister made a slip of the tongue. He talked about assuring the longshoremen about the purpose of the legislation. I hope he meant to say "collective agreement".

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing the hon. member to make that correction, because I have not as yet contemplated legislation. That would be a cabinet decision and I have not made any particular recommendations to my colleagues. When the moment of truth comes we must worry about the economy of the country and about that part of the country serviced by this port. The responsibility here must be borne by the employers and employees as well.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina East): May I ask the minister whether he made a statement in public prior to the latest balloting by the membership of the union to the effect that if the agreement was not ratified, legislation would be imposed, and if he did make such a statement, does he not consider that it was a threat to the membership?

Mr. Mackasey: I must admit I threatened all sides, including myself. I tried seduction, I tried blackmail, I tried every weapon at the disposal of a Minister of Labour to get an agreement. What I had not counted on was the membership rejecting an agreement which had been unanimously accepted by the negotiating team. That was something which had not been expected, and it is a problem which, in the final analysis, the unions themselves will have to solve—what happens to unions, to seven different locals, when they repudiate what is done in their name by a negotiating team and an executive committee in pursuance of their responsibilities. This is something which the unions themselves will have to work out.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF STAFF

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question to direct to the President of the Treasury Board. Has the hon. gentleman looked into the directive from the Treasury Board that the Auditor General reduce his staff ceiling to 239?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: We will get to it. Is the minister reviewing that directive in the light of the statement by the Auditor General that he cannot accept it because—I quote his words—"if the government is going to determine of itself the size and quality of the staff of the Auditor General then they can determine and limit the scope and effectiveness of his work."

Mr. Drury: The correspondence to which the hon. gentleman referred has been reviewed. The assumption was made that the Auditor General would wish to be a full participant in the government's program of restraint upon staff expansion in the current year. Consequently, it was proposed to him that his ceiling might well be limited in the same way as those of other government departments, namely, to the number on strength as of July 31. However, as I think we agree, the Auditor General is in a special position and he did, in fact, advise us that he required additional people beyond the number on strength in August. Agreement was reached with the Treasury Board that he should have an increase in his establishment above the figure on strength on July 31 of this year, to the figure of 239. In this sense there has been an initial review of his establishment and he has not been subject to the general guideline set for the government as a whole, because of his special position.

May I take this opportunity to correct a misunderstanding which perhaps I created yesterday in response to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, no! Don't correct it!

Mr. Drury: In reply to the hon. member's question I indicated that the establishment of the Auditor General was approved under the terms of the Appropriation Acts. In fact, the establishment and the manpower figures which appear in the estimates are there merely for information and are not approved or authorized by the Appropriation Acts. I believe this was a misunderstanding which we both shared. In fact, the establishment figures in the blue book are not binding—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman advise the House why his government believes that the staff of the man who is the watchdog over government expenditures should be curtailed while his own staff, which generates most of the spending in this country, can be enlarged without limit?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is argumentative.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATION OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT ON CERTAIN TRAINS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

As the Toronto-Ottawa and Montreal-Ottawa lines of the C.N.R. have been exempted by order in council from the administration of the Official Languages Act, could the minister tell us for how long, in terms of days and years, such exemption has been granted?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): One year, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is it the government's intention to apply such exemption to every Crown corporation?

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Could the Secretary of State tell us what policy and criteria were the basis for his recommendation that the government adopt such an order in council exempting the C.N.R. from the obligation to implement bilingualism, particularly on trains running between Toronto and Montreal, as provided in the decree, until 1972?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member could find the reply to his own question if he had another look at the Act, which provides a 60-month period for full implementation. Exemptions are therefore in order, and they are always granted on the basis of the criteria of the feasibility of achieving bilingualism in a given area within a given period, and potential conflicts. The latter criterium, I believe, applies in the case of the C.N.R. who have already signed with their employees a legally binding contract which conflicts with certain provisions of the Act.

Mr. Asselin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the minister recommend to the Cabinet that other Crown corporations or agencies be granted a similar exemption?

Mr. Speaker: I do not believe that the hon. member, whom I invite to resume his seat, can be allowed to ask the minister to disclose what was said in conversations he may have had with members of the Cabinet.

Mr. Asselin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might rephrase my question and ask the minister if other Crown corporations or agencies will also be exempted from implementing the policy on bilingualism?

Mr. Pelletier: Some requests have been made, Mr. Speaker, but I would not trust my memory to list them and say which have been accepted. I might give the hon. member that information later, if he wants it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

SASKATCHEWAN PLAN TO BARTER WHEAT FOR MACHINERY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the plan of the Premier of Saskatchewan to barter $300,000 worth of wheat for certain machinery. Has the government taken any stand against this course and, if it has, can we be told why the government of Saskatchewan should not be permitted to do something which would be beneficial to a small degree in diminishing the tremendous amount of wheat which is now piled up in that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been talking to the premier of Saskatchewan and I believe he has reported briefly to the House on those talks. If the right hon. gentleman wishes to direct his question to the minister, I can say that he expects to be in the House tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Prime Minister whether the Premier of Saskatchewan has been in touch with him in this regard and whether he has protested the attitude of the government in endeavouring to throw roadblocks in the way of the government of Saskatchewan in its endeavours to dispose of this wheat?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister intend to sit and sulk like a petulant little boy while important questions of this nature are asked?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

EXEMPTION OF OLD ORDER MENNONITES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with a reply the minister gave during an adjournment debate regarding the exemption of Old Order Mennonites from the Canada Pension Plan. On July 16 the minister indicated to me that this question had gone to the cabinet for consideration. May I ask whether a conclusion has yet been reached by the government and, if so, what that conclusion is?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I expect to be in a position to announce government policy on this matter within approximately two weeks.

Mr. Saltsman: It was to be two weeks on the last occasion, on July 16; I hope the minister can assure us that this two weeks will be shorter than the last.

NAVIGATION

MACKENZIE RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is intended for the Minister of Public Works. It concerns the statement the minister made with regard to navigation on the Mackenzie River. Will he tell us whether the government is working toward obtaining an agreement with the government of British Columbia to protect downstream benefits, potential hydro development, navigation and wildlife?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Because of the abnormal draw-down taken by British Columbia Hydro in August and September of 1968 we made representations and they restored, I think, 12,000 second-feet at that time. At the present time we are again making representations to the effect that while the area behind the dam is being filled, as much flow as possible is to be provided to the Mackenzie River.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. Would the minister advise the House whether the government has not insisted, under the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, that British Columbia obtain a permit and enter into a proper agreement, so that the federal government does not have to go cap in hand every time that province wants to transgress in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question as asked by the hon. member has taken the form of an argument.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, this problem is not a simple one but one that is seriously affecting navigation and many other matters. It is a serious area problem, and I submit it is not sufficient simply to dismiss the question. The problem may be argumentative, but the question does require an answer.

Mr. Speaker: I am not dismissing the problem; it is the hon. member's question that I am dismissing.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL MAIL ROBBERIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. It deals with a matter in which I am sure he is deeply interested, namely mail robberies in Montreal, of which there have been three within two days.

In light of the increasing incidence of major thefts of mail, can he advise whether any special measures are being taken by the protective authorities so that mail deliveries, although now unreasonably slow, will remain reasonably sure?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a long and informative answer to that question, but I do not feel competent to do so at the moment. I will be glad to look at the hon. member's question to see whether there is an answer that I can give to any part of it.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF INCOME FLOOR

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I am glad to see he is lending an ear. In view of his fervent expression of concern last weekend for people on low income, and in view of representations made yesterday in Halifax to the Senate committee on poverty, is the government now prepared to consider the establishment of an income floor below which no Canadian will be allowed to fall?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the question as asked is rather broad in nature. The hon. member is asking for a statement of policy. I doubt very much that the question is acceptable in those terms.

Mrs. MacInnis: Then, could I put it in another form? Would the Prime Minister be willing to consider making a statement on motions very shortly about this matter which is concerning a great many Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about a guaranteed annual income, yes, we have been considering it for some time. I am not in a position to say when a statement will be made, because as a government we are not yet satisfied that this is a realistic step.

SPORTS

POSSIBLE REVISION OF AID PROGRAM

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro).

Since the need for sports and recreation facilities is becoming increasingly urgent in Canada and since such facilities are not subsidized at all under the Fitness and Amateur Sport Program, does the minister intend to review the government policy in this connection during the present session?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are certain programs now under review that assist in the provision of facilities. I would remind the hon. member that his statement is not correct. The federal government has shared substantially in the provision of sports facilities across Canada under the aegis of the Canada Games and Pan-Am Games committees during the last few years.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RAID ON OFFICE OF FREDERICTON "GLEANER"

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister familiar with the question asked by me one day last week of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in relation to the apparently discriminatory raid that was recently carried out by officials under the Combines Investigation Act on the premises of the Daily Gleaner of Fredericton? If so, is he prepared to answer it now?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am also familiar with some of the newspaper editorials that have attacked the conduct of my officers.

I should like to inform the house that I have investigated these allegations and I am quite satisfied that my officials, all of whom are professionally trained, comported themselves with complete courtesy to those involved. They acted in a polite and efficient manner and confined their search to matters concerning the ownership and control of the newspapers involved. The search that they were conducting was carried out by these representatives pursuant to section 10 of the Combines Investigation Act and the statutory duty of the officers in my department to examine into this sort of matter.

Mr. Flemming: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I draw to the attention of the minister the latter part of the question that I put last week to the Minister of Justice, which was to this effect: Has the same type of investigation been made of newspapers and newspaper proprietors in other parts of Canada? There was never any question about courtesy. There was never any question about the right of his officials to do what they did. It is the question of discrimination with which I am concerned.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest that we are perhaps getting into the field of debate here. However, the minister may wish to reply to that supplementary question.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there is no question of discrimination. The Director of Investigation and Research is carrying out his statutory duties which are laid down in the Combines Investigation Act. I do not have in front of me the details of other inquiries, but I do know that the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission has conducted, over the last few years, three inquiries into the proprietors of newspapers.

Mr. Flemming: A further supplementary question. I should like to ask on whose complaint the investigation was initiated, and whether any complaint has been made with regard to any other newspaper proprietors in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again, I have some doubt about this supplementary. If it is felt that the minister should reply out of particular consideration for the hon. member who asked the question, then perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the inquiry was conducted pursuant to section 8 (b) of the Combines Investigation Act. As the House knows, under the policy laid down by the former Minister of Justice from Kamloops, British Columbia, it is not the general practice to reveal details of inquiries that are being conducted under the Combines Investigation Act. However, in this case the inquiry was made public by the people being inquired into.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether a member of the Senate of Canada from the province of New Brunswick is on the board which decided upon that prosecution?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SMALL VESSEL REGULATIONS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Transport. I have gone through two earlier Ministers of Transport on this question but I hope I will get an answer from this minister.

Just before the summer recess, I asked the minister whether he would make a statement to the House on the government's plans with regard to a small vessel harbour administration on the British Columbia coast. The minister said at that time that he would do his best to make a statement before the recess. Could he now make that statement to the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I might say, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend will find it more difficult to go through me than any of my predecessors. However, may I apologize to the hon. member; the statement is not yet ready. The reason is the complexity of trying to work out an equitable solution.

Briefly, I think I can say that we are prepared to do something in this regard. It is a matter of user charges and whether all those wealthy yachtsmen on the west coast of Canada have the right to have these services free or, frankly, whether we should nail them.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON HEARINGS OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Is the Minister of Justice now ready to report on the hearings of the Fisheries Committee concerning its investigation into the seal fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the last time the hon. member put that question to me I again looked into the matter. I want to be able to report to him in some detail later.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet, I wonder whether you would allow me to draw to the attention of the House the presence in the gallery of three distinguished members of provincial legislatures; the Attorney General of the province of British Columbia, Hon. Leslie Peterson, the Attorney General of the province of Saskatchewan, Hon. Daryl Heald, and the Minister of Justice of the province of New Brunswick, Hon. Bernard Jean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF, JASPER AND WATERTON—LEASE VALUE OF PROPERTIES

Mr. Allan B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development could advise the House how much longer the residents of Banff, Jasper and Waterton National Parks will be required to wait before being apprised in respect of the average lease value of their properties last summer?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Not much longer, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INDIAN AFAIRS

TERMS OF STANLEY ISLAND LEASE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the development in respect of leasing arrangements on Stanley Island in the St. Lawrence, will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development take appropriate steps to assure that this situation will be remedied and that such exploitation will not continue in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt as to whether the question is in order. Perhaps the hon. member may wish to debate it at the time of adjournment if there is urgency which is not apparent to the Chair.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STEPS TO AVOID STRIKE BY ELECTRONIC TECHNICIANS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services, provided I am right in assuming that he is still the minister who gives answers relating to the Public Service Staff Relations Board. If I am wrong, perhaps it might be directed to whichever minister has that responsibility. This question arises from a serious dispute that is brewing among electronic technicians in the Department of Transport. Will the minister concerned inquire into the situation and consider the possibility of making a statement to the House, informing us about the steps being taken to avoid a strike in this area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister involved is the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. I note that he is to be in the House tomorrow and on Friday. Perhaps the hon. member will ask the question then.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps this information was given to hon. members of this House earlier when I was not here. The Minister of Supply and Services last session was the minister to whom questions of this type were put. If a change was made the Prime Minister should have informed us.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the information was not given I do apologize to the House. The change was made because, as the hon. member will appreciate, it was preferable to have a Minister without Portfolio and not one responsible for another department to answer this type of question. If notice was not given, I do apologize.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in a position to tell the House whether negotiations have taken place with the province of Newfoundland with a view to developing a program for that province, and, if so, is the minister now in a position to make an announcement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered a similar question a few days ago. We are now negotiating with the authorities of Newfoundland, and of the other provinces, in order to set up projects and programs which will be implemented very quickly during the coming months.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister assure the House that a statement will be made on this most important matter before the end of the year?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why a statement should be made. There will undoubtedly be some information to give the House as the programs are set up with the co-operation of the provinces.

INFORMATION

REPLIES TO QUESTIONS IN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, have the Prime Minister and his colleagues taken note of the recommendations of the task force on government information which state there is a specific need for the government to provide more informative replies to questions raised in Parliament than has been the tradition and, if so, what does he plan to do about it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said, we plan to announce government policy regarding the task force recommendations before the end of the year. I hope we will be supported by the opposition in respect of these plans in order that we may commence an operation to be called Information Canada. With regard to the questions asked in the House and the answers given to these questions, we will undertake to give more informative answers as soon as the questions become more informative.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister, in the meantime, taken refuge in silence, and are his ministers' refusing to answer questions regarding this embarrassing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seek the co-operation of hon. members. I should remind them that there are only three or four minutes of the question period left.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHANGES IN CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I was going to say something about the number of times members in this row have tried to get the floor to ask questions—

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will assume that the hon. member has not said anything.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of the minister's announcement that Canada is to close a number of missions abroad. Will the minister say whether the action taken to close any of the Canadian missions that have been closed or are about to be closed was the result of requests from the countries involved and, if so, have these requests had anything to do with the present efforts of Canada to recognize Red China?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to that question is no, Mr. Speaker, unless one were to consider the attitude taken by the Cambodian government toward the International Control Commission as a request for us to withdraw.

ASSISTANCE TO NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is based on the fact that cancer is a disease which annually claims the second highest number of Canadian lives. In view of the important research work being done by the National Cancer Institute of Canada in attempting to eliminate this killer, will the minister assure the House that he has not and will not terminate the government's important financial support to this work, as has been rumoured in various quarters?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, representatives of this very worthwhile organization were in to see me this morning, at which time I gave them the assurance that support would be given next year. I did not give them anything definite as to the amount.

FUTURE OF FAIREY OF CANADA PLANT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he is in a position to answer the question I asked last week about direct aid or negotiations between authorities in his department and Fairey of Canada, in light of the very serious situation and the plight of a number of families?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I sent a letter to the hon. member. I do not know whether he has received it. I hope he will receive it soon, since I sent it a few days ago.

[Translation]

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, the only exchanges with my department concern information on what we might do. There was also a meeting with my executive assistant, but nothing more exhaustive than what I have just said.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

AUTOMOBILE PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, toward the end of last session the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated that if the automotive industry increased prices substantially in respect of 1970 models he would undertake to have his department investigate such price increases. I should like to know whether or not such an investigation has taken place and, if not, why not?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can only refer the hon. member to statements made in the last few days and I would refer the hon. member to those.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would request that the statements—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

LABELLING OF PRODUCTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which I would like to substantiate by referring to a meeting held in Quebec City last February 20th, when a federal official agreed in principle that labels on Canadian products should be bilingual.

Did the minister reach a decision in that respect and, if so, could he explain?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this question is urgent, but if the hon. member disagrees, it might be discussed at the time of adjournment.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE MEET TO HEAR AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council, as government house leader, if he will arrange shortly for the organization meeting of the Public Accounts Committee so that the Auditor General may appear and make his case for adequate staff to deal with the countless cases of government waste and extravagance on which he has reported.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION

MEASURE WINDING UP EXPO

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-6, to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might raise a question concerning what we do under this new régime whereby all the members do not have files of bills at their desks. I confess I have mine, as have a few others, but if we are not to have files of bills at our desks, I wonder whether a copy of a bill that is to be discussed on any particular day should not be placed on members' desks.

Mr. Speaker: The point is well taken. It was my understanding that copies of the bill would have been distributed, particularly today since the business had been announced previously.

I notice that copies of the bill are now being circulated. The minister might wish to proceed now with his presentation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: The purpose of Bill C-6 is to dissolve the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition.

Dissolution of 1967 Expo Corporation

The Exhibition ended in the fall of 1967 and the Corporation has now disposed of most of its assets and liabilities. Its continuation would consequently no longer serve any useful purpose, it would only perpetuate the presentation of annual budgets and reports which are no longer meaningful.

What is left of the assets and liabilities of the Corporation will be vested by this bill in the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Parliament will, therefore, continue to receive an accounting for the future disposal of these assets and liabilities in the same way as it does for other assets and liabilities of the government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to recall to the committee how the financing of the Corporation was carried out. Initially this financing was ensured by grants given by each of the three governments concerned in proportion to their financial commitments towards the International Exhibition according to the Tripartite agreement of January 1963.

Canada, as it is known, allocated $20,000,000 to that initial financing; Quebec $15,000,000 and Montreal $5,000,000, that is a percentage of 50 per cent, 37.5 per cent and 12.5 per cent respectively for a total of $40,000,000.

The subsequent financing of the Exhibition relied mostly on loans made by the Canadian government to the Corporation which totalled $205,000,000. The Corporation resorted to loans because it had an urgent need for large amounts and because it would have been difficult to fill those needs by issuing bonds or by asking for grants from the three governments concerned.

In exchange for these loans, the Corporation issued notes guaranteed jointly by the government of Canada and the government of the province of Quebec, on a 50 per cent basis in each case. The city of Montreal was not called upon to provide any guarantee.

A third method was used. The chartered banks also made loans of $35 million to the Expo Corporation. These loans were again guaranteed jointly by the government of Canada and the government of the province of Quebec.

Finally, a fourth method, if you wish, was used: the city of Montreal provided $5.55 million, in addition to the $5 million I have already mentioned, by not pressing for payment of sums owed to it by the Corporation.

While Expo was in progress, the city of Montreal carried out works worth about $5.55 million for which it received no compensation.

The total financing made available to the Expo Corporation was, therefore, $285.5 million of which $240 million was by notes and loans, $40 million by grants, and $5.55 million by special arrangement with Montreal, as I have just said.

[English]

My second point has to do with the distribution of assets; that is, how the assets of the Corporation were distributed among the three governments. The Canadian World Exhibition Corporation Act, Section 19(2) provides that:

> The corporation shall wind up its affairs and dispose of its assets and liabilities within such time after the closing of the Exhibition and in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Governor in Council, with the concurrence of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, may prescribe.

Accordingly, Order in Council P.C. 1967-2381 of December 21, 1967 set out how the Corporation was to dispose of its physical assets. I might given an indication of the amounts of money we are talking about now. The estimated physical assets were, at cost, about $182 million. This does not mean they were worth that amount of money after Expo. I have read that the estimated book value attached to these was in the neighbourhood of $74 million. These were the assets which had to be distributed among the three partners.

The main effect of this order was that the government of Canada and the city of Montreal, with a few exceptions, acquired the assets situated on the land they owned. So, these were the criteria for the distribution of the physical assets: first, the property on the land, and second, the best use of the particular facility involved. I will come back to the second criterion in a moment.

As a result of these criteria, the government of Canada received on January 1, 1968, in consideration of $1, all assets on the land known as Cité du Havre, which included the Victoria parking lot, which has been leased to the corporation by the National Harbours Board; Habitat, the stadium, the administration building and the labyrinth, the two exceptions being the art gallery and the Expo theatre. I will come back to those in a moment. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was designated to assume responsibility for the management of the assets acquired by Canada.

For its part, the city of Montreal acquired all the assets situated on Île Notre-Dame and Île Ste-Hélène, including La Ronde and the structures, rolling stock, trackage, electrical and mechanical installations of all the monorail trains thereon, together with the Concordia Bridge, the Bridge of the Isles, and other bridges. These again were the assets that went to the city of Montreal. It is rather important to underline that these transfers to the city of Montreal were conditional upon the release of the Corporation by the city of Montreal from its obligations under the terms of the lease dated July 1, 1964 between the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and the city of Montreal. That lease provided that the islands had to be returned to the city of Montreal in the form in which they had been handed over to the Corporation. In order to do so, the Corporation would have had to proceed with extensive dislocation, demolition and restoration which would have been rather expensive. For example, if you bear in mind that a bridge might have had to be removed or transferred to another place, the point becomes clearer. It was partly at least in recognition of this that the city of Montreal received the assets I indicated.

The major assets remaining were the art gallery, the Expo theatre and the Expo express. The two buildings were similarly acquired, that is for $1, by the government of the province of Quebec, presumably on the assumption that they could make better use of them than the federal government. The Expo express was kept out of this arrangement, as hon. members may recall, and it was sold for $1,880,000 to the highest bidder, which was the Société Urbaine des Transports Rapides Inc., at a public tender. My friend, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) remembers the circumstances very well, I am sure.

Mr. Valade: I do not remember what the minister said at that time.

Mr. Pepin: He said it would be sold to the highest bidder! This was what happened. It is my understanding, however, that later on the highest bidder, that is the Société Urbaine des Transports Rapides Inc., sold the same asset to the city of Montreal for the same price.

There are four major consequences of this method of disposal that was used. The method was slightly different from others that could have been used. The assets could have been shared on the basis of the percentage of financial participation of the governments concerned. However, it was made on the basis which I described.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Will the minister allow me a question, Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify a statement?

As regards the terms of disposal properties and assets on the site, are there not also terms and conditions to be respected as set out by the Bureau of International Exhibitions, concerning the write-off or sale of the buildings?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, after the six-month period which the exhibition is supposed to last, the pavilions must be destroyed, according to what I was told at that time, but the mayor has concluded arrangements under which most of the participating countries have donated their pavilion to the city of Montreal. It is in this context that "Man and His World", which is different from "Expo 67", began. However, from that time on, the federal government was not to be personally involved in the new form that "Expo '67" was taking, that is "Man and His World". It became then the problem of the city of Montreal.

I shall return in a brief moment to an exception to the principle that I have just stated.

[English]

One of the consequences of this method of disposal was that the expenses of demolition and of restoring the site to its original condition were eliminated. The expenses of demolition and restoration would probably have exceeded the resale value of materials and other items recovered from the site. This is the opinion of experts. In other words, had we restored the site to its previous state it would have been more expensive. In other words, the deficit would have been higher than $285 million had we gone through the process of selling the assets.

The second consequence of the method of disposal was that it eliminated the costs of the long and complex process of valuation which would have been involved in any attempt to charge each of the three parties for assets acquired. The value of exhibition buildings, roads and other structures after an exhibition is over is related not to their initial cost but to their market value for some future use, which is by no means easy to determine. In the event, it was considered advisable to avoid this costly process. In other words, had they said: let us assess what the value of each of these assets is, and then let us divide that amount on the basis of 50, 37½ and 12½, we might still be trying to assess the value of, say, a bridge which had been used for six months when we did not know exactly to what extent it would be used after! It was thought by the ministers at the time, good politicians that they were, that there was a better way of dealing with the assets than the very complicated process which was also open to them.

The third consequence of the method of disposal that was followed is that the deficit of the Expo Corporation, in these circumstances, is larger than it would have been if each of the three governments had made some payment for the assets they acquired. Suppose they had managed to assess the value of the properties involved and to distribute them among the government of Canada, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal so that the federal government would have paid, say, $46 million, the Quebec government $20 million and the city of Montreal $54 million. That would have meant $110 million would have been deducted from the deficit that we now have which is $285 million. But this method was not followed and consequently the deficit is higher than it would have been had the three governments really purchased the assets that are still there. How much larger is an open question because, as I have already explained, the value of these assets was difficult to determine. Moreover, it is important to recognize that while the deficit of the Expo Corporation could have been reduced in this way, the net cost of the exhibition to the three governments would have been unchanged. The only affect would, perhaps again, have been to change the amounts payable by each government towards the net cost.

For the Government of Canada,—here I am trying to anticipate some difficulties that might be raised—it is by no means certain that payment in full for any assets acquired, plus its share of a reduced deficit, would have been less costly than paying its 50 per cent share of the net cost of the exhibition. Do you understand all that? The disposition of assets on the present basis—"you, the federal government, get this for $1, and you, provincial Quebec government, get that for $1, and you, Montreal get that for $1"—does not change the situation that would have been created for the federal government had it paid for the assets it got back and also paid 50 per cent of a reduced deficit for the corporation. I hope it is clear now. Anyway you may read it in Hansard tomorrow!

The fourth consequence of the method of disposal used was that the process of retiring the Expo Corporation's debt was accelerated, with a consequent reduction in interest costs and in the total deficit. Indeed, had we adopted the slower method I might not have the privilege and the good fortune of introducing this legislation today.

I do not know if it is true or not, but I have been told that the Paris World Exhibition of 1893 has not yet been wound up! I cannot believe it is true, but this is what I have been told. I say this just to indicate how complicated these things can be if one follows the slower method and if once in a while you do not decide to simplify things.

In short, the method of disposal limited the further escalation of the deficit in three ways, by eliminating demolition and restoration costs in some cases, by avoiding valuation costs, and by reducing interest costs, but still showed the full cost of the exhibition to each government.

The next item is the disposition of liabilities.

After agreeing to dispose of the assets in this way, the three governments concerned themselves with the allocation of the deficit of the Corporation.

An agreement concluded between the governments of Canada and Quebec was put into effect on June 30, 1968, when the deficit was estimated at $285.2 million or at $245.2 million, after deducting the initial grants of $40 million paid by the three parties concerned.

The 37.5 per cent of $245.2 million, that is the share of the deficit Quebec had to assume, amounted to $91.95 million.

To meet its share, Quebec paid $17.5 million of the bank loans in cash and gave Canada $74.45 million of its notes in the form of 48 notes maturing at monthly intervals and bearing interest at 5.46 per cent, the average rate payable on Expo notes.

Therefore, there has been one cash payment and the others were made in the form of 48 monthly notes, each worth approximately $1.5 million. The province of Quebec has since been paying the amounts regularly.

In turn, Canada repaid $17.5 million of the bank loans and honoured its guarantees on $74.45 million of Expo notes.

The city of Montreal made arrangements with the federal government in May 1969, and met its share of 12.5 per cent of the $245 million deficit by providing $25.15 million of its notes to the Corporation, and by supplying services to Expo valued at $5.5 million which I mentioned earlier.

[English]

So, the city of Montreal has given promissory notes to the federal government to the amount of $25.15 million.

The purpose of section 5 of the Bill I am introducing this afternoon is to stop interest accruing on the outstanding notes of the Corporation payable to the government of Canada. Interest on the Corporation's obligations should cease from April 1, 1969, because the intergovernmental arrangements already explained, although finalized in May 1969, were dated April 1, 1969. Otherwise, interest would be paid twice on the same debt.

It is rather complicated but the committee will be able to look more fully into the matter, if my hon. friends want to.

Let us deal now with the write-off of the federal debts, of the federal contributions to Expo, in short, as I said earlier, of federal investments in Expo '67.

In his explanation of the budget changes before the House on June 3, 1969, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) reported that the final accounting for Expo '67 had been carried out, and that Parliament would be asked to approve by legislation the arrangements made for the settlement of the operating deficits incurred by the Expo Corporation. The federal share of this deficit amounts to $122.82 million; the Minister of Finance proposed that this amount be written off completely as a budgetary charge during the current fiscal year.

Therefore, the purpose of this bill, so to speak, is to settle that account.

Section 7(1) provides for the write-off of Canada's share of the deficit of the Corporation.

It is specified in the bill that the amount should not exceed $125 million. The exact figure is $122.82 million.

This measure does not involve any additional expenditures.

Dissolution of 1967 Expo Corporation

• (3:50 p.m.)

Nothing is being added this afternoon. This bill does not involve any additional expenditures. Its purpose is to strike off from Canada's accounts the share of the deficit of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition that the Canadian government must make up.

Turning now to another subject, section 7 (2) authorizes the Governor in Council to defer to 1972 payments due from the province of Quebec in 1969-70 in settlement of its share of the deficit of the Expo Corporation.

I shall explain this section.

Following the dispersal of Expo's assets among the participating governments, the City of Montreal established an exhibition on the portion of the site they had acquired, now referred to as "Terre des Hommes", that you may have had the opportunity to visit, Mr. Speaker, and that surely impressed you. This exhibition was held in 1968, at a relatively high cost to the City of Montreal, we are told, especially—and the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) remembers it well—as the weather was very bad.

Anyhow, in order to reopen the exhibition in 1969, the City of Montreal sought financial support from its former Expo partners. The government of the province of Quebec viewed the additional employment and tourist income which the continued operation of "Terre des Hommes" would bring to the province, and to Canada, of sufficient importance that it undertook to guarantee Montreal's potential deficit in this venture up to a maximum of $5.5 million. In order to make such a guarantee possible, the province requested—and the government of Canada agreed—to defer payments due from the province to the federal government in respect of the province's share of the Expo deficit in a like amount (up to $5.5 million) until 1972, without additional interest.

In other words, as I explained earlier, the province is making monthly payments of $1.5 million. Under this agreement, the federal government allowed the province to defer four of its payments up to a maximum of $5.5 million and that these payments be added at the end of the reimbursement process agreed upon by the province and the government of Canada.

The net cost of the transaction for the federal government will therefore be of approximately $1,100,000. For the coming year, Ottawa will conclude no similar agreements.

The agreement was to be what La Fontaine would call "a one shot affair".

In conclusion, the bill when voted will allow the winding-up of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition as a body corporate. The bill protects the rights of the individuals with claims against the Corporation, as well as the rights of the Corporation, by means of a transfer of the appropriate powers to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Paragraphs A) and B) of Section 18 and Sub-section (1) of Section 19 of the Canadian Corporation for 1967 World Exhibition Act are not repealed. They refer to the protection of trademarks, symbols and copyrights and exempt the Corporation and its property from the provisions of the Surplus Crown Assets Act.

Therefore, the said provisions of the Canadian Corporation for 1967 World Exhibition Act remain in force, even if the act itself is intended to be repealed.

If I can, I shall table the Annual Report of the Corporation for the year 1968 this afternoon. I hope to have available the number of copies required before 5 o'clock, and immediately after second reading, the bill will be referred to the finance, trade and economic affairs committee, for detailed study.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Sainte-Marie has a question.

Mr. Valade: I wish to point out to the Minister that in his remarks, he did not refer to "Habitat". He did not specify whether this was considered as a lost investment or whether the government had studied the possibility of charging it against the account of the Canadian Corporation for the World Exhibition or of the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation. He did not say either whether the benefits deriving from the undertaking would be considered as an asset or a liability in the Corporation's balance-sheet.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of this act, it is enough to say that "Habitat" is part of the federal holding. The question of whether it should be considered as assets or liabilities has no bearing on the bill under consideration.

[English]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, to put the purpose of this bill in words somewhat different from those of the minister, it calls upon Parliament to officiate, in the words of a tag end of verse at the last sad obsequies of Expo. In 1967, we had a big birthday party in Canada and I think everybody recognizes that one of the most important and successful aspects of that was the 1967 World Exhibition or Expo. As world exhibitions go, this was one of the most successful, if not the most successful, ever held.

The minister has made a long and extremely laboured effort to defend the distribution of the assets. His explanation was so laboured and complicated that I doubt if many people understood him. He recommended that members read the report in Hansard, but I doubt if they would even get a clear picture of the situation there.

As I said before, we had a big birthday party and now we must pay for it, and for Expo. I think we in this chamber must examine how the very large amount of money required for Expo was spent to see whether there was waste and extravagance and whether the escalation of cost can be justified. The original estimate put before Cabinet was for a deficit of $40 million and it was agreed that of this the federal government would pay $20 million, the Quebec government $15 million and the city of Montreal $5 million. These grants were made but what was the final result? The Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending 1968 showed a deficit of $273,500,000, but today the minister tells us that the deficit is now $285 million. In addition, there is about a million dollars in interest on deferred payments from the Quebec government and there is probably some interest due on money which the government borrowed in order to supply funds to the Canadian Commercial Corporation to meet its commitments. I do not see this item included in the Auditor General's report.

I think it is essential that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to which this bill is being referred, go thoroughly into the determination of what the costs have been. Although I have seen the figures based on the Auditor General's research up to the end of 1967 and heard the minister speak about them today, I still do not know what the cost is. Actually, the Auditor General himself does not know what the cost to the Canadian taxpayer has been, as I shall show later, nor does he know what the cost will be in the end.

The escalation of costs is symptomatic, I think, of the manner in which the Liberal government has conducted itself during the past six years. The cost to the Canadian taxpayer of Expo was to be $20 million; that cost has escalated to a present known figure of $145 million, which is a seven-fold increase. That increase is greater than for the Arts Centre, which originally was to cost $9 million and wound up costing somewhere between $45 and $50 million. The final cost will be close to $50 million. While the cost of the Arts Centre increased by a multiple of five of the original estimated cost, the cost of Expo escalated by a multiple of seven of the original estimated cost, and we have no explanation as to why these costs should have escalated to such an extent. Why has such a huge deficit finally developed in connection with these undertakings? Certainly, I do not think opposition members of the House are prepared to pass this bill without hearing some satisfactory explanation of these terrific increases in cost which have taken place.

Anyone looking over the Auditor General's report for the year ending March 31, 1968, and reading his comments from pages 32 to 38 and 184 to 188 in connection with the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition will feel his hair stand on end. He will find that things happened which ought not to have happened and that the earlier comments the Auditor General made about the conduct of this Corporation's affairs were ignored. I wish to refer to a number of these incidents, as reported by the Auditor General. Of course, all this shows that if the government wishes to save money it ought to increase the Auditor General's staff instead of decreasing it. If it wants to guard against its own thriftlessness, the government ought to increase the Auditor General's staff.

One of the matters dealt with at page 32 of the report is the inability of the joint auditors—of the Auditor General and the Auditor of Quebec—to express an opinion as to the correctness of the revenues of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition. The last paragraph on that page of the report reads:

> Prior to the opening of the Exhibition, the auditors drew to the Corporation's attention certain aspects of internal financial control that required improvement and certain important decisions... had to be taken—

Then, the report continues:

> However... the joint auditors were unable to express an opinion as to the correctness of revenues aggregating $101,438,000—

This situation was communicated by the auditors to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now I think our Secretary of State for External Affairs, and to the Minister of Industry and Commerce of the Province of Quebec. So, here we have a statement that $101 million was taken in by the Corporation, but there is no proper means of checking the figures. The Auditor General does not know whether the statement of revenue is correct and cannot say how much money may have been lost. The matter was brought to the government's attention at that time but nothing was done. This, in other words, is another example of the carelessness and ineptitude of this government.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question or direct a remark to him. I know how fair he is and I do not think he would respect me if I were not to say that these points were raised and answered before. I will appear before the committee soon and will explain, with the help of my officials, all these matters. I think it would be wrong if we were to leave the impression at this time that the matter has been swept under the carpet, because it has not been.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I am not saying it is under the carpet. It is not under the carpet precisely because the Auditor General brought the matter forward.

Mr. Pepin: No, no.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says, no. Well, I was merely reading from the Auditor General's report to the members of the House of Commons, and that the report shows how well or how badly the government has handled the taxpayers' money.

Next, may I refer to the disposition of the Corporation's major assets, something the minister spent a good deal of time explaining. The Auditor General says that there was an agreement between Canada, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, with regard to the disposition of major assets. The report, at page 33, reads:

> ...it was pointed out that the clauses of the agreement dealing with the distribution of assets and liabilities on the winding up of the affairs of the Corporation appeared to be expressed in such general terms that there could be difficulties in their ultimate interpretation and implementation. However, no action was taken to clarify these clauses.

On this point, the minister tried to make a plausible sounding excuse by saying that it would have been so difficult to implement the agreement that it seemed better to scrap it and to transfer the assets of the Corporation to the three levels of government for the nominal sum of $1. The report reads:

> However, the assets were not distributed in the manner apparently contemplated by this agreement. On the authority of the Governor in Council, ownership of the bulk of the Corporation's capital assets was transferred at December 31, 1967 to the three governments for the nominal sum of $1.

Under this arrangement the assets, according to the report, were transferred as follows: Canada received $59,876,000; the province of Quebec, $4,754,000, and the city of Montreal, $135,095,000. Of course, under the agreement 50 per cent of the assets ought to have gone to Canada, 37½ per cent to Quebec and the remaining 12½ per cent to Montreal. Any deficit was supposed to be met proportionately, according to the same percentages. The federal government, in other words the taxpayers of Canada, is called upon to meet 50 per cent of the deficit of $285 million. The province and the city of Montreal took up the remainder.

To judge from what has happened, it does not seem as if the government has taken good care of the Canadian taxpayers' money. Certainly, the executor of any estate who undertook to give away the assets of an estate and yet agreed to meet the liabilities of the estate would soon find himself in serious difficulty with the courts.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: They need a trustee in bankruptcy.

Mr. Harkness: On page 186, the Auditor General states in paragraph 228 in connection with the general handling of contracts:

> In paragraph 226 of our 1967 Report we pointed out that a number of procedures followed in connection construction projects had the effect of materially weakening financial control. These included amending contracts subsequent to the work having been completed in whole or in part without prior ascertainment of the additional costs involved, making a substantial number of progress payments to contractors without complete verification, and renegotiating bid prices with the lowest tenderer for modified programs without the benefit of competitive bidding. These procedures were continued throughout 1967.

In other words, in spite of the Auditor General having complained about this type of procedure, the government continued to act in the same way as before with a consequent continued escalation in the cost of these things. If we look at some of the costs as far as construction is concerned, we find evidence of terrific escalation. On page 35, the report deals with the cost of Habitat. The estimated cost was originally $11.5 million. It ended up at $22,686,000—an increase of 100 per cent. The report enters into considerable detail concerning the mistakes which were made in letting contracts, the delays which added to the cost, and so on, leading to expenditures on a scale which only the government could possibly stand. In the end, of course, it is the Canadian taxpayer who has to find the money.

I shall not go into further examples. As I say, the detailed comments of the Auditor General on this particular operation take up more than ten pages of his report. They disclose, undoubtedly, that there has been a great deal of carelessness and inattention on the part of the government concerning what was happening. A very large amount of money was wasted. The amount paid out in extra salaries alone totals something well over $10 million, made up of overtime payments made necessary by the poor spacing of work, termination allowances and things of that sort.

The minister talked at considerable length about the way in which the assets have been disposed of so far. I would be interested in knowing the precise nature of the assets, still held by Canada said to be worth between $50 million and $60 million, which the dominion government has received. It seems to me the most iniquitous clause in the bill is clause 6, which deals with the method of the disposal of these assets. It reads:

> The minister shall dispose of the assets and liabilities to which this Act applies in such manner as the Governor in Council, with the concurrence of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Quebec, may direct.

In other words, it is a blank cheque enabling the minister to do anything he wants to do with these assets. I submit this is a clause which should be changed. Parliament should provide that these assets be disposed of to the highest bidder by public tender, or some other arrangement along those lines. It should not be possible for them to be disposed of entirely at the convenience or whim of a minister. It is true that the concurrence of the Governor-in-Council is needed, but we all know the Governor-in-Council is preoccupied by so many things that the minister's recommendation, whatever it is, is likely to be accepted without question.

Mr. Pepin: You should trust me more.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I do not think our system is based upon trusting a minister to do what he thinks best with public money and public assets. Our system is based on control of the executive by the legislature. This is why I am attempting to impress upon the minister the need for control by this parliament over the disposal of these assets, and such control can only be exercised by saying there should be provision for public tenders and so forth.

As to the write-off of $125 million for which the bill provides, I would point out that the minister has not yet, at least in an intelligible way, indicated just how this $125 million is made up. This, too, is information with which we should be provided.

There are a great many more complaints one could make with regard to what was done, and not done, by this Corporation. However, I do not wish to take any more time this afternoon on that subject. I repeat that I trust there will be no disposition on the part of the government to push this bill through the committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs before it has received a thorough examination.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in 1967 we had a big party. Even more than two years later we realize, I think, that it was a tremendous success, that we enjoyed it and that it did something for Canada.

All parties have to be paid for, of course. Sometimes they are paid for in advance, but most often they are not paid for until after they have been enjoyed. It would seem that this is what we are being called upon to do in the bill which is now before us.

The party was a bigger one than we had planned; it cost more, and now we have to foot the bill. One cannot but agree with the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) that in retrospect there is evidence of extravagance, waste and poor planning which might have been avoided. The Auditor General is a very good witness in this connection. But even after this has been asserted, the fact remains that the bill has to be paid, and the question before us is a very simple one: who is going to pay it? The Government of Canada is obviously taking the position, and so recommending to parliament, that this was a national event, that the mere fact of its location in one part of the country, Montreal—I am referring in particular to Expo—does not mean that the people of Montreal or the people of the Province of Quebec should pay more than their fair share of it. Rather it means that the people of Canada as a whole should pay a major share of the cost of Expo which, as we all recall, was one of the major items on the program for our 100th birthday party.

Therefore, while I cannot but go along with the kind of criticism made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, I think in all realism we would have to admit that we are now presented with a fait accompli: we are now presented with the bills, and the bills have to be paid.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, as I have reminded the House on other occasions, that Expo was not the only national event in our centennial year. There were indeed events of various kinds in every province, in every city, and in many of the towns, villages and hamlets of this country. Moneys were raised in one way or another to finance those celebrations and parties. Most of them, I trust, have been paid for by now; and I share the minister's hope that it will not take us as long to wind up our 1967 events as it is taking France to get over the exposition it held during the last century.

I am sure no one in the chamber has any doubt as to the direction my remarks are taking. One of the other big national events in 1967 was the holding of the Pan-Am games in Winnipeg, or, to use the full title, the Pan-American games. Let me stress the fact that although those games were a much smaller event than Expo, they nevertheless constituted a part, and a very successful part, of the national celebration of our centennial year. Everybody recognized this. It is also a fact that the federal government joined with the government of the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg in helping to pay the cost of the Pan-American games.

Having said that, I think I can add that even two or three years later we still enjoy in retrospect the experience of Expo. It is still true that in Winnipeg we are still enjoying the experience of the Pan-American games, and we are pleased and proud to have in our city such buildings as the Pan-Am pool and other structures that were erected for the Pan-Am games of 1967.

However, just as the actual cost of Expo was greater than its anticipated cost, so the actual cost of holding the Pan-Am games was greater than anticipated. It is the view of all of us from Manitoba—I am sure I can say all of us—that just as the government by this legislation is helping Montreal and Quebec to meet the deficit incurred on Expo, so the federal government should assist Winnipeg and Manitoba to meet the deficit of the Pan-Am games.

May I point out without hesitation or qualification that the federal government did in fact pay the full amount in respect to the Pan-Am games that it contracted to pay. Therefore, any request that is now being made for additional money is a request that is made in light of subsequent experience, but this is experience that is precisely the same as that in the case of Expo. The government has stated that what it is doing in the case of Expo is simply writing off debts that are on books; that it is not turning over to anybody any extra dollars or pieces of paper. The bills have been paid and the money has been spent. The federal government is simply saying that it will not require Quebec or Montreal to pay back the debt owed to Ottawa.

The Winnipeg situation is slightly different. The debt is one that is owed by the city of Winnipeg, and if Ottawa is going to assist Winnipeg it means that some further dollars, some further cheques or pieces of paper, will have to be turned over to Winnipeg. But I submit that difference is a pretty technical one. In the long run, it is a matter of dollars and cents, a matter of balancing the books. I further submit that the case for Winnipeg with regard to assistance of this sort is on all fours with the case that is being made by Montreal and Quebec with regard to Expo.

I speak with feeling and concern about this matter. But I am not manning the barricades or shouting at the top of my voice because I dare to believe that the views I am expressing are shared on the government side of the house. I know they are shared by private members of the Liberal party from Manitoba. Back home in Winnipeg, we understand there have been exchanges of correspondence between the mayor of Winnipeg and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson). It is also our understanding that the Minister of Supply and Services, who is a member of the government from the province of Manitoba, is as concerned about this question as are some of the rest of us. It is my hope that just as some of us are making the case here on the floor of parliament, so is he making the case inside the cabinet.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

May I point out that although I talk about a case that is on all fours, a case that is parallel, with that of Montreal, when it comes to the amount of money involved we are talking about two completely different kettles of fish. In the case of Montreal, as indicated in the speech that the minister has just made, we in this House are being asked to write off $120 million odd; in other words, Ottawa's share of a deficit of $240 million, if my figures are roughly correct. In the case of the Pan-Am games the deficit facing the city of Winnipeg is only a little over $1 million. We are talking about peanuts, on the one hand, compared to what is being handed out on the other.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must say I am having some difficulty seeing how the remarks he is now making are really relevant to the bill before the House. Bill C-6, in its preamble, states that it is an act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition. It is with some misgiving that I interrupt the hon. member since he is an expert on the rules, but it does seem to me that when he gets into parallel cases—and the instance he cited may well be a parallel—the rule of relevancy excludes that type of argument.

If the hon. gentleman would like to argue the case, I would be delighted to hear him; otherwise I would prefer that he conclude his remarks on this aspect of the debate.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am really surprised that you have any difficulty procedurally in respect of this matter. You have read a part of the title of this bill. You read:

An act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition—

You did not read the rest of it which states:

—and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith.

I submit with great respect that if we are being asked to write off certain costs of something that was part of our 1967 Centennial celebration, then I have the right to draw a parallel and suggest that the same treatment—equality of treatment in this just society we are now living in—should apply in other parts of the country.

The agreement under which money was paid to Expo was an agreement concluded between the federal government and the province of Quebec, with Montreal in the picture as well. The money that was paid to the Pan-Am games was paid as a result of an agreement between the federal government and the government of Manitoba, with the city of Winnipeg in it as well. I submit these are parallel propositions.

If we are trying to wind up our 1967 celebrations before 1970, instead of taking 100 years as they are doing in France, we have the right during these discussions to remind the government of some elements of this situation it seems to have overlooked. It is on that basis that I should like to make this case. If I have not persuaded you procedurally, I hope I can persuade you to be patient by saying I have not much more to say at this time. Perhaps that is more convincing to the Chair than my procedural argument. I gather from your gracious smile that it is.

May I just say that it was shortly after the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) gave us the budget on June 3, in which he announced the write-off of the Expo deficit, that I asked him—it was on June 10 as recorded in Hansard at page 9933—whether he would agree to the same kind of consideration for Winnipeg he had accorded to Montreal. I got an answer, the spirit of which I have already referred to. A couple of questions which I asked later on seemed to leave me in the same position. I had a private talk with the minister at one point toward the end of July during which he suggested I should write him. I wrote him on August 8 and gave him, in the best terms that I could, the facts of the matter. Not having received a reply by September 9, I wrote him again on that day and reminded him of my letter of August 8 and of our previous conversations. On September 15, I got an acknowledgement from Mr. T. K. Shoyama informing me that my letters were being considered and that I would receive a reply later.

By Wednesday, October 29, not having received that promised reply, I raised the matter during the oral question period and the minister replied in these terms, as reported in Hansard at page 242:

> If I have not answered my hon. friend's letter yet, I apologize sincerely and will make sure that the answer goes out very shortly.

I still have not received an answer. I still do not intend to raise my voice or shout because I hope that the time being taken indicates that the point is being considered at cabinet level, that the argument I am making does have some merit, and now that we are winding up our 1967 costs we will deal not only with this great big one with respect to Expo, but that we will deal with this one that has come to us from Winnipeg.

I will try to draw this to a conclusion. I said that a moment ago, and if I say it again I hope it will keep you, Mr. Speaker, from interrupting me. I should like to point out that there was an agreement between the federal government on the one hand and the provincial and local governments in Manitoba on the other, on April 8, 1965, under which the costs were to be divided: five-elevenths to Ottawa, four-elevenths to the province and two-elevenths to the city of Winnipeg. Later on certain amounts were added because the Pan-Am pool was built and so on. Through the piece there was a pretty good relationship. There was an awareness of the fact that costs would mount, but when the party was held and when all the bills came in there was much more spent than had been anticipated, not astronomical as in the case of Montreal, but enough that the amount now to be paid by the city of Winnipeg is just too much for a city of that size.

There is a deficit in both cases. We are prepared to write off $120 million in respect of Expo '67. I do not object because, as I said before, this was a good party and Canada is better off for having had it as part of its 100th anniversary. But Winnipeg also made a major contribution to the celebrations of that year. It has a deficit of a little over $1 million, and it is help in clearing off this amount that is being sought from the federal government. I hope that favorable consideration is being given to this matter.

I think this is a solid case. It is being pushed by Mayor Juba of Winnipeg and the Winnipeg city council. It is being pushed by all of us who are the Manitoba members of this House. I hope this matter will be dealt with favourably. After all, we are simply asking for fair play.

Let me say again that all of us are a little astounded at the total cost of Expo. It went far beyond what we anticipated. It is also true that our enjoyment was greater than we anticipated. What it amounts to is that we have to pay the bill now that the party is over. If I may allude again to the minister's reference to the situation in Paris, let us not leave out tag ends. If we are winding up the cost of celebrating 1967 in Canada, let us do the complete job. Let us not only do the fair thing for Quebec and Montreal, let us do the fair thing for Winnipeg and Manitoba, where we made a major contribution to the celebration of 1967 through the very successful Pan-Am games that were held in my city in Canada's Centennial year. As I have already said, all we are asking for is fair play, and that is why I believe this request is germane to this bill.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a moment of the time of the house. I speak now because I do not think the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) should pass without comment. What he said was that we have an awful hangover. We had a good time at the party and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I had a good time, but no hangover.

Mr. Otto: The hon. member for Calgary Centre said we had a good time and an awful hangover because we ate and drank too much. He did not suggest that he was at that party, he just said that we should not have eaten or drunk so much. Surely, he will recall that he was here at the time we encountered difficulties and a threatened labour strike. Members of his party and he himself said we should get the '67 exposition on the road by 1967, not 1968, and the devil take care of the cost.

Questions were being asked daily as to whether we were going to complete the building on time. We finally had to get the late Hon. Robert Winters to take over. It was suggested there was only one way to finish the job on time and that was by working 24 hours a day. We were lucky to finish on time. For one to say now that there was mismanagement is completely out of order. He was one hon. member, along with others, who encouraged this government to get this exhibition ready on time in spite of the cost.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add some comment concerning Bill C-6 being introduced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). I would like to say that the previous speaker made uncalled for remarks when he repeated an expression which seemed to come from this side of the House, i.e. "The devil with the cost". Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that this is a case of inaccuracy, but rather a gratuitous assumption by a member looking for an excuse for a lack of precision on the part of the minister himself.

In any case, I do not want to deal with this question at length here. I would merely like to take advantage of this introduction, Mr. Speaker, to express the most sincere sympathy of all members, and even of all Canadians, to the families of the great builders of Expo, namely the late Senator Mark Drouin and the late Pierre Dupuy, who, in my opinion, have been the cornerstones, the foundations of what has been done at Expo. I take this opportunity to extend to their families my most heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-6 is very specific in its request to Parliament. Indeed, hon. members are asked to agree that the government write off the deficits accrued during the operation of Expo '67. I think it appropriate for me to state, Mr. Speaker, that in my own opinion and in the opinion of the majority of Canadians, Expo '67 has really been the event of the century for Canadians. It enabled us to celebrate adequately the centennial of our Confederation, and to become aware of our Canadian environment, with its differences, its requirements, its greatness and its variety.

On April 7th 1965, the former Progressive Conservative prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, speaking of Expo: "The reputation of the Canadians is at stake". To my mind, that was true: that colossal undertaking, we were staking the reputation of the Canadians.

Obviously, today we agreed to pay the bill, to pay the losses. Parliament is responsible for the moneys entrusted to it by the taxpayers, and it is responsible for giving them an account of the way in which those funds were managed.

It is certainly not encouraging for the public to be told that the government must make up $225 millions in losses. Nor is it pleasant for the citizens of Montreal, and elsewhere in Quebec, to have to pay, in addition to their share of the cost of the undertaking, additional expenses in municipal and provincial taxes.

But Expo was more than a regional achievement. It brought renown to Canada throughout the world; it focused attention on the many talents we had to offer in the fields of engineering, architecture and industry.

I feel that we proved to the whole world that Canada knows how to do things, that we are capable of competing in every field with all the countries in the world.

Of course, a deficit adds the already heavy burden the taxpayers must bear through many taxes. But we should not dwell only on the negative aspect of Expo. There is also its positive aspect, that is the various undeniably benefits Canada derived from it. The Quebec government and the municipalities are not without having also somehow benefited by it.

There is no point in emphasizing the benefit, for the country as a whole, of the flow of new visitors invited here on that occasion, who would probably not have come to Canada under other circumstances. We should not forget intangible factors such as encouragement to industry, innovation in the field of employment, and also the important income directly or indirectly accrued to the federal government through taxes levied on building materials and goods sold in Canada during the time of Expo. Had the federal government, however, accepted from the start the suggestions offered by the members, the deficit might have been curtailed. I remember, among others, a suggestion I made to the then minister of Commerce, the hon. Robert Winters. I had suggested allowing for the time of Expo a lottery the profits of which would have helped to meet part of the deficit. At that time the hon. minister had appreciated my suggestion though he did not follow it.

Considering the results of such a lottery in the city of Montreal, I believe that the 50 million people who have visited Expo would have, indirectly though voluntarily, contributed to bring down the deficit we are complaining about today.

The hon. minister was speaking a while ago of the Paris international fair of about one hundred years ago. I would like to remind him that it was precisely on this occasion that the French national lottery was instituted.

This is why I say, Mr. Speaker, that the government tell us about the deficits which they must assume, but rather cleverly, they evade a little too easily the responsibilities that were theirs, that is, they had to make sure before and not after that these moneys would be spent reasonably.

In order to enlighten a little the hon. minister of Industry and Commerce, who is responsible for Expo to the House, I would like Mr. Speaker, to refer to page 387 for the record of the House of Commons debate of the 28th of January, 1966. I will quote in English the statements of Mr. Winters.

[English]

I do want to say, in order that hon. members will be aware of the controls that are exercised, that the act provides that the corporation's expenditures must be approved by the board, the treasury board of Canada, the governor in council of Canada, as well as the treasury board of the province of Quebec and the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

That statement, Mr. Speaker, was made a year before Expo 67 operations began. I am coming back to the quotation:

[English]

The corporation operates under a master plan which budgets for all expenditures and revenues. Annual capital and operating budgets are approved by the board—

The board of the Corporation.

—the treasury board of Canada, the treasury board of Quebec, and the governor in council and the lieutenant governors of Canada and the province of Quebec. That is quite a gauntlet to run.

I shall continue because I think this is very important:

• (4:50 p.m.)

In addition, all expenditures of the corporation exceeding $100,000, or $25,000 where property is being acquired, require advance approval of the board, the treasury board of Canada, the Quebec minister on the advice of the Quebec treasury and the governor in council. I found the control procedures to be in keeping with good sound practices. It might interest hon. members to know that the corporation's operating procedures have been patterned on those of government departments and crown corporations and conform to the best practices of private enterprise.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government should see to it that the amounts are spent in an orderly and responsible way. The former minister had given us the assurance that the government would exercise a more efficient control on the Crown Corporations' administration. That was said a year before Expo. We have now come to the winding up of that company's assets, properties and securities, and the minister says that the Auditor General had made those remarks, I believe, once the Exhibition was over and that the government had done the utmost to make sure that the amounts would be properly spent.

That is why I refer to the Auditor General's report, pages 32 and 33, and more particularly to paragraph 65, that shows precisely that the government acted contrarily to the guarantee given by the former minister, Mr. Winters.

I quote the second paragraph of section 65:

> Prior to the opening of the Exhibition, the auditors drew to the Corporation's attention certain aspects of internal financial control that required improvement and certain important decisions that had to be taken before the opening of the Exhibition with respect to the procedures to be followed during the Exhibition for the handling of the substantial amounts of cash and the recording of revenues from admission passports, tickets, parking fees and other sources.

Mr. Speaker, while we can neither blame nor praise the government for having carried out a project which had been embarked upon and which was to be the crowning achievement of the century, the government is nevertheless responsible for the way it manages public property. We find that, in this case, public property was not under the control of the present government, or that it did not keep the promises made a year earlier by the predecessor of the present minister.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will allow me, I would say that answers were given to the Auditor General as regards the points he mentioned. As for myself—and the officials who will appear before the committee could say the same thing—I am prepared to answer each of these questions.

A moment ago I was discussing this matter with the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness). All I ask is that the government not be found guilty before getting a hearing. The fact that the previous speaker does not accept the answer given by the government does not mean that there is no answer. In connection with the remarks of the previous speaker, I can answer that only $97,000 have not been accounted for, which is an exceedingly small percentage, a "record" percentage, in a venture of that kind, if one recalls that an amount of $107 million is involved.

I will answer all these questions before the committee. However, one should not infer that the government did not answer, or had no answer to offer.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for those particulars. I am not talking about the amounts which cannot be traced or have not been satisfactorily accounted for in this report, although they will be at the parliamentary committee, according to the minister, but I say that certain sums of money which were spent, and many of which are presented to us in the form of a general balance-sheet, escaped government control. Perhaps the minister will allow me to prove my point by giving concrete examples.

I will first deal with Habitat 67 which is mentioned in page 40 of the Auditor general's report. As my colleague was saying a minute ago, this undertaking which had first been estimated at $11 million finally cost $17,982,000. The point I want to make is that when this program was developed the government did not exercise the necessary supervision to ensure that the money would be well spent and that the contractors would receive a lump sum after completion of the project. It was content with foreseeing in a general way the carrying out of the operations. And I am most upset as regards Habitat which I consider a monstrous extravagance. Certainly this question should have been put before the minister in charge at the time, I find it extravagant that $1,891,000 should have been paid in professional fees for the plans and estimates of this project alone.

If the government finds it normal that we should pay $1,891,000 to build such a monster, what I would like to know from the minister is whether this expense was made with the preliminary consent of the government or whether the government is now facing an accomplished fact and is simply bound to pay the shot?

According to Volume III of the Public Accounts of Canada, (1968), details on the assets of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 world exhibition show terrific increases in the related expenses.

I want to refer to page 30 of Volume III of the Public Accounts, under the item "Personnel Expenses". We find that the amount of $9,273,307, earmarked for 1967 salaries finally totalled $28,091,629.

For administration purposes, legal fees amounting to $65,157 had been provided for. However, they actually came up to $291,698. A surplus of some $230,000 was apparently paid in legal charges.

I imagine the Corporation of the World Exhibition resorted to the services of counsels. The committee should try to find out why there was such an overpayment in fees.

We will also find, on page 31 of the Public Accounts, in Schedule 2, the items listed under the heading "Advertising and Publicity Costs". This definition is quite vague, and I do not want to deal so much with commercial advertising as with consumer advertising. Expenditures went up from $2,127,177 to $7,439,999.

And further on, under the same heading, the item Consumer Advertising was added, and further below, the item Information.

The funds granted under this item went up from $2,655,000 to $5,616,000. I wonder if there is a difference between publicity and information or whether information and publicity are different for accounting purposes. However, I feel that when we add up all those figures under the item publicity, the total of $9,805,000 goes up to $20,928,000. This is therefore an increase of $11 million for the publicity item alone.

Mr. Speaker, as most Canadians, I was delighted by Expo. Like everybody, I saw in it a way for Canadians to really show the world that they were talented, that Canada was a country worth discovering and that it offered great opportunities to all. In Canada, even if we are somewhat remote from Europe, and in spite of a population smaller than that of other countries, there are enough qualified persons to carry out a project which has been envied by all countries.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, like all Canadians, I was pleased with this manifestation which did much to make Canada known throughout the world. During the world exhibition, there was a slackening in several areas of the administration and I might prove my point by giving an example that will undoubtedly impress the minister, because those are things in which I have been personally involved.

One day, I had been asked to represent the Canadian government and to replace the protocol officer, I believe. The hon. Lionel Chevrier had asked me to represent the Canadian government—in short, parliament—at an official gathering. I think it was to welcome on that day the representatives of Czechoslovakia. I had accepted offhand to replace the chief of protocol. On the eve of that official reception at Expo, I had forgotten to inquire as to the means of transportation available to me from my residence to Place des Nations. Therefore, I telephoned the Protocol Office to ask them at what time I could be picked up at my place to be taken to Place des Nations, since I had noted, as did many others, that several limousines were available to the directors of the Corporation and a few other high officials. I was told—and I must add to further illustrate this funny situation that for such receptions the lady has to wear a formal grown and the gentleman must be in formal attire, which means the striped pants—I was told quite naturally that I would have to take the subway to get to Place des Nations

I do ask the minister to try to visualize what kind of a figure the representative of the Canadian government would have cut, since I was not attending as a private individual. In fact, I had been asked to represent the Canadian government and there was no limousine available for my transportation. At Expo, that Corporation which had become all powerful at one time, which had the right to decide what it wanted—as can be seen by its deficits—had not realized that representatives of the Canadian government should have been entitled to the limousine service, and we were asked, my wife and I, to take the subway to get to Place des Nations. I have difficulty picturing how a representative of the Canadian government travelling by subway would have looked, in the eyes of the people.

I might then have become as famous as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his election campaign, through the strangeness of my garb. Mr. Speaker, although there is something cynically amusing in that incident, I feel that the Corporation may not have understood that it held its authority, its responsibility, from the government. When a corporation provided with hundreds of millions of dollars goes along so merrily in such things as that, I am not surprised that it did not make it a point to balance its budget, and that today we should have to ask the people of Canada to foot the bill.

I trust that, after those remarks, the minister will go before the parliamentary committee feeling duty bound to answer the questions which, when one really wants to get to the bottom of things, must be asked.

I have no intention, through my remarks, of casting any doubt on the integrity of the administrators of the Corporation. I do feel there was an element of urgency. There was much to be done, in very little time. As one of our colleagues said a while ago: no one has more than 24 hours in a day and, obviously, there was much to do and very little time in which to do it. However, that does not justify the fact that funds were spent without reason.

Dissolution of 1967 Expo Corporation

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the committee should see to it that the minister answers all those questions

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of making a few brief remarks at this time concerning Bill C-6. First, I would like to endorse what has already been said about the great success of Expo '67. As a matter of fact, its unparalleled success brought millions of people to our shores, attracted some 60 odd exhibitors, and all-in-all it was a tremendous success. There is no argument about that point in this House or anywhere else in Canada. However, we as Members of Parliament are now asked to defray some of the expenses connected with that great show.

I should like to deal with that part of this situation which affects all members of this House, regardless of party affiliation. In 1962, parliament passed an Act stipulating how Expo should operate and indicating that it should be managed in a businesslike way. Employees of the government of Canada were entrusted with this task.

In this connection, I wish to quote from the auditors' annual report for 1967 on the Canadian Expo Corporation. The auditors were the Auditor General of Canada and the Auditor of the province of Quebec, and in that report they said:

> The inadequacies of the financial controls referred to in previous reports still existed at the time the Exhibition opened. Certain revenues could not be effectively checked by us and we are unable to express an opinion on the correctness of the following amounts shown on Schedule 4 of the attached financial statements—

Four years prior to that, the two auditors had informed corporation officials that they were not keeping the proper accounts and records necesssary for them to do an effective audit.

• (5:10 p.m.)

What was done about it? Apparently nothing was done. The Corporation continued ignoring the reports of the two auditors and now we find ourselves in this situation today.

Mr. Pepin: That is not right.

Mr. Hales: Section 13 of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition Act states:

> The Corporation shall maintain in its own name one or more accounts in a chartered bank designated by the Minister of Finance with the approval of the Minister of Finance of Quebec.

That is what the act states, and that is what members of this House asked the Corporation to do. But what did they do? Well, let's see.

> Although two chartered banks had been designated, the Corporation conducted its banking business during the year with a third bank which had not been designated by the Minister of Finance—

They even ignored the Minister of Finance and engaged a third bank.

> —and with another financial institution which was not a chartered bank.

I ask you, gentlemen, are we in this House of any use at all if the legislation which we pass is ignored? It does not matter which side we sit on, we cannot approve of this type of conduct. The report goes on:

> The Corporation shall, as soon as practicable and in any event not later than one year after the coming into force of this Act, submit for the approval of the Governor in Council and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council its over-all plan for the Exhibition, setting forth the various undertakings and projects proposed by the Corporation in connection with the planning, organizing, holding and administering of the Exhibition, the estimated cost of each such undertaking or project and an estimate of the total capital costs and operating costs of the Corporation in respect of the Exhibition.
> Any material changes in the plan referred to in subsection (1), including estimates of cost therein, shall be submitted by the Corporation to the Governor in Council and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council for approval.

Of course, the Corporation must have done this and given it to the minister who must have approved it. But what annoys each and every member of this House is the failure to abide by the rules and regulations set forth in the Act.

I will not take time to reiterate the examples of extravagance and waste mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness), though he did not mention them all. However, we would not find ourselves facing this deficit today had the incidents brought to our attention by the two auditors not occurred.

Mr. Pepin: You are an optimist.

Mr. Hales: Amongst other things, the Auditor General mentioned the loss on operation of a rented apartment building. The Corporation rented a furnished apartment building which was not fully used, and ended up with a loss of $345,000.

An elaborate gas distribution system was built at Expo costing $743,000 but there was a provision in the agreement with the gas distribution company that should the system still have value after the close of Expo, some of this cost could be redeemed. I understand the distribution system is still in use but the Corporation, without pursuing the possibility of recovering part of its costs, has transferred its rights of recovery to the city of Montreal and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Apparently the Corporation was not at all concerned about redeeming some of the cost.

An extensive telephone service was provided at a cost of $335,000 over and above the regular charges, to cover construction costs. The service is still in use but the Corporation has never approached the telephone company for the recovery of any part of the construction cost. One hundred and nine telephone booths were to be provided to the Corporation at no cost, but apparently they wanted something more elaborate and put in their own design at a cost of $170,000. This sort of thing added greatly to the cost. There is no excuse for those in charge who did not abide by the conditions laid down for this exhibition and do their part to prevent waste and careless spending.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister why the reports were not tabled on time. The Act provides for them being tabled three months after the end of the fiscal year. The 1967 report was tabled on October 2, about six months late, and the minister states that the 1968 report will be tabled today, although it should have been tabled last April according to the act.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I did not make mention, as did the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), of the two great Canadians who had a lot to do with staging Expo 67 and who have since passed on. I refer to the late Minister of Trade and Commerce, the right honourable Robert Winters. He carried a tremendous load during Expo and I know that these expenditures worried him a great deal. It is most regrettable that a greater effort was not made by those in charge to keep costs under control. Another person who travelled abroad and was successful in having many countries exhibit at Expo was the Commissioner General and President of Expo 67 Mr. Pierre Dupuy, C.M.G. To these two great Canadians we owe respect and offer our condolences to their families.

It is regrettable that the minister has had to come before Parliament and ask that this deficit be forgiven or wiped off the accounts receivable for Canada. There is one other thing I should like to ask in connection with the deferment until 1972 of moneys due by Quebec. Is any interest being charged on these moneys, and what happens if Quebec fails to meet its commitment? These and many other questions I hope will be asked when this Bill goes to the committee. I hope that those who are responsible for letting the show get out of control will be called before the committee and asked to give an accounting.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to hon. members who have spoken on this bill which is to wind up Expo. I do not intend to spend a great deal of time on it. I merely wish to say that Expo celebrated our one hundredth birthday and was eminently successful. I am of the opinion that Expo '67 had a great unifying effect on Canada and Canadians, that it advertised Canada to the world and that the way it advertised Canada will bring us benefits for a long time to come. Nevertheless, despite the good that has come out of Expo and the good that will accrue to Canada as a nation, Members of Parliament should not hesitate to criticize if they find that planning on the financial side has been faulty and lax. That, certainly, seems to be the case with Expo. Like other members of the House, I read with amazement some of the foolish financial arrangements entered into by the federal government with regard to Expo '67. You know, Mr. Speaker, here we seem to see the same old story of cost estimates running wild and no attempt being made by the Corporation or the government to collect recoverable expenses which, in my opinion, should have been taken into account. I agree with the hon. member who preceded me. When the Auditor General's report is before the committee, those who were to keep an eye on the accounts ought to be brought before the committee and asked to explain why they did not adhere to the various agreements we had entered into in financing Expo. They must explain why certain things went wrong.

Mr. Pepin: All that will be done in committee.

Mr. Harding: If we do not ask for all these explanations, we shall not be doing our job as legislators in the House of Commons.

Since hon. members who preceded me covered matters in the report I had wished to bring up, I will not repeat what has been said. May I direct a question to the minister. I expect he will answer me when closing the debate. Why did the government not insist that Expo Corporation establish and maintain an adequate system of internal financial control?

Mr. Pepin: How does the hon. member know it did not?

Mr. Harding: The minister seems to imply that it did establish such a system. I suggest that this procedure was recommended both by the provincial Auditor of Quebec and by the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: It was not.

Mr. Harding: I suggest that, in the end, a financial control system could not be set up because the finances of Expo had reached such a state that the Auditor General could not say exactly how much revenue had been received. This merely shows that financial controls ought to have been set up at the very beginning.

Mr. Pepin: All this will be discussed in committee.

Mr. Harding: All these matters must be aired in committee.

Mr. Pepin: They will be.

Mr. Harding: Possibly the minister may wish to clear up some of these matters in the House this afternoon. Earlier in this debate an hon. member spoke about building costs running wild. For instance, it was estimated initially that Habitat '67 would cost $11.5 million. The federal government entered into the agreement, thinking that that would be the cost. Well, Mr. Speaker, eventually Habitat cost about $22.6 million, double the original estimate. The Auditor General's report lists the reasons for this increase Nevertheless, that the increase should have occurred does not speak highly of those who were supposed to be the watchdogs over government expenditure. We have the same story with the theme buildings. Originally they were to cost $9.1 million; they wound up costing $20.5 million. That is almost a repetition of the Arts Centre story, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Pepin.]

May I refer to some points mentioned by an hon. member before me, Mr. Speaker. Since the Corporation built sewage disposal units, a gas distribution system and set up a telephone service system, I submit that certain items of expenditure were recoverable. The Corporation ought to have collected certain amounts from the utilities companies which put these services in and I, for one, will ask the minister to explain why these amounts were not recovered. Why were not amounts of, say, $50,000 or $100,000 collected by the Corporation and applied to the partial benefit of the federal government, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal? That would have been the proper way to act. Since we entered into an agreement and told the people of Canada about the type of agreement we had with the other interested parties, I submit we should have implemented its terms. There can be no excuse if the minister, the government or any official has let these matters go by the board and so caused the Canadian taxpayer to lose hundreds of thousands of dollars. This is my complaint.

In closing, may I say that I will support the bill, even though its passage will mean ultimately that every man, woman and child in Canada has paid $6. Although I live many, many miles from Montreal, I visited Expo. I realize its value in unifying this country. By the same token, there is no reason for financial laxity on the part of the government or Expo Corporation. That is the point I wish to make in the House this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me not to repeat some of the things that have been said this afternoon. Nevertheless, since I come from British Columbia, which was not an original entry into the 1867 coast to coast united Canada stakes, I should like to say a few words today about this bill to wind up the affairs of Expo '67.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you and members of the House will permit me to reminisce for a short while about those great days of our centennial year and refer particular to Expo. Probably the greatest value of that fair, to my mind, was that it provided a focal point for Canadian unity at a time when our national unity was being most seriously questioned. It also proved to be a source of justifiable pride for Canadians everywhere. It would be hard to deny, I suggest, that millions of Canadian hearts beat faster in those days and continue to beat faster today at the sound and sight of the words "Expo '67". Even the name was new and Canadian. Surely, there must have been few, particularly among Members of Parliament, at the time the planning for Expo first began, who did not expect it would cost money to finish the job properly—more money than was originally anticipated.

It was a gigantic undertaking which lay before the creators of the fair. They had to build, among other things, a large extension to an island in the St. Lawrence, and the work had to be done under extremely arduous conditions. I stand to be corrected, but I do not know of a single genuine world fair in this century which has made money. But I take a special pride in our fair because I believe it set a new worldwide standard of general excellence for fairs of this calibre, while at the same time capturing the imagination of Canadians generally in a way which cannot be measured in dollars alone. They said it couldn't be done, but we did it—and we did it within the framework of what seemed at the time to be an impossible timetable. That is something else to be proud of.

There are other spin-offs, and these too, in my view, are beyond price. I am of the opinion that Expo '67 and all it encompassed came at a most significant time in history. Man and His World was the theme. I firmly believe it contributed toward better world understanding—a new understanding of Canada and Canadians by non-Canadians, a new understanding of the world and of our place in it by Canadians, a new understanding between eastern Canadians and western Canadians, between young Canadians and old Canadians, between English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians, in fact, between all Canadians. We should be grateful for this.

From across Canada, from all directions, came people, particularly young people, to gather in Montreal to see what we as a nation were capable of doing. They came not only to see what we could do and how well we could do it, but to see for themselves how far we had come in 100 years of history. It is a large amount, in terms of dollars, that we are today being asked to pay, but I believe it to be a fair one in terms of its immediate and long-range benefits to our country and to our people.

Perhaps I could quote, Mr. Speaker, some words spoken by the Premier of our Province of British Columbia who, speaking of Expo '67, said:

> I wonder how we as Canadians will remember EXPO best? Certainly we will remember it as a triumph of imagination and planning, of architecture and entertainment—for a triumph it most assuredly is. Certainly we will remember it as the catalyst which brought into focus the attention of the world to a spectacle produced in Canada by Canadians, and unrivalled by any exhibition ever produced before.
> But in the fullness of time it may be that we will remember EXPO best for still another reason; and it may be that this remembrance will be EXPO's greatest gift of all to future generations of Canadians.
> Because in my opinion, as a proud Canadian, the one greatest contribution EXPO '67 has made to our country is simply this: It has demonstrated to ourselves—not just to the world, but once and for all to ourselves—that there is in our nation an unlimited capacity for excellence.

Finally, speaking for myself, let me say this: I repeat, there are long term benefits, some of which are yet to come, from Expo and I believe there are few in this country who are not willing to see their fair share paid now by this parliament. I hope this bill will be sent to committee for fuller study tonight.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): It is not my intention to speak at any great length on Bill C-6 which is presently before the House, but there are some proposals in it which concern me since the measure has to do with a large expenditure of tax dollars and our present tax laws are of vital importance to all Canadians.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). I must disagree with his statement that members on this side urged the government to go ahead with this project "the devil with all costs", to use his words. I would remind the hon. member that it was not members on this side of the House who advocated the Pearson formula in 1966 under which a 30 per cent pay increase was granted to the stevedores, a settlement which set inflation ablaze throughout Canada and which the Liberal government has not yet been able to extinguish. To the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos), I should like to say that no one disagrees with his view that Expo was important to Canada. What my hon. friend from Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness), the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) had to say amounted to this—that everything which was accomplished could have been done with a lot less waste of money had there been more supervision over expenditures.

I find no fault with the intent of this bill. The measure simply states that it is an act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith. There is little doubt in the minds of many Canadians that we had a bang-up birthday party to celebrate our 100 years as a nation or that one of the glittering stars in that birthday celebration was Expo '67, the world exhibition held in Montreal. In fact, this star shone so brightly that it continues to glow under the direction of provincial and municipal authorities. In my view this exhibition has done much to strengthen Canada's international image. It helped the tourist trade, at least in central Canada. It encouraged our architects to think big and to create new designs. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming) says it encouraged them to charge big, as well, and this tendency may be reflected in some of today's building costs.

As I was saying, the fair, the star of the occasion, continues to glow under the direction of provincial and municipal authorities with assistance from the federal government by way of a deferral of repayment amounting to some $5,500,000, payment of which had been due on June 28, 1968. It is now deferred until 1972. Like one of the previous speakers, I wonder whether this deferral has been arranged without any consideration being paid to the interest which is due. This is a question which, more than likely, will be researched by the committee.

There is an old saying that the man who pays the piper calls the tune, and I suppose it applies to parties as well as to other things. Since all Canadians are now being asked to pay for the party, I think it is only fair that they should be made aware of the size of the tab as they reach for the bill. In the public accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, volume III we find these figures on page 29. Against a net loss from operations, we find a figure of $59,726,718. Amounts written off on transfer of capital assets to participating governments are listed as follows: City of Montreal, $135,094,953; Government of Canada, $59,876,285; Province of Quebec, $4,753,693. The loss on the disposal of the mass transit system is estimated as $199,724,931; the amount written off on the demolition of buildings and other assets is $291,160, and the loss on sale of other capital assets appears as $426,880. The deficit, the net cost of the exhibition as of December 31, 1967 is listed as $273,588,537.

You will note that the Auditor General lists the total net cost of the exhibition at $273,588,537. Anyone who knows anything about the cost of parties will have to admit that this was a good one. Obviously no thought was given as to the cost of the party or as to whom would have to pay the bill. Early in the game some people did become concerned, but they were reassured by the government of the day that the federal government's participation would not exceed $20 million. For example, during the first session of the 26th parliament this question was placed on the order paper by the then New Democratic Party member Douglas Fisher, and is to be found at page 3016 of Hansard for September 30, 1963:

> What is the estimated total contribution of the federal government to the world's fair including its share of the cost of the proposed upstream ice dam, the ramps from the Jacques Cartier bridge to the proposed Ile Notre Dame, the bridges from Ile Notre Dame to St. Helen's island and the proposed bridge from St. Helen's island to point St. Charles?

The question was answered by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) as follows:

> The federal government is committed under the statute and the agreement between Quebec and the city of Montreal to provide a maximum—> —of $20 million to the world's fair corporation. The corporation is responsible for providing services on the completed site. The federal government has also agreed to pay on the construction of an ice control structure the amount required in excess of $2½ milion to be provided by the city. The amount of the excess has not been determined pending the results of engineering studies.

I emphasize the word "maximum".

> The federal government is not responsible for providing access by the bridges mentioned in the question.
> May I add that the federal government will, like many other countries and some provinces, have an exhibit at the world fair, for which it will assume the cost.

You will also find this same amount listed at page 29, along with the amounts pledged by other governments. These amounts are listed as grants received from participating governments. There is $20 million from the government of Canada, $15 million from the government of the province of Quebec, $5 million from the city of Montreal, for a total of $40 million. This leaves a balance of $233,588,537.

Today, the House was informed by the minister that this amount had escalated. I am sorry I cannot recall the exact amount, but it was a larger figure than the previous one.

Mr. Harkness: It is $285 million plus.

Mr. Crouse: According to my hon. friend, the total has now increased to $285 million. What can we do? As a nation we must pay our bills. However, these figures give the House some idea of the slap-happy, haphazard manner in which the Liberal government has mismanaged Canada's affairs. This government has shown a sense of irresponsibility which borders on insanity. The fact that this attitude persists to the present day is causing concern to many Canadians. As I have said, we must pay off our debts. But I cannot agree with the course that is proposed in this bill, which I think is unsound. I cannot help but wonder what Canadians generally are thinking about the irresponsible approach that this government adopts to our financial problems.

What did the Auditor General, for example, have to say about this irresponsibility? At page 34 of his report to the House of Commons dated March 31, 1968 he listed some examples. Some of these have already been cited by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales). I think they skipped some that are pertinent to the discussion, and one is as follows:

> In the case of many appointments to senior positions, starting salaries were higher than the established minimum rates and frequently maximum rates were paid immediately or within six months of appointment. Thirty-three officers in receipt of salaries of $10,000 or more received increases during 1967 ranging from 20 per cent to 60 per cent. Of these employees, 10 left the Corporation's employ in 1967 and received salary termination payments averaging 27 per cent of annual salary.

Then, later he says:

> However, payments were made to all employees including those who did not qualify because their former or comparable positions were assured. Twelve such payments aggregating $70,000 came to our attention during the year, the largest being $15,425.

I presume that that was paid to one individual.

> Termination payments totalling $4,694,000 were provided for in the 1967 accounts but it is estimated that an additional $1,188,000 will be required.

These are astronomical figures and raise some doubt about the ability of the present government to manage our affairs.

If I may return to the bill, let me read to the House the words of clause 3:

> The administration and control of all the properties, rights, franchises and other assets under the administration and control of the Corporation immediately before the commencement of this Act are hereby transferred to the Minister.

Think of the power that this clause alone places in the hands of the minister! May I say at once that I am not singling out the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pepin: The amount involved is less than the hon. member has stated, but I will be making reports on my activities, as does every government department.

Mr. Crouse: I thank the minister for his intervention, and I was about to say that I was not being critical of the minister personally.

Mr. Hales: It would be too late anyway; he has sold us the goods now.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, he has sold them now. It is his misfortune to be saddled with this particular burden, but having taken the kudos he must now be prepared to accept a bit of the blame.

Clause 4 provides still more power:

> All rights of creditors against the Corporation and all actions pending against the Corporation are unimpaired by the transfer to the Minister of the administration and control of the assets heretofore under the administration and control of the Corporation; and all subsisting liabilities of the Corporation and actions pending against the Corporation may be enforced or continued against the Minister in like manner and to the same extent as they could have been enforced or continued against the Corporation.

The minister is going to be pretty busy. The clause to which I really take exception is clause 6, which provides:

> The Minister shall dispose of the assets and liabilities to which this Act applies in such manner as the Governor in Council, with the concurrence of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Quebec, may direct.

Under this government the people of Canada are losing control of their property and financial rights. Why could not the minister use the offices of the War Assets Disposal Corporation for the purpose of disposing of these assets? Since the government has been telling us every day that they are waging a war against poverty, the very least that the government should do, in our opinion, is to call for public tenders with regard to the disposal of these assets.

I say that we need greater efficiency in government management. These are not my views alone; these views were well expressed in the Sixth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada, where at page 157 the Council states:

> The government sector has now become so large, and its revenues and expenditures affect directly or indirectly so many aspects of our economic and social goals, that it has become urgent to develop more effective mechanisms for managing our affairs in this critically important area of our national life. Governments today are facing critical problems of choice among many competing demands. Moreover, there is no profit calculus in the government sector to set standards of efficiency and performance.

We have had a classic example of that. All one has to do is to look at the criticism in the Auditor General's report with regard to the mismanagement of Expo's affairs. The council continues with this statement:

> Yet greater efficiency in the delivery of public goods and services, such as health care and education, could conceivably result in very large savings in resources which could then be diverted to other pressing needs.

Canadians want to know what are the assets of Expo '67. They want to know where they are and what they are worth. Why is there all this secrecy about this particular disposal? What is the government hiding? We are being asked by the minister to give him a blank cheque covering the disposal of these assets which have been payed for by all Canadians. This literally denies all Canadians an opportunity to tender in respect of these assets. We are also being asked to pay off an amount of $125 million towards accounts receivable under Expo guarantees.

This type of procedure outlined in this bill only serves to destroy the confidence of Canadians in our democratic process. Certainly, it destroys the confidence of Canadians in this government and makes a farce, if I may say so, of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) slogan "The Just Society". At this stage, we cannot call this government just or fair.

I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) will give us some indication at an early date of the manner in which he plans to wield this almost totalitarian power placed in his hands by this bill. Many communities across Canada made an effort to celebrate our Centennial year. Many of these projects have not been paid for. In my constituency we had a number of Centennial projects. In my own home town of Lunenburg we have the only floating museum in Canada. This was established as a Centennial project. This is one of the last floating replicas of the old sailing schooner, similar to the Bluenose. The Centennial Committee is requesting the people of this town, populated by a little more than 3,000 people, to contribute $60,000 to create a permanent display berth for this ship. Surely, the minister can realize the strain that this will place on these people.

Surely, if we are prepared to give money to Expo we should be prepared to pay some of the other deficits. I should like to hear from the minister on this matter of such vital importance to the people throughout this country. The truth is that this government does not run a tight ship in respect of financial matters. It has no real objective and no real course. As a result, it is sailing around in circles while the economy flounders in a whirlpool of inflation. It has no objectives and no priorities. The government has no vision, but I know the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will welcome the opportunity of examining the wasteful and extravagant policies of his government when this measure comes before the committee. I hope the committee's recommendations will include measures to control the disposal of the assets of Expo. I hope that these recommendations will not be discarded by the minister and that he will give them careful thought and full consideration.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the Chair call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the house leader to indicate the business for tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the item now before the House as the first item of business for tomorrow, that is item No. 8 on today's order paper. The next item of business will be item No. 11, the bill in respect of Children of War Dead, in the name of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Dubé). This will be followed by item No. 19, a bill to amend the Canada Student Loans Act. We will then take up item No. 4, a bill to amend the Judges' Act, to be followed by item No. 23, a bill respecting the expropriation of land. We hope to be in a position tomorrow or Friday to announce a somewhat more definitive schedule of business for the four days next week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether this means that the Canadian National financing legislation is not included for this week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That will depend on the progress made on the bills I have enumerated. The ones I have referred to will be in a position of priority. If we succeed in giving second reading to them, the Canadian National financing legislation will be included.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I asked this question, Mr. Speaker, in order to ascertain whether the minister had changed the order slightly from that announced last night.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If we make progress, it is very likely that the Canadian National financing legislation will come before the House on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to standing order this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX "A"

STATEMENT ON CO-OPERATION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA ON ANTI-COMBINES AND ANTI-TRUST MATTERS

Monday, November 3, 1969

Canadian Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister Ron Basford met today with United States Attorney General John M. Mitchell for a discussion on co-operation between Canada and the United States in anti-trust matters affecting the two countries. They referred to the 1967 Recommendation of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development on co-operation between member countries on restrictive business practices affecting international trade and they discussed placing in this context the informal "Antitrust Notification and Consultation Procedure" between Canada and the United States. This arrangement had its origin in discussions in 1959 between then Canadian Minister of Justice E. D. Fulton and then Attorney General (now Secretary of State) William P. Rogers.

Under this understanding the United States in enforcing its anti-trust laws and Canada in enforcing its anti-combines laws consult with each other when it appears that the interests of the other country will be affected by such enforcement. The primary object of this procedure is to avoid situations arising out of the enforcement of the restrictive business practices laws of one country that might give rise to misunderstanding in the other country, particularly in cases where it might appear that such enforcement had extra-territorial effect or constituted an infringement of the sovereignty of the other country.

The normal course under the procedure is that each country notifies the other prior to the institution of an anti-trust suit which involves the interests or the nationals of the other country and, except for particular time schedules or unusual circumstances, permits time for consultation concerning the contemplated suit. While not required by the understanding, notification is given during the investigative phase whenever possible. In all cases, each government keeps the other informed of significant developments in the litigation.

Consumer Affairs Minister Basford and Attorney General Mitchell noted that the notification procedure had been useful to both countries. The two cabinet members noted that the United States-Canadian Understanding had been the forerunner of the restrictive business practices co-operation recommendation of the O.E.C.D. Council. This recommendation provides for intergovernmental co-operation on a purely voluntary basis without impairment of sovereignty and in accord with each country's laws and policy, in three areas:

1. Notification of and consultation on anti-trust actions,

2. exchange of information on anti-trust matters where feasible, and

3. co-ordination of anti-trust enforcement where possible.

The O.E.C.D., which includes 19 European countries, Canada, the United States and Japan, together with the European Communities, has a Restrictive Business Practices Committee which drafted the recommendation. Mr. D. H. W. Henry, Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act in Canada, is Chairman of that Committee and Assistant Attorney General Richard W. McLaren is a Vice-Chairman.

Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Basford stated that in their views, the procedure adopted by the O.E.C.D. strengthens the United States-Canadian understanding which has served to eliminate conflicts in anti-trust enforcement and has provided a common approach to problems affecting both countries. Of course, each country has the responsibility to enforce its own laws and the discussions under these procedures do not in any way bind a country as to what action it decides to take. The two cabinet members expressed the view that, in this time of expanding international trade, with special problems being posed by the multi-national corporation, and when most industrial countries have enacted anti-monopoly laws, international co-operation in the anti-trust area is essential for carrying out anti-trust policy and to avoid conflicts in enforcement.

In addition, therefore, to continuing the notification and consultation procedure in accordance with the 1959 understanding, the two cabinet members agreed that the O.E.C.D. recommendation of 1967 should be actively implemented as between Canada and the United States in relation to restrictive business practices in international trade. Notification and consultation will continue under both arrangements. Each country will, insofar as its national laws and legitimate interests permit, provide the other with information in its possession of activities or situations, affecting international trade, that the other requires in order to consider whether there has been a breach of its restrictive business practices laws.

A primary concern would be cartel and other restrictive agreements and restrictive business practices of multi-national corporations affecting international trade. The enforcement agencies of the two countries, each within its own jurisdiction, will where possible co-ordinate the enforcement of their respective laws against such restrictive business practices.

Referring to the close relationship that has developed over the years between the Canadian and United States anti-trust enforcement agencies, Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Basford said that to facilitate the implementation of the foregoing co-operative arrangements, it is intended that more regular and more frequent meetings between the agencies will take place.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 6, 1969

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED FAILURE TO INVESTIGATE AUTOMOBILE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Late in the last session of Parliament the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs asserted that if the automobile companies introduced a substantial increase in the price of their 1970 models he would undertake an investigation of their pricing policies. Yesterday in the House, when I asked what had been done by the minister since the automobile manufacturers announced higher prices for their new 1970 models, he reneged on this commitment to the people of Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if you agree with me I should like to move that this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that the President of the Privy Council wishes to rise in connection with the point raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. As he knows, by virtue of the Standing Order the hon. member is required to give notice, which he has done, to give the Chair an opportunity to study the matter extensively, which I have done during the lunch hour. I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to do so.

The hon. member claims that the alleged failure of a Minister of the Crown to take certain steps which he had indicated would be taken in certain circumstances is in itself a violation of Parliamentary privilege. Let me refer the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and other hon. members, as I have done in the past, to Citation 113 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

> Members often raise so-called "questions of privilege" on matters which should be dealt with as personal explanations or corrections, either in the debates or the proceedings of the House. A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament.

Do the circumstances outlined by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby give rise to a valid question of privilege? I do not think so. The circumstances alleged by the hon. member may give rise to a grievance, and grievances should normally be raised and discussed by hon. members on one of the many occasions available under our supply proceedings.

What I am suggesting to the hon. member is that although he may have a complaint and may feel that the minister has not fulfilled a promise or undertaking given to the House during the course of an answer to a question, this in itself does not, in my respectful submission, constitute a question of privilege. It is the type of grievance which should normally be taken up under other circumstances, particularly when the House is debating matters under the terms of our supply proceedings.

Neither the special privileges of the hon. member as a member of the House nor the collective privileges of the House are, to my way of thinking, at issue in this instance. I must rule, therefore, that I cannot at this time put to the House the motion proposed by the hon. member.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCIAL CO-OPERATION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING PROGRAMS

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the House that this morning the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford) and myself have had the privilege of meeting with provincial ministers in the Ministerial Committee on Official Languages of the Constitutional Conference. During that meeting I announced to the provinces the federal government's proposals for financial co-operation in respect of bilingualism programs based on the principles set forth in Book II of the Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

Financing of Bilingualism Programs

[English]

I might add that the position we have advanced is in line with the process undertaken earlier in respect of Book I of the royal commission report, particularly the Official Languages Act which was adopted by Parliament last summer. The proposals we have advanced involve acceptance by the federal government of the principles underlying those recommendations in Book II which were addressed by the Royal Commission specifically to the federal government. They look forward to a program which would provide for federal co-operation with the provinces in greatly expanded activities in the field of minority language education and second language learning.

I am sure hon. members realize that the B and B recommendations concerning other minority groups have not yet been received.

We fully recognize that much of the substance of the recommendations of Book II of the Royal Commission Report falls more in the provincial field of responsibility than that of the federal government. At the same time, we consider that there is a national dimension to the problem. We believe that this latter aspect involves the development and encouragement of programs which will advance and encourage the use of the two official languages across the country.

Volume II of the Royal Commission Report contains 12 recommendations respecting aid to minority language schools, teacher-training, including the establishment of new teacher-training institutions; university education, including grants to minority-language students to study outside their own province, grants to minority-language universities, and a one-year transfer program for students specializing in the second official language; and finally the establishment of a Language Research Council. Other details of these programs are to be found in the statement I have made this morning.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

Essentially, these programs would involve two related priorities; first, measures undertaken in co-operation with the provinces to ensure that the official language minorities will enjoy equal rights with the majority so far as access to education in their own language is concerned; second, the encouragement of second-language learning, to meet a desire expressed by an increasing number of Canadians who wish to be competent in both of Canada's official languages.

As a government, we accept both these priorities and we are prepared to provide for federal financial participation in support of them. Action in this field of course calls for provincial participation as well, because proposals relating to programs and institutions in the field of education are in the provincial domain. Accordingly, in order to achieve any substantial progress in this field, provincial initiative will be required as well as a federal willingness to participate.

The question of financing is of course of the first importance. Given the financial restraints which are operative today, no government can think in terms of providing unlimited resources or establishing open-ended programs even in fields of the highest priority. We have therefore felt it necessary to inform the provinces that it will be necessary to place at least rough limits on the amounts which the federal government can contribute to this program.

Our proposals will require detailed discussion with the provincial authorities, who have of course not yet had an opportunity to study or comment on them. My purpose in speaking today is to ensure that the House is informed without delay of the government's position on this important matter. I would hope, so far as our provincial colleagues are concerned, that what we have begun this morning is a useful series of consultations which will eventually result in arrangements satisfactory to all concerned.

[English]

With the consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the proposals that were put to the provinces this morning which, if the House agrees, might be appended to and printed in today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of proposals, see appendix.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, while we welcome the statement by the minister in his desire to inform Parliament, we have certain reservations and cautions about what appears to be a substantial initiative by the federal government in the field of education. Federal interference in the field of education has, in the past, been the source of serious problems in Canada's history.

In his statement the minister recognizes that the recommendations of Book II of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism fall more in the provincial field of responsibility. But he adds that there is a federal dimension to the problem. He went on to say that the federal dimension involves the development and encouragement of programs which will advance and encourage the use of the two official languages across the country. We do not disagree with this concept. But one is too easily reminded of the development and encouragement of medicare which forced many of the provinces to swallow an unacceptable plan. Having foisted this principle on the provinces, the government is now considering removing itself from this field.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) also mentioned the restraints resulting from austerity. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), and ex-minister of finance, also talked of austerity as the Liberal government forced medicare on the provinces. While the federal government is limiting its contributions because of austerity, it should not push increased expenditures on the provinces. Having in mind the position in the past, I would hope that the programs proposed for federal assistance to the provinces will allow for some form of assistance not only for the two official languages but also for the other ethnic languages which have become a part of Canada's culture.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in welcoming the statement by the minister we ask the government to exercise caution in its meetings with the provinces. Having in mind past experiences of the provinces with this government, it is probably superfluous to ask the provinces to exercise caution in dealing with the federal government.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my brief comments on this issue by saying immediately that so far as I am concerned I cannot see anything in the minister's statement or in the proposals which he made to the provincial ministers that suggests any intention to interfere with the provincial jurisdiction in education. I do not think one should assume this from the proposals which were made.

It has been evident from the start that if bilingualism in Canada is to be promoted and to become a reality, the major responsibility for it lies, in fact, with the federal government. The additional cost of enabling Canadians to learn the second official language and of increasing the teaching of the other official language in our schools should be borne by Canada as a whole through its federal treasury rather than by the provincial governments and the provincial treasuries. This is what the B and B commission indicated, and this is what we knew from the start. We therefore welcome the federal government's acceptance of that responsibility.

I have only three comments to make on the proposals that have been put before us. The first is the hope that the federal government will be as concerned with promoting the learning of other languages in Canada when the volume on other languages is produced by the B and B Commission as they have been with the promotion of the two official languages.

My second comment is that this is a field from which the federal government should never withdraw. I say this because we have had indications from the federal government of its intention to withdraw from other cost-sharing programs, an intention which I and my colleagues believe is contrary to the interests of Canada in those fields. But when the federal government seeks the co-operation of the provinces in introducing costly programs to promote bilingualism in Canada, the people of Canada are entitled to a firm assurance that it will not then load the provinces with the cost of that task at some future time. I do not wish to overemphasize this because although the minister did not say that in the future the government intends to withdraw from this field it is a fact that the government did not at first say it would withdraw from other cost-sharing programs, the cost of which is now being loaded entirely on the provinces. Therefore I think it is the duty of Members of Parliament to warn that any suggestion from the government of placing the burden of the cost of promoting bilingualism in Canada on the provincial treasuries would be a betrayal of the cause of bilingualism and of the obligation of this government to the people of Canada.

The third point I want to make is to express my astonishment at hearing the government pull a figure out of the air. I appreciate that any government has to allocate priorities and decide how much it can spend on A, B or C, but I am somewhat repelled by the notion that some bureaucratic group should decide that $50 million is to be spent on this project. I do not know why and how it decided on this amount; the minister has not told us. It seems to me it would have been much more sensible and, in my respectful submission, would have shown a great deal more good faith on the part of the federal government if it had continued discussions with the provincial governments, produced some kind of plan—or have the provinces produce plans for the promotion of bilingualism—made some kind of estimate of the cost and then related the cost to the total obligations of the federal treasury. Under such a procedure the figure might then be $35 million or $65 million or something else. But I am appalled at what I consider to be this totally bureaucratic approach of saying, without knowing what the plans are going to be, without having discussed exactly what they will be, without knowing what the cost will be: "You make plans but we place a limit of $50 million on those plans no matter what they may be." It seems to me this is not the proper approach to this kind of problem.

I conclude by reminding the House if I have to remind it, of my dedication to the bilingual character of this country. Therefore I cannot but greet with pleasure the federal government's involvement and its assumption of its responsibilities. I just hope that the fears I have expressed will in the future prove unjustified.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we consider it excellent policy to provide the provinces with funds for joint financing of education of minority groups of one of the official languages so that they may achieve equality with the majority group, provided the rights and powers of provinces in the field of education are respected.

I should like to remind the minister that education comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, under section 93 of the British North America Act, and urge him to keep this in mind during his discussions with the provincial representatives. We trust, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government will proceed cautiously and respect this principle, which is embodied in the Constitution.

It is obvious that on the pretense of curing a national malaise, our action should not become for the provinces another source of frustration and dissatisfaction against federalism, whatever our intentions are, if we do not comply with the terms of confederation.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. Speaker, we believe that federalism must be flexible so as to respect the identify of the individual while guaranteeing its own unity and Canadian characteristic in a bicultural and bilingual atmosphere. We rejoice at the minister's statement and action, yet they leave us confused about respecting the terms of confederation.

It is utopian to imagine that all Canadians can become bilingual. However, we sincerely believe that it should be possible for anyone who wants to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks by saying that it is up to the federal government to help the provinces finance the program for bilingualism, show every respect for the identify and characteristics of each province, and provide for all equal opportunities to see their rights respected.

It proved more expensive for the province of Quebec to ensure the respect of bilingualism than for any other province.

Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to make such a legislation retroactive, I firmly believe that the federal government would not be in a position to repay the astronomical sums of money which the province of Quebec spent to maintain federalism, while in other provinces unilingualism was promoted. If every province will extend to its minority the same respect which the province of Quebec has shown to its minority, we of the Ralliement créditiste believe that national unity is possible.

That is why we are pleased with the initiative of the federal government, provided naturally that it will respect the identity and the jurisdiction of each of the provinces.

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

PROVISION OF PENALTIES FOR FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT ARBITRATION AWARDS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-145, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Francis: The purpose of this bill is to provide penalties which would be binding upon senior government employees for failure to implement arbitration awards within the period of 90 days specified by section 74 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DOMINION COAL BOARD DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO DISSOLVE

On the order:

First reading of Senate Public Bills—Bill S-3, an Act to provide for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. At this stage I must, with great respect, challenge the right of this House, pursuant to Standing Order No. 70, to receive this bill. I should like Your Honour's leave to put the circumstances before the House very briefly, without in any sense opposing the principle of the bill or what is involved in it.

In all seriousness I suggest to Your Honour that an attempt to place the bill before the House in this way constitutes a violation of the British North America Act, and in addition violates two of our most important standing Orders, Nos. 62 and 63. I should like to read to you the clause in the bill which I submit makes it repugnant as far as this House is concerned:

3(2). The provisions made by any Appropriation Act to defray the expenses of the board shall be applied to such classifications of the public service within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as the Governor in Council may determine.

It is my submission that this is in fact an appropriation within the meaning of our rules and within the meaning of the British North America Act as well as within our traditions and practices. I need hardly remind Your Honour that the British North America Act, particularly clauses 53 and 54, states:

53. Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Standing Order 62 provides:

1. This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

Then, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the changes in Standing Orders which were made last year there is provision that:

2. The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

I cannot answer for what message may or may not have been sent by His Excellency, but certainly none has been printed in Votes and Proceedings. I would point out to Your Honour that there has been a breach of what from the time of antiquity has been one of the rights and privileges of this House, to vote and appropriate money for a specific purpose which this House may see fit to direct to that end. Beyond any question, clauses 2 and 3 of Bill S-3 deal with an appropriation of moneys for a specific purpose not covered by a Commons appropriation bill of this session.

The purpose of this bill has been initiated in the other place. Large sums of money may or may not be involved; all I can say is that an examination of the Appropriation Acts will reveal that for the current fiscal year the sum of $180,000 has been set apart for the purpose of meeting the expenses of administration of the Dominion Coal Board which is being dissolved by Bill S-3. In addition, there appears in an appropriation bill of 1964 a certain sum which was added to in 1966. The total provision is for a sum of $22 million to be expended over a five-year period on matters coming under the jurisdiction of the Coal Board.

That, simply, is my reason for objecting to this bill. It constitutes an appropriation of funds for a purpose which this House has not necessarily approved and which has not been recommended in a message from His Excellency. In other words, the spending of the unexpended funds referred to in the bill ought not to be applied to the classification of the Public Service as the Governor in Council may determine by clause 3(2).

It may well be that if this bill were allowed to proceed and subjected to the normal proceedings of this House, it would be competent for the government at any time to initiate in the other place a bill to set aside certain payments and programs covered by measures or statutes properly recommended by His Excellency and divert the money for other purposes. I am of course referring to purposes for which money has been appropriated. True, the matter would have to come back to this House for discussion, but I submit most sincerely that if that were done there would be a flouting of the provisions of the Standing Orders of this House and of the constitution.

I conclude by saying that in the past 18 months the power of the government has expanded far too much and the power of the Commons has been eroded in a studied fashion. I submit, therefore, that we cannot permit this bill to go through unchallenged. That is why I have raised this issue. Your Honour may wish to take the matter under advisement and bring down a decision on whether the bill ought to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has raised very important issues respecting the procedural and constitutional privileges of this House. Since hon. members have not had prior notice of the point raised by the hon. member in connection with the first reading in the House of the Senate bill referred to, I should like to suggest to hon. members that the matter be left in abeyance at the present time to allow those hon. members who wish to study the matter the opportunity of considering it from its different aspects. In due course, perhaps at the beginning of next week, argument might be heard from hon. members on both sides of the House about the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River. Also, the Chair would be given additional time thereafter to consider the arguments in support of and against the position advanced by the hon. member for Peace River. For the time being, the matter will be allowed to rest, with the consent of the House, and hon. members who take a special interest in these very complex questions will have an opportunity to give the situation serious thought over the weekend.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SUGGESTED CURTAILMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the historic commitment of the federal government to provide a rail link from coast to coast in Canada, and the ever increasing congestion and ever higher accident rates on our highways, what steps is the government taking to assure Canadians that adequate rail transportation will continue to be available for passengers despite the attempts of Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways to avoid their responsibilities?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will realize that he is raising a matter of very wide scope. He is inviting the Prime Minister to make a statement of a general nature. In all fairness, I suggest that this statement ought to be made on motions. I wonder whether the hon. member might not put his question in a different way.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me to rephrase my question in the manner you have suggested? Will the Prime Minister make a statement on motions and set out the government's position with regard to the historic commitment to provide train service across Canada from coast to coast?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss with the Minister of Transport the possibility of such a statement being made in due course. The matter is now before the Canadian Transport Commission. We think that we should let the companies have a chance to be heard before the commission and see what action the commission will take.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But who is the Commission?

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister assure the house that serious studies will being made on the management of railways who ask for grants, —for they are grants—before any elimination of service is accepted?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In my view, it is necessary that serious studies be made, if those companies want to put their proposals before the Canadian Transport Commission.

As I already said, we have to wait for the Commission's reaction and if the government feels their decision is wrong, we shall decide whether we should act under the law.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr.

Speaker. Since, as the Prime Minister mentioned, this matter is now before the Canadian Transport Commission and since the Canadian Pacific Railway specifically agreed prior to construction getting under way to make full provision for passenger and other transportation, will not the Prime Minister, in light of this historical background, consider having the government of Canada represented by counsel before the Canadian Transport Commission so that the government can oppose any action by the CPR—I am dealing at the moment only with the CPR—which is contrary to the provisions upon which the CPR received so much consideration prior to construction?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the statute provides certain ways in which the federal government can act. We will wait to see if it is necessary to act in one way or another, and we are prepared to take our responsibilities seriously.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. member for Prince Albert referred to the undertaking by the CPR in 1881 under which it promised to operate the railway forever for the benefit of the people of Canada. Considering the provisions of the National Transportation Act, which make it possible for the CPR to ask for subsidies of up to 80 per cent if it can prove losses in certain particulars, will the Prime Minister not discuss with the Minister of Transport the urgent need to place before the Canadian Transport Commission Canada's interests as opposed to the interests of Canadian Pacific?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Transport Commission was set up precisely to represent the public interest. The representations of the hon. member and of hon. members of other parties are well known. I think everyone in this country realizes that that railway company was given certain advantages in the west, including large grants of lands, in return for certain services. I know this as well as the right hon. member for Prince Albert, as does everyone else. We established the Canadian Transport Commission by statute; I do not think the House should panic because the railway companies are following the procedures that we set up under that law and which they are required to follow.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister in all seriousness whether, in view of the behaviour of the Canadian Pacific Railway over the last number of years and particularly in view of this present attempt to get out of a service which in law they undertook to provide, if the time has not arrived to consider seriously bringing the Canadian Pacific Railway under public ownership?

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Lest there be any mistake, I could not even indirectly agree to that proposition. Is it not a fact that government counsel have appeared before the former Board of Transport Commissioners and have placed various propositions before that board? This matter affects the people of Canada, and surely the government will not regard it as panic to place the views and propositions of this Parliament before the Transport Commission.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the last two supplementaries are argumentative.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the operations of Canadian National Railways with which the government possibly has closer liaison. Will the Prime Minister assure the House that the government will make efforts toward influencing Canadian National Railways as much as they possibly can to continue passenger services now being operated in remote areas of Canada and which are necessary to the survival of the people in those areas?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind suggesting to the Minister of Transport that he should, to use the words of the hon. member, influence this Crown corporation. I have suggested in the past weeks that I would try to influence other crown corporations, but the House did not consider that was a proper procedure. However, I will ask the Minister of Transport to use whatever influence he has over this publicly owned corporation. I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, in reference to a previous question, that I fail to see how taking over the Canadian Pacific Railway would solve this particular problem because we have in the CNR a Crown corporation which nevertheless needs to be influenced a little bit.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Simpson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I point out that in relation to manipulating Crown corporations, the Secretary of State said, as appeared in the April 26 issue of the Ottawa Journal:

Nowadays you can leave the written press free if you can manipulate the radio and television facilities.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. That, of course, is not a point of order. At the beginning of the question period I would invite the co-operation of hon. members to move on as soon as possible to other questions. If we spend too much time on one question, the Chair gets in difficulty with members who feel they should have been called upon to ask their questions earlier. I also take this opportunity to remind hon. members that there is a forty-minute limit on the question period. Some hon. members will be first, others necessarily will be last, and I try to be as fair as I can and call on hon. members as quickly as I can. I hope that from day to day members who are called at the last will not hold it against the Chair because they have not been called first.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I wish to allow the hon. member for Crowfoot to ask a supplementary. He was unfortunately lost in the fray. He asked the original question and did not have the opportunity of asking a supplementary. I feel very badly about this.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not mind being put aside for a while, but I did want to have the last word. I wish to ask the Prime Minister if the government will give consideration to providing an opportunity at an early date, possibly in the Transportation Committee, to allow this whole question of passenger service and the commitment for passenger service from coast to coast to be studied in order to determine the need in view of the particular concern of the Canadian people all across Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: You have had the last word.

Mr. Horner: I assume from the Prime Minister's reply, Mr. Speaker, that he is in agreement with having this question studied in the Transportation Committee at an early opportunity. He nodded his head and I just wanted to confirm his agreement.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS TOWARD SETTLEMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. It is my understanding that association executives and negotiating members of seven Vancouver longshoremen's locals met yesterday afternoon and last night in an endeavour to resolve the dispute and that there have been some new proposals. In view of this serious situation, is it possible for the Minister of Labour to comment on the information he has in order to bring us up to date?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The ILWU have come up with some proposals which will be considered at meetings of the several locals at one o'clock p.m. Vancouver time. I anticipate that the results of those meetings and votes will be known at six o'clock Vancouver time. If the deliberations and votes are favourable, it is quite conceivable the men will be back to work in a day or two.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPLY TO PROTEST RESPECTING VISIT OF JEAN DE LIPKOWSKI

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Can he tell the House whether he has received a reply to the diplomatic note sent to the French government concerning Mr. Lipkowski's visit to Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the discussions between our ambassador and the foreign minister of France have not yet taken place.

OIL

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF REVISIONS IN POLICY

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): May I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the critical situation which has developed, as pointed out by the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, when will the minister be in a position to announce revisions in the national oil policy which will allow the petroleum industry to fulfil the greatly increasing demand, both national and international, for Canadian oil?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The main responsibility for the oil policy, Mr. Speaker, comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Schumacher: May I then direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of national oil policy is under constant review. There is a particularly critical review going on at the present time in light of the hearings of the Schultz Committee, the presidential committee on oil in Washington, in connection with Canadian oil policy. We are in constant communication with our United States counterparts to assure that the Canadian interests are considered in the United States review and so that Canadian producers can have the maximum access to the United States market, a most advantageous oil market.

INDUSTRY

POTASH—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PRODUCERS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister holding a meeting this week with the potash producers? If so, what is the purpose of the meeting?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether the question as asked is the type of question which should be asked during the question period.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, if I might rise on a point of order, it is a very urgent matter involving the stand of the federal government, certain positions of the Saskatchewan provincial government, and an important sector of the Canadian economy. I urge that a question on this subject be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: I would be pleased to accept a question but not the one asked by the hon. member. The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Burton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Calgary North and will return to the hon. member for Regina East.

TAXATION

CONFIDENTIALITY OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the white paper on taxation was to remain confidential and in view of the invitation to hon. members to attend a confidential briefing, will the Prime Minister check and advise the House tomorrow whether there has been any leakage in reference to the white paper on taxation? I ask this question in view of statements made at noon by radio commentators and statements made in the press in reference to what may be contained in that white paper.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to check this, but during the many months that this matter has been discussed by cabinet anything that has been published heretofore has been done merely by way of speculation. We are rather satisfied with the fact that there have been no leaks at all. If, today, there is a continuation of the speculation, there is nothing I can do about it.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I put to the Prime Minister in view of his answer that there has been some speculation. Since the Prime Minister has not checked into this matter, would he do so and give an assurance to the House in this regard in view of its importance to the economy and taxpayers of Canada?

INDUSTRY

POTASH—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PRODUCERS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is it the intention of the minister to meet with the potash producers? If so, would the minister inform the House as to the government's stand with regard to the Saskatchewan plan involving licensing, minimum prices and prorationing of production?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is to be such a meeting tomorrow between producers in the potash industry and officers of my department. The purpose of the meeting is to gather from these people maximum information on their views, as well as to bring to their attention some of the cautions that I have already brought to the attention of the premier of Saskatchewan in terms of constitutionality, in terms of feasibility and in terms of economic desirability.

The House will observe that I have been rather reticent to pronounce judgment on these matters for the simple reason that nobody knows what the package that the premier of Saskatchewan is trying to put together will consist of at the end of the day. It is, of course, very difficult to comment on it before we see what it comprises. Obviously there is a difference between prorating for the purpose of conservation and controlling exports and prices.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government examining those aspects of the plan, as far as they are known to the government, that may discriminate against both Canadian producers and consumers and may result in fixed prices in Canada but no control over prices in the U.S.A.?

Mr. Pepin: That is the name of the game, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

METHOD OF PUBLICIZING POLICY STATEMENTS BY MINISTER

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Has the minister, in his role of Postmaster General, been advised that notice of his inauguration as Minister of Communications in respect of the audio-communiqué system for radio stations on November 5 was not received by certain stations in eastern Canada by mail until November 6, the day after the blessed event? Has the minister been giving thought to the expedition of mail delivery as another technique to improve communications?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a suggestion and he has to assume that it will be considered by the minister.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF LANCASTER HOSPITAL

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and is prompted by the many submissions that I and many other members of the House of Commons from New Brunswick are now receiving from veterans in that province. Is consideration being given to the postponement of the transfer of the Lancaster Department of Veterans Affairs hospital to the Board of Commissioners of the Saint John General Hospital until the proposed veterans wing at the Saint John General Hospital is available to the veterans of the province?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that this is the type of question that should properly be discussed at the time of adjournment. I realize it is important and possibly very urgent, and if that is the case it should be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. MacRae: Then I give such notice, Mr. Speaker.

UNITED NATIONS

PROPOSED ADMISSION OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—ABSTENTION FROM VOTE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could he state to the House if Canada will abstain in the vote at the United Nations on the admission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations, as has been reported?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not customary for the government to state in advance the way Canada will vote, because one can never tell whether there might not be last minute developments. The vote takes place tomorrow. I shall be very happy to explain after the vote why we acted the way we did.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question. Would the minister agree that it would be quite inconsistent with Canada's policy of negotiating for recognition to abstain on this question?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I think our vote tomorrow will be entirely consistent with our negotiations in Stockholm.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the House whether or not he is conferring with Secretary of State Rogers before making a decision?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs has the floor, may I ask him whether he has had any recent negotiations with the United States government regarding the phasing out of U.S. military bases in Canada and whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lundrigan: —before recognizing Red China he would recognize that Newfoundland is part of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BANK OF CANADA

INCREASE IN SALARY OF GOVERNOR

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Prime Minister. In this period of inflation, and in view of the government's effort to control prices and wages, did the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance approve the increase in salary of the Governor of the Bank of Canada from $50,000 to $100,000?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question. If the Prime Minister did not approve it, what organization or body did approve it?

Mr. Trudeau: No one, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Both the hon. member for Wellington and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are rising on a supplementary. I think the original question could well have been placed on the order paper since we are dealing with a situation ex post facto. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister rose to answer just a little too quickly, and so I allowed the supplementary on the part of the hon. member for Wellington. However, I do not think we should get into a debate on the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, due to a slight error in the question the Prime Minister was able to give the House a misleading answer. Was not the raise to $75,000?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the correct question might be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

WATER RESOURCES

GRAND CANAL—DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC AND ONTARIO

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Could he tell us whether the officials of his department have been in touch with the governments of Quebec and Ontario regarding the diversion of the waters of the James bay basin, what has been called the Grand Canal project? Could the minister tell us whether studies in this field are going on at the federal level?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

POLLUTION

THREAT FROM BREAKING UP OF TANKER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries may I direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the breaking up of a loaded tanker off the coast of New England yesterday pose a pollution threat to Canada's eastern coastal waters? If so, what steps is the government taking to counteract it?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of any pollution threat to Canada, but I will be glad to take notice of the hon. member's question and look into the matter. If any pollution is threatening Canada, we will certainly take such action as is available to us under the applicable legislation.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether the government is undertaking research programs in connection with the special problems of oil dispersion in the Arctic?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, there is continual research being conducted into pollution, including the possibility of pollution in the Arctic as well as elsewhere. I know of no program within my department that is specifically directed to the question of oil pollution in the Arctic, but certainly this matter is well within the ambit of our total framework of research programs.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I can perhaps direct to the government House leader, whom we all welcome back to the House. Would the government, in view of the importance of this subject, give consideration to referring this matter to the appropriate committee of the House for investigation so that the evidence can be heard and correlated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his first but, I am sure, not his last question to me this session. As in respect of all the others, I will take it into consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I seek the co-operation of hon. members. I will recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, but if he will look to his left and other hon. members will look around them, they will see how many hon. members are anxious to ask questions. For this reason, I suggest there should not be so many supplementary questions.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): May we be assured that the position of the federal government will be made clear to international bodies responsible in respect of pollution in order that our attitude toward this incident will be clear?

Mr. Greene: Yes. I think international questions in respect of ocean pollution are very much at the forefront of discussions. I believe Canada will be represented this weekend at an international conference which will discuss this specific matter.

GULF OF GEORGIA—REPRESENTATIONS FROM LABOUR ON OIL DRILLING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries, may I direct a related question to the attention of the minister's usually well informed parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mather: Have representations been received from labour organizations in British Columbia protesting what they consider to be threatened pollution in Canada's Garden of Eden as a result of impending plans to drill for oil in the Gulf of Georgia—

[Mr. Greene.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had the floor for a while now. Will he put his question?

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, have representations been received from British Columbia organizations protesting the impending plans for oil drilling in the Gulf of Georgia?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. During our investigations we found that the province has given authority for seismic testing. We do not feel that this testing will cause any damage to marine life, but the federal authorities certainly will be taking a hard look at this project before giving any drilling permits in this area, because of the pollution risk.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA-BIAFRA—STEPS TO OVERCOME BLOCKADE OF RELIEF SUPPLIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in relation to his remarks on October 24 in the House about the relief program for Nigeria-Biafra. He indicated that if the present blockade of the relief operation is not removed quickly, other appropriate steps will be taken. Can he give us some idea as to how long this government is going to wait, and make some suggestion as to the other initiatives that might now be open to it.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may answer this question on behalf of the Prime Minister. We have recently held conversations with the Candian Red Cross. General Wrinch is now in Geneva and we are hoping to hear from him soon. The main problem, as the hon. member knows, is that they have not been able to work out an agreement on daylight flights, which is by far the best way to handle the matter. If this cannot be accomplished, we will have to look at the situation again. In the meantime, we are talking to the Red Cross. I think it is most important that we should not undermine the efforts of that great international organization.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, since our government has now waited many months for the Red Cross to clear up these difficulties, can the minister indicate whether any deadline has been expressed or what is the exact interpretation to be placed on the words of the Prime Minister "not quickly removed"?

Mr. Sharp: I am sure we all want to support the Red Cross as long as its members feel there is still a chance to obtain approval for daylight flights.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can say that one of the steps taken relates to aid to the church organizations and Canairelief which have in fact been flying supplies in to the starving people of Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been holding discussions with the church groups and Canairelief who also would like to have daylight flights. I am sure hon. members would agree that this is desirable.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO ACREAGE PAYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): In view of the very serious situation on the prairies resulting from the unharvested grain and the inability to find adequate markets for grain in store which have led to very drastic cash shortages affecting the whole western economy, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon whether the government is giving consideration to implementing an immediate program of acreage payments to alleviate this intolerable situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Other questions along this line have been asked. As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Agriculture and I personally have visited the area in question and the government has been considering the situation. I expect an announcement of government policy to be made shortly.

POLLUTION

BURYING OF FISSIONABLE MATERIAL IN ATLANTIC OCEAN

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether in recent months Canada has given consideration to representations, not only at the immediate Conference on the Sea but at the much broader one to be held in 1971, concerning the burying of fissionable material in the Atlantic depths?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, under the aegis of the United Nations there will be an international conference on this subject in 1971 or 1972. Certainly, my department, along with the Department of External Affairs, has given very careful consideration to Canadian representation at this conference. I feel sure that Canada will be represented and will state her position very clearly at that time.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, will the minister indicate whether Canada is now adopting a position in respect of the custom of the United States of burying this fissionable material in the depths of the Atlantic Ocean, in this day and age when we are all concerned about pollution, particularly this worst type?

Mr. Greene: I believe this very question is under discussion at the present time. Perhaps the Department of External Affairs is more directly concerned with this problem. It may be that the minister can elaborate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this information should be conveyed to the House in due course by way of a statement on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S. RESPECTING CLOSING OF BASES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is similar to a question asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. Has the minister had discussions with his counterpart in the United States government regarding the future of United States military and naval bases in this country, and whether any will be affected by the recently announced policy of that government to phase out over 300 bases round the world?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, the United States, like Canada, has been engaged in some retrenching operations, and we can hardly protest about them. We have, however, been discussing with the United States government the notice that should be accorded to Canadian employees. We have been urging upon them, not as successfully as we would wish, some greater notice than they have given. I think that is the extent to which we can protest. In fact, as hon. members of the House know, I have been engaged in somewhat similar operations.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could indicate the result of the negotiations he has had with his United States counterpart in an effort to have the term of 30 days notice to employees with 20 to 25 years service extended so that they might have some indication of the extent of his negotiations?

Mr. Sharp: As I indicated in my previous answer, our representations have not been very successful. We have been unable to change the practice of the United States government in this respect, notwithstanding the strongest possible representations on behalf of Canadians.

TRANSPORT

TRUCKING—EXAMINATION OF COMPANIES' RECORDS BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister the following question. On October 29 I asked him a question which arose from a report that officers of the United States Interstate Commerce Commission were entering Canada to examine the records of Canadian truckers. He said he would look into the matter. Has he any further information to give the House at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did look into the question, Mr. Speaker, and discussed it with the Department of Transport. Perhaps officials of that department could give a more detailed answer. In summary, we understand there has been no such intervention or inspection in Canada by the ICC, but the responsible United States agency does have some arrangement whereby it inspects Canadian trucks in the same way that we have a similar arrangement with the United States which entitles us, as I understand it, to make certain inspections. This is a matter of convenience between the two governments, and the companies involved, so that instead of stopping the trucks at the border there is inspection inside the country. If the hon. member wishes further details he might ask the Minister of Transport when he is in the House.

ATOMIC ENERGY

BRUCE NUCLEAR GENERATING PLANT—EFFECT OF FEDERAL SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since, as a result of instructions of the federal Energy Control Board, Ontario Hydro has been forced to halt construction on its Bruce nuclear generating station and move it to a new site, was the federal Energy Control Board aware of the original building plans of Ontario Hydro for the Bruce nuclear generating station?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest this question should be placed on the order paper.

DRUGS

PLACING OF CATNIP ON RESTRICTED LIST

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the reported prosecution in Port Arthur of a person for selling catnip to the R.C.M.P.—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nesbitt: This is a serious question, Mr. Speaker. In view of this fact, has the minister put catnip on the restricted list? If not, will he consult with his colleague the Solicitor General concerning whether prosecutions of this nature are in order?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be pleased to consult with my colleague the Solicitor General on this question.

MARIJUANA—CONSIDERATION OF LEGALIZATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the effect that his department is considering legalizing marijuana, what has the Minister of Justice to say about this?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for South Western Nova.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister where applications—

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the minister would allow the hon. member who started his question to continue, and then I will return to the minister's question of privilege.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister where applications may be made to apply for a seven-hour $250 a day job?

DRUGS

MARIJUANA—CONSIDERATION OF LEGALIZATION

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege. I think the hon. member should be aware that he is very badly misinformed. I made no such statement.

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad to hear the minister deny it. Then, he must have been misquoted and this puts the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice at last in the same bed.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has already raised a question of privilege. I suggest there should be no debate on the matter. Perhaps the minister and the hon. member might get together and decide just exactly what has been said.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TELEVISION AND RADIO CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does he intend to recommend any legislation to prohibit all advertising on radio or television concerning cigarette smoking?

Mr. Speaker: I do not believe this is an urgent question. It might be put on the order paper.

[English]

INFORMATION

RETRAINING PROGRAM—LACK OF KNOWLEDGE BY FARMERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the report of the task force on government information revealed that approximately 40 per cent of Canadian farmers were not aware of the government's retraining programs or even the location of manpower centres, is it the intention of the government to provide some emergency information to the farmers or must they wait for a white paper on this subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SPORTS

PAN-AMERICAN GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the settlement the government is proposing to offer the Expo Corporation to cover its deficit, is the same consideration being given to the city of Winnipeg to cover the deficit incurred during the Pan-Am games, the major Canadian sports event of centennial year?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The question was raised in the debate yesterday and I am obtaining information on it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF DUTY ON BIOLOGICS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that veterinary medicines and biologics for the prevention of livestock diseases are equally important to those for the treatment of diseases, and in many cases are the same basic biologics, can the minister assure the farmers and ranchers that there will be a discontinuance of the 15 per cent duty on preventative biologics that was imposed in August of this year as a result of the re-interpretation of the Canada Customs Act by some overzealous customs inspectors?

Mr. Speaker: I would think the question is one which might very well be debated at the time of adjournment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—U.S. POLICY STATEMENT—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Senator Fulbright, Chairman of the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was extremely critical of President Nixon's recent statement of United States policy on Viet Nam as being unlikely to lead to peace in that unfortunate land, has the Canadian government made known to the United States government its views on this important international question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to revert to the usual custom of asking the government house leader about the business for the rest of this week and next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, today, as hon. members know, we are to continue with the second reading stage of item No. 8, Bill C-6 in respect of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition, to be followed by item No. 11, Bill No. C-8 in respect of the children of war dead.

I should like to call the attention of the House to a change in the business announced last night. Item No. 19, in respect of Bill C-135 to amend the Students Loans Act, will not follow as the third item. Rather, we will proceed to item No. 4, Bill C-2 in respect of the Judges Act and item No. 23, Bill C-136 in respect of the Expropriation Act. It is hoped that by the time the House rises at three o'clock tomorrow afternoon, second reading of these four bills may be achieved.

On Monday next, the first item of business to be called will be No. 14, Bill C-11 in respect of the Railway Act, to be followed by item No. 6, Bill C-4 in respect of the Canada Corporations Act.

The House will not sit, as hon. members know, on Tuesday due to Remembrance Day but on Wednesday the business to be called will be item No. 19, Bill C-135 in respect of the Canada Students Loans Act; item No. 12, Bill C-9 in respect of the Small Businesses Loans Act and item No. 10, Bill C-7 in respect of the Canadian National Railways. If there are any changes in this order, every effort will be made to announce them in the House in advance.

Mr. Hales: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation, and add also the appreciation of every hon. member of the House, to you and your staff for the appearance for the first time of this very colourful new seating plan which has been distributed today. I am sure it will be most useful to the thousands of visitors who grace our galleries from time to time. We appreciate the explanation therein in respect of the reason members may or may not be at their desks from time to time. I am sure the House appreciates your efforts, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION

MEASURE WINDING UP EXPO

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pepin that Bill C-6, to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, before coming to the heart of the matter, I should like to request your indulgence since, for a few seconds, I shall be in order only partly, I think; in this case, I base myself on a precedent created yesterday, for I heard some of my colleagues pay tribute to those who were at the origin of the Canadian Corporation for the World Exhibition. For instance, they referred to the honourable Mark Drouin, who has died since, and to the Commissioner, His Excellency Pierre Dupuy, who served with such distinction and who has also left us for a better world.

I feel I am complying with the wishes of every hon. member in paying tribute also to a great man, one who has contributed the most to the creation of Expo, that is Mr. Jean Drapeau, mayor of Montreal. I am doing it not only because I believe he deserves the gratefulness of all hon. members and of all Canadians but also the sympathy of the house and of every Canadian for the shocking, ungrateful and dirty way he has been treated since then by people throwing bombs at his house and his place of business.

Having said this, I now turn to Bill C-6 entitled: An Act to wind up the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition and to authorize the writing-off of certain costs and the deferral of certain payments connected therewith. The explanatory note states clearly that the purposes of this bill is:

(a) to provide for the dissolution of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition;

Nobody can object to that, I think, because it is in order.

The second purpose of this bill is, and I quote:

(b) to authorize the disposition of the remaining assets and liabilities of the Corporation;

There might be differences of opinion as to the manner of disposing of the assets and liabilities, but the government proposes a solution which will be discussed at the meetings of the appropriate committee. The third purpose of this bill is:

(c) to stop interest accruing on the outstanding notes of the Corporation payable to the Government of Canada and thus prevent the accumulation of additional liability in respect of those notes and to write-off one hundred and twenty-five million dollars representing Canada's share of the deficit of the Corporation;

It must be admitted that this is an economy measure which can be easily accounted for and it will be possible to put questions to the minister in the committee.

Here is the fourth purpose of the bill:

(d) to authorize the deferral to 1972 of payment by Quebec of not more than five million five hundred thousand dollars due in 1969-70 in connection with the operations of the Corporation.

As we know, the government has taken such action in order to take advantage of the request made by the city of Montreal to cope with unemployment there. It is therefore a rather fictitious expenditure, since the equivalent would have been spent on unemployment insurance and welfare allowances.

The minister explained in greater detail the reasons for every provision of the bill.

After the minister's statement, the bill seemed quite clear and simple to me, and even the opposition praised it no end. Therefore, I thought the debate would only take a few hours, just long enough perhaps to hear the few usual speeches from members of the opposition, so that the measure could be referred to the appropriate parliamentary committee, where questions and explanations could be asked, concern expressed and answers obtained from the minister and his experts.

I would not have dared intervene in the debate if all members had agreed that it might save time. But since the whole day yesterday was spent in bringing all kinds of charges against the government and distorting the facts, I feel duty bound today to answer at least briefly.

While I felt the debate was unnecessary, I listened to all the interventions of the opposition, including statements that were petty and at times disquieting.

I hope that I am mistaken, because I do not pride myself on being infallible. However, I thought I perceived in certain members an intention to express, indirectly and discreetly, while heaping praises on the minister, some feelings of jealousy toward the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec because of Expo. Some also took the opportunity to attack the government.

Mr. Speaker, in my view this is uncalled for, since we are dealing with an exceptional measure. In fact "Man and his World" has been the finest monument ever erected to the Canadian way of life, for all the world to see, thanks to the co-operation of all—whoever they may be: the Progressive Conservative party, other parties or all citizens, even those who are not interested in politics.

This achievement was the result of co-operation from the beginning. At least this time we managed to agree on a tremendous achievement for the sake of Canada's prestige. I think we should not give the rest of the world the impression we are mice trying to nibble away at this monument's base, but that we can work together and complete this wonderful undertaking that was launched so successfully.

Of course, some people always worry and we must try to reassure them.

First of all, I wish to deny that this was a gift to the city of Montreal, and I can prove it. On the contrary, I believe, as I already said, that it was a co-operative effort from all Canadians toward the development of this country, and that Montrealers and Quebecers did more than their share, or at least their share, shall we say, not to exaggerate.

We are told that Expo cost every Canadian $7, but it is perhaps not known that it also cost Quebecers more than $7. They have indeed paid $18, Montrealers have paid $75, not taking into account the sharing of the deficit that we shall pay as Canadians, Quebecers and Montrealers. The contribution of each Montrealer, Mr. Speaker, will amount to some $75.

This is to say that Quebecers, mostly Montrealers, have done more than their share and have not really got anything free, gratis and for nothing. Rather it is they who gave something to the rest of the country in their great kindness, a present so to speak, but I shall not stress that word unduly. At least they proved their willingness to do their share.

The same holds true for the breakdown of Expo costs: they said that Canada would finance 50 per cent of the cost, Quebec 37½ per cent and Montreal 12 per cent. However, with respect to the 50 per cent contributed by the federal government, we must recognize that about 16 per cent thereof comes from taxes collected in the province of Quebec. Therefore, Quebec did its share.

I have quoted those figures for the benefit of those who might worry and who think that on this occasion there was a lack of distributive justice in Canada; I would like to show them that, on the contrary, Quebecers and mostly Montrealers are willing to co-operate with the rest of the country, when Canada's welfare is at stake.

In the course of this debate, Mr Speaker, it has also been said to my amazement that Expo cost considerably more than had been anticipated originally. I have here the official report of the House of Commons debates recording the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in this matter. Indeed on December 20, 1963, as is recorded at page 6213, the latter spoke in the following terms and I quote:

[English]

In 1959 the Montreal chamber of commerce prepared a brief. In 1960, on February 10, I announced that Canada would apply to I.B.E. for the fair; that Ottawa would guarantee $20 million, Quebec $15 million and the city of Montreal $5 million.

• (3:30 p.m.)

That is what had been anticipated in 1960.

Mr. Speaker, I feel almost tempted to be nasty to my friends opposite and remind them that the then responsible authorities for Expo, the Commissioner at that time, were of the same politicial stripe as they are. I have the feeling that those people—his associates and himself—lacked vision, did not imagine that Canada had to meet a greater challenge than what they pictured.

Those figures, moreover, were much too conservative. They did not show enough vision to anticipate the great support from people all over the world who would come to Canada on that occasion, to anticipate the number of countries which would wish to take part in Expo, as well as the number of statesmen who would come here with impressive retinues to visit what Canada and all the other participating countries had to show to the modern world.

I forgive them for making wrong predictions, but the government should not now be blamed for shortsightedness because the people who made wrong predictions had been appointed by our friends on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, I readily admit that nobody in the world could have forecast in 1960, 1961, 1962 or 1963 the tremendous success of the exhibition. Planning was as sound as could be but, considering the unprecedented number of countries anxious to take part in Expo and the millions of people who were then planning to visit us, the Expo site had to be enlarged, facilities and staff had to be increased. They were recruited within the private sector and, since it was for temporary employment, they obviously had to be paid more than had been expected.

Mr. Speaker, it is no cause for surprise that the exhibition should have left us with a deficit of $143 million, at least as far as the federal government is concerned. No matter what the Auditor General says, I maintain that the exhibition has left us with assets worth more than that deficit. The Auditor General of Canada has overlooked them. They are most valuable and more than compensate the deficit for Canada.

These are moral assets, Mr. Speaker: invaluable prestige, such as Canada never enjoyed before and acquired through the exhibition which brought citizens of many other countries to visit us. They now know the true image of Canada, a giant emerging from sleep in 1969, thanks, first of all, to Expo, then to "Man and His World."

Mr. Speaker, such things are bought and are paid for, even with money, nowadays. The research and the experiments that were carried out will bear fruit in many sectors of our economy and of our industry. What nobody would have dared undertake before because the necessary money could not be found in the usual budgets, was done with the Expo budget. Such things will profit our scientists, manufacturers and businessmen for centuries. All year round, funds are being spent for research and our friends opposite are the first to blame the government for not investing enough in that field. Now, we had a unique opportunity for research which resulted some new techniques.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government's share in the deficit have contributed to the advancement of research. The results were so many that I would have to speak for hours on end to explain what I have seen, and I am only a layman.

What about the publicity given to Canada and its undertakings? Everyone knows how publicity is costly. My friends opposite are the first to criticize the government sometimes for spending too much on publicity for Canada. We got the benefit of indirect publicity which would have cost us millions of dollars and would not have been as effective, since it attracted to Canada a great number of visitors who came to see for themselves that our country was one of the most active in the world.

With regard to the Expo deficit, we should keep in mind the Auditor General's function. I do not want to criticize him because his job is not to appraise moral, intellectual or scientific values but to add figures. He is doing a fine job. If reliance is placed solely on his evidence to condemn the deficit of Expo '67, then any argument is unfair and practically dishonest in some cases.

What has Expo brought us that does not appear in the official reports? Revenue in the form of taxes that have been derived from the tourist trade. This means considerable sums of money that have not been added to the good results brought about by Expo. Today, when this great event has ended brilliantly, some would start beefing—if I may use this expression that is not taken from Bossuet—when we have succeeded in building something as tremendous as that, without taking into account a number of things that undeniably and unquestionably exist and that have brought to Canada considerable and needed additional revenue for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, Expo '67 has brought us more than that still. I am thinking of the ties which have been established through Expo. A number of businessmen came from various countries to establish commercial and industrial connections with Canadian businessmen, financiers and manufacturers. Such connections are of priceless value to the Canadian people. Let us think of that, rather than criticize additional expenses which by the way, are nothing out of the ordinary, since the initial estimates go back to 1960 and the scope of this exhibition has more than doubled; actually it increased fourfold, as compared with the first estimations.

Mr. Speaker, Expo had another result that adding machines will not be able to compute: it reinforced national unity. All the countries which took part in the World Exhibition and whose citizens came to Canada, join hands today in a spirit of good will; they have gained a better mutual understanding and have a sincere desire for peace.

Those results of Expo cannot be denied. I believe the deficit of Expo, which will cost Canadians $125 million, not to mention the City of Montreal and the province of Quebec, will be offset by the circulation of additional money.

Expo will have tangible results. As I said before, Expo is the most beautiful memorial ever erected to Canadianism. All Canadians should rally around this memorial, and give up all petty thoughts at this point, when Expo is about to wind up.

Mr. Speaker, I think that I should bring my comments to a close, even if it is only to prove that I believe a little in what I have just said.

What is the minister asking us to do, after having given his explanations? To refer that bill to the parliamentary committee, because he will be there with his experts and he will answer all our questions. If we are not satisfied, the bill will be sent back to the House and we will then be free to air our grievances.

The opposition has the right to question public expenditures, but at least when an important achievement which will affect the future of Canada and of many other countries is concerned, hon. members should certainly not make malicious assumptions or dubious statements.

In my view—and all government members agree with me, I think—one must admit, so that no doubts remain in the minds of the members of the opposition, that Expo was an achievement to which everyone contributed to the full extent of their power, even the opposition parties.

As good citizens of Canada, we should put an end to all objections and hasten to refer this bill to the designated committee where questions can be asked and answers listened to and checked, so that the bill may come back to the House where every member will be able to vote on it according to his lights.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, this is where we pay up for our one-hundredth birthday party and I believe most Canadians are willing to pay if convinced the overspending was reasonable. I believe there is very little disposition in the minds of Canadians generally to question cases of additional expenditure where reasonable overtime was required and where things were done in good faith to make the birthday party and Expo a success. However, I rather resent some of the remarks of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain). I should like to answer in a friendly spirit, and perhaps explain to him some of the things which motivate those of us who are questioning the expenditures for Expo.

I do not think we can ignore any instances of bad faith there may have been during the construction of the Expo site, nor can we afford to make further mistakes in winding up the Expo corporation.

I should like to make some comments on the hon. member's speech, Mr. Speaker. He seemed to think there might be some hidden jealousy of Montreal in the speeches of members of the opposition and suggested that where good projects were involved, troublesome minds were at work. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anybody in this country who feels any resentment toward either Montreal or Quebec in connection with Expo 67. As a matter of fact, it is exactly the opposite; it was a tremendous national project in which Montreal, the Province of Quebec and all Canadians joined. We were proud of Montreal, of the show they put on, and we were proud of the people of the province of Quebec. People from all over the country went to Montreal for Expo 67, were thrilled by it and heartened by the friendliness of the people of Quebec. They returned to their homes full of good will. Surely, no one is trying to spoil this result of a real effort on the part of all Canadians.

However, government supervision of the project and the activities in connection with winding it up must be questioned. At least, these are matters which concern me. There is no doubt in the world that a lot of mistakes were made as a result of bad judgment, and these cost money. I am sure some can be justified by the fact that there was a time limit; there was just no way of postponing the day of opening. However, we do not have this excuse now and further mistakes in winding up should be prevented, although there are some things in this bill which I believe to be wrong.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières said that all Canadians had benefitted financially from Expo 67. In a sense that is true, but I come from a tourist area in a tourist province and I can tell the hon. member that in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, and in Ontario generally, tourist revenues in 1967 dropped as low as they have ever been. They dropped right down to nothing because everybody was going to Montreal. However, I never heard one word of complaint. People felt that if they were losing money, then they would probably make up for it the next year. The deficit about which we are talking amounts to $7 per head, but some of these people lost thousands. They just hoped that their usual customers would return the next year. The hope had been expressed that tourists would take a triangular or circular tour through our part of the country when returning to their homes in the United States or the west. This did not happen but people in my riding did not complain about it. This is the spirit in which the great effort of the city of Montreal was accepted. Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that they did lose large sums of money.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières also mentioned generosity, and asked if we were going to be niggardly about a few million dollars in settling the affairs of this Corporation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out that Winnipeg has a deficit of less than one million dollars as a result of the Pan-Am Games, a pittance compared with Expo. However, as far as I can gather, this government has not made any commitment to assist in this regard.

An hon. Member: Yes, there was.

Mr. Aiken: I hope so, but no reply was made to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday. If an answer has been given since it was the fastest answer I have ever heard in this place.

Mr. Pepin: They were asking for extra money.

Mr. Aiken: Yes, they were asking for extra money. What do we have here—$20 million to $175 million. I would say that is a lot of extra money. I am not quibbling about the volume, I am just saying that a great deal of money is involved.

The Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto is desperately trying to modernize its facilities. I remember that about four years ago a group came down here from Toronto to try to get some help, but nothing substantial has happened as yet. I am surprised that we have not heard the hon. members from the Toronto area squawking about the shabby treatment meted out to them. But perhaps we will hear about it before the debate is concluded. The treatment accorded the Toronto exhibition is incidental but I am just trying to point out that if the question of generosity is involved, surely it applies to one part of the country as much as to another. If no generosity was shown, a little bit of jealousy might have arisen following Expo 67, as the hon. member for Trois-Rivières mentioned. I think perhaps this controversy has arisen because tremendous sums were spent on Expo while other people, who may have wanted to spend $1 million or less on good centennial projects, did not receive the treatment they really expected.

May I now return to my own speech, Mr. Speaker. The one thing that specifically bothers me about this bill is that it gives the minister power to dispose of the assets of the Corporation without consultation with Parliament. No guidelines are established as to the method of disposing of these assets.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, it may save time if I inform the hon. member that the remaining assets are minimal. Also, I shall be reporting on these matters, as well as on others, in the normal way. There is nothing strange, difficult or abnormal about this question of assets.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I do not doubt that the minister will be perfectly above-board with us. I do not question the minister's honesty or veracity in connection with this matter. Nevertheless, for all I know he may soon be promoted to a position of greater glory. He may not be here and one of his less forthright colleagues might take over the minister's job. Yet again, the minister may be defeated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: The assets are not worth stealing.

Mr. Aiken: The minister says the assets are not worth stealing. A few dollars here or there do not matter, perhaps. I was given to understand that between $50 million and $75 million worth of assets remain for disposal. At any rate, that is what we understood from the minister's remarks yesterday. The minister cannot divert my trend of thought. He need not explain to anyone how he is to dispose of these assets. The bill does not require him to explain, and it is that to which I object. For instance, a building that has cost several millions of dollars to erect could be acquired by another party for $1. On the other hand, there might be cases where accounts owing to the federal government or to Expo Corporation are wiped out. I should be interested to hear about these matters. For instance, it is quite possible that debts owing to Expo will be cancelled. I do not know the laws of Quebec too well, but I do know that in most provinces of Canada there is a statute of limitations under which debts owing may be collected at least six or seven years after those debts have been incurred. After that period, the debtor may invoke the statute of limitations. In this case, debts owing to Expo Corporation may be eliminated at the stroke of a pen. Perhaps no money is owing to the Corporation; but I should be quite surprised to learn that there are no outstanding contracts or that there are no contracts which have not been terminated in some manner. The minister can terminate them and wipe out debts owing with a stroke of his pen, and he need not explain anything to anyone.

The minister may well say that he will explain everything to us; but it is the principle of the bill that is wrong. It seems to us that the government is saying that its authority is not to be limited by the control of Parliament and that it does not have the responsibility of reporting back to parliament on certain matters. I do not care whether the amount involved is $1 or $1 million; the principle of the bill is wrong, and we object to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Aiken: It is the principle of the bill itself that counts. As I said, the provisions of the bill make it unnecessary for the minister to report back to this House after he has disposed of the assets of Expo Corporation. I think this bill ought to be amended in committee so that public tenders are required for the sale of assets.

Mr. Pepin: But the assets have been disposed of already.

Mr. Aiken: Then, why does the government not eliminate the clause to which we object?

Mr. Pepin: The assets have been disposed of.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are not progressing in an orderly way. My understanding is that the types of questions being asked by the hon. member, and the answers given by the minister, ought normally to be considered when the bill is before the committee.

Mr. Pepin: That is quite right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, since the minister is such an amiable person, I do not object to his interruptions. I ask, if the assets are all gone, what are we doing now? We may as well dispose of this bill immediately, or the government could withdraw it. At any rate, the minister could withdraw the pertinent clause of the bill I am discussing. I think he is exaggerating.

I merely wanted to draw this particular clause to the attention of the House because, in passing this bill, Parliament will be divesting itself of any power to control the public properties involved. That is the principle to which we object. I think the minister ought to make it very clear that he has no assets for disposal.

Mr. Pepin: I have already said that.

Mr. Aiken: In that case, could we not withdraw the clause? If the assets are so miniscule that it does not matter, could the clause not be withdrawn? Perhaps the minister may want to amend the bill so that even those miniscule items still remaining could be sold by public tender. I think the federal government can afford the cost of advertising in our newspapers.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, we are now in the position of a man who is suffering from the hangover that comes after a big party. The hangover in question results from the actions of the present government, because it was in office when the expenditures covered by Bill C-6 were undertaken.

It is good to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in the House. Initially, when the opposition of the day warned the government of the magnitude of the cost Canadian taxpayers would have to bear unless the government took some action to protect the taxpayers, our present Secretary of State for External Affairs was the minister responsible for Expo. He was unwilling to allow a committee of the House to examine the activities of the management of Expo '67 to determine whether excessive expenditures were being made in respect of Expo.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I wish to refer to a question I asked the acting Prime Minister (Mr. Martin) on June 22, 1965, as recorded on Pages 2744 and 2745 of Hansard for that year. I asked the government to set up a special committee to investigate expenditures in connection with Expo '67. This request was made on the basis of information tabled in reply to question 397 in which the House was informed the expenditures of the federal government had risen from the initial $20 million to more than $64 million. On June 22, as recorded at page 2803 of Hansard, I indicated my concern over the unwillingness of the federal government to set up a committee because at that time I feared the expenditures might rise to $100 million. I felt that would have been an excessive figure. All I can say in connection with the bill now before us is that I certainly took a pessimistic view of the big spenders across the way.

It appears from the comments of the minister to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) that there has not been much change in the government's approach to these matters. The minister says the assets are minimal, whereas the auditor-general places their value somewhere between $50 million and $60 million. That may be minimal to the minister, but it is certainly not minimal to the taxpayers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: The minister is following in the footsteps of a former minister of that department who said "what's a million?". We have now reached the point where this minister states, what's $50 million or $60 million. It all depends on the degree of inflation the Canadian people have to put up with and the attitudes of those who sit on the government front benches.

Mr. Pepin: Come on!

Mr. Coates: The minister says "come on". He is upset, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pepin: Could I interrupt you for one moment?

Mr. Coates: Sure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I am sorry to interrupt the minister. We really should not have this type of exchange during debate on second reading. We are not in committee. If the minister wishes to clarify a statement he previously made which he feels is being misrepresented, he has the right under the rules to do so. But I do not think we can allow this present type of exchange.

Mr. Coates: Perhaps we will have the benefit of the minister's views a little later. I would be very happy to hear from him. When I initially asked on June 22, 1965 that a committee be set up to examine the expenditures of Expo '67 and the federal government's involvement therein, the present minister was the parliamentary secretary to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce. At that time, the present minister indicated to me that maybe in the fall a committee would be set up, but in fact a committee was not given the opportunity of examining the expenditures until well into 1966. This was after the late Robert Winters became Minister of Trade and Commerce. He willingly consented to an examination because he, like most Canadians, was becoming very concerned about what appeared to be a spending spree at Expo '67.

Mr. Pepin: And you said you were satisfied.

Mr. Coates: Certainly, we were satisfied at that time. If the committee had been established in June 1965 a great many things that did happen might not have happened. As it turned out, it was too late to do anything about them. The same situation applies today. We are discussing a write-off of $122.8 million. We can only talk about it. We still have to pay the bill, but even at this late date Canadian taxpayers have the right to know that this government was asked to take action in 1965 and refused to do so. If they had taken action at that time, the bill today would not be nearly as large. That is the point I am trying to make.

It is only right that the people of this nation should be aware that a great many expenditures were made in relation to Expo '67 that do not come within the purview of this legislation, or, indeed, of Expo itself. I am referring to expenditures such as those incurred by the CBC, the National Harbours Board and the Department of Public Works. For example, an ice control structure erected by the Department of Public Works was originally estimated to cost $2.5 million. The final cost was $13 million, of which the federal government was responsible for $10.5 million. Inflation being what it is with this government in office, that's the way things go; $2.5 million becomes $10.5 million.

The expenditures of the National Harbours Board in the year 1964-65 were $2 million. For the year 1965-66, it was estimated they would increase by an additional $3.8 million. However, in the supplementary estimates for 1965-66 this figure was increased by almost another $1 million.

The total cost of Expo '67 cannot be determined by a study of this bill. This would require an examination of every department of government. If such an examination were undertaken, the figure would be fantastically large, much more than the $122.8 million which we are now discussing. I feel this figure is a very small portion of the cost to Canadian taxpayers.

A statement made by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka deserves corroboration. He pointed out a previous speaker suggested that some Canadians, including some members of the opposition, were upset about the fact that Expo was located in the city of Montreal. Nothing could be further from the truth. I think Canadians everywhere were pleased that Montreal was the site of the fair and that it did such an outstanding job of giving the right impression to those people from other parts of Canada as well as those from other lands who visited Expo. However, all Canadians outside of Quebec certainly sacrificed a great deal in tourist dollars as a result of Expo '67.

As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) said, although they did not complain they did find less cash flowing into their businesses in the Atlantic provinces. The tourist industry there showed substantially less return in 1967 compared with 1966. The tourist operators shouldered a very heavy burden that year as a result of Expo '67.

I have but one other point to make, Mr. Speaker. One of the matters that gave me greatest concern was the construction of Habitat '67. The government has yet to provide a full explanation of what is happening to this—

Mr. Southam: White elephant.

Mr. Coates: "White elephant" is the kindest phrase you could possibly use so far as the Canadian taxpayer is concerned. We do not know who is responsible for it, whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or somebody else. But I do know that it was not required in the first place. It cost many millions of dollars, and the taxpayer has had to foot the bill almost entirely. In my opinion Habitat '67 was, and still is, a monstrosity, one of the most expensive monstrosities ever constructed in this country's history.

I await with interest and anticipation the comments of the minister when he rises to explain exactly what bills will be paid, whether there will be further bills later, what is going to happen to Habitat '67 and what the final bill will be.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have very few comments to make, following which I hope the minister will be able to answer the questions which have been asked.

I want to join with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) in denying categorically that, as far as I am concerned, there is any question of jealousy or of being upset in the context of the remarks of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain). All Canadians were proud of the fact that Expo was held in the way it was; that it was held in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec; that it brought to Canadians all over the country a sense of exhilaration, joy and happiness. It was a great event, and no one I know of has ever suggested anything to the contrary.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is over, finished. The money has been spent. I think we agree with the Tentmaker, who said:

> The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ,
> Moves on; nor all your Piety nor Wit
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
> Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it.

Although we cannot now do anything about money that has been spent, I am here as one of 264 trustees of the people of Canada whose money is being utilized in a variety of ways. Consequently, I would be derelict in the exercise of my duty were I not to call to the attention of the House, and I hope ultimately to the committee, certain facts in connection with the financial program and administration of this Corporation.

I would not call back one cent, one five cent piece, of the money that was needed to be spent on the great and glorious spectacle that was Expo. Neither do I know of any member on this side of the House who would want to call back any of that money. However, I come from an area where there are a million acres under the snow; where thousands of people will have extreme difficulty in eking out a living this year; where, as the minister knows, there are tens of millions of bushels of grain which will not be harvested until next spring, and probably not harvested successfully even then.

[Mr. Coates.]

I would not be carrying out my responsibility if I did not challenge certain of the workings of this Corporation with regard to Expo. I conceive it my duty to call to account people, corporations and administrations which have been delinquent, which have been guilty of extravagance and waste.

As to the future, we do not know what other areas of expenditure may be taken in hand. The lessons of Expo may well be lessons that can be usefully exploited and utilized by this or succeeding governments that undertake responsibilities that are related in their nature to the undertaking that was Expo.

With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, just what do we find? Right from the inception of this Corporation, an officer of this Parliament, independent and answerable only to Parliament, saw fit, in the exercise of his duties, to call to our attention, through the medium of the successive reports published by him, a number of aspects concerning the administration of Expo which he, the Auditor General, considered very dubious and which, at the very least, required explanation. These observations appear in the 1964 report and are pursued in the reports of 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968. I am quite convinced that the report for the fiscal year ending March 1969 will also have some interesting observations to make on this subject.

Merely because we say that Expo was a good show, a good party, that the people of Montreal and their mayor, the people of the province of Quebec, indeed the people of Canada, did a good job in putting it on, does not absolve us from the responsibility of making a careful examination of these accounts. All we can do, of course, is to carry on a post-mortem, and in this respect I wish to bring certain matters briefly to the attention of the House. Then, I will make a suggestion.

For example, may I refer to a matter that was brought to my attention by a person in my constituency, a constituency in which, as a result of certain factors, people occasionally read the report of the Auditor General. At page 154 of the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year 1966-67 appears this paragraph:

> In several cases relocation expenses involving substantial moving hotel and living expenses of newly-appointed senior officers and employees over extended periods would not have qualified for payment under the regulations laid down by the federal or provincial Treasury Boards. From the inception of the Corporation to December 31, 1966, approximately $150,000 has been spent on removal expenses for newly-appointed employees. Six cases involved expenditures in excess of $4,000 each and, in one instance during 1966, $5,000 was paid for the shipment by air express of the employee's effects from overseas.

This is the kind of thing that I have to explain to the long-suffering people in the riding of Peace River. It is the kind of thing about which I am going to insist upon an answer, whether in this House, in the committee, or in the public accounts committee.

The Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1968 at page 34, contains several interesting statements:

In the case of many appointments to senior positions, starting salaries were higher than the established minimum rates and frequently maximum rates were paid immediately or within six months of appointment. Thirty-three officers in receipt of salaries of $10,000 or more received increases during 1967 ranging from 20% to 60%. Of these employees, 10 left the corporation's employ in 1967 and received salary termination payments averaging 27 per cent of annual salary.

This government, now acting like a reformed drunkard, must have its attention directed to some of its alcoholic excesses during the past three or four years. At the bottom of the same page, there is the following statement:

About 2,400 employees, 25 per cent of the Corporation's work force, received overtime pay ranging from $1,000 to $19,000 during 1967 at a cost to the Corporation of nearly $4.5 million.

One employee received overtime pay in the amount of $19,000. Obviously, this must have been an employee at a very high executive level, in receipt of a very substantial salary, to which must be added overtime of $19,000. We cannot recall the money that has been spent, but we are entitled to examine the situation and apportion the blame so this kind of thing will not happen again. That is true if this House has the authority it should have.

Let me refer to some of the questions of a general nature which should be answered. I have just given illustrations of the more exorbitant and flagrant type of thing that has happened. We are entitled to have information about the investigation in respect of salary rates and termination payments. We should know how much was paid in termination payments and what percentage of employees received such payments. We should also know how many of these already had lined up jobs.

Let me refer specifically to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year 1966-67, at pages 154 and 155. The federal government for example bought a number of bonds which the federal government itself guaranteed. What did this do to the status of the guarantees of the province of Quebec? How much did the federal government spend on Expo securities? These matters are referred to in the Auditor General's report for 1967-68 at page 187. What did the government pay exactly in terms of benefits? Who was eligible for payment and in what way? What was the total cost of foregone tax revenue? Were there any comparable tax concessions from the government of Quebec? What were the tax concessions made in respect of temporary buildings of concessionaires and so on?

As hon. members know there were amendments to certain tax provisions dealing specifically with Expo, and these are questions that must be answered. Why were the auditors unable to verify approximately $101 million out of Expo's $141 million revenue? Was anything given in the way of sales tax concessions? These are reasonable and logical questions to which satisfactory answers should be given.

Although I was tempted to do so, I am not going to move that the committee study of this bill should be postponed until a thorough and proper examination has been made by the Public Accounts committee of the affairs of this corporation. I suggest nothing would be lost if this were done. The standing committee to which the bill will be referred will be engaged in many other matters. I know it will want to deal with certain aspects of the bill itself. The Public Accounts Committee is set up to handle studies of this kind. It should look into this whole situation with the Auditor General and his officials in attendance. They should delve into the questions asked by members of this and other parties in the opposition. These questions should be answered before the winding up is completed.

When this bill is passed the corporation will have been wound up and will be functus officio. It is my respectful submission that it should not be wound up until adequate answers have been supplied. I, therefore, urge the minister who will be replying shortly to give very careful consideration to this suggestion. A lot of questions have been asked. I might feel sorry for the minister were it not for the fact he has escaped from the problems of the Wheat Board and is now faced with the problems of Expo which are, I believe, the lesser of two evils. Surely, he is willing, on behalf of the government and the people of Canada, to allow a very careful and thorough financial examination by a committee of this House, I have in mind the public accounts committee. This should take place before this bill is examined by the other committee. In view of the many appeals that have been made, I hope he will agree. If he does agree I think this will have the effect of expediting the passage of this bill. For this reason, it is important that the minister direct his attention to this proposal.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a few questions at this time. I am sure that everyone in Canada is proud of our 1967 Centennial celebration. Certainly not everyone is proud of the inept way in which this exhibition was financed. No one who has had any experience in financing a municipality, province or a government at the federal level could be unaware that estimates have a tendency of increasing over original tenders. However, it is absolutely unreasonable to expect the public of Canada to accept an increase of this kind from $40 million to $285 million.

It would not matter much which part of the nation held Centennial celebrations such as Expo. It would not make much difference whether Expo had been held in Newfoundland, the Maritimes, central Canada, on the prairies, or on the west coast. The same situation might have existed if the supervision of spending had been exercised in the same way.

Mr. Pepin: How do you know?

Mr. Skoberg: Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have some questions to ask about Bill C-6. What action does the minister intend to take so far as this bill is concerned? When we read the various provisions, we realize that all the assets are to be transferred to the minister. We should have some assurance from him that if there are any assets worth redeeming they will be subject to public tender.

Mr. Pepin: I would be in violation of the law.

Mr. Skoberg: I agree with the minister when he suggests it is sometimes better to get a dollar here and a dollar there because occasionally it takes a long time to make a dollar by demolition. I presume there will be other assets turned over, and these should be subject to public tender.

Let me refer for a moment to one other aspect of this bill which indicates that all the rights of creditors against the corporation, and all actions pending, are unimpaired by the transfer of these assets to the minister. The bill also provides:

—all subsisting liabilities of the Corporation and actions pending against the Corporation may be enforced or continued against the Minister in like manner—

I should like to know whether or not there may be some outstanding liabilities, some outstanding claims against the Corporation, for which we now are assuming responsibility. I should like to know also whether or not the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal could act on behalf of any complainant against the Corporation once this bill is passed. I believe it is most important to realize that we do have in our society today individuals who will deliberately take advantage of a large spending institution such as the federal government. I should like to make sure that the minister will tell the House, and the committee when this matter is referred to it, that whatever the outstanding claims are against the Corporation, neither the province of Quebec nor the city of Montreal will be able to participate in further claims against the federal purse. I believe this is very important if we are to be truthful to the people whom we represent and ensure there is fair play in respect of the over-all financing of this centennial project, in view of the exorbitant increase in the cost of it.

I am sure all of us here would say without hesitation that we hope the fair of 1967, which brought with it a great unity in Canada, can continue. However, it was only through the centennial, and the people and institutions in the various provinces working together, that this unity was brought about. Now that we are spending $125 million to write off the liability of Expo and to wind it up, I suggest we should be looking for better ways to unify Canada. We had unity in 1967 and this could be strengthened if we have the right kind of federal government. I am not sure, however, that this kind of money will accomplish the purpose. It will take a real effort on the part of the information services to bring about the unity of our entire nation.

That is about the extent of what I have to say at this time. Again, I would ask the minister when he replies to assure the House that these are all the liabilities against the Corporation or, if there are others, what they may be. Only then can we intelligently vote on this bill when it comes back to the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the minister, it is my duty, according to Standing Order, to advise the House that if the minister speaks now he closes the debate.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, of course, because I would not want to filibuster my own bill.

I shall say a few words only to point out that during yesterday's and today's discussions we totally agreed on at least two points: first of all, on Expo's considerable success. I had brought a refrigerator almost full of famous quotations from Canadians and foreigners concerning Expo '67. It will not be necessary for me to use them, since hon. members have proved themselves equal to the occasion to point out this great success.

However, I am taking the liberty of reminding the house that usually such a success is relatively expensive in terms of human efforts and money. For a sum of $20 million, you can have what you pay for: a small circus, a regional exhibition. However, to get an international and universal exhibition, you must pay the price. In fact, I was reading in a newspaper, a few days ago, that the Japanese expect their exhibition to cost them $2,300,000,000. It would thus have been rather odd if Canada had been able to manage with only a dozen millions or two. In other words, to have an exhibition which will not be a disappointment, you have to pay the price.

Secondly, total agreement was reached on the advisability of obtaining from the committee the answers to the questions which have been raised and while I rose two or three times to interrupt the speeches of my hon. friends, it was not to deny them the right to direct questions; it was to try and shorten the debate because some of them proved inclined to draw conclusions based on false premises. If I annoyed some hon. members with these interventions, I humbly apologize.

But again I could not but notice that some were a little tempted to arrive at conclusions based on unproved premises. Before finding the corporation or the government guilty, the least one should do is to hear the explanations to be given to the committee beginning tomorrow morning, I hope.

So we shall see among other things why the cost of Expo increased during its four years of preparation and why also benefits have been larger. Further, we shall examine the administration system under which the corporation operated. If it is so desired, we shall look at each of the criticisms made by the Auditor General in his 1967 report. I believe that it is better to study those questions in committee. We shall have plenty of time to analyse them as my hon. friends please.

Mr. Speaker, let me now recommend that the bill be referred to the committee; however, I wish the members of the committee had the following document, that is, the Sixth annual report of the Canadian Corporation for the 1967 World Exhibition for the year 1968. With leave, I shall table it now. I shall also have one copy sent to the hon. members of the opposition parties.

[English]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, before there is agreement to the tabling of this report, I should like to ask the minister on what date the report should have been tabled.

Mr. Pepin: I really do not know what date it should have been tabled. The only thing I know is that it is being tabled today. Again, as probably happens in these cases, there must have been difficulties of reconciliation. However, I will look at that before tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD (EDUCATION ASSISTANCE) ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY, ETC.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-8, to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He said:

—Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House deals with a legislative measure which has been in existence for sixteen years, more precisely since April 13, 1953. At that date, the legislation was received with enthusiasm by all members of all parties. The Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act is based upon two principles closely related: firstly, to allow those young people to complete their education and, secondly, to recognize the special obligation of the state towards the children of Canadian war dead who gave their lives for their country.

Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians can rightly be proud of this legislation. Since it came into effect, many young people who benefited from its provisions later on expressed their gratitude to the Minister and to the Department. Thus, I received a few weeks ago a letter of which I would like to quote an excerpt:

> The bill with respect of children of War dead is an excellent legislation; my daughter Linda feels as I do that it is a distinguished tribute to the memory of her father.

Mr. Speaker, the number of recipients clearly indicates that the law is attaining its true objective. Since its enforcement on July 1, 1953, 4,801 orphans of soldiers, veterans or certain special classes of civilians have been in a position to carry on post-secondary studies. Of that number, 2,201 successfully completed their studies, 135 of them during the financial year 1968-1969. In the course of that same year, 330 students were enabled to start their studies through assistance provided under the Act, i.e. 16 more than in the previous year. On March 31, 1969, 899 students were pursuing their studies under this plan throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker, since 1953, the Act has been amended four times, to make its benefits available to groups of children not covered by the initial Act, to increase the amounts applicable to tuition and other related expenses, and also to increase the amounts of monthly allowances and, in certain special cases, to extend the period over which allowances are payable beyond the 36 months or 4 academic years initially provided.

From 1953 to 1963, beneficiaries included primarily students whose father or mother died or were killed during World War II. During the last six years, they included mostly children of veterans killed in Korea, of deceased members of the regular forces or of deceased World War II pensioners.

All members will agree I am sure, that that piece of legislation has been most useful, not only to those who are directly concerned, but to the general public.

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to ask the house to approve two amendments that not only will eliminate certain anomalies but will also give full justice to the students to whom the act applies.

[Mr. Dubé.]

First of all, we want to extend the application of this measure to a group of children, approximately 80 in number at the present time, who receive a pension under section 25 of the Pension Act. As many members know, according to section 25 of the Pension Act, the Canadian Pension Commission is authorized to pay a compassionate pension, an allocation or a supplementary pension in certain worthy cases where the claimant is not otherwise entitled to a pension.

Section 25 is therefore very useful where technical considerations make it impossible to grant a pension in the usual way, that is because of statutory entitlement. For instance, when a veteran dies before the Canadian Pension Commission has been able to decide on the question of eligibility or to assess disability which existed before death, section 25 allows the granting of a pension to his children. Section 25 allows in fact the Commission to conclude from the medical file that it would have declared itself in favour of eligibility had the veteran lived.

Mr. Speaker, I guess it is not the appropriate moment to discuss the technical details of the Pension Act. In fact I was only mentioning a case relating to the first of the two suggested amendments.

I should like to add that the suggested amendment derives from a recommendation of the Woods Commission which suggested that, when a pension is granted on compassionate grounds to a widow, her children who are entitled to pension should be eligible to the educational allowances provided by the Education Assistance Act. Moreover, with this amendment, the children of a widow who does not benefit from a pension, or does not live with them, would be eligible to this assistance.

Mr. Speaker, the second amendment that we shall have to study pertains to section 7 of the Pension Act. It concerns students who fail their examinations and to whom is given the right to try a second examination. At the present time, any student who fails more than one supplementary examination is deprived of any other assistance provided for in section 7. This exclusion results from the standard of success that used to be imposed to student veterans, at the end of World War II. It was in accordance with requirements from colleges, universities and other educational institutions, at the time this legislation was enacted. As a rule, the students were required to give up their studies under the circumstances I have just mentioned. However, these educational institutions, colleges and universities have modified their rules in the last few years, thus creating abnormalities resulting in unfair treatment.

Let us take the case of two students in the same university or faculty who failed their examinations: one of them failed for lack of a few marks only, while the other one failed by a wider margin. Perhaps the university will offer the first one the privilege of trying supplementary examinations and should he fail several of them, he might be authorized to repeat his year and then proceed normally with his studies. However, he would not be entitled to any financial aid because section 7 forbids subsidizing students who have failed more than one supplementary examination. The second student mentioned, who was barred from the supplementary examination because of lower marks and a poorer general standing, can repeat his year and get his degree. However, under the present legislation, the latter who has failed to a greater extent than the former can obtain financial aid after successful completion of the year that he failed.

Another oddity occurs when two students attending the exact same courses in two different universities fail their examinations. One of those institutions offers supplementary examinations and section 7 of the Act then applies to that student. The other university does not offer supplementary examinations so that the student attending the latter university is not liable to the exclusion provided for by the said section. Those two examples point to an obvious injustice, and we hope these amendments will correct the situation.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members recognize the benefits of the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act. Also, I am positive that all members want this Act to be brought in line with current practices being followed in Canadian educational institutions and eligible students to get approximately what their parents would have given them had they lived.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on the minister's statement which I think was an excellent one. It covered this bill very well. The Children of War Dead (Education Assistance), Act, which was introduced in 1953, is perhaps the finest piece of legislation in the entire veterans' charter. In 1946, at the very first national convention of the Canadian Legion held following the end of World War II, and which I attended, this matter was discussed. It was again pressed in 1948, 1950 and 1952, and in 1953 the federal government enacted the legislation, mainly in the form in which we presently find it.

One unfortunate thing about the enactment of the legislation was that it was a full eight years after the end of World War II before it became effective. As a result we had examples of older men, perhaps not older in relation to many of us now, who had children getting out of high school in 1945 and 1946, and of other men who were killed, or who died of war wounds and who left children still attending high school. These children were not able to benefit from the act. After the act became effective in 1953 the children of war dead, and of those who subsequently died from their wounds, were protected under the act.

I was interested to hear the minister's figures showing that 4,800 students have benefited under the act, and that over 2,000 students have completed their education. He also pointed out that roughly 900 are presently in schools or attending university. This also includes students attending nursing schools.

The minister's explanation of the clauses in the bill was helpful, but through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to him that it must be in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs that this legislation is thoroughly examined, with the assistance of very able departmental officials, especially from the Welfare Department, who will answer our questions. At first reading, clause 2 in particular, amending section 7 of the act, looks highly technical. I have had some discussion with officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs on the bill and as a result I understand exactly what is proposed. However, I am sure many other hon. members would find it difficult to follow.

I can assure hon. members that everything proposed in this bill is good. I only wish we had been able to amend the Act a few years earlier, but for the delay the present minister cannot be held responsible in any way. As I say, the amendments in this bill are excellent.

I was interested to note that the minister pointed out that this is one of the first of the Woods Commission recommendations to come before Parliament in the form of legislation. It is only fitting that our finest piece of veterans' legislation should be the first to be amended. I conclude by saying I feel the members of this party—I cannot speak for all the others, only for myself—the members of

Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the House of Commons will support the amendments that have been presented, and I congratulate the minister on bringing them forward.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle)—Communications—southern Labrador—request for temporary re-instatement of D.O.T. service; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Canada Elections Act—suggested vote by mail for disabled persons; the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)—Navigation—Mackenzie River—inquiry as to agreement with British Columbia.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, Notices of Motions (Papers).

MOTIONS (PAPERS)

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GRANTS TO INDIAN BAND COUNCILS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of any document prepared in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development entitled, or relating to "Grants to Indian Band Councils" subsequent to the issuance of Circular No. 15, dated September 18, 1968, which is entitled "Grants to Indian Band Councils."

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is a short history relating to the particular document for which production is sought, a short history that I think shows an element of refusal on the part of the government to be totally and completely honest with the general public, and to be open in so far as its activities are concerned with our native Indian people. There has been a confined, narrow, bureaucratic and legislatively fine concept which has permitted the present difficulties to arise.

[Mr. MacRae.]

In referring to this matter, I must go back to May 28 of this year in the preceding session when a motion, identical in wording, was presented to the House. As recorded at page 9163 of Hansard for that date a response was given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Forest) as follows:

On behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I would like to inform the hon. member that subsequent to the issuance of circular 15, dated September 18, 1968, entitled "Grants to Indian Band Councils", no additional documents have been issued.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Under the circumstances would the hon. member from Skeena consent to withdrawing the motion?

I did not so consent, but had the motion transferred for debate. The opportunity to debate it did not arise but I think it is important, apropos of what I said earlier about a deliberate refusal to be completely open with the public about these matters, to point out that the motion made on the 28th of May for the production of that document asked for the production of any document prepared in the department relating to that subject. I think it is important to notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Forest) who has a particularly esteemed and high position within the government, deliberately phrased his response to avoid making reference to the request in the motion for any document that was prepared, but simply talked about any documents that were issued.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, this sort of legalistic nit-picking was deliberately designed to confuse the issue and cover up something within the department. Otherwise, why did the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council ignore the particular request in the motion for any document that was "prepared" and use instead the word "issued", to which no reference was made.

Here, we have exactly the same motion, exactly the same words, but now we have a newly appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Honey). As an aside, I am sure Your Honour will not mind if I wish him well in his appointment. Presumably, if he works well and carefully, he may rise to higher and greater things within the structure of government. I shall be quite happy to co-operate with him in any way in the performance of his duties, but I would probably cause him some difficulties. However, that is the way things happen. In any event, yesterday the Parliamentary Secretary, in response to the motion which I put to the House, said:

> Mr. Speaker, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no record of any document prepared—

And here the word "prepared" is used. I think this is the correct approach because that is what I am seeking to obtain, any document prepared by the department. He says the department "has no record of any document prepared subsequent to the issuance of Circular No. 15 dated September 18, 1968" relating to certain matters.

I would not say this unless I were fairly sure of my ground and I do not mean it unkindly, but knowing how things work within the government, I think it is probable that some one in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development prepares a reply to a motion. The reply is then handed to the unsuspecting minister or parliamentary secretary for presentation to the House. So when the parliamentary secretary stated yesterday that the "Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no record of any document prepared subsequent to the issuance of Circular No. 15" relating to the subject matter contained therein, I think this is a deliberate attempt to maintain an element of secrecy and keep information from the public. It is a deliberate and conscious effort to deny to the Indian people access to a document prepared by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which relates to grants to Indian Band Councils. The government seems content to present to the public, by way of press release, only those things it wants to present and to keep hidden those things it wants to hide. It is more intent upon propagandizing than upon public disclosure.

I cite this development as a preliminary to the argument for the production of this particular document or any document because, as I said earlier, regardless of what the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council said on the 28th May and regardless of what the parliamentary secretary said yesterday about there being no record of any such document, there is in fact a document which can easily be identified and was identified by the motion before us. The identification of the document in the motion before us was extracted from the document in question. Lest there be any doubt, I have in my hand this document which does not exist, of which the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no record; this document which the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council skirted around on May 28th.

The document is on a piece of paper which has right at the top, in the English language so that it is properly identified, "Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development", the very department about which we are talking. The French version is underneath that. There is the coat of arms with "Canada" underneath it and a place along the right hand side for the file number or "dossier". Then, there is the subject, and let me quote that, Mr. Speaker: "Grants to Indian Bands Councils".

What I am seeking to obtain is any document prepared subsequent to the issuance of Circular 15 dated September 18 entitled "Grants to Indian Bands Councils". This document is entitled, "Grants to Indian Bands Councils". It is on paper which has on it the name of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and there is a bunch of numbers down at the bottom to identify some kind of form used within the department. There is on it a date which is not legible but which is 1969, a date which would then be subsequent to September 18, 1968. It goes into more detail, Mr. Speaker, about the subject matter of grants to Indian Band Councils. The document contains eight pages of formulae, statistical information, tabular material and a report on the subject contained therein.

If the massive and highly efficient Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has no record of such a document, I would be quite happy to make mine available so that they would have a record of it. I would be quite happy to table the document, and make it available. Mr. Speaker, this is not something upon which the foundation of the state rests; it is not something within the Department of National Defence which is highly confidential; it is not any secret document from the Department of External Affairs concerning our relationship with other countries; it is not from the files of the R.C.M.P. who are involved in secret activities. This is a simple, ordinary document from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, prepared within that department, distributed to every Indian agency in Canada, distributed to quite a number of chiefs of Indian Band Councils, and distributed to regional directors within the Indian Affairs Branch.

Surely, a document like this would be prepared within the department. Judging from the paper it was written on, it was, and is widely circulated within the department. Surely, departmental officials must have some record of it. I submit that they either have some record of it, or that somebody is deliberately misleading us by saying there is no record of it. If that is the case, and I cannot believe that is true, then departmental officials are even more incompetent and inefficient than some would suggest. If there is no record of the document I shall be very glad to make my copy available to the department. I will not give it to the Parliamentary Secretary because he is not really involved in this matter, having been caught in the bureaucratic workings of government. He is more of a spokesman in this situation and has probably been grossly misled. But I am certainly prepared to make the document available to the public and to parliament, and I hope I may be allowed to table the document so that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development can no longer hide behind the excuse that there is no record of it. May I ask for the consent of the House to table this document?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is in order in asking that his copy of the document be tabled. If my hon. friend consents, what I should like to do is complete my remarks, and then see whether there is a consensus for one or other of us to table some documents.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have found the document, then?

Mr. Honey: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has been very congenial in his remarks but has been somewhat critical of departmental officials. I think perhaps he may have overstated the case. I ask him to read again the notices of motion prepared for the previous session of parliament and for the present session of parliament. Does he think that the officials of the department or anyone else, for that matter, could reasonably identify from the wording of the motions the particular document he has in mind? I have been able to identify the document after listening to the hon. member's remarks this afternoon. I suspect, however, that without his assistance in this debate it would have been quite difficult or almost impossible to sort out his document from the several hundred memoranda which each year emanate from the department to regional directors, chiefs of Indian bands, and so on, on the question of consultation between the minister and his officials and the Indians of Canada. If I have correctly identified the document, it is only because the hon. member has been of assistance this afternoon. It would have been very difficult to identify it from his notice of motion.

I think the document we are speaking about is the memorandum that was prepared to be circulated to regional directors of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, chiefs of Indian band councils and superintendents of Indian agencies, with a view to obtaining the views of the Indians of Canada, through their bands and in consultation and discussion with officials of the department, on certain modifications that were proposed with respect to grants to Indian band councils. A cursory reading of the document will reveal that it was not intended to be a final document. Its purpose was only to provide a basis of consultation with the Indian peoples. I think it might be helpful if I were to note two or three items in the covering letter which accompanied this particular memorandum to regional directors and to others to whom it was circulated. This letter is from the then director of the department, Mr. David A. Munro, and I wish to quote two or three extracts from this letter. Mr. Munro said in part:

> You will recall that the Grants to Bands Program was discussed during the Regional Directors' Conference last December. I indicated to you that as soon as modifications to the existing program as requested by the Indian people could be embodied in the new proposal it would be referred to you to ensure that the Indians in your Region would be given the opportunity to give us their views on the modified formula.

The letter goes on to say:

> There are herewith . . .
> A proposal on the Grants to Bands Program, embodying certain changes intended to meet the wishes of Indians to be used by you—

Meaning, by the Regional Director. I continue:

> —as a basis for discussion with them.
> Copies of Blue Circulars 4, 9, 13 and 15, which will be rescinded and replaced by a new circular after an agreement has been reached on the modified program.

It is apparent from the covering letter and the document itself that this was only the basis of consultation. There was to be a reporting back to the minister and his officials in Ottawa, and the reactions of Indians throughout Canada would be considered. Then the minister, in consultation with his officials, would decide whether the particular modifications could be adopted on the basis of reports received from the Indian peoples of Canada. The last paragraph of the letter which, I repeat, was sent to regional directors across the country, reads:

> Would you, therefore, by February 21st, please supply me with a statement of the reaction of Indians to the proposals contained in the draft circular attached, together with a clear statement of the manner in which you have consulted with them.

Clearly, if my hon. friend and I are speaking of the same document, and I think we are, the document was widely circulated. As I have said, it was sent to the regional directors and chiefs of Indian band councils, and was made available to all Indians through their band councils. There is nothing privileged about the document; it is not classified. Since the hon. member for Skeena has been so helpful in identifying the document, perhaps I might be allowed to table it in the House.

Before sitting down may I thank my hon. friend for helping to describe the document. He has been most helpful. Although his criticism may have been fair, and I concede that Members of Parliament have a responsibility in these matters, his criticism of departmental officials might have been more valid if he had taken a bit more care in drafting the notice of motion. Then, the particular document or memorandum he wanted might have been identified from among the hundreds of memoranda on the subject that are sent, and continue to be sent, to regional directors. These documents are meant to be a basis for consultation with Indians in their particular areas.

Having said that, and if it is in order, I wish to table the document referred to by the hon. member for Skeena and to which I have been referring. I need not describe it further because it has already been described in the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena. This document is issued by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It is entitled "Grants to Indian Band Councils". It is on the basis of this memorandum that discussions were to be held with the Indian people in connection with certain proposed modifications to the Indian Band Council grants program.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder why there is any question about getting consent to table a document. Surely, all that is necessary is for the motion to be passed. I might also say, Mr. Speaker, I am impressed with the argument of my colleague. The definition in his motion certainly fits the document, at least the copy I now have in my hand. At any rate this is one of those mysteries that it is nice to see cleared up. Perhaps the motion could be put and it might even be passed unanimously.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Now that the motion has carried, I wish to rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The motion which we have just passed orders the issuance and production of a copy of any document prepared in the department, identified in the way this was. That does not necessarily restrict it to the particular document to which the hon. parliamentary secretary (Mr. Honey) and I have been referring. There are many more. I think it is now incumbent upon the government to search its records and produce all documents. This was the intent of the motion.

Mr. Pilon: Mr. Speaker, I think we have reached agreement that we now adjourn until eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.30 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CHILDREN OF WAR DEAD (EDUCATION ASSISTANCE) ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dubé that Bill C-8, to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Children of War Dead Act

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the remarks made by the minister in introducing second reading of this bill. I am also gratified at the number of people who have received support under this act. The amendments to the act throw no light on what the act has done for children of war dead, but I think it is safe to say that under this legislation, as under other veterans legislation concerned with the education of veterans and the children of veterans, we have more for our money than is the case with most pieces of legislation passed by Parliament.

I think it is also true to say that no educational assistance provided under veterans affairs legislation has been more productive than the act we are now discussing. For example, take the case of a woman whose husband returned from overseas badly wounded and later died, leaving several small children. I suspect that those children's chances of going on to higher education on the amount of money the widow would receive under other pension legislation would be non-existent were it not for this particular act. As I say, the dollar value received for the money spent under this legislation has been exceedingly good.

I am pleased that in these amendments the minister has taken into consideration two matters that have radically changed in approach over the years. One concerns age requirement. An opportunity is being afforded children to attend school for longer than has been the case in the past. This provision is in keeping with modern times and is a change well worth making. The other matter relates to the person who is weak in a particular subject and it has cost him his year. There is a growing body of opinion that it is one's over-all educational qualifications that are important, and so long as one has a reasonable awareness of all subjects a student should be allowed to proceed to a higher education level and carry his one weak subject. Prior to these amendments such a person would not have qualified for assistance.

I suggest the minister could also have considered assisting education in institutions other than universities. I include courses of instruction at technical colleges. Many of our high schools are now offering courses in technical subjects, and a great deal of emphasis is put on taking full advantage of the natural ability of students in the field for which they are best equipped. Many of these students have yet to complete even their elementary education. In many cases where education is sought in the technical field beyond high school level assistance is not now available. I think the minister could have considered providing some assistance in these cases as well.

It is true that when this act was originally passed in 1953 the need was for assistance at the university level. Technical education in most provinces had not advanced to the level where it offered a major opportunity to most students. But today attendance at technical school beyond the elementary level of education costs just as much as for attending university, with the probable exception of the tuition fee. I suggest the minister could have put forward an amendment to assist a large segment of the population to take advantage of technical education in every province in Canada.

Neither of the amendments proposed by the minister offer assistance of this kind. I am sure most members feel that since this legislation is offering assistance to children of war dead, it is obviously coming to the end of its life. Today the child of a father killed overseas during the last war would be about 27 years old and with respect to him the provisions of the act are self-liquidating. However, since numbers of children will now qualify under the act because they are in receipt of a compassionate pension under the Pension Act, the need for this legislation will remain for some time.

I suggest that the minister consider an additional amendment to provide assistance in respect of students at less than secondary school level. This would allow students to attain higher educational standards in certain fields, including university degree courses following a number of years in an academic field. It would be a very serious amendment, but such a provision would be in keeping with changes now taking place in our educational institutions. This matter has been drawn to the minister's attention. I am sure he will give consideration to it.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated because I thought other hon. members would want to make some remarks about this bill. I want to take the opportunity to draw the minister's attention in a public way to something about which I have had correspondence with him. The minister has on four occasions said that the act has been changed to expand facilities and to extend the assistance offered to groups which were heretofore excluded. There is still a deficiency within the act and its regulations; there is a disparity which is not corrected by the amendments now before us. The disparity occurs in respect of children now coming under the Pension Commission and children who receive benefits under Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act.

I have in mind those children who come within the ambit of the provisions of this act and attend institutions of higher learning than secondary schools. They do not receive assistance if the educational institution they attend does not have a requirement for a secondary school graduation certificate. In other words, if a student intends going to a university or college which requires a secondary school graduation certificate, he can receive assistance under the act. If a student wishes to attend an educational institution—say of a technical or vocational nature—other than a university, which might not have an entrance requirement including a certificate of graduation from a secondary school, assistance is not available.

I have exchanged correspondence with the minister in this regard. Let me put on the record part of what the minister said to me in a letter dated September 25 following representations made to him. In one paragraph of the letter he said:

—facilities for technological training and the broadening of the occupational fields in which such training is given can quite properly, I think, be described as remarkable in the past decade.

I take it that this program has expanded in the past few years partly because of a recommendation to extend facilities and partly because of assistance to technical training schools and the like. The minister indicates that the growth has continued. I should like to read one sentence of his letter which I think does not fit in with the rest of it. It does not match the concept of the act or the expectation of the minister in relation to the benefits that should be available to students. He stated:

The majority of these newly developed courses require secondary school graduation as an entry condition, and it would be a retrogressive step to establish a lower criterion for the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act at this time.

Apparently the majority of them require a secondary school graduation certificate as a condition of entry. The great bulk of technical educational facilities available to persons with a grade 10 standard obviously do not require secondary school graduation certificates. In any event, the minister goes on to say that it would be a retrogressive step to establish a lower criterion for these children under the act. It seems that if we expand the benefits available under this act to an additional group of students, that would not be a retrogressive step. Any time we can provide assistance or a helping hand to students, we are progressing. Surely this is not a retrogressive step. The minister has confused the two concepts.

It was my hope that between the time of that exchange of correspondence and the presentation of this bill to Parliament the minister would have looked into the situation and made some changes. Perhaps it is necessary to do this by way of legislation, but some provision should be made to extend the benefits available under the act to students who are embarking upon a course of higher education in institutions that do not call for a secondary school certificate as an entry requirement. Perhaps the minister can do this by way of regulation. If it is necessary to do it by ministerial edict, I hope he will consider doing so. Perhaps it can be done by order in council. In any event, I make a plea to the minister to take the step, which is certainly not a retrogressive step, to expand the benefits of the act to this larger group of students.

The minister read a letter about this matter, extolling the virtues of his action. That is all well and good. Perhaps he will not complain about my referring to a letter which points out another awkward situation. It relates to a particular individual and a particular situation. I do not intend to mention the name of the person or the family involved. I should like to quote from this letter without reference to the individual. I do not think one need involve specific people under these circumstances. The letter was addressed to the mother of the student concerned. It is dated September 9 this year, just a couple of months ago. At that time the minister was undoubtedly considering this bill or had prepared it for presentation. The letter was written by the area supervisor for welfare, the Department of Veterans Affairs, Vancouver. The text of the letter is as follows:

As per your recent correspondence where you state that—

• (8:20 p.m.)

It gives here the name of the young girl.

—is now attending Columbia Junior College—

Listen to this, Mr. Minister, because it indicates the perseverance of this young student.

—and taking two Grade 12 subjects and her first year university—

There are the two things. She does not have secondary school graduation. She is taking first year university and at the same time is taking Grade 12 subjects. She is proceeding with both at the same time in order to advance herself in the educational field. The letter continues:

—it is unfortunate that I have to point out that assistance under EAA—

I take it that means educational assistance act.

—does not apply until the student has successfully completed Grade 12. So it now appears that we are in a position where we cannot assist until—

Then it gives the name of the young lady.

—has completed the two subjects she is presently taking. On completion of these two courses, I would assume this to be in June of 1970, we will be in a position to assist in her nursing training.

I say this is an anomalous situation. It is probably a situation which had not been conceived when the act was developed and amended from time to time. This may be the first case, but it is one case in point of a young girl who is desirous of pursuing a higher level of education to become something better than she is at the moment. From personal knowledge I know that this girl has spent a great many hours on homework and on work at school in order to proceed through school in this way. Unfortunately she does not fall within the narrow legal framework of the act and its regulations.

I cite this as an additional example of a situation with which I am sure the minister is sympathetic. I am quite sure no one would object to the concept that this young lady should have available to her the benefits available under the act. Her mother, with the pension accruing to her, is not in a position to provide for the advancement of this young girl through school. There may be other children in a similar situation. In fact, another mother wrote to me. I shall not quote that letter except to say it was written by a widowed mother with a feeling of despair and anguish because of the difficulty she was facing in trying to raise her children and get them through school. She was up against a situation where if the circumstances had been slightly different there would have been this additional benefit available to her both in respect of the children proceeding through Grade 12 and into first year of university. In both cases the assistance was not available because the person did not fall under the ambit of the Children of War Dead (Educational Assistance) Act but rather came under the ambit of the Pension Act.

I am sure it is not the desire of the minister or of the government to make these decisions on an extremely narrow legalistic and interpretive basis. I am sure it is the desire of the minister to be expansive and deal with situations from a moral point of view. I do not know whether this requires legislative action or whether it can be done by regulatory action or decision on the part of the minister, but I would ask the minister seriously to take this matter under his sanction and expand even further the facilities available under the act. Contrary to what the minister said in his letter, it is not a retrogressive step when we make available to needy students the assistance which generally is available under the act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé).

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I have to inform the House that if the hon. minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

[English]

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to express my appreciation to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) for his support and that of his party which he has offered in respect of this bill. Of course, I agree with him that this small bill is in fact one of the finest pieces of legislation arising from the veterans' charter. I also agree with him that there are some technical points which need to be clarified. This we will endeavour to do in committee. I wish also to thank the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) for the remarks he has made. I agree with him that we are receiving more value for our money from this legislation dealing with education than from most other bills of a similar nature. The hon. member for Timiskaming would like us to reduce the qualifications and not insist on high school education for training under this legislation. That is something we will have to discuss at greater length, but at the present time I would make a few remarks which apply to what the hon.

member and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) said.

First of all, high school education is free in most provinces, so there is no necessity to include in this bill a reference to high school education. I should also say that most technological schools today do insist on high school graduation as a condition of entrance. I do not have with me the full list of all the new schools in the country, but we will attempt to provide this to the committee. In summing up I should say that the purpose is not at all to try to limit the number of children who would qualify under the act. The purpose of the act is to be very generous and to make sure that the greatest possible number of students are admitted to the best possible schools and universities. We will attempt to achieve this purpose. If hon. members can convince us that we could be more generous and more liberal by dropping out the high school qualification, we will look into it. However, from the information I have and the advice I have received, this seems to be the best deal we can have at the present time. In any event, I wish to thank hon. members of the opposition for the support they have given this bill. We will discuss the technicalities and further improve it in due course.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I address a brief question to the minister? As one who has had a very sincere interest in Section 25 of the Pension Act, and as one who presented a brief to the Woods Commission on this specific point, may I ask the minister whether he has under serious consideration a review of the very rigid requirements of this act, and possibly new legislation? I appreciate that this question deals with only the educational part of that section. But does the minister agree that this compassionate section 25 of the Pension Act is very important? Is he looking at it seriously, and is he hopeful that it may be possible in the future to ensure, by way of new legislation, that the requirements of the section are not so rigid?

• (8:30 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Bell: All I am asking for, Mr. Speaker, is an indication of interest from the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. At present we are studying a special bill, Bill C-8, an act to amend the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN ALBERTA AND ONTARIO

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Judges Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate you for taking the Chair again in this session of Parliament. Through you may I send my commendations to Mr. Speaker and the Deputy Speaker together with my best wishes as they preside over the chamber during this session.

Bill C-2 is adequately described in the explanatory note. However, I will say very briefly that authority is sought from Parliament for the provision of salaries for eight additional judges; two judges of the Supreme Court of Alberta, five judges of the county and district courts of Ontario and one judge of the district court of Alberta. I should like to mention for the information of the House that the number of judicial offices for the district court of Alberta was increased by way of provincial order in council. The order in council was passed by the government of Alberta, providing for an additional district judge of the southern part of Alberta, on February 11, 1969. The provision for increasing the number of judicial offices of the trial division of the Supreme Court of Alberta was made in a statute of that province which received royal assent on April 21 of this year. As I said, provision is also made in this bill for increasing by five the number of judicial offices in the county and district courts of Ontario, four for the county of York and one for the county of Carleton. The Ontario legislature provided for these additional judicial offices by a statute of the legislature which received royal assent on March 26 of this year.

From discussions I have had with my provincial counterparts, the attorneys general of Alberta and Ontario, concerning the administration of justice in those provinces and based on the information that I receive from time to time from the legal profession and from the public generally, I am satisfied that these increases are warranted. They are necessary to deal effectively with the additional volume of judicial business and litigation in those provinces that must be transacted in the public interest. I am satisfied, therefore, that Parliament would be justified in authorizing an increase in the provisions for the salaries of these judges.

In recent times I have received submissions from the Canadian Bar Association and from other quarters indicating that in the opinion of the bar it is time we began to think about further changes in the Judges Act. This bill is a simple one again this year. It provides for an increased number of judges, but the time will come very soon—I think by the next session of Parliament—when we should think seriously about fundamental amendments to the Judges Act.

The question of salaries is one which we shall have to consider. I felt that it was not appropriate this year to come before Parliament and ask for any increase in the salaries of judges in the country. But I say frankly to Parliament that it is becoming increasingly difficult for me to persuade some of the leading candidates for judicial office, particularly lawyers who have had experience before the courts, younger men between 40 and 50 years of age who could make a great contribution to the bench and thereby to the administration of justice, to accept judicial office.

Mr. Peters: Or parliamentary office for that matter.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will take that as read. Those men between 40 and 50 have children who are usually at the high school or university stage, and are therefore at their maximum financial exposure in those years. When one considers that the current provisions for widows and dependent children are ludicrously low, it is often very difficult to persuade them to accept the office. The widow's pension is two-ninths of two-thirds of the judge's salary, and many women are now living close to penury. However, as I said, I felt that this year was not the proper time to broach the subject. But I say to the House that we will be looking very seriously into the matter of salaries, pensions and expenses during the coming year because I think it is important that we attract the best men and women we can to serve on the bench in Canada. In order to do that one has to offer remuneration that is at least somewhat competitive with what they might otherwise receive. There are a few matters that I would like to mention briefly for the purpose of informing the House about a number of initiatives that we have taken during the last year with respect to the judiciary.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

First, I should mention that we have set up language courses for judges. I must inform the House that, between July 20 and August 8, a series of classes was given successfully in the capital city of Quebec for 24 judges of the provincial Superior Courts.

I am glad to mention, Mr. Speaker, that judges from seven out of ten provinces attended these classes. The courses were given by the federal school of languages. These are preliminary courses of necessity and these judges as well as those from the federal courts will be able to attend French classes in their own district and if they take an immersion course in a school of languages, I think that they will be able to improve their ability to speak or at least to understand the other language.

Bilingual facilities will also be available to French-speaking judges of the Superior Courts and we are confident that our program for French-speaking and English-speaking judges will be made available to all members of the judiciary.

In the near future we hope to be in a position to make these courses available to all district and county judges. Obviously, these courses have to be organized so as not to affect the proper administration of justice. Therefore, a schedule of classes has to be arranged with the co-operation of the chief justices of the country.

[English]

I also wish to say something about the Canadian Judicial Conference which was held for the first time this past summer in the city of Toronto. We sent the judges back to school. I might say that this was done with the full, enthusiastic co-operation of the Chief Justices of the country. The course was sponsored by the federal government. It was established by the Conference of Chief Justices of Canada. The council of the conference is composed of Chief Justice Gale of Ontario as chairman, with Associate Chief Justice Challies of Quebec as vice-chairman. The balance of the council is composed of Chief Justice Smith of Alberta, Chief Justice Culliton of Saskatchewan and Chief Justice Cowan of Nova Scotia. This council convened the first seminar which began on August 14 in the city of Toronto. It lasted for an entire week and 24 judges from all parts of Canada attended.

I was particularly glad that Mr. Justice William Morrow, territorial judge of the Northwest Territories, was among these 24 judges. I would hope that because of the remoteness of his particular circuit he would be able to attend these courses at least every second year in order that he could be brought into contact with his brother judges across the country who have more opportunity to converse with each and keep abreast of the law. In fact, he made such an impression upon his brother judges that they have asked him to join the faculty of the seminar next year. I would suggest that Mr. Justice Henry Madison of the Yukon be invited to attend these seminars on alternate years. I understand that the seminar will be an annual event sponsored by the Council of Chief Justices.

I would like to read into the record the faculty for the seminar this year which consisted of the following persons: Chief Justice Tremblay of Montreal, Chief Justice Challies of Montreal, Chief Justice Cowan of Halifax, Mr. Justice Laskin of Toronto, Mr. Justice Hartt of Toronto, Mr. Justice McFarlane of Vancouver, Mr. Justice Brooke of Toronto, Dean G. E. LeDain, Q.C., of Toronto, Professor John Edwards of Toronto, Professor D. Mendes da Costa of Toronto, and the Dean was H. Allan Leal, Q.C., of Toronto.

I wish to thank publicly the members of the faculty for participating in what I think is a very useful initiative in Canadian judicial practice. It is my information, not only from the council but from the judges who attended the seminar, that they all benefited individually from the course. One of their particularly lively discussions concerned public relations, and I understand they had a stimulating discussion with Mr. Jack Dennett and Mr. Ray Corelli, two well known representatives of the newspaper world in the city of Toronto.

Among the subjects discussed at the seminar were criminal law and procedure, divorce, evidence, administrative bodies, the preparation and writing of judgments, judicial behaviour and recent trends in the law of contract and tort. I would hope we could reach a stage where once every five years every high court judge in the country would be able to go back to school to continue his legal training, not just for a period of one week but for, say, three weeks, and that subjects that are of social concern and subjects of current human confrontation before the courts would be researched.

I believe that the Canadian Judicial Conference inaugurated last year fills a very definite void that has existed in this country for a great many years in the area of judicial training. We are trying to improve our law schools and make their curricula more relevant. We are trying to inaugurate courses in consumer law, courses on law as it affects the poor, on law to protect the debtor as well as the creditor, the borrower as well as the lender. I believe that the legal profession in certain parts of the country is becoming alive to its responsibilities as a profession and is recognizing that society as a whole is the client of the law. I am delighted to see that the judges of this country are becoming more responsive to the new urges for change under the law. The Canadian Judicial Conference will serve as a refresher course for those who have sat on the bench for some time.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, may I ask how many judges outside the province of Ontario attended this course?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Twenty-four, minus five, would be 19.

Mr. Marshall: Outside Ontario?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Marshall: You did not indicate that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We started this in a limited way, but as I have said I hope we will expand it so that every judge in the country gets this refresher course once every five years. I think this is important because I think the judges, and the bench as a whole, must realize that in an era where there is a crisis of legitimacy, of authority, there is no institution in this country that is immune from criticism, and the bench must also respond to these urges for change and social responsibility. The seminar will be held in the city of Montreal next year and a completely different group of judges will attend on that occasion.

I should also mention that the annual conference of the Chief Justices of Canada met in Edmonton this year on September 28, 29 and 30. This conference is now well established and a decision was taken at this year's meeting to convene next year's meeting in Newfoundland. This conference enables all the Chief Justices to meet to discuss problems that are common to them in relation to the administration of justice. They find that they are able to assist one another greatly by their free exchange of ideas. They are able to carry back to their own respective benches various suggestions relating to procedures and administration, and interpretations of the law, that have considerable value to all members of the bench.

I should like at this time to make a brief reference to the question of judicial appointments. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, I went into this matter rather fully last year. We have continued the practice of consulting, prior to recommending appointments to the bench, the Judicial Committee of the Canadian Bar Association. Aside from that, I consult the members of the provincial bars concerned and sometimes members of the bench who have the opportunity of judging who are the competent counsel appearing before them. We consult as widely as we can in the community. But I want to add that of course the final responsibility for making a recommendation to the Governor in Council remains mine. I do not intend to shirk that responsibility or delegate it to any other body. I believe that I should take the heat in the legislature for the appointments whether they are good or bad. I might say that no candidate for the bench whom the committee of the Canadian Bar Association judged not qualified received an appointment to the bench since my appointment to this portfolio. In other words only those whom the bar committee judged to be qualified received nomination and appointment.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members will recall that for the first time in the history of this country a lady was appointed to one of the high courts in Canada, the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec. Madame Rejeanne Colas is an outstanding woman. She graduated top of her class at the law school of the University of Montreal in 1952 and practised law for 16 or 17 years before appointment to the bench. She has three children, was president of Les Clubs Feminins de la Province de Quebec, and chairman of the Canadian Bar Association Committee on Family Law. She has made an outstanding contribution to the bench in the six months since her appointment, particularly with reference to interpretation of the new Divorce Act.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to mention the Supreme Court and Exchequer Court in relation to the Official Languages Act. Members of the House will recall that sections 5 and 11 of this act impose obligations upon the federal judiciary. I have taken appropriate steps to see that arrangements are made to meet the requirements in section 5 to permit simultaneous translation in the Supreme Court and Exchequer Court. Both languages have enjoyed equal rights before the federal courts of this country but the additional requirements in sections 5 and 11 make some adjustments necessary. I am informed that these are well in hand. I have also been considering the usefulness of certain regulations on judicial proceedings which might be made by order in council under section 11 (5) of the Official Languages Act in order to facilitate the application of section 11 (2) respecting simultaneous translation. These rules, if made, would apply to all courts of record established pursuant to an act of the Parliament of Canada as well as to the Supreme Court and Exchequer Court.

There are also courts in the Yukon and Northwest Territories to be considered. I have caused enquiries to be made as to what arrangements will be necessary for them in order to meet the exigencies of the Official Languages Act. Here, too, the matter seems to be well in hand. We have arranged to appoint Mr. Justice Dechene of the Alberta Supreme Court a deputy judge for the Northwest Territories, and we are attempting to provide court staff so that it will be possible to have proceedings in the French language where necessary without obligatory recourse to simultaneous translation in the French language. It is not yet settled whether similar arrangements will have to be made in the Yukon Territory. However, translation of the judgements of both these courts will be made available as well as facilities for simultaneous translation where required.

Mr. Speaker, that is a small report to the shareholders in the country through their representatives in this House in so far as the judiciary under the authority of the federal government is concerned. But the administration of justice is wider than that, and sometimes I find it restricting and even frustrating that the daily operation of the courts falls within provincial jurisdiction in both criminal and civil matters. Whereas all criminal law in statute form rests with Parliament, prosecution under the Criminal Code is the responsibility of the provincial attorneys general. But there are problems within the administration of justice that, while provincial in content, are so national in scope that sometimes I find it necessary to communicate with the several attorneys general. Indeed, when they were here at the beginning of the week discussing the Charter of Human Rights we considered the possibility of convening a meeting of all attorneys general federal and provincial to deal with national problems relating to the administration of justice.

I am concerned about the delays in our courts, whether the responsibility lies with the judiciary, or the bar, lawyers who amongst themselves conveniently arrange to postpone cases. In the Department of Justice in Ottawa we are exploring the uses of the computer in the land. I think it could be used a great deal in promoting the administration of justice at the provincial level. In order to set to rest the fears of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) let me say that we do not intend to replace lawyers, we just intend to explore some improvements. I am convinced that if justice in the city of Toronto or Montreal were put to a computer for the purpose of ascertaining who is responsible for the delay in our courts, the answer might be the same as that found in Philadelphia where delays were traced to just one or two law firms who were digesting too much business. But I do think we should pinpoint the responsibility for the delays.

We must consider the effectiveness of right to counsel. We must also consider the very serious problem which is building up with respect to the Divorce Act. Dissolving a marriage does not solve the problems of maintenance, alimony and custody of children. These matters often have to be decided by separate courts in the same jurisdiction and it is not unusual to have the same matrimonial situation simultaneously before two or three courts. All the legal consequences of divorce and marriage should somehow be co-ordinated better than they are at present.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the matters relating to the administration of justice and the appointment of judges which fall within the general scope of this bill. In any event, my brother attorneys general are agreeable to a conference and I hope we can hold it late in the spring. I thank the House very much for its attention.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not really intend to participate in this debate—

Mr. Peters: I did not know it was going to be so extensive

Mr. Baldwin: I have the keen attention of my friends to the left who are already evincing an interest in what I am going to say before I even say it. The distinguished and learned critic for this party is at present engaged in examining other legislation which the minister will be presenting to the House leader, and this has catapulted me into making a speech. I was glad to hear the minister engage in a rather extracurricular discussion—no one is objecting to it—but the question of the appointment of judges should not be any bar to the minister, to members of the opposition or backbenchers on the government side dealing with this matter in some detail.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who has seen on television or read in the press in the past year of the riots and violence which have taken place throughout the western world will have wondered whether the courts are going to have a place in society as we know it. Is there a place for those delegated by society to the decision-making process in the judiciary to determine the rights of the parties, having in mind the stresses of modern times? Is there a real place for a man learned in the law to calmly and dispassionately make a decision in disputes arising between citizens or between citizens and the state? To some of us this would not appear necessary. People have taken to the streets. The demonstration which has sometimes become violent has counter-balanced the machinery our society has established for dealing with such problems. I was glad to hear the minister give some indication of his thinking in this regard. It was not the government's thinking, but his own. His remarks gave us an insight and will enable us to judge what we may look forward to in this regard in the next year or two.

We must appoint to the judiciary people who are not only learned in the law but are knowledgeable about society and the frailties of human nature. The men we appoint must be those who can sit on a dais and weigh, evaluate and assess the conflicts between human beings and the differences between them. They will listen to people who challenge the rights of governments and the rights of big corporations. I think no society will remain free and good unless we evolve methods of selecting people of this kind for judicial appointment.

May I digress and say that I have sometimes heard in different parts of Canada and in this House the suggestion that those who serve in the public life of this country, our politicians in other words, should not be made judges. I disagree with that. I am not saying that one's participation in public life by itself is a mark of distinction and should automatically mean that one may be elevated to the bench. Men in public life have often been elevated. I submit that men in public life gain an insight into human nature, and a politician has that faculty. The man who has sat on the opposition benches and had to contend with the monolithic apparatus of government makes a very good judge—and please do not think I am preaching for a call, Mr. Speaker. It is bad enough for one to have to sit here and to listen to some of the speeches. At least we can walk out occasionally, but unfortunately judges cannot do that and are compelled to stay and listen to what is being said.

I make this comment only because I have heard it repeated frequently in this House during the last 10 or 15 years that the man in public life, even though he may have all the other necessary qualifications, should not be elevated to the bench. I disagree with that. In making judicial appointments we recognize that the government of the day will, all things being equal, probably appoint its supporters to the bench. I do not quarrel with that, provided the appointees have all other necessary qualifications. I have discussed this matter with the minister from time to time and will continue to do so as objectively as I can.

If society as we know it is to endure, we must have a free Parliament and a free, independent, very learned and knowledgeable judiciary. Any minister of justice attempting to acquire for the bench of this country people of that character will have my support. While it is very nice to have bilingual judges, if the government must choose between two men, let it choose the good judge. If the judges appointed are bilingual, so much the better. But if you have a man who speaks French and no English and he would make a good judge, I say that you should by all means appoint him. Similarly, if you have a lawyer who speaks English but not too much French and he would make a good judge, by all means appoint him. If you can find a man who speaks both languages, that is fine.

In my experience of the past 40 years I have never come across a case—and I was substantially involved in counsel work—where a person charged with an offence or involved in civil proceedings was unable to secure from the court, upon request, the fullest opportunity to have made available to him in the language of his choice all statements and evidence given before the court. In all instances persons are made fully aware of what is taking place. As this country progresses we may reach the stage where all those appointed to the judiciary will be bilingual, although I think it may be many years before that happens. I urge the minister to exercise the utmost caution in his appointments and not let his desire to appoint a bilingual judge interfere with his need to appoint a good judge.

How judges behave is very important. I recall that as a young law student I appeared in a case—I was not appearing on my own but had a watching brief—involving a woman who was charged with being the keeper of a bawdy house. Something turned upon whether the particular house had stairs at the back, and a lengthy examination was conducted on this point. Finally the judge turned to counsel and said, "Surely you can tell the court whether the stairs are in fact there." The accused woman turned and said to the judge, "But Your Lordship was there last night. You should know that."

Next I wish to speak about our divorce courts. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was Minister of Justice many of us in the House said that jurisdiction to try divorces should not be restricted to Supreme Court judges and that the backlog of human misery which had been built up over the course of years would create many judicial problems. Some provinces take the position that certain leading cases give their county judges jurisdiction to try divorces. I think it would have been better if Parliament had made a unilateral declaration that county and Supreme Court judges can try divorce cases. May I repeat what I have said before. I see no reason for the present distinction between judges. I think we pay Supreme Court judges $26,000 a year, and county and district court judges $19,000 a year. Can you measure the value of justice by the amount you pay a member of the bar?

For a great many years, both as a member of the bar and as a bencher of the Law Society of Alberta, as well as a Member of Parliament, I said that this distinction should be abolished. If the Government of Canada acting on instructions from the Parliament of Canada has the right to appoint judges to courts of record, why should it say, "You, John Brown, with your knowledge and capacity are limited to trying civil cases not involving more than so many thousands of dollars and criminal cases of certain types. But you, Bill Smith, have complete jurisdiction over everything." Justice should not be valued in those terms. I urge the minister to consider abolishing the distinction between county and Supreme Court judges. If a member of the bar has in the opinion of the minister the qualifications necessary to adjudicate in a civil capacity between people and people, people and corporations, people and the government and in criminal cases, he should have the capacity to try divorce cases whether or not he is a county court or Supreme Court judge. Our only reason for maintaining the distinction is that it existed at the time of confederation and we have continued it to the present time. I suggest there should be only one category of judge rather than a division between county court, district court and Supreme Court.

The minister mentioned judges attending school. I think this is a very good idea. All people in authority should go to school. From time to time even the cabinet should take a little time off and go to school to learn something. They might even learn to answer questions, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: There are good reasons for this. While we should strive to develop jurisprudence which works toward achieving certain common objectives, nevertheless because human beings are what they are it is not easy to say, for example, that a person who has committed a criminal offence in the province of Ontario should receive the same punishment as a person who committed the same offence in the province of Alberta. Circumstances and environment differ. Each case must be considered entirely on its own merits.

I am nauseated when I hear people talking about uniformity of sentence. There can be no such thing as uniformity of sentence. Sentencing is one of the most important parts of our criminal jurisdiction. Having found a person guilty of a criminal offence, a most searching inquiry consistent with equity must be made into the background of the relevant, surrounding circumstances. I consider it quite improper for the Prime Minister or any minister to suggest that with respect to offences committed under the Narcotic Control Act or any section of the Criminal Code there must be uniformity of sentence. I believe the minister, in response to questions the other day, made this quite plain. There can be no more uniformity of sentence than there can be uniformity of individuals.

I think it would probably serve a good purpose if judges did get together to discuss among themselves their experiences and problems and listen to lectures. Nevertheless, there are limits to this type of practice. It is about time this House became a more effective and active instrument in the formulation of policy with regard to judges. I think it might be advisable if judges appeared before a committee of this House in Ottawa or somewhere else and discussed with the members of the committee, in an informal way, some of the problems which they as the judiciary have encountered. I think this practice would be very useful.

This may appear irrelevant, although it is in the context of what I have been saying, but I feel a committee should be charged with the continuing responsibility of examining our criminal law and all other types of law reform. The committee should be maintained through the course of Parliament, not only to deal with various bills which the minister presents but to deal with other matters of this kind. I think it would be most useful if in fact judges appeared before such a committee from time to time. The hearings could even be held in camera. In this way the committee would have the benefit of the judges' views.

I wish to stress the great importance of the character and type of people who are appointed to the bench. This matter has already been mentioned by the minister. We may talk about anti-bugging devices, matters of defence and secrecy and the problems of the unfortunate people who have become drug addicts, but in the final analysis the extent to which any society continues to survive depends upon those people who have been elevated to judge their fellow human beings. Nothing can be more important than to ensure that the quality and character of these people remains at the very highest level.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the act before us is not as earth-shaking as the minister indicated. However, it has given an opportunity to the minister, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and myself to make some general observations either criticizing or commending our judicial system. I should like to spend a moment or two speaking about the bill itself.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That would be a highly unusual practice.

Mr. Baldwin: You are liable to be ruled out of order if you do that.

Mr. Brewin: I would not venture to discuss the situation in Alberta, but the proposal to add five judges to the county courts in York and Carleton is highly commendable. The county court judges in these urban centres are the most overworked people in the judicial group. They have a very heavy workload and it is entirely appropriate that their number should be increased.

There should be one amendment in particular to the Code, that is, all judges should be given concurrent jurisdiction in matters of divorce. This was urged upon the minister's predecessor, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), by the Bar Association. It made good sense then and it makes good sense now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We have already done that. We have that provision in British Columbia.

Mr. Brewin: It should be done right across the country. I do not understand this to be the case in Ontario. I still hear reports of the Supreme Court being clogged with divorce cases. This is causing long delays. I know they do odd things in British Columbia, but as far as I know the Supreme Court of Ontario is still very much tied up with divorce cases. This should not be the case. I am informed that at the beginning of the fall session of the courts the judges spent several weeks doing nothing but grinding out divorce judgments.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Will the hon. member permit a question Mr. Speaker? Is the hon. member aware that under the federal act the province can at any time designate the county court as having concurrent jurisdiction?

Mr. Brewin: I do not read the act in that way. I followed it closely and even urged an amendment in this House so that it would be clear there would be concurrent jurisdiction in county court judges. The predecessor of the minister, now the Prime Minister, said that although all the advice is to the contrary, we were not prepared to do this. I suggested the requisite amendment should be to the Divorce Act. It should be clear to the province that there is a designation of jurisdiction. There have been delays and attendant expense in the way these matters have been dealt with in the past.

It makes sense when county court judges have this added jurisdiction they will carry a heavier burden than is the case at the present time. I make no apology for approving the addition of these needed judicial officers even at a time when in the interest of controlling inflation the economy axe is being used. It would be false economy to overburden the judicial process by not being ready to make additional judicial appointments when they are required.

There are other fields where the same principle applies. Parole is under the jurisdiction of his colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith), though I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has particular interest in that subject. However, I suggest it is false economy not to increase substantially the number of parole officers. Every parole officer on the job saves the country a considerable amount of money, because they are able to service those who otherwise would be in detention. Certainly they can look after people on parole better than if they were still in detention. I hope that no attempt will be made to wield the economy axe as far as the appointment of additional staff in parole institutions is concerned.

The appointment of judges has been discussed, and in this regard I want to say something that I think the minister will be pleased to hear. As far as I know, since the minister has been Minister of Justice appointments to the bench have been of a very high calibre. The appointments have not been political appointments. May I congratulate him on those appointments of which I am aware, though I am not aware of all of them. However, I suggest it is simply not good enough for the minister to perform in the manner he is. If another minister were in his place we might again run into the sort of pork-barrel system that prevailed for many generations when people were appointed to the bench on the basis of political patronage. There has been no greater scandal in the judicial history of our country than this tendency that has existed in the past.

I am happy to say that I do not believe this practice exists today. Indeed, I hope it will never be resuscitated in the future. However, it is the system itself that requires change. We should not have to depend on the good intentions of ministers of justice who are from time to time appointed. The present minister says that he consults the bar associations and other qualified people with regard to judicial appointment, but I suggest some system be worked out under which the temptation to use these appointments for political purposes is removed.

I am aware of the conscious effort of the minister to take politics out of these appointments, but I hope he will not think this will be achieved merely by adopting his present practice for just a little while. I have seen new ministers of justice come to their portfolio with the highest intentions. The first few appointments made are admirable, but then as they linger on and the demands of former supporters become more insistent, later appointments do not reach the same high calibre of the earlier ones. I hope this will not happen as far as this minister is concerned, but I warn him that it has happened before and it might happen again. I suggest that while the opportunity presents itself he should ensure that some system of consultation is firmly embedded in the legislation.

I was delighted to hear that judges were going to be sent to school again. It has been my experience at the bar, especially when I was a young lawyer, that very few judges would have the humility to return to school. They seemed to know almost everything and did not require any instruction from counsel; at least, that could be said of some of them. I was glad to hear the minister say that some of their instruction would be in social subjects. I believe that past legal training has completely failed to instil any adequate social awareness in those who are called to the bar. They do not have any adequate knowledge of the modern social sciences to assist them to do their job. I hope that when judges return to school they will take these courses seriously; that they will be attended not by just a few conscientious judges but that they will be regularly attended by all judges.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to learn that some English-speaking judges have taken French immersion courses.

[English]

I see no purpose in detaining the House longer by discussing this bill. As I said at the beginning, the subject is not earth-shaking. I think we might properly pass the bill, and may I thank the minister for taking the time and trouble to tell us something about how his department is approaching the whole question of judicial appointments and activities. I must say I was encouraged by what he said.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, while I do not wish to put myself forward as a connoisseur of the French language, I had to avail myself of the services of the translator to appreciate the effort of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) at the close of his remarks.

I should also say that since the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) had occasion during the course of his speech to mention the present justices of the territorial courts in the Northwest Territories and Yukon territory, I would be very remiss if I did not take this occasion, one that I think is very appropriate, to commemorate the passing this past year of the first judge of the territorial court of the Northwest Territories, the Hon. Jack Sissons. I had the pleasure and privilege of articling in law at Lethbridge at a time when Judge Sissons was chief judge of the district court, and a very good friend of mine he was. He was also a very good friend of the native people of the Northwest Territories. I understand his popularity here was somewhat more circumscribed. I do not propose to attempt to discuss the judicial situation in the province of Ontario, but I should like to elaborate to some extent on a subject opened up by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) during his speech. I refer to the rationale for the division of the two courts in the province of Alberta.

By chapter 4 of the Statutes of Alberta, 1907, the district court was established on the basis that in every judicial district there would be a resident—I underline the word "resident"—district court judge who could exercise his jurisdiction, in the absence of a special direction, only within the judicial district in which he held his appointment. His civil jurisdiction in trial matters went to a maximum of $400.

At that time the Supreme Court, consisting of five judges, exercised both trial and appeal jurisdiction. There were nine judicial districts and two sub-judicial districts. Of these, the more populous were Calgary, with a population of 31,800; Edmonton, with a population of 20,500, including Strathcona; Lethbridge, with 6,200; and Medicine Hat with 4,300. The other judicial districts were Athabasca, Wetaskiwin, Red Deer, Stettler and Macleod.

A resident judge in a community of small population could become involved in the community life and intimately known by his neighbours. Therefore, it was not difficult to understand that it was in the interests of justice that an independent, removed judicial personage should come to the community to deal with the more serious civil and criminal matters and matters involving jury trials. With the difficulties of transportation it is easy to understand why district court judges were also required to be resident judges. However, in 1933, by chapter 15 of the Statutes of Alberta the province was divided into district courts for northern and southern Alberta. The judges appointed had jurisdiction throughout the district; that is to say, judges appointed as district court judges for southern Alberta had complete jurisdiction throughout southern Alberta, and this was the case with the district court judges in northern Alberta district courts.

In effect, this meant the disappearance of resident judges as such. At the present time Alberta is served by eight district court judges for the district of northern Alberta, all of whom reside in Edmonton; and by six district court judges for the district of southern Alberta, four of whom reside in Calgary and two in Lethbridge. The district court judges in northern Alberta serve six judicial districts, and by order in council are required to hold court in 12 centres. The district court judges in southern Alberta serve six judicial districts as well, and by order in council are required to hold court in 19 centres. In each case, the centres other than those where the judges reside are served by judges travelling to these centres at the times scheduled to hear chamber applications, hold civil and criminal trials, deal with matters of adoption and wardship, probate, administration and the passing of accounts. In the matter of chamber applications, and in civil trials, the judges are frequently required to act and exercise jurisdiction as local judges of the Supreme Court.

The jurisdictional wall between the two courts, the district and Supreme Court, is an odd thing. The numerous overlappings and contradictions make it appear that it is something without any real, present day reason. The District Courts Act limits the trial jurisdiction to cases involving a monetary value of $2,000, but the Seizures Act gives complete jurisdiction to the district court. This jurisdiction involves the determination, in a summary way, with affadavit or viva voce evidence, of such matters as the right to make seizure, the amount payable between the parties or the ownership of goods. There have been in Calgary cases under this act where the question for determination was the ownership of $1 million worth of machinery and the ownership of $750,000 worth of bowling equipment. These cases were heard and determined in a summary way by the district court. The Surrogate Courts Act gives to judges of the district court jurisdiction in "all matters arising out of or connected with the issue and revocation of grants of probate and administration" and confers the rights and powers of the Supreme Court and of the judges and officers thereof.

There has never been any limitation of the value of a probate or administration with which a district court judge could deal, although in the past, before the Surrogate Courts Act, certain matters had to be referred to the Supreme Court. Under the Domestic Relations Act, Supreme Court judges hearing divorce actions have dealt with the question of the custody of the children and have awarded custody to one or other parent. No order for such custody is ever final and may be referred back to the court in the event of any change in the circumstances of the respective parties. But under the Child Welfare Act a judge of the district court has the power, and it must be frequently exercised, to make a child a permanent ward of the Crown and permit his or her adoption by other persons. In the exercise of this power a district court judge may make an order for permanent wardship which by section 32 of the Child Welfare Act takes precedence over any order for custody given by anyone else. With the consent of the parties a district court judge may as local judge of the Supreme Court hear and determine any action brought in the Supreme Court, and in such case he has the same powers as a judge of the Supreme Court. The district court has concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Court in all matters except capital offences and trial by jury.

In southern Alberta, district court judges serve six judicial districts and hold court in 19 centres. Two of these are not visited with any regularity because they are close to other centres and the solicitors bring their work to these other centres. But the other 17 are served regularly. The judicial centres, six of them, are served regularly by the trial division of the Supreme Court. In Lethbridge, for example, where there are two resident district court judges and where the public is well served by them, the Supreme Court will attend four times in the spring term to do those things which a district court judge could do if he had the jurisdiction. Medicine Hat is served weekly by one or other of the district court judges from Lethbridge. Three times during the spring term judges of the Supreme Court are required to go to Medicine Hat to do those things which the limit of jurisdiction prevents the district court judge from doing when he is there at the same time.

The district court judges from Calgary serve Hanna and Drumheller, both of which are judicial centres of separate judicial districts, once a month. In the spring term judges of the Supreme Court must go twice to Drumheller, in each case within a few days of the district court judge, to do those things which the division of the courts makes necessary. The same situation holds true in the judicial districts of northern Alberta outside the city of Edmonton.

It is significant that much of the work done by the judges of the district court in these outlying points is done in the exercise of their jurisdiction as local judges of the Supreme Court. But those functions which can be performed only by judges of the Supreme Court are not performed at those centres to which district court judges go, which are not the centres of judicial districts. Banff, Brooks, Cardston, Blairmore, Claresholm, to name just a few, although they are served regularly by the district court must bring all Supreme Court matters to Calgary, to Medicine Hat, to Lethbridge or to Fort Macleod. An amalgamation of the two courts would not diminish the service; it would only do away with the duplication, which is costly and senseless.

The qualifications for appointment as judge of the district court are the same as those for appointment as judge of the Supreme Court. The law and its application is the same in both courts, the rules of evidence are the same, the rules of court apply to both courts and the rules of procedure are the same. But the separation of the courts and the limits of jurisdiction placed on the district court leave the public with the impression that there is a lesser brand of justice in a lower court.

I realize that this a matter for reform by provincial government and I hope that with the endorsement of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) the Attorney General of Alberta will get the idea that this might be a good thing to do. I certainly hope the Minister of Justice is prepared to go along with any such action. The only cost to us is related to extra salaries. There are not too many things which western Canada feels it can learn from the province of Quebec, but we can look upon the actions of Quebec in this regard as a very progressive step.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, if we had not been enticed to participate in this debate perhaps we would have dealt with the matter by now. A couple of points mentioned by the minister deserve elaboration. I do not suggest he did not cover the subject completely, but there is room for another expansion or point of view regarding the change that will take place. This is true particularly in view of the minister's suggestion that at the next session or some time in the near future there will be an overhaul of the Judges Act in terms of philosophy and structure rather than just changes in respect of bits and pieces of the act.

At the outset I would say in respect of the matter of judges salaries that so far as I am concerned, it is extremely important. Their job is in many cases extremely difficult. If there is only the matter of salaries involved, and by increasing salaries we can obtain a high standard and quality of judges in our courts, by all means raise the salaries. We should not be hesitant in this regard.

I know the government is sensitive about curtailing inflation through a reduction of government expenditure. The minister should not be timid in this area, because it is a very important field. Judges are public servants who deal with interpretation regarding the rights, functions and the position of society. The minister mentioned that some judges have recently gone to school.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I said they have gone back to school.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I prefer my original phrase—some judges have recently gone to school, particularly in terms of bilingualism. In this regard many judges are lacking education in terms of the humanities of our society. Many of them are too damn legalistic and narrow minded when it comes to interpreting the law. They have no concept whatever of individual feelings. Many of them operate simply on the basis of the criminal law and mete out the full extent of the penalty the law provides. It is in this area that I think an element of education is necessary.

Since I am not one of those who has any desire to be a judge, nor the opportunity since I am not in a field or activity that would lead to it, perhaps my remarks about judges may not be as precise as those of a lawyer. Quite frankly, however, I think there are too few judges in our court system and in our society who have an all-embracing approach. There are too many judges, to put it the other way, who apply statutes universally whether they are dealing with the most violent criminal cases that come before them or with a young citizen who is appearing in court on a first offence for a minor, insignificant demeanor. There is a danger on the part of judges —and on the part of magistrates who do not fall within the jurisdiction here—to apply a sort of "two-bit" lecture approach without any concern for the individual or what is involved in a social or humanitarian sense.

I believe there is a tendency on the part of the courts and judges to disregard completely the whole social area of use or misuse of drugs. The misuse of drugs has reached fantastic proportions by any comparison with the past, and it has reached fantastic proportions in any comparison with age groups that use narcotics or hallucinatory drugs of all kinds now and those who used them in the past. In fact, government itself has today moved into this area, albeit on a scant basis, without too much understanding of what is involved in respect of the individual. How can one urge the judiciary to have any concern about this problem when they are faced with a particular law which they must enforce? I believe the judges, in the field of drug use and abuse, think in terms of the full impact of the criminal law against the offender and in the context that the penalty must be a preventive and deterrent measure. I believe it can be reasonably and logically argued that there is no connection whatever, in the field of drug use and misuse, between the deterrent concept and the actual use of the drug.

It is true that judges are enforcing the law as it is. Nonetheless, there is a certain psychology involved. The idea would seem to be that so long as the individual is behind bars and is in jail, he is not using drugs. Although that is not always the case, it is at least the case in theory. We have read of instances where judges, in meting out offences for a criminal act, will make the senseless statement that they are sentencing an individual to a particular institution because there he will have an opportunity to learn a trade. We have also read about judges meting out sentences to mentally or emotionally disturbed individuals who will make this sort of gracious remark, "I am sentencing you to this particular institution so that you will receive psychiatric help". Anyone who has paid the least attention to what goes on in our penal institutions is aware that the judges just do not know what they are talking about when they make such declarations when sentencing people to penal institutions. They hope the person will receive psychiatric treatment or learn a trade so that they will become worthwhile members of society.

If judges were to go back to school, I think one of the requirements should be that they spend a certain period in our penal institutions which deal with young offenders. This should not be a casual visit which they would make when everything would be laid out and everything that was undesirable would be kept out of the way. Rather, it should be an extended visit in the form of an immersion course so that they would have an opportunity to find out what goes on in penal institutions. In this way a judge who hands down a sentence that an individual is to be incarcerated in jail would at least know through some association with the institution, from having visited there on a number of occasions, to what he is sentencing the individual. He might thereby have a more human attitude about the sentence he is meting out.

I do not think too many people will disagree with what I am about to say. Certainly some members of the House who are lawyers have spoken on this subject. We have two types of justice. Even though the standard of law may be the same, the justice which is meted out to the rich is different from the type of justice meted out to the poor. I am sure that from his activity in the legal field the minister is aware of cases where the person charged with an offence, because he did not have a fair amount of money at his disposal, was not able to arrange for the best hearing or obtain the best lawyer to fight his case through the legal system and the loopholes which exist in it.

There are in our society many people who do not have sufficient understanding of what is involved in court procedure. These people sometimes appear unrepresented in court either because of threats by the R.C.M.P. or perhaps because of promises of some sort of act of justice. They lack an understanding of their position, appear in court and plead guilty to charges of which they are in fact not guilty. Had they had the money with which to obtain proper legal assistance, in many instances they would never have been convicted.

So there is in the very practice of it, one type of justice for the rich and another for the poor. I believe this is something which must be looked at. I put forward these few ideas from the limited experience I have in the courts and the legal system in the hope that they might have some effect on what is finally transformed into law when the philosophy relating to judges and the manner in which they enforce the law is considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before I call on the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) to address us on the subject of Bill C-2 I think I should remind hon. members that we are dealing with a bill which is rather limited in scope. I understand the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) when he presented the bill did open the subject by ranging far and wide. This having been allowed, it is very difficult to confine hon. members to the very narrow scope of the bill. However, in our future contributions to the debate we should try to keep as close as possible to the scope of the bill.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in regard to justice, I feel I am to be judged by a different law than the hon. members who have already spoken. Therefore, perhaps you will excuse me if I vary a little from the scope of the bill. I should like to commend the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) for his contribution. Some of the remarks he made, I had intended to make myself.

I should like to make one point in connection with justice. I am not suggesting that there should not be more judges appointed in Alberta or Ontario, but I think that judges appointed in the future should receive further training in the social understanding of Indians and Eskimos. This is an area in which these people do not understand the law as does the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) or members of the house; therefore, I think that the judges appointed in this area of Canada should have special training in this respect. Many Indians feel that there is inequality in the way in which laws are applied, and I do not think the Minister of Justice would be happy about that.

I should like to commend the minister on appointing permanent magistrates in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I think this was a good move. However, I have a criticism to make. As I understand it, the prosecuting attorney is appointed by the Department of Justice on a more or less haphazard basis. If I am in error, I will gladly accept correction in this respect. However, it is my understanding that it was done on a casual basis because there were no permanent people available to act as crown prosecutors in some places in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. If this is the case, I think the minister should consider the appointment of a permanent crown prosecutor in addition to the additional judges in Ontario and Alberta. I hope the minister will be able to answer the question I am putting to him now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will answer the hon. member by asking whether he is aware that in the Northwest Territories there is a permanent crown prosecutor, and that at his request we appoint deputy crown prosecutors from the province of Alberta to help him when he considers that his caseload has become too burdensome for him to carry alone. There is also a permanent prosecutor in the Yukon, although the latter has now left the practice of law and I have to replace him.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief. Since I am neither a jurist nor a regular visitor of courts of justice, perhaps I am not fully qualified to discuss tonight's subject. I only wish to make a few comments on something the minister said when he introduced his bill.

First, I have nothing against the appointment of additional judges in Alberta and Ontario, quite the contrary; however, considering what is going on these days, I wonder if enough good judges can be found. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) declared earlier that it is better to appoint good judges than bilingual judges, and I could not agree more. I am in favour of that because, according to what the minister said, it was a matter of establishing language schools in order to give judges an opportunity to master a second language.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I feel somewhat skeptical and concerned, because I have the impression that before speaking a second language fluently, particularly when it comes to deciding the fate of an individual, one has to be perfectly bilingual.

I doubt that even in the most up-to-date language schools, it would be possible in more or less short periods to make a judge fluent enough in the other official language to allow him to judge adequately the case of the accused before him.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I myself would be rather concerned had I to appear before a judge who does not speak my language. My comments however do not apply to a court comprising three or five judges, one of whom at least speaks the language of the accused.

In that case, the judges by consulting each other will better understand the testimony and the defence of the accused.

For these reasons, I believe that it would be necessary to be very cautious when choosing judges who will have to hear the cases of the accused.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

COMMUNICATIONS—SOUTHERN LABRADOR—REQUEST FOR TEMPORARY REINSTATEMENT OF D.O.T. SERVICE

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, on October 29, about eight or nine days ago, during the regular question period I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the target date of Bell Canada for improved telephone service in southern Labrador has been set ahead to January, 1970, and in view of the fact that the Department of Transport withdrew its radio, telephone and telegram service from that area on August 1 of this year to coincide with the inauguration of the improved Bell Canada service which did not materialize, will the Minister of Transport arrange for the radio, telephone and telegram service of the Department of Transport to be reinstated and maintained until such time as Bell Canada has completed its installation in 1970 and is capable of providing reasonable communications in that area?

You were quite right when you said that I had made a representation, but Your Honour said the question should be placed on the order paper. I must say, with all respect, that I cannot accept that suggestion because the result of putting it on the order paper would be that the answer would not be forthcoming for about two months, at which time the question would become obsolete. For that reason I have to take it up with the minister now. I communicated this problem to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in a letter which I wrote him on July 11. It reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Jamieson: I am enclosing a petition received from the residents of Henley Harbour, Labrador, regarding the proposal of the Department of Transport to withdraw its radio-telephone service from South Labrador as of August 1, 1969. I have also received correspondence from several other communities in Labrador South requesting that the service of your department be maintained until the Bell Canada service is brought up to a better standard.
> I support this petition, and ask that you also give it sympathetic consideration.
> I would appreciate your comments.
> Yours sincerely,
> Ambrose Peddle, M.P.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I received a very prompt reply on July 15, four days afterwards, from Mr. Ross, special assistant to the minister, saying that the minister was out of town, and advising me that my letter and the petition I had forwarded had been brought to the attention of the appropriate officials for their consideration and report; on receipt of that report they would be pleased to get in touch with me again. On August 14, about 30 days later, I had a communication from the minister which read:

> Further to the letter of July 15 from my Special Assistant, concerning the withdrawal of the department's radio-telephone message service at Henley Harbour, I share your concern and will do everything possible to ensure that adequate service is provided to the residents of this area.

Before that, during that and following that I received a number of petitions from the area of Labrador south. The people there are very concerned because Bell Canada was supposed to have a decent service inaugurated by August 1, and on this basis the Department of Transport decided to withdraw its service on August 1. However, Bell Canada, because of certain problems caused by strikes and God knows what, found they could not improve their service. I have been in communication with Bell Canada who have told me there were a number of parts—I do not know the technical names for them—that were needed but could not be provided. They now tell me that these parts cannot be made available until late November, that a number of them will be assembled in Montreal and forwarded to Labrador south, and that improvement to the service will be in full effect as of some time in January, 1970.

I have had communications and petitions from people in places such as Port Hope Simpson, Labrador; Henley Harbour, Marys

Harbour and Cartwright—communities in which several hundred people live. They are not asking for anything fancy; they are asking only that the Department of Transport continue to provide its service until the independent organization, Bell Canada, gets around to providing a decent service.

I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the answer from the minister's representative will not be, "We are looking into it." There has been ample time to look into it. I have given these communications to the minister; he expressed his concern to me and said he would see that a reasonable standard of service was maintained. I hope that will be the case.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that not only is the minister looking into it but that he can give a very encouraging answer to the hon. member. I suppose the hon. member's question is directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) because the Minister of Transport is from his province, but I should point out that responsibility for the maintenance of the Labrador service now rests with the Department of Telecommunications.

The difficulties referred to are the unfortunate result of unavoidable delays in the delivery of equipment to Bell Canada, which holds the franchise for the area and which is to take over the service previously provided by the Department of Transport. Changes were made in anticipation of the transfer to Bell Canada, but because of the timing problem certain inconveniences have resulted, and as the hon. member has mentioned, his people have been suffering since.

Steps have been taken to correct these inconveniences. The Minister of Transport has indicated a willingness to reactivate the original equipment at those locations where this appears necessary, as an interim measure until the Bell service is in full operation. In this regard, stations that were serviced by Department of Transport radio-telephones up to August 1 are now being reactivated. Both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) will do everything possible to ensure that service to people of the Labrador coast is maintained at least at the level that prevailed before the Bell transfer was undertaken. As the hon. member can see, the Minister of Transport, who is from the same province, is looking after the interests of the people of Newfoundland.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT—SUGGESTED VOTE BY MAIL FOR DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be raising a question during the late show on a night when it seems that we are getting favourable replies. My question is based on a point which I raised on Monday, November 3, as recorded in Hansard at page 405, when I asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that when the Manitoba legislature amended the provincial Elections Act to provide for voting at age 18 it also included a provision to make it possible for persons who are so disabled they cannot get to the polls to vote by mail, I wonder whether the federal government would consider making a similar recommendation so far as the federal Elections Act is concerned?

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) replied that he was not responsible for amendments to the Elections Act and that I should put my question to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I was a little puzzled by his advice because I had looked at the book that morning and found that it confirmed that the Secretary of State is responsible for the supervision of the Chief Electoral Officer. However, that is a minor point and I am delighted to see the President of the Privy Council here tonight to respond to my question.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the Manitoba legislature at a recent special session did pass Bill 38, entitled an act to amend the Elections Act. This bill makes two changes. On the one hand it lowers the voting age for provincial elections in Manitoba to 18 and, in addition, it includes a provision under which persons who are physically incapacitated may cast their vote by mail. The arrangements, of course, are spelled out in Manitoba's Bill 38 and are similar to arrangements made for members of the armed forces to vote in the federal election and the arrangements made in some other provinces for absentee voting.

However, the details are not important; what is important is that something has been done. In Manitoba persons who are physically incapacitated and therefore through no fault of their own are unable to go to the polls will be able to exercise their franchise in provincial elections in my province. It is my earnest hope that a similar provision will be included in the Canada Elections Act, and that this will be one of the results of the study to that legislation now being given by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

• (10:10 p.m.)

I hope the House will not mind if I take a moment or two to pay tribute to a person who is recognized as being largely responsible for this achievement in Manitoba. I believe this person is known to my hon. friend, the President of the Privy Council. Dr. Isabel MacArthur, a woman in her early fifties who has been a victim of multiple sclerosis for nearly a decade and who pursued a very active career before she became incapacitated, has been working from her bed on this issue of votes for disabled persons. She has written a great many letters to various persons in Manitoba, seeking support for the change that has now been accomplished there. Members of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House have received letters from her, as have various members of the federal government and various officials here in Ottawa. After bill 38 was passed in Manitoba she wrote a letter to Premier Schreyer. This was in October, and this is what she said:

Dear Sir:

Thank you for the 2nd part of Bill 38 which allows voting by mail. I hope that the Federal government will take a "Leaf from Manitoba's Book."

Sincerely
(Dr.) Isabel MacArthur

I want to read a sentence or two from the letter Premier Schreyer sent to this lady, also in October. At the end of his first paragraph he wrote:

I believe the passage of this measure was due in no small part to your own determined efforts.

After indicating that he was forwarding certain material to some of us here in Ottawa, he concluded by saying:

With kind regards and my good wishes to a very gallant lady.

I join in that tribute paid by Premier Schreyer to this outstanding Manitoban, Dr. Isabel MacArthur, and I hope that the appeal she has been making to the federal government and to the members of our Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections will have the same successful outcome that has attended her efforts in Manitoba.

After all, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of an election is to enable all citizens to express their view by casting their vote. When people cannot get to the polls I think we ought to make arrangements so that their votes can be counted. I believe this ought to apply in particular to those people who cannot get to the polls through no fault of theirs, particularly when they are bed-ridden or unable to get out at all. Dr. MacArthur once made the statement that she often wondered why people did not do something about matters of this sort. The time came when she realized that it was up to her to do that something. She made the effort in Manitoba and succeeded. I join with others in paying tribute to her and I hope the federal government will also look sympathetically at this proposal and make an appropriate recommendation so that when the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections makes its report we shall have an amendment to The Canada Elections Act that will enable those who cannot get to the polls, and particularly those who cannot get to the polls because of physical incapacity, to vote, either by mail or by proxy, in all federal elections.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated, Dr. MacArthur's appeal comes with greater force to me because she has been a long-standing friend of my family in Winnipeg. I first met her when I was a boy. Her idea has force. I am also glad to support her idea from a personal standpoint.

As the House knows, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections has already commenced studies of the Elections Act, including the changes in this regard. I have given notice of a motion to authorize the committee in the present session to continue that study. During the last session I had already recommended to the chairman of that committee and to members of this party on the committee that they give special attention to the question of absentee voting. I was referring not only to absentee voting in the case of those whom I regard as being most meritorious in deserving consideration because of their physical incapacity, but to the absentee votes of other people who for a variety of reasons would not be able to exercise their franchise. It would not matter whether they are resident abroad or whether there are difficulties preventing their voting at the advanced poll in Canada.

Hon. members will recall the committee recommended against the permanent voters' list scheme for Canada, and it must be recognized a permanent voters list would certainly have facilitated absentee voting. I still regard absentee voting as possible and I am very hopeful the committee will give particular priority to seeking a solution to this question to facilitate absentee voting. I repeat in public what I already recommended in private, that they should give particular attention to the bills that have been adopted by the province in this regard. I believe an even more encompassing bill is now in force in British Columbia, and I hope we might have a recommendation from them as to an effective method for absentee balloting for the voting of not only those physically incapacitated but others who, for a variety of reasons, may not be able to be present at the polls on either voting day or at the advance poll.

I have one or two comments regarding Bill 38. I am surprised it is confined only to the physically incapacitated and does not extend the franchise even further. I would like to be satisfied, which I am not by Bill 38, that the anonymity of the ballot, the secrecy of the ballot, will not suffer in the course of the mail ballot. Subject to that I have no hesitation in recommending the proposal to the members of the committee, and I am hopeful that perhaps before the House rises at Christmas time we may have a definitive report from the committee including a favourable recommendation along this line.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear.

NAVIGATION—MACKENZIE RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the reason I appear tonight is not so much because I am dissatified with the answer I received from the minister but because under the rules a member who is not satisfied with the ruling of Mr. Speaker may raise the point at this time. I say this with some deference, but the problem I raised and the manner in which I raised my question was on a par with questions being asked yesterday in connection with the port of Vancouver. These questions were close and I intended my question to be close. It is for that reason I sought to speak on this occasion tonight.

The problem of navigation on the Mackenzie River affects far fewer people than does the situation in the port of Vancouver, but for those people along the Mackenzie River and part of the Northwest Territories it is far more important. That is why I insisted upon the problem being ventilated. There is a problem in that area. I do not suppose many hon. members are aware of what has happened, but with a great fanfare the province of British Columbia constructed a huge hydro-electric dam on the Peace River at Partridge Mountain, upstream from Hudson Hope. At the time the chief engineers on this project warned that the hydro-electric scheme tied in with, shall we say, a B.C.-Pacific coast ridge, could theoretically and quite effectively cut off all the water downstream in order to fulfil the requirements for hydro-electric power.

It must be remembered that under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, protection must be provided. The act envisages protection of downstream interests when obstructions on navigable rivers are erected. This protection is not limited to those years when there is sufficient rainfall and adequate water resources. You have to take it by and large, good years and bad. It is said that this year there was a deficiency in rainfall. But what we saw, Mr. Speaker, was a deficiency in the water levels of the Athabasca River, as evidenced this spring. There was a deficiency in the level of the Mackenzie River, particularly this fall, for navigation purposes downstream, to such an extent that a crown company, Northern Transportation, had to make a public statement that it would have to undertake many hundreds of thousands of dollars of expenditure to clear the Sans Sault rapids for navigation purposes if it were to fulfil its contracts in the forthcoming year, to justify the fleet it now has and to which it committed itself in the future.

The company stated that, as a result of the government's cutback in expenditure, the Department of Public Works could not clear this obstacle to navigation. Barges travelled downstream at 40 per cent load at a time of year when there was unprecedented development on the Arctic slope and a real opportunity to develop Canada's portion of the Arctic.

I am not blaming the minister; I blame the faceless people in this administration who have not the smallest conception of what transportation in remote areas of Canada means to developing businesses. At a time when we are asserting our sovereignty in the Arctic and trying to develop new resources, the government makes across-the-board cutbacks. No doubt the estimates of the minister's department have been cut back, and as I say I do not blame him. I blame those faceless members in Ottawa who sit in those comfortable pews and have not the slightest idea what is happening in the north.

I want to know just what is happening in the matter of navigation on the Mackenzie River. I was hoping that the minister would make a full statement outlining the difficulties. I was hoping he would explain why the government has not insisted in the past that the government of British Columbia enter into an agreement so that the downstream benefits are protected. I should like to know why it is that the town of Peace River has to sue to protect its position. Why has navigation along the Athabasca River been affected? The federal government has to go to the government of British Columbia cap in hand every time the government of British Columbia takes some action in connection with B.C. Hydro and the water level of the Peace River dam. The Department of Public Works has been derelict in the responsibility conferred on it by the Navigable Waters Protection Act to protect the interests of the province of Alberta and the Northwest Territories in regard to navigable waters.

I hope I have exposed the problem sufficiently and have justified my putting the question and the suggestion that Mr. Speaker should not have ruled it out of order.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for having brought this matter to the attention of the House. First, it gives me an opportunity as well as the hon. member to confirm the importance of the Mackenzie River. He will recall that Sir Alexander Mackenzie in 1789 called it the river of disappointment. I hope that to most Canadians today it is the river of very great hope. We hope to make a first-class commercial river along this route. Freight carried this year by the Northern Transportation Company was of the order of 235,000 tons. We hope that by 1972 this will be in excess of 800,000 tons. Not only is there a tremendous amount of activity along the Mackenzie River as a result of companies exploring for oil and metals, but also because of companies operating in the high Arctic Islands and Panarctic Islands.

Last summer the Northern Transportation Company carried 235,000 tons of freight at an average cost of $85 per ton, compared with $25 per ton out of Seattle. We expect to make the Mackenzie River an important traffic artery. That is why we have obtained about $500,000 for blasting to remove the rock at Sans Sault rapids. We intend to make a passage of about 600 feet in width over a distance of 900 feet. As my hon. friend has pointed out, there was a loss of about 25 days in shipping as a result of low water in the Mackenzie this year and because of the situation at Sans Sault rapids. Last year we had a very low level of rainfall and the drainage was low. Unfortunately the action by British Columbia Hydro in filling their reservoir as quickly as possible cut the level of water severely. When a corporation spends $741 million on a dam, it wants to get water behind it as soon as it can in order to sell power.

This action cut back the normal discharge of water of 36,000 cubic feet per second on one occasion to 1,000 cubic feet per second. My hon. friend pointed out that no permit was issued. Apparently at that time the company was not required to take out a permit. Having regard to correspondence and questions by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), I had contact with Mr. Gordon Shrum, chairman of the British Columbia Hydro. He admitted that the company had cut down the outflow to 1,100 feet per second in July, 1,000 feet per second in August and 4,900 feet per second in September. When we made representations the company brought it back as quickly as it could to 15,000 feet. The danger spot occurs in the month of September and the 15 days in October when we are still shipping on the river. Prior to that the normal river flow supplies us with ample water—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE, THE HONOURABLE GÉRARD PELLETIER, TABLED IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON NOVEMBER 6, 1969, CONCERNING THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S POLICY WITH RESPECT TO VOLUME II OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

I. GENERAL REMARKS

Over the past few months careful and detailed consideration has been given to those aspects of Volume II of the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which are of particular interest to the federal government. Special attention has been devoted to an examination of the extent to which the federal government may be able to assist in this area.

The government acknowledges that much of the substance of the recommendations put forward in Book II is more in the provincial domain than that of the federal government, both in terms of constitutional jurisdiction and as a practical matter. Nevertheless, we believe that there is a dimension to the problem which perforce involves the federal government.

As we see it, this entails the development and encouragement of programs to reinforce and advance the use of the two official languages across the country. More specifically, it relates to twelve of the royal commissioners' recommendations which are addressed directly to the federal government. We also believe that it involves a concerted effort in co-operation with the provinces to ensure that full advantage is taken of the widespread desire, not only to ensure equal rights to the official minority language communities, but also to encourage second-language learning.

The government's basic position is that we accept the principles underlying the recommendations addressed to the federal government and are prepared to provide for a financial contribution to support their implementation. This means that the government is ready to accept its responsibilities as set out by the royal commissioners. It is clear of course that action in this field cannot depend on the federal government alone, for these proposals relate to educational institutions and programmes which are a provincial responsibility. Translation of these principles into practice therefore requires acceptance by the provinces, and beyond that a willingness on their part to take the initiative in putting new programmes into effect.

Secondly, the federal government welcomes and fully supports the view expressed by Canadians that the time has come to provide a better opportunity in Canada, particularly among young people, to learn the second official language, whether this be French or English, as the case may be. We recognize that this would require a concerted effort in the field of education, which is pre-eminently the concern of the provinces, and we will be examining the possibilities for action in this area with the provinces.

Because the government is aware not only of provincial interests but of provincial responsibilities and jurisdiction, our suggestions have been put forward as a basis for discussion and consultation and it is the government's hope that further consideration of the matter can go forward in this spirit. Federal representatives look forward to meeting with their provincial counterparts to work out formulae which will be satisfactory to all concerned.

With respect to financing the programmes involved, the government has indicated that it has no choice but to establish priorities and limitations for all programmes across the range of governmental activities. We have suggested that, realistically, even the best will in the world does not necessarily carry with it the ability to disperse unlimited funds. We have therefore informed the provinces that, after the most careful consideration, the government feels obliged to place at least approximate limits on the amounts which it can contribute to this programme.

II. RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION WHICH ARE ADDRESSED TO THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

The twelve recommendations specifically directed to the federal government can be grouped into five categories: the first is recommendation 26 which asserts a general principle; second, recommendation 27 has reference to minority language schools; third, there are four recommendations—numbers 28 and 29, 41 and 42—which have regard to teacher-training; fourth, recommendations 23, 24, 25, 30 and 44 are related to university education; and finally, recommendation 46 is concerned with the establishment of a language research council.

a) General Principle

Recommendation 26 asserts a general proposition to the effect that the federal government should accept, in principle, the responsibility for additional costs involved in official-language minority education. The financial implications of this recommendation and the means of giving substance to this principle are to be found in the remaining recommendations addressed to the federal authority.

b) Primary and Secondary Schools

Recommendation 27 proposes a formula which might be used as a basis for establishing costs and the extent of federal financial aid for official-language minority schools. The formula proposed is that a federal grant to provinces be based on the number of students attending official-language minority schools, and that the grant be 10 per cent of the average cost of education per student within the province. The federal government accepts the principle that a grant should be made to provinces for additional costs entailed in providing minority-language education. The government believes, however, that the costing of this recommendation, including the question whether the 10 per cent formula could be applied universally and equitably across the country, will require further examination and consultation with the provinces.

c) Teacher-Training

Recommendation 28 proposes a federal grant to Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick to be based on the number of students attending official-language minority teacher-training institutions, the grant to be 10 per cent of the cost per student plus 10 per cent of capital costs in future. Again, in accordance with the principle that federal government is willing to provide assistance in respect of additional costs arising from minority-language education, we are prepared in principle to accept this recommendation, subject to further discussion of its implications with the provinces.

Recommendation 29 relates to a teacher-training institution at Moncton to service the Western provinces. It suggests that the federal grant to the provinces be 25 per cent of the cost per student attending each of the two teacher-training institutions. A further recommendation is made that for the Western provinces there be a federal grant covering 75 per cent of capital costs of the institution, and that for the college at Moncton, the grant should cover 50 per cent of capital costs attributable to out-of-province students. The government is prepared to accept this recommendation as a basis for discussion with the provinces, recognizing of course that they may have comments and suggestions regarding numbers of institutions and locations, as well as on the question of financing.

Recommendations 41 and 42 relate to the creation of second-language training centres, designed for the training of language teachers, and to the establishment of an interprovincial bureau of second-language training centres. Recommendation 41 proposes a federal grant to the interprovincial bureau and recommendation 42 suggests that there be a federal-provincial sharing of capital costs of the second-language training centres. The government is prepared to accept the principles embodied in these recommendations and to discuss their implementation with the provinces. In order to give greater encouragement to second-language learning, the government is also prepared to think in terms of a larger number of institutions than that envisaged by the royal commission. Beyond that, we also consider that there may be somehing to be gained by providing for modest bursaries to teachers who would be attending these or similar training institutions, in order to ensure that they would be able to do so without undue hardship. We are prepared to discuss all these aspects with the provinces.

d) University Education

Recommendation 23 proposes a federal grant to official minority-language students to enable them to study in their own language at a university outside their province when appropriate courses are not offered within the province. The government is ready to accept participation in a programme of this nature and is prepared to discuss the manner of its implementation with the provincial representatives.

Recommendation 24, which should be read in conjunction with recommendation 23, provides for a grant for additional costs that the host university will be expected to incur in respect of visiting students. The commissioners recommend that the grant be equivalent to the normal provincial grant to the university. The government is prepared to consider grants for this purpose and to review with the provinces the amounts which might be involved and the manner in which they might be made.

Recommendation 25 proposes that the federal and provincial governments reach agreement on measures required to meet the special needs of French-language universities. In the government's view, this recommendation appears to require special treatment. Our consideration of the matter leads us to believe that it would be difficult to judge the extent of these needs without further study. We have therefore suggested to the provinces that studies be conducted into the nature and dimensions of these needs and the manner of meeting them within available resources. The federal government would be prepared to consider participating in the financing of such studies.

Recommendation 30 proposes that there be a federal grant to provinces in respect of official minority-language universities which would amount to 10% of the provincial grants to these universities. Again, the government is prepared to accept the principle of federal grants for this purpose and to work out the modalities in consultation with the provinces.

Recommendation 44 suggests that the federal government meet the cost of a one-year transfer programme for university students specializing in the second official language. Within limits which will need to be agreed upon, as to the number of students who could be involved in such a programme and the cost per student, the government is prepared to accept this recommendation as well. We would hope to examine the possibilities for such a programme with the provinces.

e) Language Research Council

Recommendation 46 proposes that a language research council be established by the federal government. We are ready to accept this recommendation and to consult interested parties on the implications of establishing such a council, as well as to the manner in which it could best serve to meet the requirements of improved minority-language education and second-language training.

III. SECOND-LANGUAGE LEARNING

A study of the recommendations of the commission which are addressed to the federal government shows that they are intended to cover both minority-language education and second-language learning. The first of these priorities is designed to redress an imbalance which has existed for many years and to ensure access to education in the minority, as well as the majority, language across Canada, wherever this is feasible. The second priority goes beyond this and looks to a future in which there will be an increasing opportunity for all Canadians to learn their second official language.

The government accepts both these priorities, and our acceptance of both is reflected in our willingness to provide financial assistance in both areas in the light of the commission's recommendations. We believe, however, that the further effort which may be required to improve the quality and the quantity of second-language instruction requires experience and knowledge of curricula, facilities and other matters of concern to educators in the provinces. As a result, we believe that further action in this field will require the closest consultation with the provinces on the dimensions of a rational programme in this area, and the means available to meet the needs once the latter are determined.

IV. FINANCIAL CONSIDERATIONS

Based on our studies, we believe that the recommendations which I have just reviewed can be met, insofar as a federal contribution is concerned, by financial participation in the order of about $50 million for a full year of operations. This amount could increase, within limits established in terms of available resources, as the programme expands with enhanced participation on the part of the provinces. As far as we are concerned, the programme could go into operation in January of next year.

The government naturally envisages a series of further discussions and consultations among federal and provincial representatives on financial aspects of the programme. It was considered desirable, however, to provide a reasonably clear indication at the outset of the limits which financial considerations place on the potential federal contribution.

V. CONCLUSION

The government regards the problems which have been examined by the royal commissioners, with respect to minority-language education and second-language learning, as being of fundamental significance to the future of Canada. The extent to which the Canadian people will succeed in reaching their goals depends, in our view, on our ability to face up realistically to the facts of life in a federal state comprising ten provinces and two major linguistic groups. We believe that the royal commission report takes us a long way forward in this direction. It is clear that there are limits—of a technical, financial and human order—as to what can be accomplished in this area, but we believe that we can nevertheless do a great deal. The federal government is prepared to do its part. It profoundly hopes that the provinces will wish to do likewise.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 7, 1969

The House met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HANSARD, VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS, ORDER PAPER—DELIVERY TO MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to inform hon. members that on occasions when copies of Hansard, Votes and Proceedings or the order paper are not received from the Queen's Printer by our joint distribution branch by one o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, delivery will then be made directly to members' offices rather than to their mail boxes.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LACK OF OPPORTUNITY TO STUDY EXPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know Friday is not usually a day for disturbing the House of Commons, but this is a very serious point of order. As I understand the order of business for today, in a few minutes we shall begin the debate on second reading of Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land. Copies of this bill were distributed this morning. I received a copy yesterday because, after the government House leader said that it would likely come up, I asked for and received a copy. This bill contains 44 clauses and copies of it were distributed only this morning. After we have finished the routine which we go through every day the opposition will be asked to discuss intelligently the question of expropriation on second reading of a bill containing 44 clauses.

With the greatest respect, I say this is further evidence that the government does not want Parliament and does not want an opposition. This is proof of it. This bill is one of the most important measures facing Canadians since it involves their civil rights in respect of owning property. Yet we are being asked to debate a bill containing 44 clauses which was delivered only this morning. Surely this place can arrange its business a little better. If the Prime Minister considers Parliament to be a nuisance and believes we are nobodies, if he does not want Parliament at all, why does he not get up and say, "Let us dissolve Parliament", because we have a dictatorship in Canada now.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am not really in a position to control the publication and delivery of bills. I should like to bring out the fact that this bill is not exactly strange to the hon. gentleman. It was in fact before the House in the last session. Second, notice of this bill was given and in fact first reading was given earlier.

I can only apologize to the hon. gentleman if he does not have a copy available. I indicated privately and publicly to House leaders earlier and again yesterday that this would be the business to be called. The first indication we on this side of the House had that any hon. gentleman had an objection was when the hon. member got to his feet. I regret the circumstances, but at least from the standpoint of the government it seems to me our conduct has not been unreasonable.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Edmonton West rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to say, with regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary North that I understand there may have been some delay in distributing the bills caused by the fact that some 100 or more bills were sent for printing and had to be distributed thereafter. To the extent that the administration of the House is at fault, there will be an effort made to correct the situation in the future.

Mr. Woolliams: May I say with the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, that my comment was not a criticism of the administration of the House or of Parliament but a criticism of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: They do not want criticism.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can only reiterate that to the extent that the administration is at fault we will try to correct the situation in the future. We realize that at the start of a session some difficulty is always caused when there are 100 or more bills which have to be printed and distributed. I may say that as soon as bills receive first reading in the House they will be distributed to hon. members. So perhaps we can prevent in the future a repetition of the situation with which we are faced this morning.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (EDMONTON WEST)—ARRANGEMENTS FOR BRIEFING MEMBERS ON WHITE PAPER ON TAXATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege which also affects a number of my colleagues on this side of the House. I have not raised the matter with the Minister of Finance before because it did not come to my attention until very recently. I am referring to the arrangements for this afternoon with regard to the presentation and study of the white paper on taxation, according to which hon. members who wish to have a look at the document before it is tabled by the minister will be confined in a room. Unfortunately, this has certain connotations for those members of the House who are former members of the Privy Council and are still under their oath. They are entitled to the information but they are still bound by their oath and should not be bound by additional restraint. Therefore alternative arrangements should be made for those members of the House who are Privy Councillors so they will not be so restricted. They are bound as members of the Privy Council to their oath of secrecy, just as the minister is, and I am sure they are fully cognizant of their responsibilities.

I raise this point not in criticism but to draw it to the attention of the House and also to preserve the privilege of Privy Councillors.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that, at some urging from the opposition for the first time in history with respect to tax matters hon. members will be able to see the document involved before it is actually presented to the House.

With respect to the distribution of the document to Privy Councillors, I wish to point out to my hon. friend that with one or two exceptions I have not even distributed the document to the present members of the cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no excuse.

Mr. Baldwin: You have some leaky colleagues over there, anyway.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF MR. AND MRS. HENRI LABOUISSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to call the attention of the House to the presence in your gallery of Mr. and Mrs. Henri Labouisse. Mr. Labouisse is the Executive Director of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund. Mr. Labouisse will be remembered by many as a distinguished member of the United States diplomatic service. Perhaps I might also remind the house that Mrs. Labouisse is the former Eve Curie whose mother was famous for her contributions to humanity so well remembered in the famous biography.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN FARMERS WITH UNTHRESHED CROPS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, unfavourable weather conditions in western Canada have resulted in a complete stoppage of harvest operations in the Peace River district of both Alberta and British Columbia, in areas of central Alberta, northern Saskatchewan and to a limited extent in parts of Manitoba.

In the Peace River district very few farmers have harvested more than 20 per cent of their crops.

The largest amount of unharvested crop is in Alberta where approximately 5,635,000 acres of wheat, oats, barley and rye remain standing or in the swath, and an additional 435,000 acres of flax and 375,000 acres of rapeseed have yet to be harvested.

In Saskatchewan there are some 3,000,000 acres remaining to be harvested while in Manitoba there are about 350,000 acres still to be threshed. In total some 10,000,000 acres of western crops may remain in the fields over winter to be harvested in the spring.

It is estimated that some 25,000 farmers have been affected by the inclement weather conditions and as a result find themselves in financial difficulties. Many of these farmers would now be entitled to assistance under the PFAA crop insurance and advance payments programs had they been able to harvest their crop in a normal manner.

To meet this condition the government therefore proposes to take the following steps to accelerate the provision of assistance to farmers in western Canada with unthreshed crops:

1. In areas where in the opinion of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration potential yields of unthreshed crops are such that producers would qualify for some measure of assistance regardless of a possible spring harvest, there will be an assessment of possible yields and interim payments made to those who qualify for same. These payments will be subject to final adjustment after harvest is completed in the spring.

2. The Department of Agriculture, through the Prairie Farm Assistance administration, will maintain a close liaison with provincial crop insurance administrators with a view to providing interim indemnity payments to farmers whose potential yields are estimated to be such as will fall below insured levels when crops are threshed in the spring.

3. Legislation will be brought forward to provide for cash advances on unthreshed grain similar to those provided for with respect to threshed grain under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the minister was kind enough to hand me a copy of his remarks as I was coming into the House a few moments ago. May I at once say that in so far as the third suggestion is concerned regarding legislation to provide for cash advances on unthreshed grain similar to those provided for threshed grain under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, it commands support. This is something that I and other members have pressed for, and I compliment the government for proceeding in this regard. It is something that is going to cover a present position of affairs that has required, as I have described it, emergency action in order to place money in the hands of the western farmers at the earliest possible date.

In regard to the first two steps proposed, in effect what will be done is that in those areas in which the yields may be anticipated to be such that they will qualify under one or more of the categories for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, then in co-operation with the authorities of PFAA and in close liaison with provincial crop authorities advances will be made of part of that to which, under ordinary circumstances, the individual would have become entitled.

These things are beneficial and will bring moneys into the hands of the western farmers at a time when, because of inability to sell our wheat abroad, sales are almost impossible for the average farmer except within the quota limitations, and then only provided there is space to store the grain.

This brings me to a suggestion that I should like to place before the minister as part of the general pattern. I refer to the need to assure western farmers that moneys required to harvest the remaining 375,000 acres of rapeseed will be forthcoming. As has been pointed out to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), when rapeseed is actually placed on the premises for cleaning it is not taking up space that should be available for wheat. I therefore find it difficult to understand why Canadian Northern Seeds Limited, a company which has been selling rapeseed abroad and has markets all over the world which in no way interferes with storage, has been denied the right to take rapeseed from thousands of farmers in Saskatchewan.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the order made by the Wheat Board is completely arbitrary, unjustified and should be repudiated. The Wheat Board might lose face as a result of a change but it would mean that tens of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of dollars would be available to the farmers of Saskatchewan who are producing rapeseed. It would gain markets abroad and bring in foreign exchange. Knowing the interest of the minister in agriculture, and I say that without any intention to flatter, I suggest to him that before he leaves on his trip to Rome in connection with agricultural matters he should remedy the defect which prevents Saskatchewan farmers from selling their rapeseed in this manner, which would not interfere, directly or indirectly, with elevator space used for wheat and other crops. The matter has been before the government. It was presented with the support of the government of Saskatchewan but apparently the Wheat Board is standing firm. It should be made known to them that the order is directly contrary to the wishes and desires of the western farmer.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the minister has put before the House the program which the government intends to follow in this very serious situation. Within its limits it is a workable program, but I am afraid it will fall far short of meeting the needs of other types of farming. For instance, it says nothing about assistance in providing livestock feed in the area concerned. From the information I have been able to gather it appears that because of wet weather farmers have been unable to gather the feed necessary to carry their livestock through the winter, and in this part of the prairies there is a significant concentration of livestock. I strongly urge the minister to address himself to this problem as I doubt very much that the farmers, of themselves and by themselves, can meet the situation. The last thing we want to happen is a reduction of hogs and, more particularly, cow-calf herds in that area. This is a very important matter.

I think action should be taken to ensure, with the co-operation of the grain companies, that drying facilities are available in case some of the flax or rapeseed can be taken off the ground. Anyone who knows anything about rapeseed no doubt realizes that if the seed stays outside all winter it will be ruined by the time spring comes. Rapeseed piled in the outdoors will not survive the winter. Flaxseed was showing a 15 per cent moisture content, I believe when tested yesterday. The chances are pretty slim that these grains will dry. I would have been much happier if the minister had said that drying facilities would be set up. Possibly cash advances in addition to the ones contemplated in the program now before us will need to be introduced.

I do not wish to downgrade the program the minister has put in motion, which is similar to existing programs in the form of cash advances, crop insurance and PFAA. Such programs are designed to be of assistance to farmers. Let us not forget that farmers need assistance. The price of farm products has declined and costs of production have gone up to such an extent that the farmer has been caught in a cost-price squeeze and cannot afford to meet the slightest extra cost without the risk of finding himself in deep trouble. I hope the minister will consider these representations.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have just read the statement the Minister of Agriculture was good enough to make here about problems now arising in west Canada in connection with the crop. This is indeed a most trying experience for the 25,000 western farmers, particularly those in the province of Alberta.

I believe the government should take action to assist those western farmers financially, and not let it remain just another plan. We must make haste as expenses are incurred regularly and day by day. Funds must be found to provide the farmers with financial resources, income, in order to meet their commitments.

However, I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture could not take the necessary steps to prevent excessive effects on prices of grain for the preparation of mill-feed in the eastern provinces.

The eastern farmers are also experiencing difficulties, and their dairy and production problems as well as others are known to the members of this house.

The federal government will give assistance to the western farmers and I would ask, on behalf of the eastern producers, that the government also take the necessary steps to prevent a possible increase in prices which would be greatly detrimental to the eastern farmers.

I welcome the intended government measures which I feel are timely. The bill concerning subsidies for unthreshed cereals should be introduced—and this is also the minister's opinion—as soon as possible.

As far as we Créditistes are concerned, we can assure the western farmers and the government of our full co-operation.

REMEMBRANCE DAY ACT

ADDITION OF PRECEDING SUNDAY

Mr. Barney Danson (York-North) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-146, to amend the Remembrance Day Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, the motive behind this bill is to make the remembrance of World War II and other wars more relevant to our society today, 24 years after World War II. It is designed to enhance the sanctity of the occasion for those who served and those who were bereaved. Equally important, it is designed to manifest some compassion to our former enemies, more particularly those who are now in Canada, and even more particularly to their children who sometimes grow up in our society with a feeling of guilt about the role their parents played in past wars.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTIONS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE ON LONG-TERM OBLIGATIONS —ROLE OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Finance. Does the continued increase in interest rates as reflected by this week's rise to 7.85 per cent on government long-term obligations in the face of the government's monetary restraints indicate that any changes in these restraints or other measures taken by the government in combating inflation will have to be reviewed if we are to see a ceiling or some sort of control imposed on interest rates?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Speaker, our policies in this regard are continually under review.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Does the statement by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission made yesterday in a speech for delivery in Montreal, indicating a study by the commission of specific price increases, mean that the commission will assume the role of a prices review board? Does this indicate a change in the government's thinking with regard to the role of the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; as I have stated many times, the commission is acting on the authority it has received from Parliament.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. There has been an indication by the commission of a purely voluntary approach and that it would not conduct a study into specific prices as though it were a review board. However, the statement yesterday does make that suggestion.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, because the commission is independent from the government it is using various ways and approaches to control inflation. It may be that the statement to which the hon. member is referring, of which I have no knowledge, indicates a change of tactics or strategy by the commission. The hon. member asked if it indicated a change in the government's approach, and my answer is no. We consider the commission to be acting under its own steam.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say when hon. members will be able to find out whether a prices review board will be constituted?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. I am not in a position to say when.

GRAIN

FLAX—REPORTED LACK OF SUPPLIES FOR EXPORT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. In view of reports that supplies of flax for export were not available at the Lakehead during the October to November shipping period, can the minister assure the House that steps have been taken to ensure that supplies will immediately be moved into position at the Lakehead?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I believe I indicated to the House on a previous occasion that the Wheat Board has given high priority to the movement of flax into position and that on the basis of information I had, flax was flowing to meet the demand there.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister without Portfolio if the chain of responsibility of the companies concerned, other than permission by the Wheat Board, has been clearly established?

Mr. Lang: I am not sure I understand the real import of that question, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have any instructions been issued to elevator companies requiring them to have space available for marketable grain such as flax and rapeseed?

Mr. Lang: That is a pretty broad question. I do not know whose instructions are being referred to, but I will certainly investigate whether any instructions have been given by the Wheat Board in this regard.

Mr. Skoberg: Can the Minister tell the House whether he has assumed any responsibility in this regard or whether he is leaving it up to the elevator companies?

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister determined from his examination of the situation whether in fact flax orders were shifted from Canada to the United States, and has his investigation of the situation led to the conclusion that flax should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Lang: With regard to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, my investigations are not complete. With regard to the second part, this is a broad question which indeed does deserve and may well be the subject of further consideration by the House later this year.

INFORMATION

REQUESTED REFERENCE OF TASK FORCE REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning the report of the task force on information to which the Prime Minister has made reference in the House recently. Would the Prime Minister consider having the task force report sent to a House committee for study and recommendation, thereby helping the government in formulating its policy on this very important but potentially dangerous course of action?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when I tabled the task force report, the government intends to make a statement on its own policy before the end of the year. If the House wants to examine the report in a committee, of course we could consider this. Another way of proceeding would be for the members who have constructive ideas on the subject to make speeches or let us know their thoughts. I was surprised that in the debate which just ended there were not very many constructive suggestions on this topic; however, members may have some ideas.

Mr. Macquarrie: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I cannot reflect upon the right hon. gentleman's lack of taste or otherwise. In the meantime and in accordance with its proclamations of austerity, has the government decided to put a freeze on the hiring of information and public relations officers for the staffs of individual ministers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this particular aspect of a freeze has not been the object of any government announcement, but I confess to the House that in our view information is perhaps the most important single subject which is facing not only this government but all governments in Canada. We intend to do as much as we can to correct the lack of proper information available to the people of Canada so that they will know they live in a federal state and that the federal government is very much present in their lives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORT

ALLEGED LACK OF ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS, ETC. BY AIR TRANSPORT COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is the Minister aware that the Air Transport Association of Canada has charged that the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission is not enforcing its own regulations, orders and directions, and that the association has passed an unprecedented vote of non-confidence in the committee?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubts as to the form in which the question is asked. The hon. member is simply asking whether the minister is aware of a certain situation. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of it and in fact have already discussed it with the officials, including the chairman of the Air Transport Association. I think perhaps there was a certain amount of misunderstanding on both sides. The difficulty appears to have arisen because of an inadequacy in some of the older legislation having to do with the establishment of the new Air Transport Committee. This has now been rectified and I believe the members of the association are satisfied that within a comparatively short time these anomalies will be ironed out. We shall undertake to do this because I believe there are legitimate grounds for some of the complaints which were made at the convention.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Will the minister be bringing down new legislation so as to make these regulations enforceable and, if so, when may it be expected?

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. member may recall that legislation was passed at the end of last session; the changes have already been made in the legislation to take care of the anomalies. However, it is now necessary to bring the provision into line with the old regulations of the former Air Transport Board.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—DENIAL TO FIRM OF RIGHT TO PURCHASE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. It has to do with the matter to which I referred a few moments ago, namely, a direction from the Wheat Board to Joe Caplan, who operates a seed firm, denying him the right to purchase rapeseed although he has orders from abroad and his elevator does not come within the definition of an elevator under the law as it now stands and could not, therefore, be used for the storage of wheat or interfere with wheat storage elsewhere. I know the minister's own feelings on this subject; he is from Saskatchewan. What has the minister to say as to the reason for this most unconscionable order by the Wheat Board which is preventing thousands of farmers—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman has asked his question now and the minister could reply.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I think an accurate statement of the facts would in itself be a good part of the answer to this question. I am very sympathetic to the movement of this grain, as I am to the movement of all others. The truth of the matter is that the Wheat Board has in no way impeded the delivery on quota of rapeseed by farmers to Mr. Caplan. What it is resisting is the granting of a special off-quota privilege which would prejudice farmers who are not able to avail themselves of this privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not the minister's view the other day. But if this is so, why are the crushing plants in Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Nipawin and Altona allowed to do so over the quota? Surely the minister intends to start looking after the interests of the western farmers.

Mr. Lang: That is indeed the intention not only of the minister but of this government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CURTAILMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—CONSIDERATION OF RETURN OF GRANTS TO CPR

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway has expressed its intention to withdraw from all passenger services and thereby withdraw from carrying out the obligation which it undertook to the people of Canada in return for large grants of land and money to set up the corporation, would the minister and the government consider demanding that the railway system give back to the people of Canada the land and the money grants made to them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to consider that proposal.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister tell the House now whether he is prepared to consider it favourably or whether he thinks that was merely a funny answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION BY COUNSEL AT HEARINGS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wonder whether I might ask the following question, Mr. Speaker. It was touched upon yesterday but the minister was not in the House. Since the Canadian Transport Commission is a quasi-judicial body which has responsibility for transport generally, and since the railway will be represented when the latest proposals by Canadian Pacific are being considered by that body, will the minister consider having the government of Canada, which represents the people, represented by counsel in order that not only the position of the railways but the interests of the people can be made clear before the commission?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I would be glad to consider that suggestion but I believe the procedures are well established under the act. There is ample opportunity for representations to be made by all parties. In any event, should the decision of the CTC be challenged by any authority, then there is a right to appeal to the Governor in Council.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but in view of the fact that railway law and railway economics are difficult subjects and subjects upon which railway counsel are well briefed, would the minister not agree that it is costly to retain the services of the right kind of experts and counsel, for which reason it is important that the government should be represented at this hearing in order that the public interest might be protected?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that his supplementary is a repetition of his earlier question, put in an argumentative way.

PROVINCIAL CENTENNIALS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO GRANT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Taking into account the announcement that the federal government is making a $5 million grant toward Manitoba's centennial celebrations, can the Prime Minister indicate whether similar consideration will be given in the case of British Columbia's centennial celebrations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not know of any request having been made yet by the province of British Columbia, but when we were discussing the grant to Manitoba several ministers from British Columbia did raise that question with me. I answered then, as I answer the hon. member now, that if we receive such a request we shall, of course, consider it very carefully. It may be that British Columbia, because it has benefited so much from confederation and because it is so generous, will decide to send money to Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POLYMER—REMOVAL FROM SCOPE OF GOVERNMENT COMPANIES OPERATION ACT

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services; I have given the hon. gentleman notice. Did anyone consult with the city of Sarnia or the province of Ontario before Polymer Corporation was removed from the scope of the Government Companies Operation Act, bearing in mind the fact that a change in the distribution of $1 million in municipal tax money is involved?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt as to the admissibility of this question. The hon. member is asking whether the minister consulted with anyone in connection with this situation. However, the hon. gentleman may wish to reply.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I am able to advise him that the removal of Polymer Corporation from under the Government Companies Operation Act was not a matter which required consultation with the city of Sarnia or with the province of Ontario, and that to the best of my knowledge no consultation took place.

I might add by way of explanation that as an agent of the Crown, Polymer paid the City of Sarnia a grant in lieu of tax equal to the assessment which would have been payable had it been an ordinary commercial corporation. I understand that the amount in lieu of tax in 1968 was approximately $825,000—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The reply given by the minister confirms my original thought that the question should have been placed on the order paper.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL

EMPLOYMENT OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. Since it has been alleged that the Economic Council of Canada has been requested to cut back expenditure on the engagement of outside consultants, can the minister assure the House that the government does not intend to interfere with the effectiveness of such bodies as the Economic Council of Canada and the office of the Auditor General?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the government is anxious and indeed eager to see that the Economic Council of Canada is as productive and useful as it can be. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that there have to be limits placed on attempts to do all the good things we want to do right here and now. The Economic Council of Canada has accepted the fact that it is not possible right now to achieve all the things it would like to achieve.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question in relation to the last part of my original question. In view of the fact that substantial salary increases have been and are being given to senior officers in departments and government institutions is it the intention of the government to introduce a proposal for a comparative increase in the salary of the Auditor General, an officer of this House and Parliament?

Mr. Drury: Consideration will be given to that, Mr. Speaker.

PESTICIDES

DISPOSAL BY CROWN ASSETS DISPOSAL CORPORATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to the statement he made in the House on November 3 concerning restrictions on the use of DDT. In view of the fact that Crown Assets Disposal Corporation has called for public tenders for the purchase of 5,000 DDT bombs and 500 pounds of pesticides, the reason for the sale being the high content of DDT, will the Prime Minister request the Minister of Supply and Services to withdraw this call for tenders and have the materials returned to the manufacturer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Benjamin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might rephrase my question. What the government is doing is in direct contradiction of the statement made in the House a few days ago. I request your indulgence and I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Supply and Services whether they will consider withdrawing this call for public tenders on this product the government intends to ban?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will discuss the matter with the minister, Mr. Speaker.

NICKEL—EFFECT OF STRIKE ON EXPORTS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce tell the House what is the over-all decline in our nickel exports as a result of the strike at the International Nickel Company of Canada, and will he indicate how much in the way of permanent markets we are likely to lose as a result?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question asks for detailed information which should not normally be either asked for or given at this time. The second part of the question may be in order, but only to the extent that the hon. member is asking the minister to make a statement on motions. He may want to reply to that part of the question.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Should I make a statement on it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It is not my job to answer questions.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE PACT—REMOVAL OF PROTECTION BENEFICIAL TO CANADA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the question I intend to put to the congenial Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be in order. In view of impending meetings in the United States with a view to removing from the U.S.-Canada car pact certain beneficial protections as far as Canada is concerned, will the minister assure the House that he will not endorse or condone the removal of these protective features?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not think this would be the proper approach. In conversations of this kind I think you must stand on principles that you think are worthwhile, but you should be flexible, also open to suggestions for improvements.

Mr. Hales: Is it the intention of the minister to agree to having original replacement parts incorporated in the agreement?

Mr. Pepin: This might be part of the conversations. I want to repeat that I treat the whole thing very seriously, and I consider that the safeguards that are in the present agreement are very important as far as Canada is concerned. I will not let them go easily; you can be sure of that.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's brilliantly consistent record of failure to obtain automobile price parity between the United States and Canada, will the minister agree that Canadians are likely to obtain price parity and lower prices for automobiles only by following the suggestion made yesterday by Dennis McDermott, Canadian director of the United Automobile Workers of America, that unions must begin to negotiate such prices with the company?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an argument rather than a question.

NATURAL GAS

REPORTED DISCOVERY BY PANARCTIC OILS LIMITED

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he has been advised of the very substantial discovery by the Panarctic consortium in the Arctic and, if so, is he in a position to advise us as to the nature and the extent of the same?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I shall answer that question. It is true that on Wednesday a substantial discovery was made, at a depth of 3,600 feet, of a gas field of a capacity of 10 million cubic feet per day. Had this discovery been made in Alberta its importance would have been all the greater. But, as it has taken place in the Arctic, its importance is lessened although this discovery does prove that the government's investment in Panarctic consortium was justified.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER—DISTRIBUTION ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance what arrangements have been made to distribute extra copies of the white paper in light of the great interest shown in western Canada by the mining and oil industries?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in light of the great interest shown by everyone in the white paper, individual single copies are available free of charge to anyone who writes to my office.

[Later:]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not complete my answer. I should also have pointed out that copies of the white paper on taxation will be available at all district taxation offices from six o'clock till nine o'clock tonight and again on Monday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They have already got them? They are subject to secrecy.

FISHERIES

LAMPREY CONTROL—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO LAKE ONTARIO

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and his pinchhitter, perhaps I should direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it the intention of the government to give any consideration to the request made by the Lake Ontario fisheries committee to extend lamprey control operations to the waters of Lake Ontario?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will make sure that this question is brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Noble: Perhaps I should direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government made any investigation to determine whether lampricide used in the lamprey control program is making any significant contribution toward pollution?

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the hon. member that the supplementary question should normally be answered by way of a statement.

POST OFFICE

DECEMBER SATURDAY DELIVERY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the news release issued last night outside the House by the Postmaster General indicating that letter carrier delivery in urban areas will be made on three Saturdays in December and will cost $350,000 per day, will the Minister of Finance tell the House whether it is a fact that failure to provide letter carrier delivery on the other 49 Saturdays in the year will save the treasury $17,150,000?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

POLLUTION

THREAT FROM BREAKING UP OF TANKER

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. John's East asked me whether or not the break-up, as he termed it, of a loaded tanker off the coast of New England posed a pollution threat to Canada. I investigated the matter immediately and found that this disaster happened southeast of Nantucket, several hundred miles south of Canada's shoreline. The best information of the scientists is that the normal tides and currents will dissipate any pollution and there will be no threat to Canadian shores as a result of this disaster.

HOUSING

URBAN RENEWAL—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF FREEZE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of housing. It arises from his statement in response to a question on October 28 as to when there would be a removal of the freeze on urban renewal. He said at that time that if the Leader of the Opposition would try to be patient he would try to make a statement during the next few days. In British Columbia we are not used to such long periods of freezing, and I should like to ask the minister when this statement will be made and when the next few days will be over.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DELAY IN ISSUING RETROACTIVE PAY CHEQUES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board in an attempt to assist him in making some of the constituents of the Solicitor General happy this weekend. Has the President of the Treasury Board received a lawyer's letter about the delay in payment of retroactive wages to civil servants, and what action does he plan to relieve the hardship to many people?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a letter from the legal representative of the Professional Institute of the Public Service. It has been forwarded to the law officers of the Crown for advice. I should point out that we have been taking and are continuing to take massive action to try to overcome the very large problem created by this backlog of retroactive pay. As I indicated to the House before, in each individual case of reconciliation of accounts going back to July 1, 1967 there is a great deal of clerical work required in the departments and in the Central Pay Office. It is this complicated one-time operation we are trying to get over.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the President of the Treasury Board what he thinks of a meeting on this matter with the legal officer such as has been suggested?

Mr. Drury: Highly.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PLACING OF SERVICEMEN'S GROUP INSURANCE WITH U.S. ACQUIRED CANADIAN COMPANY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Last Friday I asked the Minister of Finance a question concerning a report that life insurance coverage for the Canadian Armed Forces to the value of between $1 billion and $2 billion had been acquired by a non-Canadian company. I trust the minister will have his reply available today.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I have taken up this matter with the Minister of National Defence. He is to supply me with information in this regard. It is not, as I understand it, a matter of the government being engaged in giving insurance to this company but rather it is a matter of the employees carrying additional insurance through the company. The Minister of National Defence is looking into the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—SHIPMENTS FROM VANCOUVER DURING STRIKE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. Can the minister tell the House the amount of wheat that has actually been moved through the port of Vancouver since the beginning of the longshoremen's strike, and whether the volume has been normal?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for statistical information. This is the type of question which should not normally be asked at this time.

PENSIONS

FEDERAL SUPERANNUATES, RETIRED CNR EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that Christmas is only 48 days away, may I put a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Is the minister hopeful that a decision regarding pension increases for federal superannuates will be made in time so that these people might enjoy a happier Christmas than is in prospect for some of them?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I think the hon. gentleman knows I am always full of hope.

Mr. Bell: Like Scrooge.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport? I should like to ask him whether he is hopeful that something might be done to increase the pensions of retired employees of the CNR, also before Christmas.

An hon. Member: Are you full of hope, too?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, and more of it.

TRADE

NICKEL—EFFECT OF STRIKE ON DOMESTIC ECONOMY AND EXPORTS

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which bears some slight relationship to a previous question. I trust you, sir, will find my question more acceptable. I should like to remind Your Honour and members of the House that we in this country have other important export commodities besides wheat and grain, about which we hear so much. Can the minister advise the House concerning what initiative has been taken or what can be done to encourage the resolution of another serious situation. I refer to the prolonged strike at the International Nickel Company and the increasingly adverse effect of it on our domestic industrial economy as well as on our export position with regard to the production and supply of nickel.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the question as asked by the hon. member is somewhat more regular than the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary. The minister might try to reply to both questions at the same time.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the labour aspect of this problem is not under my jurisdiction or for that matter under the jurisdiction of the federal government. So my contribution, I am sorry to say is limited to prayers.

With regard to the other aspect of the question, concerning the influence the strikes in the nickel, copper and steel industries have had on the exports of Canada, I have a figure but I hesitate to put it on record because it may well be that once the strikes are solved the companies will pick up in their operations and exports will increase sharply.

However, there are other aspects of this question. The price of these metals has gone up and substitution of sources might be taking place. Other countries are developing mines for nickel and copper which might not have been developed had Canada been in a position to fill the requirements. All these aspects are terribly important, but again I hesitate to give a figure in respect of the damage the strikes have caused to our export position because, as I said, some of it may be picked up in the future.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider placing an embargo on the export of scrap copper in order to relieve this situation?

Mr. Pepin: Is this scrap copper, nickel, or what?

Mr. Hales: Copper chiefly.

Mr. Pepin: I understand this is beneficial to Canada at this time. Some of this scrap—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pepin: —is being imported in Canada. This might have changed, I will check and report back. I said "scrap", Mr. Speaker.

TAXATION

CONFIDENTIALITY OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up a question I asked the Prime Minister yesterday. I asked him whether he would check to see if there were any leaks in respect of the briefing on the white paper. Can he advise us now how many copies of the white paper have been handed out, in whose hands they are, and in fact whether there have been any leaks.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have made the check, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance may wish to give his own reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, copies of the white paper were not distributed. As you know, the members of the press are locked up in a room and will have copies of the white paper in their hands. Also as is usual, sealed bundles have been sent across the country. In the past we have sent these to the branches of the Bank of Canada. In this instance we sent them to the district taxation offices. They are sealed and will not be opened until six o'clock tonight. As for distribution among members of the government, I think I have given a copy of the white paper to two of my cabinet colleagues.

Mr. Woolliams: Are these people in the department who have received the sealed packages under oath to keep secret or are you just depending on their good behaviour to not disclose anything?

Mr. Benson: In the Department of National Revenue, all employees are under oath. I, of course, told them to keep this secret until six o'clock and I believe they will do so. We have never in the past had a leak in sending such documents to the Bank of Canada offices. This has been done for a great many years.

TRADE

SASKATCHEWAN PLAN TO BARTER WHEAT FOR MACHINERY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the government decided whether it will allow the type of barter plan being promoted by the province of Saskatchewan involving the exchange of Japanese electric generators for Saskatchewan wheat? Also can the minister inform the House whether other countries have made inquiries about the possibility of barter arrangements since the suggestion of the Saskatchewan-Japanese arrangement was first raised?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not think the government of Canada can prevent the province of Saskatchewan from buying wheat from the Wheat Board at the regular prices and bartering with it. I believe any individual or even the provincial leader could do this.

I have been almost tangling with both the former prime minister of Canada and the Premier of Saskatchewan on this subject. This is very daring on my part. I have been trying to show the disadvantages of this operation in terms of co-operation between exporters-countries, in terms of the jeopardizing of a number of markets which are cash markets at this time, and in terms of the damage this might do to the other sectors of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister as we will be running short of time soon.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): The minister saw fit to mention me in his answer. Let me ask him this, is it a fact that, as stated by the premier of Saskatchewan, the minister is 90 per cent opposed to any action in this regard that would remove a great deal of wheat from the province of Saskatchewan? What is his position?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister may be allowed to reply, but I thought the hon. gentleman was asking for statistical information.

Mr. Pepin: I was just trying to be helpful. When the hon. member for Prince Albert went west this summer he said himself that there were major difficulties to bear in mind. I have been spelling out what the difficulties were.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How long?

Expropriation

LABOUR RELATIONS

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—DENIAL OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE TO CASUAL WORKERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): This question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but perhaps it may be taken as notice by his parliamentary secretary if he is not in a position to answer at the moment. Has the minister reconsidered the decision to deny unemployment insurance benefits to those casuals employed on the British Columbia waterfront in longshoring who had no part in the decision to strike and who have been, at least up until now, considered ineligible for B.C. welfare benefits on the grounds that they have unemployment insurance stamps in their books?

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall draw the attention of the minister on that question so he may give his answer the next time he is in the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPROPRIATION

ACQUISITION AND ABANDONMENT OF LAND, APPOINTMENT OF HEARING OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill was first introduced in the House during the last session of parliament as Bill C-200 on May 23. It is designed to reform the law relating to the compulsory acquisition or expropriation of land by the federal government and by its agencies. We trust that this comprehensive revision will largely remove the arbitrary features long associated with the existing federal expropriation law. We trust also that it will provide a consistent legislative scheme predicated on an advance notice of intent to expropriate, on a public hearing before expropriation, a prompt offer of payment, revised negotiation procedures, and statutory principles of compensation.

The existing law on the subject is found mainly in the Expropriation Act as it now exists, chapter 106, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. It has remained substantially unmodified since its enactment in 1886. Even then, it was not very new since the provisions of the existing law can be traced to earlier public works legislation and to inter-colonial railway legislation.

I suggest to the House, therefore, that there is very little wonder that a law which was drafted and prepared for a primarily agrarian rural society is in its present form, at a time when 80 per cent of Canadians live in the great urban centres of the country, wholly unsuited to the complexities and realities of modern urban life.

When the bill was first introduced in the spring, I made reference to the fact that several provincial governments had reviewed their legislation on expropriation recently. The federal government, in preparing the bill now before the House, owes a good deal to the research made by Chief Justice McRuer and his report, and to the hon. Mr. Clyne of British Columbia and his report. I want to say that the federal government never hesitates to borrow and to adopt the good ideas advanced by the provincial legislatures, and in this instance I think much credit can be attributed to those earlier studies. We feel that in several ways perhaps this bill may be a further improvement.

The legislation, if adopted by the House and by the other place, will apply to all federal departments and to expropriations by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Capital Commission, the National Harbours Board and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. It will not, however, extend to inter-provincial railways or to private companies under special acts which exercise special expropriation powers. We plan to deal separately with these companies in the future. Obviously, if we had applied this bill to the Canadian National Railways without having corresponding legislation affecting the Canadian Pacific Railway it would not have been a just piece of legislation. We are actively reviewing that particular problem.

Since the bill was introduced, I have had consultations with the Bar across the country and in response to a circular letter which I sent out to members of the Canadian Bar Association I received about 1,700 requests for copies of the bill. In response, the department received hundreds of letters, some detailed, some less detailed, from lawyers across the country who had some expertise in this very complicated area of legislation. Indeed, at the Canadian Bar convention here in Ottawa in September there was a panel on the new bill in which my deputy minister participated, and here again we were able to derive some useful ideas. I expect as well that when the bill is referred, if it is, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, some more useful ideas from all sides of the House will be brought forward.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): May I ask if the bill in its present form has been amended from the draft that was sent out to the society.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member seems to be somewhat telepathic. I was just going to say yes, it has been amended. There are 11 changes, most of them technical, and we hope technical improvements. None of them affect the principle of the bill.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I might just review the highlights of the bill without, I hope, trespassing on the rules of this place by referring to specific clauses. The first amendment of consequence is the introduction of a public notice of intention to expropriate. Under the present law the government can decide to expropriate property without giving any notice of its intention to expropriate to an owner or tenant, and the person whose land or interest is expropriated sometimes learns about it only after expropriation takes place. The new law will require, in advance of any property being taken, that there be publication in a local newspaper of a notice of intention to expropriate, and notification by registered mail to any person whose interest against the property appears in the local registry office. The notice must describe the property to be taken, indicate the public work or purpose for which it is required, and inform all interested persons of their right to object to the intended expropriation. I would hope that in this way the current shroud or curtain of secrecy that surrounds expropriations will be lifted.

[Translation]

As for the second reform, it deals in principle with the holding of a public hearing before the expropriation. The legislation as it stands now, Mr. Speaker, does not grant an owner or a tenant the right to object in law to the expropriation of his property, even if he is always free to complain to his member of parliament once the property has been expropriated.

The new act will give him or any other person the right to appraise the minister concerned of the reasons for his opposition to the expropriation contemplated and to get, either personally or through his lawyer or solicitor, a public hearing to be held by the investigator specially appointed by the Attorney General of Canada for the purpose of looking into objections to expropriations.

The investigator, not a public servant, is required to prepare a report dealing with the objections to the expropriation, and the minister must accept and study that report before confirming his intention to expropriate and before actually expropriating the property.

Furthermore, if the responsible minister decides to expropriate the property, he is required, upon request by the litigant, to supply him with a copy of the investigator's report, and to give him the reasons why he disregarded his objections.

It is especially provided that persons who submit objections will be reimbursed for any reasonable expenses incurred in that connection. However, when expropriation is not carried out, the law provides for a special right to claim compensation, to the extent of any real loss due to the registration of a notice of intent to expropriate in the course of the period during which such notice was effective.

[English]

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, under the present law a person whose property has been expropriated without notice and without a hearing can be required to give up possession immediately and prior to the payment of any compensation by the government. The new law will provide that following the registration of a notice of confirmation—and this confirmation will effect the actual expropriation or taking, to use the technical term, of the property—each person who is entitled to compensation must be offered, within 90 days of that notice of confirmation, an amount estimated to be his full compensation. This offer must be on an unconditional and without prejudice basis.

The offer so made by the minister must be made in writing, based upon a written appraisal, and a copy of the appraisal must be sent to each person entitled to compensation. Persons receiving such offers will be free to accept them or press for an additional amount in court if they are not satisfied with the amount so offered.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask what I think is a very fundamental question? I think it is more than a question of detail. Supposing the offer is not accepted, supposing the owner feels the offer is inadequate, is there provision in the statute for any money to be paid to him then, pending disposition of his claim?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Then, he can receive all the money and still proceed before the court for the extra amount he feels is his due, and the minister then is bound to make that payment.

Mr. Woolliams: Following on that may I ask another question? That suggestion is a good one. But if the property owner accepts the money at that stage, is that made known to the court, like tendering money, and if the judgment given is less than the amount offered will the owner have to pay the court costs?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The costs might well be discretionary on that basis. If the owner goes to court and gets an award over the amount paid by the minister, then he is entitled to his legal costs as of right, and the minister must pay a penalty of 10 per cent of the amount between his offer and the amount awarded by the court.

On the other hand, let us say the court awards him less than the minister offered. We must remember that it was an unconditional offer, and I suppose he is entitled to retain it, but obviously in such a case the costs would be assessed at the discretion of the court.

Unless there are special circumstances that give rise to an urgent requirement for possession of the property by the government, a minimum of 90 days' notice will have to be given to persons in occupation of expropriated property before the government can take possession from them under the new law, and they must have received an offer of full compensation as described, as a condition of giving up possession to the government. If, however, the government must take possession before the 90 day period has elapsed it will be obliged to pay what might be described as a special compulsory taking allowance, as a kind of penalty for depriving persons of their general right to remain in possession for the minimum 90 day period. The additional amount specified is 10 per cent of the value of the expropriated property.

[Translation]

Fourth, under the present legislation, the government can arbitrarily state, in writing, that it no longer requires a property that was expropriated and that it abandons its rights to it and the registration of such a document at the Registrar's Office automatically allows the property to be returned to the former owner.

The new legislation will allow the government to abandon an expropriated property only if the former owner chooses to accept the abandonment after receiving a notice indicating the government's intention to abandon its right to the property.

Fifth, we shall inaugurate a new negotiation procedure. The present legislation prescribes no negotiation procedure to help solve disputes concerning compensation. The new legislation entitles the owner or the lessee to cause a negotiator to be appointed, and that negotiator shall not be a civil servant, to inspect the land, the appraisals and other evidence for the purpose of determining the compensation payable to him. The statements made in the course of the negotiations are privileged statements not admissible in judicial proceedings intended to settle the compensation payable.

[English]

Turning now to the principles of compensation, at present the rules that govern the determination of the amount of compensation payable are unstated except in the decided cases. They depend on the rules that have been determined over the years by the courts.

• (12:30 p.m.)

The new law will provide a comprehensive code for determining the compensation payable with the minimum or base amount being, in general, the market value of the property at the time of its taking. Provision is expressly made to compensate for any costs or losses incidental to disturbance, including moving to other premises and for any element of special economic advantage related to occupation or use of the property. Special rules are also included to cover specially designed buildings such as schools, hospitals and religious institutions for which there is no general demand or market. Holders of security interests or mortgage interest are also dealt with specifically.

New principles of compensation have been included to deal with the expropriation of property that was in use as a residence and with the expropriation of leasehold interests. In the case of the expropriation of a residence, the new law will recognize the right of the expropriated person to claim as compensation the cost of relocating his residence in reasonably equivalent premises if the compensation otherwise payable to him is not sufficient to enable him to do this. In the case of a tenant, the length of the term remaining under his lease, his prospect of obtaining a renewal of the lease and his investment in the property, including the nature of any business carried on by him on the premises, will all be taken into consideration in determining the compensation payable to him.

In the matter of interest, Mr. Speaker, the present law provides for interest payable at the statutory 5 per cent. Under the new law, interest will be paid at an economic rate that will fluctuate from time to time and will not be less than the average yield from government of Canada treasury bills.

An hon. member asked about costs. Lawyers in the House are well aware that under the present law a person claiming compensation has no right to claim legal and appraisal costs reasonably incurred in asserting his claim before legal proceedings are commenced. Those are costs for an appraisal and legal fees spent by him or incurred by him to evaluate his property. The new law will also provide that legal and appraisal costs reasonably incurred in asserting a claim for compensation will be paid as well as any court costs awarded if legal proceedings are commenced.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister another question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Could the minister state whether these costs will be paid before or after expropriation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the bill is that the legal and appraisal costs incurred before negotiation relate to the unconditional offer. Costs of legal proceedings will be awarded as of right or by discretion at the time judgment is given.

Under the new law a claimant will be entitled as of right to have the whole of his court costs paid by the government where the amount awarded to him exceeds the amount of compensation offered by the government, and in any other case, the awarding of court costs will be in the discretion of the court. It will, therefore, be seen that the new law will make provision for the payment of costs at three stages, namely, the pre-expropriation stage when objection can be taken to the expropriation itself, the negotiation stage following upon the confirmation of an intent to expropriate, and the litigation stage to which resort may be had in the event that a negotiated settlement cannot be achieved. Mr. Speaker, those are the general principles of the bill.

As I stated in a speech before the Canadian Bar Association, and some members of the House were present, during the time I am permitted to hold this portfolio we will have three main objectives. The first is, within the federal sphere, to move as far as we can toward equality of access and equality of treatment before the law for rich and poor alike. The second is to move toward a more contemporary criminal law, one that is enforceable, flexible and compassionate.

The final objective is to achieve a better balance between the right of the ordinary citizen and the government.

It is to the first and third objectives that the present bill is directed. As the administrative arm of the state increases its influence over our social values, our lives and our goals, more and more people in this country demand greater protection from the abuses of the administrative process. This Parliament is making an effort to achieve this goal. I hope the report of the House committee on statutory instruments will result in parliamentary review of regulations. Within the government we shall re-examine the enabling powers given to the ministers and before the session is over we hope to introduce a new reform of administrative law, providing the courts with wider powers of Judicial review of the decision of administration.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I believe this new expropriation bill strikes a blow for individual rights against arbitrary state power. Canadian citizens will have the right to participate in a process which in the past has been denied. The fact that government is powerful and remote must not and should not dwarf individual rights. This expropriation bill with its guarantees of the individual's right to notice, right to a hearing, right to negotiation, right to appeal and minimum compensation, will enhance the power of the individual against the state.

Mr. Speaker, as I said when this bill was first introduced, it is a citizens' bill.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all I should like to thank the minister for outlining the purpose of the new expropriation bill and stating the high aims of the department under his direction in the weeks and months, maybe even years ahead.

Expropriation

I have a little article which appeared on October 13 in the Palo Alto Times in San Francisco which pretty well describes the situation in the past regarding expropriation in the United States, but I am sure it applies equally in Canada. I am not so sure, Mr. Speaker, whether we have really measured up to the high aims of the minister. This is an article by Dennis Tristram concerning expropriation from the average man who waits years for compensation and in the meantime has to pay for his appraiser's report and a lawyer to plead in a very academic court, namely the Exchequer Court. This is a parody on a song, and here it is:

An hon. Member: Sing it.

Mr. Woolliams: I would but I have not got such a nice voice as my friend.

Old McMillan had a farm.
And on that farm he had a lot of things.
He had milk cows here and chickens there and work horses everywhere. With hay fields big and silos full and oink from there and a moo moo here and a moo moo there and everywhere a function and everywhere production, here a function there production, Old McMillan had a farm—
He doesn't any more, just memories and some scattered junk. E-I-E-I-O.

Yes, he had a farm once but now the farm is a freeway. And I think that is really the problem, Mr. Speaker, that in the development of the urban society and specialized living, it is necessary to give the power of expropriation to the government.

• (12:40 p.m.)

I should like to make a few points immediately. Without getting into any particularization, I notice that the sole court mentioned in the bill is the Exchequer Court of Canada and I should like to say something about this provision. However, in doing so I do not want to break confidence arising from a discussion with a member of that court. I am not attacking the court or the personnel of the court, Mr. Speaker but I do say that the Exchequer Court was specially set up to serve the state and, in particular, the Crown. Actually the court functions from Ottawa. When there is a need, its judges from time to time move to the various urban centres of Canada to try cases. Actions which were begun by petition will now be set in motion by the filing of statement of claim. Any litigant who begins an action by filing a statement of claim is usually forced to make various applications under the rules of the Exchequer Court, and I shall have some comments about those rules later in my speech. I say that if the judges have the right to determine what the rules are, litigants are not being fairly treated.

A litigant in that court may make an application in chambers. He may seek an order permitting him to examine for discovery certain officers of the Crown who otherwise may not be available for discovery. Sometimes departmental officials are not willing to give answers during examinations for discovery, and orders to compel answers are sometimes necessary. Similarly, if it should happen that a departmental official is withholding information, it may be necessary for the litigant to obtain an order from a judge of the court to force the official to provide the necessary information so that counsel can argue the case properly and obtain adequate compensation in law.

My point is this, Mr. Speaker. If a litigant's lawyer has to travel to Ottawa from Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg or the Maritimes, the litigant is put to great expense. If all the litigant's assets are tied up in a piece of land which is to be expropriated by the Crown, say, then, unless he can obtain a lawyer who will work until the compensation is handed down, justice will not be done. The litigant will be unable to retain counsel or pay an appraiser. It is very nice for the minister to write beautiful law into our statute books, but nothing is gained unless each person in our society has an equal opportunity to appear before the courts.

What is the answer to this, Mr. Speaker? Unless the Crown or the state has special reasons for opposing my idea, I do not see why the superior trial courts of all of the provinces should not have concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court deals with matters pertaining to the tax field and I do not think we would destroy the efficiency of that court if we gave the superior courts of our land concurrent jurisdiction with it. Surely, there is nothing wrong with giving all the high courts of each province equal and concurrent jurisdiction. The advantages flowing from such equal and concurrent jurisdiction are several. First, all chamber applications can be argued at the situs of the litigant. Second, since a local judge will have a better knowledge of his province and community and will no doubt know something of the land or local matter in question, he will be able to use his environmental knowledge to better interpret the law for the benefit of the litigant. For example, a judge residing in Calgary or Edmonton would know more about problems associated with national parks, and how to value that unique land which might be the subject matter of an Exchequer Court action, than a stranger to the community.

I think the minister is acquainted with Mr. Jack Safian, Q.C., of Regina. I believe Mr. Safian mentioned to the minister at the meeting of the Canadian Bar Association his thoughts on this matter. He emphasized that in his view a judge with local knowledge could do a much better job, not only from the point of view of the litigant, but also for the court. Let us set up in this country courts before which all can appear. Let us not set up courts which are so expensive to litigate in that only those with money can afford to retain counsel to argue their cases. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has high ideas about lawyers, and his recent criticisms did not please the bar.

What other advantages would flow from giving our high courts concurrent jurisdiction? At present, if you are not satisfied with an Exchequer Court judgment, you must appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. And may I say this, Mr. Speaker. All lawyers concede that the higher the tribunal before which one pleads, the more courteous is the hearing one receives. No matter whether counsel comes from a village, town or city, the Supreme Court of Canada will invariably grant him a courteous hearing; and for that I commend the court. But, Mr. Speaker, appealing to that court is very expensive. For example, I once considered appealing a case involving compensation. The cost of the evidence alone and of the appeal books was somewhere between $6,000 and $7,000. Of course, counsel fee would have to be added to that sum. In addition, anyone contemplating appealing in Ottawa must retain an agent to file all the necessary documents with the Supreme Court of Canada. If provincial appeal courts were empowered to hear appeals from the Exchequer Courts, litigants could stay in their own province, have their appeals heard by provincial courts of appeal, and save a great deal of money.

I hope the minister is sincere in his intention to give all people equal opportunities to appear before the courts; because, Mr. Speaker, as we all know, at present there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. I do not think passage of this bill will remedy that state of affairs.

May I deal now with the question of leases in parks, Mr. Speaker. What are the factors we must consider when studying the question of expropriations in this area? At one time some of the land in the parks of Canada—and I am dealing with the question of expropriation at this time—was held in fee simple. Other land was held under 99 year leases, and still other land was held under leases in perpetuity. Of course, other land was held with leases to run for a term certain of, say, 42 years, and provision was made for renewal of the lease for certain periods. A big change has taken place in this area, Mr. Speaker. Anyone now wishing to build a hotel or motel to serve the tourist trade must obtain a lease from the government. At the end of 42 years or some other term that person may renew his lease for an additional five or ten years. Nevertheless, at the end of the 42 years or the term certain, title to all the buildings erected on the land reverts to the government, and no compensation is paid.

I studied a lease over the weekend, and what does it say, Mr. Speaker? May I point out that property erected on such leased land often costs between $600,000 and $700,000. Ordinary people may put up, say, $100,000 of their own money and a syndicate may put up the rest. The point is that all this property reverts to the Crown at the expiry of the lease. Clause 16 of the lease I have in my hand reads:

• (12:50 p.m.)

(1) Where

(a) any portion of the rent is unpaid for more than thirty (30) days after it becomes due whether formally demanded or not;

(b) the Lessee fails to perform, observe or keep any of the covenants and agreements herein contained; or—

(c) the Lessee violates any of the provisions of the National Parks Act—

The Minister can on notice, and in some cases without notice, cancel the lease prior to the 42 year term. I will now refer to termination of the lease. This is the important part. It shows us the power of the Crown. Section 23 reads as follows:

On termination of this lease all structures, fixtures and improvements which have been affixed or placed on the land at the expense of the Lessee will become the property of Her Majesty.

Referring back to the other clause, it is easy to determine whether the lessee has paid his rent. Section 16 refers to the lessee failing to perform, observe or keep any of the covenants and agreements, and there are many, but under this document who has the discretion to decide whether he has observed them or not? The Minister has full discretion.

I challenge anyone in Canada to say he knows all the regulations that govern parks.

When I was dealing with lawsuits in connection with parks, I had a thick book of regulations. I never did know all the regulations because they were contradictory.

Let's take a look at this lease. It is up to the Minister to determine whether the lessee fails to perform and observe the agreement. What political power does this give to the Minister? The Minister decides whether there has been a breach of the National Parks Act. If he comes to a careful and thoughtful conclusion, using his wise discretion, whether it is political or motivated by some other reason, he can terminate the lease and all the property becomes the property of the state without compensation.

The trouble with this kind of document is that those people who get involved in this type of deal do not understand it until everything has been signed and they have their property worth many thousands of dollars. The Minister said he hoped this new law would serve to protect people against the strong state infringing on the right to own property. I say leases with the Department of Northern Affairs, similar to the one I have been referring to, and possibly other leases, do not allow for any compensation.

This lease might be interpreted differently. If it means something else the Minister should so state. I wish to again read Section 23:

> 23. On termination of this lease all structures, which have been affixed or placed on the land at the expense of the Lessee will become the property of Her Majesty.

The Minister can cancel this lease on these grounds, which in fact are rather wide. In my opinion, this bill does not remedy that situation and certainly does not give people equal opportunity before the courts. There is still a law for the rich and a law for the poor. This is why I would like to see all courts with concurrent jurisdiction.

I now wish to deal with the Exchequer Court. This is a different type of court to plead in from the high trial courts of the provinces. In order that an action may properly get before the Exchequer Court, counsel must have knowledge and experience in litigation in the Exchequer Court. Exchequer Court judges have their own rules. These rules, as I read them, do not compare to the rules that streamline our courts in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, where I practise, but are more like the English court rules. In fact, if one reads the white book, dealing with the procedure in English courts, he would almost think we had English courts functioning here in Canada, in the name of the Exchequer Court. This makes it very difficult. It does not facilitate litigation. Highly skilled counsel are required to understand the situation and appear before the Exchequer Court. I believe that unless we change the rules of procedure for government expropriations by giving all courts concurrent jurisdiction, we will not remedy or cure the situation.

I maintain that even though this bill is changing law which has been in force since 1886, it is still not doing much for the average man. The average man will not like it because he cannot afford to take his case to that court. What happens is the Crown makes an offer. The owner must very carefully consider this offer. If he is not satisfied, he knows it will be very costly to bring an action to the Exchequer Court. It will be very costly to him to hire an appraiser. If he loses in the Exchequer Court, it is going to be very costly to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

What happens? The big squeeze by the big state is exerted on the little man and he has to accept the sum of money that is offered, even if it is inadequate. An example of this is the Fraser case which one hon. member knows something about because his father was involved in the litigation. I do not have the exact figures, but the amount awarded by the Exchequer Court was only one-fifth of the amount awarded by the Supreme Court of Canada. In one of my own cases, my clients were offered $13,500 and ended up with over $100,000. If they could not have afforded to litigate and did not have someone to go along with them, they would have had to accept the little handout of $13,500.

If this bill is not changed much from the one I saw previously, and I listened to the lectures of the Canadian Bar Association, then I do not believe it will solve the situation.

I wish to pause here and call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, just before one o'clock I was dealing with the application of this measure to leases in the national parks, particularly in western Canada. I see nothing here which provides for compensation upon the cancellation of leases granted in respect of land upon which hotels and motels are built.

The section of the act in question says that if any portion of the rent is unpaid for 30 days, a formal demand having been made, or if the lessee fails to perform any convenant in the agreement, or if he breaks any of the park regulations, the minister may terminate the lease. It is the minister who decides. He is all-powerful. He is the court which will determine whether the regulations have been broken. This is what happens, Mr. Speaker, after people have been encouraged to put their money into projects to serve the needs of tourists. Anyway, who would know whether lessees are in breach of some of these regulations? It is a most complicated document. Browning said of one poem he had written: When I wrote it only God and I knew what it meant; now, only God knows. The same applies to this document. On one point, however, section 23 is very clear. It states that on the termination of the lease all the improvements, all the fixtures, all the fittings, go back to the Queen without compensation. I listened to the minister's fine words. But it is like talking about the just society; words are one thing, but you have to look for deeds. In saying this, I am not criticizing the minister himself because the subject I have been discussing does not directly concern his department. Nevertheless, I hope he will look into this question. I doubt very much whether this measure will help anyone in connection with leases. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said while speaking in Saskatchewan during the election campaign that if the farmers were not efficient the state would take the farms over and lease them out. Well, if this is the kind of lease a tenant will get, it will not be of much help to him.

There are one or two other points I should like to make. One has to do with tender of offer. It has been asked: What is the purpose of this clause which provides that the offer of compensation should "forthwith, upon the acceptance of the offer, be paid"? In what circumstances would an owner decline to accept the offer, since he might do so without prejudice to his claim for additional compensation? Would it not be simpler to provide in plain language that the amount of the offer should be tendered together with a notice drawing the owner's attention to the fact that he can cash the cheque without prejudice to any claim for additional compensation, saying, in other words, that if he did not like the offer he could take his objection to court. To me, this would be streamlining the law and bringing in some measure of equality for everybody.

Now, I turn to this matter of definitions. One of the hardest things about these expropriation acts is to arrive at clear definitions of what is meant by the value to the owner, market value at the time of expropriation, and so on. There are scores of cases on this point.

Professor Eric C. E. Todd of the faculty of law at the University of British Columbia said about this act that the definition of market values is a clumsy thing. I agree with him, because when you are talking about marketing value at the time of the taking of the property you become involved in the principles of the Fraser and Woods cases for example, one of which went to the Supreme Court of Canada. The decisions in those cases went so far as to say that market value is not only the value of the land as a piece of agricultural land but is also its future potential. The courts have been reluctant to apply that principle.

We might refer to the famous Indian case that went to the Privy Council on the principle of future potential. This is like the Lake Louise case in which I was involved. The townsite had already been surveyed when the government built the road. They needed only 2½ acres but took the whole 40 to 50 acres. The Crown said it was needed for park purposes. The government then built the townsite. I suggested to the court, although they did not follow me, that the future potential was there and the government should have paid for the land on its townsite value.

If a piece of land had been taken in the city of Calgary, Montreal or Toronto, it would have been fine, because the courts and even the department would have applied this principle. They would not apply it in the case to which I have referred. I think the definition in the Ontario act to which the minister has referred is very much better than that in the federal act. Professor Todd said it is a very clumsy definition of market value and introduces the novel element of "fully paid for in cash". He said that if this element were retained it would either be ignored in practice or would cause considerable difficulty when using comparable sales in order to ascertain market value.

When you come to put a value on land you try to obtain details of sales of similar quality and potential which occurred about the same time as the taking of the property. From those and the appraiser's report the judge comes up with an answer. These sales are not for cash, so they have not been looked at in this way. Under today's conditions you cannot get cash because of the tight money policy. Very few sales of real estate on the open market are fully paid for in cash. Ontario has adopted the standard definition used in England and the United States. We should take a serious look at this definition.

I have only one or two more points to make. I should like the act to have done something for the first Canadians. I am not talking about the English or the French; I am talking about the Canadian Indian. If ever a dirty deal was perpetrated on any group of Canadians, it was perpetrated on the Indians. The white people eroded the conditions of the Indians and drove them onto little reservations. They have ever since been taking a little more from them in respect of their property rights. This new policy will not help our Indians. Their rights have been ignored, their treaties have been ignored and every promise made to them has been broken. How could they trust us? For years we have been asking the government to set up an Indian Claims Commission. I know of one case that has been before the Exchequer Court for at least ten years without anything being resolved. It involves the Blackfoot reservation near Gleichen. I should have thought that when the minister was bringing in a bill in respect of compensation, Indian claims would also have been covered.

This brings me to my conclusion. Let me again emphasize that I hope the minister will see fit to amend this act when the bill goes before the committee and amendments are proposed. I hope we will not be faced with little changes handed in by members of that committee who belong to the party to which the minister belongs. Let us make a real change and divide the jurisdiction of the act. Let me give one example. A man named Gourlay is a litigant before the Exchequer Court in respect of land that was expropriated. He finally got the case before the Exchequer Court, but because of the rule which provides that you have to file an appraiser's report within a certain number of days, the case was adjourned. After all the parties came here and were ready to proceed, one of the Crown Counsel stood up and objected on the basis that this rule had not been complied with. As a result the case stands adjourned. I know what would have happened in the courts of Alberta. The trial judge would have asked whether the Crown's case had been prejudiced. How long does it take to read an appraiser's report and analyse it? The case would have been adjourned till the next day and the court would then have proceeded.

So far as I am concerned you could write a wonderful book on the Expropriation Act. You can say as often as you like that you are trying to make the law equal for everybody, but this will not solve the situation if you leave full jurisdiction with one court. It will do nothing for the litigant. This bill is straight window-dressing. I might be a little extreme in this remark, but I feel we would be wasting our time to even study the bill. So long as the situation is left in this way, we are not helping the individual. It has been said that we want to give every man in Canada an equal opportunity before the courts. The individual is not getting an equal opportunity because individuals are not equally wealthy. Under the Expropriation Act individuals are fighting the state which has the taxpayers' money behind it, including some of the money the litigant has thrown in. A litigant must pay for the appraiser's services, which sometimes amount to thousands of dollars. He has to pay for his lawyer, the use of documents, and witnesses.

An offer made by an expropriating body amounts in many cases to nothing more than duress. A person either accepts the offer or he loses everything. I appeal to the minister to take a good look at this matter. If he intends to streamline the law he should do just that. There has been talk of changing the criminal law. It is still such that any child of seven years of age who knows the nature and the quality of his act can be tried for an offence under the Code. The government has talked about reform, but it has not even scratched the surface of this problem. I should like to see something really constructive done about this matter. I have had enough experience in the courts, including the Exchequer Court, to know that the average man does not get a fair shake.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the Expropriation Act is an act of immense importance to a very great many individuals. I know of very few fields in respect of which there is more sensitivity and more sense of injustice than in cases where the state has stepped in and taken over property which has been built up by the work and effort of perhaps generations, certainly of individuals. I suppose I must in all fairness congratulate the minister for producing what is clearly an advance in the law on this subject. I cannot help saying that it is extraordinary to me—it is not the minister's fault and I should not blame him for it in any way—that a sensitive subject like this, which affects the whole of our economy, has up to the present time come under a law passed in 1886, more than 80 years ago.

The fact that we have had to wait 80 years to update our law is certainly a reflection on somebody. It is not a reflection on the minister, who has at long last produced this bill which contains many improvements; it is a reflection on our system of government. The minister has indicated his acceptance of my proposition. I think the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has indicated the same thing. This is an intensely complex subject. It seems easy enough in a dynamic economy, such as we have, to establish the value that ought in all fairness to be assessed in respect of an individual's property. We must remember that the state should not be required to pay a disproportionate or excessive price. This is an extremely complex matter which involves the advice of experts and substantial sums of money. In view of the complexity of the subject and the voluminous nature of the bill itself, which breaks new ground, I hope the minister will be thoroughly receptive at the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, to which this bill is to be referred, to amendments proposed by hon. members from all sections of the House.

As I say, I think this bill is a great advance, but I believe it needs the most careful examination not only by the minister's department but by representatives of all parties in this House. In committee there is sometimes a tendency to say that we already have a lot of good advice and that we do not need much more; that by and large we will let things go as they are with only minor changes. In this case, if fundamental changes are suggested I hope they will be given the most open-minded consideration.

In my experience the property owner who is well financed originally, who owns very substantial property, has very few problems with respect to expropriation. He is able to hire an expert evaluator and experienced counsel, and he pays very substantial sums of money for their services. On the other hand, the small property owner, the farmer, the property owner who perhaps owns a small house which he has bought out of his savings, is not only inexperienced in the law, not only unacquainted with where to get qualified advice, but is intimidated by the whole proceedings.

One of the weaknesses of our system has been the complete inequality of bargaining power as between the citizen whose property is expropriated, on the one hand, and the expropriating authority on the other hand. The authority usually has a department responsible for this work. It has a lot of expertise. Usually it has a legal branch devoted to the subject. But the ordinary citizen is baffled, worried and frightened because he does not want to incur tremendous expenses. When the minister was speaking I asked him what would happen under this legislation if the offer made by the expropriating authority were not accepted. The minister replied that it could be accepted without prejudice. That is a matter which needs to be looked into very carefully. In clause 15 of the bill it is explicitly stated:

> Where an offer of compensation has been made to any person under section 14, the full amount thereof shall, forthwith upon the acceptance of the offer, be paid to that person.

I do not intend to discuss the details of that provision, but it goes to the principle of the bill. The way I would interpret a provision like this is that when you accept an offer you are bound by it. In this case you get paid. If you do not accept the offer, how can you still accept the money? How can you accept and not accept it? I am aware that there is a provision in clause 29 which indicates in some rather backhanded manner that perhaps you can accept the offer, change your mind within a year and ask for more. That is a novel legal concept. It is not made clear in the statute.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, the point I want to make to the minister is that somehow or other we have to make it clear beyond peradventure that the person whose property is expropriated, before being dispossessed and having his claim determined, should at least have the Crown's estimate of compensation—or a substantial portion of it say, 90 per cent—paid to him so that financially he may be in a position of equality and can secure the expert services necessary to take the case further.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is the case.

Mr. Brewin: The minister says that is the case. I am delighted to hear it, if that is his interpretation. But I give him notice now that in the committee we will have to clarify the question beyond what we see in this bill. If that is the case, fine; let us say it in words that no court, no judge and no citizen can misunderstand. I do not think those words are there now. I am afraid I would be getting into an argument on detail, on the legality of the matter, if I pursued this point further. However, I am pleased with what the minister has said and I assure him that when we get into committee we will deal with the question.

The root of the whole problem at present is the uneveness of the negotiating balance between the expropriating authority and the person whose property is being expropriated. This happens when a government department, the Crown or some other public authority is on one side and a small, private citizen unused to the law and without the necessary funds is on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, this is a little out of order in my notes, but I concur entirely with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) when he says there is no use providing justice unless you make it available in all areas. Without being rude to the Exchequer Court, sitting here in Ottawa with high legal fees and antiquated rules it is not available to the ordinary citizen except on terms almost impossible for him to meet. The hon. member is right in suggesting that justice should be made available locally. It should not be something to be purchased at great expense in a capital city perhaps 2,000 miles from where you live. I join the hon. member for Calgary North in urging the minister to consider the question of whether the Exchequer Court is the only court that ought to be able to determine these matters.

There are in the bill some things which I commend and for which I congratulate the minister. He has introduced something of an innovation in providing for a right to a hearing and a right to make objection to the expropriation itself. This is a valuable, new principle in the act. It seems to me very clear that when property owners have their property taken away by the force of the state, they should have the right to attend an open hearing and say, "There is vacant land next to mine that you could use just as well. You do not need mine for your particular purpose. The purpose is unsuitable for the locality."

There is in the bill another provision which I am happy to see. It concerns a principle for which I and other hon. members have fought many battles in this House in the past. The bill provides the right of a small homeowner to get, in effect, a home for a home. This principle of relocation has long been neglected. I believe it is imperative that in order for the person dispossessed to be put in an economic position where he does not suffer from the expropriation, he should be given the means to acquire other property, another place where he can live, as long as it is comparable to what he had, and he should be paid whatever is necessary for this to be done. I commend this feature of the legislation.

The provision with respect to interest is also commendable and reasonable. It made no sense at all that the government should take your property, have long hearings over it and then say at the end of it all, "We will pay you 5 per cent on the money we withheld from you even though we acquired title to your property a long time ago." I am not equally happy, frankly, about the provisions of the bill that attempt to define the compensation to which people are entitled. There are long, complex provisions in regard to that matter. My view is that the basic principle has been recognized by courts in civilized countries for generations, and that principle is fair value to the owner. That principle, as Mr. Justice Rand said in one case, is that the owner is entitled to be made economically whole.

You can talk about the market and relocation value and try to analyse it to your heart's content. The basic proposition is that the man whose property is taken should neither benefit nor be damaged because it happens to be his property that is taken. I suggest that in those sections which deal with the definition of compensation there should be an overriding provision in this respect. Even if we are trying to spell out the principles that make up the concept of market value, value to the owner and what should happen to the tenant, the basic purpose is to make the person expropriated economically whole and to give the proper value to the owner. In so doing you fall back on the basic principle that has been recognized by civilized jurisdictions and courts for many centuries, and that has a useful effect.

There is a danger in being too specific about these things. If you attempt too much definition you limit cases by definition. The circumstances that exist in respect of matters of expropriation are as infinite as is the ingenuity of mankind in acquiring and improving different types of property. So if you put provisions into a straitjacket of long and complicated words, as is done here, and you do not adequately reproduce the basic principle, you may be giving a formula for injustice in certain cases.

I want to say something general about this legislation. I do not know whether anything can be done about it because it is really too long and too complex. I do not know why the draftsmen had to produce pages and pages in order to set out the principles. I would very much hope that someone could say to these draftsmen, "Shorten this. Cut out the verbiage that is unnecessary." Perhaps it is an impossible thing to do in this case.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member is a classic common lawyer.

Mr. Brewin: I may be a common lawyer but I am also a common man and I do not like long, complicated words that no normal person would ever want to read or could understand if they did read them.

Mr. Otto: You would not like to be paid by the word.

Mr. Brewin: There is one example of what I am saying. There are provisions for what I call forced negotiations. When your property has been expropriated after receipt of notice, the confirmation and offers having been made, you may have to engage in a process of mediation or settlement. The mediator is appointed by the government. I suspect that this process is a waste of time. I do not mind negotiating directly with the government, and I do not want to instal a whole host of fifth wheels on the coaches whereby you would waste time going through other processes. If I cannot agree with the government, I want to go to the courts as quickly as possible without going through unnecessary proceedings which are more expensive and less satisfactory. Delay and uncertainty in this field causes more frustration than actual injustice.

I am afraid I will not use the 40 minutes that are assigned to me, but I do not suppose anyone in the House will complain very bitterly about that. I may be setting a good example to others who may follow in the debate. May I say in summary that this is a good act. It is at least 50 years overdue. It has some excellent features which we welcome. It has in it some provisions which we question and which we desire to have clarified. There are some things in it which we oppose and want taken out. I assure the minister that in the committee he will have our full co-operation in trying to make the act as modern, just and up-to-date as possible. As I said in my opening remarks, this is a subject which we may regard as academic and suitable for discussion by lawyers, but when the shoe pinches it pinches the average citizen and we are concerned with justice to individuals in this country.

Therefore, I commend the bill and say to the minister that we hope to meet him again in the committee. At that time we shall press amendments which we think will constitute real improvements to the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank hon. members for the instructive and positive way in which they dealt with the bill. I wonder whether with the consent of the House I could call it three o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock I do now leave the chair until 5.45 p.m.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION BY MEMBER FOR PEACE RIVER

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege or a point of order to bring to Your Honour's attention, and the attention of the House, a situation with regard to a motion which I filed in the proper way last Friday. I accompanied it with a letter to the Clerk dated November 7 in which I wrote the following:

> Enclosed please find a motion for the Order Paper for Monday next in connection with the introduction of a bill.
> You will note that I am using the alternative means which is available under Standing Order 68(1), namely, a motion to appoint a committee to prepare and bring in the bill.
> With kind regards, I am
> Yours sincerely,
> Gerald W. Baldwin,
> Member for Peace River

The motion in question, which appears, as a matter of fact, on today's Order Paper under private members' notices of motions, reads as follows:

> That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, Chapter 111, R.S.C., in order to extend the application of the said act to debts incurred before January 1, 1969, and to authorize the Governor in Council to have the said amendment come into effect in such parts of Canada as may from time to time be designated by Order in Council.

The Clerk, exercising his discretion, felt that this type of motion could not be dealt with under routine proceedings, whereas I submitted it could be, and it has now been placed in the back of the Order Paper under private members' notices of motions.

I wish to argue very strenuously that I am entitled, as is any other hon. member, to have this motion dealt with in the daily routine of business under Standing Order 68, which I shall read to Your Honour. It provides that:

> Every bill is introduced upon motion for leave, specifying the title of the bill; or upon motion to appoint a committee to prepare and bring it in.

It was my feeling for several reasons that this was the type of proceeding which I would choose in this particular case. I point out that while it is true, as was pointed out to me, that Standing Order 69 provides that no bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape, the nature of my motion is an interlocutory proceeding, a proceeding by which I am asking for the appointment of a committee pursuant to this Standing Order written in the plainest of language, according to which the committee could prepare and bring in the bill.

It should, therefore, be under the heading, "Introduction of Bills", despite the fact that the bill itself is not presented. The purpose of the order is to appoint a committee which would prepare the bill and bring it in. I submit that for that reason it should be placed on the Order Paper under "Daily Routine of Business" and, if not for that reason, then certainly according to the provisions of Standing Order 42(1) which provides that:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee—

This is just what I am trying to do.

There is nothing in the Standing Orders which says that this motion to appoint a committee must be a government motion. I submit that all too often a tradition has been allowed to grow up in this House of permitting things to be done only by the government when they are really matters for the House to settle. I will be quite frank and say that if effect is given to my application, then this motion becomes debatable under Standing Order 32(1)(m), which Standing Order defines a number of types of motions which may be debated. I believe that Standing Order 32(1)(m) provides that one of the motions that may be debated in this House is a motion for the appointment of a committee.

It is true that, for reasons best known to itself, the House at the time Standing Order

68 was introduced provided that the first method of introducing a bill is not debatable. Standing Order 68(2) reads:

A motion for leave to introduce a bill—

Of course, this is not the method I am employing.

—shall be decided without debate or amendment.

Consequently, most bills are introduced in the normal way and this has been the general practice. However, I submit that if this motion were placed upon the Order Paper under "Daily Routine" it would be a debatable motion.

Let me say very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that I have had occasion over some months to look into this practice. I have wondered why it has never been used in this House. It was the practice in the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact, originally, the proper method of introducing a bill, whether it was a government bill or a private member's bill, was to appoint a select committee which prepared the bill. Then, the chairman of the committee brought in the bill in accordance with the practices of the House.

Apparently that practice has never been altered so far as Canada is concerned and so far as this House is concerned, particularly if one reads the second part of Standing Order 68(1). However, the United Kingdom House of Commons saw fit some 80 years ago to change that practice by introducing what is known as the ten minute rule. Under it, there is a motion for leave to introduce a bill and a limited amount of time is allotted to the sponsor to speak, as well as those who are opposed. A committee is then appointed and brings in the bill. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that custom endures right up until 1964.

I have here an extract from the United Kingdom House of Commons Debates for January 14, 1964, recording that on that date a motion was moved by Mr. Fenner Brockway, a private member of the House, for leave to bring in a bill "to make it an offence to discriminate" against any person, etc. It was debated by the sponsor for some 10 or 15 minutes. The question was then put and agreed to, and a committee was appointed to prepare and bring in the bill at a stated date.

Later in the same year, on July 22, 1964, Mr. John Parker, also a private member at Westminster, introduced a bill in the same way. A committee was appointed and brought in the bill. For some reason we in Canada, in this House, did not see fit to attach to the employing of a committee the reservations which have been established in the United Kingdom. It is my argument, therefore, that I am entitled to use, as is any hon. member, this particular practice which I have referred to and which forms the basis of my motion today.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, may I say that although this procedure may impose certain difficulties upon the government, I submit that the government has had an option in the past to deal with this particular rule and should not now thrust upon Your Honour the onus of making this decision.

The simple ordinary language speaks for itself. Any other interpretation would be twisted and contorted and not in keeping with what was intended as an alternative means of introducing a bill. It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that other members will intervene on this somewhat novel point. Your Honour may wish to take the matter under advisement.

I think my motion is a good one for a good cause but it has a collateral purpose. The rules governing the introduction of private members' public bills smack so much of hypocrisy in the sense there is no opportunity at any time to have them brought to the point of decision by the House. Before this debate is over I hope that either the Acting Prime Minister or the government house leader will be prepared to announce that the present method of introduction of private members' bills, the method of appointment of a committee to consider the bringing in of such bills involving the U.K. ten minute rule, and the need to allow such bills to come to a vote, will be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization forthwith. In that case, Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to ask that this matter stand. I think it is more than time for some method to be designed by which private members' public bills can be considered and put to the question in this House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River I should like to commend him for bringing this matter before the House. I realize that since the notice was given on Friday there has been an opportunity for Your Honour to spend an enjoyable weekend going over all the precedents, but perhaps there are further arguments for some of us to put forward.

It seems to me that the hon. member is rendering a service in two ways. In the first place, he is raising the whole question of how private members' bills are handled. In the second place, he is raising the question of the intent of the language in the latter part of Standing Order 68 (1). It must have some purpose, some meaning, although there are Standing Orders which seem to have died through lack of use. Standing Order 68 (1) reads as follows:

68 (1) Every bill is introduced upon motion for leave, specifying the title of the bill; or upon motion to appoint a committee to prepare and bring it in.

That rule clearly specifies two ways in which a bill can be introduced. Usually we rely upon the first method, but the hon. member for Peace River has attempted to exercise the right contained in the second part of the Standing Order. I hope that this matter will be clarified, whether Your Honour makes a ruling today or holds it over for decision on a later day.

Whilst assuring the hon. member for Peace River that I am on his side, I should like to point out that another Standing Order seems to have been broken by the placing of his motion as No. 42 under Private Members' Notices of Motions.

Standing Order No. 49 (3) reads:

No member shall have more than one notice of motion at a time on the Order Paper.

The hon. member for Peace River already has a motion under this order of business, No. 39 which reads as follows:

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization review Standing Orders dealing with private members' public bills with a view to making a report to the House with a recommendation that such changes be made as will allow a recorded vote on some of such bills.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the operation of Standing Order 49 (3) would prevent a second motion being put on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. member. Yet the Chair or the table saw fit to put it there, which seems to me to suggest that the Chair or the table believes that in some way the hon. member's motion can or should be brought before the House. If that is the case, if it is the belief of the Chair or the table that it can or should be brought before the House, I hope it will be made clear when we shall have a chance to deal with this matter.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to underline those points which have been brought up by my colleague from Peace River. I say it is instructive for Your Honour's guidance for Your Honour to consider that all these rules were before the committee on procedure for detailed examination last session and this rule was not amended. It was, therefore, felt that it was in order. If there was anything that was, shall we say, contrary to the practice or the intended practice with regard to the latter portion of 68 (1), that matter would have been brought to the attention of the House and the committee would have directed its attention to it.

On reading the wording of the Standing Order I think it becomes obvious that the language is quite clear and that it envisages that a motion can be moved—it does not specify by whom it shall be moved, whether by a member of the treasury benches or by a private member—directing the committee to prepare a bill and bring it in. This is, therefore, a clearly defined way of introducing a bill. Actually, it would be the committee in its report that would introduce the bill.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it seems to me that somehow or other the table officers who were faced with the question of this motion had to fit it into some slot. Without doing their thinking for them, I suggest it is very likely that the table officers felt this would be the area in which there would be the least difficulty, namely, under private members' notices of motions. However, there is nothing in the rules that says that a member shall only present a motion under that heading.

In fact, I would put it that the argument made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to Standing Order 49 (3), to which he referred, would have an extraordinarily limiting effect on the conduct of hon. members. In other words, if the member had been unfortunate enough to have a motion put down in the normal course of events—and we know what kinds of motions these are—and if, subsequently, he had a purpose in bringing forth a bill through a committee, he would be precluded, unless he obtained the consent of the House, from withdrawing his first notice of motion which might be sixty-fifth or one hundredth on the list for consideration. In other words, it would be one which would never reach the floor of this House and the member would be completely stultified. Certainly, I do not think one would interpret our rules in so limiting a manner. Therefore there is this different, albeit very unusual, means which is still open to the hon. member for Peace River by which he is entitled to ask a committee of the House to consider and bring in a bill for the purposes stated in his motion. After all, it is up to the committee to bring in the bill and the committee, undoubtedly having a government majority in its membership, would, if it brought down a bill, undoubtedly have the government's assent. Therefore this motion must not be taken to be a means to defeat the government or to do anything of the kind. This is something which involves the privileges of a member of this House. Therefore I would urge Your Honour to give the most favourable consideration to the points and arguments put forward in support of the motion by my colleague from Peace River.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Peace River, as the hon. member for Edmonton West suggested, is an obsolete procedure of the House. In reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West may I say he will, having been a member of the procedure committee last year, recognize that there are a great many Standing Orders which have become obsolete in their application, perhaps the most notable example being Standing Order 5.

Mr. Baldwin: How about 75c?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): How about 75c? Well, that depends on the good conduct of the hon. gentleman. Whether this is an indication, Mr. Speaker, of a program of obstruction to be carried on under the leadership of the hon. gentleman, we will find out in due course.

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Surely the distinguished, honourable and learned government House leader knows he is not allowed to make such a remark. I was simply using the privilege to which I am entitled. To say that this is obstruction is something I am sure the hon. minister will, on reflection, realize he should not have said and withdraw the remark.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member knows very well there is no element of privilege involved in those remarks.

To deal briefly with the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West, the fact of the matter is that although the committee did deal at some length with the Standing Orders last year, neither this question nor many of the other obsolete and archaic provisions in our rules were dealt with. The mere fact it was left on the books does not indicate anything.

It is not without significance, after what the hon. member for Peace River has said, that neither he nor any of his colleagues were so motivated by their concern about this problem being dealt with by the standing committee last year that they brought forward any elaborated proposals for dealing with the question of private members' business. I am prepared to concede that at some appropriate time perhaps this might be reviewed, but the fact is that until now this concern has not been indicated, at least in the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

I make the submission to Your Honour and the hon. member that the provisions of Standing Order 68(1) are to be read in contemplation of the provisions of the Standing Orders with regard to private members' business. I think that common sense requires little hesitation over this point to see that if hon. members such as the hon. member for Peace River were to be in this position every day, the business each day could be pre-empted by a motion of this kind and there would be no possibility to bring government business before the House. Every day there would be one of these motions and it would therefore be impossible to deal with the public business. That, of course, is not the intention or meaning of the Standing Order.

There is a recognized procedure in the Standing Orders for dealing with private members' business. It is quite clear that to give the interpretation to Standing Order 68 sought by the hon. member would, in effect, stop dead the forward progress of the business of the company—the country.

An hon. Member: You are still a corporation lawyer!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We are still a united company on this side, but I do not see the former member for Colchester-Hants on that side. We are quite prepared to have this question of private members' business discussed by the hon. member for Peace River, if he is still interested in the question, when it comes up under private members' business. We submit it is not in order for the hon. member to have the motion brought forward in the way he has suggested.

An hon. Member: When are you going to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): When are you going to open your ears?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thank hon. members who have participated in this procedural debate. The Chair always has a difficult decision to make whether a final ruling ought to be made at the time this kind of point is raised or whether the matter should be taken under advisement with a view to making a ruling at a later date or later in the day's proceedings.

As hon. members will suspect, and as it has been indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Chair has had some time now to consider the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River since the difficulty first arose on Friday afternoon. My weekend was not spent entirely in looking into the matter, but I did with the assistance and advice of counsel and the learned officials at the table, look into the matter very closely. Most of the time was spent looking for precedents which I did not find. Indeed, I have to tell the hon. member for Peace River—and I believe he recognized this himself—that there is no precedent at all for the procedure he is suggesting now.

This may not be the proper approach, but I must say I am always a bit suspicious when an hon. member proposes a procedure and, looking over 100 years of precedents, I cannot find a single precedent which applies. I suspect that if hon. members had thought in the past that this was a procedure which was open to them they might have proposed it before, and rulings would have come from the Chair one way or another. Because of the circumstances I believe I can at this point give hon. members the benefit of my reflections on the situation.

The hon. member raised this question by way of a point of order concerning consideration of this private member's notice of motion which proposes the appointment of a committee for the purpose of bringing in a bill to amend the Farmers Creditors' Arrangement Act. In support of his argument and of the proposed procedure he referred to Standing Order 68(1), which reads as follows:

> Every bill is introduced upon motion for leave, specifying the title of the bill; or upon motion to appoint a committee to prepare and bring it in.

As the hon. member for Edmonton West and others have pointed out, if these words mean anything they must be accepted as a procedure which ought to be followed. If so, what is the procedure contemplated by the words in 68(1)? With respect, I have come to the conclusion that it is not the procedure which is suggested now by the hon. member for Peace River. I mention in passing that the terms of the hon. member's notice of motion would appear to involve a charge on the consolidated revenue fund and, if this is so, the question could not be considered until after a recommendation from His Excellency. But I am not ruling on that point; I have some qualms on the point but I think they should be set aside and that the ruling of the Chair should at this time relate exclusively to the question specifically raised by the hon. member for Peace River, the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

It would appear to the Chair that the one question which must be resolved at this time is whether the hon. member's motion may be proceeded with during routine proceedings. While Standing Order 15(2) does provide for the introduction of such bills at this time it does not permit the proposing of a motion to appoint a special committee to prepare a bill during routine proceedings. In accordance with paragraph 4 of Standing Order 15, such a proposed motion may be considered only under government orders or, in the case of a private member's motion, only when private members' business is being considered between the hours of 5 and 6 p.m. on a Monday a Tuesday or on a Friday. It is suggested that the provisions of 15(4) are quite explicit in this regard.

The hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre drew attention to another problem in connection with the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River, pointing out that we now have on the order paper two notices of motion standing in the name of that hon. member. My understanding is that this decision was taken in the face of the difficulty which arose through the motion having been proposed at that time, and because it was difficult to hold consultations at that moment. It may have been an error; possibly the matter should have been held in abeyance until the hon. member had had an opportunity to explain his views, and the Chair to consider them.

In any event, we find ourselves in a situation now in which, contrary to the Standing Orders, the hon. member for Peace River has two notices of motion appearing in his name whereas in accordance with the rules, he is entitled to only one. It is of interest to note that the hon. member's notice of motion No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

39, the one which stands as a bona fide notice of motion on the Order Paper, seeks to alter the procedure relating to the consideration and disposal of private members' business. This point was made by the hon. member for Peace River in the course of his presentation. I wish to say that I have every sympathy with the objective sought to be achieved by the hon. member as expressed in the terms of his notice of motion No. 39 and by the motion now being discussed.

There is much to be said for a re-examination of our procedure in the whole field of private members' legislation and it may well be that this is a suitable topic for consideration in due course by our Committee on Procedure and Organization.

As hon. members may know, there are meetings of house leaders in the Speaker's chambers during which procedural matters are discussed informally from time to time at which the Speaker takes the initiative on occasion to suggest that the committee might consider special problems. I propose to take the initiative to recommend to the committee that it take up at the first opportunity, at its very first meeting, the point raised today by the hon. member for Peace River. However, for the moment, and for the reasons stated I must rule that the hon. member's motion now being discussed will have to be removed from the notice section of the order paper.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order related to the remarks made by the President of the Privy Council. I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order No. 5 and ask whether permission has been given by the House for the absence of the right hon. member for Mount Royal and also of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order raised by the hon. member is a precise illustration of the statement which was made by the President of the Privy Council, namely, that some of our rules are not observed to the extent that they ought to be. Perhaps the committee would like to consider not only 68(1) but all the Standing Orders which need to be looked into further. I do not think it would be possible at this time to try to enforce the Standing Order to which the hon. member for Timiskaming has referred.

Mr. Peters: Since this Standing Order is unenforceable, and since Your Honour has a responsibility for enforcing it, could I ask you to make arrangements for the committee to review these unenforceable Standing Orders, with, of course, the support of the committee?

Mr. Speaker: That is precisely what I was saying a few moments ago. I can make suggestions to the committee though it is, of course, a committee of the House, not a committee of the Chair; a committee instructed by the House can study whatever subjects it decides in its own wisdom to consider. But I would be pleased to bring to the attention of the committee, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the suggestion now made by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why me? I am here.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE RELATING TO QUALIFICATIONS OF DIRECTOR

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-147, an Act to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the bill tends only to amend a provision of the present legislation to the effect that one has to be a British subject in order to become an official of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I simply wish to replace the expression "British subject" by "Canadian subject" in the provisions of the Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DISORDER IN PARLIAMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-148, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (Disturbance in Parliament).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize parliament to apply severe sanctions against those who, from the gallery, disturb the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

USE OF THE WORD "CANADA"

AMENDMENT ABOLISHING CERTAIN EXPRESSIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-149 entitled "An Act respecting the use of the word "Canada".

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, this bill concerns the use of the word "Canada". In our opinion, the term "Dominion of Canada" should be dropped and replaced simply by the word "Canada".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TRANSLATION OF JUDGMENTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-150 entitled "An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act".

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, at the present time, according to the act, the Supreme Court renders its judgments in English only.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Caouette: The object of this bill is to provide for the translation of the judgments of the Supreme Court and for their publication in both the official languages.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, may I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question has already been put and carried. Perhaps the minister might want to raise his point of order now that the question has been put. When shall the said bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, with the greatest respect to the hon. member who has just introduced the last bill, I would suggest that the terms of the Official Languages Act cover the point he is making in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that is hardly a point of order but a point of debate. The minister may want to participate in the debate in the House before the bill is given second reading.

DOMINION COAL BOARD DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO DISSOLVE

On the order:

First reading of Senate Public Bills—Bill S-3, an act to provide for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker: Bill S-3 comes forward for consideration under this item. I take the liberty of reminding hon. members who have taken an interest in the procedural point raised last week that perhaps at an early opportunity they may wish to submit arguments in relation to the proposed Bill S-3 for the consideration of the Chair. Shall the matter stand?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accommodate my hon. friends, but I wonder whether they would be prepared to go ahead today. I should like to deal with this matter on Wednesday next if they wish. I believe the hon. member for Peace River has already made his argument, and I am addressing myself to other members of the House. I am prepared to go ahead today if hon. members so wish.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am in the hands of the House. I am prepared to go ahead or I am prepared to wait.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Then, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to make my argument now in relation to the bill. You Honour might then have the privilege of spending another holiday looking into the precedents of the House.

As I followed his argument the other day, the hon. member for Peace River's objection to the proposed Bill S-3, an act to amend the Dominion Coal Board Act and certain other statutes, was basically founded upon the provisions of section 53 of the British North America Act and Standing Orders 62 and 63 of the House, which to a substantial degree re-enact the directions given by the British North America Act.

For the purpose of my argument in this regard, perhaps I might be permitted to indicate in a general way the provisions of the bill. Clause 2 provides for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board. Clause 3(1) provides that all rights and property of the board, and all obligations and other liabilities, are transferred to, vested in, or imposed upon the Crown itself. Clause 3(2) of the bill is the one to which the hon. member took exception. This clause stipulates that where an appropriation has been made by an Appropriation Act, either present or future, to defray the expenses of the board, then that sum may be applied to such appropriate branch of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources as the Governor in Council may determine. Clause 4 repeals the other Acts referred to and, in my submission, is not material to the point of order raised by the hon. member.

The critical question, therefore, is whether this provision amounts to an appropriation of public revenue as indicated in Section 53 of the British North America Act and, therefore, also whether there should have been preceding this bill a recommendation under the hand of His Excellency recommending the measure to the House and, in particular, whether, therefore, the measure should have been commenced in this House rather than the other place.

I should like to submit two arguments in this connection supporting the conclusion that this is not a money Bill, in the very broad term used often in debate in this House, introduced as an appropriation of the public revenue and therefore this is not a measure which requires a recommendation of His Excellency or one required to be introduced in this House. The basis upon which I would make my argument, firstly, is the very terms of clause 3(2) of the proposed bill. There can be no application of the section and therefore, there can be no charge against the Consolidated Revenue Fund unless there is, in fact, an Appropriation Act. Putting that in the context of the Appropriation Act passed in June this year which provided the appropriation for the board in the current year—unless the House had previously taken exception to it, and there is no exception now—clause 3(2) could not operate unless there had been a legal appropriation, which there was in this case. If there had not been any appropriation at all, of course the clause would not apply.

I think it might be of some assistance to refer to some of the precedents in this regard. In the opportunity I have had to look into this matter I could find no precedent exactly on the case which appears to have commended itself forcefully to Parliamentary counsel. I would, however, like to draw to the attention of the Chair two citations from the third edition of Beauchesne which would seem to be particularly germane to the type of measure we have here. The first is paragraph 449. It is a brief one and I should like to read it in full if I may:

> A Bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the Government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by Parliament, is not a money Bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

I submit that the procedure being followed here is analogous to the procedure being discussed in that particular case. Here we have a situation where money has in fact been voted by Parliament and, therefore, it is a question of changing the tense of the quotation in that particular paragraph and saying that where money has been voted by Parliament no direct charge against the Crown is involved and therefore no recommendation is necessary in this particular context.

The other precedent to which I would refer is paragraph 450 of Beauchesne's third edition, the one immediately following the one to which I have referred. Here again I should like to quote the paragraph in full:

> A Bill designed to furnish machinery for the expenditure of a certain sum of public money to be voted subsequently by Parliament may be introduced in the House without the recommendation of the Crown and without a resolution being first considered in committee.

Just to remind the House, of course, the procedure referred to in that decision, that is to say, a resolution being first considered in committee, is due to the rule changes of last year, no longer required in the House. I would say by analogy that that precedent applies in this case. Parliament did approve an appropriation bill last year for the Dominion Coal Board. What this particular bill does is provide the machinery whereby the executive government may take advantage of those particular funds that have already been appropriated by parliament. Therefore on an analogous principle, by carrying forward to a later date in time, that is to say to the time when funds have been appropriated, this would be machinery to deal with funds which have been appropriated after the dissolution of the corporation in question.

There is also another body of opinion which I have had an opportunity to consider. I should also like to bring this to Your Honour's attention. This, in essence, is a second alternative. This argument is really founded upon the opinion held in some quarters that there probably is no necessity at all for clause 3(2) in this particular bill.

In answer to the obvious question concerning why it was put in, my understanding is it was put in out of an abundance of caution on the advice of legal counsel to make certain there would be no doubt concerning the propriety of the provision. I submit, however, there has already been an Act of Parliament, preceded by the necessary formality, which in fact authorizes the re-direction of the particular Act of appropriation already made for another purpose. I should like to draw to your attention the Financial Administration Act, which is chapter 116 of the Revised Statutes of Canada and more particularly section 81 of the Financial Administration Act. Section 81(2) stipulates:

> The Minister of Finance may, with the concurrence of the appropriate Minister, direct a corporation to pay all or any part of the money of the corporation to the Receiver General to be placed to the credit of a special account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the name of the corporation, and the Minister of Finance may pay out, for the purposes of the corporation, or repay to the corporation, all or any part of the money in the special account.

Similarly subsection (3) of that section makes a stipulation with regard to the application of surplus funds where they have been appropriated but not used or otherwise dealt with. The decision of the minister in question is to be supported by a decision of the Governor in Council. I, therefore, make an argument on two grounds; first, that the provisions of the bill indicate it is in order in that, in effect there has been advance appropriation of public funds. The funds are to be provided for the ends, benefits, conditions, obligations and qualifications for which the sums were originally appropriated in the Appropriation Act of last June. Therefore, there has been the necessary authorization by parliament of an appropriation against the public revenue. That being so, this in effect is a procedural means whereby funds already appropriated may be dealt with so far as necessary by the department to which the responsibility will be given if parliament adopts the bill. They will be applied to the purposes already approved by Parliament.

Secondly, in any event, the provision for the application of funds is covered by section 81 of the Financial Administration Act in respect of corporations as set out in the schedule to that statute. We have the authorization of the Governor in Council on the advice of the minister to apply those funds in such circumstances as may be required. In effect, this is a provision to make for greater certainty, and is one which is already authorized by statute of this parliament. For that reason also, therefore, the bill will be found to be in order. I hope these two arguments may commend themselves to you, Mr. Speaker, but in any event I will be happy to abide by your decision in this regard.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regard this as an extremely important point of order which goes to the very root of the relations between the two Houses of Parliament. I commend the hon. member for Peace River for having raised this issue last week, and I believe that it should be given most serious consideration. I should like to make it clear that our concern does not relate to the substance of the bill. In all probability, I will be prepared to support, without any question whatever, what the bill seeks to bring into effect. The simple question is this: Should a bill of this kind originate in the Senate or is it required by our constitution and our practices that it originate in the House of Commons. Should we in the House of Commons receive this bill or should we refuse to receive it—the latter, I believe, is the course we should take—whereupon the government would be in a position to introduce the same bill here in the House of Commons.

In my view there is no question but that Bill S-3 is an appropriation measure. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) argues that it is merely a case of putting somewhere else funds that have already been appropriated by Parliament, and he tries to find support for his argument in the Financial Administration Act. I submit that the portions of the Financial Administration Act to which he referred do not apply, but I remind him and I remind Your Honour that there is a provision in that act under which moneys, although appropriated, if not expended as appropriated, lapse. I submit that but for the provisions in subclause (2) of clause 3 of Bill S-3, the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board would mean that the moneys appropriated for that Board would lapse. Therefore, a bill that seeks to make it possible to spend those moneys in some other way is an appropriation bill.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Bill S-3 is an attempt to give parliamentary approval for the use of moneys in a certain way, a use which has not been previously authorized by parliament. If this could be done by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) under the Financial Administration Act, then this proposal did not need to be put in this bill or to be put before us at all. But the fact is that those who drew up this bill realized that with the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board its funds would lapse, and that the only way in which the unused money could be used for some other purpose would be by an appropriation bill passed through all stages in parliament. It is because this is a bill for the appropriation of money, and for saying how certain of the public moneys are to be spent, that we contend it is the kind of measure that should originate in the House of Commons and not in the Senate.

The hon. member for Peace River read some portions of the British North America Act and some of the Standing Orders the other day, but so that the whole argument might appear in today's Hansard as well, may I be permitted to read some of these portions. First of all, section 53 of the BNA Act is very clear and explicit. It reads as follows:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

I contend, on the basis of the argument I have already advanced, that Bill S-3 is an attempt to appropriate part of the public revenue and to say how it is to be expended. There is nothing obscure, mysterious, or difficult to follow about this. This is a bill that will appropriate part of the public revenue, and therefore under the terms of our constitution, the BNA Act, it should originate in the House of Commons.

Section 54 of the BNA Act reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address or Bill is proposed.

That, of course, is a spelling out of what is already in section 53. I recognize the point made by the President of the Privy Council, that we used to think that that section required that there be a resolution preceding a money bill. We decided that that is no longer the case, but it is still true that this House of Commons cannot pass a bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue that has not first been recommended to this House by message of the Governor General in the current session. That means that a bill to appropriate money, if we are going to vote for it, has to be one presented in the House with the recommendation of the Governor General. If, on the contrary, we proceed to vote on and pass Bill S-3, which comes to us from the other place without that message to the House, then I submit we are violating section 54 of the BNA Act.

Let me turn also to some of our Standing Orders. Standing Order 62 (1) reads:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

That is obviously taken from the BNA Act.

Standing Order 62 (2) reads:

> The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

None of these procedures has been followed because this bill has not originated in this House but rather has come from the other place.

Paragraph (3) does not really matter, so I shall skip it. I will come shortly to a more important one.

Standing Order 63 reads:

> All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The last phrase relates to another problem, and I will have something to say about that in a moment. But please note, Mr. Speaker, that by the granting of money to Her Majesty, and that is what this bill does in the offending clause, the government is provided with certain money which, but for this bill, would not be there because but for this bill that money would lapse. But we have the sole right of originating a bill for such money, and we have the sole and undoubted right to "direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions" and so on. This is our sole and undoubted right, but in this case the decision is already made and given to us in a bill from the other place.

I must be careful, Mr. Speaker. I must not get worked up into expressing my feelings for the institution we call the other place. That is another issue, and it will come up in a private member's bill in a few days. But here, I am talking to those who accept the existence of the Senate, for a while yet at any rate, and I suggest that as long as it does remain we should follow the constitution. Standing Order 63 is as clear as it could possibly be, that the decisions as to how moneys are to be spent, what limitations, conditions and qualifications are to be attached to such grants, are the sole prerogative of the House of Commons. They are not even alterable by Their Honours in the other place. In this case, not only are they beyond that right but they are going to the point of telling this House, in the first place, how those grants shall be used.

While I am dealing with Standing Orders, may I draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order 64, which I think we should take very seriously as a House, even if Your Honour were to rule that the bill is in order. I hope the bill is not in order, but if you do rule that it is a decision for the House to make rather than the Chair, I hope the House will carry out the provisions of Standing Order 64 and refuse to receive it. Please note what Standing Order 64 says:

> In order to expedite the business of Parliament, the House will not insist on the privilege claimed and exercised by them of laying aside bills sent from the Senate because they impose pecuniary penalties nor of laying aside amendments made by the Senate because they introduce into or alter pecuniary penalties in bills sent to them by this House; provided that all such penalties thereby imposed are only to punish or prevent crimes and offences, and do not tend to lay a burden on the subject, either as aid or supply to Her Majesty, or for any general or special purposes, by rates, tolls, assessments or otherwise.

If I understand the language of that Standing Order, it is quite clear. It says that, as a general rule, we in this House of Commons have the complete say over money matters, and if the Senate were to send us a money bill we would refuse it. However, it says that if the Senate sends us a bill, or amends a bill of ours, in a money respect, and that bill or amendment is concerned only with the imposition of a fine or a punishment of some sort, we will not claim our privilege of refusing to accept that bill. Surely, the language of Standing Order 64 is as clear as can be to the effect that in all other cases we will claim our privilege. Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if Your Honour finds this a matter for the House to decide rather than the Chair, the decision of the House should be to reject the introduction and the first reading of this bill.

Now, Sir, by an interesting but strange coincidence Professor Elmer A. Driedger, now of the Faculty of Law at Queen's University, just a few days before this issue came up very kindly sent me a copy of a paper he had prepared entitled, "Money Bills and the Senate". Professor Driedger sent it to me because he knew I would be interested in this kind of exciting reading. I read it before this issue was raised the other day, and it is amazing how timely it is.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Would the hon. member give the date?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, it is reprinted from the Ottawa Law Review, volume 3, No. 1, Fall 1968, copyright 1968 by the University of Ottawa, and is entitled "Money Bills and the Senate" by Elmer A. Driedger, Q.C. It is a very interesting and learned review of this whole question of whether or not the Senate has the authority to amend money bills.

Professor Driedger, whom we all remember as a distinguished civil servant, a former deputy minister of justice who was with us for many years, goes into the question very thoroughly and finds that the practice in the United Kingdom is quite clear. Their Lordships just do not have this power. He also finds that, over the years, our Senate has argued from time to time that the limitations on their Honours are not the same as the limitations on the House of Lords at Westminster. He points out that the Senate has argued that really the only limitation placed on the Senate in money matters is that they cannot originate money bills.

Now, I do not agree with the position the Senate takes, and I think it is fair to Professor Driedger to say that he does not agree either. But the point I am making, well documented in his article, is that even the Senate, in its discussions over the years of its powers in relation to the House of Commons, has never doubted the proposition that it has no right to originate money bills. The Senate has argued for the right to amend money bills, a right which the House of Commons has never conceded, but at no point has the Senate even contended that it had the right to originate money bills.

Professor Driedger's article, as I said, deals at some length with the position in the United Kingdom, and then he translates that into the Canadian position. As so often happens in these procedural arguments, he falls back on those famous nine words in the preamble to our constitution which so often, when we get into something like this and wonder what the answer is, lead us to say that our constitution is "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". And Professor Driedger says that if the Senate has certain powers here that Their Lordships do not have in Westminster, then of course those nine famous words in the preamble to our constitution are being violated. I quote briefly from his article as follows:

> But perhaps the strongest argument in favour of the Commons can be founded on the theory that under our Constitution (similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom), representation and consent form the basis of the power of the Commons to grant money and impose taxes.

Further on he says:

> Through the centuries the principle was maintained that taxation required representation and consent. The only body in Canada that meets this test is the Commons. The elected representatives of the people sit in the Commons, and not in the Senate—

This is Professor Driedger talking, not the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

> —and, consistently with history and tradition, they may well insist that they alone—

The House of Commons.

> —have the right to decide to the last cent what money is to be granted and what taxes are to be imposed.

Professor Driedger carries this argument through to point out something that Your Honour is very much aware of, namely, that we so completely assert our rights with respect to the appropriation of money that, as he says:

> The Supply Bill is presented for Royal Assent by the Speaker of the House of Commons with the words "The Commons of Canada have voted supplies required to enable the government to defray certain expenses of the public service. In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill." And in the course of his speech on prorogation the Governor General addresses his thanks to the Commons alone.

In another paragraph, Professor Driedger points out that Section 53 of the BNA Act deals only with origination of bills and therefore does not deal with the question of amending money bills, so that so far as origination is concerned there is no question that that particular power does not belong to the Senate. Over the years, the Senate has produced a number of studies on this issue, and in some of their memoranda they have made certain arguments for their rights. But as Professor Driedger points out:

The Senate argues that Section 53 takes away only the right to initiate, and not the right to amend;

This is an argument for the Senate's position, that maybe the Senate has power to amend. But at no point in all of these discussions, even on behalf of Their Honours, has there been any question about the right to originate money bills. That right belongs solely, exclusively, absolutely to the House of Commons.

• (3:20 p.m.)

At one point Professor Driedger discussed this position hypothetically and indicated that if this principle were violated, that is if the Senate could amend a money bill, a number of other things might follow. I shall read this paragraph:

Again if the Senate conclusions are sound, it must necessarily follow that the Senate could change the incidence of taxation, could postpone the coming into force of a taxation bill, could limit its duration, and otherwise control or interfere with the imposition and collection of the revenue.

By a logical extension of the Senate conclusions, it would follow that the Senate could

(1) increase or decrease taxation;
(2) increase or decrease appropriations;
(3) alter the purposes of appropriations;

At best, Mr. Speaker, Bill S-3 does this; at worst it appropriates new money, and this one of the things that Professor Driedger lists as an undesirable consequence if we were to give in to the Senate on this issue. I go on with the quotation:

(4) postpone the operation or limit the duration of taxation bills;
(5) alter the incidence of taxation;

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I found this article on the question of the right of the Senate to amend money bills extremely interesting. By implication, it confirms one of the solid facts of Commons-Senate relationships over the years, namely, that whatever power the Senate may have to deal with our bills it has no power to originate a money bill. That power rests solely with the House of Commons.

To come back to the nature of this bill, I know that the President of the Privy Council takes a view different from mine, and of course I think he is wrong. I think this is a money bill but he says it is just a case of putting money that has already been appropriated somewhere else. But if the Dominion Coal Board were to go out of business, the money allocated to it would lapse. It would not be available, and therefore what would be required would be a new appropriation to make it possible for the money to be spent in some other way.

This is an appropriation bill, and in terms of the Standing Orders as well as all the theory of representative government, it is a matter which should originate in this House of Commons. I hope Your Honour will so find. I hope, too, that on the basis of Your Honour's finding this House will refuse to receive this bill from the Senate but will give it back to the government so that it may be introduced in the proper manner in this House of Commons.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought it apparent that what the government has done is not acceptable. I submit that they should have moved by way of supplementary estimates, with an item of $1, as they did at the last session when transferring unused funds for a different purpose. I do not think that the Section 81(1) has any bearing because it refers to a sort of "class B" Crown Corporation. Here, in the House of Commons, we must receive a recommendation for appropriation, and this was not done. If this proposal is accepted it is possible that we might find moneys which were allocated for one purpose but unused, being diverted to another purpose which had never been considered by this House. I would say that the limitations imposed upon the Crown are binding in this case. The bill should not have started in the Senate but should have come here in the normal course of events with the usual notation "for discussion and disposal".

Mr. Speaker: I should like to thank hon. members for their learned contributions to a very interesting debate. I shall spend some time studying the arguments and precedents brought forward by hon. members and give my ruling as soon as possible.

INVESTIGATION OF DEATH OF TROUT

Question No. 85—Mr. Harding:

Has the Department of Fisheries and Forestry undertaken an investigation of the thousands of dead trout fish along a four-mile stretch of the Sable River on the south coast of Prince Edward Island and, if so what are the results of this investigation?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes. Fish kill was detected almost immediately on August 25, 1969, by patrol officers in the DeSable River. Some flounders were killed in the tidal portion of the stream and several thousand speckled trout above in the size range 1½" to 12". This is a small stream of average width of eight feet and depth of two feet, infrequently visited by anglers. The source of the kill was located about four and a half miles upstream.

This source was pollution emanating from emptied agricultural pesticide bags and containers, including DDT. Aquatic life in the stream was normal above this point for the remaining several miles.

Water is taken from the stream in the vicinity of the source of pollution for use in spraying equipment by a number of farms. An intensive investigation failed to provide the identity of the person responsible for the violation. The Department is conducting a very comprehensive program with a view of stamping out the release in streams of these deleterious materials related to agricultural activities.

Warner's travel expenses to the Arctic to examine the scene where an oil barge was crushed and sunk near Melville Island.

2. Professor Warner was unable to locate the oil slick in flights over the scene. 6. If these are not the correct figures, has the group policy been farmed out and on what basis?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. No. Members of the Canadian Forces designed a self-paid group insurance plan for the specific needs of the serviceman. The Chief of the Defence Staff will sign the contract on behalf of the serviceman. The expenditure of public funds is not involved in this proposal.

2. The value of the insurance and the premiums are individual based on age, income, family status and years of service. Since it is a vountary program the number of participants cannot be forecast and thus the aggregate amount of protection is unknown.

3. The plan was offered to all federally registered insurance companies. A consortium, of which Maritime Life Assurance Company of Halifax was a member, was eventually accepted.

4. John Hancock Mutual Life Assurance Company of Boston is the principal shareholder of Maritime Life Assurance Company of Halifax.

IMPORTS—DESIGNATION AS TO SOURCE OF ORIGIN

Question No. 234—Mr. Gleave:

1. Which imports coming into Canada are not labelled to be specifically identified as to source of origin and for what reasons?

2. Is the Government of Canada giving favourable consideration to requiring Australian beef imported into Canada to be labelled as to source of origin?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): 1. The following is a list of categories of imported goods which are not required to be marked as to country of origin: (a) Goods for use by the trade which are not normally considered to be consumer goods. The Marking of Imported Goods Order was passed by Order in Council under the authority of section 15 of the Customs Tariff, to provide for country of origin marking of certain consumer goods so that the ultimate purchaser or consumer could determine the origin of an article if he so desired, and was not intended to be a protection for manufacturers or a form of trade barrier. (b) Goods that are only partially manufactured before importation or are components to be further manufactured or to be incorporated into other goods in Canada. To require goods of this nature to be marked could result in goods of substantial Canadian manufacture being sold on the domestic and world markets as the produce of the country of origin of the imported part. (c) Goods imported by individuals or institutions for their own use such as antiques, gifts, personal effects, bequests and donations to institutions. In instances of this nature, the importers are also the ultimate consumers and are aware of the origin of the goods by virtue of the importation effected. (d) Goods imported on a temporary basis or in transit through Canada. Importations of this nature usually do not become the property of anyone in Canada and in most instances remain under Customs control while in Canada. Departmental Memorandum D42 established by Order in Council P.C. 1963-1775, December 5, 1963, as amended, contains the Marking of Imported Goods Order including a Schedule of the goods to which this Order applies.

2. Importations of beef from Australia, as well as from other countries whose system of meat inspection is satisfactory to the Government of Canada, are presently subject to country of origin labelling in accordance with Part VI of the Meat Inspection Regulations. Section 87(1) states in part: "Except as provided in this Part, products are not eligible for importation into Canada unless (b) there is securely applied to the meat product and to the package and container thereof (iii) the name of the country of origin preceded by the words 'product of', except that where the name of the country of origin appears as part of an official stamp or brand of the national government and such name is prominently displayed, the words 'product of' may be omitted from the marking." The Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise co-operate with the Department of Agriculture in the administration of the parts of the Act dealing with imports and exports of meat. Regulations pertaining thereto were passed by Order in Council P.C. 1959-192, February 19, 1959, as amended, and are published in departmental Memorandum D55-18.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. Following normal business practice, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation advertised its requirements for executives where this appeared most practical or necessary to find the talent required to fill the position and no advertising was considered necessary, particularly in the case of urgent and limited term requirements in this period of transition, where personnel with known skills and experience were immediately available from within the fishery and the fish trade community.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

SALES AND SPECIAL COMMODITY TAXES—INQUIRY AS TO REVIEW

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question relating to finance. I do not know whether as a result of the white paper on taxation the Prime Minister and his finance minister have sought refuge or are away celebrating. In view of the statement by the Minister of Finance that the government will review its sales and special commodity taxes as soon as Parliament and the country have digested the white paper proposals, will somebody say when the review will get under way and how it will proceed? Will we have a white paper with regard to these taxes and, if so, when?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the department will be responding to questions tomorrow.

An hon. Member: Tomorrow?

Mr. Stanfield: The department is supposed to be responding to questions today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: We might as well have had a holiday today. They are all away.

Mr. Crouse: You are the government; you are running the country.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Give your leader a chance. He needs it.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am delighted by the co-operative attitude shown by the government house leader. I have a supplementary question for the appropriate minister when he comes into the House to answer. Is it the position of the government of Canada that Parliament should be asked to consider proposals like those in the white paper without having had an opportunity to examine and consider in the same context changes in the sales and special commodity taxes, which the government intends to consider?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if I may correct my previous answer, the House will not be sitting tomorrow so it will respond to the question on Wednesday.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN TAKE-OVERS OF CANADIAN FIRMS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising from a report by the anti-combines branch which showed an alarming increase in take-overs in Canada as well as an alarming increase in the merger of Canadian firms. Is the minister considering the establishment of an agency or other body within his department to supervise foreign take-overs of Canadian firms and to limit such take-overs if it is in the public interest to do so?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the comment in the report tabled the other day arose out of a study prepared for the Economic Council of Canada which was published some months ago. The recommendations of the study were taken into account in the recommendations that the Economic Council of Canada made with regard to competition policy. The implications of the report, the implications of the merger movement in Canada and of the take-over movement, are being considered in our proposed revisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the minister's answer correctly, he said that all these things are now being studied by his department. Can he inform the House when he expects the studies in this important field to be concluded and whether he expects to bring in legislation to deal with these matters?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne indicated that we will be introducing amendments to the Combines Investigation Act during the present session.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

POST OFFICE

PARCEL DELIVERY—INCREASE IN SERVICE BY BUS COMPANIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, since so many ministers are absent may I direct my question to the Postmaster General. It is prompted by information that certain bus companies are expanding their parcel delivery system in anticipation of increased demand for their services because of high rates and the lack of dependability of delivery by the Post Office. Can the minister advise if he or any of his 15 task forces are contemplating the withdrawal of the Post Office from the parcel post business?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST FOR TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR COMMITTEE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the Public Accounts Committee has a vast amount of work facing it, a fact that was drawn to the government's attention only last week, and since no action has yet been taken, will the Acting Prime Minister see to it that the required terms of reference to the Public Accounts Committee are brought in as speedily as possible in order that we, the members of the committee, can not only get on with the work ahead of us but obtain fresh authority to bring in a report on the work we finished prior to the recess?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to look into the matter.

PROPOSED MONTREAL BYLAW

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Can he tell us whether the authorities of the city of Montreal have asked the advice of his department concerning the bylaw which it is on the verge of passing in connection with demonstrations and public meetings which will from now on be banned in the city?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rondeau: I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Does he believe that the Montreal bylaw is constitutional?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this question is still—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will admit that the question is out of order.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the apparently sweeping nature of the proposed bylaw to ban demonstrations in Montreal and its possible implications with respect to freedom of speech and freedom of assembly guaranteed by the Canadian Bill of Rights, will the Minister of Justice look into this question and consider making a statement to the House on the constitutional aspects of the bylaw?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, since the bylaw is still before the city council of Montreal, I doubt whether it would be appropriate for me at this time to say much about it. I have asked to see a copy of the text of the bylaw. Of course, whether such bylaw is constitutional or not will depend, in the final analysis, on what the courts might say about it if it were challenged. If the bylaw were challenged it might, at that point, give an opportunity to the Attorney General of Canada to decide whether to intervene.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LAYING OF WREATH AT WAR MEMORIAL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can he advise the House what minister is to lay the wreath tomorrow at the war memorial on behalf of the government of Canada?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will be the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain why the Prime Minister himself will not be laying the wreath?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

CONSERVATION OF RESOURCES OF SEA, CONTROL OF POLLUTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are absent, may I direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the hon. gentleman anything to report on the outcome of discussions held over the weekend between the Prime Minister and U Thant on the proposed conservation of our sea resources as well as methods for controlling pollution of the high seas?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): No, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to report at this time.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECURITIES COMMISSION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the list of legislation tabled by the Prime Minister on opening day does not contain any reference to a bill dealing with a Canadian or national securities commission, does that mean the minister has abandoned any thought of establishing such a commission? Will he report to the House what progress he has made since the month of June with regard to obtaining consent for the establishment of such a commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. The answer to the second part is that we are still considering our position within the government.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ACHIEVEMENT OF QUOTA IN UNITED APPEAL CAMPAIGN

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Did the Public Service division of the United Appeal achieve its quota in the recent Red Feather drive. If so, will the government issue a statement to counteract the impression left on a recent television program that the Public Service division was in large part responsible for the failure to meet the United Appeal quota?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): According to my information on the subject, Mr. Speaker, the Public Service employees have not only reached but oversubscribed the objective set for them in this joint appeal, and it might be a good idea to take up the hon. member's suggestion and issue an official statement about it.

[English]

ALLEGED LACK OF EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Since he is absent may I direct the question to an appropriate minister of the government who can take it as notice. In view of the statement over the weekend by the chairman of the Public Service Commission of Canada alleging a lack of equality in employment opportunities for women in the Canadian Public Service, will the minister look into this matter and make an early statement in the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question in the form it was asked is in order. The hon. member should ask his question directly, instead of seeking a comment from the minister about a statement made outside the House.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY—CONSIDERATION OF RAISING OF AGE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It has to do with Criminal Code reforms to be brought in to comply with recommendations of the Committee on Juvenile Delinquency. Is the Minister of Justice considering amendment of the Criminal Code so that the age at which a person may be convicted for an offence will be raised from seven years, the present age, to twelve years. Will he also be considering section 13, the exception clause?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are studying all aspects of that report.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. No bill has yet been brought down, but in the contemplated reform of the Criminal Code, will this aspect be dealt with?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member will have to wait and see. It may be in that bill or in another bill to be introduced by my colleague, the Solicitor General.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's answer and the convictions registered against youths, would he consider referring my bill to amend sections 12 and 13 of the Criminal Code to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, whatever procedure we may want to adopt, I certainly will do everything I can to make sure that the provisions of the hon. member's bill receive early consideration by the committee. I do not know whether I can influence the deliberations of that committee. The hon. member is a very prominent member of it.

COMBINES

RETAIL GASOLINE TRADE—MACKENZIE REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO FINDINGS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On March 6 last the minister told the House that the research division of the Combines Investigation Branch was conducting an examination of the MacKenzie report to the provincial government of Alberta in respect of the retail gasoline trade. He stated also at that time that the report was being referred to the Economic Council of Canada. Can the minister now say whether the examination of the MacKenzie report has been completed by these two bodies, and can he also state whether we may expect the findings to be communicated to this House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The Economic Council in its report published last August commented on the problems and some of the trade practices raised not only in the MacKenzie report but in the T.B.A. report and the B.C. report, all of which dealt with similar trade practices engaged in by the oil companies. As I said earlier today, we are considering the report of the Economic Council leading toward a revision of the Combines Investigation Act.

With regard to the MacKenzie report, I want to make it very clear that many of its recommendations do not fall within the jurisdiction of either the Combines Investigation Act, no matter how worded, or within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Many of these recommendations with regard to licensing, terms of chattel mortgages or leases, are purely provincial matters.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact this question is of the utmost importance, particularly to those who are involved in the gasoline trade, is the minister prepared to introduce this subject to Parliament by means of a white paper or some other parliamentary procedure?

Mr. Basford: My preference would be to act more quickly than that and introduce an anti-combines revision act.

Mr. Mazankowski: In light of the fact Imperial Oil has launched an intemperate attack on the MacKenzie report, can the minister advise whether in fact this or any other company made representations to his department—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This supplementary should be placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the minister is from Vancouver I wish to ask, in view of the large initiation fee Vancouver has to pay to enter the National Hockey League, whether he will investigate the N.H.L. under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the law is clear that professional sports do not fall within the Canadian Combines Investigation Act. As the hon. member may have noticed, I had some discussions on this subject a few days ago in Washington and I stated some months ago in Toronto the onus was on professional sports leagues to show why they should not be included in a revised Combines Investigation Act.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED CURTAILMENT OF RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the deep concern felt by railway workers over the applications by the two railways to abandon passenger services and in view of requests by the unions representing these workers that hearings on these applications be held in public, will the government do what it can to see to it that these requests are met?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have the matter looked into.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—METHOD OF SELECTING MONTREAL CONTRACTOR

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. It is based on the report that the government, in hot pursuit of its program of austerity, awarded a contract for $27 million to a Montreal firm for the construction of buildings in the city of Ottawa. Can the minister advise if this contract was awarded by tender or by closed invitation?

Mr. Speaker: I think this question should be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency about the matter, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

MANPOWER

JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): My question is to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the growing concern about the number of non-Canadians on the faculties of Canadian universities and the lack of job opportunities for Canadians at the graduate and post-graduate level, can the minister tell the House if his department has in existence any programs designed to provide placement for the highly educated unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: Similar questions have been asked in the past. It has always been the view of the Chair that information of this kind should be given by ministers by way of a statement on motions. Perhaps the question might be asked in those terms.

Mr. Comeau: Would the minister be prepared to make a statement on motions regarding this problem?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the problem my hon. friend mentions. I will seek some opportunity to give the information that I have available on this point.

DRUGS

LSD—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of recent hospital reports of an alarming increase in emergency treatment of young people suffering from the effects of LSD, as well as four deaths in the last month, is the minister considering the taking of early action on the legislative level?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, despite the tragedy of the particular instances which the hon. member has brought to the attention of the House, it is still the intention of the government to await the report of the task force under the chairmanship of Dean Le Dain of Osgoode Hall Law School. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is awaiting his report on the non-medical use of drugs. I think that is the position at the moment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PURPOSE OF VISIT BY MINISTER TO MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to inform the House as to the purpose of the visit by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Middle East?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Acting Prime Minister in a position to inform the House as to which countries the minister will be visiting while in the Middle East?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, but I will be glad to have that information brought forward on Wednesday.

[Later:]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I answered two questions addressed to me. I was under the impression the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs was not in the House. I notice he is in the House and perhaps he could be permitted to give fuller answers to those questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is going to Iran, Israel and the United Arab Republic.

The purpose of his trip is to respond to the invitation extended by the Foreign Affairs ministers of these three countries and, naturally, to inquire in the field on the problems facing those countries.

The object of his mission is necessarily a peaceful one, even if it is not necessarily a peace mission.

[English]

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wanted to ask a question relating to external affairs but apparently there is no one in the House to answer. I think this is a day on which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is supposed to respond to questions. He was here earlier. Perhaps his Parliamentary Secretary could inform the House whether a chairman of the board of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has yet been appointed to replace the chairman who resigned a number of months ago?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will be pleased to bring that question to the attention of the minister, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Postmaster General. In view of the increasing number of Canadians who are deprived of letter carrier delivery service under the existing rules of the Post Office, does the minister or the government have under consideration the complete abolition of mail delivery to individual premises across Canada in order that all discrimination can be eliminated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question appears to be in argumentative terms.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF LANCASTER HOSPITAL

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): My question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. With regard to the take-over of the Lancaster veterans hospital, which is the subject matter of a pending question on the late show this week by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, will the minister satisfy himself that the heavy lay-offs of staff from this hospital are in accordance with civil service guarantees?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): As the hon. member has said, Mr. Speaker, this whole matter will be discussed on the late show some time this week, perhaps this evening. With regard to the lay-offs, I wish to assure the hon. member that all due precautions and notices have been given. We do not know as yet how many lay-offs there will be. What we did send out last week were notices to those who may be surplus. It is very possible those who have received such notices will fit into other positions.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Tomorrow being Remembrance Day, I wonder if I might ask the hon. gentleman a question which is of concern to many veterans. When the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs finishes the work it is now doing in connection with the Pension Act, will the government be prepared to refer to that committee a study of the War Veterans Allowance Act?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has already announced—in fact, he did so on June 16 before the adjournment of the previous session—that the whole fabric of social legislation in this country is under review by the government. As soon as this review has been completed announcements will be made at the proper time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RAILWAY ACT

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY OF CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION RESPECTING TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE TOLLS

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications) moved the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill C-11, to amend the Railway Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is merely to extend the regulating powers of the Canadian Transport Commission with regard to telecommunications companies whose activity falls within its jurisdiction. Before going into the reasons for this initiative, I should like to say a few words about the Canadian telecommunications industry and existing regulating powers.

Our industry represents a unique combination of the public and private sectors which, through the years, has allowed the setting up in Canada of one of the best telecommunications system in the world. Thanks to their efforts of voluntary co-operation, those companies which, in this respect deserve praise, have managed to set up an integrated national system that meets the nation's economic and social needs. The most recent addition to this family of companies is, naturally, Telesat Canada. A few months ago we made a review of the plans for integrating the new satellite technology into the complex cable and microwave network we already have. It behoves us all to pursue our overall plan and use our authority in such a way that the Canadian telecommunications network may be even more efficient, more flexible and surer in the future.

[English]

Turning now, Mr. Speaker, to the regulatory situation, radio matters as such are exclusively under federal jurisdiction. So, also, are the affairs of telecommunications companies operating under federal charter, of which the most prominent are Bell Canada, CN/CP Telecommunications and the British Columbia Telephone Company.

The implementation of this federal jurisdiction in terms of legislation has been I think it is fair to say, rather limited. Apart from broadcasting, the regulation of telecommunication has been confined largely to a detailed technical control of the use of radio, a rate setting activity in the public telephone and telegraph field, a control over submarine cables used for external telecommunication, and other matters covered by special acts.

Under the Railway Act, the Canadian Transport Commission regulates telephone and telegraph rates charged to the public but not the rates for services where no charge is made to the public. These latter services are usually referred to in the jargon as private wire services. They include such things as networks for TV distribution, Telex and TWX, data transmission for computers, air traffic control voice circuits, etc. There is a limited element of competition among the providers of these private services, whereas the telephone service is considered a natural monopoly. It is to these private wire services that the bill would extend the jurisdiction of the Transport Commission.

As I am sure hon. members know, the pace of technological development in telecommunication has been accelerating at an exceptional rate with the result that this technology is being applied to practical use at a rate that often exceeds the ability of legislators and administrators to assess the long term implications. I need only mention, as an example, the wide band cables which in a short space of time have been established to bring many TV channels into our homes and which can bring many other types of service as time goes on. This same cable technology will be used to provide thousands of telephone and data transmission paths within and between cities.

If the government's regulatory structure is not geared to keep pace with these industrial changes, both in terms of competence and basic philosophy, then logical, well-planned and orderly development will be impeded.

It was with all of these factors in mind that earlier this year I established a telecommission which has as its objective the production of facts and recommendations in this whole field. Already this body has organized some 50 separate studies involving many interested parties engaged in various disciplines throughout the country.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask leave of the House to have a document setting out the work of the telecommission printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kierans: There are copies in English and in French.

[Editor's Note: For text of document referred to see Appendix A.]

Mr. Kierans: When the work is completed and evaluated, toward the end of next year, the government will make known its general intentions on telecommunications policy and legislation. We do not pretend that such policy can be fixed in all respects or endure for a long period of time; the art is too fluid and concepts are being challenged continuously. However, it will be essential to have a sufficient degree of stability to allow the industry to continue their long term planning with certainty.

I think I have said enough about the general position in which we find ourselves, and where we plan to go during the next few years. If developments were not so rapid, I could stop here and have this regarded as a progress report on our activities. However, nothing stands still.

Among the many developments taking place in the telecommunications industry few are more striking than the growth of private wire services. They have been growing at the rate of up to 20 per cent a year and today the private wire services of federally regulated companies account for some $90 million. This rate of growth will not only continue but will increase particularly as a result of the development of computer service companies which operate on-line time-shared computers linked to distant customers by communication systems. The present value of all types of computers installed in Canada is estimated at about $800 million and is forecast to exceed $1 billion by the end of 1970.

The development of private wire networks is important in itself. It is important also in relation to the general networks which are regulated in the public interest, through private networks are, at present, not so regulated. The same communication companies operate both regulated networks and unregulated private networks. In the case of CN-CP, for example, close to 75 per cent of the revenue of this company derives from its private wire offerings.

• (4:00 p.m.)

It is inherently unsatisfactory for a body such as the CTC to be charged with regulating only one position of a particular company's business. In terms of the rates charged to users, the relationship between the regulated and unregulated operations of a company can be decisive. In this connection, I should mention that the CTC in its recent decision on the rate application by Bell Canada requested that company to produce a revenue and cost breakdown both of its regulated and its unregulated operation.

[Translation]

Most hon. members are aware, I am sure, of the enormous possibilities of electronic data processing. Before long, computer systems will cover the whole country and will be used extensively for storing, distributing and communicating information as well as scientific, medical, educational, legal, accounting statistics and others. Already, improvements which will increase considerably the storing and research capacity of computers can be foreseen. Used jointly with today's highly complex telecommunication system, the whole thing becomes a powerful instrument which, well managed, may strongly influence Canada's development. In that respect, the proposed amendment is designed to enable the Commission to determine an equitable rate applicable to the private wires which intervene in computer communications with other services, and to make sure that all users of the private wire service will get equitable non discriminatory treatment. Such an amendment will entitle the Canadian Transport Commission to examine the complete range of the activities carried out by the telecommunications companies falling under its jurisdiction. To that end, the definitions "telegraph toll" and "telephone toll" are amended by clause 1 of the bill.

The charges collected by the cable television firms from their customers are expressly excluded from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission, since they come under the Canadian Radio Television Commission.

[English]

I have much pleasure in moving the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the minister for going into orbit for the first time, I think, as a sort of custodian or guardian angel of the Railway Act. I have watched with interest the expansion of his empire as, by order in council, those responsibilities which heretofore were held by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) have come under his careful scrutiny.

I suppose it is only proper that the empire of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) should be expanded, because after all he has done so remarkably well in the Post Office Department that he should be given greater opportunities to serve and to expedite! I did not realize how ambitious were his plans for new empires until I returned to the precincts of Parliament Hill this fall, when on visiting the men's room outside the door to this chamber I discovered that about a fourth of the floor space had been pre-empted. When I asked about this I was told it was to be the new domain of the Minister of Communications. So, the expansion is indeed physical as well as intellectual and jurisdictional.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The information is false.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have been corrected, Mr. Speaker, and I stand corrected. As I stand crowded in the future I will remember that it is not this minister but the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) who is responsible. I should not have been building for the Minister of Communications a larger empire than he has; I should have known better than to think that he needed help from me in that particular regard.

At some time we will be looking forward to what is supposed to be in the wind, a confrontation of Imperia between those who are supposed to be the consuls of the new Information Canada empire—the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) and the Minister of Communications. This confrontation will be extremely interesting.

On looking at Bill C-11 I thought it was very straightforward and innocuous, not a piece of legislation that would evoke a great deal of wide ranging discussion. But never has so seemingly a straightforward and innocuous piece of legislation evoked such an explosion of ideational projection as that which has just been delivered. I suppose that old habits die hard. It is said that once you learn to write you never forget. I suppose once you learn to sky-write you never forget that either, and the minister is an expert at sky-writing. He has expertise in his office, and perhaps there are some appropriate speeches left over. Who knows what opportunities must be seized to make use of them?

I had not expected that in this legislation the minister would find an opportunity to expatiate upon the telecommission or Telesat. I thought he might more likely have told us about his own "Dial a Message" service which he inaugurated, perhaps anticipating the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) in this regard. When the minister finally got to the legislation, I think he said nothing to which I would find serious reason for taking exception. I think this is just a piecemeal beginning.

As we mentioned to the minister many times during the past session, there is a crying need for a more thorough going operation in the realm of regulation in the whole field of telecommunications. For a time it seemed as if the minister was not seized with the importance of this, but with the appointment of the telecommission I am satisfied that he has now come to a recognition of the great importance of putting into one framework the relationship between regulation and operation in this tremendously important field.

I am sure that some of my colleagues who are very well informed on this subject may wish to address themselves to this legislation. I will look forward to later opportunities, at various stages of the bill's passage, to express further views thereon.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the minister say at the commencement of his remarks that Canada has one of the best telecommunications systems in the world, I wondered whether he and I were living on the same planet. One Saturday morning this summer, while spending some time in my constituency, I wanted to do what has been for at least 100 years a relatively simple task: I wanted to send a telegram to the city of Yorkton, Saskatchewan, approximately 300 miles from Winnipeg. I phoned the Canadian Pacific telegraph office, since Yorkton is on the CP line, and I was told that although they could take my message they could not tell me, in view of the cut-back in services, whether the CP telegraph office in Yorkton was open, and consequently did not know whether my message would be delivered before Monday morning. So, when the minister tells us we have one of the best telecommunications systems in the world he and I must be talking about a different company.

Railway Act

The purpose of this bill apparently is a very simple one, to extend the authority of the CTC under the provisions of the Railway Act to regulate and set the tolls charged by the telegraph or telephone companies to private wire services. I submit it is not nearly as simple a proposal as the minister puts forward. I believe the cabinet, having made a very serious mistake in January of this year, is now proposing legislation in an effort to get itself out of a somewhat difficult situation. On January 28, 1969 the cabinet passed an order in council, one paragraph of which I should like to read:

> That after exploring a number of alternatives and following extended negotiations, it was concluded that the purpose of CN/CP Telecommunications would best be served by accepting a proposal to acquire a 51% interest in Computer Sciences (Canada) Limited;

It is because the cabinet permitted that acquisition that we are in this difficulty and have to pass this legislation. I submit, however, that it is not in the best interests of the computer companies of Canada nor of the ordinary people of Canada. This was done at the same time the anti-combines division of the government was holding an inquiry into the defects, if there are any, in permitting Bell Canada to own a wholly owned subsidiary, Northern Electric Company. The Bell-Northern Electric inquiry was held because Northern Electric is a manufacturer, as is Computer Sciences Limited. The inquiry by the anti-combines division is for the purpose of examining the relationship of Bell, as a monopolistic buyer of communications equipment, and Northern Electric which apparently is a subsidiary of Bell and a manufacturer of this equipment. One section of the government apparently has some doubt about the good sense of permitting Bell, a communications carrier, to own Northern Electric while another section of the government, in this case the cabinet, has permitted CN-CP Telecommunications to purchase a computer company, which I submit is in precisely the same position in relation to it as is Northern Electric to Bell Canada.

Not only was it probably a mistake to have permitted this, but I submit, having permitted it, the government will find that Bell Canada will now follow the example of the CN-CP Telecommunications and want to engage in the same business of transmitting computer information from one city to another. The government took this action in the full knowledge that the private computer companies of Canada objected to it and made their position very clear in a brief which they submitted to a number of cabinet ministers, including the Minister of Communications. In their brief the companies suggest that the government investigate the competitive nature of CN Telecommunications and the public communications arm of Canadian Pacific, the relationship between the Canadian and United States Telex networks, the adequacy of existing telecommunications, the relationship of unregulated and regulated aspects of common carriers to computer uses, common carrier rates and tariffs and the possibility of the federal government becoming more involved in communications and the security of data sent by common carriers. They point out that there was a similar proposal in the United States to the U.S. Federal Communications Commission from the Department of Justice.

Despite this, the Canadian cabinet permitted this acquisition by CN-CP Telecommunications. The brief quotes from a submission to the United States Federal Communications Commission from the Department of Justice which says that common carriers may use tariff restrictions as a means of placing independent data processors at a disadvantage if allowed to enter the computer time-sharing field. It goes on to say that communications common carriers should not be allowed to use their monopoly position in the field of providing circuits to extend their influence into areas not necessarily included in the monopoly.

I submit that the cabinet has permitted CN-CP Telecommunications to do what no other telecommunications system has been permitted to do. In the Montreal Gazette of February 27, 1969 the vice-president of the CPR, Mr. W. J. Stenason, is reported to have told a press conference that this is the first time anywhere in the world computer systems and communications services have been integrated, despite the fact that they are ideal partners. That, of course, is Mr. Stenason's opinion. I submit it was a mistake to permit this purchase by CN-CP Telecommunications. It is a merger which will not benefit the people of Canada. I submit that when the minister suggests he wants the CTC to regulate these operations, he really is saying there will be no regulation at all. I suggest that the record of the Board of Transport Commissioners, the commission which preceded the CTC, the record of the CTC and of its highly priced and highly influential but in my opinion hardly objective president, has been one of complete failure in protecting the interests of the citizens of Canada. Whether you look at the failure of the regulatory commission to protect the interests of the people in respect of railway services or whether you look at its complete failure to protect the interests of the ordinary people in respect of telephone rates, it is a history and a record of complete failure.

I have said on another occasion, and I repeat it, that the office of the Board of Transport Commissioners and the office of the Canadian Transport Commission might just as well be at the head office of the CPR or Bell Telephone because that Board has never done very much to protect the interests of the ordinary people. The Board of Transport Commissioners and the Canadian Transport Commission have been given, by government legislation, the task of making sure the interest of the public are protected on matters of rates and service. They are quasi-judicial bodies, but there is no evidence at all that they have really protected the rights of the people they are supposed to protect. Unlike regulatory bodies of a comparable nature in other countries which vigorously dig out the facts regarding the financial positions of public utilities, the Canadian agencies have played the very passive role of merely assessing the information submitted to them in the hearings which they hold on very rare occasions. The result has been a most uneven contest with organizations, such as the Canadian Association of Mayors and Reeves, having to pass the hat around to collect a few tens of thousands of dollars from their already strapped budgets trying to get the expert advice needed to counter the fantastic ability of Bell of Canada and, I submit now, of CN-CP Telecommunications to hire the best people to present their case.

It should be acknowledged that as a result of reconstituting the old Board of Transport Commissioners into the new Canadian Transport Commission, the CTC is now empowered to dig out the facts in the manner traditionally adopted by the U.S. regulatory bodies. However, there is no evidence that it has in fact done anything more than the old Board of Transport Commissioners. Every year, following rulings by the former board which entitled Bell to a certain rate of profit on its investment, Bell exceeded the level of earnings permitted by the Board of Transport Commissioners. From 1958 into the middle of the 1960's Bell's excess profits which were extracted, I submit, illegally and in violation of the Board of Transport Commissioners own rulings, amounted to some $37 million. When you consider that this amount remained after Bell paid the 50 per cent corporation tax, it is obvious that Bell extracted in that period, I submit illegally, about $75 million from the telephone users.

In 1964, the Board again reviewed the situation, but all it did was to permit Bell to continue legally to make the rate of profit over and above what had been permitted in the earlier rulings. This profit amounted to about 6.6 per cent, despite the earlier ruling of the Board of Transport Commissioners which permitted the Company to make a much lower rate of profit. Bell's defiance of the Board of Transport Commissioners continued into the period when parliament changed the set-up and established the Canadian Transport Commission with Mr. Pickersgill as its president. In its first full year of earnings after the 1966 ruling, Bell's profit levels were in the range of 6.7 per cent and 6.8 per cent. At that point the CTC stirred itself, and asked Bell what proposals for rate decreases it had in view of its excess earnings. Bell argued that because of the sharp rise in interest rates and increase in construction costs, their excessive profits were justified. The CTC like the Board of Transport Commissioners before it, accepted this explanation and agreed to tolerate profit levels in excess of the maximum which they had fixed in their own ruling a year earlier.

With that encouragement, Bell of Canada came back to the CTC and asked for new permissive rates of 8 or 9 per cent return on total average investment. To achieve this, Bell requested a general rate rise which would add 10 per cent or about $83 million to their revenues. These increases would have meant 40 cents to 70 cents a month increase for home telephones and approximately $1.30 to $2.95 for business telephones.

The CTC seemed to reject the Bell application but in fact, using a slightly different formula, it permitted Bell increases estimated to amount to $27 million a year. I submit, on the basis of past experience with Bell's calculations which have always erred on the side of conservatism when it suited Bell, that the rate increase which the CTC permitted, we will find, will not come to $27 million a year but probably to something in the neighbourhood of $35 million to $40 million a year. In making this decision, the CTC ignored Bell's relationship with Northern Electric. As has been suggested by a number of government agencies such as the Canadian Association of Mayors and Reeves, the Board refused to order an investigation into the accounting system of Bell so that the accounting system would show the division of costs between the regulated and unregulated aspects of Bell's business. This is essential for any commission to be in a position to determine the fair, reasonable and non-discriminatory rates in a regulated area. Furthermore, exact and complete particulars of the nature of Bell's investments should have been required.

Other information should have been required of the company, such as the detailed depreciated book value of all non-telephone communications, plant and equipment not regulated by the CTC; reports showing operating revenue for the same years produced by non-telephone plant and equipment; the relationship and transactions between Bell and the American Telephone and Telegraph Company; and the actual terms of the service agreement between these two companies. None of this information was requested by the Canadian Transport Commission or by its chairman, thereby following the completely passive role of the former Board of Transport Commissioners.

One should not be surprised that this board and its chairman—on the basis of our past experience with him—should have taken this passive approach. However, that does not absolve the government from appointing the kind of commission which has done the sloppy and passive job which I have indicated. The board did not look into the relationship between Bell of Canada and its subsidiary, Northern Electric. The United States authorities have prohibited and forbidden the kind of close relationship which exists between Bell of Canada and Northern Electric. The commission should have inquired into what amount in excess of fair prices was paid to Northern Electric by Bell and which may be buried in Bell's earning base or operating expenses. It should have investigated the dividend policy of Northern Electric. It is true that the commission has no direct control over Northern Electric, but since Northern Electric is a wholly owned subsidiary of Bell of Canada, obviously its financial position is extremely important because Bell can hide in the profits of Northern Electric a good part of what are supposedly its operating costs. It should have compared Northern Electric's rate of return with those of other telephone equipment makers. It should have demanded a cost of manufacturing study of Northern Electric by private groups to ascertain the precise level of mark-up or profit from its sales to Bell that may be embedded in Bell's operating expenses or earning base.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The Board should have determined whether funds spent by Northern for research and development were excessive in relation to other operating costs and whether these were included in the cost to Bell of materials and services purchased from Northern. None of these things were done by the CTC in the last inquiry which it held when Bell asked for an increase.

On the basis of my personal experience with the way the former commission failed to protect the interests of the consumer, of railway passengers, I am very skeptical that the CTC will look closely at the proposal of the CPR to abandon its transcontinental train service. I remember speaking to the Chairman of the former Board of Transport Commissioners in 1966 and asking him was he aware of the rumours then prevalent among CPR employees that the CPR intended to do away with the Canadian, its transcontinental train. The chairman told me he had no knowledge of this.

I pointed out to the then chairman that a couple of years previous to that the CPR operated two transcontinental trains, the Canadian which was then still in operation, and the Dominion. I reminded him that the CPR had applied to Board of Transport Commissioners for permission to withdraw the Dominion from service, that the board had refused the application, and that then the CPR had taken the dining car and sleeping car facilities away from the Dominion. I do not have to tell members of this House that there are very few people willing to travel from Montreal to Vancouver by train if they cannot get a meal on that train or a place to sleep. The inevitable result was that in about six months the Dominion attracted no passengers.

The CPR then came back to the board and said, "We want to discontinue the Dominion; we can show you that it has no passengers and that we are losing a great deal of money on it." The board did not ask, "Why has it no passengers? Why is it losing money?" The board did as it always did, it rubber-stamped the discontinuance of the Dominion.

On the basis of past experience with the Board of Transport Commissioners, I am very much afraid that in acting as a regulatory agency to protect the people of Canada the new board will behave as its predecessor, and will serve simply as an office boy for the companies it is supposed to regulate, the CPR, Bell Telephone and CN-CP Telecommunications. Indeed, I am very doubtful that the new board needs any more power, taking into account its high-priced, competent personnel, although I am not certain they are as competent on behalf of the Canadian people as they are on behalf of the companies that the Board is supposed to regulate.

In the past this Board has failed to use the power given to it to regulate telephone rates. In the past it has failed to use its powers to make the railways companies, in particular the CPR, live up to their commitments. The commitment by the CPR was in a contact which it made with the Canadian government and the people of Canada, a contract to provide adequate railway service. The CPR has now built up other interests and investments, but it should be remembered that these have been based almost exclusively on the grant of some 25 million acres of land, some of it the most valuable land in this country, given to the CPR about one hundred years ago as part of the price of persuading so-called free enterprisers to build a railway across Canada. In the light of this past experience I have no hope that the CTC will use the new powers which the minister proposes to give it to protect the interests of the consumers in this field, any more than it used its power to protect consumers in the past. This being the case I have to say to the minister that at the very least I am rather skeptical about the proposal he is making.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, in its outward appearance Bill C-11 might be one of those simple types of bills that are periodically brought before this House to tidy up matters and put certain things into focus. But in view of the statement which the minister has made, it is now clear that it is not a simple bill. It does not deal with a simple matter, but rather with something that is very complex, very sophisticated, and upon which a number of companies are spending a great deal of money.

At first glance it might appear that the bill deals with small, private telephone and telegraph companies which had been getting away with something that should not be permitted. However, from the minister's statement it would appear that the bill concerns important matters of transportation and communication and problems that have arisen with respect to the use of new types of communications now being employed by so many business organizations. Therefore, the bill is one that requires a great deal of thought and examination.

The authority of the Canadian Transport Commission is to be enlarged, and the explanatory note to clause 3 of the bill reads:

> This amendment would extend the non-discriminatory and just and reasonable rules application now "in respect of tolls" to services and facilities provided by a telegraph or telephone company.

The minister did not indicate in his statement to the House whether there had been any discrimination, or areas of dispute or complaint with respect to companies using services being provided by telephone and telegraph companies. I remember that when we were discussing amendments to the Telephone Act a few years ago a little bit of controversy arose between the cable television people and the Bell Telephone people with regard to the rental being charged by Bell Telephone for the services it provided for the cable television companies. Regulatory authority might be necessary in an area such as that.

But, Mr. Speaker, there must be other areas in which discrimination may have been practiced, areas that the minister did not tell us about, because a bill like this is not introduced in this House, all of a sudden without some reason other than that the industry has increased in size and complexity. Someone must have felt he had been over-charged or not properly served, and complaints must have been made to the department, to the government and to the Canadian Transportation Commission, thus making this bill necessary to bring all these companies under the control of the Canadian Transportation Commission.

I do not want to ramble around like the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), going into railway matters and all types and areas of communications and transportation. However, when the Canadian Transport Commission was established a few years ago we hoped for a tremendous improvement in dealing with problems, but at the present time we wonder whether they have the facilities to investigate questions like discrimination and toll charges. This is a very complex business and if the Commission is going to take these matters under consideration it may be necessary to double the staff and even hire experts to ensure the job is done properly. I am not so sure that we have seen very many concrete examples of the wonderful job the Transport Commission was supposed to do. By the time they get through dealing with railway complaints it is doubtful whether they will have time to go into the matters covered by this bill.

I hope that the many people involved in this type of business will receive notice well in advance so that they will have ample opportunity to prepare and present their cases before the committee. There will be arguments for and against the bill, but there is so much money involved—the minister indicated $90 million in one case and $100 million in the other—that I hope everyone involved will have enough time to prepare a case to help the committee examine the subject thoroughly before this bill finally becomes the law of the land. We look forward to a thorough and adequate discussion of this legislation at the committee stage.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in saying a few words on this Bill C-11 I am not interested in wire service or Telesat; I am only interested in getting the normal means of communication for the people I represent. The government can repeal paragraphs or sections of the Act to their heart's content, but it is obvious to me that if tolls are to be changed or approved or revised, there must be a service in the first place. I submit respectfully that this is not the case in the district I represent. The name of the Canadian Transport Commission is not one which is bandied about in a complementary way in the province of Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, because they continue to treat with apathy the services they are charged with providing for my province. I need not repeat statements about the action taken with regard to the railway passenger service in the province which has denied normal transportation services to many Newfoundlanders.

With regard to telephone service, another form of communication and one which falls within the responsibility of this Board, one would not believe the type of system that exists in many of the communities in the province. There are far too many communities limited to one telephone in a home or in a CNT office, where people have to travel as much as 10 to 14 miles to use it—that is if one is lucky enough to find the phone in working order.

And then again, Mr. Speaker, there are some communities which are really well supplied with CNT service. Some communities have 10 or 12 phones supplied by the good graces of the CTC, but they are all on the same line. Picture, if you will, Mr. Speaker, a community in Newfoundland in which someone gets sick and one has to call a doctor. The lack of medical services is one thing but the means of communication necessary to contact help in the case of an emergency is the responsibility of the department which controls the CNT. To deny any Canadian the right to this service is a shameful situation. Reference has been made to changes in tolls but in the isolated communities of Newfoundland the Company does not charge a toll, they charge by the pole. If anyone wants telephone services extended the charge is $85 a pole. So, why are we so concerned with amendments? Why is the CNT looking for approval or revisions? When is the government going to live up to their promise of equal opportunity for all Canadians regardless of where they live?

May I quote a few examples? I offer the little community of Trout River which is lucky enough to have a few telephones, but if people want to call an adjacent community about five miles away they have to use long distance. Then, there is the community just a stone's throw away from the city of Corner Brook where the storekeeper who has the phone has to pay 40 cents every time he wants to make a call. This is the latest type of telephone, Mr. Speaker, a radio-telephone. In this age of the satellite, Mr. Speaker, the government does not hesitate to spend millions upon millions of dollars to communicate around the world, but they evidently are not aware of the denial of the rights of many thousands of Newfoundlanders who do not have the basic necessity, a telephone.

And now we are coming up with a new scheme which is called Information Canada. This agency is going to inform all Canadians what the government is doing. Well, this Information Canada is not going to be of much help to many parts of Newfoundland, certainly not through the use of the telephone. But these people are getting information from their members of parliament because they know how to communicate directly with the people they represent. The Newfoundland members are interested in offering the involvement and participation that this government does not care to communicate to neglected Newfoundlanders.

I hesitate to criticize the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) in this regard, Mr. Speaker, but when one faces the daily frustrations resulting from the neglect of one's district through the failure to provide the basic right of normal communication services, it is pretty hard to accept. So, Mr. Speaker, I say if the passage of this bill will help provide the telephone service and the extension of these facilities to people who need them and must have them, by all means let us pass it. Let us do our duty to the Canadians we represent by providing this necessary service.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the House that when the minister speaks he closes debate.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have warm sympathy for the remarks made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). Recently, I had a discussion with the telephone companies and while it was not directly related to his riding, great emphasis was laid on the fact that services had to be improved and maintained, particularly in Labrador. We see all the common carriers from time to time and this is the position we take with all of them. Inevitably, this matter comes up and I might say that it is one of the strongest selling points for the satellite.

The satellite will make possible the extension of communication services to scattered areas, and throughout the north. It will make service available in both languages in accordance with national policy and will strengthen communications from one end of this country to the other. If common carriers are not willing to comply with requirements, having all the facilities at their disposal through satellite communication, my department will take very firm measures.

I should like to reply to the three members at one time, the hon. members for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and Wellington-Grey (Mr. Howe) and to thank them for their participation in this debate. I agree with some of the subsequent speakers in that I did not find the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North entirely relevant. We are not here to fight again the battle of increasing telephone rates or curtailing railway services before the CTC. It is not relevant. We are getting into a somewhat analogous situation. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, it is a very difficult issue and the Board itself is faced with some very complex questions. We cannot decide them now. So, I say to the hon. member that the position we presently find ourselves in is this: we want to introduce this amendment as a holding operation, pending a full scale review that will be placed before the House on what should be a telecommunications policy for Canada. With the gracious permission of hon. members I tabled today the document showing the scope and extent of the studies of that commission. Some 50 studies are going on, and involve participants both inside and outside the government.

I ask for the co-operation of all hon. members. If they think that this outline is not complete, and that the 50 studies do not encompass all the ramifications of the problem—and I am not certain that they do—I should appreciate hearing suggestions about areas we have overlooked.

At present we have in Canada a computer industry that is overwhelmingly United States owned. Do we want the services side of the industry also to be United States owned? If so, then it follows also that the location of all computer banks may inevitably have to be on a north-south orientation instead of an east-west orientation. We have not made up our minds yet as to whether we want to permit Canadian-owned common carriers to enter the computer services industry. If we do, under what conditions do we want them to enter? To what extent are we going to permit the structure of that particular telecommunications industry to be organized in the competitive, free enterprise area? To what extent are we going to demand that it be under monopoly control and how much of that monopoly will we attempt to regulate; also, how is it to be regulated? This industry is advancing so rapidly, as I was at great pains to point out, that instead of letting another 18 months go by before we have all these answers, we have simply said that for the time being we will conduct a holding operation. We will, during this period, attempt to develop a logical, coherent and rational policy we can lay before hon. members. We are giving priority to this particular aspect of the study and I think that some very serious questions will be posed in this House.

All I can say at present is that instead of waiting that 18 months and letting the industry become entrenched in new directions that we may find impossible to roll back, we think it is better to take advantage of the Canadian Transport Commission which we presently have at our disposal and bring this matter under the aegis and authority of the commission. It can regulate either for better or worse, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North suggests. But it will regulate the industry to some extent, and that is better than having no regulations at all. The bill, we frankly admit, is a short term solution being brought in now so that a long run solution and policy can be presented to this House.

Mr. Orlikow: Before he finishes, will the minister permit a question? When the 50 studies to which the minister referred are completed, will they be tabled and made available to members of this House and to the public, or will they be treated as so many other studies commissioned by the government have been, as internal documents not to be made available to the public?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, it is my policy and the policy of my department to table, as we did in the case of the post office, as many of these studies as we possibly can. The restrictions will of course be those that are imposed by the authors, restrictions that may be applied for reasons best known to themselves and may be designed to prevent personal criticism or criticism of, let us say, a particular aspect of an operation. For instance, the criticism might not serve the interests of the Canadian people because it might contribute in a material way to some decrease in morale within a department. But I would say that, generally speaking, the answer is that we intend to table as many of these studies as we can, if not all.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch)—housing—urban renewal, Vancouver—request for policy statement; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—social security—inquiry as to establishment of income floor; the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae)—veterans affairs—transfer of veterans hospital.

The House will now proceed to consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely: notices of motions.

[Mr. Kierans.]

NOTICES OF MOTIONS

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED INCREASED EXEMPTION FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to increasing the Income Tax exemption of all citizens from the date they start receiving their pension from $1,500 to $2,500, retroactive to January 1, 1969 in view of the spiralling cost of living during the past ten years, so as to prevent the tax burden from falling heavily on those no longer able to earn.

He said: The motion before us which I have had the honour to move is in effect a plea on behalf of all citizens in receipt of old age security pension to have their income tax exemption increased from the present $1,000 to $2,500, retroactive to January 1, 1969.

I am naturally pleased that this resolution is No. 1 on the order paper under private members' notices of motions and I express the hope that, knowing there could hardly be a dissenting voice to the implementation of this measure in this first session of the twenty eighth parliament, the government will give it early consideration. This motion is, of course, principally designed to offer a modest relief to pensioners in general and to superannuates, most of whom have been suffering from the inflationary trend of consumers' prices prevailing in the economy.

Last Friday the government unveiled a tax reform program which will free some 750,000 low income Canadians; among this number there will be many of those whom this motion is designed to help. Nevertheless, the exemption for a single pensioner does not reach the $2,500 I am suggesting in this resolution.

In the white paper the Minister of Finance has acknowledged the need for an increase in tax exemption from $1,000 to $1,400 for a single person, but does not make any distinction between a young person in the prime of his productivity and a pensioner, a person who has reached the declining years and can only look forward to a bleak future. For what the minister has suggested in the overhauling of the tax system, I have nothing but praise The general effect is bound to be good; but it would have been a little better if he had taken into consideration the plight of those for whom I am speaking.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The purpose of this motion, however, is not to discuss the merits of the white paper on taxation in general, but I hope I am in order in pointing out what the white paper could have contained to help the pensioner with a low income. In passing, may I point out the pitiful situation in which retired civil servants find themselves, with a low fixed income eroded year after year by the spiralling cost of living.

If the pension dollar had the same purchasing value it had in the year 1959. I would not be introducing this motion at this time. However, I am thinking of the many thousands of pensioners, including the thousands of retired civil servants with an income of not much more than their pensions, for whom even the little assistance they may find in the modest exemption increase of $1500 in their personal income tax, would be of some help.

Life expectancy at age 65 is estimated at approximately 15 years. It is a small recognition to extend to those who will live beyond their retiring age the right to enjoy a few extra dollars saved from their income tax. It seems that whether or not we should seriously attempt to provide a measure of income below which no man or woman will fall is a social as well as an economic and moral question. I admit at once that the measure of relief which the motion under discussion will provide to pensioners is very small. Nevertheless, it is an admission that it is immoral to allow some Canadians to exist below an adequate level of income, while the majority live on a level of prosperity.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 13, 1969, speaking on "Expenditures and Guidelines" said, and I quote:

> We want to replace inefficient and outdated programs by new ones which will assist even more than now, low-income and destitute Canadians.

With the introduction of the suggestions contained in the white paper, it is evident the Prime Minister meant what he said on that occasion. However, the tax proposals in the document are not final. There will be ample time available for amendments since the date for the implementation of the tax reform is January 1, 1971 The head of our government always means what he says. He is not given to making promises, as everyone knows but everyone may not admit. He is a man of action, and I am encouraged to firmly believe that as soon as possible he will come through with a program which, in time, will dispense with the need of introducing resolutions such as this one. But, in the meantime, I submit to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) this modest proposal of giving those who have made their contribution to the sum total of our national development a little relief from the burden of taxation.

While I am proposing an increase in the personal income tax exemption for recipients of old age security pensions in general, I wish to add a word on behalf of the federal superannuates, for most of whom financial security has deteriorated considerably during the past few years on account of the escalation of the cost of living. I feel that the government should do something to alleviate their predicament by an upward revision of their pension benefits.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), speaking to the Canadian Pension Conference in Montreal last May, dealt with the subject of an increase in pensions to the retired civil servants. He contended that the government could not dip into funds of the superannuation account to pay an increase in pensions to retired civil servants and leave to the future the question of repaying the deficit that such an increase would create. If it did so, the minister stated, the statutes would require the government to make good this deficiency by budgetary charges, so this provides no easy way out for the government under the present budgetary system. Frankly, I have not been impressed by the minister's statement, however correct it might be. If to meet an obligation, and I feel it is a moral obligation if you will, the government has to make good whatever budgetary charges may be necessary, so what?

However, I have faith in a statement made by the Prime Minister shortly after he took office. He said he had arranged for a review of the costs and benefits involved in our social security system which could take into account the question of the difficulties now being experienced by those living on pensions.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), speaking at a conference of social workers a few days ago on the subject of justice to the poor, had this to say and I quote:

> That we should have poverty in Canada is, as the Economic Council has reported, a disgrace. The arguments of social academics, then, as to what constitutes the threshold of poverty, or whether there is a cycle of poverty, or whether most of the poor are found in the slums, or in the central city, or whether they are concentrated in areas of rural blight, appear not so much brutal, as banal. Poverty, simply enough, is pervasive; and poverty, unhappily enough, is present everywhere in Canadian society.
> You don't have to tell the poor what poverty is, they know. They feel it very painfully—the sense of hopelessness and helplessness. They understand the deprivation of denial. They know what it is like to live in decrepit housing, to have the cracked pavements of the streets as their only parks. They know what it means to be prey to debt and despair.

Senator David Croll, that great humanitarian, as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Poverty now holding hearings on the question of poverty in the various regions of Canada, three years ago headed a Senate committee on aging. His committee report recommended massive reforms in attitudes and assistance involving Canada's senior citizens. One was a suggestion that all Canadians at 65 should receive a guaranteed minimum income as a matter of right. This recommendation, as everyone knows, was finally adopted by the former Liberal government of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, in the form of a $30 supplement to the old age security pension to pensioners with no other income.

This was a breakthrough for all old people without income. It meant a minimum income of $1,260 for single persons and $2,220 for married couples. The committee also recommended the establishment of a technically competent body to study income needs and develop a socially acceptable minimum. Had such a committee been established it would undoubtedly have looked into the effect of personal income tax exemptions upon the aged whose means, other than their pensions, were limited.

I might add that Senator Croll's committee report fully justified the three years of study and research which went into its preparation. To my knowledge no previous attempt had ever been made to examine, as a whole, the problems facing aged Canadians. To those Senators who worked like beavers on this committee, parliament owes a debt of gratitude; certainly, a parliamentary committee of the House of Commons would not have the time to undertake this approach to the income needs of elderly people on a long term basis. It is to be regretted that notwithstanding such valuable work there are some who advocate the abolition of the Senate.

Few problems are worse than to be old without the means of sustaining a decent standard of living, especially if one suffers from poor health, as is often the case. Then again, those I have in mind are the people who suffer most when inflation robs them of a portion of their meagre incomes. I realize that the government has been busy trying to formulate a program limiting large new expenditures, and that it has been reluctant to give up any revenues until inflation has been brought under control. Nevertheless, bearing in mind the fact that wide ranging proposals for tax reform were made public last Friday, November 7, I suggest the effect of this motion will be very small indeed, and I therefore urge the government to give favourable consideration to its adoption tonight.

[Mr. Badanai.]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the calling of the hon. member's motion today has precipitated discussion in this House of part of the contents of the government's white paper on income tax. To this extent, one welcomes the motion.

I would say to the hon. member, however, that before we can possibly adopt this proposal, all the evidence will have to be available. Taking account of the proposals which now appear in the white paper to increase the allowances of all citizens to $1,400, one has to ask: what is the impact on the totality of revenue? The white paper says the cost would exceed $1 billion The provisions of the Income Tax Act, as they now stand, are such that the taxpayer receives an exemption of $1,500 if he is over 70. It was one of the conditions of the increase in the old age pension in 1964, whereby old age security benefits were made payable progressively over the next five years down to the age of 65, that the $500 exemption then applied to recipients of old age security over the age of 65. Any taxpayer over 65 was allowed the additional $500 personal exemption. But this did not apply to the spouse unless the spouse was an individual taxpayer. So a couple, in normal circumstances, received a personal allowance of $2,500.

The purport of the hon. member's motion would be to increase this to $5,000. Since no distinction has been made between taxpayers and non-taxpayers, his calculations may be somewhat affected by the proposals in the white paper. The proposal in that document is that the personal exemption of a couple shall increase to $2,800; the $500 which now comes into effect at the age of 70 if the person concerned is receiving old age security benefit, applies again only to the taxpayer. Thus, in the normal pensioner's household this would amount to $3,300. However, if the wife was in receipt of a separate income which resulted in her being an independent taxpayer, it would go up to $3,800.

I do not believe there are any hon. members in this House who are more conscious than any others of the burden imposed by inflation on persons of fixed incomes. I find it interesting that the hon. member, who was a parliamentary secretary and who is now an entirely private member on the government side, should be drawing attention in such clear and unmistakeable terms to the evils of inflation. The government, it would appear, has only recently been convinced of the seriousness of this problem, if we are to judge by the nature of the program it is advocating. Even three years ago we were brushed off whenever we drew attention to the dangers of inflation. I am glad to note that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) has come to the side of the growing number of people in this House who say that all else matters nought—that first, we must deal with inflation. This has been said by speakers on this side of the House for a long time—even before the change in pension arrangements made in 1964.

It seems to me, however, that the hon. member is destroying the equity of the tax system. It is proposed in the white paper that the system should be made more equitable by increasing the personal allowance to $1,400. I am not satisfied that this will be the result, because the $1,400 applies to a person who is in receipt of a very modest income as well as to a person who receives a very substantial income. Thus, in effect, the additional $400 exemption should be chargeable to the well-endowed taxpayer at his marginal rate.

The benefit bestowed by the $400 can be very high, as much as 50 per cent under the new rates. In other words, the tax benefit to an individual at the end of five years will be to the extent of $200. The additional $400 per taxpayer in the more modest income class can mean an $80 benefit if the tax rate is only about 20 per cent.

I would have been much more interested in seeing the hon. member put forward a proposal for a tax credit at the age of 65. I am referring to a tax credit which can be computed as a target rate, shall I say, for a mean income. By that I mean a standard income, not the very modest or low income. It would be more valuable to persons of lower income.

Let us suppose you give $150 in cash by way of a tax credit to a man who has an income of $3,500. These figures are taken out of thin air purely by way of illustration. This sum would represent to this person a nice little gift. On the other hand, in the case of a person of the same age and with the same entitlement, but whose income is $15,000, what does this $150 mean to him? To this extent a payment or tax credit to the taxpayer of more modest means would tend to make the tax system more equitable.

This is a personal view, Mr. Speaker. I have a preference for the tax credit system over a personal allowance. It is contended that a tax system must be equitable, but my own view is that the tax system must not inhibit economic growth. If it does, then it becomes very difficult even to maintain equity within the system. Equity is important, yes—terribly important; but I do not think it outranks all other considerations, as some people have indicated.

I also wonder whether or not the hon. member should have put a dollar figure on his proposal. For example, how many taxpayers would there be at age 65—in this particular case, at age 70—who would receive this exemption? If millions of dollars of revenue were lost or diverted as a result of this proposal, where would it go? We must bear in mind that income tax yield seems to be an inflexible figure. Certainly the record of this government indicates that expenditures per annum are going to rise, notwithstanding the fact that there have been all sorts of promises made about revenues being held to the line. In 1968 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) guaranteed that the budget would be balanced and that government expenditure would remain the same. Although there was no decline in revenue there was a short fall of over $700 million. Therefore, I find it a little difficult to accept that any revenue saved from this particular group of taxpayers would not be transferred to some other group.

If this is so, I would like to know whether this group is going to be the middle income group, or is it going to be that very high income group that apparently the Minister of Finance has recognized is so limited in Canada that additional taxes on the group would yield very little? This is why the middle income taxpaying group is being distinguished in the white paper as the target for ever-increasing heavy taxation.

We must remember that the so-called wealthy people described in the white paper are those who earn from about $10,000 to $24,000, and I am just wondering how many people in this country earning between $11,000 and $13,000, those who find themselves in this so-called wealthy class and are the first to disclaim that they are wealthy, are in fact struggling. Otherwise, why do we see heavy wage demands in certain categories of skilled workers, such as carpenters, electricians, plumbers and bricklayers, in Toronto and Hamilton whose new contracts, providing they work all year, will net them $12,000 or $13,000 a year and even more if sufficient overtime is available?

The hon. member spoke about the guaranteed income supplement that has been in effect for some years under federal legislation. This supplement was, of course, a rehash of legislation that existed in some provinces, though not necessarily under the guise of a guaranteed income supplement. I remember in some provinces it was in the form of an old age supplement to which the federal government contributed half the cost. It was computed by the provincial government, who had the administration of it, frankly as a form of guaranteed income; there was an income test to qualify.

In my own province, the province of Alberta had an old age supplement which was then changed to a social allowance, but the purpose was the same. The criteria in relation thereto were much the same. Actually this was not a new and radical idea. In fact, it has broad application, I think, across the country today. Some provinces not in a financial position to pay the supplement are now doing so even though this is placing an additional strain on their budgets, the provincial contribution being substantial.

I think it might be called the fortunes of war that the hon. member has raised this question at this time; that is, if the word "war" can be used in any way in connection with private members' hour. The hon. member was exceedingly fortunate to draw first position in debating this motion, and on that score he is to be congratulated. He is extraordinarily lucky to bring the motion in just on the morrow of the white paper on taxation.

I am sure the hon. member would agree that, before we could properly express ourselves on the advisability or otherwise of his motion in the terms in which it is couched, we must have evidence of the repercussions of the white paper and the modifications that may be brought to it by the government, since the government itself has said that the white paper does not contain hard and fast proposals in every case. This may be one of those cases.

I suggest that the hon. member address himself to his government colleagues in order to see whether he cannot bring about some additional relief for the particular group to which he refers. But let us bear in mind that the old age security recipients are not the only ones whose fixed incomes are being eroded by inflation. A number of widows have been caught by the effect of inflation on annuities arranged by their husbands. Women in their middle years who are raising a family and trying to pay for their children's university education, as well as many other people who depend on a fixed income to live, deserve consideration too. However, I think the prime consideration is that every effort should be made to defeat inflation and then to remove some of the pressure on all those groups which are equally meritorious.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not share the confidence in the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the present government expressed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) so far as pension matters are concerned. I am also afraid I do not share his euphoria about the other place and its Committee on Poverty. I commend the two or three members of that committee who have been anxious to get acquainted with poverty itself rather than just listen to ivory tower briefs. But that is beside the point about which we are concerned at this time. I do not wish to take over any of the functions of the Senate, although it is trying to take over one of ours. However, despite my not sharing some of the attitudes expressed by the hon. member for Fort William, I am glad he won the draw so that his motion could be at the top of the list on the order paper and be discussed today, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) just said, on the morrow of the presentation of the tax reform white paper.

As the last speaker pointed out, the details in a motion of this kind are a bit complicated. One must look at what it does in raising the exemption levels at the lower end in respect of giving a little to some people and a whole lot to others who do not need it, and so on. But I do not think even that should be brought into the argument today, because the hon. member's contention is that something should be done right away to relieve the suffering being experienced by a great many of our retired people. I agree. I am glad he mentioned not only old age pensioners generally, although I think those on the old age pension and who have nothing else are the worst off. I am glad he also mentioned retired civil servants. It seems they have been mentioned a few times before in this House. I would add other federal superannuates such as retired members of the R.C.M.P., retired members of the armed forces, retired employees of the CNR and various other groups.

The fact about this resolution which I think pleases me most is that it has in it a date, namely January 1, 1969. The hon. member is asking that whatever is done be made retroactive to January ,1 1969. On that proposal I wish to support him wholeheartedly. I would urge him, no matter what happens to this resolution today, to use all the winsomeness he has with his colleagues on that side of the House to get them to accept that part of his resolution. We can argue all we want—and I will do some of it—about the proposals in the white paper, whether they are good enough, whether they go far enough and so on, and what their effect would be on pensioners; but the fact is even if the white paper is adopted it would not be effective until January 1, 1971. Therefore, even if the white paper becomes law, in the two years 1969 and 1970 old age pensioners will be under the law as it now stands.

I cannot expect the government to bring in an elaborate amendment to the Old Age Security Act or to the Income Tax Act with regard to one group in society when it is planning an over-all tax reform bill, but it does seem to me it could find a way to declare a moratorium on income tax for 1969 and 1970 in the case of people who are living on only the old age security pension or on only an income up to a total of, say, $2,000 for a single person and $4,000 for a married couple. I should like to stress this as strongly as I can. I can see the government saying to the hon. member that he has a good idea and all the rest of it, but now that we have the white paper this type of change cannot be made because it would amount to fiddling around in the meantime. The trouble is that in the meantime many of these people are passing away. Some of them will die sooner than they would otherwise simply because they cannot make both ends meet.

What I find to be commendable in the hon. member's resolution, and what I am asking as something that should be considered, is a moratorium on income tax for the years 1969 and 1970 in the case of retired people whose incomes are below a certain point. The figures I suggest are $2,000 single and $4,000 married. Like the hon. member for Edmonton West, I become a little concerned about merely raising the exemption level because then the millionaire who is in receipt of the old age pension would be covered by this resolution and would receive quite a bonanza. This problem could be solved, however, by the proposal I am making in respect of establishing floors and declaring that any retired persons whose incomes are under those floors shall not pay any income tax whatsoever for the years 1969 and 1970. I make that proposal strongly and suggest the figures of $2,000 single and $4,000 married.

If the government does not turn around and accept my proposal right off the bat, or argues that my figures are too high in respect of the bookkeeping or figuring that has been done, then may I say that at least the government should go as far as $1,400 single and $2,800 married. By the white paper of Friday the government has admitted that no one in Canada should be paying income tax if his income is below $1,400 single or $2,800 married. The government is saying that in its view $1,400 single between age 65 and 70, $1,900 single over age 70, $2,800 married between age 65 and 70 and $3,300 married over age 70, are floors which ought to be achieved. That having been admitted with regard to our pensioners, I think it is an insult to these people to say this shall not come into effect until the taxation year 1971. There are many other people who would like to see the tax benefits come into effect earlier, and I am with them. At least most other people will have a few years to live in which they will be able to obtain the benefits of the tax reform proposals, but many pensioners will not.

I think it would be little enough for the government to declare the kind of moratorium I have suggested. If it is not prepared to take my figures of $2,000 and $4,000, at least it should take its own figure of $1,400 and $2,800, $1,900 and $3,300 or whatever it is. I urge that the government do this, and that the hon. member for Fort William and the friends he has on his side of the House fight this matter out in the Liberal caucus and not take no for an answer. I hope he will not come back one day and tell us that he took it up with the government but that he was given good reasons for not going ahead with his proposal. That is not good enough.

I said in passing that I shared the view of the hon. member for Edmonton West, that if you merely raise the tax exemption level you give quite a bonanza to the people on top. This is true, but I would almost rather accept the resolution as it is than not do anything at all. The reason is that 60 per cent of the people of Canada who have qualified for the old age security pension, the non-means test one, have qualified for the guaranteed income supplement, and about half of those who have qualified for the guaranteed income supplement have qualified for its full amount. This tells a story of poverty and old age in this country that is even more glaring than anything the Senate committee has yet brought out. You do not have to go looking for it; it is right there in the statistics that 60 per cent of our people who are old enough to receive the old age security pension have been able to qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. This means they have been able to meet the means, or needs, or income test on that pension.

That is why I say that the important thing is to get some action. Let us not make the kind of mistakes that could be made, but I would rather make those mistakes and give a few bonuses where they are not needed, if that is the way we have to do it to get something done for those who really need help.

I return to my basic position. I think the thing to pick out of this motion, coming as it does after the white paper has been proposed, is the date the proposal would become effective—January 1, 1969. Let us ask for retroactivity, and let us not be satisfied with action two or three years from now. Let us, rather, call for action which will take care of these people during 1969 and 1970. I repeat the word I have used a number of times and again call for a moratorium on income tax for all persons in receipt of the old age security pension whose total income is below certain figures. I have already suggested the figures I have in mind.

Having said all that, I want to sit down in case there are others who want a minute or two in which to speak before a vote is taken on this motion. But may I remind the House that even after we have done these things in terms of the income tax legislation, even after we have tried to improve things for people in other ways, this does not fill the bill. The one thing that we have to do for our older people is increase their pensions. That goes for the old age security basic pension, for pensions to retired civil servants, for pensions to all federal superannuates and for pensions across the board.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I am not taken in by the argument that these people have to wait until we have solved the problem of inflation, because in the meantime they are suffering more than those higher up the economic ladder. In my view it is time that we closed the gap between those at the bottom and those at the top, by raising the incomes of those at the bottom, without waiting to solve the problem of inflation. I am in favour of coping with it, but I do not think these people should be made to suffer while we wait. The main job of this Parliament in the economic field is to increase the pensions of our older people and the income levels of all our people, but in the meantime I support the proposal that something effective be done regarding the income tax situation, not just in 1971 and the years thereafter but by a moratorium that will be effective for 1969 and 1970.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to have at least a few moments in which to make some comments on the notice of motion that has come before us in the name of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai). It is a double privilege because the hon. member is held in very high regard and has the affection of many members of this House, if not of us all. Therefore, I am pleased to support the motion that he put forward. It seems rather symbolic that the hon. member's motion should have come out first in the draw and that it should be the first one to be debated today.

Some people might say that since the Members of Parliament on the government side of the House tend to be youthful, they are interested only in young people. Some of the youngest people I know are very old in years, and I commend the concern expressed in the motion for the retired and those on limited and fixed incomes. This concern is demonstrated not only by the motion before us but by the actions of the Government of Canada, in particular in presenting the white paper on tax reform, which matter has been adequately covered by hon. members who spoke before me.

It has for a long time seemed to me that the two main problems in Canada are, first the ever decreasing farm incomes in rural areas, and second the problems facing pensioners, especially those retired from civil service. I think both problems are very urgent and demand equal attention. I hope that Treasury Board will be able to raise the pensions of retired civil servants, those who have given of themselves, of their time and of their years for the well-being and furtherance of Canada. I was delighted, as I am sure other members of the House were, to learn last Friday that the white paper on tax reform proposes a significant step in the right direction in easing the burden of many people who are on fixed incomes.

The motion before us and the suggested raising of the exemption from personal income tax reflect the social concerns and indeed the social sensitivity of the government. This kind of concern demonstrates the heart and compassion of the government, and the view held in all parts of the House that people are of first importance and governments must seek a closer understanding of the problems of the average man whom we represent in the House. We must be concerned about the quality of life, and not simply the quantity of life. We do not want simply to perpetuate more years of penury; we want to promote genuine prosperity. It is a very natural human desire and drive to want to survive, to cling to life. But we want more than the survival of the elderly; we want, rather—and must work for—a personal income that enables the maintenance of the highest possible degree of human dignity. It is not good enough to provide institutions and community clubs for the "unfortunate" elderly. We must eliminate the circumstances that tend to demean and belittle anyone's self-esteem.

I want to illustrate this point by sharing with the House a report that came to me in the last few days from a man who was travelling in the Andes of Peru. He was coming down a mountain route when he met a local Peruvian who could speak English. This man was very interested in what the native of Peru thought of North America in general and of the United States in particular, and asked him about it. The Peruvian told him that he hated North Americans. My friend was a bit surprised and he said, "Why? Surely you are aware that the United States of America has given many millions of dollars in aid to your country, to help Latin America, and has done so much for you." The Peruvian drew himself up, standing on his dignity, and replied, "Yes, that is true. They have given us a lot, but they confirm us as beggars."

It may be very difficult to give assistance but it is far more difficult for many proud Canadians, among whom are most of our elderly people, all of them very proud of their human dignity, to be the recipients of handouts and charity. Therefore, I support wholeheartedly and with great enthusiasm any means which would enable our elderly citizens to be independent and to command their own future by having adequate financial means with which to live a full and rewarding life in their advanced years. So far as this motion and the steps taken by the government will not confirm our elderly as beggars, but will do the exact reverse, I support them.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, time is pressing and I do not want to prevent anybody else from speaking. However, I think there is one thing that should be considered when the substance of this proposal is being examined. We now have the white paper on tax reform which will have a generally good and advantageous effect, but it seems to me that some form of tax allowance should be considered in respect of legitimate expenses as well as the capital gains tax allowance that will be granted on homes. I wonder why we should not allow depreciation on homes owned by elderly people whose reportable or taxable income is below a certain figure. I know that many people do not own their own homes, but I think it is a tragedy when a married couple with a very modest income, probably anchored by time and memory to a home they have lived in for years, find that the cost of ever-increasing taxation is driving them out of that home.

When this matter is being discussed I think consideration should be given to the proposal that those with incomes below a certain level be allowed full depreciation on their homes after they have reached a certain age; and further, that the depreciation be worked out in such a way that the costs of education of the younger people, in other words the educational taxes involved in the full tax on their homes, would be eliminated. The federal government would then be subsidizing education. I know that might be unconstitutional, but the government would be doing it through a back-door method and it would also be helping poor, elderly people. In the average city such people would have their taxes cut by at least half. That suggestion is all I have to contribute at this time, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to use the remaining few minutes to express my full support of the motion of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai).

Nobody in this House would refuse to join in assisting and encouraging him in his good intentions, when the aim is to help a group of our fellow citizens who need it so badly, particularly old people who, due to their age, find it so difficult to earn a living.

I concur with other members who have mentioned, perhaps it was coincidence, the white paper published a few days ago. I have studies this document rather rapidly and it seems to me that it contains, at least in part, an answer to some questions that hon. members, especially the hon. member for Fort William, may have.

In any case, the government proposes to improve the situation in this white paper. There is no mention of a $1,500 basic exemption for old people, single people, or of a $2,500 exemption for married persons but things look better just the same. By the way, if I am not mistaken, there is nothing final about the white paper since the government intends to refer it to a committee where all hon. members will be given the opportunity to defend their point of view so as to help our senior people and our parents.

However, there is one thing that worries me in reading this white paper—and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) concurs in this—and it is the difficulty to make the measures passed in 1970 retroactive to January 1969.

Generally speaking and in principle, it will not be easy to give retroactive effect to measures adopted between now and 1971.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

ADMINISTRATIVE AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-4, to amend the Canada Corporations Act and other statutory provisions related to the subject matter of certain of those amendments, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-4 which is moved for reference to the committee this evening embodies important and far-reaching amendments to the Canada Corporations Act. Since its introduction in 1934 the Canada Corporations Act has been amended three times. Only one set of those amendments, those enacted four years ago in 1965, could in any way be considered substantial amendments. The amendments now before the House are the most extensive that have been prepared since the inception of the act in 1934. In retrospect, Mr. Speaker, I think 1965 can be considered as the year in which we in this House initiated a complete review of our corporation law. The amendments now before us are an important part of that review, and I emphasize "an important part" —a review which I expect will be completed within the next two years. These amendments are, therefore, only part of the process.

The tremendous changes that have occurred in society since 1934 and which are continuing at an increasing pace must be reflected in our legislation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that such an important piece of legislation could have gone virtually untouched from 1934 to 1965. Our corporation law sets the framework within which much of the economic development in the business life of our country takes place and I believe that such legislation should be under constant review, consideration—and reconsideration. Only then can it fulfil the vital objectives it is designed to serve.

As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not propose the complete revision of all matters dealt with in the Canada Corporations Act. It deals with the most pressing problems. Other aspects of the Canada Corporations Act are still under study in my department as part of a general review of company law. Since the early 1960's a good deal has been said about the role of securities and companies regulation in the careful functioning of our capital markets. The Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, the Porter Commission, was the first attempt in Canada to consider this question in a meaningful manner. In 1964 this report helped point the way to the advances we have witnessed during the last four or five years in this field. More recently it was pointed out by the Kimber Committee in Ontario that "one of the strongest single forces in the complex process of raising capital is public confidence". Public confidence requires a knowledge of the relevant facts that will permit the anticipation of profits. The Porter Report stressed the desirability of greater disclosure of corporation information relating not only to financial institutions but also to the securities market as a whole. The Kimber Report paved the way to the introduction of a comprehensive set of disclosure requirements in Ontario in 1967. The four western provinces have followed suit and have adopted in substantial form the Ontario requirements.

The maintenance and strengthening of investor confidence and investor protection are real concerns of this government. The 1965 amendments improved the financial disclosure requirements of the Canada Corporations Act. This was only the first step, Mr. Speaker. The bill that is now before the House will considerably improve the quality, the range and the level not only of the financial information but generally of the corporate information available to shareholders, prospective shareholders and to the public in general. There is no valid reason why the corporate information available from federal companies should not be as adequate as the information concerning companies incorporated in other jurisdictions. The improvements proposed in the interests of investors should help increase confidence in the securities industry. As was pointed out by the Kimber Report, to the extent that the securities industry has become a more effective and a more efficient part of the economy, the general public will benefit. This is the main goal that we are pursuing in the present bill.

The measures contained in Bill C-4, whether they concern no disclosure, insider trading, takeover bids, proxy solicitation or inspection and investigation, are all designed to promote the climate required for a high degree of investor confidence to develop. The most important proposals in this bill to improve public confidence and public information relate to financial disclosure. As long ago as 1935 the Royal Commission on Price Spreads, the Stevens Commission, called for better financial statements and recommended that they be published in the press and in the Canada Gazette. A later Royal Commission on Prices, the Curtis Commission devoted much of its attention to proposals for greater quantity and better quality of information in corporate financial statements. In 1959 the Royal Commission on Price Spreads in Food Products, under Dr. Andrew Stewart, noted that "private companies whether incorporated federally or provincially are not required to provide financial information." The commission pointed out that this category includes subsidiaries of many foreign firms. It recommended that private companies be brought under the same financial disclosure rules as public companies. The Porter Commission and the Carter Commission both expressed concern about the standards of corporate disclosure in Canada.

The concerns these various inquiries have expressed was reflected in the interim report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons of which I had the honour to be the co-chairman together with Senator Croll. In our interim report of December, 1966, our committee, which was made up of all parties of the House, said in part:

> In times of both depression and prosperity, Canada has in the past resorted to a series of Royal Commissions or parliamentary inquiries on prices and price spreads, each of which has had to compile its own information on costs, profits and return on investments. Your Committee was no different, and used its parliamentary privilege to ask for and receive from corporate witnesses information never before made public. However, your Committee feels strongly that if those responsible for or concerned about the management of public affairs are to be properly informed, such information should be available publicly on a continuous basis for the scrutiny of parliamentarians, public officials, consumer groups, investment analysts and the academic community. Such public disclosures would also be a spur to greater efficiency and productivity by preventing inefficient enterpreneurs from hiding their inefficiency from shareholders or public scrutiny. Further, your Committee sees no reason why large public companies should be compelled to compete in the marketplace against other large private competitors whose operations are almost wholly secret and many of which are privately held wholly-owned subsidiaries of the non-Canadian parents.

The committee's recommendations were:

> (a) That the distinction between disclosure requirements for private companies of significance to the public and public companies be eliminated.
> (b) That the disclosure requirements for both public and such private companies be enlarged to assure full and complete disclosure of corporate activities to give to the public sufficient information for meaningful continuous analysis and comparison.

In this bill, Mr. Speaker, we are seeking to extend the financial disclosure requirements to all federal companies of economic significance, to make all this information more readily available to the public and to make the financial information that is disclosed more comprehensive and meaningful. To take the last point first, the amendments would require companies to prepare a statement of source and application of their funds. This will provide an accurate portrayal of the manner in which the company used the funds that became available to it during the year. Companies would also be required to prepare all their financial statements in comparative form, showing in a single statement figures for the last two consecutive years. Generally speaking, these new requirements will involve little or no additional work by the company, as the figures to be included in these statements would readily be derived from the company's books.

The bill proposes various other requirements which will undoubtedly be thoroughly discussed in the committee to which it is to be referred. But there is one new requirement that I wish to draw to the attention of the House this evening.

The growing conglomeration and diversification of business enterprises, especially in the United States and to a certain degree in Canada as well, has reduced the quality and the usefulness of the financial statements of many corporations. Companies operating across many industries commonly report their operating results on a consolidated basis, thus preventing the public from having access to relevant financial and operating characteristics. The failure to make public detailed financial information not only deprives investors of the data they need to make informed investment judgments, but also deprives shareholders of the data they require to assess the performance and quality of the administrators and managers of companies.

The variables that are of primary concern to the investor include the profitability of the business, the risks involved and the opportunity for growth. In the case of a company with a single class of business, each of these variables is effectively consistent throughout the company. In a company with multiple classes of business, the rate of profit, the extent of the risk and the opportunity for growth are bound to be different for each class of business. The progress and success of such a company is a composite of the progress or success of its several parts, and it is not possible to forecast the future of the total company without some knowledge of each of these parts.

For these reasons, companies with more than one class of business would be required to indicate the proportion in which their sales or gross revenue are divided amongst these classes. They would also be required to disclose the extent to which the carrying on of the business of each class contributed to or restricted the profit or loss of the company. I am convinced that hon. members will agree with me that in the wake of conglomeration and diversification of business enterprises in Canada it is essential that we take steps to increase the quality and usefulness of the financial statements of many corporations.

[Mr. Basford.]

The experience in other jurisdictions, especially in the United States and Great Britain, has shown that reporting requirements of this sort are both desirable and feasible. The amendments would leave a good deal to the discretion and judgment of the directors. We are confident that they will approach this requirement in a manner consistent with the over-all purpose of the legislation. This brings me to a second important aspect of our proposals concerning financial disclosure.

One question that we had to resolve is to whom the companies' financial reports should be made available. The Canada Corporations Act is silent on this point, but following a policy of long standing my department does not make these financial statements available to the public. I suggest that there are no valid reasons for such a restriction in the case of the financial statements of public companies. Shareholders, prospective shareholders and creditors should all have access to this information. We all know how easy it is for anyone to get access to the information available to the shareholders by buying one share in the company. We propose to do away with this legal hypocrisy, and the amendments require that the financial statements filed in my department be made available to the public on the payment of a prescribed fee.

I now turn to the third aspect, the extension of financial reporting requirements to some private companies.

We are most anxious not to impose unnecessary reporting burdens or disclosing requirements on the many firms—the great majority of all companies incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act—which are private companies. We have considered the advisability of imposing on all private companies the disclosing requirements imposed on public companies, as has been done in some jurisdictions. We have concluded that the public benefit that could possibly be expected to be gained from such disclosure requirements being imposed on all private companies, of whatever size, would not be sufficient to justify such additional costs.

There is, however, the problem of the many large private companies that exert considerable influence in our economy. The private company device that had originally been developed to assist the small entrepreneur, most often organized on a family basis, has very often become the corporate structure used by huge firms. Furthermore, many of these large private companies are in competition with public companies which must disclose information about their operations. Many of these private companies are wholly-owned subsidiaries of public companies incorporated abroad; we know little if anything about their operations in Canada, although the global operations of the parent and subsidiaries taken as a whole may be required to be disclosed in the foreign jurisdiction concerned.

The government and the public need to know more about the affairs of the large private companies. It is a prerequisite of any rational decision-making process that it be based on information as complete and accurate as possible. This principle applies to all managers, including those who manage the affairs of the country.

The 1968 report of the Task Force on the Structure of Canadian Industry struggled with this problem in dealing with the issue of foreign ownership and control in Canada. The report correctly pointed out that a judgment of the benefits and costs to Canada of foreign investment must include a careful analysis of the performance of foreign-owned firms in Canada. How does the behaviour of these firms and their efficiency compare with Canadian-owned firms? With their parents? With foreign subsidiaries elsewhere? These are some of the questions that are most difficult to answer now because of the lack of sufficient information about foreign-owned, private firms. In the view of the task force, the most serious problem with respect to the issue of foreign ownership and control was the extent to which foreign-owned firms were relieved of the necessity of public disclosure by virtue of their status as private companies in Canada.

The lack of definite information about private companies concerns not only the issue of foreign ownership. Noting that it is impossible to determine precisely the number of large private companies in Canada, the report indicates that on the basis of data on 743 of the largest Canadian companies it appears that 60 per cent are private companies. Of 375 of the largest non-financial Canadian corporate complexes identified by the task force, 162 or 43 per cent are private companies and about 75 per cent of those are controlled by non-residents.

In a recent study on the performance of foreign-owned firms in Canada, Professor Safarian noted how limited was the available data for the examination of both foreign-owned and Canadian-owned firms in Canada.

The task force pointed out:

> It is a pre-requisite to public discussion of government policy and the formulation and implementation of actual policy that more information be available on the activities of corporations, particularly large corporations, both Canadian-owned and foreign-owned.

The proposals now before the House in Bill C-4 will make an important contribution toward improving the present situation. The disclosure requirements that we propose will not apply to small private companies for the reasons I have outlined. Nor will they apply to any private company that is a personal corporation within the meaning of section 68 of the Income Tax Act. They will apply only to private companies which by virtue of their size are of significance in our economy.

One of the difficulties of this approach is deciding which companies are economically significant. We recognize that setting a test for this purpose is bound to be arbitrary. We have chosen to define an economically significant company as one which has assets or gross annual revenues greater than $3 million. We have chosen this figure because this test will elicit sufficient information to help us understand the greater part of the economic activity of federal companies. If the test we are proposing in Bill C-4 was copied in all Canadian jurisdictions, federal and provincial, we would get the following coverage: (a) some 1,200 manufacturing companies accounting for 80 per cent of assets employed in all manufacturing and 75 per cent of manufacturing sales; (b) over 300 mining companies accounting for 87 per cent of sales, and 87 per cent of assets in the industry; (c) over 400 companies accounting for nearly 50 per cent of sales in the wholesale trade; and (d) some 1,700 finance companies accounting for over 75 per cent of gross revenues and 86 per cent of assets in the industry.

Some people say that the government has the information it needs in its files, especially in the files of the Department of National Revenue, in the files of Calura and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics; that if it does not have the required information, the government has the means of getting it. The claim is made, however, that there is no need to make public the information relative to the affairs of private companies; that to do so would amount to an unwarranted invasion of privacy. Those who speak that language surely do not appreciate all the implications of their position. I can hardly believe that in this day and age they want the government of the land to stand beyond the reach of the criticism of the citizens; that they want to allow the government of the land to take decisions that affect us all on the basis of information not available to the public. The public, even the otherwise well-informed public, the analysts, the academics and commentators, cannot appreciate, discuss or criticize policy as effectively as possible because of lack of access to the same information as is available to the policymakers or to the government.

One may ask whether it is worth having such disclosure since it will apply only to federal companies. First, it should be recognized that many, if not most, of the large foreign corporations operating in Canada through wholly-owned private companies are federally incorporated. Moreover, we believe that it is up to the federal government to take a lead in this matter and encourage provincial governments to follow. The act will provide for exemption when disclosure would be detrimental to a company's interests. Some people have also suggested that the requirement sould apply only to foreign-owned companies not to Canadian-owned firms.

Surely, we do not want to embark on a course that would discriminate in this way against foreigners. We do impose restrictions on the degree of foreign ownership permitted in certain sensitive sectors of our economy, such as communications, finance, banking and broadcasting. But once those specific requirements are satisfied, our general corporate laws should apply equally to foreign-owned and Canadian-owned companies, regardless of the ownership of the shares.

I like to think that hon. members will agree with the government that although there is no particular objection to the large firm being organized on a private basis, there is no valid reason why the use of the private company device by large firms, which play an increasingly important role in our economy, should become a shelter enabling them to hide from the public their financial affairs.

[Mr. Basford.]

I would now like to discuss some of the other aspects of Bill C-4. Much of the discussion about corporate law in recent years has turned on the relationship that should exist between corporate management and the company, and between corporate management and the shareholders. At the centre of this discussion is the question of the duties and responsibilities of corporate management in the exercise of their office.

This question raises many difficult problems that are still under study in my department and in other jurisdictions as well. Bill C-4, however, deals in a comprehensive manner with one of the most important of these problems, the problem of insider trading. Let me illustrate by an example the type of situation that in this regard troubles the public so much. Texas Gulf Sulphur is a case in point which has been widely publicized in the press. Various issues arising out of this case are still currently discussed, especially in the United States press and the United States courts.

The case of Texas Gulf Sulphur raised complex questions that have resulted in a number of lawsuits in the United States. Some of these are not yet settled and I do not wish to comment on whatever action may remain before the courts. However, the case provides a good illustration of a problem that should concern us all. Insiders who have access to information intended to be available only for a corporate purpose and trade for their own account in the securities of a corporation do great damage to our system of free market economy.

The Kimber Report studied this question in great depth. It concluded that while it is not improper for an insider to buy or sell securities in his own company, it is improper to use confidential information acquired by him by virtue of his position as an insider in order to make profits through trading in the securities of his company. The ideal securities market should be a free and open market. The price of securities should be based upon the fullest possible knowledge of all relevant facts. We agree with the Kimber Committee that any factor which tends to destroy or put in question this concept lessens the confidence of the investing public in the marketplace and is, therefore, a matter of public concern. The question which arises is: What do we do to prevent insiders from using confidential information for their own personal benefit and to the detriment of the company or the shareholders? And when the insider has in fact used the information for his own personal gain and caused prejudice to the company or to some other person, what do we do? How do we ensure that everyone is treated fairly?

The problem of insider trading is dealt with in a rather rudimentary way in the Canada Corporations Act. Under the current provisions, directors, officers and shareholders controlling more than 10 per cent of the issued shares of a corporation are required to file reports with the company's secretary on a monthly basis disclosing the number of shares sold or purchased during the preceding month. The secretary must make the reports available for inspection by the shareholders and they are presented to the shareholders, whether requested or not, at the annual meeting. The secretary of the company must also, within a month of receipt by him, send copies of these reports to my department, where they are available for shareholders' inspection. Penalties for breaches of these provisions are imposed by way of summary conviction proceedings. There are a number of shortcomings in this approach: First, the act currently applies to a narrowly defined class of insiders. Second, the disclosure provisions are not satisfactory. The information disclosed is available only to the shareholders of the company and not to former shareholders, let alone to the investing public generally. Finally, there are not provisions for the recovery of the benefit or advantage received by the insider at the expense and to the detriment of the company or the persons who traded with the insider.

Bill C-4 proposes a comprehensive code to deal with the problem of insider trading. The proposed insider trading rules are substantially the same as those already found in the company law or securities legislation of Ontario and the four western provinces. The important features of the uniform provincial legislation in this regard have been adopted. The differences are only minor. Insiders would not under these provisions be prevented from trading in the securities of their company. The amendments would, however, improve the accessibility of insider trading reports by making them available to the public, and not only to shareholders as is now the case. Thus, the purposes of these disclosure requirements will be better served. The reports will provide an indication of insiders who might be liable for damages. They may also prevent insiders from engaging in improper trading they would be reluctant to disclose.

The amendments would also impose a statutory liability on the insiders, their associates and affiliates, including close members of the family as well as on any employee of the company or any person whose services are retained by the company, who take improper advantage of their inside knowledge. These people would be accountable to any persons who have suffered a direct loss because of the use by such insider of specific confidential information in connection with a transaction relating to the securities of the company. The insider would also be accountable to the company for any direct benefit received by him in similar circumstances. As this kind of abuse is likely to arise only in the case of a company whose securities are traded publicly, these provisions would apply only to public companies that have made or are making offers of their securities to the public. These new requirements should help to maintain a high degree of confidence in the investing public that all will be treated fairly and equitably. They should also militate against the undue enrichment of insiders through their confidential knowledge at the expense of the shareholders or other affected persons who lack the inside knowledge.

I now turn to the amendments which deal with proxies and proxy solicitation. As our economy expands and our companies grow larger and more complex, management seems further isolated from the shareholders in an increasing number of companies. For most of the year, corporation management can carry on without reference to the shareholders. Once a year, however, the shareholders have the privilege of deciding whether the present management should be continued in office. Relatively few shareholders actually appear at annual meetings and more are willing to give proxies to representatives of management. Unregulated, the proxy device thus tends to become a powerful instrument which management can easily use to perpetuate itself indefinitely. Furthermore, proxies are often solicited to approve management's action in cases where shareholders are not given sufficient information. An informed decision is often almost impossible. In practice, no alternative is offered to the shareholders. The proxy form they receive designates a management representative as nominee. He has full discretion to vote on behalf of the shareholders.

Professor Louis Loss, an American authority on securities regulation, has discussed this problem in the following words:

> Corporate practice has come a long way from the common law's non-recognition of the proxy device. The widespread distribution of corporate securities with the concommitant separation of ownership and management, puts the entire concept of the stockholders' meeting at the mercy of the proxy instrument. This makes the corporate proxy a tremendous force for good or evil in our economic scheme. Unregulated, it is an open invitation to self-perpetuation and irresponsibility of management. Properly circumscribed, it may well turn out to be the salvation of the modern corporate system.

The proposed amendments provide a comprehensive set of rules governing proxies and proxy solicitation whether the solicitation is by management or others. The form of the proxy would be regulated. It would also be designed in such a manner as to afford the shareholder the opportunity to appoint as his nominee someone other than the person designated by management. The form would also allow the shareholder to instruct his proxy how to vote on each matter to be considered.

Sufficient information is a prerequisite to sound decisions. An information statement would therefore be required to accompany any solicitation of proxies. Shareholders must be provided with an opportunity to exercise their right of corporate suffrage. For that reason, companies would be required to send suitable proxy forms along with notices of meetings. Furthermore, shareholders will now receive, prior to the meeting, an information circular giving information on the matters to be considered at the meeting. Thus, they should be in a position to vote more intelligently. The considerations to which I have referred are less likely to arise in companies owned by a small number of shareholders. Consequently, these requirements would not apply to a private company or a public company which has fewer than 15 shareholders. These amendments correspond with the present requirements of the legislation of Ontario and the western provinces.

In one important respect we are breaking new ground insofar as Canada is concerned. We are introducing a procedure of shareholder initiative to make it easier for those shareholders who wish to involve themselves in the affairs of their company to do so more effectively. The amendments would provide machinery to enable a shareholder to give notice to all shareholders of his intention to submit a proposal to the meeting. A company soliciting proxies would be required to include the shareholder's proposal in its information statement. Thus, a shareholder, not only the management, could avail himself of the company's mailing facilities at comparatively little cost to the company. This should prove, as it has proved in other jurisdictions, a healthy device in stimulating shareholder interest; and there are provisions in the act to prevent abuse of this privilege by cranks and kooks. Our objective in proposing these changes is clear. We want to ensure that shareholders are provided with adequate information to enable them to make intelligent use of their voting right, or of their right to have someone else vote for them at meetings. In this way we wish to encourage shareholders to take an active and responsible role in the direction of their companies.

The fourth major aspect of Bill C-4 deals with takeover bids. At present there is virtually no provision in the Canada Corporations Act governing takeover bids, despite the growing importance of this method of acquiring control. There can be serious, undesirable side effects if shareholders are not given the time and information necessary to judge on its merits an offer for shares. Most other jurisdictions have found such legislation desirable for orderly activity in the marketplace. The object has been to give the shareholders whose shares are wanted for the purpose of the takeover the information which they need to evaluate the bid intelligently, and to ensure that those shareholders who want to accept the bid are treated equally by the bidder. The new rules would apply to takeover bids involving public companies with more than 15 shareholders. These rules will cover situations where the bidder or offerer has, or will have, 10 per cent of the object company's equity shares, which can often constitute control. Shareholders must be given at least 21 days in which to make their decision and deposit their shares.

Mr. Woolliams: That is a beautiful statement.

Mr. Basford: I am glad the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) likes my statement. When more shares are deposited than the bidder wants, the bidder must take up his total and pay for them, from all that are available to him, on a pro rata basis. This means that there is no pressure on shareholders, as now, on the basis of "first come, first served." The bidder must send his bid to the directors, as well as the shareholders, of the company in question. Whenever the directors of the offeree company recommend to their shareholders acceptance or rejection of the takeover bid, the directors would be required to issue a directors' circular containing information to explain their recommendation, and indicating whether they themselves propose to accept or reject the offer. It is most desirable that the shareholders receive sufficient information to enable them to evaluate the position of management.

Offers to be effected through the facilities of a stock exchange or on the over-the-counter market would be exempt from these provisions. In these cases the bidders are not in direct contact with the shareholders; the purchase of shares takes place in the market. As the shareholders and the bidders are dealing at arm's length, there is not the same need for protecting the shareholders. Similarly, these provisions would not cover offers made by way of private agreement with individual shareholders. There is also provision for specific exemption by a court upon application. These provisions are substantially similar to the requirements found in the legislation of Ontario and other provinces.

The fifth series of amendments contained in Bill C-4 deal with provisions for inspection and investigation of federal companies. Corporate laws of Canada, most of the provinces and the Commonwealth already contain provisions for inspection and investigation of companies in the interests of shareholders oppressed by mismanagement or fraud, although the mechanics of the investigation process vary greatly.

Under the Canada Corporations Act the minister may appoint inspectors to investigate the affairs of a company, but only on the application of shareholders. Furthermore, the expenses of any such investigation are the responsibility of the applicants or, where I as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so direct, that of the company. Such requirements tend to deter people from bringing forward valid complaints.

Our experience supports this conclusion. Since 1950 the department has received only 11 formal requests for inspection, although the number of informal complaints received is substantially higher—about six a year. A few of the inspections ordered by the department have paved the way to the laying of criminal charges. In other cases the inspection was useful in showing suspicions of irregularities or misconduct to be groundless and baseless.

The inspection and investigation procedure has a key role to play in maintaining and developing investor confidence in our market system. Through this machinery the administration can help to ensure that the corporate device is not used as a shield to defraud the investors, the creditors or the public generally. Through this procedure the administration can also help to ensure that the shareholders, whatever the extent of their financial involvement in a company, whether their interest is a minority one or not, will be treated fairly and equitably.

With these objectives in mind, and bearing in mind the overriding requirement that the inspection and investigation process be fair and just to all and that the fundamental rights of all be protected, we propose a new approach to inspection and investigation. First, the amendments would spell out the grounds on which an inspection or investigation could be made. These grounds are of two categories; first, suspected fraudulent or unlawful acts, or misconduct on the part of the company; second, acts that are oppressive on the minority of dissenting shareholders.

Second, an investigation could be commenced only with the approval of the tribunal, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. This approval could be sought either by my department or by a sufficient number of shareholders of the company. On approving the initiation of an investigation the tribunal would appoint an inspector and define the scope of the investigation to be undertaken. Again I emphasize that in spelling out the powers of the inspector under these provisions great care has been taken to ensure that all be treated justly and equitably. On completing his investigation the inspector will be required to prepare a statement of the evidence he has obtained, and the tribunal must give anyone affected by the statement a fair opportunity to be heard before the tribunal makes its report.

A simpler procedure is provided where the purpose of the investigation is solely to determine the reasons why a company has failed to file with my department a document that is required by the act to be filed. I hope that these powers of investigation and inquiry need never be used. Any investigation or inquiry power has to provide within it proper safeguards. I am confident that these have been built into the act and that they can be defended as proper safeguards in the circumstances. Finally, we propose that the costs of carrying out an investigation be part of the public costs of administering the act. The amendments, however, provide that in some circumstances individuals or companies can be required to reimburse the administration.

Some may raise questions as to the additional reporting requirements that some of these amendments will impose on the business community. Many of our federal companies are already required to comply with provincial reporting requirements under the securities acts of the provinces. For these companies the amendments are not likely to result in a much greater burden. Great care will be taken to ensure a high degree of uniformity in the development of the prescribed forms.

We have already begun to discuss with the provinces ways and means of eliminating unnecessary duplication of reports. There is no reason why we cannot, in close co-operation with the provinces, minimize the amount of duplication. We will continue our efforts in this direction just as we have tried to make our proposals as consistent as possible with provincial legislation.

We have taken the opportunity in Bill C-4 to deal with one very different kind of problem, the question of companies incorporated by special act of Parliament. As hon. members are aware, various categories of companies such as pipe line companies, trust, loan and insurance companies and railway companies cannot now be incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act or any other statute of general application. They can only be incorporated by special act of this Parliament.

The pressure of other business does not always permit the setting aside of sufficient parliamentary time to consider and dispose of requests for special acts to incorporate new companies or amend the original incorporating statutes. As a result, great inconvenience can at times be caused to the companies involved because of the uncertainty of the procedure and lengthy delays which are sometimes involved. We therefore propose an alternative procedure to the special act machinery.

In the case of pipe line companies, insurance, loan and trust companies, letters patent of incorporation could issue pursuant to the Canada Corporations Act with the concurrence of the minister responsible for the department concerned or any other minister named by order in council. In the case of railway companies, the granting of letters patent would be subject to the issue of a certificate of public convenience and necessity by the Canadian Transport Commission. Companies of this type now governed by special acts would be allowed to apply to become companies subject to the ordinary provisions of the Canada Corporations Act. The amendments do not apply to banks, telephone and telegraph companies which will continue to be governed by the special act provisions.

We have taken great care to ensure that the public interest continues to be a paramount consideration when dealing with these special types of companies. In our view the protective measures embodied in the amendments will be sufficient to ensure that the public interest is well served. I am confident hon. members will come to the conclusion that this is a commendable step which will result in a considerable saving of the time of the House and greater convenience for the companies involved.

Finally, I should draw the attention of hon. members to the provisions of clause 4 of the bill. This clause would permit companies to restrict their shareholders to Canadian citizens or residents if the shareholders are unanimous in wanting such a restriction. At present, companies incorporated under the Canada Corporations Act do not have this power although certain federal regulations, particularly in the broadcasting field, make a certain degree of Canadian ownership a requirement.

Since this bill was introduced in the last Parliament we have received representations pointing to a number of difficulties in clause 4 as it now stands. We have been studying the problem for some time and I am hopeful that when the bill is discussed in committee I will be in a position to offer for consideration and study an amended or improved version of clause 4.

I am confident hon. members will share my view that Bill C-4 is a piece of legislation that deserves the support of the House. I apologize, Mr. Speaker, in this introductory statement on second reading for taking so much of the time of the House, but these are comprehensive amendments to the Canada Corporations Act covering new and very important disclosure provisions, insider trading, takeover bids, proxies, investigations and inquiries. I thought it was, therefore, important that I should make a long and detailed opening statement. I commend these amendments and this bill to the members of the Finance Committee and trust I will receive the support of that committee in dealing with Bill C-4.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in some instances I am glad the minister has given us some rather lengthy explanations in respect of this 82-page bill, which of course is quite complicated in much of its length, and has outlined the reason this is being done by regulation. We have a sort of allegation or claim in respect of a just society.

Combined with what is proposed in the Minister of Finance's (Mr. Benson) white paper on taxation, this bill concerning corporations and some other things leads me to wonder whether we are moving toward a regulative society. With regard to many of the amendments I have a great number of questions, because it seems to me, particularly in the area of private companies, that since the investing public is not involved in private companies there are some attempts at what seem to be just plain out and out snooping for whatever purpose it may be. It may be that people just want to have control over certain operations. There again, I simply ask: Is it an attempt to establish a regulative society? I give the minister fair warning that I will be looking very carefully at these matters which have to do with a number of the requirements that will be made of private companies in which the investing public is not in any way affected.

It is a cardinal principle that in so far as public companies are concerned, the requirements as to filing financial statements and so on are for the benefit and protection of the investing public. It is not so much the actions of the companies' branches in Toronto, Vancouver or Edmonton that really act as protection for the public, but rather the actions of the various stock exchanges and the securities commission. They are the real watchdog of the public. The minister told me this afternoon that he had not been able to make much progress in respect of the establishment of a Canadian securities commission.

Mr. Basford: That is not what I said.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister said he had not abandoned his idea and that it was still continuing. But I can tell the House and the minister that I know he is not making any progress. The point is, however, that substitute machinery is being set up so that his department can act as though it was a national securities commission in so far as dominion companies are concerned. We will see just how far this goes. I would not want it to be the substitute for a Canadian securities commission. I know some of the problems with regard to that matter. Ottawa's requirement is that the commission shall be seated in Ottawa and shall operate from Ottawa. This is nonsense. A securities commission operates near the biggest market, and a national securities commission could operate in Montreal or Toronto far more effectively than in Ottawa. This is one of the stumbling blocks, and there are others. But I am sure all provincial authorities agree with the principle of a national securities commission whereby many of the provisions the minister would like to impose in the corporations act which would go further than any other corporations act, would be put into effect. I think we are trying to achieve commendable ends.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Certainly those of us who have some knowledge of company law want to see an improvement in the control of insider trading. But according to the way the minister explained it, anybody who might potentially be an insider acts at his own peril, because any information might be used or deemed to have been used by him for his advantage. This point will have to be explained. He will also be subject to claims by shareholders who might have been affected, by previous shareholders, or even somehow or other by the regulatory agency which may initiate a suit to try to recover moneys. This policy goes much further than has even been the case and will require a good deal of explanation.

Let us deal with the various points raised. First of all, there is the removal from this House of the power of incorporation by private bill of many types of organizations, as described by the minister in a rather complete press release dated May 22. I do not know why great parts of it had to be read into the record tonight. In any event, if we look at page 8 of the press release we see that incorporation by special act of Parliament would apply to pipeline companies whether oil, gas or commodity, trust companies, loan companies, insurance companies and railway companies. There is a limitation that they cannot be incorporated in any way other than that permitted under the acts which govern these particular types of companies, such as the Trust Companies Act, and so forth. In other words, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) could not incorporate a trust company in derogation of any of the requirements of the Trust Companies Act. It must be clear that this is understood.

One provision which concerns me somewhat is that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will issue the appropriate certificate on the recommendation of the minister concerned. This leads me to ask the following question: What will happen in the case where the minister concerned said no? Presumably he has full discretion as to why he should authorize or withhold the authorization or recommendation. We wonder just what considerations shall apply. I warn the minister right now that we shall look into this point very carefully and study what shall be the requirements imposed upon the recommending minister. Those requirements must be outlined clearly, otherwise there will be areas of discretion which could be used improperly. This question must be cleared up.

I am in favour of the provision that existing companies may be brought under the provisions of the act at their own request and with the proper safeguards. This provision will remove an abuse that has grown up in the House whereby justice has not been done to entirely bona fide people whose businesses were quite legitimate and who, for reasons best known to the parties concerned, were prevented from obtaining justice from this House. I think our whole system has fallen into ill-repute as a result of the abuse of rules with regard to the incorporation of such business concerns, or amendments to their acts, in that appropriate restrictions were not imposed upon members of the House with regard to a discussion of matters that were before them. In other words, an application for a change of name allowed a complete discussion of the whole operation of a company.

Another matter to be considered is proxy voting. I agree with the minister that more information must be disclosed in this respect. I hope that the minister and the House do not expect me to reply fully to a detailed statement which took 45 minutes to read, after hearing it just once. If a copy had been made available to me beforehand, this may have been possible. I recall a comment that was made about the British Parliament. A minister came into the House carrying a portfolio and the opposition whip said, "Surely the minister will not read that whole document and then bore us with an equally long speech".

This is our problem when a minister comes into the House with a very carefully prepared statement. We do not deny him authorship or part authorship of the statement, but the opposition must then comment upon what he has said, if we are to have a proper debate. The only thing on which one can go is the fact that the bill was presented and that there was a press release, which fortunately I saw last May and kept in a file-cover in anticipation. But beyond that it becomes rather difficult.

I wonder just what is the justification for the so-called Watkins task force. I must be careful not to confuse the manifesto with the task force. I am wondering whether the minister read the manifesto as background for the provision to control, examine and inspect certain corporations. I think there should be some respect for the privacy of business operations. For instance, I find it somewhat difficult at the present time to understand why the minister may want the source and application of funds statement to be filled by private companies. There may be a good reason for it. What is so sacrosanct about the figure of assets of $3 million or gross revenue of $3 million? Why those particular figures? The minister did admit they may have been an arbitrary figures. Presumably we will in the committee, be getting reasons for this.

I fail to see why the minister bothered to quote at length the conclusions of a committee in which he took an active part and, therefore, might have a less than objective judgment on the conclusions of the committee to serve as the recommendations for action he may be taking in so far as disclosure of financial statements is concerned. I do not like to think that unless some of the major provinces adopt precisely these provisions there will be no incorporation of federal companies and foreign interests will simply come in with their own company, register in a province as a foreign company and then register in whatever province they may wish to operate.

As a matter of fact, on occasion corporate lawyers have said to me, "Frankly, we see no advantage whatsoever in getting a dominion corporation." The stickier becomes the incorporation, and the stickier become the regulations under which incorporation may be granted, the less will be the incentive to incorporate under a federal charter.

In 1965 when I was on the committee I had a lengthy discussion with the then Registrar of Companies. I suggested to him and to others that it would be more efficient to get more companies to register under the federal charter if certain provisions could be loosened up, otherwise we would lose the opportunity to incorporate companies under the federal act. As a matter of fact, when I was practising law I knew several parties who, having considered the pros and cons of federal legislation and of the legislation of certain provinces which make a speciality of corporate law, decided they preferred to go with provincial incorporation because the facilities were so much better.

I could speak at considerable length on the area of investigation and inspection. Again, we will want to see what provisions are made with respect to empowering the various inspectors and whether their powers will be greater than those given to the police when they are seeking drugs. Is it thought necessary that they should have the power to walk into any company and on presentation of credentials seize books and do what else they want?

I believe that some legislative acts passed within the last few years are nothing but an infringement of civil rights. In the present case we must see what is intended and what powers will be granted to the various inspectors. Taken with amendments relating to companies that come under the Income Tax Act, I feel that we are moving rapidly toward a much more regulated society. I for one do not subscribe to that policy. However, I am quite prepared to recommend to the House that we give this bill second reading for the purpose of its referral to the committee for examination.

The examination of the bill in committee may take some time. It is a fairly complicated measure, and the committee will have plenty of work before it. The committee must deal with competing legislation, and it is possible that the government's white paper on tax reform will shortly be turned over to it; therefore, we will be faced with a scheduling problem. Progress will also depend on reaction from the public. I am sure a number of bodies will want to make very careful representations on the bill. In conclusion, may I say that I, too, want to see a viable, lively, federal Companies Act, but one which is a useful instrument and does not merely become the authority for a great deal of snooping.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, when the minister was introducing the bill I was asked a question behind the curtains. Somebody asked, "What does it all mean?" The thought that occurred to me as a rather fast explanation of the bill was that it will just make it a little more difficult for corporate structures to get away with things. The minister has been castigated by some of the financial newspapers. One had the headline, "Corporation Act Changes Rouse Businessmen," and another, "Business Protest to Corporations Act Mounts." From these headlines it would seem that the minister was introducing an earthshaking document. However, all he is really saying is that after 34 years the executive have finally come to the conclusion that public investors are entitled to expect that there will be disclosure of business activities, that inside trading will be restricted and reported and that proxy solicitation will be somewhat more straightforward than it has been in the past. After 34 years these are the earthshattering amendments that he proposes.

I do not want to commence my remarks with a negative attitude, Mr. Speaker. The fact that it has taken so long to produce these amendments is not something for which we can blame the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). By and large I am glad to see these changes being proposed in our laws affecting corporations. The time has long past when businesses, particularly large ones, and in many cases foreign-owned corporations, can say, "What we do is of no concern to the public or to our shareholders." The proposed legislation is a worth-while step in terms of taking a look at what is going on inside the corporate structure of the country, but I would suggest that the bill can be only a prelude to measures of far greater significance.

Just finding out that there are bad things going on is not enough. Obviously the purpose of finding out is to take some kind of action, but there has been little indication of the kind of action the minister is prepared to take if his investigations reveal that corporations are not always acting in the public interest. I for one do not necessarily view corporations as bad things. In some cases I believe they have been bad things. But, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the kind of industrial society in which we live, and at the kind of technological progress that is taking place, it is quite obvious that only very large corporations having large resources are able to take advantage of these technological changes. The implication is that we will have to live with corporations, with very large organizations. The question is not whether we are going to be happy about it, but to what extent we can make corporations responsive to the needs of people.

The important thing about all our institutions is the degree of responsiveness that they demonstrate to the needs of Canadians. This bill will at least provide us with an opportunity to examine the structure and behaviour of corporations in a better way than we have been able to do recently. The significant question is, how will the government act to make changes once it is in command of such information? The large companies of our time have taken on the position of a state within a state. They have enormous power. Some of them employ more people than some countries have populations. Many of them have financial resources that are infinitely greater than the taxing powers of some countries. Many of these corporations are based outside the boundaries of the countries in which they operate, and they take their orders from outside those boundaries. This is very true in Canada where to a large extent foreign-owned corporations, if American-owned, are subject to American law even if it be in conflict with the law of Canada. This gives rise to a very serious condition, a state within a state, and we must find means of coping with it.

Large corporations have virtually the power to tax. Usually we think of taxes as being imposed by government at various levels, but where a corporation is able to determine its own profit level it also imposes a kind of tax. The difference is that if we do not like the taxes imposed by our government we can at least turn it out, but people are helpless in the face of a giant corporation.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come to look at the kind of profits corporations are entitled to make and the prices they charge. They should not unilaterally have the power to tax without having to answer to the people of the country in which they operate, any more than may the government of that country. Governments do not always plan, but corporations do. They represent a huge investment and must make advance decisions. They become bureaucracies with a life of their own and must decide investment and market policy years ahead. Often they are even able to overcome the market structure.

I do not think we can really say that we have the kind of free market of which the classical economists used to speak. Giant corporations and associations of every kind have been able to operate against this type of market system. Knowing that, and knowing that the discipline we would expect from the market system no longer exists, there must be some other way that corporations can respond to the country and its people. The market system cannot be depended on any more in this respect. It is difficult, and to some extent perhaps even undesirable, to impose excessive regulations of any kind, whether of business or other organizations in our society. I for one would look for ways to provide a regulating mechanism without detailed government scrutiny for every sort of activity. I am suggesting that the market can serve a useful purpose if we change the rules of the game so that it becomes a reflection of efficiency and responsiveness, which is what it is supposed to be.

When we set priorities for the number of houses we want and the kind of hospitals and public service we want in a civilized society, we should not let the market make the decisions. But when it comes to a decision as to the kind of shoes we wear, the kind of car we drive or the hat we sport at Easter, surely the market can offer the choice provided there is the market mechanism and it is not frustrated by the enormous power of the corporation as we know it today.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we need more than just disclosure and more than just some idea about proxy trading or insider trading. We will have to change our tax system. I suggest that unless we change it to bring some corporations either under regulation or some kind of market pressure, this bill will be meaningless; we will have a lot of information and a lot of facts that will be of no help. We already have enough information and facts and enough insights to indicate a fundamental change in our tax system. Such change is not taking place. I do not have any cause for confidence that if this legislation is passed, the kind of tax reforms and changes necessary to make corporations responsive will come to pass.

How does the corporation escape from the market discipline? One way is by vertical integration of its operation. A clear example of this is the oil industry which starts with exploration, developing, refining and then ownership of the service stations just to make sure the whole thing is co-ordinated. They have a market system which obscures facts. What does "platform power" really tell us about gasoline? What do the glossy ads which we read or see on television tell us about the product? Very little. This is a real form of power. In some ways it is tyranny, and must be broken. I would be much more impressed with this legislation if there were provisions in it to the effect that owners of oil wells cannot also own service stations. Then we would really get some market forces at work.

That is not such a far-out suggestion, Mr. Speaker. There has been three major investigations in the oil industry all of which came to the conclusion that too many service stations were being built, that operators were not able to make a decent enough living, and that the prices as a result of vertical integration were not cheaper but were higher than necessary. There has been an enormous amount of waste through the vertically integrated operation.

The minister pointed out that under the bill, in the case of conglomerates separate reports of their activities will be required and that there will have to be an indication of their profit and loss position. However, there is nothing in the bill to say that for tax purposes they cannot present a consolidated statement and be taxed on the over-all position provided they indicate their method of operation.

To make this measure effective, where you have a chain of supermarkets each store should report separately and be taxed on the basis of its profit and loss position. If this is not done, one store may take tax money that would normally go to the government and subsidize an inefficient operation or drive out a competitor; the profit from one store could be used to absorb the loss of another. This is really a distortion of the market system because there is no test of efficiency. In effect there is a vast subsidization of the corporation in this position, an internal subsidization at its own discretion.

There is much talk about providing money for old age pensioners, increasing the family allowance and even bringing in the guaranteed annal income. There never seems to be enough money to do this, but the tax laws permit this type of subsidization to go on. In the long run it destroys the small entrepreneur. If the small entrepreneur is destroyed because he is inefficient, that is one thing; but if he is destroyed because a competitor who owns a series of chain stores can open up a store close by and run it at a loss because it is subsidized by the other stores, that is another. That is an unhealthy situation and it illustrates to some extent the real problem that exists in vertical integration and conglomerates and chains. Under our present tax system you do not have an effective way of evaluating the efficiency of the structure of various corporations. Mere pious hopes or platitudes will not do; we need a taxation policy that will force large enterprises into competition.

If you say that competition is good in some areas—and I think it is—then let us have it. Large corporations do not have to compete today except on their own terms; or if they do compete, often they compete with corporations that are organized exactly as they are. That is a very different kind of competition. The minister seems to be quite sincere, and I have no doubt that he is determined to make substantive changes to the corporate structure of this country. He may as well complete his task because he is being blasted in the press. He is not much of a hero to the establishment at this time and has not much to lose. On the other hand, if I keep on talking he may wind up looking like a Conservative. I think he must go beyond words and declarations and give strong assurances that there will be changes in the tax structure of this country.

Many large corporations grow not because they are efficient, although some of them are efficient and have good management and technical know-how, but because they are subsidized by the tax moneys of this country. Some of them grow because they can deduct selling and marketing expenses from income tax liability. Some of them obtain a head start in business and spend money on advertising and the promotion of brand name products, which in themselves are a form of monopoly. If you spend money to impress a brand name on the public consciousness, every 50 cents you spend is 50 cents that might have been paid in taxes. For that reason I say that potential tax money is being used to subsidize the advertising and enlargement of such corporations. Repeated over and over again, the brand name becomes a form of monopoly control. It is true that other people may use brand names, but a brand name is a powerful selling tool.

The abuse does not end there. Most of the brand names we talk about are United States brand names. When we permit a corporation to deduct from taxable income money spent on the advertising of brand names, we are subsidizing that corporation with our tax money. Actually, we are accepting the culture of another country. There is no way around this. If you buy United States products, look at their programs and accept their advertising, it follows that you must share their values. I say nothing about how useful these values may be to the people of the United States; they must consider them worth while or they would discard them. That is their business. But I do not like those values for this country because I think we are a different kind of people. I resent tax laws that allow us to be dominated culturally by entrepreneurs of another country. There might have been some justification for these exemptions in the early stages of industrialization, but by permitting them to continue today we are distorting the market system.

I am not making a pitch for us to regulate advertising; I am not saying that we ought to control it, because I do not think anyone in government is wise enough to say how much one should spend on advertising, what form the advertising should take or how an advertiser should spend his advertising dollar. That is not what I am suggesting. I am suggesting that the product should bear its full selling costs. I say that selling costs should not be deductible for income tax purposes. If the product sells well, that is good. If by selling many items you lower your selling costs, as many people claim, that is very good. The success of your product will be reflected by success in the marketplace and it will not be subsidized with tax money. If the product does not sell, again that will show up in the marketplace. We cannot see how successful a product is so long as we allow advertising and selling expenses to be deducted for income tax purposes. The tax bonus that is conferred on the entrepreneur in this manner is tantamount to a direct subsidy. This is made possible by our present taxation system. I am asking that our tax system be changed to allow market forces to operate more accurately and specifically than they now do. Our large enterpreneurs always say they want to live by the market. But they are not living by the market, Mr. Speaker, because they are receiving a subsidy through our tax system. I do not think they are entitled to that kind of protection.

The third area I wish to touch on is that of retained earnings. According to our information about corporations, big corporations seldom have to go to the marketplace if they want money for expansion. Even when they do go to the market, they go there with the advantage of an AAA credit rating, and so on. It might be worth-while if we forced large corporations to pay out all retained earnings to shareholders. Corporations should not hold on to retained earnings or if they do those earnings should be taxed at a special rate. If the corporations need money for expansion, let them go back to the shareholders and the marketplace. I think the minister said that our capital markets are functioning smoothly. I say to him that our capital markets are enormously distorted because corporations can hang on to retained earnings. As a result they are not subject to the discipline of the marketplace; they do not have to explain their investment priorities to any banker. In my opinion this is not good. If those gentlemen who are in charge of our corporations believe so much in the marketplace, they should live by the marketplace. Then perhaps we might see some significant changes which would benefit our consumers.

I think this legislation is worth while, Mr. Speaker, and I am sorry it has taken 34 years to arrive. That it has taken so long is a powerful indictment against governments which for the past 34 years have directed this nation's affairs.

An hon. Member: I do not agree.

Mr. Saltsman: I exonerate the present minister from blame. It is hard to hold him accountable for the sins of previous governments since for all I know he may not have been born 34 years ago. We have come a long way, and I hope we do not have to wait another 34 years before seeing action based on the kind of information that will become available through legislation of this kind. I conclude by saying that unless we obtain a fairer tax system, and unless the government is prepared to act on the information that is obtained, this entire exercise will not have been worth while.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-4 introduced by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) is entitled "An Act to amend the Canadian Corporations Act and other statutory provisions related to the subject matter of certain of those amendments."

The members of the Ralliement créditiste have always expressed very clearly their faith in private enterprise and they are in favour of permitting private enterprise a maximum of development in order to reach standards of valid competition that will enable the consumers to benefit from reasonable prices while respecting the consumer sector of our society and of our national economy.

Many people have taken objection, in the past, to corporations, calling them, for instance, highway robbers and exploiters of small people, profiteers who take in millions and millions of dollars, asking the government to take over some corporations or even nationalize them in order to achieve a more equitable distribution of the country's wealth.

Mr. Speaker, one seems to forget that the millions of dollars made by these companies are not necessarily stashed away in order to ensure them a cash reserve. On the contrary, the corporations are investing their profits in their firms to expand.

I remember reading one day the speech made by a great American tycoon. I refer to Henry Ford who said some time before he died: If I had to launch my industry today, I could not do it because when I started in the car industry, I could use my profits to expand, to enlarge my plants and I did. Today, I could not do it simply because the government takes away my profits and I have to go to credit lenders and borrow at prohibitive interest rates in order to expand.

Today, this same thinking should be understood by the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people.

Often I hear people say: If there are poor people in Canada, it is due to the large corporations and the profits they make. It is incorrect to say or to attempt to prove that poverty in some areas of Canada is due exclusively to corporations.

I know that some corporations, and the same is true of any other sector of our economy, are guilty of abuses. For example, if several companies combine in order to fix prices, in that case the government is certainly obligated to interfere in order to prevent trusts.

In the past, we have seen cases where the organizers of trusts or combines were sentenced to fines from $25,000 to $50,000. Those people did not care because by raising their prices by a quarter of a cent or half a cent, they could make a $50 million profit within 12 or 24 hours.

That was laughing at the government or at justice.

Therefore, as concerns combines, trusts or people who want to monopolize in order to exploit the Canadian people, I say that the government should take more restrictive measures, not only by having them pay a fine, but by sentencing them to jail. In fact, a five or ten-year jail term would give the trust or combine organizers something to think about.

If we really want to protect private enterprise as well as the establishment of new corporations or ensure the respect of already established ones, we should preserve healthy competition that provides for a better output to the consumer sector in our society.

Whenever a company does not provide good service, or produces low-quality goods, competition takes on great importance since consumers will prefer honest companies which really have at heart the welfare of the people.

This 80-page bill is really a substantial one, but hon. members have not had enough time to consider all its clauses.

In any event, I feel this is I a measure that could improve the part played by corporations in our society. This measure is intended to protect the consumer and I hope it will do so. Were we some day to, realize it has failed to achieve its objective, it would be up to us to introduce the required amendments.

Mr. Speaker, provided we keep a watchful eye on them, it is possible to have in Canada honest corporations, eager to promote the general welfare of the country and respectful of the laws passed by the federal parliament. If every corporation is led to see the importance of legislation passed in order to ensure the over-all welfare of the people, the Canadian parliament will have contributed to help the consumers of the country and the nation as a whole.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is a very large bill to correct a very small fault with relation to the private members' hour. That has been mentioned as one of the reasons for this bill. I think there are probably other reasons for it. Some of them have been mentioned.

The objection which we in this party have is that bills coming before Parliament recently have not been met by the terms of this bill, and I do not think they will be. The minister is to be congratulated on building up a bureaucracy in his department from a very small beginning to what has obviously become a large section of the government. I remember when there were only three or four people in the companies branch and the function of two or three of them was to help the others back on their chairs when for various reasons they fell off. This was about all that was done in the companies branch. Obviously the minister intends to make changes. This is good, because from my personal observations it has not been the strongest of our federal government branches. Perhaps armchairs would have been more satisfactory for some of these people, Mr. Speaker.

We in this party have been interested in a number of incorporations. We have used other companies for the purpose of getting the minister to make a decision in this regard, and for that we make no apology. To prove the point, I have on a number of occasions discussed at length the proposal of a company to change its name when the amendment being sought contained no other proposal but that.

• (9:50 p.m.)

I agree with everyone who says that companies should not be subjected to harrassment of this sort when they are seeking merely a small change of that nature. We have been concerned by the fact that many companies wish to set themselves up in Canada under a federal charter and then operate as if they were foreign companies, providing none of the benefits which one is inclined to think should come from a good Canadian corporate enterprise. This is true in the case of many insurance companies. I am happy that we have been able to persuade some of them which have been incorporated during the last two or three years to become Canadian-owned within a stated period of time to the extent that Canadian law provides. It is odd that this should be, not 51 per cent as one might expect but 49 per cent. Canadian law states they can establish only 49 per cent or all voting rights are lost, with the exception of 10 per cent.

We do not believe this bill will really meet these problems. It is true the minister is expanding his department, but the Superintendent of Insurance still does not have the powers necessary to do the job which I am sure both the minister and myself, as well as Canadians generally, want done in relation to insurance companies.

An hon. Member: How are you so sure the minister wants it done?

Mr. Peters: I am fairly sure he does. I cannot believe anyone would want to extend further the proliferation of insurance companies, adding more to the thousand or so already in existence. We would be creating a monster, one which the minister would not wish to supervise. How much better the situation would be if the number of companies engaged was small enough to maintain a reasonable competitive level while at the same time providing coverage in all necessary fields.

In an attempt to provide safeguards for the public we have resorted, in addition to legislation, to a number of devices. One is control through the National Energy Board and similar bodies such as the Transportation Commission. This is an area which the minister should seriously consider enlarging. I presume we shall soon be incorporating companies engaged in the transfer of gas and oil. I would point out that it is not only a question of whether these companies meet all the corporate requirements; we have to consider whether they also meet the needs of the Canadian people.

We can all recall the debate on the trans-Canada pipeline which brought down the man who was perhaps the greatest planner Canada ever had, Mr. C. D. Howe. It brought him down because he had looked only at the business entities, forgetting the way in which people would be affected. I believe this situation will be repeated. It will not be long before a national commodity pipeline is in operation, and even before that we shall see the construction of a national oil pipeline to the Montreal market When this happens the needs of the Canadian people will have to be considered first, not the convenience of the new company which will be incorporated to carry out the work.

In this connection, I do not think the National Energy Board should make decisions which ought to be made in Parliament. I do not believe the board has the machinery for making these decisions on a proper basis. I strongly urge that important decisions on questions such as these be left to Parliament because of the great influence we have on our national development. It is possible that given time the minister will set up more effective machinery within the insurance branch of his department. I do not think such machinery exists at the present moment. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred, as did one of my hon. friends, to the work of the securities commissions of the provinces and the lack of any federal equivalent in this field capable of supervising investment corporations and other companies whose activities are being supervised haphazardly under provincial jurisdiction.

The minister has gone to great trouble to remove from the attention of private members a number of vexing problems which have developed over the years. But let us look at the traditional procedure under which the federal Parliament authorizes the incorporation of companies. I submit that we incorporate them here because it is felt that the necessary controls for the protection of the Canadian people would otherwise be lacking—because as things are the public interest could not be supervised in any other manner.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, would the leader of the House confirm that the business for Wednesday is as announced?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Notwithstanding the fact that we did not complete consideration of this bill, we shall begin on Wednesday the three bills which were announced—the Canadian student loans bill, the small businesses loans bill and the bill for financing the Canadian National Railways. I forget the order which was given. If we make progress on these measures, we shall for the balance of the afternoon return to the bill we have been discussing.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—URBAN RENEWAL, VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Early last week, Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of a debate at ten o'clock because an answer is urgently required from the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for reporting to this chamber on housing matters.

It will be recognized by all hon. members that several months ago the government put a freeze on urban renewal and development. We would like to have a weather forecast indicating when the thaw is likely to set in. In my constituency of Vancouver East and one adjoining area in Vancouver Centre is a total of 1,315 acres all of which is subject to urban development and renewal. Two of the projects in this area were approved as far back as five years ago. It is therefore understandable that we should be interested in learning from the minister how long we shall have to wait before construction begins, and just when it is expected he will reach a decision on the policies, procedures and regulations which will be involved in the government's brand new urban renewal and development plans.

In order to give a few examples of what this means in my riding, let me say that I received information from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the project known as redevelopment project No. 2, comprising some 28 acres of land, was initially approved in July, 1964. No action has yet been taken.

There is also urban renewal scheme No. 3 at False Creek flats which was approved in December, 1964. This area comprises a total area of about 900 acres, which is divided into seven sub-areas, of which only one has been completed. We have what is known as Strathcona sub-area, which covers some 40 acres and has a population of 3,000. This application has been deferred until the government brings down its new policy. We also have what is known as urban renewal scheme No. 4A, which was approved on October 3, 1968, and comprises 340 acres. According to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, this submission is being held up pending determination of the government's brand new urban renewal and development policy. Another is urban renewal scheme No. 6, covering seven acres of a residential pocket. This scheme was approved in August, 1967, and only the clearing is under way.

Those are a few examples of projects which have been approved over a period of five years and cover a total of 1,315 acres in my constituency. All the work and development is being held up, to say nothing of the planning, until we are told what is in the mind of the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing in regard to reconstruction and development in the city of Vancouver.

I think I have said sufficient to point out the situation in my constituency and the urgency of the matter. We members of the House of Commons need an indication from the government as to when the thaw will set in and the government will announce its policy. Then construction and redevelopment of these projects can proceed. Such projects are a vital necessity not only in my constituency but throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will recall, the minister responsible for housing has agreed to make a statement on motions in the near future on the general subject of urban renewal.

In so far as the situation in Vancouver East is concerned, as I think the hon. member who asked the question is aware, the city of Vancouver has made an application for assistance under section 23B for the Strathcona section only of the total 1,300-acre area No. 3. As the minister indicated to the hon. member recently, he had the opportunity to visit this area and to talk to many of its residents when he was in Vancouver in August to meet the Hon. Dan Campbell, Minister of Municipal Affairs for the province of British Columbia. On August 7, he met with the mayor and members of council of the city of Vancouver. The representatives of the Strathcona Property Owners and Tenants Association were also present. As a result of these meetings it was agreed that the real need in this area appeared to be one of finding ways and means of assisting the citizens in rehabilitating and upgrading their properties and to involve the people concerned in the total process. The earlier proposals of the city contemplated acquisition and clearance of most of the properties in the area.

The National Housing Act contains no provisions for grants or subsidies to assist people of low income in the repair and rehabilitation of privately-owned residential properties. It seemed apparent that the citizens of Strathcona area considered such aids to be necessary in their case. Therefore, it has been arranged with the city and the province as well as with the Strathcona property owners and Tenants Association, that a committee should be appointed with representatives from the city, the province and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation as well as the association charged with the responsibility of formulating proposals for the rehabilitation of one or two blocks within the area.

A condition to the minister's agreement is that the residents of the area are given the fullest opportunity to participate in the selection of the site and in the terms of reference for the proposed study. Since that time a working committee has been organized under the chairmanship of the director of the Vancouver social welfare department. The Strathcona Property Owners and Tenants Association is represented on the committee, as are officials of the province and of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Continuing meetings at about weekly intervals have been held since October 1. The committee has agreed to the principle of the residents' association engaging consultants to assist in the definition of a one or two block area which may be the subject of an experimental rehabilitation project and as well to assist in examining the buildings in this area to establish what might be done.

Mr. Winch: That is only 40 acres out of 1,350.

Mr. O'Connell: That is the only area in respect of which the city of Vancouver has made application for an implementation scheme. City officials are examining the area to ascertain—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

SOCIAL SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF INCOME FLOOR

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): On November 5, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if, in view of his recent expressions of concern about people on low income and in view of the representations made in Halifax to the Senate Committee on Poverty, the government was now prepared to consider establishing an income floor below which no Canadian would be allowed to fall. The Prime Minister very courteously replied that the government was not yet satisfied that this was a realistic step.

Two days later the government published its white paper on tax reform. It proposed, among other things, to raise income tax levels from the present levels of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married couple to $1,400 for a single person and $2,800 for a married couple. By this very proposal the government admits that several million Canadians are now living below acceptable income levels. The fact that three-quarters of a million taxpayers are now going to be dropped from the rolls because their income is too pitifully low to tax is the strongest argument anyone could advance for the need to establish a guaranteed income in Canada.

As I listened to the debate this afternoon on the motion of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) I had the distinct impression that some members on the government side of the House have the idea that if and when the proposals of the white paper become law in 1971, everything will be all right; low income people will then know the full blessings of the just society. Not so. Fairer taxation will help, of course. We are not sure yet how fair it is nor how many of the proposals will be put into effect. But fairer taxation will not necessarily provide income for the 4½ million to 5 million Canadians who live in poverty. Only a guaranteed annual income can do that; and only this Parliament can establish that income floor.

Where is the money to come from? There is only one source, ever. It is the taxpayer's money, based on the wealth this country can produce. But today a lot of this money is wasted in keeping poverty in being. Poverty is not cheap. The Economic Council in its latest report points out that poverty is an expensive luxury. Keeping people poor means using precious resources to deal with more sickness than we would otherwise have. Keeping people poor means using valuable resources to administer public welfare and assistance programs. Keeping people poor means paying for more policemen, judges and jails than we would otherwise need. Keeping people poor means losing human abilities and possibilities on a scandalously wasteful scale. And what have we to show for keeping people poor? We have frustrated, alienated, wasted, broken human beings who exist in a substandard world of their own and watch twentieth century life passing them by on television. We send out the rare committee to weep over their misery. No wonder the young people revolt against our hypocrisy.

The time has come for us to realize that while millions of our fellow Canadians continue to live in poverty, the rest of us cannot long continue to enjoy affluence with impunity. The time has come to face the challenge of getting rid of poverty altogether and, as has been indicated over and over again in this House, although there is never money to establish things like a guaranteed income we know perfectly well that if a war were to break out tomorrow, money would be no object; it would be found, and in the amounts needed.

An essential, first step in that direction is the building of a solid income floor based on a modern standard of living and geared to changes in that standard of living. Surely we want to get away from the charge levelled in the story told by the hon. member for Lanark and Renfrew (Mr. McBride) in which the poor said bitterly of their wealthy benefactors, "They confirm us as beggars". The guaranteed income will be a first step in wiping out that indictment against the rest of us.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her continuing concern in this area, one which we all share. I am sure that all members of the House share this concern, as does the government. As the hon. member knows, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) answered the question that was asked by the hon. member during the oral question period in this chamber on November 5 in the only way he could. At that time he stated, as recorded at page 547 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about a guaranteed annual income, yes, we have been considering it for some time. I am not in a position to say when a statement will be made, because as a government we are not yet satisfied that this is a realistic step.

May I suggest that when the Prime Minister used the word "realistic" he was talking about a step that must be realistically beneficial to people of low income, and in my judgment there is no use doing anything until we know that this will be the result of government action.

I think also it is obvious from the remarks of the Prime Minister that the government's constant attention has been addressed to the interest of Canadian citizens on low income. Certainly the tax reform proposals, about which the hon. member had some nice things to say a minute ago, recently put forward by a genuinely liberal Finance Minister and supported by the government, are unassailable proof that a major preoccupation of this government is the creation of a just and equitable society for all Canadians. How this can best be done is matter for discussion and consideration of the kind that was intimated by the Prime Minister in his reply to the hon. member.

I might add that I share the hon. member's deep and sincere concern that has continued for many years, and I have confidence that this government will be producing proposals that are best for the low income families in our country. I am quite sure that all members of the House will endorse such proposals when they are brought forward.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

VETERANS AFFAIRS—TRANSFER OF LANCASTER HOSPITAL

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to discuss in the seven minutes that I have under the rules this evening is that of the proposed transfer of Lancaster Military Hospital to the board of commissioners of the Saint John General Hospital and the New Brunswick department of health. There are a number of questions involved in this whole matter.

First of all, an integral part of the agreement in the transfer was that there was to be a 300-bed wing provided for veterans at the Saint John General Hospital, and second that the takeover date was to be the 1st day of July, 1970, or such other date as the parties might agree—I repeat, "or such other date as the parties might agree."

This particular question was debated very fully at the New Brunswick provincial convention of the Royal Canadian Legion held on September 1 and 2. As the minister perhaps knows, it was also debated a week ago when the very able and eloquent member of the New Brunswick Legislature for Saint John West, Mr. Logan, aired this matter on the television station there. A response was made to Mr. Logan's charges by the New Brunswick minister of health, Mr. Theriault.

I wish to quote from a press release which appeared in the Saint John Evening Times Globe on November 3, in which Mr. Theriault is reported to have said that there are two points with which he is dissatisfied; first, the amount of the federal grant in connection with this takeover, and second, the takeover date. As to the grant, he felt it should be $10 million instead of the 4½ million that the federal government is transferring to the province. Second, he objected to the takeover date because he did not expect that all the details could be worked out by that date. I would call the particular attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) to these statements by the New Brunswick minister of health. They indicate that the province of New Brunswick is not prepared to take over the hospitalization of New Brunswick's veterans on July 1 next.

There is something more important than just having all the details worked out, Mr. Speaker. I feel, and the New Brunswick veterans feel, that before any transfer is made the proposed new 300-bed wing at the Saint John General Hospital must be ready for the receiving and proper care of those veterans who need treatment. In answering my question I would ask the minister to advise whether or not he is aware of the freeze on new hospital construction that has been imposed by the New Brunswick provincial government. I am sure that the minister has received many letters on this subject, as have all of us who represent New Brunswick constituencies. I am deeply concerned. I know the Royal Canadian Legion is deeply concerned. I know the veterans are concerned.

In order to help the minister out with his answer—I want to be helpful because we are working toward the same objective on this matter—I would like to place on the record the resolution passed at its convention by the Royal Canadian Legion. If the minister has not received a copy I would be glad to supply him with one. It reads:

> Whereas the present agreement between the Department of Veterans Affairs, Province of New Brunswick and the Commissioners of the Saint John General Hospital provides inter alia for the transfer of Lancaster D.V.A. facilities to the province of New Brunswick by July 1st, 1970,
> And whereas the integral part of the aforementioned agreement is the construction of a 300-bed wing to the Saint John General Hospital and the agreement provided for a takeover date for Lancaster D.V.A. as "the first day of July, 1970 or such other date as the parties may agree,"
> And whereas the New Brunswick Command, Royal Canadian Legion strenuously and vigorously objects to any takeover prior to the construction of the new wing, and paragraph 11 of the agreement clearly contemplates no move of veterans until the said wing is completed,
> And whereas the New Brunswick Command Royal Canadian Legions considers the pith and substance of the agrement to be the proper care of veterans in conjunction with the construction of the new wing, and whereas the Department of Health for the province of New Brunswick has announced a halt in hospital construction in the province.
> Therefore be it resolved that the proposed takeover of the Lancaster D.V.A. facility by the Province of New Brunswick be postponed until such time as the new wing proposed for the Saint John General Hospital is constructed and ready for occupancy.

I am sure that the New Brunswick veterans, especially those who are sick and who need hospitalization, will be deeply interested in what the minister has to say on this question.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) has said, there is indeed an agreement between the Government of Canada and the province of New Brunswick whereby Lancaster will be transferred to the province on July 1, 1970, "or such other date as the parties may agree." The agreement referred to also provides for the construction by the province of New Brunswick of a 300-bed wing to the Saint John General Hospital, for which my department is ready to contribute the sum of $4½ million.

Both the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) and myself are aware that the province of New Brunswick has announced that it will not commence hospital construction this year. Under the circumstances we are reviewing the situation with the province. Officials of my department were in New Brunswick last week meeting with officials from provincial hospitals, the provincial department of health and the Legion. I myself expect to meet with the provincial minister of health later this month.

We must remember, however, that the paramount consideration is the welfare of the veterans. My duty as Minister of Veterans Affairs is to ensure that our veterans continue in the future to receive the highest standard of hospital care. This cannot be accomplished by keeping our hospitals in isolation when there is such a heavy load of chronic cases. We must ensure that they participate fully in the most modern techniques and medical services that can be obtained only in hospitals with an adequate load of active patients. This is the only way to ensure that a sufficient number of professional and technical staff will continue to be attracted.

Under the rules I have only three minutes at my disposal; therefore I must conclude my remarks. I wish to assure the hon. member for York-Sunbury and all New Brunswick veterans that our sole purpose is to improve the lot of veterans. We will stampede no one into a forced transfer, but we are duty-bound to ensure that the best possible care for our veterans is secured for the future.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, November 12, 1969

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be of some assistance to the House if I set out the government's intentions as to the business for the balance of this week. It would be the government's objective to call the following measures this week in the following order, in order to have them disposed of: First, as already announced for today, item No. 19, the Canada student loans bill, to be followed by No. 12, the small businesses loans bill, and item No. 10, the CNR financing bill. It would be intended then to call item No. 6, the Canada Corporations Act amending bill, which has already been under debate, to be followed by item No. 17, the repeal of the Deep Sea Fisheries Act, item No. 18 with respect to the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, and finally item No. 30, the resolution standing in my name with respect to the Canada Elections Act.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I propose, pursuant to Standing Order 43, in view of the fact that no statement has been forthcoming from the government on motions today with regard to the greatly increasing dissatisfaction and unrest among the Indian people of Canada, to ask for unanimous consent to move a motion. I will exercise my right under that Standing Order to make a very brief explanation which I hope will move the House to let me move the motion.

Despite sincere efforts by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to deal with the increasing unrest and dissatisfaction with government policies, no substantial results have to date been achieved. Indeed, only today the Indian people on the Six Nations Reservation near Brantford, Ontario, have announced their intention to secede from Canada and have sent notice of this decision not only to the Prime Minister but to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

This extreme action can only have been taken because of a sense of deep frustration among the Indian people at the treatment they are continuing to be accorded by the government. Indeed, the fact that such notice has been sent to the Secretary General of the United Nations can only embarrass Canada internationally and give those unfriendly to us an opportunity to discredit our good intentions with the newly developing nations.

The motion I will move, if the requisite consent is given me, is:

That the question of aboriginal and treaty rights in particular and the general dissatisfaction of the Indian peoples of Canada be referred at once to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and that this committee shall have the widest authority to look into these matters, to summon witnesses and to seek whatever expertise may be required to appropriately carry out this mandate.

Should I be granted unanimous consent the house leader of my party would be glad to consult with the government house leader as to an appropriate time for debate on the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I understand there is not unanimous consent. In the circumstances we may not proceed with the motion proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Nesbitt: Who said no?

Mr. Trudeau: I said no.

DOMINION COAL BOARD DISSOLUTION ACT

MEASURE TO DISSOLVE

On the order:

First reading of Senate Public Bills—Bill S-3, an Act to provide for the Dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act—The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Dominion Coal Board Dissolution Act

Mr. Speaker: Before calling Bill S-3, an act to provide for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act, I have to refer to a procedural discussion which took place in the House during the last few days.

On Thursday last the hon. member for Peace River rose on a point of order to suggest that the provisions of Bill S-3, an act to provide for the dissolution of the Dominion Coal Board and for the repeal of the Canadian Coal Equality Act, the Coal Production Assistance Act and the Dominion Coal Board Act, constituted a violation of clauses 53 and 54 of the British North America Act and also of the provisions of two of our most important rules of procedure, Standing Orders 62 and 63. In his submission the hon. member contended in particular that the stated purpose of clauses 2 and 3 of the bill dealt with the appropriation of public funds and, this being so, that the bill could only be initiated in the House of Commons upon a recommendation of the Crown.

Subsequently, on Monday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre debated the point of order and referred in some detail to a number of authorities dealing with the question of appropriating public funds. I suggest that the hon. gentleman made a lucid and cogent presentation and received the strong support of the hon. member for Edmonton West.

The President of the Privy Council, when he entered the discussion on Monday last, quoted citations 449 and 450 of Beauchesne's third edition in relation to the proceedings on Bill S-3. Those citations read as follows:

449. A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by Parliament, is not a money bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

450. A bill designed to furnish machinery for the expenditure of a certain sum of public money to be voted subsequently by Parliament may be introduced in the House without the recommendation of the Crown and without a resolution being first considered in committee.

I have had an opportunity to review the origin of the citations referred to by the minister. They are to be found at pages 118 and 119 and page 240 in the Journals of 1912-13 but, frankly, I do not think those two precedents are analogous to the question now before the House.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

In his ruling given on January 16, 1912, the then Speaker stated, in part, as follows:

The question is not free from difficulty. Mr. Bourinot in his observation seems to have extended the scope of the rule rather beyond the terms in which it is worded. What those terms cover is "A motion for any public aid or charge upon the people." This bill does not constitute such a motion. The most that can be said is, that under its provisions, something may be done which may give rise to a claim against the government. If this be sufficient to bring it within the rule, then it would have to be held that every bill conferring a power upon the government in the exercise of which expense might be incurred, comes under the rule. This, in my opinion, would be giving altogether too extensive an interpretation to the words "a motion for any public aid or charge upon the people."

While the authorities are not absolutely reconcilable, I am not disposed to attach to the rule this very enlarged meaning. I am therefore of opinion that no resolution is necessary.

It will be seen from the remarks of Mr. Speaker in 1912 that there was no question of altering or amending any provision of any Appropriation Act.

The provision in subclause 2 of Bill S-3 cannot be construed in any manner except as an amendment to Appropriation Acts, past and future, and bestows upon the Governor in Council power to dispose of moneys in a manner not authorized by the relevant provisions of certain Appropriation Acts.

By allowing those financial provisions to remain in a public bill sent down from the Senate, the privileges of this House, in my opinion, have been infringed. Section 1 of Standing Order 62, which is explicit in that regard, reads as follows:

This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

My ruling, therefore, must be that as the provisions in Bill S-3 relating to the appropriation of public moneys infringe the privileges of this House that bill should be laid aside. Therefore the notice for first reading of this bill will be removed from the Order Paper.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

ORAL QUESTIONS

POLLUTION

BRUSSELS INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING ARCTIC WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. At the Brussels International Legal Conference on Maritime Pollution will the Canadian position with respect to the north be based upon the assertion of Canadian sovereignty over all the waters between the Canadian Arctic islands and the Canadian mainland? Will the Canadian position at the Brussels International Legal Conference on Maritime Pollution be based on that ground?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will be based on the position that I have stated in my answers to previous questions by the hon. member: that Canada asserts its claim to as large a part of the Arctic waters as is possible and is proper. However, we have not yet instructed our minister in Brussels to put any lines on a map.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to infer from the Prime Minister's answer that Canada will be attempting to negotiate at this international conference without making it clear what our area of sovereign responsibility is?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, because the conference is involved precisely with international waters and the minister will be discussing Canada's role and its desire to participate in international controls. But what we do with our own waters is not a matter for discussion at Brussels.

Mr. Baldwin: The government is muddying the waters.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Member of Parliament for Don Valley stating the position of the government of Canada when he suggested at the United Nations' political committee that a percentage of each sea, be it Atlantic or Pacific or any other, be set aside for international exploitation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the question is in order and whether we are not attempting to extend the rule which allows the Prime Minister to comment on statements made by ministers outside the House on questions of government policy. It seems to me that we are at this point attempting to enlarge that general rule.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wished to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but since neither he nor his Parliamentary Secretary are present may I direct it to the acting minister and, hopefully, obtain an answer. To what extent did the government or the minister consult the elected members of the territorial council of the Northwest Territories in the preparation of that puny document which was issued there the other day?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member may wish to rephrase his question since I do not think it was put in the proper form.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, will the acting minister tell us whether the elected members of the territorial council of the Northwest Territories were consulted in the preparation of the speech which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made on Monday?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister will be returning to the House on Friday and I will draw the hon. member's observation to his attention.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether the statement made in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory is the last statement with respect to gradual progress toward more autonomy in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories or is a further statement anticipated, particularly in view of the fact that next year is the centennial of the Northwest Territories?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question in detail, but I did see an early draft of the minister's speech. To the extent that he adhered to it I could say that it is a statement of government policy.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—POSITION OF EXTRADITION APPLICATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question, as today is an appointed day for him to be in the House, but in his absence I will address it to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement by Mr. George Aldrich, the legal adviser to the United States State Department, in his memorandum to the minister that "our embassy in Ottawa advises that the Canadian federal government does not have any great interest in reopening the case", would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House where its application for the extradition of Hal Banks now stands?

A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is not going to answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Goyer: I do not think this will be necessary after I have said that I feel this question should be directed to the Minister of Justice.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, can I ask anyone who has nerve enough to answer my question? I am willing to listen. If the Minister of Justice would like to have a go at it, let him try.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything in the newspaper story that the hon. member and I both read to change the facts of the situation, namely, that we have received legal advice from counsel in the United States that there would be no purpose in attempting to reopen the case. I only wish the hon. member would be as interested in the administration of justice as he in playing politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if I, too, were a prima donna I would demand retraction of that remark because, as we all know, Members of Parliament are not allowed to make such remarks. However, I will not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member will allow the hon. member for Témiscamingue, whom I have already recognized, to ask his question and I will return to the hon. member in just a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. As the same memo to Mr. Rogers from Mr. Aldrich recommended that Canada be informed that "as a matter of law the Canadian government is free to make a second request through the courts for the extradition of Harold Banks", is it the intention of the government to make a second request?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I can only reply by quoting from the same report to which the hon. member addressed himself. I quote:

> Reports from our Canadian posts generally indicate that the Canadian political interest stems more from attempts to embarrass the Canadian federal government than from an interest in the return of Mr. Banks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: My question remains unanswered, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Minister of Justice a further supplementary: Who played politics more with Mr. Banks than did the hon. member?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Hees.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—ACTION OF EMPLOYEE WITH RESPECT TO DEMONSTRATION AGAINST QUEBEC BILL 63

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

On the occasion of the famous demonstration against Bill 63 now before the Quebec National Assembly, a C.B.C. employee called the leaders of the Rouyn CEGEP, asking them to organize the said demonstration.

Does the Secretary of State know that some C.B.C. employees use the Corporation's telephones to organize similar demonstrations in remote areas such as Rouyn-Noranda? If not, would he inquire about the situation with a view to determining which C.B.C. employee made that telephone call to the Rouyn CEGEP?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of this fact, but I agree to inquire.

[English]

UNITED NATIONS

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—CANADA'S POSITION ON ADMISSION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the discussions leading to diplomatic relations between Canada and the People's Republic of China are apparently progressing favourably, will the Prime Minister consider making a statement to the House explaining why the government of Canada did not propose to the United Nations the seating of the People's Republic of China in that body, without prejudice to the eventual position to be held there by the government of Taiwan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I would not make such a statement, Mr. Speaker, because I have nothing to add to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said in previous explanations.

DRUGS

MARIJUANA—STUDY OF EFFECTS ON HUMANS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister initiated a study by his department concerning the medical effects of the use of marijuana and, if so, when will he be in a position to inform the House of the findings?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Money is available to various scientists in Canada for study and research having to do with the effects of marijuana on humans. Some experiments are going on, first, with a view to ascertaining its effect on animals, and the findings will then be related to the study affecting humans. I do not know precisely when the results will be made public.

I should like to point out that the commission inquiring into the non-medical use of drugs has money available to it for similar studies. As the hon. member may know, it is expected to make an interim report some time in January and a final report about a year and a half later.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL

REDUCTION OF PERMANENT SECRETARIAT, EMPLOYMENT OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. Has the Economic Council of Canada been asked to reduce its permanent secretariat and to refrain from entering into contracts with outside consultants?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The Economic Council, like other departments and agencies of the government, has been given a budget for the next fiscal year. In some instances this will result in a reduction of staff; in some instances it will result in changes in programs, and in other instances it will involve changes in the practice of hiring consultants. The determination of which of these courses of action is to be followed is left largely to the agency.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask whether this important body has made representations to the effect that its work might be inhibited and proscribed by these respective suggestions?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Speaker, such representations have been made and given consideration.

SPORTS

TELEVISING OF FOOTBALL PLAY-OFFS

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Thousands of Canadians who receive only television coverage provided by the CBC will be able to see only four or perhaps five of the eight Canadian Football League play-off games, which is a great injustice to them. Would the minister contact the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and urge that all eight games be carried on the full network?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a representation. He has to assume he has the support of all hon. members and that this will be looked into by the appropriate minister.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

NATIONAL DEFENCE COMPLEX—ASSURANCE RESPECTING ESCALATION OF COST

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker. It has to do with the tender recently let to build a national defence complex at a cost of $27 million. Can the minister assure the House that the final cost of this building will not escalate to $135 million, or five times the estimate, as was the case with the National Arts Centre?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as asked is argumentative.

HEIGHT OF STRUCTURES NEAR PEACE TOWER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Public Works and it is on the same subject, but I hope in order. In view of the announcement that a $27 million national defence headquarters is to be built in centre town in place of the national defence tower at LeBreton flats, which was to have cost $90 million and would have been higher than the Peace Tower, may I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he can assure the House that there are no plans for any buildings in the immediate proximity of this building that would be taller than the Peace Tower of this building?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that assurance can be given.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

SASKATCHEWAN PROPOSALS RESPECTING WHEAT AND POTASH

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister had discussions with Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan today, or is he about to have them and, if so, could he advise the House whether he is willing to support the Premier's barter deal on wheat and the prorationing of production and a minimum price for potash?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, which makes the second part hypothetical.

Mr. Southam: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the Prime Minister has his discussion with the Premier, will he look favourably on his representations?

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

STATUS OF WATERS BETWEEN ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON AND CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In his reply to a question from the Leader of the Opposition the Prime Minister referred to international waters. Can the Prime Minister tell the House what will be the status of the waters which lie between St. Pierre and Miquelon and Canada? Will any fishing activity be permitted in this area, and will our boundaries be the traditional three miles or will the 12-mile limit apply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot answer that statistical question, Mr. Speaker.

ACCESS TO NORTHWEST PASSAGE FOR FOREIGN SHIPS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recent statement of the Minister of Transport that it is acceptable to Canada to permit free access to the northwest passage to United States ice-breakers and freighters, is it the policy of the Canadian government to agree that access shall be permitted to all other nations irrespective of their purposes or their relationship with Canada and the western world?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Laing.]

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that the United States has already made use of the passage, is the government making certain that there will be security restrictions and protection for Canada and, indeed, North America, against the use of access to the northwest passage by nations for purposes other than trade and goodwill?

Mr. Trudeau: In so far as it will be necessary and possible, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOCATING OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Defence. I hope he will be able to reply to it so that I can answer a number of questions I have received. Has a decision been reached to locate any of the new CF-5 aircraft in northern Canada? If so, how extensive will be the navigational equipment necessary to meet Arctic conditions having regard to the proximity of the magnetic pole?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that this is the type of question that should be placed on the order paper. When the hon. member receives a reply in writing, perhaps he could pass on the information in writing to his constituents.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. By leaving out the last part—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase the question.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether a decision has been reached to locate any of the CF-5 aircraft in northern Canada?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No decision has been reached, Mr. Speaker, because there are no such plans.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

DISTRIBUTION OF GRANT FOR PROGRAMS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Would he tell the House how he intends to divide between the provinces the $50 million ear-marked to promote the teaching of a second language, or, rather, which steps he will take to enable each member state of the federation to benefit equally from it? Would the province of Quebec be treated differently in view of its special situation?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is seeking information which should normally be given to the House by way of a statement on motions.

[English]

AIR TRANSPORT

CRASH AT LABRADOR CITY—AIRPORT EQUIPMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Transport. Is the minister prepared to make a statement in the House concerning the circumstances of the tragic plane crash yesterday at Labrador City and can the minister, either now or in a subsequent statement, assure the House that this airport is adequately equipped with GCA equipment and DOT personnel to man it?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In answer to the question put by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, the department started to look into this matter yesterday. I will be pleased to inform the hon. member of any further information, and when the department will have a report.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the serious effect on the standard of living of Canadian consumers caused by the price increases in gasoline and heating oil just announced by Shell Canada Limited, would the minister suggest to the Prices and Incomes Commission that they make an early investigation of these price increases?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that the price increase announcement made by that company is inflationary and a danger to the Canadian economy. I regret very much that the company saw fit to make these price increases. I have endeavoured to make clear, as explained in the House many times, that the Prices and Incomes Commission is independent and entitled to look at this or any other question as it thinks necessary.

Mrs. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister, in view of his reluctance to advise the Prices and Incomes Commission of his opinions, whether he would now consider setting up a prices review board under his direct control to investigate these increases which keep occurring with rather alarming frequency?

Mr. Basford: First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I say that at one point the House wanted an independent body, but I am delighted with the hon. member's confidence in me since she now feels I should have direct control. I will certainly consider that.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Are we to assume from his answer and from the view he has expressed with regard to this price increase that either he or the government are now expressing opinions as to specific restraints that should be applied, indicating what is appropriate to particular conditions, rather than simply calling for a general exercise of restraint?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, any general call for restraint must, of course, involve individual companies and price decisions, and I was commenting on one this morning.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. I understood what the minister said very well. What I was asking him was whether the government is now doing what the Prices and Incomes Commission says it is unable to do in the absence of a consensus, namely, to indicate what does, in effect, constitute restraint in a particular circumstance?

Mr. Basford: In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, what constitutes restraint is companies and others making private decisions not to increase prices. I think I have made that very clear for some time.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to do anything about the specific promise he made last August to investigate prices in the automotive industry?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that that question was asked; at least, it was according to my recollection. If I am wrong the minister may reply. Apparently I am right.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that the minister has commented on the Shell Oil increase, what is his opinion of the apparent increase which is being voted on today as a result of the Inco settlement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister to express an opinion, and I do not think that a question asked in this way is acceptable.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might rephrase the question, always recognizing the Chair. After we know what the Inco settlement is, will the minister be prepared to come into the House and express an opinion on whether it too may be inflationary?

Mr. Basford: If that should be indicated as a desirable course of action, yes.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister which has to do with his visit to New York. Besides dancing with "Funny Girl", did the Prime Minister preempt his next election by going to see the Broadway play, "Promises, Promises"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FUTURE STRUCTURE OF MILITIA FORCES AND CADET CORPS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of National Defence inform the house whether the government is contemplating a drastic reduction in Canada's militia forces and, if so, will this involve the various cadet movements?

Mr. Speaker: I should think that the question as asked is an invitation to the minister to make a very general statement of policy. I hope the minister will not attempt to do that at this time.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I intended to indicate to the hon. member that I did specify in my announcement of September 19 that the number of cadets would not be reduced. So far as the militia is concerned, we are currently discussing this matter with the Conference of Defence Associations, and I am sure there is going to be a meeting of minds on what the future structure of the militia forces will be.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the permanence of the tender to build a new defence headquarters I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether we should understand that the defence review has now been concluded?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, my own interpretation in respect of the defence building is that it is just an indication that we are still in business.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST THAT STANDING COMMITTEE MEET

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that almost two weeks ago we received the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the evidence taken by the committee at the last session on matters referred to it, will the House leader take this matter up with the chairman of the committee and urge an early calling of meetings?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ARCTIC FORCES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence indicate when he will announce his plans in respect of Arctic forces, a subject of much discussion these days?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I hope this may be soon, if that is satisfactory to the hon. member. May I also indicate to him that after the many representations he has made the flights in the North are more regular than before.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIGERIA-BIAFRA—DISCUSSIONS WITH UN SECRETARY GENERAL

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to his meeting yesterday with the Secretary General of the United Nations. Can he inform the House whether or not in his discussions with U Thant any matters were raised relative to the war in Nigeria-Biafra, specifically the removal of some of the obstacles the Prime Minister referred to in his speech in the debate in reply to the Throne Speech in terms of relief and progress regarding the possibility of United Nations assistance toward a ceasefire?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can speak only in general terms because I believe I would be wrong to refer to the discussions in detail. The matter of confidence regarding these meetings is very important. I did want to assure myself whether Canada could usefully take any new initiatives at the United Nations. On that aspect of the question I received no encouragement from the Secretary General.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, was the Prime Minister able to ascertain from the Secretary General whether the United Nations might play some role in establishing effective relief corridors?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, and I would hesitate to speak in the name of the United Nations.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED LACK OF EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be allowed to rephrase a question I tried to direct to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board on November 10. Having in mind the statement last weekend by the chairman of the Public Service Commission of Canada alleging discrimination in employment opportunities for women in the Public Service, will he undertake to inquire into this situation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I recommend that the hon. gentleman read the speech of the chairman of the Public Service Commission; I will send him a copy of it. It is an analysis of a situation which is perhaps to some extent reflected in this chamber. It involves obtaining adequate recognition of the rights and qualifications of women, even in Parliament. He was merely drawing attention to the fact that this situation also exists in the Public Service.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I should like to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a supplementary question. Perhaps he would kindly resume his seat so that it will be easier for me to indicate to him that I have the same reservations today that I had last week about questions concerning statements made outside the House by persons other than ministers of the Crown. Perhaps the supplementary question should be asked in another fashion.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to ask the minister whether, in spite of what he has said, he will have a look at this general situation?

TAXATION

SALES AND SPECIAL COMMODITY TAXES—INQUIRY AS TO REVIEW

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor West whether, in view of the statement by the Minister of Finance that the government will review its sales and special commodities tax as soon as Parliament and the country have digested the white paper proposals issued last week, he can indicate when this review will get under way and how it will proceed? Will we have a white paper on the subject of these other taxes and, if so, when may we expect it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the white paper on tax reform points out in paragraph 1.19 that income taxes:

> —should be given priority in the tax reform program. Reform of the sales tax is less urgent and can be undertaken after action on the proposals in this paper.

I think these words speak for themselves. May I conclude by saying that the method of reviewing sales taxes will be announced in due course.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it this relates to something that is possibly in the dim and distant future. Do I understand the minister correctly that it is the intention of the government to have the country and Parliament study the proposals in respect of income tax changes without having had an opportunity to examine and consider in the same context changes in sales and commodity taxes which might very well have a bearing on attitudes toward the special proposals in the white paper?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, Parliament and the public may well feel that the proposals in the white paper are of sufficient importance that they should have primary attention for the time being.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Attorney General for the Northwest Territories. I understand he has that function. When will he be making a statement regarding the administration of justice in the territories?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Within the next two weeks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): In view of the fact that the report on Indians and the law has been sort of sloughed off by his colleague because this subject falls to a great extent within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and inasmuch as there is no such impediment regarding the Northwest Territories, will his statement about the administration of justice cover the salient points of that report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader whether he will bring in an appropriate reference in order that the Standing Committee on Regional Development can continue its study of the various regional development programs in the country, which it did not complete at the last session?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I will discuss that with my colleague, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL—MEETING AND DIRECTIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, now that the Atlantic Development Council has been appointed I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion when it will begin meeting and whether the minister is willing to make a statement on the directions he gives the council, or table them in the House, in order that we may fully understand its duties and its responsibilities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the Council will meet in Halifax in the very near future, that is next week, if not this week.

Its terms of reference are laid down in the legislation, and I do not expect we will issue other guidelines than those contained in it.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that undoubtedly the minister or his deputies will be giving further directions because of the very general nature of the act, when these directions have been given to the council will he agree to make them public by tabling them or making a statement so that all hon. members may be aware of the council's full responsibilities?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if general guidelines are to be issued to the Council, then I shall not object to their being tabled in the House.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the House when the federal government will appoint a Commissioner of Languages as provided for in the act that was passed during the last session?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): In the near future, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDING BILL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Toward the end of last session there was a list of bills given, many of which were not reached. One of them was a bill to amend the Old Age Security Act. In view of the fact that such a bill was not included in the list of bills that the Prime Minister tabled on the first day of this session, may I ask the minister whether there will be such a bill during the course of this session?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is highly unlikely, Mr. Speaker.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PARTICIPATION OF MUNICIPALITIES IN CONFERENCE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the oncoming federal-provincial conference, is it the intention of the government, in co-operation with the provinces, to invite representatives of the municipalities throughout the nation to attend this conference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At one point I made some general remarks along the lines suggested by the hon. member, but of course I cannot issue directions to the provinces with regard to the composition of their delegations.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister prepared to take leadership in this regard and to follow up the matter with the provinces in order to get their opinions?

Mr. Trudeau: Sometimes I am asked to take leadership within areas of provincial juridiction and at other times I am asked not to take leadership in the area of federal jurisdiction, so I am not quite sure in which direction the House wishes me to go.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister say whether representatives from the Northwest Territories Council and the Yukon Council will attend the conference?

Mr. Trudeau: I expect the arrangements to be similar to the ones that existed in the past.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF HOUSE COMMITTEE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since he stated recently that he was contemplating setting up a committee on constitutional matters, is he in a position to advise us whether a decision has been taken in this connection? If not, would he be prepared to issue a statement on this subject in the near future?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the decision has been announced in principle. The main thing is to agree with the leaders of the opposition parties on the most suitable time for the creation of that committee.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—REPORTED REPRESSION AND TORTURE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question concerning leadership outside the country. In view of the continuing reports of repression and torture by the military government of Greece, is the government of Canada making any special effort within NATO to bring the strongest possible pressure to bear on the regime in Greece and, if so, what measures are being taken and what alternatives are being considered by the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the European Commission on Human Rights is studying this question at the present time, and I do not believe that an intervention by the government of Canada is advisable at this time, particularly in view of the fact that the Greek government has agreed to an inspection by a Red Cross international commission of the camps where Greek citizens are detained, and that this commission plans to publish a report on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister ensure that the House is given a report on the present extent of Canadian sales and supplies of military and other equipment to Greece in view of the apparent increase in Canadian military exports to that country since the present regime took over?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, Greece is a member of NATO and this question must necessarily come under our general NATO policy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION OF "BANKS", QUALIFYING STUDENTS, ETC.

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-135, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make a number of amendments to the act which created the Canada student loans plan. As hon. members know, this program was first implemented in July of 1964, in time for the academic year 1964-65. It provides a government guarantee for loans made by chartered banks and certain designated credit unions to qualifying students at the post-secondary level. The federal government pays the interest on these loans during the period that the student is engaged in full-time study and for six months thereafter. From then on the student takes over the responsibility for interest charges and repayment of the principal.

Before speaking in more detail about the proposed amendments, I would like to say something about the important role that the plan has played during the past 5½ years in helping thousands of Canadian students to pursue post-secondary studies. The loans under the plan may be obtained only on the basis of certificates of eligibility which are issued to their own residents by provinces participating in the plan. The act contains a provision whereby any province which operates a student loans program of its own can opt out of the plan as such and receive an alternative payment from the federal government. The province of Quebec elected this option at the time the plan was begun and has received this payment in each year since. All other provinces take part in the plan, as do the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories who issue certificates of eligibility to territorial residents for the purposes of the program.

Eligible students may borrow up to $1,000 in any one academic year and up to $5,000 over their entire academic careers. During the first loan year, 1964-65, some 42,000 students received loans valued at over $26 million. In the loan year ended June 30 of this year, over 107,000 students obtained loans valued at almost $66 million, and it is anticipated that the volume of loans could approach $90 million in the current loan year.

Hon. members can see from these figures that the Canada student loans plan has in fact played a very important role in the field of student aid. When the plan first began in 1964-65 it was the only significant source of student aid available in the participating provinces. During the intervening years, however, many provinces have initiated or greatly expanded their own student aid programs. In many cases they have integrated them with the Canada student loans plan so that financial assistance is provided through a combination of federal and provincial aid.

Each participating province has designated an appropriate provincial authority to be responsible for issuing certificates of eligibility for that province. Each province has an allocation which limits the aggregate value of certificates of eligibility which it may issue.

Very soon after the implementation of the plan it became evident to all concerned that it was highly desirable for provinces to co-ordinate among themselves a number of administrative matters associated with its effective operation. For this purpose a committee of officials of the provincial governments, including the province of Quebec, has met regularly in Ottawa since 1964 to develop and review continuously commonly agreed approaches to a number of administrative matters. Federal officials have also participated in these meetings. At these meetings a set of criteria has been developed which represents a consensus of the provinces concerned.

The effectiveness of the Canada student loans plan would not have been possible without the active participation and initiative of the provinces at these federal-provincial meetings and their willingness to work toward a consensus of the approach to be followed by all of them on matters of common concern linked with its administration. The result has been a basic student loans facility which is available to students in all participating provinces for attendance at recognized post-secondary institutions inside and outside Canada and which is administered on a uniform and consistent basis among the provinces. At the same time it still leaves individual provinces flexibility to deal with those factors they consider to be operating in a unique way within their own jurisdictions.

Let me now turn to the proposed amendments. Hon. members will recall that the Canada Student Loans Act provides for a basic loan provision for each loan year. This provision is divided among the provinces, both participating and non-participating, into provincial allocations on the basis of the distribution among them of the general population in the 18 to 24-year age group. The provincial allocation acts as a limit on the aggregate value of certificates of eligibility which can be issued by a participating province. The basic loan provision was originally established for the loan year opening on July 1, 1964, at $40 million. The original act provided that this could be increased in subsequent loan years by the percentage increase of Canada's population in the 18 to 24-year age group from year to year. The $40 million, while sufficient over-all in the first loan year, proved to be inadequate in the case of a few individual, participating provinces. It was necessary, therefore, through the medium of the estimates to provide special increases for that year.

Early in the second loan year which began on July 1, 1965, it became apparent that the basic loan provision, which had increased by a small amount over the first year, would be inadequate to meet the demand for loans which would be placed on it. In June of 1966, therefore, amendments were made to the act which increased the basic loan provision for the year 1965-66 to $58 million. At the same time a supplementary loan provision, equal to 20 per cent of the basic loan amount in a loan year, was established.

This provision could be allocated by the Minister of Finance of the day on the request of a province where the demand for loans exceeded the available provincial allocation. This feature was incorporated in the act because it came to be recognized that there was a different relative demand for loans among participating provinces which could not be met simply by dividing the basic loan provision among provinces on the basis of population distribution.

These amendments enabled the Canada student loans plan to work effectively until the loan year 1968-69. During the intervening period, however, the rate of increase in the number of students attending post-secondary institutions was some three times greater than that in the 18 to 24-year age group. This inevitably meant that the growth in demand for student loans would outstrip the increase in the basic loan provision from year to year. When this situation in fact came to a head last year, use was made of the supplementary estimates to provide a temporary solution.

The Appropriations Act, No. 1, 1969, established the basic loan provision for the loan year 1968-69 at $80 million and increased the supplementary loan amount from 20 per cent to 21 per cent of the revised basic loan provision. The same item also took account of the current loan year which commenced last July 1, setting the basic loan amount at $100 million and increasing the supplementary provision to 30 per cent. However, no provision was made for the period beyond June 30 of next year. This meant, in the absence of legislative action prior to that time, available allocations for the loan year 1970-71 would have to be determined under the basic provisions currently in the act itself, and these would be insufficient to meet current needs. It is primarily to prevent this from happening that this bill is being presented at this time.

Another reason for this bill is that during the period since the act was last amended a number of matters have arisen related to conditions spelled out in it, which have caused complications for borrowers and others involved in the effective administration of the program. A number of the proposed amendments are intended to deal with these complications.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the most important of the amendments before us is the one dealing with available allocations for the loan year commencing July 1, 1970, and for subsequent years. In 1970-71 the basic loan provision under the proposed amendment will be established at $115 million, a 15 per cent increase over the current year. For loan years subsequent to 1970-71 the basic loan provision will be escalated by the percentage increase in total post-secondary enrolment in Canada in that year rather than the percentage increase in the 18 to 24-year age group. This will provide for an automatic escalation factor of from 12 per cent to 15 per cent a year for the next few years rather than the 4 per cent to 5 per cent which would have been the case under the present act, and at least will allow the basic loan provision to increase in line with the increase in the post-secondary student population.

In addition to increasing the basic loan provision, the amendments will make permanent the increase in the supplementary loan provision which has been implemented for the current loan year. The supplementary loan provision, if Parliament agrees, will accordingly from this year on be established at an amount equal to 30 per cent of the basic loan provision for a given year. This will provide greater flexibility in meeting the requirements of provinces which for one reason or another have relatively higher student loan requirements than others.

At the time the act was implemented virtually all students attending post-secondary institutions did so on the familiar academic year basis, that is, a fall and winter term followed by a relatively long summer vacation. Accordingly, the terms and conditions under which individual students could obtain loans were all related to the academic year, defined as a distinct period of full-time studies of not less than 26 consecutive weeks.

The past five years have seen a considerable growth in a new form of study program, the semester system. Under this system a student completes a study program which is broken into a number of distinct periods, generally three or four in a year, and to which the traditional concept of the academic year is not applicable. While these students were not definitely excluded from the benefits of the Canada student loans plan, a number of complications and problems were encountered by many of them. Amendments are contained in this bill which will explicitly include students studying on the semester system as well as those who study on the academic year basis. Thus, the full benefits of this program will be made available to a group of post-secondary students whom it was intended to include within it.

Provision is also made in the amendments to enable trust companies, insurance companies and mortgage loan companies to apply to the Minister of Finance for designation as eligible lenders under the plan. Lenders presently operating under the plan are all the chartered banks as well as certain credit unions that have applied for and received designation as eligible lenders.

This amendment will broaden the classes of lending institutions to which students can apply for loans. It will parallel changes made in the recent past in two of the other guaranteed loan programs operated under the Minister of Finance, the farm improvement loans and the fisheries improvement loans programs. It will also parallel changes which are proposed in the bill to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, which will be considered next by the House.

I would like to comment on another amendment in this bill. The existing provisions of the act provide that students are eligible for loans if they are, among other things, Canadian citizens, or are not Canadian citizens but have lived in Canada for one year and have indicated that they intend to make their home in Canada upon completion of their studies.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The proposal in this bill is to require that persons who are non-Canadian, to be eligible for a loan under the act, must have landed-immigrant status and must have resided in Canada for one year. The effect of this amendment is simply to clarify the language presently in the legislation, since it is a condition to obtain landed-immigrant status, and provide that applicants for loans declare their intention to reside permanently in Canada. Let me stress that the amendment will, therefore, in no way restrict the availability of student loans to new Canadians who come here to make this country their home. The main effect of the amendment will be to make clear that foreign students here on student visas are not eligible under the act.

There are a few other amendments in the bill, Mr. Speaker, but I will not take the time of hon. members to describe them at this point. They are either consequential on one or more of the amendments I discussed earlier or are of a minor administrative nature. I am sure hon. members will agree that they can be covered adequately in discussions in the standing committee.

May I say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that the government believes that the Canada Student Loans Act has served a useful purpose in aiding tens of thousands of young Canadians to further their education beyond the secondary school level, enabling them to be better able to take advantage of the opportunities which Canada today offers its young people and thereby to make a greater contribution to Canadian society, which is ultimately of benefit to all Canadians. It is the hope of the government that the amendments being considered at this time will be supported by the House to enable the Canada student loans plan to work even more effectively in achieving its important goals.

Mr. Stanfield: What happened to all those scholarships?

Mr. Dinsdale: Ten thousand!

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for the very comprehensive statement that he has given to the House on a very important subject, the education of the youth of our country. Perhaps it is a cliché to say that the future of our nation depends upon the education of our youth, but it is true.

I am deeply interested in this particular act for many reasons, as a parent and as the president of a school where many students have been able to take advantage of the provisions of the act. I feel the act is a good one but unfortunately—I shall touch on this in more detail later—there have been abuses as there have been in all acts designed to improve our lot. The first item, that of including more institutions to make loans, is a good one and brings this act in line with other legislation. I have often wondered why these institutions were not granted the right to make loans from the beginning. This is an item which we can recommend. Second, I am not entirely clear about the minister's statement on making changes under the certificate of eligibility. What has been deleted here, as I understand it, is explained in the explanatory section of the bill. The act provides that where an applicant—

—(B) has been resident in Canada for a period of not less than one year and has declared that he intends to reside in Canada after he ceases to be a full-time student—

In that event he is a qualifying student. That provision has been deleted, Mr. Speaker, and from the minister's explanation I am not sure why. Undoubtedly this will be raised and thoroughly discussed in committee. We all know, of course, of the brain drain to the United States and other nations every year. Perhaps it would help to retain those who are educated here with the help of these loans if there were such a declaration of intent. At the moment I cannot see the reason for the amendment.

The minister raised the point about the semester, and I think that is good. A great change is taking place these days in the whole educational system of our country. There is fomentation everywhere. Although some of it may be justified, events such as those at Sir George Williams University and Simon Fraser University, for instance, are deplorable. But coming back to the point which the minister raised, the semester idea, previously nearly all universities started in September and went through until May. If you failed two subjects and did not get a chance to write supplementals, the entire year was lost. So the semester idea is excellent; it provides good, progressive education.

The minister stated that the limit of the loan is to remain at $1,000 but is to be based on $500 for each semester. That is good. We all know only too well that under the British North America Act education is a provincial matter. But did the minister discuss the matter of authorization with the provinces? He used the word "payment" in reference to Quebec. Did he mean in this case that it was a loan to Quebec to make necessary loans to students or was this an outright payment? I think the minister indicated it was an outright payment. I would ask him to clarify that matter because I am not completely clear on it, and perhaps I should be as I am a native of Quebec. The minister did not discuss the introduction of the means test. I think he might also clarify that point.

I am completely in accord with this provision of the act. For many years it has disturbed me that children of wealthy parents can obtain a student loan whilst others, when there is a limit imposed, cannot because they do not have the necessary marks. I think the means test is a good idea. Just this morning, Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues expressed the thought that if we are going to reduce the voting age to 18 perhaps we should also be prepared to make students completely responsible from the age of 18. But that is debatable.

There is another point that we must not forget. Whilst these loans help students obtain a university education, it means that they start out in life with a debt of $5,000. Many of us here who were educated during the depression did not have the opportunity to obtain a university education. However, I believe in the means test. I know of the case of a young lady who at the beginning of the winter semester last year filled in the necessary application forms for a loan, went to the bank and obtained the money and terminated her education that day. She was married a few days later and never returned to school.

These are abuses we should somehow or other try to correct. We all want to be on the side of the angels and see that every deserving youth receives an education, but this bill needs to be as carefully screened and looked into as other bills of its kind. As the minister said, in my province of New Brunswick we have a designated official who administers this program. The department responsible is the department of youth, with an able deputy minister and the program has been very well administered over the years. We have been very fortunate in that regard.

Last March I put on the order paper a question dealing with this matter. I was interested in knowing whether we had made many loans which could not be collected and had to be written off. To be frank, I was surprised at the answer I received, but on reflection I can understand the reason for it. The answer to my question shows that at that particular time little had been written off by the government. An amount over $100,000 had been written off because of the death of the students concerned, and something over $500,000 in loans was owed by students who were in default. We shall have to see what can be done about students who are in default. However, only $22,000 had been written off at that particular time. I am afraid that as the years go by many millions of dollars will not be collectable for one reason or another; some students who have obtained loans will leave the country and factors other than death will enter into the picture. There will have to be proper provision for the writing off of such loans.

In conclusion, may I say that I think the amendments the minister is proposing in this bill are good ones and the legislation is good when it is used properly. I should appreciate answers in due course from the minister with respect to the points I have raised on this occasion.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with an aspect of student loans that was not dealt with directly or implicitly by the minister in his statement or by the previous speaker. I am speaking of the whole question of the social legitimacy or social desirability of higher education costs being financed through a loans program.

In the 1963 election campaign the former Prime Minister of this country, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, made what many considered a commendable promise, namely, to provide 10,000 scholarships for Canadian students. By granting scholarships we would recognize that higher education must be universally attainable and that cost should not be a factor in enabling an individual to obtain an education. Of course, no such program has been instituted since 1963. Instead, our program permits students to borrow money and pay it back, with interest. This approach to education is outdated on grounds of social philosophy and on grounds that it will not, even in pragmatic terms, lead to the kind of limited advanced society which we understand the Liberal party espouses.

[Mr. MacRae.]

I therefore wish to suggest briefly what the positive and negative aspects of student loans are when one compares them with the universal right to higher education. By making loans available to students, as opposed to giving them by right a chance of obtaining a post-secondary education, we do not really motivate students who have not reached university age to seek a university education. Only if post-secondary education is universal and as readily available as a public school or high school education will all our students be motivated to seek higher education. The point is—this has been demonstrated in many studies—that unless a child has acquired the motivation to go to university before reaching university age, it is very unlikely that he will go to university or even apply for a loan. Whether a child lives in one of the poor provinces of Canada or one of the rich provinces, he takes for granted his right to a secondary school education.

I submit that if a child has the ability to learn and the talent and desire to go to university, his right to do so should be a basic and fundamental right. I say this because the loans program militates against children of working class parents who view the loan merely as a debt. These children look on the loan as a burden. More important, perhaps, is that these children adopt their parents' attitude in looking on such loans as obstacles which must be overcome. Such children must surmount psychological barriers arising from their backgrounds, which barriers do not inhibit children of wealthy parents in the development of what I may call positive attitudes toward higher education.

All kinds of evidence is available to support my contention. The "Vertical Mosaic", a study of social classes and the power structure of Canada, although it is outdated shows very conclusively the maldistribution of our university population. It shows that the children of the wealthier people of this country are proportionately over-represented at universities when compared with students who come from other class backgrounds. Although student loans have rectified this situation to some degree, I submit that we would do much better if we made university or other post-secondary education free for all children of our society.

I should like to make another very important point about university education. Many consider a university education to be something that is bought—which it is now—and something which you acquire after paying a fee. That sort of thinking has promoted a wrong attitude towards what education is all about. At present our students see a university education as a commodity to be invested in so as to provide a future economic benefit. This, I suggest, is precisely the kind of education and attitude we do not want. We do not want to see that kind of environment nurtured in Canada. Education must not be looked on as a commodity. That is why I am pleased that certain educational authorities have suggested abolishing the B.A. degree. They know that some students want a degree only because it will enable them to get a better or higher paid job. The theory of these authorities is that if you do not grant a degree, only those interested in learning will seek higher education because at the end of it there will be no official recognition of their endeavours. This is a very serious point that others concerned about higher education ought to be considering carefully.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Professions, of course, are quite another matter. It is necessary to retain a formal recognition such as a degree to maintain technical standards. The point is that we in this country must do everything we can to get away from the notion that education is some kind of commodity which it is useful to obtain for a supposed kind of advancement. We must not look upon the loan factor as an inducement to regarding education as an investment.

The next point I want to make—and it was suggested by the previous speaker—is that under the present loans set-up thousands of Canadian students are deeply in debt by the time they graduate; the figure often reaches $5,000 owing on government loans. In my opinion this has an interesting class effect. Its impact weights more heavily on students from average income or poor families, which tends to affect the student's judgment in deciding which course he should enter. The duration of the course is very relevant to such a student. The studies undertaken bear out the fact that students from working class families are more likely to enter short-term courses. This is in fact happening. Students from these families know they will be in debt and therefore choose the shorter courses, avoiding post-graduate work and the longer professional courses. I say again the debt principle weighs very heavily on the thinking of the poorer members of our community. In short, it has an anti-democratic bias.

I wish to suggest the social consequences this attitude will have on our society. I have already indicated that it more seriously affects students from lower income families. These students take the debt problem much more seriously than do the students from wealthier families. When such students graduate, they tend to accept more lucrative jobs in order to pay off their debts. What does this do to our society? Relatively speaking, fewer students are entering the field of social work, fewer are joining CUSO, and I suggest that fewer students are becoming members of the Company of Young Canadians. Fewer students are undertaking socially desirable work because a higher income is required in order to pay off their debt of $5,000. Therefore, in the long run the community as a whole is the loser; we are losing the creative work that many of these university graduates would be willing to carry out if they did not have to work in higher paying positions in order to pay off their debts.

With regard to the general question of extending the range of students to whom these loans would be available, I ask the minister to comment on why part-time students were not considered in the amendments. It is important that men and women who are working in our society and have the desire for some form of higher education should be eligible for a loan. As a first step toward universality, people in this category should also be eligible for loans under the program.

I have received letters from working wives in my constituency, as I am sure other hon. members have, stating that they would take university courses if loans under the program were available to them under this program. At the moment they are excluded. One reason they require a loan is to pay for babysitters while they are attending university. Why should adults who are working part-time be excluded from this measure?

These are my general observations, Mr. Speaker. Although the points have been made in a rather low-keyed fashion, they are extremely important to our society. Some years ago, under the leadership of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, the Liberal Party embarked upon a desirable program, at least in terms of commitment. The program in principle gave the right of education to every young Canadian, not as something that had to be purchased on borrowed money on which interest had to be paid but as something available according to one's own capacities, talents and desires. I suggest we do not have such a legislative program. Although this loans bill is important, it comes nowhere near meeting this requirement and as a consequence many individual Canadians, and Canadian society as a whole, suffer.

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member who has spoken so eloquently and has evidently done his homework on this matter? In doing his research, did he inquire into the question or make any estimate of what it would cost the nation to educate its students to the end of a baccalaureate degree?

Mr. Broadbent: I will be pleased to answer, although I will not go into detail. Perhaps the minister or the questioner could provide more specific information. I do know that approximately two-thirds or three-quarters of the costs of attending university are paid by the state, whether from a provincial or a federal source. This is merely an extension of that cost. I am not trying to underestimate the size of the problem.

A statement of commitment should be made by the government with regard to moving in that direction, and this is not accomplished by a loans program. A very different principle underlies the loans program. If the questioner would like a suggestion regarding the principle of universality, the initial step would be for the federal government to pick up the fee tab of every student who is admitted to a post-secondary institution. At this point perhaps it would not pay his living costs, but every student admitted to such an institution would have a least his fees paid and would not have to pay back those costs to the state. This is an initial step which the federal government could now take at not too great a cost.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the matter of student loans is one of the most essential aspects of the evolution of our society. There is a fundamental principle: the right of the individual to education. It should not give rise to any financial problem, since I believe this right to be inherent in the freedom of the human being. Poverty, the number of children in the family, lack of education facilities in a region, none of those reasons should prevent a student from getting the education to which he is entitled.

That is why I unreservedly approve the comments of the previous speaker, namely that the matter of loans should not even be mentioned, as it is quite obvious that the students who are unable to pay their school fees should be helped. But since we are always stuck in the same system and we unfortunately refuse to consider the necessary reforms and changes within our economic system, we are compelled to accept the lesser evil of student loans.

The amendments brought to the Canada Student Loans Act seem to me worthwhile and I hope that they will further promote education. I take the liberty of pointing out that Quebec has a program of loans and scholarships and therefore has no need for the federal legislation.

It is our duty to see to it that justice prevail in that field. It would be imperative for the federal government to reach full agreement with the provinces which already have their own program so as to prevent any discrimination against any region of our country.

It is a known fact that certain political administrations in Quebec rejected many student loans programs during several years. Thus Quebec lost a considerable amount of money and this explains in part why it is lagging and must take giant strides in order to achieve a decent standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that all the funds which Quebec needs to enable its students to complete their studies be made available to it by the federal government, without any restrictions whatsoever, in order to ensure an equitable distribution.

Such equitable distribution is one of the points I wanted to emphasize. It should not be based on a certain amount, as this would lead to injustice. Actually, should the number of students requiring financial assistance exceed the amounts available, some will be unable to obtain loans. These loans should be made available to all of them, provided, of course, they really need assistance.

Too often, students whose parents could well pay for their studies are using scholarships, so as to have things easy or perhaps to cause trouble.

We should be more wary of the conditions under which loans are granted in order that they may meet a real need. But with that reservation, is it not unfair to set an amount thus setting aside a number of applicants?

Under what principle can we justify discrimination? This problem should be looked into more thoroughly and I do not think we should impose any restrictions, if everybody recognizes the principle that every citizen has a right to education.

Starting from that principle, let us make the required amount available to those who need it and that without any kind of restrictions.

There is always a certain amount of injustice in the present loans plan. In fact, it seems that those are penalized who participate most in the development of the country, that is those who are not afraid of bringing up children. This is what happens when there are five, six or seven children of school age in a family. It is easy to imagine what it costs then and even wealthy families are unable to cope with education expenses if they have at the same time too many children at the post-secondary level.

Students who take advantage of these loans will have to repay them some day. Therefore, why not simply distribute equitably the necessary credit to those who need it?

We will have to come back to this matter in order to defend the freedom of the individual to get an education. Lack of money should not be an obstacle to the development of people, particularly in 1969, when there is an abundance of money. Without education, no one could possibly earn a living these days or consider playing a part in society. It is very important to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to get an education.

I hope that this amendment will be useful. And I close my remarks by saying once again that we will have to study the problem more seriously and consider granting interest free loans to all those who need them, in order to raise the educational level of our citizens, something which our people could be proud of.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to support Bill C-135 and to recommend that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

At the beginning of my remarks, I should like to stress a point just mentioned by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), as regards those students with better financial means who are nevertheless entitled to those loans under the plan. Even if their parents are rich, some of those students want to pay for their education. This feeling of independence is commendable, and I do not see how such a plan could deter—

Mr. Matte: If it deprives others.

Mr. Breau: Nobody is deprived.

Mr. Matte: Yes, because a certain amount is earmarked for this purpose.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Breau: In any case, when dealing with education, one should remember that this question is within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments and that if the federal government intends to subsidize education, it should do so in agreement with the provinces.

In any event, it is important, in my opinion, that the federal government should often take the initiative since such a moving population as ours needs a well-coordinated education system.

Another very important aspect of education that should be taken into account is the fact that conditions change from one province to the other. That is why I think it is extremely important for the federal government to deal actively with this matter.

I should like now to talk about the priority of expenditures for education, and in particular of the change which occurred in the priorities in effect over the last 10 or 20 years.

Everyone knows that the per capita expenditures of the federal and provincial governments with regard to students and the people in general, as well as in ratio to the government revenues from taxation, have greatly increased in the last few years. At any rate, I think that even with an increase in expenditures we have not managed to really deal with the educational problem.

For example, 50 years ago in some provinces and about 20 years ago in others, the principle of free secondary education was accepted.

I think that today it is even more important to get a university education, for instance a B.A. and in some cases an M.A., than it was 30 years ago.

However, at that time, the government assumed the cost of high school education while today university education is not free. Of course, a large part is paid for but education at all levels is not yet free.

Mr. Speaker, here and there, the need for education in our country has not been recognized.

I should like now to make mine the comments of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) when he spoke about free education.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that education is an inalienable right. Everybody should have access to it. Therefore, I think that in Canada we should enjoy free education because today schooling fees represent only a minimal part of educational fees.

This is due to the existing university systems. A student must leave his parents' home to go and study at university, for eight or ten months a year. Moreover, he must pay his expenses to live away from home. One should think of subsidizing students, of helping them to pay their expenses because they must live near the university.

Of course, when we talk of free education, among other things, we should mention in one way or another that what is necessary to pay for all that is deducted at the source. In my opinion, if we study the university education system in Canada, we will find out perhaps that it might be possible to change the priorities, in order to give this inalienable right to students.

Is it not more important to give free education and, perhaps, to spend somewhat less in other fields? Perhaps it would be possible to erect less costly buildings? And perhaps, to reduce some university services in order to give priority to free education?

In a society such as ours, I do not see how anyone could accept that only those able to pay $1,000 or $1,200 a year can go to university. I repeat that this is an inalienable right. Education should be made available to everybody. It should not matter whether a person can pay or not.

Before suggesting that the state should assume the cost of education, I should like to deal with the orientation our university system is taking. I think it should be advisable today to consider the very reason for the existence of the university today.

True it is something of an anachronism. It stems from a XIVth or maybe a XVth century concept, whereby educators gathered together in a center and students had to go to them.

Is that the only way to educate people? Is it the only way to have a university education system?

Today, we are witnessing lots of problems on the campuses where students and professors alike are questioning the authority of the administration and all sorts of other things for that matter. To put it in my own simple words, there is a conflict between the students, the educators and the administrators.

I suggest that we shall never make administrators out of professors and vice versa.

This should perhaps induce us to make a thorough reappraisal of our education system. We ought perhaps to wonder whether we are making the fullest use of our communication and transportation networks. Our universities remain uncharged in spite of the fact that, contrary to what prevailed 20 years ago, it is now possible to travel at a speed of 600 miles per hour and to enjoy very fast means of communication of which these institutions do not avail themselves enough.

Some do but, in my opinion, there is a duplication of facilities in these institutions. We are therefore spending a lot of money on those things while it is a matter of respecting a right or a principle. We are unable to find an alternative for the sole reason that it would cost a little more.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the provinces and the federal government should right now give serious consideration to the role of the university in the Canadian society. They should try to ascertain whether it is not imperative that we should better co-ordinate education, programming and teaching considered as such.

Today, for instance, a professor living in Montreal could deliver his courses across eastern Canada either by being on the spot, or with the help of television. It would be very easy indeed but it is not done.

There are three universities in my province, New Brunswick. It was said that one French university and one English were needed. But I shall not go into that. In any event, there are three universities for 600,000 people. To my mind, that is too many. A lot of money has already been invested in buildings and services alone, and for duplication in administration.

I should like to repeat that I agree with the members for Champlain and Oshawa-Whitby who say that education should be universal, should be accessible to all. However, before saying that more money should be spent on education, the system should be studied in depth as well as the role of the university which was conceived in the XIVth century.

Then, we may be forced by circumstances, by costs and by the standard of living, to review the whole question and see if we might not be able to dispense education at a lower cost.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words about these amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. Let me say at the outset that I think it has been a very acceptable and worth-while piece of legislation. Since its inception in July, 1964, approximately 142,000 students have taken advantage of the act and obtained loans with which to further their education and, in a broad sense, to help Canada as a whole. I am particularly interested in two amendments which have been set forth.

The first amendment deals with landed immigrants. The act is changed in this regard. To be eligible, individuals must no longer be residents of Canada for a period of not less than one year. It seems only right and proper that loans should go to Canadian students or those with landed-immigrant status, rather than to students who may take advantage of the legislation and then return to their native land without being of further assistance to Canada. Of course, we hope they will be of assistance to their native land.

The other amendment makes it possible for students who are enrolled in colleges on semester systems to obtain loans. I am proud to say that the University of Guelph in my city and Simon Fraser University were the first two universities in Canada with a semester system. I think this is still the case. The semester system at Guelph University is working extremely well. It provides an opportunity for many students to continue their education, which they would not otherwise be able to do because of the length of time involved. Under a semester system they can go to school continuously. All in all, the semester system is working out extremely well, and I am happy to note that the plan is being broadened to include it.

I believe that two parts of the operation and control of this act should be considered. A number of people have spoken to me about discrimination in the allotting of student loans. I realize it is up to the provinces to issue certificates, but we at the federal level should be more concerned about this matter. Parents have come to me and indicated that their sons or daughters have been denied student loans. In one case the father and mother were both working and had a family of six children. A student loan was denied one of their children, yet in the same community the son of a banker was granted a student loan. It is very difficult to understand this discrepancy. In August of this year the minister issued a news release in which he said:

> In revising these criteria, no change has been made in the basic principles. In considering whether a student needs financial help, the resources available from the student's family will continue to be taken into account, in most cases, and loans will be authorized only when a student's overall financial resources are insufficient to meet his costs of education. The new criteria include for the first time a uniform procedure to be followed in considering the amount of money that parents can be expected to contribute to the student's educational costs. This will take into account factors such as family income, the number of other dependent children, taxes paid, medical expenses, allowances for a working wife, and other considerations affecting a family's ability to support a son or daughter in college.

If these criteria are followed closely, we should overcome this discrepancy which has been brought to my attention on many occasions. I should now like to speak briefly about the mature and responsible attitude students must adopt when granted a loan. The act has been functioning for some time. At the end of the fourth year a growing number of borrowers have ceased to be students and have become responsible for regular payments on principal and interest. As of June 30, 1968, about 66,400 borrowers were in this category. The report of the Canada student loans plan sets out that the majority of them have adopted a mature and responsible position, but approximately 4 per cent have not done so. The question arises as to how much effort the banks put into collecting loan repayments. Are the banks taking a casual approach and only half attempting to collect the principal and interest because they are guaranteed by the government? Are they taking the attitude that if they do not collect the loans, they will be paid by the government anyway?

Those responsible for administering this act should make it very clear to the banks that they will not be paid the money which has been guaranteed until they have made every effort to collect the loans outstanding. This program has been very good for the business of chartered banks in Canada. In 1968 the federal government paid the chartered banks and other lenders $4,936,456.46 in interest. The plan has been in operation for almost five years, and the interest paid by the federal government to chartered banks on student loans must be in the neighbourhood of $22 million to $25 million. The chartered banks have here a very good account with the federal government and it is up to them to see that the principal and interest are paid.

How many students who received loans were here on student visas? How many of them went home and cannot be located? These are interesting questions. I hope that those responsible for the collection of these debts will ensure that the chartered banks do everything possible to collect them. I am advised that when the program commenced, the banks were paid 4½ per cent interest by the federal government. This rate has been increased to 8⅛ per cent.

Mr. Gray: It started at 5¼ per cent.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Hales: It is now up to 8⅛ per cent. The federal government is paying a mighty good interest rate to the lenders of this money. I conclude by repeating that I feel this has been a very worth-while piece of legislation. I believe the plan must have careful guidance and direction from those in control, otherwise it will get out of hand. Those who take loans must be informed that they must be repaid. They must have a mature and responsible attitude when it comes to repaying loans which have been granted them for the specific purpose of their getting through university. It is a privilege that was not accorded to many in this House. Loans of this type were not available when many of us went through university, but by some way or means we got through. We worked hard to pay our way through. When today's society comes forward with such advantages as these, the only fair and reasonable response of students is to repay the loans on time and with thanks for the privilege that has been accorded them.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take a few moments to make some comments concerning Bill C-135, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act. But before I make them I want to commend the minister who introduced the bill and say that not only myself but, I am sure, many members of the House are delighted to see him in the cabinet. We wish him well in all the responsibilities which he handles so capably.

I also want to make two observations about the speeches just made, one of them by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales). I suppose it is only good, common sense to put on the record the remarks he made concerning the necessity to crack the whip even over such venerable institutions as the banks. This is a laudable observation and I concur in it. The other notable comment was by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) who said that perhaps we should look at the whole structure of post-secondary education and ask ourselves whether we are getting good dollar value for the money that is being spent on it in Canada, and whether in a modern society with all the means and advantages of modern techniques of communication we should continue to have a tremendous number of duplications of facilities, administrations, etc.

The main features of the act are these. First, the act will extend the insurability of loans that are issued by three groups other than regular banks, namely, trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies. Second, it will include students who are landed-immigrants. Several speakers have commented on that feature of the act and I shall not elaborate on it now. Third, I am delighted at seeing the flexibility clause included, that is, the $500 for a semester which is now added to the $1,000 for a whole year.

There is another very good provision to which reference has not been made hitherto in this debate. I feel it is important that we have a ceiling on the loan that a student can take—the ceiling here is $5,000—so that students do not come out of the end of the educational pipeline so encumbered by indebtedness that they are forced to do what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) suggested some are already doing, that is, take employment and pursue goals in society that they would not normally pursue but for the fact that they are so encumbered by debts. In this sense we must do everything we can to enable those who pursue education not to become slaves of our economic system when they have finished their formal education. The clause in this bill specifying that the government will pay off the loan in the case of the death of a student is one that I am delighted to see. I think it is a genuine step forward. It demonstrates the sensitivity of the drafters of this bill, and of the government, to the needs of youth and to what can happen in extreme circumstances.

The main provision of the act is the one which states that the over-all amount of money that is being insured will be raised from $100 million to $115 million for 1970. That is an increase of $15 million of insurable loans at a time of austerity. I think this says in a more than symbolic way that the government is well aware of the priority of education and of the fact that improved educational opportunities should be at the top of its priority list. Thereafter, as the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) has so well explained to the House, the amount of money to be made available will be tied to the proportion of the population that is made up of students.

This act also bears on the problem that is before us all in an increasingly technologically oriented society. Unfortunately, for many reasons it has become necessary for people to spend a larger proportion of their lives in educational institutions than was hitherto the case. This has resulted in a larger and larger proportion of our citizens being engaged at one point in time in the business of being students. This development makes it progressively more incumbent on all governments, and certainly on the national government of our country, to provide means to enable students to continue their studies. For this reason I am delighted to learn of the elevation in the ceiling of insurable loans up to $115 million. In my view this is a first-rate example of federal initiative and involvement in education.

I wish to endorse the observation which has been made before in this debate, that although education comes under provincial jurisdiction we see in this act a worth-while contribution by the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, in an area of primarily provincial responsibility according to our constitution.

The whole discussion today regarding education so far as it relates to the federal government, and therefore to all of Canada—we are the government of the whole country, of course—gives me an opportunity to go one step further and make a proposal on this subject. I propose that in line with the concerns behind Bill C-135 we at the federal level give serious consideration to the creation of a federal agency to unify and standardize education throughout the country. The variety of education among the different provinces is a very serious problem that is faced by many of our citizens. It arises directly out of the mobility of people. This government along with others is already spending millions of dollars to enable Canadians to feel at home in all parts of this great country.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker: How can our citizens feel at home in all parts of Canada under circumstances which now exist wherein the education of their children is very seriously disturbed by most movements across provincial lines? It is true, and I repeat it, that education comes under provincial jurisdiction. But surely if we in this chamber are going to be concerned about techniques and means whereby Canadians can feel at home in all parts of our nation, we must also be concerned with instituting techniques whereby a family's children are not seriously disrupted and unbalanced, or put forward or put back, or failed or passed to other grades and levels of education just because the family happens to move from one province to another.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, education already receives substantial financial aid from the federal government. Especially is this so at the post-secondary school level. There exist a number of areas of jurisdiction which, like education, are primarily the responsibility of the provinces but within which the federal government maintains an active interest. I would suggest but two or three examples to make my case. One is in the area of housing. Housing is a field in which the provinces have a primary responsibility but in which, as all members of this chamber know, the federal government maintains an active role both through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and through the assignment of the full attention of a federal minister without portfolio to the responsibility of housing.

Why has this bending of the constitution come about? Why do we have a minister who is responsible for housing, when housing is not even a primary concern of the federal government but rather, under our constitution, is placed under provincial jurisdiction? It seems to me that it is for a very pragmatic reason. It is simply because there has been demonstrated a need for federal involvement that has long been recognized, and so we have responded.

Similarly, Mr. Speaker, you and all other members of the House recognize that most of the jurisdiction for mines, mining development, and so on, comes under the relevant provincial authority. Yet we have a federal minister in this area of concern who sort of backs up the provinces; he is known as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). In the same way, forestry is primarily a provincial responsibility but in the federal cabinet we have a Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). Of course, the other side of his portfolio, fisheries, is also a provincial responsibility except in so far as it involves coastal waters.

In addition to all these—there are also others but I shall not take up too much time of the House to develop this point—we have a minister in the federal cabinet, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who is responsible for many of the educational interests of the Government of Canada, of Canada and of Canadians generally. So, Mr. Speaker, I propose that we do one of the following: (a) we ought to establish an agency under the Secretary of State to take an active lead in co-ordinating and moving toward establishing a uniform system of education throughout all of Canada, to the end that a family moving from province to province would suffer no educational setback; or (b) if we do not want to make it a branch, a division or agency—whatever you want to call it—under the Secretary of State, it would seem to me that this is a sufficiently important area of concern that we ought to assign this responsibility to a minister without portfolio in the federal cabinet. In that way some order might begin to be achieved in what must be, for many mobile families in this country of ours, educational chaos. With that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I would close my remarks and say that Bill C-135 is certainly deserving of the support of all parties in the House.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I begin by extending my congratulations to the minister not only for his elevation but for the presentation which he made of this important bill. It was brisk, it was competent and I think very elucidating, and I hope he will, so long as he is there, do this again. I would like to associate myself most strongly with the spokesman for our party, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae), who with his usual thoughtful wisdom seized the import of the bill and spoke with great lucidity. As an outstanding educator and a very successful businessman he said those things with which all of us are in agreement, and I will not go over that ground again. I agree with him, and I agree with my colleague from Waterloo (Mr. Hales) that it is important that everything be done to vitiate the potential discrimination in the measure and also to plug any loopholes that can be found.

I suppose our society has always thrown up the lead-swinger. Always there are these people, but it is up to the state to make sure its largesse is extended to them as seldom as possible. I suppose the youth of Canada must be somewhat disappointed with the hon. gentlemen across the way from us. I agree with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) that it was a great disappointment and indeed a most misleading promise to suggest to the young people of Canada that by voting in a certain way, and if that were the course of enough people to put a certain group in power, that 10,000 scholarships would be made available. These scholarships have never been disbursed and I now never hear them mentioned. Apparently they are as remote as the Canada Development Corporation.

[Mr. McBride.]

I suppose, too, the young people of Canada will see eventually that the Company of Young Canadians will be no more. And if I read aright the remarks of the Hon. Judy La Marsh, who must know a great deal about these things, it will not be primarily the fault of the young men about the country but of those who once having erected the edifice no longer offered any interest, direction or concern for this group, which could have been a most valuable organization. I suppose there was even another disappointment when the people of Canada discovered that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was not quite as young as he seemed to allege. In fact, when the true statistic emerged he was as old as I am, and with no flight of fancy would I ever pretend I was or could be a swinger.

The student loans measure is an important one, and heaven knows the student loans have been a real help. This has been valuable legislation. I am in accord with all those who have spoken in favour of this sort of thing. It underlines a federal concern in an area of provincial jurisdiction; there is no question about that. But how could the national government be unconcerned about the development of the nation's human resources? Such a course of action, such an abdication of concern would be totally irresponsible and indeed thoroughly impossible today. I think that despite those forces against it there will in fact be greater and greater involvement on the part of the dominion government in this broad question of educating the youth of our land, indeed educating all the people of our country. I am convinced that one area in which the federal government must become increasingly alert is in regard to the Americanization of our universities. In this connection I believe Professor Steele and those who think like him are on the right track.

I mention this not on the basis of anti-Americanism because that has never been a credo of mine. If I could not be a Canadian I would like to be an American; that is how I view Americans. My concern stems not from any latent anti-Americanism but from anxiety as to what is happening to the Canadian products of Canadian universities.

I hope that my learned friend from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) will not be upset if I seem to use "commodity" language. I am interested, as are some of my colleagues, in the question of intent as to residence in this country. What has been our experience with the declaration as it exists at present?

How did it work? How was it administered? What did so-and-so really declare to make himself eligible for a loan? I think the amendment is an improvement but I have reservations about the age group. I agree with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that in these days of great adult education development it would be unrealistic to impose an age limitation in this bill. That would be passé, a bit old-fashioned.

It should be underscored, Mr. Speaker, that while student loans have helped a great many young people in Canada to further and finish their education, it would be foolish indeed to think that loans of themselves are enough to educate the young people. My own children are on the threshold of university education and when I think of the financial burden which I will not be able to bear alone, this becomes a matter of great sensitivity and something much more than an academic question, if I may risk a pun.

I have known personally some of the problems of working one's way through college, to use an old expression, Mr. Speaker. There was a time when those who had gone through that mill would express the view that it was a desirable thing and it should happen to everybody. I totally disagree. When I think of the wasted hours, the wasted energy, the misdirected hard work that went into the process, I thoroughly agree with the late Dr. Sydney Smith, a Canadian whom I admired greatly. Recalling his own experiences he said he would not wish them upon any young person in this or any other country. It is a very, very difficult problem indeed. In these days of inflation and a rapidly rising cost of living, let us not delude ourselves that this measure will relieve our young people or their parents of the whole burden. It is a good help but it is only part of the job.

Mr. Speaker, in this afternoon's very interesting discussion some hon. members have dealt with the problems of the universities. I note in particular the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) in this connection. However, I do not think that the most important problem facing our universities today is a financial one. There are problems which transcend this. The whole question of academic freedom is emerging in a manner which, in my days in the cloistered halls, would have been unexpected. At that time we thought that the great danger to academic freedom would come from without. But we are now living in an age in Canada and in the United States, and perhaps in most of the western world and even beyond that, when academic freedom is threatened more from within the institution than from without. This is a problem with which universities must grapple, and some of them do so unwisely and bring upon themselves a proliferation of anxieties which make the whole academic process extremely difficult.

I have often wondered what would happen if I retired from this place—or should be retired from it by my electors—and whether I would return to the ivy towers to live out my declining years. But looking at the trouble at universities today I know that unless I were to gird my loins with new strength I should have to aspire to the Senate for more ideas and inspiration—

An hon. Member: There are lots of ideas over there.

Mr. Macquarrie: My friend says there are lots of ideas over there. There may be a renewed elixir of life there, too.

Mr. Speaker, it is well known to members of this House that universities today are troubled, perplexed and torn and that quite often the danger comes from within. This may be one of the revelations in our society. Indeed, I have feelings about the future of this particular institution, our Parliament, and it seems to me that at the present time the greatest dangers are not from without but are from within. However, this is a topic for another day; indeed, I have a feeling it will be a topic for a good many other days.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I recognize that other problems are of vital importance—finances for the individual Canadian, for the young person aspiring to equip himself to better serve himself, the country or the community—and that these things are of tremendous importance as the task of making a living and making ends meet becomes more and more acute. To use the current expression, this is most difficult for the group usually called "the affluent poor", the middle-range group. Indeed, they may find it even more difficult if the white paper recommendations are enacted.

In recent years we have seen a tightening of job opportunities for young people in the summertime. This is another reason why loans are so important. Inquiries and complaints from students about the lack of summer employment are increasing every year. Last year was particularly bad for students seeking summer jobs and I am afraid that this summer will be worse.

So, Mr. Speaker, we must continue with programs such as this and in so far as this bill makes the program more efficient—and I think in most ways it does—it is a measure which is all to the good. I think it will help the educational process and I am sure it will be of value to many students and therefore of value to the country and the people whom we, collectively, are trying to serve. I hope the minister will accept our support in this regard. Since he is a new minister, perhaps he will take note of what has been said by some of the wise men of the opposition.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise and say a few words on this topic which I regard as one of the most important in Canada today. It is encouraging that money for student loans will be increased from $100 million to $115 million. I should like to look at the purpose of loans and consider whether or not they achieve their objective. Certainly there is a need for student loans in this country. Thousands of students have already been helped in this way, as I was. But it must be remembered, as one hon. member pointed out, that many students find themselves in debt upon graduation. The main objective of the act is to ensure that every person in Canada who wants a university education has the opportunity to acquire it. The goal is universal accessibility to education, but student loans do not go all the way toward acheving this. I think we must take a broader and deeper look at the issue.

The Canada student loans program, as everybody knows, was begun in 1964 and arose out of the 1963 election campaign, at which time the Prime Minister of the country was on the campaign trail. Present student loans in Canada are quite inadequate, especially if one recognizes that living costs and tuition costs in the country have risen. Only 16.9 per cent of Canadians receive a higher education, as compared with about 40 per cent of the United States population.

Student loans are no longer adequate for student budgets. Perhaps I can illustrate this point by referring to a survey on student means conducted by the Canadian Union of Students in 1966. This survey, conducted by Robert Rabinovitch, outlines the difficulties students face nowadays. The survey shows that a typical student pays about 25.6 per cent of his budget money for tuition fees, this being an average of $430 a year. The survey also shows that room and board and other household operating expenses take up another 25.28 per cent of the budget, or about $424 a year. Clearly, tuition fees and room and board account for over half of the average student's budget, which normally runs at $1,677 a year. These figures applied to average students attending university two years ago. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, present available loans would not be adequate to meet the needs of today's students, especially since living costs have increased vastly in the last couple of years. A previous speaker in this debate touched on that point.

Then, all across the country students, and particularly girls, have been finding great difficulty in being gainfully employed during the summer. I know that the students of the University of Saskatchewan are facing this difficulty. Girls, especially, have a hard time finding jobs that pay decent wages. Usually they work as secretaries or clerks. Therefore it is quite clear that as tuition fees, the cost of books and the cost of living have gone up, our student loans program has become inadequate.

We must also look at equity in education. Today we do not have equity. Our system in general favours students coming from middle class or wealthy backgrounds. In this regard may I refer again to the survey conducted by the Canadian Union of Students that I referred to a few minutes ago. It shows that those making $3,000 or less make up 22.1 per cent of Canada's population; yet only 9 per cent of our university population consists of children coming from such background. About 54 per cent of Canada's population has an income of under $5,000; yet only 28 per cent of the students in our universities come from such backgrounds.

On the opposite end of the scale we see that 6.1 per cent of our population has an income of $10,000 a year and over and that 25 per cent of our student population comes fom this upper group. These figures show that we have no equity in our educational system today. The class of society the student comes from clearly is a determining factor in his educational potential. A quarter of Canadian undergraduates come from the richest 6.1 per cent group of our population, and about 28 per cent come from the poorer 54 per cent of the population.

If you want higher education to be universally accessible to all, you must change the system. Student loans are good in their way but they do not go far enough. Many young people who want to go to university cannot afford tuition fees; many cannot obtain jobs and earn the tuition fees and others, either because of family backgrounds or early marriages, do not have the opportunity of obtaining the tuition fees. The price of education has gone up in common with the price of housing, clothing and almost everything else.

I should like to emphasize one more point. Making higher education universally accessible means more than just removing the financial barriers to education. We must also remove many of the social, psychological and even structural barriers if most of our young people are to have the chance of going to university. Our so-called lower class people live on inadequate incomes. Many of them live in poverty and in homes where unemployment is rife. Such people have social values that are different from those of the middle class of this country or of similar people in the United States. They do not have the same values, the same confidence in education as their cousins from wealthier backgrounds, or the same motivation to learn. Also, you will find that the children coming from the poorer homes of Canada may not be as healthy physically as many of the children coming from the better-off families. All these factors must be taken into account if one wants to make higher education universally accessible to people of all income levels.

I think it is also true to say that our educational system, and especially our higher educational system, discriminates against children coming from the poorer backgrounds of this country. In support of that contention may I quote what Dr. John Porter had to say. I quote:

> Systems of early selection always favour children from the middle and upper social classes. There are no true culture-free techniques of selection. Lower class children live in environments which are restrictive of their intellectual development. Middle class children are exposed at an earlier age and in greater intensity to a range of cultural items which have become important in the measuring of intelligence and aptitudes. Their parents, moreover, have a better knowledge of the system and can prepare them for it. Middle class parents can turn failure in being selected into success by dealing with teachers and school administrators as social equals or superiors rather than social inferiors which is very frequently the experience of the lower class parent. Some lower and working class children are able to compete in this selection system, but they tend to be the exceptionally able.

I think this point is valid and is borne out when one looks at what is happening in the underprivileged areas of the country. Even the curriculum in our classrooms, which is designed by middle-class Canadians and is oriented towards children coming from middle-class backgrounds, is an example in point. Look at what happens in grade 1. The grade 1 story of Dick and Jane is essentially a story involving a middle-class background. The characters display middle-class attitudes and values which are not always relevant to those coming from poorer families. The stories seldom deal with poverty stricken backgrounds, and always have characters that are white. Children coming from the poor and rural background of the country see little that is relevant in such stories. They live in different worlds. Also, the atmosphere of the classroom alone is another barrier to the progress of lower class students because it is alien and, to them, unreal.

I have touched on some of the factors contributing to the inequities in our educational system today. We must take them all into consideration if we wish to solve the problems confronting us. Student loans go only halfway; they are, so to speak, a halfway house and to that extent they are good. May I emphasize, in summary, that the goal of universally accessible higher education is most desirable. I submit that every person, regardless of colour, economic background or social or ethnic origin, should have an equal opportunity to be educated. Only then will you have a just society.

This means the removal of financial, social and structural barriers that many of these young people are facing long before they reach university age. It is also very desirable to have universal accessibility for society as a whole. Many economists say we are losing millions of dollars a year because students are dropping out of school. At this point I would like to quote from a speech made by the late Robert Winters when he was president of Brazilian Light and Power. This speech was made last year in Windsor, Ontario, on the subject of education. He said:

> To bring such facilities and faculties to all who have the wish and the ability to use them is a financial undertaking of the first magnitude. It requires the resources of all levels of government and the private sector.

That is, the private sector of our economy. He went on to say:

> The level of education and the standard of national economic well-being are inter-related. In our case, it is the major reason for the shortfall in our economic performance compared with our better educated neighbours to the south.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a very relevant fact and should be taken into consideration. Also, it is a great contribution to society. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) talked about the social advantages involved. Much of the unrest we see in our society is as a result of people living in poverty, not only economic but social and cultural poverty. If we had greater opportunities for education for all we would remove some of the lack of purpose many of these young people feel, and many of the needs that go along with it.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying I welcome some of the changes that are being made to the Student Loans Act, but I think we have to go much further. The money is available in this country. All that is necessary is to set the proper priorities. The time to begin is now. Nothing will be gained by procrastinating, or conditions in general will continue to get worse.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, there is no need to speak at length on this measure. I intend to speak for only a few moments to indicate my continuing interest and also to urge the minister and the government to look far beyond the terms of reference of the bill now before us and to move forward to the next important step that is required in public assistance to Canadian students of university potential. I say this because the legislation that we have before us is merely housekeeping. It tidies up a bill that has been on the statute books since 1964. The minister in his outline of the amendments underscored this point. It regularizes procedures with respect to the position of students with landed-immigrant status It changes the act to deal with the new approach to the university timetable, namely, the trend in universities toward the semester system as contrasted with the yearly system that has prevailed hitherto. It also changes the amount of a loan in line with the inflationary conditions in Canada and the rapidly increasing student population eligible for the student loans program.

I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this housekeeping approach to the problem of assistance to our rapidly increasing student population is not sufficient to meet the demands for skilled young Canadians with professional training to deal with the complexities of our modern twentieth century society. The student loans program was actually pioneered by the provincial governments. Most provincial governments had a student loans program operating before the federal government entered the field. The federal government entered the field because it was not within the financial resources of the provinces to provide the sums that were necessary to meet the upsurge in student interest.

I recall the discussions concerning these subjects in the latter 1950's and early 1960's. The federal government's substantial participation in the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act was one of the strong motivating sources in stirring up federal government interest. It hardly seemed logical that the federal government would be providing substantial assistance to students at the technical and vocational level and ignoring completely the area of university training, wherein Canadians had the opportunity to become professionally qualified in order to meet the demands of the rapidly expanding Canadian economy as well as the expanding role of Canada in many other areas of human activity both domestic and international. It was entirely logical that the federal government should derive this inspiration from the provincial governments which had already pioneered in this field. I notice the minister did not give the provincial governments credit for being the first to enter this field.

The only other comment I wish to make on the matter on the administration of the present loans act is that the method of administration leaves much to be desired in terms of the allocation of limited loans to students on the basis of academic ability as well as on the basis of economic need. Only in the last year have I received increasing complaints from students who have been denied access to the loan fund because of what would appear to be arbitrary decision. As I have investigated each case that has come to my attention, the student has been eminently qualified in terms of academic ability. It seems that the elimination of these students from access to the loan fund is derived largely from the shortage of total funds available.

It may be that the increased amounts permitted under the amendments to the legislation will overcome the deficiency to this extent. However, I feel that the application of the needs test is on the basis of the old means test principle, which should have been discarded long ago. I think in all public programs of this kind which are administrated at both the provincial and federal levels it has become the accepted procedure to speak in terms of actual need and not in terms of the total means available.

The cases which have come to my attention have involved families where the father had a total income of approximately $10,000 per year. In the light of that total amount the student was automatically disqualified, even though he might have been one of two or three members of the family attending university at the same time. The point I wish to make is that the program should be administered on the basis of need in light of the total financial picture of the family concerned, and not on the basis of the old, long outmoded means formula that was applied in the past.

I do not think there is any need for a complete and comprehensive speech at this time on the general question of university finances. However, I should like the government to think beyond this intermediate step in the direction of solving the growing financial problems of a student population whose number is rapidly increasing. The provincial governments have already occupied this area to a substantial extent. It was for this reason that Ottawa was thinking and speaking in terms of bursaries rather than in terms of repayable loans. Beneficial as it is to large numbers of students, the loans program does not in any way deal with the needs of the student who is denied an opportunity for university training because of his poor economic position. Other hon. members have drawn attention to the fact that there is a real problem of poverty in Canada; that there are families at the lower levels of the income ladder which cannot afford to send their children to university, simply because no money is available.

It might be argued that the loans program makes up for this deficiency. In fact, it does not, because it fails to meet the needs of those living at the poverty level, those whom the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is trying to assist in the white paper on taxation which he brought down recently. It seems the minister intends to rob Peter to pay Paul; he has adopted the Robin Hood philosophy of taking from those who have and giving to those who have not. It appears to me that this same philosophy should, then, be applied with respect to university students in need of financial assistance. Back in 1963 the government promised in most definite terms to make 10,000 bursaries available for Canadians of exceptional ability who would otherwise be unable to enter university. We pursued this subject in the House for several years. I was one who was interested in it. This afternoon I was looking over my file and I found there the record of a long series of questions which had been put to Mr. Walter Gordon when he was Minister of Finance and to the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

Each of these gentlemen had promised in specific terms that the bursary program would be implemented within a matter of months. Since then, years have rolled by and the promise has yet to be fulfilled. I suggest to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) who is handling this legislation this afternoon that here is an area in which he might well become occupied in more than a housekeeping sense. Let us get on with the next stage, that of attending to the real area of need, by supplying these long-promised 10,000 bursaries, promise of which formed part of the 60 glorious days of decision under the late Pearson administration.

There is no need to labour the point further. This is merely housekeeping legislation bringing an old statute up to date. What we want now is some pioneering in this field of public assistance as applied to the needs of university students.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration concerning student loans is rather important.

This afternoon, I heard the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) set out the purpose of this bill.

I also heard some hon. members deal with the situation the students experience in Canada and, with the exception of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), all more or less said the same thing. Our students lack the necessary means to further their studies and the government intends to increase the amount made available for education under Bill C-135.

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), for instance, said that some students with well-to-do parents did not want their parents to pay for their studies but would rather borrow.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I suggest,—and I would ask the hon. member if he can give proof to the contrary,—that students who can afford to pay their studies do not usually apply for a bank loan and pay an interest rate of 9 or 10 per cent. It is those without any income, those for whom the amendments to this bill are intended, who will borrow $1,000 for a school year, or $500 for a semester, at a higher interest rate than in 1964 when a student could secure a loan at 5¼ per cent. In 1969, the interest rate has gone up to 8⅛ per cent. If we add to that the bank charges, we get the equivalent of 9, 9¼ per cent, and even 10 per cent in some cases.

Now, a student who must complete a five-year university course may get into debt for $5,000 and on completing his studies, if he wants to establish himself, he will have to spend another $5,000 or even $10,000 in the case of a dentist, a doctor, a lawyer, a sociologist or a psychiatrist.

Therefore, a professional of 26, 27 or 28, is faced with debts ranging from $10,000, $15,000, $17,000 to $18,000. Is this likely to promote initiative? Is this the so-called free education promised by the federal and provincial authorities?

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that if the loans allow students to complete their studies, they nonetheless mortgage their future. It may be one of the reasons why university students do not much agree with the way the central and provincial governments proceed in that matter.

After all, those young people are no fools; they are quite aware they will get into debt. Moreover, when they fail to find summer jobs to earn money in order to pay for their studies, this is no encouragement to them.

I saw something worse last week in western Canada. In Saskatchewan, university students, for instance, pay tuition fees at Regina University with wheat because they do not have any money. In Winnipeg, they pay with barley.

Are those young people encouraged by this government? I admit that education comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces rather than that of the central government as such, but the latter, for example, could set up a credit system which would enable the provinces to look after their respective educational systems and provincial autonomy would be entirely protected in that field.

Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that students cannot find summer jobs. I saw striking examples of that situation last summer; thousands of students were unable to find a job during their holidays, although they had to go back to the university for the fall term. Thousands of them cannot afford it; thousands of others can go back thanks to their annual $1,000 loans.

Is it any wonder then that young students rise against what is commonly known as the establishment, that they rebel against a society to which they cannot identify themselves?

Young people of 20 or 22 still have to ask their father for a buck—and he may be a labourer in Montreal or a miner in Noranda—to be able to go to a movie or buy a pack of cigarettes. Are these young people of 20 or 22 not a bit ashamed to ask their father whose salary is not even sufficient to pay tuition fees for their children attending school or university?

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for the government to introduce legislation which will enable students to go $115 million deeper into debt, but will it be able to take them out of the hole? All previous speakers mentioned students, young people, because everybody likes them, the future of the country rests on them. We sure like the future and the young people of Canada. But when time comes to help them in order to guarantee the future of Canada, bills are introduced to mortgage them to the hilt, to crush them still more.

Mr. Speaker, in 1964, I had the opportunity to visit communist countries. We are all afraid of communism. We are afraid of some communists in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Halifax. But when I went to Moscow, I made a visit to the university of that city, which has 35,000 students, with whom I talked. As a matter of fact, my Russian interpreter was a student.

At the Moscow university, education is free, although it is in a communist country. Besides the free tuition, the student is given $30 per month. I hope that hon. members have their ears open, and especially their mind. Mr. Speaker, it is possible to give each student $30 per month plus tuition fees, at whatever faculty he may be enrolled. And this is in a communist country. You may say that the individual has been deprived of his freedom, and it is true. But when the Canadian student is prevented from entering university because he cannot afford it, is it not a financial dictatorship which makes it impossible for him to pursue his studies under a system which is supposed to promote personal initiative and liberty?

In a country where private enterprise and freedom of the individual must be respected, the best we can do is to introduce Bill C-135, telling our students: "See how generous we are with you. Get into debt for ten or fifteen years. Borrow from banks or finance companies. Mortgage the future, yours and Canada's."

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, a capitalist system must curb abuses, not deprive our young people from getting a university education or going to secondary and post-secondary schools because funds have not been made available. It is most shameful and we are condoning it. We tolerate this in the name of freedom, but what kind of freedom is that. I agree that we need individual freedom, that security is not enough. I know it is easy to obtain security. It is the easiest thing in the world when you forego freedom. If all of us here were to go to Freiman's on Rideau Street and smash a big show-window, within ten minutes we would have perfect security, but behind bars. We would be entitled to three meals a day, clothes and a bedroom. It might not be just like home, but it would be secure. If we needed medical care, we would get it. If we had a toothache, we would go to the dentist—free. That is security, but our freedom would be behind bars.

That is why we want to establish a system of security coupled with freedom, real freedom. We must not tell students they can get their education on credit and if next year they can no longer pay, well, just wait another year. We play with students as if they were pets, and we think we are settling their problems.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time we open our eyes. About a year ago, the American economist Robert Theobard suggested that students should get a salary, because, he argued, they do work as any other laborer in any sector of the economy.

What are we of the Ralliement Créditiste suggesting? We do not suggest to fetch the moon and bring it to earth. We do not suggest either to launch the students along with the astronauts to the moon next Friday. We are saying that the public sector of our national economy should be financed from interest-free loans issued directly by the Bank of Canada.

We still need scrip money to cope with the new production—and education is a kind of production—when we are building and developing a country. We say to the federal government to order the Bank of Canada to supply the provinces with the money needed for the administration of their education system. That is what we are suggesting. We can do that for several things, but there is nothing that keeps the government or parliament from ordering Mr. Rasminsky, Governor of the Bank of Canada, to grant the necessary credit to the provinces so that they may take care of their education system.

The federal government should not tell the province of Quebec, the province of Alberta, the province of British Columbia or Newfoundland, how it intends to handle the students. That is the responsibility of the provinces since education comes under their jurisdiction.

The federal government must supply credits through the Bank of Canada so that the provinces may supervise the education system and erect, for instance, universities, post-secondary, secondary and technical schools, if need be. It must help also talented students to pursue their studies.

It is said today that students are faced with financial problems. It is not said that they are having difficulties with their teachers. No! It is not said that they are having difficulties with the university. No! Nor is it said that their text-books are a problem. No! It is said that they do not have the money they need to carry on their studies. So, let us pass legislation giving them the opportunity to go into debt. Such is our present system. But it will not last forever!

According to an old saying: One can fool some of the people all the time; one can fool all of the people some of the time; but one cannot fool all of the people all the time. That is not true, because that is exactly what is happening today!

Mr. Speaker, once more no doubt the créditistes will be laughed at but this will bring no change in the situation and will not help the students in any way.

There are complaints that everything is not well in Montreal and that students should be blamed for it! I met students last week in western Canada. I met students at the Alberta University, at Saint-Paul College in Winnipeg, at the Manitoba University. At Saint-Paul College, I met more than 600 students aged from 18 to 22 who listened religiously to what we had to tell them. Their problem is not so much a French or English language problem as an education problem, a finance problem!

Yet the government does not find any way other than introducing legislation that would allow students to get into debt. What a clever solution! How satisfied these young people must be with Ottawa! It is not surprising that the young are rising against the federal and provincial governments! They are given no chance at all. Why? Because there is too much to do at the same time.

In western Canada, parents face a wheat surplus that they cannot sell; in eastern Canada, it is fish, in Quebec, it is wood and milk, in the province of Ontario, it is corn, fruits, vegetables, wood, and mines that they cannot develop. Parents and children, all are fighting the present system, which does not make sense at all.

That is why I said a while ago—and I have some evidence, because like the students, I got it on good authority—that some students are compelled to pay their school fees with barley and wheat, since they are penniless. The government says: "Now you will have some money because you will be allowed to borrow." But borrow where? From banks and finance companies. Instead of using the Bank of Canada to help the provinces to solve their education problems, students are allowed to be in debt to banks.

If the government has the means to draw up a bill, could it not also issue a government bond which would be bought by the Bank of Canada and made available to the provinces?

• (5:30 p.m.)

When they come to Ottawa, the provinces should ask the central government to use the means at its disposal rather than spend its time saying to the provinces, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does: We are sovereign, we administer the taxes that we collect, that is all. If we do not have money, it is because we do not collect enough taxes. To get more money, we will have to levy more taxes, and since we do not intend to do that, we advise the provinces to take their responsibilities, to get money from their own taxpayers, so the federal government will be cleared of the charges now laid against it.

But does that solve anything? No. We are going towards general paralysis in Canada, in education as in everything else. Not only is paralysis coming, it is a fact!

The farmers in western Canada are paralyzed with stacks of wheet and the people in the Maritimes, with stacks of fish. The same phenomenon appears all over Canada. And the government says: Our only financial solution is taxation. And inflation follows.

They try to quiet down reactions by telling the western farmers: You know, we are going through a period of inflation. Therefore, do bear with it, let your wheat rot on the field. To the eastern fishermen, they say: "We are going through a period of inflation. Let your fish rot there." And to everybody, they sing the same tune: Inflation prevails. Let yourselves be paralyzed.

[Mr. Caouette.]

However, if war broke out tomorrow, the present government would find billions of dollars to get the young students into the army, to feed them, clothe them and house them decently, for then they would say: This is national urgency.

But, when it comes to helping our young people to build Canada and to prepare them to take over the reins, this government says: We are in a period of inflation, and newspapermen believe that, because we can read through the pages of the newspapers: Inflation prevents us from doing this and that. The first people that I would get into the army if war were declared, would be all the Canadian newspapermen. Then, they would learn the difference between inflation and deflation.

Mr. Speaker, there must be an end to all this deceit and it is done on the back of our young people, because we cannot do anything for them. But comes war, and immediately, we can do everything and nothing is missing. But in peace time, it is not the same thing any longer. Universities, let us close them.

I was referring earlier to Moscow and Prague where students have no tuition fees to pay and moreover get $30 a month to study. If under a communist system where freedom is non-existent, students are assisted, in a system where private enterprise must be respected, there is not a single worthwhile reason why they should not be treated in the same manner. I am in no way suggesting that communists are right or wrong, but they certainly look better after their students than we have done up to now.

Everybody knows how much I am against marxism whose aim is to make an individual the slave of the state. On the contrary, I want the state to serve the individual, the mother, the child and the older people. It is precisely this philosophy of life advocated by the Ralliement Creditiste in our province, in our country.

We are not working against one another; we want a state, a government, a parliament that takes into consideration the needs of the individual.

If ever we legislate in terms of the needs of the individuals, of our physical possibilities, then, Mr. Speaker, we can say that in this country of ours we have a system of personal freedom that guarantees security to all the people, including the students who are entitled to a better treatment than the one provided for in this bill.

This is no solution; it is as effective as a band-aid on a wooden leg—as I often say—it will do nothing to solve the problem of Canadian students.

And so, in closing, Mr. Speaker, I say that the federal government should order the Bank of Canada to finance the provinces that they might offer the students, our children, an education system enabling them to pursue their studies and to fulfil themselves for the good of the whole Canadian population.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), outlined the opinions of our party on this bill; therefore, all I wish to do is deal with a couple of points to which my attention has been drawn over and over again in connection with the Canada Student Loans Act and the amendments in the bill before us.

On balance, we are very glad to see some of the improvements which have been made to the act, particularly in the clause which will qualify for a loan a student who has been a resident in Canada for a period of not less than one year and has declared his intention to reside in this country after he ceases to be a full-time student. I know that this provision will be welcomed in my city of Vancouver as well as in cities across Canada which are receiving a number of people who will make excellent citizens of this country.

I want to comment on the amendment which deals with the period of time for which a person may be eligible to receive a loan. I find that throughout the bill, as well as throughout the act, there is an insistence on the applicant being a full-time student in order to qualify I think the amendment to the act is an improvement in that it introduces the semester as a period for which a student may obtain a loan, but in my riding a number of people—a great many women are in this position—are not able to become full-time students. They are able to give part of their time to household duties and part of their time to studies to upgrade themselves. They cannot study for a full semester nor can they enrol for a full university year, but they can be part-time students or what I would call installment students.

I have known a great many people, not only in my own riding but all across Canada—and this applies particularly although not entirely to women—who are well able to take one course in a year, following which they can take another course the second year and in due time work up to a full university degree. However, as I understand it, under this legislation even as it is amended they are not eligible for a student loan. These are the types of people who need a loan because very frequently they are most anxious to upgrade themselves after their children have left home and no longer need them. Very frequently their studies have been interrupted by an early marriage, but after their children have left home they want to go back to their career or to a job, and prepare themselves for it by going to university; but since they can only study part-time they do not qualify for a loan. I hope the minister will consider these cases because I think it is very important that an incentive in the form of a loan be given to these people to encourage them to study.

As I have said, improvements have been made to the act. It is not necessary now to enrol for a full university year in order to obtain a loan; a semester is sufficient. However, under the bill the instalment students who can take only one course or two in a year do not qualify for a loan.

The other comment which I wish to make applies to the moderate to low income people. There are a great many young people in Canada who are trying their very best to get to university. I have in mind in particular the case of a young chap who managed, through the efforts of his whole family, to enrol for the first year at a university and to get a loan. He found at the end of his first year that he was not able to continue his studies because he had to go out to earn money to help the family. He tried to get a job but was unable to get any kind of steady work after only one year at university. As the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) emphasized today, jobs are very scarce, particularly in the summer months. This young fellow could get only casual work for short periods but not a steady or permanent job. He went away to the hinterland of British Columbia to look for work, but he could not find a good paying, steady enough job that would permit him to pay back the loan principal and interest. In fact he got into real trouble about paying back his loan and it was only due to very special intercession that we were able to have his payments suspended until he had the chance to get a permanent job.

Canada Student Loans Act

• (5:40 p.m.)

I wish we could have some assurance from the minister that in such cases a period of repayment suspension would be allowed, particularly where solid guarantees are provided to the effect that the individual involved has been trying hard to get work but has been unable to do so. Students who had ambition and who applied for and received loans have encountered real hardships, and if cases like these could be met it would be very helpful.

The third point which I want to mention, concerning students who get into a bad position with a heavy load of debt, has already been dealt with to some extent by previous speakers but I do not think anybody mentioned compound cases, such as the one I encountered involving a young girl student. She had almost finished her university course. She had a debt of several thousand dollars under the Student loans plan, and she told me, "I am married now. When I graduate I want to earn money in order to keep my husband at university, where he is trying to qualify as a doctor. Unfortunately, the only dowry I was able to bring him was this load of debt in the form of a student loan. But what if I become pregnant in the meantime"? Then she looked straight at me and said, "I suppose it could be worse in that case if it were twins or triplets." She regarded this as a distinct catastrophe. I hope there will be provision in the legislation for discretion to be exercised in cases of this kind, which are more frequent than many of us who are older realize.

I also notice that there is provision in the legislation that if a student dies suddenly the government must repay to the bank the amount of principal and interest due by the borrower at the time of his death. I suggest to the minister that there are other kinds of death; there is the death of lingering hope, where students hopes are trampled underfoot after receiving these loans. Discretionary power should be provided in such cases. I hope the legislation will before it is passed be amended and improved in respect of these two or three points. Perhaps the minister would touch on these points in his reply.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). Having heard the sweeping suggestions he proposed, I feel a bit embarrassed at putting forward the minimal changes I would propose to the legislation.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

Bill C-135 is not all I would wish, nor is it all that education requires from the federal government. Nevertheless, I make a point of expressing my approval for and appreciation of the fact that the government is concerned in this area. I sincerely hope that it is the beginning of an activist, pragmatic approach by the government toward the challenge of education and the development of the Canada that so many of us envision for the 1970s. I consider that the amendments proposed by the bill are worthy of support, but I wish to make a few brief comments on them. One proposed amendment extends the definition of a bank to include:

> —a corporation that carries on the business of a trust company within the meaning of the Trust Companies Act, the business of a loan company within the meaning of the Loan Companies Act, or the business of insurance within the meaning of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and that is designated by the Minister on the application of that corporation as a bank for the purposes of this Act.

This is wholly commendable. It substantially expands the number of institutions from which students will be able to borrow funds. It is very much like the amendments passed last session with regard to the Co-operative Credit Associations Act and the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act. Another amendment restricts the availability of loans to foreign students to those qualified as landed-immigrants. Previously, a non-Canadian student was only required to state his intention to remain in Canada after completing his studies. This amendment was not drafted out of malice to those who do not yet wish to become Canadian citizens. That is not why I support it. It is commendable in that it narrows the definition at this time simply because we must apply priorities with regard to public expenditure.

Finally, extending the provisions of the act to include semester students is something which is overdue and is welcomed. The semester is becoming more and more a part of the educational system, of university life in general. The Canadian Student Loans Act has been prejudiced against this system for too long, and the semester student should be included in any such program. Under the legislation parents are not liable to repay interest and principal on loans to their children; that is the sole responsibility of the student. Further, in the event of death or in the event of an assumed death beyond all shadow of doubt, the federal government is held liable. Yet since the act became operative in 1965, to be eligible for a loan a student has had to prove that his parents or guardian are unable to pay for his post-secondary education. A student is declared independent only if: (1) the student is married; (2) the student has completed four successful years in a post-secondary institution; (3) the student held a permanent job before enrolling in a post-secondary institution; (4) the student is 25 years of age or over.

Bill C-135 should have removed from the act the distinction between "dependent' and "independent". Today growing numbers of young men and women are independent at the age of 18 simply because of their own choice or that of their parents.

This government is about to acknowledge in our Elections Act that an 18-year old is both independent and mature; otherwise, suggesting he should vote would be an insult to democracy. If an 18-year old is to be considered fit to vote, he should now be accepted as independent according to the Canadian Student Loans Act. You can call it undemocratic, or I suppose there is a great deal of other terminology which could be used, but if we consider a student old enough to vote we should consider him old enough to be independent under the Student Loans Act. The present classification of dependent for those not within the criteria of independence is unrealistic for our society today and therefore is of harm to the act and unjust for many young people. I am displeased that this was not one of the provisions put forward in the amendments.

The breadth of assistance has been extended and terminologically and administratively the act has been improved. However, there is another serious inadequacy in Bill C-135 which affects the quality of the program at this time. For five years the ceiling of loan assistance has remained at $1,000 per year. I argue that this figure is increasingly inadequate, it increasingly excludes the poor and, being arbitrary, should have been amended. This bill does not take into consideration increasing tuition costs and the cost of living which for five years have seriously diminished the real value of a $1,000 loan. I would suspect that for all those who require a loan to the full level of the ceiling, this amount is now much too low. This must be painfully true of mothers and fathers who have lost their spouses.

I suggest that Bill C-135 should be reconsidered in light of the two points I have made. An adequate bill amending the Canada Assistance Act would accept that an 18-year old is often independent. I think we should consider raising the loan ceiling. I would not want to throw out a figure, but I would think $1,200 or $1,500 would be a little more realistic when we look at what inflation has done to the economy.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak of the Canada Student Loans Act in its fullest context. We can see immediately that this program in terms of aid to education provides more for the wealthy provinces than for the poor ones. For 1967-68 the plan provided $8.25 million to British Columbia, $23.6 million to Ontario, only $1.7 million to Newfoundland and only $4.2 million to New Brunswick. This makes sense considering the objective of the act. However, with the removal of federal assistance generally to education, the financial distribution of the act raises several questions regarding federal involvement in education. Is it responsible only to help students achieve accessibility and not assist the provinces to establish proper facilities? Should not the federal government, the guardian of our two founding cultures, be actively concerned with the Americanization of our universities? Are not accessible and effective universities a central factor in regional development?

I feel these questions are important and compel action. I suggest that the university has become a pivotal national institution as are, for example, the CPR and the CBC. Therefore, I appeal to this House to go beyond the housekeeping of present legislation and adopt an active and selective stance toward higher education within inherent obligations of the federal parliament.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 43 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the serious increase in unemployment during the past month from 5 per cent to 5.3 per cent seasonally adjusted, the culmination of the steady rise which has been taking place for the past four months because of the failure of the government to control inflation and thereby keep Canadian products competitive with foreign goods, and to pursue an aggressive export drive to sell Canadian products in the world market.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand it, the hon. member is seeking unanimous consent to adjourn the House to discuss this matter. Under the provisions of Standing Order 26 it seems to me there is basically and procedurally something wrong with the proposed motion of the hon. member. I would think it is in order for the motion to be moved under Standing Order 43, but I would not think that the hon. member can, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, make a motion which would normally be made under the provisions of Standing Order 26. I suggest to the hon. member that the motion he has proposed to the House in those terms is not in order. If it were, he would require the unanimous consent of the House.

To facilitate things for the hon. member I might at this point ask whether there is unanimous agreement to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose suggested by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is not unanimous agreement, but I have to—

An hon. Member: Struck out again, George.

Mr. Speaker: —caution the hon. member that the motion is not properly worded in that it seems to circumvent the provisions set out in Standing Order 26.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED FUEL OIL PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the House, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, for unanimous consent to move a motion regarding the inflationary increases in Canada, particularly the increase in fuel oil prices by the oil companies, which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs agreed yesterday "was obviously inflationary and obviously damaging to the economy". Therefore I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, to move the following motion:

That a Standing Committee of the House of Commons to be known as the Standing Committee on Consumer Affairs be established to inquire into and report upon the trends in the cost of living in Canada and factors which may be contributing to changes in the cost of living.

And that, further, as first order of business, this committee be authorized to meet forthwith and proceed as quickly as possible to investigate the recent price increases of the oil industry and their effect on the inflationary situation in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not.

ORAL QUESTIONS

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE INCREASE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since unemployment increased between September and October by 35,000 people, that figure including an increase of 11,000 in the province of Quebec and 10,000 in the prairie provinces, is the minister ready to announce any programs to alleviate the serious increase in unemployment already apparent in these regions? Apparently the rate of unemployment is likely to increase this winter.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the officials of my department are now negotiating with the representatives of all the provinces, especially with those of Quebec and the provinces affected by unemployment, in order to carry out as soon as possible the programs agreed to, to create new jobs and fight the unemployment referred to by the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Is the government accepting congratulations upon the success of its program to create more unemployment, particularly in regions of slow growth, in order to overcome the problem of inflation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The Leader of the Opposition is asking whether the government is accepting congratulations. I am not sure whether that is all that urgent.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

MONTREAL BYLAW—REQUEST FOR TEST OF CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Since the Montreal bylaw passed yesterday banning demonstrations clearly invades the domain of criminal law and has the effect of superseding traditional forms of the exercise of the right of free public debate and assembly—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a statement. He has to ask a question.

Mr. Brewin: I will ask it, Mr. Speaker. Will the government take steps to have the constitutional validity of this bylaw referred to the Supreme Court of Canada as soon as possible?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said on Monday in the House.

An hon. Member: Zero plus zero is zero.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister said in the House that he could not deal with the matter because the bylaw had not been passed. In view of it now having been passed, will he not answer my question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we now have a copy of the text of the bylaw as it was before it was submitted to city council. As I said on Monday, we are studying it.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. When Mr. Saulnier met him a few days ago, did he discuss the terms of the bylaw with him?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it appropriate for me to disclose that which was discussed by Mr. Saulnier and myself at a private meeting.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. After the law officers of his department have had a chance to review the bylaw passed by Montreal city council, will the minister make a statement on motions in order to clarify this very important matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is not usual for the Attorney General of Canada to give opinions on constitutional matters since these are still questions that are ordinarily decided by the courts.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—ACTION OF EMPLOYEE WITH RESPECT TO DEMONSTRATION AGAINST QUEBEC BILL 63

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I asked the Secretary of State if he was aware that a CBC employee had taken the liberty of phoning a separatist at the Rouyn CEGEP to ask him to organize a demonstration against Bill 63 of the Quebec National Assembly, he answered that he would find out whether there was any truth in my statement.

Would the minister tell us whether he has been in touch with the CBC management about that matter?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, I have asked for information on this allegation made by the hon. member. Apparently, the latter was mistaken as far as the date is concerned, but the investigation is still going on.

Mr. Caouette: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last evening, the C.B.C. French network newscast ran my interview with Mr. Michel Gaudet about a question I had asked in the House. After the interview, the regular announcer, Mr. Pierre Nadeau, explained that the news had not been given on the 11 p.m. newscast on October 30 and that, obviously, my statement was not quite true.

Mr. Speaker, I inquired this morning and found out that the C.B.C. did broadcast the said news at 11 p.m. on October 28. The C.B.C. employee did phone a separatist at the Rouyn CEGEP during the afternoon of October 28 and urged him to send the students out for a demonstration.

Now on October 28, there was no demonstration in Rouyn, but in fact, on October 29, there was one in the morning.

Mr. Speaker, I simply ask that Mr. Nadeau—and this is my question of privilege—stop garbling the news in order to deceive the population—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member that pursuant to Standing Order 17(2), he must normally give notice to the Chair of such a question of privilege.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Since the minister has just said that he has been informed that my question was unfounded, because the date of October 30 was not involved, am I not entitled to give the necessary explanations so that the minister, parliament and even C.B.C. announcers may know the truth?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is hypothetical.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT—APPROVAL OF DETAILS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the government given its approval to purely token participation in self-government on the part of the inhabitants of the Yukon and Northwest Territories? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in light of the reforms in territorial government recently announced by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The elected representatives total only 9 of the 14 members of the council and only one of four executive members. I also ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in light of the Prime Minister's oft-repeated desire—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to intervene at this point. The hon. member knows that questions should be for the purpose of seeking information. At the present time the hon. member is conveying information to the House. That is not in order. I suggest that the hon. member should now ask his question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Your Honour, for your very wise advice. I will, of course, be delighted to abide by it. I put the question this way, Your Honour. Has the government given its approval to the announcement of the details of participation in self-government on the part of the inhabitants of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon? This announcement was made yesterday, Your Honour, by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit confused by the question. Perhaps I could repeat what I said yesterday and the hon. member may ask a supplementary and perhaps clearer question. I said yesterday that the general principle, laid down by the minister, was government policy and, in broad terms, the government policy is that the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are not yet ready for any form of provincial status. This is the government's position. If it is the position of the opposition that they should have provincial status, we should like to hear argument on this point at some time.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry the Prime Minister was confused and misunderstood my question. I am aware, of course, of the statement he made yesterday. But my question today—and I will try to make it clear if I can—is: has the government given its approval to the details—"the details", not the general policy—of the experiment in democracy in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories as announced yesterday by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we did give our approval to the principle and to the details, but with regard to whether those details were stated exactly by the minister in the Northwest Territories, I don't know. I said, yesterday, that I had not read the final draft of his speech, nor have I done so since then, but I do not think the government is bound by every comma in what he said. However, the principle is government policy, and this is what the government is intent on implementing.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Could the Prime Minister convey a request to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to be in the House tomorrow and make a statement on this matter in order that in this same arena other Members of Parliament may have an opportunity to comment?

Mr. Trudeau: I will gladly convey that request to the minister.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question with reference to any statement the minister may make in the House on motions. Bearing in mind the strong protests made by the elected council of the Yukon Territory arising from this announcement, would the Prime Minister suggest to his colleague responsible for northern development that in the course of his statement he might refer to the strong resolutions passed by the council with reference not to provincial status but to greater autonomy and increased responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: That is really not a question but a suggestion made by the hon. member to the Prime Minister.

POST OFFICE

SPECIAL RATES FOR NON-PROFIT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, according to the roster, the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications should be in the House today. In his absence, I am forced to put my question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if his government intends to emulate the United States and grant special postage rates to non-profit publications by amending the Post Office Act?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications could not be in the House today, he asked me to take notice of any questions that might be directed to him, and I am pleased to do so for the hon. member's question.

[English]

BROADCASTING, FILMS AND ASSISTANCE TO THE ARTS

REQUEST FOR FACILITIES FOR COMMITTEE COUNSEL

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is directed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker, as the minister responsible for the Company of Young Canadians. Would he consult with his colleagues and, in particular, with the government House leader, in order that his good offices or the collective good offices of hon. gentlemen opposite might be used to provide an office and secretarial help for counsel appointed by the parliamentary committee at present inquiring into the affairs of the CYC?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize, I think, that this question should be directed to the administration of the House. Perhaps the hon. member would like to make his representation in the usual way to the Chair for consideration.

Mr. Nowlan: I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he would consult with the chairman of the parliamentary committee which is inquiring into the affairs of the CYC in order that the pending resignation of counsel does not take place tomorrow?

TRADE

FINANCING OF SALE OF LOCOMOTIVES TO YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. In his absence I propose to direct it to the acting minister, whoever that may be. Will the minister look into the reasons why the Export Development Corporation has failed to provide financing for a very considerable sale of diesel locomotives to Yugoslavia? Further, in view of the fact that considerable unemployment will be caused unless this sale goes through, would the minister make sure that the matter is reconsidered by the corporation?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I shall be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WASHINGTON DEMONSTRATION—CANCELLATION BY MURRAY HILL OF ARRANGEMENTS TO SUPPLY BUSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of reports that Murray Hill Limousine Service of Montreal cancelled certain arrangements they had made to supply buses for trips from points in the United States to Washington by Americans wishing to participate in the demonstration where on Saturday because of representations made to Murray Hill by a Canadian Member of Parliament, can the Prime Minister say whether this was done with the knowledge and consent of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It was not done with my knowledge or consent, Mr. Speaker, nor have I any reason to believe that it was done with the consent of any other minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to direct to the Minister of Justice. In view of statements made by Murray Hill that one of the reasons for breaking this arrangement was that they did not want their files examined by the FBI, may I ask whether there are any arrangements under which private companies in Canada can have their files investigated in this way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that this supplementary could well be placed on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that dairy producers are left in the dark annually in regard to the government's forthcoming dairy policy, would it be possible for the minister to announce the next dairy year policy well in advance of the beginning of that dairy year instead of a day or two before it commences?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There was an attempt to do this last year and it would have been done had there not been some major changes in dairy production that became known just a few days before April 1.

Mr. McKinley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the minister is on this subject, could he give the House an assurance that there will be no further cutbacks in the government's allotment to the dairy producers in the coming year?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF RATES ON NON-PROFIT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, but since he is not in the House and he has no parliamentary secretary, though he does have 15 task forces, may I direct my question to the Acting Postmaster General. It concerns the Committee for Fair Postal Rates, composed of representatives of many important non-profit publications seriously injured by existing postal rates, who met with the minister earlier today. May I ask whether an assurance was given to this important group that they could expect, not a free rate, like the National Liberal Federation, but a much better rate than they are now paying?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRADE

WHEAT—DIRECT SALES TO EASTERN FARMERS

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member has a supplementary.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question.

Can the Minister tell us whether he is considering altering his policy with regard to the western wheat farmers so that they can sell their wheat direct to another province without having to go through the Wheat Board in Winnipeg?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure I understand the question and I would like to take it as notice so as to give a more precise answer. However, I do not believe it is the intention of the government to relax the regulations respecting the movement of wheat across provincial borders.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SASKATCHEWAN PROPOSALS RESPECTING WHEAT AND POTASH

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House whether he has now had a meeting with the premier of that province of Saskatchewan and whether any progress has been made on questions involving that province's wheat barter proposals and potash problems?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can so indicate to the House, but no, I have not had any meeting with Premier Thatcher.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS ON PROVINCIAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO DISCUSSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Communications was stating the position of the government of Canada when he said in Toronto last night that nine of the ten provinces of Canada are making very little contribution to constitutional discussion, and that nothing of substance has come from these provinces? Is this the position the government is taking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter of policy; it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I gather it is not the opinion of the government.

Mr. Trudeau: Surely, Mr. Speaker, I could not answer that with a yes or no. Some provinces are contributing more and some provinces are contributing less. This is a matter of opinion.

An hon. Member: How about the federal government?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Prime Minister is disassociating himself from the remarks of the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Let me ask the Prime Minister whether it is the view of Canada, as expressed by the Minister of Communications, that the Confederation for Tomorrow conference called by Premier Robarts in 1967 was a "grandstand play", and whether it is also the view that—

[Mr. Olson.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: This may be great fun to my hon. friends opposite, but is it also the opinion of the government, as expressed by the Minister of Communications, that only the province of Quebec is making any positive contribution to these discussions and that the others have lost interest?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can be quite firm about this. We certainly do not take the position that Premier Robarts embarks upon grandstand plays.

Mr. Stanfield: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that the Minister of Communications seems to be embarrassing the government and is also a liability to the country, will the Prime Minister consider appointing him to the National Parole Board or some other refuge for retired—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Cancel his parole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: It would be too hard on the Tories who came before the board.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED FUEL OIL PRICES—INVESTIGATION OF COLLUSION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in light of the similar increase in fuel oil prices announced today by BP Canada Limited, following yesterday's inflationary increase by Shell Canada Limited, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to indicate whether the Combines Investigation Branch is looking into the collusive nature of these price increases?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have said on many occasions that the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act watches significant price movements and can be expected to fulfil his statutory duties under that Act.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, is it possible for him to end the watching process and go ahead with the stopping process?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUCCESS OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION IN COMBATTING PRICE AND WAGE INCREASES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the house what success the Prices and Incomes Commission has had since it was established in persuading management to hold down prices and labour unions to hold down wage demands? Also, what is the program of the commission for the immediate future?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the commission has been making a number of statements. I will discuss with him whether in his view it would be useful for me or himself to make an additional statement in answer to the hon. member's question. The commission is carrying out its program which the Chairman has announced in various statements. I hope the hon. member joins with me in wishing him success. I have complete confidence in the members of the commission, and it would be of great value to the Canadian economy if people would co-operate with them so they may be successful in this undertaking.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, if the successes of the commission are to be measured by the public statements about its activities so far, will the minister not agree that the commission has been a complete failure, and would it not be a good idea to wrap it up, dismiss it and save the taxpayers' money?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact we are not getting much action from the commission as it is now set up, will the minister give serious consideration to reconvening the committee on consumer prices which proved so effective the last time?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I dispute the implication in the question. The commission has undertaken a program of work, research and inquiry in co-operation with economic interest groups in the country. I cannot accept the implication that it is not doing anything.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister another question in view of the difficulty we are having as to when ministers are or are not stating government policy. Was the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stating government policy yesterday when he indicated that in his opinion any price increase constitutes a violation of the principle of restraint?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the Leader of the Opposition is referring to a statement made in the House or a statement made outside the House. Certainly it is not in order for a member to ask whether a statement made in the House by a minister represents government policy.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether it is his intention to reconvene the committee on consumer prices as a way of dealing with these increases which are taking place?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, at the end of the last session there was an order on the Order Paper somewhat along those lines. I am currently having discussions with my friend the House leader as to an appropriate motion for the Order Paper, and how it might be fitted into the Parliamentary program.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to rephrase my question to the Prime Minister. Is it his view or the view of the government that any increase in prices constitutes a violation of the principle of restraint being pursued by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is a moral judgment or an economic judgment, but if a proposition can be defended in logic I would think it should not be left to stand alone. As a general principle I see nothing wrong with it.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have already had a number of supplementary questions on this point. I realize that—

Mr. Hees: Just one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says he has just one, but the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Waterloo are also anxious to ask just one. If we have time we will return to the subject. I must caution hon. members that there are a number of members in the third and other rows who are anxious to ask questions and who will blame the Chair if they do not have an opportunity to do so.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INCLUSION OF COST OF SCHOOL IN GRANT FOR BILINGUAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he tell us if the $3 million spent for the Public Service Language Centre are included in the $50-million grant offered to Canadians for language teaching?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member's question could be put on the order paper. If there is any urgency, the question could be debated at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Dumont: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Does he approve of the attitude of the Quebec Liberal party leaders, particularly Messrs. Bourassa, Laporte, Wagner and Lesage—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe we can hear the hon. member's question. Furthermore I suggest that in its present form the question is out of order.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, have I your permission to word it in another way?

Does the Prime Minister approve of the attitude of the Quebec Liberal party which, according to information published this morning, intends to vote against the motion for third reading of the Quebec National Assembly Bill 63?

Mr. Speaker: The new wording is not more agreeable than the first.

Mr. Asselin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Could I ask the Prime Minister whether, as a citizen of Quebec, he approves of the principle of the languages bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot ask questions of the Prime Minister in his quality of citizen of a province.

AGRICULTURE

NORTHERN PRAIRIES—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS FACING FORECLOSURE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that a great many foreclosure actions have been taken or threatened in parts of northern Alberta and Saskatchewan, including one by the Farm Credit Corporation against a man with ten children, and in light of the fact that thousands of honest farmers are unable to meet their obligations as they fall due because of the peculiar situation this year, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government is considering accepting its responsibility by passing legislation to re-activate the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to protect these people?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as far as foreclosures by the F.C.C. are concerned, I have asked for a report regarding their actions in respect of every single case. I am advised that information like the hon. member has given me is not common to the foreclosure actions that have been undertaken. Indeed, there were something less than 15 out of 562 in the entire area and there will be no evictions of anyone who has made any attempt whatever to look after his indebtedness and is still living on the land.

So far as the other part of the question is concerned, I am unable to answer it. I think this kind of legislation falls in a department other than agriculture.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister and his officials not review the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the very useful service it performed after being passed by a previous Conservative government to see whether it could be re-enacted in order to cover the present circumstances?

Mr. Olson: My hon. friend misinterprets that act—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is fast becoming a partisan debate which would be of no interest to the House of Commons.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF RATES ON NON-PROFIT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications but first I wish to thank him for rushing back to the House in time for the last part of the question period. In view of the representations made to the minister today by representatives from the Committee for Fair Postal Rates, is the minister considering granting some relief under Section 12 of the Post Office Act in respect of postal rates for regular publications of non-profit organizations? If not, will he give an undertaking to the House to review all such publications and the postal rates they are charged?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): I thank the hon. member for the question and for explaining my earlier absence from the House.

Mr. Hees: Were you making some tapes?

Mr. Kierans: The meeting was called by Mr. Bill Dodge of the Canadian Labour Congress. He was not present, unfortunately, but I did meet with a group. We discussed the matter very carefully and I explained that my colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is subsidizing the consumers—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the minister and I realize it may not be easy to give a short answer to a long question. However, I do not think he should make a statement of policy.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, in brief my answer is that if these magazines would put up their subscription rates by amounts varying from 8 cents to 34 cents they could cover all of the increased postal rate.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

In today's Montréal Matin, one could read the following:

Mr. Réal Caouette, N.D.P. leader, asked in the Commons whether the C.B.C. had authorized one of its employees to phone the Rouyn CEGEP from Montreal.

Since this newspaper calls me the leader of the N.D.P., does the minister feel I have the right to bring an action for libel against it?

TRADE

IMPORT OF COTTON THREAD—EFFECT ON VALLEYFIELD PLANT

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Has he received from the United Textile Workers of America, local 110, in Valleyfield, a letter informing him that the entry into Canada of cotton and thread compels the Dominion Textiles plants to lose one or two weeks of work each year, which is prejudicial to the workers of that company?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The letter would be better directed, Mr. Speaker, to the minister in charge of manpower than to the Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that there are only a few minutes left before the end of the question period but perhaps we could allow him to repeat his question.

Mr. Ricard: Then I direct my question to the minister concerned and I hope that he will be kind enough to answer it because it interests a lot of people who will be out of work if the government does not assume its responsibility.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are running out of time. The hon. member for South Shore.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON HEARINGS OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister now ready to table his report on the findings of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry relative to the seal industry?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me what action I was taking with regard to the report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. The third recommendation was that the Department of Justice be advised of unresolved conflicts in the testimony of some witnesses. The record of the testimony given by certain witnesses who appeared before the committee is under investigation by the RCMP. Upon completion of the investigation it will be a matter for the appropriate provincial authorities to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to warrant prosecution under the Criminal Code.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

EFFECTS OF QUEBEC BILL 63 IN RELATION TO OBJECTIVES OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Could he say whether Bill 63, now before the Quebec National Assembly, meets the aims of integral bilingualism in Canada set by the 1968 Constitutional Conference in which the present Prime Minister participated?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much that this question is in order. The hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to express an opinion and I feel the question is out of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether Bill 63 is contrary to the guidelines issued at the 1968 Constitutional Conference, which he himself presided.

Mr. Speaker: I believe that I should again express the same opinion. I hope that I am not mistaken, for the matter, of course, is very serious. However, I feel that the hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to express an opinion and, in that respect, the question is out of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. May I call Your Honour's attention to the fact that the Prime Minister rose to answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: That of course does not alter the fact the the question is out of order.

The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or in his absence to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the government having allocated $2 million to major cities for a so-called bash to celebrate their Klondike activities, would the minister or his Parliamentary Secretary check to see why Edmonton, which has carried on the tradition of the Klondike and Klondike days, has not been included in this so-called slush fund?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SELECTION OF COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the government House leader. In the interest of making committees more autonomous vis-à-vis the government, would the government House leader follow the excellent example set this morning by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in electing a member of the official opposition as vice-chairman so that perhaps on some of the other committees a member of the official opposition could be elected as chairman?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

GRAIN

CASH ADVANCES ON UNTHRESHED CROPS—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's statement to the House on November 7 to the effect that legislation will be brought forward to provide for cash advances on unthreshed grain in disaster areas similar to advances provided under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and in view of the urgency of the situation, can the minister inform the House when such legislation will be brought forward?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the exact date when it will be introduced.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROGRAMS ON CANADA'S ROLE AT UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the public interest over current disarmament negotiations and in Canada's role at the United Nations, would the Secretary of State consider requesting that the CBC consider programs dealing with Canada's role at the United Nations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made a suggestion or representation to the minister. It is not a question.

TRANSPORT

NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY—RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION—SUPPLYING OF DATA

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Could he indicate to the House whether or not he has conveyed to the Premier of Prince Edward Island that the government of Canada may be reconsidering its decision, made earlier this year, not to build the Northumberland Strait crossing and, if not, whether it has made available to the Premier much of the preliminary data acquired in the earlier surveys and work?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, and as to the part about the data I am not aware. I shall have to ask the departments concerned, especially the Department of Public Works.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REQUEST FOR TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House Leader if he could bring in promptly the necessary motion to enable the Public Accounts Committee to proceed with its very important work?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be meeting the House Leaders this afternoon at five o'clock to discuss this and other related matters.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION OF "BANKS", QUALIFYING STUDENTS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Basford) that Bill C-135, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Trade, Finance, and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): I had concluded my remarks on the Student Loans bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? If the minister speaks now he will be closing the debate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am rising merely to point out that another hon. member, if I am not mistaken, was rising.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member was rising for the purpose of leaving.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think members would expect me to attempt to respond briefly to some of their questions and to deal, at least in a preliminary way, with some of the very interesting comments they have made in this debate. I thank them for their contributions to it. I am sure we could go into the matters that have been raised so far in the debate in greater detail when this bill is before the standing committee.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae), who has a distinguished record as an educationalist, asked why the requirement with respect to a declaration of residence is proposed to be deleted in the draft bill. I think that the explanation is to be found in the fact that essentially the bill calls for the maintenance of the requirement of a year's residence but stipulates that the person applying for a loan, who is not a citizen, must be a landed immigrant. It is my understanding that to become a landed immigrant a person must declare he has the intention to reside permanently in Canada. Therefore, it would seem to me that achieving the status of landed immigrant would be a more definite indication than the signing of a simple declaration that the person wishes to remain in our country as a permanent resident and make his life here.

The basic purpose of this provision is to make clear that those who come here with student visas are not intended to be covered by the Canada Student Loans Act. The reason for this is that by definition a person with a student visa is someone who has demonstrated he has the financial resources available to him to pursue the course of studies he has in mind in this country. So, I think the point which concerned the hon. member is covered by requiring that someone who is not a citizen not only must reside here for a year but must become a landed immigrant in order to become eligible for a student loan.

The hon. member also asked for some explanation of the payments made to the province of Quebec, and of how they are made. He seemed rather concerned when I indicated, I guess by a shaking of the head, that it was a transfer not by way of fiscal equivalent but a real payment.

The details of the formula can be found in section 12 of the Act. It is a rather complicated formula and I will not take the time of the House to read it, but to use the words of the annual report it may be summarized as follows: The alternative payment made to a province which does not participate is based upon two factors, the actual payments by the minister to lenders for interest and other charges, and the population aged 18-24 in a non-participating province relative to the size of the same age group in participating provinces.

This formula permits determination of the amounts that have been paid over the years to the province of Quebec. The total paid to the province of Quebec since the inception of the plan in 1964 is in the amount of some $7,334,000, and the payment in the year 1968-69, which is part of this total, was in the amount of some $2,900,000. We should recall that the federal government itself does not provide the moneys for the loans. As hon. members know the moneys are provided by the banks and certain credit unions. The federal government pays the interest on the loans made to students from the participating provinces during the period of their post-secondary studies and for six months thereafter.

Various members have commented upon the criteria for determining eligibility for loans, for example, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson). Some, like the hon. member for York-Sunbury, referred to the test to determine eligibility for loans in a way that was somewhat more sympathetic than other hon. members, including some in his own party. I do not quarrel with that because that is part of the process of debate in our parliamentary system. However, I would like to point out that the criteria for eligibility for loans are not set forth in the Act itself or in any regulations made under the act by the federal government.

[Mr. Gray.]

Basically, the Act says in effect that loans can be made only where a student presents a certificate of eligibility which is issued by an appropriate provincial authority, and to get such a certificate he has to demonstrate to that authority that he has attained a satisfactory scholastic standard and that he is in need of a student loan. As I have said, the criteria for need are not defined in the Act itself or in the regulations made under it, but instead in a set of criteria which reflect basically the provincial consensus on these matters. To reply to a very interesting point raised by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, this means that the act itself, so far as I am aware, does not define what would constitute an independent student, and therefore a change in any definition of such a student would not have to be carried out through amendment in the act itself but instead in the administrative criteria which have been worked out by the provinces.

Decisions on eligibility for loans and on amounts of loans are not made by any agency of the federal government but instead by provincial authorities who apply these criteria. Therefore hon. members who have raised problems that have been brought to their attention by students whose applications have been turned down, or who have received loans in amounts they do not consider satisfactory, should make attempts to see that the appeal procedure which is provided for in these criteria is used. This will enable those not satisfied with the decisions of the provincial authorities to have these decisions reviewed. I again stress that there is an appeal procedure set forth or called for in these criteria which have been developed through provincial consultation.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) also expressed the fear that many millions of dollars which have been paid out under student loans would prove uncollectable. However, I think the experience to date should provide some reassurance. If one looks at the annual report one can see that a number of students have already begun repaying loans. About 93 per cent were meeting their obligation on a regular basis. About 3.5 per cent encountered difficulties in meeting regular payments due to a variety of circumstances such as illness, or lack of steady employment, only about 3.5 per cent of those now responsible for their repayment obligation seem to have tried to avoid their responsibility in some way. I think this speaks quite highly of the integrity and commonsense and of the soundness of the general approach by our young people who have taken advantage of the student loan program. In my opinion, it augurs well for the attitude of students in future who have not yet come to the stage of repaying their loans.

The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) stated that he felt the chartered banks should be called upon to make sure that those students—and I am saying again, Mr. Speaker, that the percentage so far is very small—who have not been meeting their obligations are required to do so. He asked whether there was some procedure followed by the federal government to make sure that the banks were doing all they could in this regard. I am happy to inform him that there is in fact an established procedure, which has been worked out between the guaranteed loans administration of the Department of Finance and the lending institution, whereby a series of steps have to be completed by the lender before it can submit a claim for payment by the federal government. I am not going to discuss these steps in detail, but they begin with the bank sending a letter and can culminate with court action and judgment taken by the bank against the defaulting borrower. Should one or more of these steps be omitted, a responsible officer of the bank must explain why to the government. In all cases where a claim for payment is submitted to the government, the bank officer must sign a statement to the effect that the loan is uncollectable at the present time.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that while the government does pay interest on student loans until the end of the sixth month after the month when the borrower ceases to be a full-time student, should a loan be defaulted, the government pays to the bank the outstanding principal amount but only any past due interest. This total amount, however, becomes a debt due the Crown and follow-up procedures are begun to attempt to recover these funds from the borrower. The federal government does not pay interest indefinitely to the banks on past due loans which they are not attempting to collect. I know the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales), as chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, will be interested in having this reassurance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) made some very interesting comments on the social desirability of the student loan program and also made some reference to the Liberal program of 1963. As I recall, in so far as that program covered this area, it had basically three parts: One, a system of youth allowances; second, creation of a student loan program, and third, a scholarship or bursary program. I think it is well to recall that two of these three programs have been implemented. The youth allowance program is in operation as the student loan program and of course we also have had for several years a program under which the federal government has been paying half the operating costs of post-secondary education. This program is costing the federal government hundreds of millions of dollars. Comments have been made about the social desirability of student loan programs and how they should fit into the general spectrum of student aid.

I might say that I, personally, do not consider that student loan programs will turn out to be the final word on the subject of efforts by governments—and I use the word in the plural—to make certain that all who are capable and desirous of post-secondary education have access to it. Canadians generally have been increasingly willing to support, as a desirable and necessary goal, steps to insure that everyone is able to get all the education desired, irrespective of personal financial resources. However, to achieve this goal calls for effort by more than one level of government. Since under our present constitution education is essentially a provincial matter, this means that any federal activity in this field must take into account this fact of Canadian life. Aside from what the present Canadian constitution provides in this area the provinces appear to have strong views as to the extent that the federal government should attempt to operate in what presently appears to be essentially a field of provincial jurisdiction. It seems to me that our movements toward this goal have to be made within this particular context. In saying this, one should not forget that the Canada student loan program has helped many students get post-secondary education who probably would not have otherwise had the resources to do so. I think this is demonstrated by the facts of the operation of the program. In 1964-65, 42,000 students received loans under the program. In the past year, this number increased to 107,000.

We could of course talk at length, Mr. Speaker, about improvements that could possibly be made to this program but I think we should not forget that what has been done represents a real allocation of resources by the federal government to student aid. If this plan were not in existence, these resources might possibly have gone into other areas of priority. The federal government has not simply guaranteed payment of loans. Since the beginning of the plan in 1964, a total of some $23 million has been paid for interest, the relatively small amount of claims and alternative payments to Quebec. And certainly these amounts for interest and so on can be expected to increase in future years.

A number of hon. members, Mr. Speaker, have made suggestions for changes in the plan, for addition of different categories of students or changes in the maximum amounts that may be borrowed. For example, several hon. members called for the inclusion of part-time students in the plan. It is true that at the moment the plan only provides for loans to full-time students, but it should not be forgotten that its main purpose is to assist students to obtain education through full-time study so that the education need not be dragged on over several years. In many cases, part-time students hold employment which would assist in paying costs. At the time the plan was originally presented and adopted by Parliament the intention was that it cover full-time students only.

It should be kept in mind when looking at the question of broadening the plan or including other categories or changing the general approach, that when it was introduced in 1964 it was as a broad general measure in the student aid field. It was not intended to meet all the needs of all students seeking post-secondary education but was designed to supplement resources available to students from their own efforts and their families as well as other private or provincial student aid funds. As a reflection of this fact, the maximum individual loan amount of $1,000 did not, even in the first loan year, meet the entire average cost of a student's attendance at a post-secondary institution. As hon. members have pointed out, it is true that costs have increased since that time and $1,000 will now finance a relatively smaller portion of the total costs involved. One should not forget, however, that in 1964-65 the Canada student loans plan was the only major government measure in the student aid field. Since then there has been a dramatic increase in the volume of student aid made available by provincial governments which has helped offset rising costs.

[Mr. Gray.]

The demand by most students, educationalists and others has been for increased grant aid rather than loans in order to minimize the loan burden on students. Programs of student aid in several provinces have been moving in this direction. One should keep this in mind when calling for an increase in the maximum amount of loans, annually or in total. I think at least one hon. member called for such an increase. However, other hon. members pointed out the problem that could be created if students should graduate with a heavy burden of debt. The maximum loan amount that could be obtained by a student for his post-secondary education under the plan was fixed originally with a view to taking into account the problem that could be created by imposing on the student an undue burden of debt after he graduates.

• (3:10 p.m.)

It is my understanding that the provinces are in the process of reviewing, together with the council of ministers of education, the whole field of student aid. The federal government has said that, if invited by them, it would be pleased to take part in this review. Therefore, in spite of the very interesting arguments made by various hon. members with regard to changing in some significant way the structure of the Canada student loans plan, it would not seem appropriate, in view of this ongoing review, that consideration should be given to making basic changes in the program until this review has been completed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), and the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) have raised the question of maximum amounts under the Canada Student Loans Act.

I want to say that the purpose of the bill is to guarantee sufficient money to meet loan requirements and this is why we are asking the House to approve the increased loan provision.

According to my information, the federal government has always taken the necessary steps to make sure that there is enough money to meet student loan requirements throughout Canada. It is the main reason why the government is introducing this bill now.

As far as I know no student has ever been refused a loan because provincial allocations were insufficient.

These allocations have always been adjusted so as to meet needs of students everywhere in Canada.

[English]

Dealing with another point raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), I seem to recall him making references to age limits in the Canada Student Loans Act. There is, I should like to assure him, no age limit in the act as far as eligibility for loans is concerned. Perhaps he noted the reference in my remarks to the 18 to 24 years age group. This reference was made solely to help to describe the formula which was used for determining the division of the total amounts permissible in the participating provinces.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has brought to the attention of the House the problem of people who have encountered difficulty in meeting repayment terms for various reasons. She mentioned a case where one person was not able to make payments because he was not able to find permanent employment. I should like to assure her and this House that such situations are in fact provided for by the regulations. There exists in the regulations a considerable degree of flexibility in setting the terms of repayment to fit the ability of the borrower to repay or for changing them where the borrower's financial circumstances are, for one reason or another, upset. In addition, there is considerable consultation between the guaranteed loans administration and the lending institutions where genuine cases of hardship are encountered. The important thing for the borrower falling into this sort of difficulty to remember is that he should consult with the bank as soon as possible. I am informed that almost in all cases where complications arise for borrowers in this category, they do so because they have failed to advise the lender of their circumstances. So, the existing regulations do appear to provide sufficient flexibility to take care of the types of cases the hon. member has raised. Therefore, it would not appear necessary to call for an amendment to the act itself to deal with such problems.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, may I say by way of conclusion, to hon. members that I would be very happy to receive any questions or complaints they may have brought to their attention from time to time about the operation of the Canada student loans plan.

If the matters in question happen to fall within that aspect of the plan which is directly under federal administration, that is matters having to do chiefly with the relationship between the government and the banks which make the loans, I would be happy to have them looked into and, if possible, dealt with in a satisfactory way. If they deal with aspects that come under provincial administration, including aspects dealing with questions of eligibility which I have outlined, I would be very happy to inform hon. members as to the steps they should take to have them reviewed by provincial authorities; or, if they prefer, I would be happy to make sure myself that these matters are looked into by provincial authorities. I hope hon. members will feel free to avail themselves of my willingness to assist them in dealing with problems of this type.

I will conclude, therefore, by saying that we have certainly had a very good discussion during this second reading stage. I look forward to going into other aspects which I have not had the opportunity to deal with at this point when the bill is before the committee. I hope it will be agreed that, on the basis of my own initial presentation, and the discussion that has followed, this bill deserves the support of this House on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley rising to ask a question.

Mr. Thomson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio two or three times in his remarks referred to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley. I think he probably meant to refer to the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey). I have not taken part in the debate on this bill. I make this slight correction for the sake of the record.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I stand corrected. Both hon. members are active in the work of this House, and perhaps my mistake therefore was a reasonable one to make.

An hon. Member: You'll go a long way, Herb.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF CATEGORIES OF LENDERS

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-9, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this bill are proposed a number of amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. The small businesses loans program is one of a group of three commercially oriented guaranteed loans programs under federal government auspices. They are designed to make available federally guaranteed term credit from private financial institutions to small businessmen, farmers and fishermen, to enable them to undertake a wide variety of expansion and improvement projects. The companion acts, therefore, to the Small Businesses Loans Act are the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

The Small Businesses Loans Act, first passed in 1960, provided for an initial three-year lending period. The act has subsequently been amended from time to time to provide for additional lending periods. Under the legislation, businessmen engaged in a number of fields of activity can obtain loans of up to $25,000 to finance a large number of business improvement projects. A small business is defined in the Act as one which has estimated gross revenues of less than $500,000 in the year in which it applies for the loan and which is engaged in one of the following forms of business activity: manufacturing, retail trade, wholesale trade, provision of services, construction, transportation and communication.

Borrowers may use the proceeds of loans to finance the purchase of fixed or movable assets or equipment or for the purchase, construction or improvement of business premises. Small business loans must generally be secured by a first charge on machinery or equipment purchased or a mortgage on business premises. In addition, the borrower must sign a promissory note and the bank may, if it considers it advisable, require further securities to be given in order to secure a loan. Loans may be repaid over a period of up to 10 years. The act does not place the banks under any obligation to make such loans. In fact, it is a requirement of the legislation that they exercise the same care in the making of small business loans as they do in the general conduct of their business.

Lending under the Small Businesses Loans Act has proved to be relatively stable, ranging between $20 million and $26 million in each year since the beginning of the program, with the exception of 1967 when the volume of loans declined to $11 million. From the time this program was started until November, 1968, the maximum rate of interest which banks could charge on loans made under the program was established under the regulations at 5½ per cent.

For some time prior to 1968, however, the general level of interest rates had been moving steadily upward and during 1968 this movement accelerated. The result of this was to make the 5½ per cent maximum rate unrealistic in relation to other avenues of investment which were open to lenders. In November of 1968 an order-in-council was made which changed the basis on which the maximum rate for small business loans was determined. This rate is now established twice annually, April 1 and October 1, and is based on the average of certain government of Canada bond yields over the preceding six months, plus a margin of 1 per cent. For the current period, October 1 of this first to March 31 next, this maximum rate is 8½ per cent. Since the interest rate procedure was implemented, lending has returned to levels closer to the levels of past years.

I now wish to outline the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act proposed in Bill C-9. These amendments parallel changes which have been made to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in the past year or so. If the present amendments are adopted by Parliament, these three programs will operate on a consistent and comparable basis. The amendments will enable trust companies, insurance companies, mortgage loan companies as well as credit unions, Caisses Populaires and other co-operative credit societies to apply to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) for designation as eligible lenders under the Small Businesses Loans Act. This will parallel changes made in other guaranteed loans legislation and considerably broaden the types of financial institutions from which small businessmen may seek financing under this act.

The current lending period would, in the absence of amendment, expire on December 31 of this year. Among the amendments being proposed, therefore, is one which will add an additional 18 month period which will expire on June 30, 1971. This will result in the lending period under the Small Businesses Loans Act ending at the same time as the current lending periods under both the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. This will enable the government to review these three very similar programs as a group when they next come up for renewal. Possible changes in each can then readily be assessed in light of the implications which it holds for the others.

Under the Small Businesses Loans Act there is a two-fold limitation of the extent of the liability of the Minister of Finance for loans made. The first of these relates to the aggregate value of loans made by all lending institutions in a lending period. For the current lending period this over-all maximum was established at $300 million. During the new lending period established by these amendments, this amount is to be set at $100 million in respect of loans made by all chartered banks and $50 million in respect of loans made by all other eligible lenders.

The second part of the minister's liability deals with its extent to an individual lender. Currently, the liability is limited to an amount equal to 10 per cent of the gross value of loans made by any one lender. Since only the chartered banks had been eligible lenders in the past and since each had a sizeable amount of loans under the act, this in practice amounted to a 100 per cent guarantee as 10 per cent of the aggregate loans made by each was more than enough to pay out in full balances owing to banks on defaulted loans.

This provision could, however, expose a lender with only a few loans to the risk that if there was to be default on even one or two of them, there would be insufficient guarantee to cover the entire amount of the loss to the lender. In order to minimize this possibility, the liability of the minister to an individual lender will now be set at an amount equal to 90 per cent of the aggregate value of the first $125,000, 50 per cent of the amount between $125,000 and $250,000, and 10 per cent of the amount in excess of $250,000 of loans made by that lender. It is hoped that this revision will encourage the making of small business loans even at the low volume of lending by the individual classes of lenders who will be eligible to do so under the proposed amendments.

In conclusion, I wish to say it is the government's hope that these amendments will be of help to the small businessmen in Canada who constitute an important element of our economy. While lending under this program has never approached the volume under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, it has none the less been a useful source of term financing for the small businessmen. Since its inception some 20,000 small businesses have obtained financing of almost $190 million under this program. The proposals in Bill C-9 will ensure that this kind of credit facility will continue to be available to assist small businessmen in Canada.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): On reading Bill C-9, an act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, one finds that section 1(a) extends the definition of a bank within the meaning of the Act to credit unions, caisse populaire, trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies. When the Bank Act was revised in 1966, the government refused amendments defining the business of banking in such a way as to bring credit unions and institutions of this type, carrying on all the functions of banking, under the control of the Bank Act. Yet, in this bill the government is deliberately amending an Act so as to define these institutions as banks. I have no quarrel with this, but it does give me the feeling there is some inconsistency in planning by the government.

The thought occurs to me, why should trust companies be included in this bill? I wonder whether they have actually sought the change to allow them to engage in this business or if this is merely wishful thinking on the part of the government. With a measure of this kind, it is necessary to examine how effective it has been and how many people are making use of these small business loans. I now wish to refer to the annual report of the Small Businesses Loans Act. I find that in the period 1961 to 1965, the total of the loans remained constant at $26 million per year. In the period 1966-1967, this amount decreased to $20 million. In 1968, the figure decreased to $11 million, or slightly more. I think we can draw a parallel to this, to some extent. If hon. members will look at the report on the operation of the Farm Improvement Loans Act they will find there was a gradual build-up to a point at which something between $200 millions and $212 million was being lent in the years from 1965 to 1967. Then, in 1968 it dropped to $40 million, or a little more, which represents a far greater decline than is evident even in small business loans under the legislation we are considering.

It is interesting to compare these figures with those of the Industrial Development Bank operating in an area where the interest rate has been allowed to rise. We note at once the absence of a similar decline in the amount of money lent. The current I.D.B. rate of interest is something like 10 per cent on amounts less than $50,000, whereas the rate for the small business loans would be 8½ per cent. Knowing the demand which exists for credit at the present time it is obvious there must be definite reasons for the sharp decline in the amount of money lent under the Act now before us.

Three reasons come to my mind. First, the Act could be too restrictive—it might not seem to be, but possibly it could be interpreted by the banks in terms which are too restrictive. It may be we should broaden the scope of this Act so as to cover more types of business, or more lines of credit. We should certainly encourage the use of loans of this type. I am sure hon. members looking back to their ridings, would agree it is much better to have 50 businesses employing 20 people each than to have one business employing 1,000.

Another reason, and one which in my view can be advanced with a greater degree of certainty, follows from the fact that no loan can exceed $25,000. While this may have been realistic back in 1961, it is not even in the ball park today. I do not intend to discuss the changes in the price structure and in the cost of living index since 1961, because we are all familiar with this situation, but I will say that a maximum figure of $40,000 or $50,000 would be far more in line with the credit requirements of business today. The I.D.B. figures certainly indicate that loans in the higher category are more generally required.

The third reason which occurs to me, and I believe it is probably the main reason, is the reluctance of the banks to lend money under this Act. This situation might be partially corrected by the amendment which would increase the percentage of the guarantee for banks whose aggregate amount on loan under the Act did not exceed $250,000. Nevertheless, I cannot but feel there is a reluctance on the part of the financial institutions to lend money at the current rate of 8½ per cent when it is possible for them to do considerably better.

We are all aware that the banks have an obligation to this country and to its citizens. When Parliament granted them a charter to service the money market and create credit they accepted this obligation. I submit, from our experience of the operation of this Small Businesses Loans Act and of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, that they are not living up to their obligation. We can see the demand for loans generally is increasing. But instead of fulfilling their obligations under their charters, our banks are simply going after bigger profits. They are going after the dollar, that is all it boils down to, and they are not concerned with small business; they are not concerned with the people. They would much prefer to put their money where there is no risk and where interest rates are higher than to lend it under this small loans legislation. It is time the minister put his finger on the banks and told them: Live up to your obligations to the citizens of this country or maybe we should revoke your charter.

The banks have a responsibility and it is the duty of the government to see they live up to the terms of their charters. If we allow the present situation to continue we could eventually find the banks lending all their money to the large corporations. General Motors, for example, could use far more capital than is needed for all the small business and farm improvement loans put together. I believe the banks are tending to look at the situation in this light. They are not conscious of any pressure on them to fulfil their obligations, and they are by-passing small borrowers. Look at the amounts set aside for guarantees as compared with the amount used under this Act—something like $100 million set aside for each year, and only $11 million used last year. We know the demand is there, so we can only conclude that a great deal must be wrong in this area.

Last week the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) put his finger on the small businesses of this nation. His white paper on taxation said, in effect, to small businessmen, the middle class of this country: Live up to your obligation to the poor. But he is not doing anything to affect the real wealth of this country. The tax rates to be imposed on certain income levels will be dropping from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. If the minister is willing to put his finger on small businesses and private entrepreneurs, I say he should be willing to put his finger on the banks and tell them to live up to their responsibilities, too.

When we look at the financial statements of the banks we find they are not suffering any hardship. I have a statement here from the Royal Bank of Canada from which I note that in the last three years, from 1966 to 1968, net profits rose from $27 million to $35½ million. There is certainly no reason for the banks to complain about their profit margin. They should be forced, if necessary, to go out into the market and extend credit where it is needed.

I do not believe one can consider this bill adequately without at the same time taking into account the ramifications of the white paper on tax reform, if and when they are implemented—and there is every indication from the government that they will be. Most of the small businesses that will obtain loans under Bill C-9 are what the white paper describes as closely held corporations, and for taxation purposes will be taxed at rates similar to those applied to unincorporated businesses. When a small businessman takes a loan under this Act—the same can be said of farmers taking farm improvement loans—a contract is entered into for a period of time. I believe the time limit on small business loans is up to ten years. In many cases, these loans will extend into the period when the proposed plans in the government's white paper on taxation come into effect.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Present borrowers are contracting to repay their loans in a given period knowing that the tax rate under our present corporate structure is 21 cents on the dollar on amounts under $35,000, the sort of loans we are mostly concerned with here. What happens to these businesses when the government changes the rules in the middle of the ball game? The borrower who has contracted to repay his loan at the current taxation rate is suddenly put into the position of being called upon to pay 130 per cent of his present rate of taxation. By way of additional burden, he may also be paying 50 per cent tax on paper profits supposedly accrued from a misplaced valuation date.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I say that these amendments will do absolutely nothing for the small businessman unless the finance minister puts his finger in present banking policy. May I also say there is little benefit bestowed by legislation that we hope will encourage small businesses and private entrepreneurs when there is already on the drafting board a systematic program that will lead to the eventual destruction of such private enterprises.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) that this time both the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) and the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley are participating in the debate, and since it is reasonable to suggest that he may become confused perhaps he should not quote us directly.

First of all, may I put a direct question to the minister in the hope that he will reply to it when he closes the debate. My question concerns how the Department of Finance intends to supervise and guarantee loans that are made by authorized corporations. The reason I raise this question is that an insurance company, authorized under provincial legislation in Ontario, recently went bankrupt with particularly messy results. In this case many investors lost their money. I would not want to see any federal taxation money going down a similar type of drain, so perhaps the minister will explain how he intends to supervise companies who lend money under a federal guarantee in accordance with the terms of the act.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, there has been a trend in recent years for small businesses to be swallowed up by the large corporations. Sometimes small businesses are bought up; on other occasions direct competition has been successful in forcing the small businessman to the wall. I hope this bill will provide him with some relief in this regard. Certainly, the small businessman needs capital, and in a time of inflation and tight money it is extremely difficult to find.

I suggest this bill can be likened to a piece of string. Although you can give the string some leeway, and let it out a little, you cannot exert pressure on it. Similarly, you cannot persuade a small businessman to borrow money unless he wishes to do so. Neither can you force a bank to lend him that money. I wonder whether the minister would consider this legislation in that light, because perhaps a little leeway on the string might be required as far as credit institutions are concerned.

The small businessman frequently finds himself in the awkward position of passing on increased costs to his customers. In times of continually rising interest rates, he finds himself in a more awkward position in this respect than do some of the larger firms. I think some consideration should be given to the fact that small businesses are less able to pay high interest rates than the big corporations.

I also wonder whether something could be done for the small businessman by way of training. Let me give an example of what I mean. Take the man who is an exceptionally able automobile mechanic. Soon, he is promoted to shop foreman, and then eventually, having saved money and perhaps borrowed some from his relatives, the bank, or the credit union under this particular legislation, he purchases the business and goes into business for himself. He is now in a completely different field; no longer is he repairing automobiles or tractors. From experience I have had with others, I feel it would be useful to establish some sort of business management training scheme. Although we have training schemes for mechanics that want to turn to some other trade, to my knowledge there is no adequate government-sponsored training offered in the field of business management.

As a farmer, I was once a member of a farm management club, and I am fully aware of what membership in that club did for me as a small businessman. I suggest the government should consider establishing, either by bringing pressure to bear on provincial governments or in co-operation with provincial governments, a management training scheme for small businessmen who are required to manage businesses. This is particularly necessary when a man leaves a trade and enters the field of business management. Whether these people are in the newspaper business, are workers in garages, tinsmiths or plumbers, most of them have moved up the ladder through their trade, and I think something of the kind I have outlined should be done for them. It is tragic when men who have saved money for 25 years and who have borrowed money to go into business lose all within five years, plus five years off their lives. I know people to whom this has happened, and all they really needed was a little more management skill.

There has also been quite an expansion of the franchising field recently. I think that this sort of business enterprise has considerable merit. In some cases it provides more efficiency, and it offers the individual an opportunity to participate at the local level. I think it is good to have franchising rather than having big companies run everything from the top. I am happy to see the expansion. It is not always the best thing, in so far as price competition is concerned, to have this difference in the positions of the two elements. Frequently, the local businessman finds he has to work long hours for little or nothing, making sacrifices to make ends meet, whereas the big company has arranged to be in a protected position. Perhaps we should have legislation which offers some protection to the man who finds himself in competition with a big company. There are many in this position and the number is apt to increase. Perhaps the minister would consider legislation of this nature.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Let me make one or two comments in respect of small businessmen generally. In our small prairie communities, these people have an equity in the community and they are interested in its welfare and well being. Frequently, they attempt to move heaven and earth to improve business and the community generally. We should give them credit where credit is due. If by offering credit in an economic sense we can help them to establish businesses, I suggest we ought to do so. I am in favour of this bill but I have some reservations as to how effective it might be. I hope the minister will answer the question I have asked in respect of supervision of provincial organizations.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak in favour of these amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act. They will allow small business enterprises to avail themselves of more competitive loans from various banking institutions. Prior to this, a small businessman was only able to get a loan from a bank. The horizons will now be such that he can get a loan from a credit union, from a trust company and the like.

It is not fair to suggest that the trust companies had a hand in proposing these amendments to the Act. In any event, more money will be made available to the small businessman. The purpose of the Small Businesses Loans Act has been forgotten in recent years. Perhaps this is the result of the establishment of the Area Development Agency program which has provided a certain amount of necessary funds to small businessmen in Canada.

The present bill is an excellent one and is an indication that the Act has served its purpose. The fact that the number and amount of loans have decreased is also an indication of this fact. The suggestion that chartered banks are not prepared to take a risk in respect of small loans is not in accordance with the facts. This suggestion cannot be made simply because banks make loans in the normal course of business and ask for guarantees against default. The income of any bank has little or no bearing on the amount of money being made available under the terms of this Act and I think it is unfair to suggest that banks have been reluctant to make such loans.

Let me also draw attention to the fact that the current taxation payment of 21 per cent on the first $35,000 will remain unchanged. It is not correct to say that after valuation day small businessmen will be penalized in relation to the big corporations. It will be open to the small businessmen, after valuation day, to pay himself a salary or fees which will be subject to the normal tax rates. Therefore, he does not have to pay double taxation. A small businessman can elect to follow this course under the present legislation and he can elect to do so after valuation day.

Let me caution some hon. members who have spoken about this subject. There is no difference in the terms or percentage that the small businessman pays under the existing law up to the $35,000 limit and what he will pay under the proposed changes in the white paper. The proposals in this bill will increase the number of banking institutions, including mortgage companies, trust companies and credit unions, to which the small businessman in Canada can go for a loan. These institutions will be prepared to assist in the same way the banks have done. This is an excellent change to the present Act. It will help the small businessman and encourage him. If this measure is operated in conjunction with the ADA program, it will be of tremendous advantage to the small business communities in Canada.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on the proposed amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act now before us, will, of necessity, be brief. There is little purpose in discussing at length a question that may very shortly become purely an academic one if the tax reform proposals so recently advanced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) are adopted by parliament.

In my view the minister's plans, as they affect small businesses and family enterprises, with which this bill is concerned, will effectively remove this segment of business from the national economy. In a few years such legislation as this Small Businesses Loans Act will be unnecessary because there may well be few small businessmen left to apply for loans and no small businesses needing money.

As far as this Act itself and the amendments proposed to be made to it are concerned, I have not criticism. Indeed, I think it is commendable to extend the body of loan-making institutions and to make more money available to small businesses on more generous terms. But, if the government's intent is to drive the small operator out of business, as the proposed tax reforms would appear to indicate, then what is the purpose of amending this Act or of having it on the statute books at all?

I was amazed to read Anthony Westell's quotation of a statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in the Globe and Mail of November 8. The minister was quoted as saying that his tax reform program was all for the little man. Such a statement may be politically astute, but it is hardly believable when we take a close look at the minister's proposals with regard to the little man in his role as a businessman. Small companies will be faced with the progressive rise in the tax on corporate income from the present fixed and tolerable 21 per cent on the first $35,000 of earnings to a level of 50 per cent on all income. In these circumstances it will matter little to a small businessman that, thanks to the passing of the amendments now before us, he can apply for a small business loan to a credit union, a caisse populaire, a co-operative credit society, insurance company, trust company or loan company.

Today's small operator, already being ground between jarring economic factors such as inflation, high interest rates, soaring federal, provincial and municipal tax rates, is scarcely likely to be excited by amendments to this Act designed to encourage lending by small-volume lenders. With the tax proposals hanging like a cloud over his head the small businessman in Canada today simply will be looking for a way out. All one needs to do is to take a look at what faces many small businesses and family businesses that revolve around one principal. Should this principal die, his heirs would be confronted by an estate tax that can run up to 50 per cent; a full capital gains tax that, including the provincial tax, could reach a rate of 56 per cent on any profit over the figure established on the proposed valuation day.

The excuse the Minister of Finance has given for singling out small businesses for such harsh treatment is that it is a method of stopping up the loophole of personal incorporation, a device by which some individuals sought relief from taxes by incorporating themselves. But where does that leave legitimate small businesses? Surely, some simple legal provisions could be made that would prevent tax avoidance by self-incorporation without victimizing legitimate individual business enterprise and initiative. The minister is using a cannon to kill a mouse. He proposes to penalize many to get the few.

In today's Globe and Mail, I. H. Asper, in a very perceptive and thought-provoking article on the proposed tax reforms, asks several pertinent questions—"Does Ottawa want everyone to go public" and "Is there no place left for family or individual ownership?" These two questions go to the very heart of the legislation now before us. If Ottawa does in truth want everyone to go public—that is get out of small business and leave the whole field to large public corporations—then these amendments and the Act itself are redundant. If, as Mr. Asper suggests, there is no place left for family or individual ownership, then the same thing applies and we are wasting our time discussing this piece of legislation.

It is my firm belief, Mr. Speaker, that the philosophy of this present government allows no place in the national economy for small enterprises of any kind. The whole tenor of government statements and action since taking office has been to emphasize the fact that individuals, small businesses, independent operators of any kind, particularly those that make up the bulk of Canada's agricultural community, are not wanted, are nothing but a nuisance to the planners and the tax gatherers and have been, in effect, declared expendable by this government.

In conclusion may I say I support this legislation but believe it is odd that, although this legislation is of great value to the small businesses in the relatively depressed areas, these businesses should be faced with this tax cloud hanging over their heads.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in respect of Bill C-9 to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is rather interesting that I do not entirely agree with my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) when he says that small businesses are disappearing. It is interesting to note how many variety stores spring up in small towns and in this city. Many of these variety stores are open long hours. They are still doing business and must be prosperous. Their premises are well maintained and they provide a service to those of us who forget to get what we need before the large stores close at six o'clock. I do not have the statistics with me but from the statistics I have seen from time to time it would appear that small businesses are able to carry on in Canada today, despite the fact that there are such tremendous organizations as the chain stores and large department stores with which they must compete.

I am happy to support this legislation. The amendments simply add certain other lending institutions to those which are presently available to provide loans to small businessmen who require them. I should like to remind the House and the people of the country that the government of which I was a member in 1961 brought this Act into force in the first place. We were proud to do that because previously there had been no lending area in which a small businessman could borrow money for the purpose of enlarging his establishment, improving it or putting in new facilities. This legislation was of great assistance to him. The report for the year 1968 shows that almost 20,000 small businessmen have taken advantage of this legislation over a period of years. An amount of approximately $108 million has been lent, since the inception of this legislation. I believe this fact was mentioned earlier. It is interesting to note that in 1968 the number of applications and the amount of the loans made dropped by almost half. This fact brings to my mind the situation that has developed in connection with farm improvement loans in my area. When the bank interest rate became so high, the bankers were not interested in lending money to farmers. The same situation applies in respect of small businessmen. When the lending institutions can get 10 per cent for their money in other areas they are not interested in giving money to small businessmen or farmers at an interest rate of 8¾ per cent. I understand the interest rate applicable to this legislation at the present time is 8¾ per cent.

This brings us to an area which I think is important in respect of this legislation. I have reference to the rate of interest which is now so high. When this legislation was brought in, I believe the interest rate was around 5 per cent or at the most 6 per cent. Now, however, it is 8¾ per cent. Under present conditions, this may not seem to be too high, but how high is high. I think interest rates are something which should be looked into by this great commission we have set up to make a review of prices, wages and costs.

Perhaps the Bank Act could be altered in order to place a ceiling on the bank rate. Just the other day a banker whom I know said to me that he would be very happy to see the bank rate go back to 6 per cent because this would be of great assistance to the people of Canada and would have a tremendous impact on the cost of living. Everybody is affected by the inflationary pressures that take away from the value of our dollars. This situation worries the old age pensioners and those who are retired on fixed incomes because they find they do not have adequate money to buy the things they need. I maintain that the high interest rate has had a tremendous impact on the cost of living. As I said before, I believe the government, through the wonderful new commission which has been set up, should examine the interest rates and if possible come to the conclusion that a reduction in the interest rate will combat the high cost of living and reduce the inflationary pressures in our nation.

There is one other thing I would like to speak about, and one other suggestion I would like to make in connection with this particular legislation. I notice the people who are eligible for loans are those who are in manufacturing, wholesale trade, retail trade, service businesses, construction, transportation or communications. I come from a small community of around 1,200 people which serves quite a large farm area, and we find it difficult to attract professional people who will set up businesses in the community. Would it not be possible to include professional people under the act such as doctors who want to build medical offices or medical centres from which they would service the area, and accountants, dentists and lawyers? I know these people are in the high income brackets, but hon. members who have small communities in their ridings know how difficult it is to attract professional people to them, people whose services are necessary.

Would it be possible for the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) to look into this suggestion, and give consideration to the possibility of loans being made to these types of people so that they would find it attractive to move into small communities and provide the services that are so greatly needed? In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation because, as I say, it was promoted by our party when we were the government and it has served a tremendous need in the nation ever since its inception.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate very briefly in this debate and to speak in support of this legislation because, as the last speaker has mentioned, it was brought in by our Party when we were in office. We considered it sound at that time and it is equally sound today.

For a few moments I would like to comment on a proposal contained in the White Paper on Taxation which affects small businesses. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have submitted that white paper to the country so that it may be commented upon over the next few months, and I would like to make a comment on it now which I hope will be noted by the Minister of Finance through his colleague, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray). I feel sure he will bring this suggestion to his attention.

I feel it would be a great mistake to introduce the cancellation of the provision which presently exists, the 21 per cent rate on the first $35,000 of profits, and replace it with the 50 per cent rate on all profits. I feel this way, Mr. Speaker, for the following reasons: This 21 per cent rate of tax for the first $35,000 of profits has been of great help to small businesses in two important ways. First of all, the ability to retain a far larger share of the first $35,000 of profits has encouraged many creative men with drive and ability to get into business for themselves, and the country and the economy have benefited greatly thereby. These small businesses have often grown into large operations, with the resultant growth in wealth and employment for our country.

The second reason is that the lower rate of tax on the first $35,000 of profits has encouraged many small businesses to plow much of their earnings back into the business, and this has provided them with expansion capital which they badly need. This is particularly important for small businesses which have the ability to expand but find it hard to do so because of the difficulty in borrowing the capital which they need for their expansion operation.

As we all know, small businesses find it much more difficult than large businesses to borrow capital because of their size and because of the fact that in many cases they have not been long established. If they are able to borrow they often have to pay very high and sometimes exorbitant rates of interest, something which they can ill afford to do. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I strongly recommend to the Minister of Finance and to the government, through the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) who is in attendance today, that they give serious consideration to retaining the 21 per cent tax rate on the first $35,000 of profits which as I say, has been of tremendous benefit to small businesses in the past, and will be in the future. If that measure is retained, I believe that small businesses will in the future be able to continue to grow and prosper with great benefit to our country.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words on Bill C-9 to protest the evidence of discrimination which, in my opinion, exists in relation to the availability of funds for some parts of Canada under the Small Businesses Loans Act. I refer in particular to the Atlantic region, especially the province of Newfoundland.

The more I look at this Small Businesses Loans Act and at two other similar ones—I refer to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act—the more it is brought forcibly to me that they are not worth much, if I assess correctly the benefits that are supposed to be derived from the legislation in some areas of the country. But more important is the fact that the lending institutions, specifically the banks, are shirking their responsibility in carrying out their duty to all those for whom the benefits are intended.

We spend hours and hours debating the various Acts and the amendments thereto proposed in this House but I have yet to understand why we waste time debating them when, as is apparent, the government does not seem to follow up what happens after they are passed. I have no hesitation in stating that the principle of the Small Businesses Loans Act is a good one, but if we keep passing these bills we must assume responsibility for seeing that the benefits which should flow from them are extended to all Canadians. Furthermore, we should make sure that those agencies which are responsible carry out the responsibilities with which they are charged under these Acts. Instead, we print reams and reams of copies of these bills and file them away for posterity.

I would like to refer to a news release issued by the Department of Finance on October 21 giving a list of the loans made in 1968 and part of 1969. In 1968, for a six months period under the Small Businesses Loans Act, there were 742 loans granted in Canada totalling an amount over $7 million. However, only one loan was granted in Newfoundland for an amount of $25,00. In a six months period in 1969 there were 769 loans granted in Canada totalling over $8 million, and again only one, amounting to $4,380, to some applicant in Newfoundland.

The same situation applies with regard to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. In the 15 years since its inception, only 18 loans were granted in Newfoundland. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, in 1968 only one loan was granted in that province, amounting to the grand sum of $1,280 out of a total for Canada of over $30 million. It is easy to see the trend, Mr. Speaker. Newfoundland must be on a quota system for these loans, a quota of one per year. This is a preposterous and ridiculous situation, and it should be the duty of the government to investigate the reason for this situation.

If the object of this Act is to provide funds for loans to small businessmen to start or improve various types of businesses and to help those with initiative and resourcefulness who might not be able to borrow money under ordinary circumstances, then someone is denying Newfoundlanders this right or else Newfoundlanders are not trusted. If this is not so, then I would like to get some answers. I want to know if Newfoundlanders are treated on the same basis as people in the rest of Canada. Since coming to Ottawa I have recommended the availability of various government loans to many constituents in my province seeking help to start businesses, and of the many who tried to obtain loans all have failed with the exception of one. He must be the quota for this year. He was granted a loan, but at an interest rate of 11 per cent. Even though he applied under this legislation, he was not given the benefit of the lower rate of interest. A few months ago, as a result of frustration, I wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) with regard to Fisheries Improvement Loans asking for some explanation of the fact that 99.9 per cent of applicants from Newfoundland were being turned down. I received a three page reply and this is what I was told in effect.

As you know, all these guaranteed loans programs require the lender to exercise the normal procedures used by him in the course of the conduct of his own business. A lender has the authority under the legislation to refuse a loan if a manager feels he would not make a normal bank loan to the individual concerned because of past experience with the customer or if he considers the credit risk too high. He further went on to say that he did not think it would be proper for him to interfere in these aspects of the programs. If this is the case; Mr. Speaker, that the banks can refuse a government guaranteed loan just as they would a normal bank loan, then what do we need the legislation for or what is its purpose? I can only deduce, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of past performance which is so evident from the information in the breakdown of loans, that the lending institutions are destroying the initiative of small business in the deprived regions of Canada absolutely and intentionally. Unless a new appraisal of the situation is made in good faith, this bill will not benefit all Canadians as it is supposed to do.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it was very interesting, and disconcerting too, to listen to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who just preceded me and to understand from them that the great benevolent banking system in this country is not really that interested in some parts of Canada. Obviously, the government of the day and its predecessors who have made occasional changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act are not that interested either.

We all know that the intention and the purpose of the Act was, in theory anyway, to provide an opportunity for small businesses to acquire the capital that had previously been denied them. We know, too, that the presumption of the law when it was initially introduced was that the forces of the Canadian government and the Canadian Parliament, not only in an underwriting sense so far as loans were concerned but in a moral sense as well, were to underpin the position of the small businessman all across the nation. According to the remarks of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) that has not been the case in Newfoundland. I think it probably shows that the banking fraternity in Canada, as is the case with institutions in other fields, is interested in making a buck, making a profit. The factor of service and availability of facilities to areas on a moralistic or economic basis is purely incidental.

One would think, Mr. Speaker, that this government, which is purported to have some concept of the just society, would take cognizance of this reluctance on the part of banking and lending institutions to involve themselves more intimately in the areas of Canada most in need of assistance. To that extent, and in the light of the proposal before us, I consider this government to be derelict and delinquent in its duty to Canadians interested in developing, promoting or establishing a small business.

When it comes to reading the fine print and putting the law into force, some of the reasons for the legislation seem to have gone by the board. One of these reasons was to put the small businessman in a relatively competitive economic position with regard to big business, the corporate entities. We all know that larger corporations have more financial resources which make it easier for them to engage in research, etc. We know that it is easier for a large corporation, vis-à-vis a small business or company, to engage in the sales and advertising techniques necessary to promote the product which it produces or distributes. It is easier for them to find their finances internally or to borrow money by debenture or raise it by the sale of additional shares or the issue of warrants. Small businesses cannot take such measures, however. The large corporations can carry a large inventory. As witnessed in the last day or two by the announcement of Shell Oil and Gulf Oil, who will not be the only two companies to increase prices, it is easier for large corporations to control prices.

The presumption of the law when it was first introduced in the Canadian Parliament was that it should be used to place the small businessman in a better position with respect to his total activities in the fields of production, advertising, sales, creation of money, capital and the like. Mr. Speaker, this does not seem to be the case. It seems that the Act is more for propaganda purposes than to render aid. Mind you, it is true that some businesses have acquired loans from banks under the Act and no doubt some will in future. I think the minister said that the loans ranged somewhere between $20 million and $26 million a year, but the chances are that many of the businesses concerned could have acquired a loan from the bank even had it not been guaranteed under the Small Businesses Loans Act, so the full force and value of the legislation is not really reflected in these figures.

One of the prime costs of doing business today is the interest rate. The Small Businesses Loans Act deals with this and at the moment the rate is pegged at 8½ per cent. By April 1st, next, it is likely that this will have increased because interest rates on government bonds will probably increase. This is partly due, I think, to the publication of the White Paper on Taxation and the issuance of the current Canada Savings Bonds series. To draw an analogy with the Canada Savings Bonds, the government has said to the Canadian people that for the next five years they can expect interest rates to be as high if not higher than they are at the moment. The Government has taken the course of borrowing money through the issuance of Canada Savings Bonds and has guaranteed to pay interest rates averaging 8 per cent over a nine year period and ranging upward of 8¼ per cent in the latter years of the life of the Canada Savings Bonds. The government would not presume to do that if it expected interest rates to decline. The White Paper on Taxation which was issued a week ago indicates that there is a likelihood of interest rates increasing.

It seems, from the way the stock market reacted last week to the white paper, that much money in this country is to be invested in the stocks of Canadian corporations. If that is the case, then part of that investment money will be re-invested; it will be taken out of bonds and put into the common shares of companies. Clearly, if the attractiveness of bonds is to remain, then the interest rates of government, municipal, provincial bonds and the like will have to be increased in order that investors will want to invest money in bonds. If that is to happen, as seems to be the case, it simply means that interest rates are likely to increase further. The prospective figure of 8½ per cent interest or thereabouts that is to apply to small business loans may increase to heaven knows what; we do not know to what extent rates will have increased by next April. I submit that this sort of thing is certainly not helpful to the total economy of the nation. It reflects a mismanagement of the entire monetary system in Canada. Also, it does not help the small businessmen of this country, those who are supposed in theory to benefit from the Act we are amending.

The amendment, I submit, is relatively insignificant. It simply seeks to extend the group which may lend money, to extend the time during which the Act will be in force and to make an extension with respect to amounts. But the amendment does not get to the core of the problem. It does not, in the true sense, place those small businessmen who are the backbone of the rural part of the country in a position that is different from the one they are in now.

One would think that with the so-called concern expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of the government about the position we are in, it would have been possible to develop legislation that is more attractive, worth-while and valuable to the small businessman than is the bill we are currently considering.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, we have been advised that the government would introduce Bill C-9 entitled "An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act", which reads in part:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Paragraph (a) of section 2 of the Small Businesses Loans Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) "bank" means

(i) a bank to which the Bank Act applies,

(ii) a credit union, caisse populaire or other cooperative credit society that is designated by the Minister on the application of that society as a bank for the purposes of this Act, or

However, when we get in touch with the officials of credit unions or caisses populaires in the province of Quebec, we realize that they have not even been consulted before the bill was amended. The officials of those organizations, which have provincial juridiction and are provincially-chartered, fail to understand why they were not even consulted before the Small Businesses Loans Act was amended. They see the federal government intervene in the preparation of legislation about which they expect to be consulted.

In view of such intransigence on the part of the federal government, which does not even bother to consult provincially-chartered organizations, we of the Ralliement Creditiste cannot understand why a meeting was not held in order to avoid friction between the federal and the provincial governments.

Our responsibility as members is always to consider first the orderly conduct of the nation's business. I think I should point out that there may be disagreements, but they are not always due to the provinces; bent on centralization, the federal government often forgets that certain areas come under provincial jurisdiction. That is why we ask that what belongs to Caesar be given to Caesar and that some effort be made to reach prior agreement with credit unions.

I would like to remind the House that we, of the Ralliement Creditiste, have been asking for many years that the Bank of Canada be put at the service of small businesses by granting them low interest loans, or merely on the basis of the administration costs, because several small businessmen are compelled today for all practical purposes to pay up to 10 per cent of interest.

In my opinion, the request made by our organization for over 50 years has certainly not been put into practice, and this interferes with the operation of some small businesses which, because they belong to the private sector, should be helped in co-operation with the Bank of Canada granting loans at interest rates of 1½ or 2 per cent.

Quite often, our opponents tell us: "Yes, but if the Bank of Canada provides interest-free loans to small businesses, that would be senseless. I will now take the liberty of referring to a statement as reported in Hansard for April 28, 1959. It is a statement of Mr. Cardin which I will textually quote, in order that we may note that in 1959, under a Progressive Conservative government, the opposition criticized. With a reversal of the situation, criticism sometimes comes from the other side of the House.

Therefore, one realizes we are not the only ones who ask that the Bank of Canada, and not the caisses populaires and credit unions, make loans to small businesses. The claims of others are sometimes more convincing, specially when those others belong to the opposition.

Here is what Mr. Cardin said, and I quote:

As I say, I think it is clear that the Conservative government has in fact decided to monetize its defiicit. I admit that I had to look into the matter of monetization and in my research, I came across an article in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of April 23—

I will now quote from that article, signed by Mr. Robert B. Anderson, Secretary of the United States Treasury:

"There is little understanding of fiscal matters, even among those who are eminent and on the whole otherwise well informed. I realized this one day when a visitor to my office told me: 'Mr. Secretary, you refer to the dangers involved in monetization. Do you know, I just don't believe any danger is involved, probably because I don't quite understand what monetization means'." Here is the Hon. Robert Anderson's explanation:

"I replied: "Let us suppose I want to issue 100 million dollars worth of cheques by tomorrow morning, but the Treasury has no more funds. If I called a bank and said: "Would you lend me $100 million at 3½ per cent payable in six months if I sent you a promissory note?", the banker would probably reply: "Yes, sure."

Where would he find the $100 million to credit to the U.S. Treasury? Would he take them from someone else's account? Surely not. He would simply create this sum of money on condition that he would not encroach on the prescribed reserves—in crediting it to our account and in accepting the government's note as an asset. When $100 millions worth of cheques had been issued, the operation would have added this amount to the aggregate currency in circulation. This is monetization to about the same degree as if I had called the Mint and had asked them: "Coin me $100 million of bank notes and send them to me before tomorrow."

Mr. Speaker, if the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States was able, in 1959, to make such a statement and if, last week, in the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee, a German expert in "indebtedness" was able to tell us that the real cause of the disappearance of some industries lies in the increase of interest rates up to 10 per cent, it might be a good idea to take into consideration the proposals made by the Créditistes.

In the United States and in Germany, small businesses succeed because the money they need to survive is printed by hundreds of million dollars.

The Americans can afford to purchase the product of the Canadian economy. We have seen this, especially in the province of Quebec, with regard to the Ski-Doo industry which has developed in the last few years.

Ski-roule, a Canadian company, has just been sold to Americans for an amount of $28 millions. No wonder since they print money, $100 millions at a time. They come and buy Canadian industries while we hurl accusations at each other and refuse to accept the suggestions that the Créditistes have been proposing for 50 years.

The German professor who visited us last week demonstrated that everything was just fine in Germany and that his country, as well as the United States, has taken a leaf from the Social Credit's book without saying so, and allowed State banks to lend money to small industries, sometimes at low rates or by means of other clearing devices, which enables them to buy some Canadian industries.

It is time, I think, that all Canadians join forces because if, as the Secretary of the U.S. Treasury stated, Americans can print $100 millions in order to buy Canadian small industries, it is time, I say, that we should join forces and print money against production guarantee, so as to help small businesses and lend them money at interest rates much lower than those now in force.

As a young student working in credit unions, I was taking courses where I was told that co-operation was a marvellous thing to prevent the exploitation of man by man.

We had composed a very popular song against the exorbitant interest rates of 10 per cent imposed by some finance companies while credit unions required only 3 per cent The song was entitled: "un jour les voleurs confus s'en iront". (Some day, the confused thieves will go away).

Well, Mr. Speaker, since we are paying 10 per cent interest at the present time, I say that this is legalized robbery, and that many industries will disappear unless we follow the example of other countries which print money according to their needs, without telling us about it. Besides Mr. Cardin added, and I quote:

Then, it is quite difficult to understand how, according to the Minister of Finance—

—a Progressive Conservative then——the highest bank rates in Canada's history can be helpful to the provinces and the municipalities. We recall all the speeches that were made by members of the government and all the crocodile tears that were shed about the financial plight of the provinces and the municipalities and the fact that they were so greatly in debt it was very difficult for them to get out. We also remember the promises that were made that the provinces and the municipalities would have a greater share of the tax dollar and that borrowings would be made far more easy.

If such statements were made in 1959 about the municipalities and provinces, I submit that today, for the benefit of the smaller industries, we must accept the proposed amendment to the act, subject to the reservations I made at the beginning, because the caisses populaires and the credit unions have not even been consulted. As I said, it is high time we joined hands to grant low interest loans, because at the present time, even with Bill C-202 designed to help small businesses, if these are unable to borrow even at low interest rates to go into business, we fail to see the purpose served by this bill.

It seems that money is scarce almost everywhere, as evidenced by an obvious increase in the interest rate. We have to borrow on the New York market, and also in Germany, because the German people pursue the policy of issuing paper money.

Therefore, I urge the government to amend the act so as to enable the Bank of Canada to grant loans to those small businesses, in order to bring prosperity back to Canada.

[Mr. Dumont.]

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks on Bill C-9, entitled an Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, tabled and sponsored by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Needless to say, I support the remarks just made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont). Indeed, he dealt with the fundamental problem now facing private enterprise, the small businesses in particular, that is the exorbitantly high interest rates over which the federal government has no control, which it uses to favour big finance instead of private enterprise. There lies the fundamental problem: should we continue to encourage private enterprise or, through all kinds of measures, under the pretext of helping it, should we "sink" it, as the saying goes?

In the last five or ten years, private enterprise in Quebec is in a very precarious situation. In fact, from one year to the next the number of bankruptcies keeps increasing.

The federal government will say that it is aware of the problem, of the increase in unemployment, and of the ensuing economic and social problems. The minister will say that Bill C-202 is intended precisely to remedy those problems.

I feel that Bill C-202 really tackles the problem of economic and regional disparities, but I also believe we should pass a measure to protect small businesses, to enable small plant owner to modernize their operations, to improve and increase their production and services and also to provide work for the unemployed family men with four, five and six children.

I have in mind—that is why I am taking part in this debate—six small industries in the municipalities of Victoriaville and Princeville—both in my constituency—that got in touch with me to get federal assistance for they were in such a serious situation that failing immediate help, they were doomed to disappear from the business world.

In fact, three of those six businesses have failed already with the resulting lay-offs. Now, the government has to pay those people unemployment insurance and welfare benefits.

With the present system, it seems that we would rather pay people for doing nothing than pay them for producing something.

I now come to the matter I want to deal with, namely that the small enterprise owners and people as a whole are badly informed about the legislation entitled "An act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act".

If the owners of small Canadian businesses were the subject of a survey and were asked what advantages they can draw from the legislation, one would be surprised to discover their ignorance, and this, not because they want this state of affairs, but because the government agencies do not convey to them this information.

Last year, for example, I requested precise information from the officials responsible for administering this legislation in order to communicate it to my constituents, rather than simply giving them a copy of the text of the legislation.

It took a month and a half to get an answer and when it came, it was too late for the owner had lost interest in carrying on his business and was about to close.

Every time my colleagues or myself have tried to get information as to the application of the act, the number of concerns that were able to avail themselves of its provisions, nature of such concerns or the location of the regional offices, we have repeatedly been disappointed.

Valuable as the legislation may be, information is always shown in coming. We could pass every day a number of excellent measures but if they cannot reach the people through every channel available, they might make the legislators happy but from the point of view of economics, they are just nil.

It so happens that the law is not all that good for it results in putting the small businesses into a very difficult position. Without help, they are bound to disappear. And even if they do get that help, they will still disappear, sooner or later because of the increasing interest rates and because of the doings of big business which is trying to get hold of them, particularly if they are located in Quebec.

I do not want to put the blame on the federal government only but also on the provincial government; both fail to assume their responsibilities, thus causing the majority of French Canadian businesses in Quebec to fall into the hands of Americans.

I could mention the case of the Gâteaux Vachon Company from Beauce. What is happening to that business? If my memory serves me right, it has been taken over by Americans. If it has not happened yet, it is a matter of days or hours perhaps.

Not far from home, there is another very flourishing French Canadian business, established at Wickham in the riding of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). It is called Ski-roule. It has been sold to American interests and French Canadians will have to keep on working for them.

I do not object to the fact that other countries come to our assistance nor do I have any objection to Canada helping other countries. But our provincial and federal governments should assume their responsibilities and prevent these businesses from collapsing under the weight of big finance which prescribes its own interest rates to the government, which pays into the election fund of the governments in power, in Quebec as well as in Ottawa, so that, little by little nearly all our businesses disappear. It is the responsibility of our members to put this matter before the House.

It is not a matter of creating a scandal or a storm in a tea-pot nor of blaming unnecessarily the government for that situation but we must simply raise the matter in the hope that we will stir up the interest of government members to the extent that they will espouse the cause of our citizens and private enterprises.

As I was saying earlier, people are misinformed. Let us assume for a moment that this legislation under consideration is perfect. If people are not adequately informed as to the advantages of such legislation if they do not understand its terms, or its implications, how can we expect our small businesses to benefit from it?

In my riding, I know that six firms were trying by every means to obtain long awaited information that was quite incomplete. I wonder whether it would not be appropriate to conduct an investigation throughout Canada in order to determine if this act is actually enforced or if it does not serve only a few privileged people.

I have been wondering about this. If this legislation were truly serving all Canadians, no one would be afraid to give it publicity accordingly, no one would be reluctant to speak about it, to provide government services to small businesses, in an attempt to make private enterprise truly progressive.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks with the hope that the minister will not consider them completely derogatory. I would like to tell him that we cannot accept his policy on interest rates, which keeps increasing inflation and unemployment, and tends to destroy the small business.

Furthermore, I would urge him to promote increasingly the establishment of a complete information system between the government and the people, the legislators and those who may benefit from the act, otherwise we shall be led to believe that it is intended for friendly supporters of the government, and not for businesses which really need it.

I would suggest to the minister that if he has any money left and if he really is interested in helping small businesses, the Lotbinière constituency would need some help. He might empty his coffers there.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

EXTENSION OF CATEGORIES OF LENDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray that Bill C-9, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-9, because it has to do with industry and improvements to the small businesses loans program.

Some of these amendments will enable the caisses populaires to participate in this loans program.

Presently, I do not see how the problem could be solved this way.

Certainly we are facing a financial problem we will not solve by creating new debts, by granting new loans, by setting prohibitive interest rates.

As an example, I will take the Industrial Development Bank which is now making loans to industries at an 11 or 12 per cent interest rate. Is it by maintaining this practice, in the case of Caisses Populaires or other institutions lending under similar conditions, that we will solve the industrialization problem? The only thing we achieve this way is to encourage industry to incur further debts it cannot repay. In fact, its production costs will increase so much that it will be unable to distribute its production because the consumers will never have the necessary purchasing power to buy the surplus production.

Several industries would not need capital at the present time nor would they have to pay prohibitive interest rates, if they could find a market to sell their products. We can finance production as much as we want to, but if we do not finance consumption, we will only aggravate the existing uneasiness.

But industry is compelled to finance consumption and buyers because the latter have no buying power. And industry is bound to do this for five, six or twelve months and to secure repayment bit by bit or to force the debtors to pay. That is one of the reasons why industry can no longer operate: it has to pile up stocks, to enlarge premises and to support consumers.

That explains why important reserves of capital are necessary to run an industry. When capital has to be borrowed at present interest rates which are exorbitant very little progress is possible in industry.

Here is how this will come out: we are going to help industry fill its warehouses and sell on credit even more. But one of these fine days, there will be all kinds of bankruptcies. Small business in particular will go bankrupt because they will be unable to sell their products and will have to pay too much interest to keep their inventories and their buyers.

There is the rub. Many small businesses could well do without such charges if they were able to sell out their products and get paid. That is one of the reasons why I wanted to rise and speak on this bill.

Our problem is of an economic nature. It is one of distribution, rather than one of production, because, at the present time, in 1969, our gross national product amounts to $72 billion. Canada has consumed $40 billion of it, and with $40 billion we want to purchase $72 billion's worth of goods. It is impossible. Consumers should pay $40 billion for products valued at $72 billion. This is where we should intervene. This is where adjustments should be made. This overproduction costs nothing to anyone. It is a surplus of the society at large, a surplus for all Canadians who are shareholders of their country, a surplus which should be distributed under the form of compensated discount in order to reduce prices and bring them in line with the purchasing power. This is what I wanted to say. There surely are solutions.

At the present time, instead of trying to remedy the situation, we aggravate it. The more we apply the system, the more unbalanced becomes our economy. What is needed is a balanced economy which we will arrive at by adjusting prices rather than setting them. This is where we should intervene.

Production represents $72 billion and consumption is equivalent to $40 billion. Production is equal to consumption. Consumers should pay $40 billion for that production. That is the point where prices should be adjusted. Otherwise, we will no longer succeed in balancing a productive, active, mechanized and technical economy, from which would issue an automated production requiring no employer.

We shall not settle the problem by granting loans. We are not against loans. We want the small industries to carry on. We very well know that the problem will remain the same and that the burden of the debt will simply increase.

The desired goal will only be reached through the implementation of a banking policy designed to provide the necessary funds both for the production of the goods that our human and material resources make physically possible, and for the proper distribution of all our national production or the equivalent.

If there is no money to make production possible in order to meet human and normal needs, and if it becomes plentiful when production and means of production are requisitioned to pay soldiers and to make deadly weapons, it is because the present monetary system is imposing decisions instead of proudly reflecting the facts resulting from the free action of free producers and free consumers. So this is why we should get to the heart of the problem and find appropriate solutions.

The first proposal is aimed at insuring maximum purchasing power by achieving a balance between consumer prices and the total amount of money available to purchasers.

If production is to achieve its end, which is consumption, it is necessary to establish a price adjustment machinery, instead of fixing prices. It is up to the producers themselves to determine their cost prices, for they know their production costs.

During the last financial year, the country's production has reached $72 billion and consumption $44 billion, in round figures. The $72 billion production has then cost the country $44 billion. The $28 billion must be supplied by another source, not by the buyers. The monetary system should see to that.

In other words, there should be a general compensated discount which would be the contrary of a sales tax and this compensated discount should be applied to all the retail prices for the duration of the financial year which is beginning. At the end of each financial year, the general compensated discount should be calculated in the light of consumption and in relation to the production volume.

Thus we would come as close as possible to the ideal purchasing power. This operation would be called a compensated price or discount, because the money which the seller does not get from the purchaser owing to that discount, he would get later on from the national credit board. This compensation granted to the seller so that he may get his full cost price, safeguards all interests and benefits everyone through the easy flow of goods to meet the needs. Production is intended to be sold.

If industry is to be reorganized, it is impossible to do so simply with loans in the case of private industry. Here I distinguish between private industry and capital stock industry.

Private industry has to reimburse its capital, pay interest and pay its taxes, and the loans it raises result in bankruptcy for 99 per cent of the small companies.

So what is the use of creating such a situation, organizing industries in such a way that they cannot prosper. All our present efforts are useless. Share-capital industries, since they do not have to reimburse capital, can manage to scrape through, although many of them will be unable to make it.

So what we are heading for is socialism, centralization, an appalling slump, utter destruction of private enterprise. With the present tax pattern, no private industry, no merchant can manage to pay debts as well as provincial, municipal, school and other taxes.

In these conditions, it is impossible for a small industry to become prosperous and to make profits if it cannot dispose of its products. Even though we invest more in industry, we do not inject into it more purchasing power because our investments are used to pay for the machinery and the buildings. They are "dead" investments which hardly contribute to put money in circulation.

Nowadays, an industry which employs 10 people can be compared to one which employed 200 people 20 years ago, taking into consideration automation, science and progress.

I would have a lot more to say but I think that other hon. members wish to speak on this matter. As for me, I consider that I have done my share.

I am sure that the increase in the amount of these loans will not improve the economic situation of industry.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I think in winding up this debate on second reading of the bill hon. members would expect me to respond briefly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I must advise the House that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

• (8:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I would like to ask a question to the hon. minister.

I touched upon this subject a while ago, at the time of adjournment. However, I think that the house would be interested to hear his comments on a suggestion that might be advisable about Bill C-9.

Under the legislation, it is sought to extend by a year and a half the advantages of an act that is already in force and even to grant an additional amount of money to the chartered banks up to a maximum of $100 million and up to $50 million to the caisses populaires, credit unions, insurance companies, and so on in order to grant loans.

This is an advantage granted to the chartered banks which have the privilege, under the act, to create the necessary credits to grant loans, while the caisses populaires really lend the money of investors without being authorized to multiply it.

In any event, I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that in the province of Quebec, there exists another form of institution which was born a few years ago and which is developing rather quickly: I mean capital funds. What are these? It is capital recovered in a given area and collected under the authority of a legislation, administered by a provincial act and intended to be reinvested in the same area.

These capital funds are developing rather rapidly, thanks to the confidence prevailing among the people who understood the advantages which they could draw from their capital if it was reinvested in these capital funds. In fact, this money would be made available to the people as housing loans. I met recently an administrator of a capital fund and he told me that loans would soon be granted to industry.

I know that the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) has just made some relevant remarks about the present economic situation. Indeed, with an increased production, if industry cannot sell more, financing becomes more and more necessary. I do not want to bring up the matter again because he gave a very sensible account of a situation that everybody must acknowledge but which is rather difficult to correct, because of the present financial system.

At all events, since we should always make the best of any situation, even the worst, I would like somebody to tell us, as clearly as possible, whether under the bill now before us, the lending institutions will be limited to the very terms of the legislation or whether it will be possible, by way of new regulations, to extend its benefits to the new institutions I have just mentioned: the capital funds.

If I stress the point so strongly, Mr. Speaker, it is because I have recently attended the general meeting of one of those funds which, only three years ago, starting with savings of $1.67. Today, over $3.5 million have been entrusted to this fund by the people of the area. This initiative is an incentive and an asset for the industrial development of the area, and a means of fighting unemployment which is steadily increasing because of the farm situation which is worsening. Many farmers are compelled to quit.

That is why it is so important to do everything that can be done to provide every area with equal apportunities. If the guarantee provided by the government to the other lending institutions could be made available to those capital funds, it would, indeed, help the people. It would not totally redress the situation but it would at least induce the people to develop an interest towards the problems of their own environment, which, so far, has seldom been the case.

We have always expected other people to come and solve our problems while neglecting to make the necessary efforts in our own environment to co-operate with businessmen and industrial leaders who can prove their initiative and their experience in this field, thus enabling every citizen to benefit from this co-operation.

I hope that having hear these remarks, the responsible minister will be able to set our mind at rest on that point and to introduce in due time whatever amendments to the bill may be felt necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I would like once more to point out to the House that by taking the floor at this stage the hon. minister would close the debate.

[English]

Order, please. If the minister speaks at this time, he will close the debate.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, it would now appear appropriate for me to rise and finalize this debate on second reading by attempting to reply to at least some of the points raised by hon. members earlier in the day. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) made a comment regarding the wording of the amendment which makes it possible for credit unions, caisses populaires, trust companies and other credit societies to take part in the small businesses loan program. I should stress that in spite of the form of the wording used, the act does not purport to make these institutions into banks for all purposes. The effect of the wording used is simply to enable the institutions in question to participate in this guaranteed loans program. I suggest there really is no conflict therefore with the policy of the government at the time the Bank Act was studied by Parliament. We must remember that as its name implies this is a guaranteed loans program under which the government guarantees that the institutions which make the loans shall not suffer loss. It would appear that the effect of having a more flexible interest rate formula has been to encourage banks to make more money available for loans of this type. This is implied by the most recent figures which are available.

Some hon. members have suggested that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) should take some kind of action to have the banks make even more money available for the purpose of this program. However, as far as I am aware the Bank Act does not give the Minister of Finance the type of authority under which he could order banks to participate in this or any of the other guaranteed loans program to any particular extent. However, the banks may be interested in noting the view expressed by hon. members in this debate, to the effect that they have not been living up to their responsibility to the community by making sufficient funds available for loan to small businesses.

Several hon. members have used this debate as a vehicle through which to express their views regarding some of the proposals in the government's white paper on tax reform. While these views are very interesting, I think the degree of concern expressed may well be proven excessive after hon. members have experience of the impact of the proposals on small businesses. I shall not attempt to debate these proposals at this point. I am sure there will be many opportunities to do so either before the standing committee or when the government presents a bill to the House following the report of the standing committee on the proposals.

I think it is worthwhile for hon. members and the public generally to very carefully study them before reaching definite conclusions about their possible effects. As I have said, it may be that the initial reactions to the proposals which were reflected in some speeches this afternoon may not have indicated exactly what the real impact of the proposals will be on small businessmen.

Several hon. members advanced interesting suggestions regarding changes in the small businesses loans program. Therefore I would like to point out that the basic effect of having the lending period under the program terminate at the same time as the two other government guaranteed loans programs will be that the government will make a thorough review of the effectiveness of the small businesses loans program together with its two companion guaranteed loans programs. I am sure it will be possible in the course of this review to give consideration to the suggestions which have been made.

Some hon. members have argued, in effect, that the proposals before us will not really do anything to help small businessmen. However, we should recognize that if this bill is not supported by the House it will not be possible to carry on a small businesses loans program at all once the current lending period ends. If this bill is passed it will mean that the program can continue for a further lending period. As the hon. member for Wellington-Grey (Mr. Howe) has pointed out, some 20,000 loans have been made under this program to date. This is an indication that it has been playing a useful role in helping small business to exist and, hopefully, to expand and thrive. I might add that the presentation of the amendments at this time is a demonstration that the government is certainly not against small business.

The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) asked me how the Department of Finance intends to supervise loans which, if this bill is adopted, would be made by trust companies and other institutions under provincial jurisdiction. The approach the department will be taking is that when an application is made by a provincially incorporated or provincially chartered institution for designation under the program, the application will be referred to the Superintendent of Insurance for his comments and consideration of the institution's financial soundness. Only after his report has been received would a decision be made as to whether the provincially incorporated institution in question should be designated for the purpose of the act. Once approval had been given, the appropriate branch of the Department of Finance would keep an eye on its work through a series of established practices with the aim of seeking to avoid the type of problem to which the hon. member referred.

Finally, I can say that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation can give coverage to provincial institutions and I am informed that almost all the provincially chartered trust and loan companies are in fact under the supervision of that corporation. And although Quebec-based companies are under a provincially supervised program as far as deposits in that province are concerned, their deposits outside the province fall under the federally created Deposit Insurance Corporation.

As I said earlier, I shall not attempt to comment on all the interesting suggestions which have been made; these matters can be dealt with in the course of the review of the program which the government intends to carry out, as well as in the discussions before the standing committee.

[Translation]

I believe I should also answer the question of the member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin). The credit unions and caisses populaires have been authorized to grant loans to students since 1964, to fishermen since 1965, and to farmers since 1968.

Bill C-9 will enable them to participate in this small businesses loans program if they so desire. I have been advised that the Department of Finance has received absolutely no complaints so far, concerning the proposals put forth by this bill.

In addition, the bill does not force provincial institutions to participate automatically in the program. It is up to them to ask that they be designated as eligible to grant loans to small businesses. If they do not wish to be designated, they will not be, and will have nothing to do with the program. Moreover the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) asked for greater advertising of that program and I think the idea should be considered. I believe some advertising is already being done. For instance, I have seen pamphlets describing the program.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for having drawn my attention to the question of investment funds. I will answer him by pointing out to him the wording of clause 1 of bill C-9, and I quote:

Paragraph (a) of section 2 of the Small Businesses Loans Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

—and in subparagraph (ii), one can read:

—a credit union, caisse populaire or other co-operative credit society that is designated by the Minister on the application of that society as a bank for the purposes of this Act, or

(iii) a corporation that carries on the business of a trust company within the meaning of the Trust Companies Act, the business of a loan company within the meaning of the Loan Companies Act,—

I can therefore tell him that if the investment funds may be included in the provisions set out in clause I of the bill, I believe it will be possible for them to do something under this small businesses loans program.

We may consider that question more thoroughly as we study this bill in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

[English]

To conclude, I should like to say again to hon. members that I hope they will feel free to bring to my attention any problems they feel their constituents are having with regard to the application of this program; I shall be happy to have them looked into. We can engage in further discussion of the bill when it reaches the standing committee. I would now ask the House to support the motion for second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to bills for the financing of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada which have been before Parliament in past years. These bills, including the present one, have been introduced annually with the exception of the 1963 bill which covered 1962 and 1963, and the 1966 bill which covered 1965 and 1966.

The present bill has seven main objectives, most of which have taken a similar form in previous legislation. First, it would authorize capital expenditures by Canadian National Railways not exceeding $201,700,000 during the 1969 calendar year. This level of expenditures compares with $189,400,000 authorized previously for 1968, excluding the amount required in that year for investment in Air Canada. The bill also contains technical provisions authorizing Canadian National Railways to make expenditures not exceeding $82 million between January 1 and July 1, 1970, for obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1970, and to enter into contracts before July 1, 1970, for capital expenditures not exceeding $113 million, for which payment will not come due until after 1969.

Second, the bill contains a provision authorizing Canadian National Railways to borrow $19 million for financing all branch line construction. Up till recently each special statute for construction of a branch line has included authority for financing its construction, and branch lines not requiring special legislation have been financed out of self-generated funds. In addition to covering all branch lines, the provision in the resolution and the bill based upon it are consistent with the intent of reflecting in the financing and guarantee bill all the financing authorities which Canadian National Railways require.

Third, the bill would provide for the continued purchase by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) of Canadian National Railways' 4 per cent preferred stock through to the end of the calendar year 1970. This continues the practice of previous financing and guarantee acts. The 1968 financing and guarantee act extended to December 31, 1969, the expiry date of the authority granted by Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952 for the purchase of such stock equivalent to 3 per cent of the company's gross revenue.

Fourth, and for the same reasons, the bill would extend until the end of 1970 the moratorium on interest on the government loan of $100 million to the railway company authorized by the capital revision act of 1952.

Fifth, as in previous years the bill would provide authority for the government to make temporary loans to Canadian National Railways and Air Canada to meet deficiencies in operating revenues up to June 30, 1970. Any such loan is repaid later from revenues of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada or, if these prove insufficient, the loans are written off through parliamentary appropriation.

Sixth, the bill contains an option similar to that contained in the 1968 financing and guarantee act which would enable Air Canada to borrow $165 million either directly from Her Majesty or by means of a guaranteed public issue.

Seventh, the bill would provide for the appointment of the firm of Touche, Ross and Co. of the cities of Toronto and Montreal, chartered accountants, as auditor of Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1970.

Finally, I would point out that the present bill makes no provisions for enlargement of Canadian National Railways' authority to refinance, which at present stands at $680 million and is considered adequate for the period covered by the bill. I would commend to members of this House second reading of this bill.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in debating Bill C-7 we are adopting in essence, as the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) has stated, what to many is a customary and standard procedure. The opportunity to discuss this bill in the House is timely in view of the confused state of railroading and transportation in Canada. It gives us the chance to examine the financial budget and expenditure both of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada.

I note at the very beginning of my remarks that money for these companies has already been appropriated for the year 1969 and most of the $201 million being appropriated by this bill has already been spent. I think it is poor administration from the legislative point of view to examine a bill appropriating money that has already been spent. But this being the case, all we can do is to ask whether the money has been spent well. It is from this point of view that I propose to examine the bill. I want to determine whether the money has been spent wisely, and whether or not Air Canada and the CNR have met the obligation imposed upon them of satisfying the transportation needs of all Canadians.

Canada today finds herself involved in the great emotional question of whether she can survive as a nation. Is Canada a viable entity? What part does transportation play in holding the country together? To my mind, transportation without doubt is still the key to the economic survival of Canada, particularly in that part of Canada in the proximity of the 49th parallel. I see in Canada today great concern and unhappiness with our transportation complex. The costing system that has been approved by the Canadian Transport Commission is being appealed to the Supreme Court. Passenger traffic is in a state of complete chaos and so is air passenger traffic, with which I will deal later in my remarks. The three major components of our transportation industry—freight and passenger rail traffic and air traffic—are in confusion. For the moment I exclude trucking and pipelines.

I have with me this evening a poem that was written some time ago by a well known resident of Alberta. I think it correctly spells out the difficulty in which we find ourselves in Canada today. If the House will bide with me for a moment or two I should like to read this poem, because I think it puts rather clearly before Canadians the picture of our railroads today. The poem was written by a person called "Ferg" James and is called "Farewell to the Old Iron Horse". It reads as follows:

They opened up a continent,
They brought the settlers in
They colonized a nation,
With every kith and kin.
They did a yeoman service,
Their laurels they have won,
Now the giants of the frontier
Have made their final run.

We miss their belching smokestacks,
And their whistle's moan and scream
We miss the throbbing pistons,
And the hissing clouds of steam.
But their days were surely numbered,
They have vanished one by one,
And the grand old railroad steamers
Have made their final run.

The water tanks stand empty,
Along the right of way
The round house is foresaken,
Where the monsters used to stay.
The coal docks are a memory,
Their days of service done,
Since the big steam locomotives
Have made their final run.

A sleek new shining diesel,
Came down the line today
And it makes you kind of wonder
Are these units here to stay?
With progress pressing onward,
And their era just begun
As history keeps repeating
Will they make their final run?

As we gaze into the future,
Of a hundred years or more
What scientific marvels
This old world may have in store.
A weird fantastic monster,
Getting power from the sun
With ten million pounds of payload
May be on their daily run.

I feel that that poem spells out the problems facing Canada today in the railroading and transportation field. If Canada were a small, compact country, transportation might not be a problem; but Canada is a great country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, transportation is the key to our economic survival. If Canada is to maintain a sound and viable economy, we must pay great attention to our transportation problems. If we take transportation for granted and allow our railroad companies to become conglomerates, paying no heed to the obligations they undertook in return for certain privileges granted to them when we started to build this country, we as legislators are failing in our duty.

• (8:50 p.m.)

We see a host of expenditures here and, as I mentioned, the money has already been spent. Let us examine how it was spent so we may know whether it was spent wisely. Is the CNR to remain a "next year" railroad? Will we forever have to examine deficits of $29 million in 1968 and an estimated $25 million for 1969? This bill is a measure to cover that deficit. Will the railroad forever be coming back asking this government to pick up its deficits? During my speech I intended to ask the government to have this whole question referred to the transport committee. It should study costing, the question of branch line abandonment and freight rates, all of which are tied together. It should decide whether we need passenger service, and what is our air policy. All these things should be subject to a comprehensive study by the transport committee.

It may well be suggested that the committee studied these matters a number of years ago. I know that it studied them, but if Canada is to remain economically solvent we must be on guard in respect of expenditures by our transportation systems. We must decide whether they are directed in the right way or whether they will make the CNR a "next year" railroad and Air Canada a "next year" air line.

What is our air policy? This question has been puzzling many people recently. We notice in this legislation a number of expenditures. Last year $79 million was spent by the CNR for passenger travel alone. In its application before the Canadian Transport Commission the CNR claimed it lost $11,600,000. How great a role has the Canadian Transport Commission played in respect of transportation in the last two years? One cannot say it has played a magnificent role, because it has not changed things. It has adopted a costing formula which has not satisfied the railways; they are appealing it to the Supreme Court. In other words, the Supreme Court must analyse the situation on the basis of research carried out by somebody; it must decide whether the railroad's costing system is better than the system proposed by the Transport Commission.

The Canadian transportation bill which this House passed a few years ago provides in principle that if a loss can be proved, the government will grant up to 80 per cent of that loss. If one is a shrewd businessman, as I know the CPR and CNR managers are, it is good business to appeal to the Canadian Transport Commission in an attempt to prove a gigantic loss. I have questioned this principle and I will continue to question it in my remarks tonight.

Let me re-emphasize the importance of this whole question being referred to the transport committee. I point out that the whole costing procedure is in question today. We must decide whether passenger train service is necessary and whether this was spelled out in the old Act of Parliament of 1881 which established the CPR. I have it before me and could read it. I may do so before I am through.

Is passenger service still necessary, and should the government pay 80 per cent of these fictitious losses which the railways present to the commission? We must also consider the whole question of our air policy. This question was considered at a recent meeting in Ottawa of the Air Transport Association of Canada. At that meeting the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson)—that very amiable fellow—tried his best to spread oil on troubled waters. What has taken place? Let me quote from the Globe and Mail of November 6 of this year. This is a report of what took place at that meeting of the Air Transport Association attended by people involved in all aspects of air traffic in Canada, including regional carriers and I suppose Canadian Pacific. The article states:

> The Air Transport Association of Canada in an unprecedented action yesterday moved a vote of no confidence in the air transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission.

The Air Transport Committee is a body set up by this Parliament, yet the Transport Association says it has no confidence whatsoever in that body. We as members of parliament ought to be the watch-dogs of Canadian legislation. We should immediately have brought the members of the Air Transport Committee before the transportation committee of this House so that we as elected representatives could properly decide whether what is said in the article in the Globe and Mail is accurate. It suggests that directives have been made which cannot be carried out and are incapable of enforcement. Let me read further from this article:

> The membership was told at that meeting the transport committee's general orders were considered unenforceable by the Transport Commission because of a Supreme Court of Canada decision last year that ruled that the Air Transport Committee did not have the power under the Aeronautics Act to issue orders.

Even the transport committee is making no attempt to enforce these directives. I spoke to the minister privately about this matter and suggested this was a deplorable situation in one of the fastest means of transportation in the country. He said he had been made aware of the situation and thought he had it covered. Where has he been? Where has the government been? I quote from the 1968 34th Annual Report of the Air Transport Association of Canada. This is what the chairman said over a year ago:

> I would be remiss if I did not record the disappointment and frustration of this industry resulting from the confusion existing regarding government policy. Not only has there been no implementation of previously enunciated policy governing the mainline and regional carriers, but no extension of policy governing other segments of the industry has been developed. Virtually all Canadian air carriers are suffering under a tremendous handicap in the development of plans, acquisition of new aircraft, and the continued operation of their companies on a profitable basis as action is delayed in providing effective air policy.

One could go on and read the whole 1968 annual report, but that is what was said in 1968 about the Air Transport Committee. I read from the Globe and Mail and what it said about this matter in 1969. One could also read from the 1967 and 1966 annual reports. Air passenger traffic and air freight have increased very rapidly in the last three or four years, but the air transport aspect of the Canadian Transport Commission has not kept up to date. The evidence of this is there for anyone to see. The bill now before us provides for another $165 million. We note that Air Canada is attempting to lower fares from Canada to Europe. If this is justified, where is all the money going? Certainly the people in the air transportation business do not know the answer to that question. They suggest that we do not have an air policy and that the policy we used to have is not enforced. Surely we should do better than this as elected representatives of the people of our great country.

Let us take a brief look at the passenger situation. As I mentioned, this bill covers the budget for 1968-69. The CNR has budgeted $79 million for passenger services in 1969. In 1968 it budgeted $81 million for passenger service. That is a lot of money. How does this compare with the situation in the CPR? Both the CNR and the CPR have submitted a long list of applications in respect of passenger services. They have asked the Board of Transport Commissioners to allow them to abandon these services, or if not to pay them the losses they incur. As I mentioned before, they have tremendously increased these losses. It is provided in the act under which they operate that if they can prove their losses the government may grant them a subsidy in the amount of 80 per cent of those losses. The theory is that if they suffer the other 20 per cent of the loss it will help to keep them competitive and desirous of providing additional services. Is that really the case? We have an act which encourages the railways to go out of business. How does it do that? The railways must lose money on their passenger services because then they can collect a subsidy. If they get a subsidy, then that is their bread and butter.

• (9:00 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Eighty per cent is a lot of bread.

Mr. Horner: Yes, 80 per cent is a lot of bread. As I have said before, I believe the railways deliberately downgrade their services. We heard evidence before the committee to suggest this is the case, that is, that they do it deliberately in order to create a deficit so that they can ask for a subsidy. This is a deplorable situation. This is what the Transport Act suggests they do. When the Transport Act was passed by this House it said in effect that $110 million worth of subsidies would be cut out, but if the railways could prove they were losing business on any particular line they could come back to Parliament and would be granted 80 per cent of that loss. Since the end of centennial year, the year in which passenger services were profitable, the railways have attempted to prove that they are losing money on all their major passenger lines.

Let us study the two railways briefly. The CNR has four times as many passenger miles as the CPR. Revenue passenger miles are calculated by multiplying the number of paying passengers by the mileage they travel. The CNR has something like 2,246 million passenger miles; the CPR has something like 500 million passenger miles. It is obvious that the CNR carries over four times as many passengers over four times as much mileage. One would therefore think that if the passenger business was losing money, the losses of the CNR—according to their figures—would be four times greater than the losses of the CPR. The CPR has some very profitable lines and some short lines which are paying well. The CNR appears before the Canadian Transport Commission and files applications to discontinue some regional services on which they say they are losing $11.6 million. The CPR appears before the same board—and bear in mind it is travelling one quarter the distance—and says it is losing $30 million.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Horner: Now, from a quick look at these figures one will realize that the CPR is quickly building up a case for a huge subsidy. There is in the Financial Post dated November 15, 1969, a very interesting article on transportation and railways. I should like to read one paragraph:

> CN President N. J. MacMillan told a House of Commons committee this spring that the two railroads and the Canadian Transport Commission have a study under way toward the development of a "coherent" national rail passenger system.

With this vividly on the record it is obvious that we can hardly study CNR passenger traffic without studying CPR passenger traffic because the two, whether or not they admit it openly, as more or less in cahoots in an effort to create an atmosphere that they are losing huge amounts of money on their passenger services. I do not doubt that they may well be losing money on some lines. But should we as representatives from every region in Canada say that if they are losing money in one region they can discontinue the service? We are running a national, government-owned railway. Can we say that one region should not have passenger service and that all other regions should? I do not think we can do that.

We might ask ourselves what is the situation in respect of the CPR, what it was granted in 1881 and what obligation was placed upon it. When Mr. Sinclair appeared before the committee in 1966 he said that they accept their obligation, but in order to meet the obligation here must be an effective demand for the service. He said there is no point in living up to an obligation when people do not travel on the trains. I made the point earlier that the CPR have deliberately downgraded their services in order to create the fictitious figure of $30 million. What has really happened? What obligation is there upon the railways to create effective demand? If we are in business we must advertise in order to create an effective demand. So I say there is an obligation on the CPR and the CNR in this regard. I commend the CNR for its past action in respect of lowering fares and improving passenger services. From 1962 on a really good effort was made to encourage more passenger traffic on their trains. The CPR, however, has done exactly the opposite.

Back in 1881 when the government of the day was attempting to tie this great nation together, it started to build a railway line. It was given to the CPR. At that time the railroad that had been built was worth something in the order of $37 million. The CPR officials were told that they would be given a lot of right-of-way and a lot of money if they would complete the railroad. I shall not go into all the detail; it is to be found at page 1198 of the proceedings of the transport committee for the year 1966-67. What happened? The railway was completed by the CPR. The total amount of government money the CPR received, both direct and indirect, was $228 million. This was a lot of hay, particularly in those days when a dollar was a dollar.

However, the inflated egos of the present government have inflated the value of money so that a dollar is not what it used to be. We are all aware of that. The point I am making is that the CPR continued to sell townsites all along the railway line. Prior to June, 1916, it sold land for townsites through the southern prairies and into British Columbia worth $123 million. This was land we gave the CPR. We encouraged the CPR to build and to develop Canada. I am not condemning that. It did a pretty good job. But now it comes along and says, "We have no further obligation. We sold the land for those townsites, but we have no obligation to continue passenger service for the people in those towns." I say they are reneging on the moral concept of the 1881 agreement, and I hope that the CTC, Parliament and the government will look into the whole question of the CPR.

I could go on and tell the House of the mineral wealth of the CPR and of the tremendous acreage granted to it. I do not need to tell you what the CPR has done with it. It now has Canadian Pacific Investments and Cominco, founded on the mineral wealth it was given under the original agreement. The CPR would like us to consider passenger service as a separate entity. I point out that railroads today are becoming conglomerates throughout the United States and Canada. It is good business sense that they should do so. I am not objecting to the CPR becoming a conglomerate, but I say it does not have the right to renege on the moral concept of the original agreement.

Can you imagine the whole southern half of the prairies being left without railway passenger service? It might be said that air service would fill the gap. But is there really air service for the little towns, with airplanes now getting larger to the point where the runways at some of the major prairie centres are not big enough to handle them? In this respect I think of the town from which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) comes, Medicine Hat, a thriving community, an old community in the province of Alberta; yet it is having a difficult time maintaining any kind of regional air transport service.

Mr. Southam: And it is a designated area.

Mr. Horner: It is a designated area, and perhaps it should be. As airplanes become bigger and faster they will make fewer and fewer stops. The major concern in the future will be the location of airports. Even now there is a fairly large body of opinion that Toronto and Montreal should share an airport located somewhere between them. But how will people get to such an airport? This was a project thought of a couple of years ago by a former minister of transport. Passenger service by the CNR and CPR is still necessary in many regions. Since 1962 the CNR has done a commendable job to attract passengers, but as I read present-day signs it is going to attempt to discontinue its drive toward that end and has now applied for a $11.6 million subsidy.

I say that the CNR should be something like the Post Office Department. It should not necessarily pay its way. It should provide service for Canadians in Newfoundland, Alberta, the Peace River country and in every part of our land. This is also the obligation that the CPR has to accept. It has a duty to provide a service because it was built under a special agreement; it was built with the money of Canadian people and it has a moral obligation to them. As I say, I see signs that the CNR is discontinuing its drive to attract passengers. Just look at the great province of Newfoundland and what is happening to its rail service. We have to examine the whole problem, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is sponsoring legislation to provide for standardization of safety in automobiles. Why are we concerned about automobile safety? It is because of the overloaded traffic on our highways? If the railroads modernized their services they can and will provide very effective commuter service and cut down on the number of automobiles on our highways. They can do so if, to use the common expression, they get with it.

What about the question of pollution? The Economic Council has dealt with it at length, particularly pollution in major population centres caused by automobiles. This is one of the major problems in areas of dense population. A fast, economical railroad commuter service would relieve the congestion on our highways and cut down the pollution caused in major centres throughout Canada such as Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver. These cities are already examining the problem of pollution caused by carbon monoxide being emitted from automobiles.

Let us look at the cost of branch line services. Under this bill provision is made for the building of 140 miles of branch lines, at a cost of $19 million. Some $2½ million are to be spent on building a railroad out to Robert's Bank. I suppose this is a good expenditure, but it is a pretty narrow one in the sense that the Robert's Bank port will handle only coal while on occasion the port of Vancouver is congested with grain ships. We are spending $2½ million to build a railroad to Robert's Bank on behalf of the Kaiser Corporation so that it may sell coal to Japan. If Burrard Inlet were able to handle all our other traffic, this would be good, but it is not able to do so. We have had plenty of evidence over the years that it is not.

Surely we should attempt sooner or later to do a little for ourselves. I believe that Canada is a great nation and will someday acquire that stature in the nations of the world. The whole question of branch line abandonment deals specifically with costing. To me it is a matter of regret that when the Canadian transportation legislation was passed a few years ago we did not realize that these regulations would allow an appeal from that body to the Supreme Court. I know there is provision for appeal to the minister but I do not believe that the original intention was for appeal to the Supreme Court. This procedure could be detrimental in setting precedents which may not be wise in regard to transportation and costing. Railroad costing is a most complicated subject. The railroads have perfected a system which the Canadian Transport Commission did not accept completely.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the railroads lose their case in the Supreme Court. Having said that, I believe we must examine the whole question of rail line abandonment from the point of view of need and subsidies and whether we can abandon rail lines holus-bolus without any regard for the necessity of the service even if it is losing money. It may be that there is provision for them to obtain a subsidy for loss incurred on a branch line. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this whole question should receive exhaustive study and witnesses should be called, particularly from the CPR, before the transportation committee of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: Then the elected representatives of the people of Canada could decide whether these two railroads are living up to the moral commitments they have made over the years. Another question that must be gone into thoroughly is the enforcement of the rulings and directives of the Air Transport Committee. In the case of air passenger service and charter flights there is plenty of evidence to suggest that air travel agencies as well as sub-agencies have been booking charter flights; then suddenly the Air Transport Committee wiped out the effectiveness of the sub-agencies. A travel agency was allowed to charge 5 per cent of the fare as commission and the sub-agency was allowed to charge 7½ per cent. It then gave 5 per cent back to the agency under which it worked. But suddenly the Air Transport Committee ruling suggested that the sub-agencies would have to cancel their bookings. This was after they had gone out and earned the 2½ per cent commission on their own initiative. We should be encouraging Canadians to do this sort of thing; there are in our society too many things which tend to discourage initiative.

Mr. Baldwin: Like Benson's white paper.

Mr. Horner: That is a very good example. I have a file here which I think suggests that Air Canada is making an honest effort to put charter flights out of business. Whether or not they should be in business is not the question we have to decide tonight, but I think Air Canada should be called before a committee and the whole question of charter flights, travel bureaux and sub-agencies of travel bureaux should be thoroughly explored. If Bill C-7 initiates a debate across the country and in this House which decides that the whole question of transportation should be examined by the transport committee, I shall be very pleased indeed.

I urge everybody in this House, Mr. Speaker, to examine the question fully, because in a country as broad and as wide as Canada transportation is the key to future economic survival. I believe it is the duty of every member of this House to watch and examine carefully the direction taken by this industry.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) who has this bill in his charge introduced it, he said it was like other bills that we have had year after year. I believe there are one or two differences, particularly in that part of the bill which relates to the financing of Air Canada, but the point I should like to make at the outset is that I think we should resist this business of being asked year after year to vote this money without being given any clear picture as to where we are going in this country in terms of a transportation policy.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that some of us have been rather critical of the number of reviews launched by this government. There seem to be many issues where we think action should be taken but instead we are getting reviews, studies, consideration and so on. But here is an area which does call for an over-all review before our whole transportation picture winds up in one awful mess. The fact that we are in danger of moving in the direction of an awful mess has been highlighted by the recent applications made by Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway for the abandonment of most of their passenger services in this country.

May I say that few of us think that it would actually come to pass that passenger trains would cease to run in Canada. There is no sign that they will cease to run in the United States or Europe and other parts of the world, and it is terribly true that we do need passenger train services to help hold this country together.

I think it is clear what is taking place when an organization like Canadian Pacific Railway, parallelled by the Canadian National Railways, applies for permission to abandon passenger service. They are trying to get out of that part of the transportation business which is unprofitable in order to devote all their energies to those portions of the transportation business where they can make money.

Some day the Government of Canada, and I do not know whether this government will do it, must look into the question of public versus private ownership in many fields, and in particular in the field of transportation. This government, in common with past Conservative governments, often pays tribute to the idea of public ownership up to a certain extent. They support public ownership where it is needed, but the record is clear that they do not really believe in it. They only bring it in when private enterprise is not able to fill the bill.

Here we have a proposition that transportation, which has many aspects including passenger service and freight service, air line service and all other related services that are tied into it can, in certain areas of our market economy, make money. So private enterprise wants to be in that part of the transportation business to make all the money it can out of freight traffic and those areas of transport that are profitable, and agrees to take on the passenger services. Hon. members will remember the famous wording in the agreements of 1881 and in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1881, which talked of that company providing railway service in Canada thereafter and for ever, which talked about perpetual operation and about service being provided in perpetuity. That is what organizations like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the other railways that eventually failed and had to be taken over as part of Canadian National Railways agreed to do in order to obtain a corner of our economy in which profits were to be made. Now, as the years have gone on, it turns out that no railway company in the world operating over any extended area makes a profit out of its passenger business; but there are profits to be made in freight and other portions of the transportation industry. So these organizations, these conglomerations that were prepared initially to promise service forever, want to get out of that part which is unprofitable but enjoy the gravy that is to be made in other sections of industry.

One can hardly blame these people too much for taking that view. That is the view private enterprisers take generally. But we of this party blame the government for not realizing that transportation is so basic and essential to the life of this country. We must resolve this issue. I think the government should change its stance, because it seems to be saying, "All right; we will subsidize private enterprisers in the unprofitable part of the operation. If necessary, we will take over the unprofitable part of the operation, but we will bend over backwards to make sure that private enterprisers are given every opportunity to make all the money they can out of the profitable sections of the industry."

In the case of Canadian National Railways, huge batches of figures and tables are thrust at us. My friend and colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), has been reading some of the tables he obtained from the library. He asked me to explain them. I cannot explain them to him, nor can he explain them to me. Sometimes people say that we own Canadian National, but when I look at all the figures and the way the railway's debts are mounting, I think Canadian National owns us. The amount of our wealth we have to apportion to pay the interest on this ever-growing debt portends ill for the future. It is getting us nowhere.

Why is this done, Mr. Speaker? The reason is that this government wants to maintain a régime under which the profitable parts of the transportation industry are left to private enterprise. Transportation must be looked at as a whole industry, and if our private enterprisers are not prepared to operate the industry as a whole in the spirit of the 1881 agreements entered into by the Canadian Pacific Railway and others, then the public should take the industry over as a whole.

As a result of pressures that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National are exerting, the day will come—and it may not be far off—when a real threat to close down passenger lines will tie this country up far more than any industrial strike has ever tied it up. That will result in the government saying, "We must have passenger service, so we will take over that unprofitable part of the business and run it but we will let you fellows go on and retain the freight service; we will let private enterprise acquire more and more of the air line business and all those other services, the hotel, financial and other services that are part of the conglomerate known as the Canadian Pacific Company. Then we the government, we the people, we the taxpayers will pay the shot for that part which happens to be unprofitable."

Either these people are in the transportation business, or they are not. If they are in it, they should be obligated to run the whole of it. If they are not prepared to run the whole of it and give us the kind of service that has been promised over the years, then they should get out of it and let the Canadian people, through the well tried medium of public ownership, take it over and run it in their own interests.

Some people who do not like this kind of reasoning will say, "Are not we going to run ourselves into debt if we run the unprofitable part of the services?" Please note, I am saying that we should have the profitable parts as well as the unprofitable parts. Of course, some members of Parliament may say, "Maybe we should not run the part that is unprofitable." The truth is that all this is a piece of bookkeeping fiction, if I may call it that.

The running of passenger train services in the market place economy seems to produce a loss. But the country does not lose because we have passenger train services; the country does not lose because we are all tied together with these bands of steel. And now, of course, we have air line services and all the rest of it. The country does not lose because it costs money to maintain a postal service, and because we have docks and wharves and roads and all sorts of services that we must provide socially because they cannot be provided either individually or on a profit-making basis. If, as no doubt we all agree, Canada needs and will continue to need a whole transportation industry, which includes railway passenger service, for a long time to come, I submit that this should be the responsibility of the government itself. I would not be doctrinaire and insist that we are not prepared to let our private enterprisers have their share of the industry if they want to take it over. But, no; they do not want it all. They want only the profitable parts and are prepared to let the rest of it be owned by the public. As the previous speaker pointed out, and I think we are all aware of this, both the major railways of this country have a record of downgrading their passenger services—particularly the Canadian Pacific Railway—so that people will not use them and rely on them. The railways then turn around and say it is costing them money, and that they need to be bailed out.

Something should be said about the bill of goods that was put over on us a few years ago when this arrangement was made for the 80 per cent subsidy on a loss. The railways can get this by applying for the right to discontinue passenger service. It seems now that we just built into the legislation an open challenge to these railways. It is strange how the one we do not own and the one we do own seem to work together. When one applies for abandonment, the other applies for abandonment, and so on. We seem to have built into our legislation a challenge to the railways to come along a few years later and apply for an 80 per cent subsidy, thereby putting us on the spot. They know the people of Canada, the Parliament and the government of this country realize we must have passenger service and if they threaten, as they do, to abandon it the government will pick up the tab or take over that service.

I speak as strongly as I can, Mr. Speaker, against moving in that direction. I refer not only to the direction of paying 80 per cent of the losses that these companies may designate but in the direction of taking over only the passenger operation and allowing this private enterprise outfit to carry on with the profit making part of the whole business. I submit if there is an area of our national life that calls for a review and an in-depth survey, it is this one to which no attention seems to have been given. I think I know the reason for this. It is because those in power today do not want to disturb this situation in which profits can be made on part of the industry. As for passenger service, it will not be allowed to drop because the country needs it. This is no way to run things. This is no way to talk of giving leadership or of accepting responsibility for the life of this country. I call upon this government not to just come along year after year with this bill and stand up and tell us in a seven minute speech that it is the same bill we had last year, the year before that, the year before that and the same bill we will probably have next year and the year after.

Surely transportation is important enough to the life of this country that we should analyse, review and resolve it in rational and sensible terms. I thought that was what we were going to get a few years ago when Mr. Pickersgill introduced that bill of his. He gave us a long preamble to the national transportation policy. It was a great speech. He made it clear that he was such an expert in the field that he was able to take the job provided by the bill, but of course that is all water under the bridge. I remember when he spoke I had the feeling that maybe the time had come when we were going to get a critical examination of the whole subject of transportation in our country. However, we did not get that. All we got was a reshuffling of the financial arrangements without changing the basic concept under which transportation is still operating, namely, let the private enterprise people have all the profit they can get from the profitable phases, and let them come to us crying poverty as far as the essential services are concerned and we will pay the deficit or take over the service. That, Mr. Speaker, is not good government.

When the Minister without Portfolio was proposing this bill I had the feeling it would be good if we had a Parliament with enough people in it with the guts to refuse to pass the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some people say we cannot deny the CNR this money because the trains would stop running tomorrow morning if we did not pass this bill.

An hon. Member: Some have.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As my hon. friend points out, trains have stopped running in an important part of Canada. Not too long ago, Mr. Speaker, there was a real crisis in this House because the CPR was going to discontinue the "Dominion". It was going to reduce train service across Canada to one train a day instead of two. This matter was referred to committee and we had a great discussion on the matter. The CPR kept the "Dominion" running because it was centennial year. Some members said this showed the way the wind was blowing. We said it would not be long until they would want to discontinue the "Canadian" as well. Now we see this happening.

We should not worry that the effect of any action we might take will result in the stopping of train service. The railways themselves are doing this. If we had a Parliament with enough people in it with the guts to say no to this kind of legislation and refuse to pass it, it might bring home to the government the realization that it has not examined transportation policy. The government does not have a policy that is good for the sixties, which are almost over, no policy for the seventies and certainly no policy for the final decades of this century. We go on year after year with the same bill.

There is only one thing we have not had tonight which we usually have when this bill is presented, namely, a little homily about it just being a financial bill respecting the CNR and the fact that we should not get into speeches about CNR policy. No one tried to impose that stricture at this time because the threats to cut out passenger service have brought the whole thing to a head in the minds of hon. members and the public. If we had a Parliament that would not pass this bill, the government might realize the jig is up and that they cannot go on perpetuating this mess. This is a completely unsatisfactory situation. We must resolve the whole transportation picture.

I want to say a word about the effect of this policy on the workers of the transportation industry. I come from a city which is a major centre for employees of Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. These employees have been going through a good deal of agony for the last decade or more, wondering what is happening as services are being cut one after the other. They are also wondering what is happening now. I submit that this is part of the responsibility of an industry such as the transportation industry. This industry has no moral right to talk about discontinuing these services without realizing what it can mean to those who are working in the industry and who have helped to build it up to the strong, effective industry which it has been over the years. The government has no concern for these people.

When it gets to be ten o'clock, I believe we will have a late show. I may have a surprise for some hon. members tonight. I will be on the late show to speak on the subject of pensions. I will be speaking on the pensions of CNR employees. There, again, is an example of the failure of these outfits. Both the privately-owned CPR and the might-as-well-be privately-owned CNR ought to be concerned about the services this country needs, the condition under which their employees work and the pensions of those who have retired.

I do not know what we are going to do to get the government to realize that a crisis point is being reached. The workers, the country and the people who depend on train service know this. Most of us as private members in this House know it. I think that goes as much for private members on the government side as those on this side. But what does the cabinet do? It brings in the same old financing bill, gives us a seven minute speech telling us it is the same except for a couple of years when we had two years instead of one and with no indication at all of their awareness of the seriousness of this whole problem.

Another aspect of this which matters has been brought out in the bill before us, and which shows the failure of the government to realize the seriousness of this whole problem, relates to air transport. This bill provides for the interim financing of Canadian National Railways and for loans to Air Canada. I believe there are some differences in the bill as compared with similar bills of a few years ago. Those differences seem to me to portend the direction in which the government is moving, namely, that of farming out all the profitable aspects of air travel to Canadian Pacific and other private air lines while cutting down the amount of business available to the public utility.

We heard a speech the other day from a backbencher on the Liberal side who argued that this should be done. Why, he asked, should the people of Canada be shareholders in Air Canada compulsorily as taxpayers; why not put the shares on the market and let those Canadians who want to be shareholders in Air Canada become shareholders by buying shares in the company? It is very plausible, put that way, but it is the same old story. When air transport was new, and needed to be built up—

Mr. Mather: Where was private enterprise then?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a good question. I was here. I will tell you where private enterprise was then. It was not interested. But now there are phases of the air transport industry which are starting to show a profit. And the government line is: let us give these to private enterprise and we will keep up the essential services; we shall probably go into the red doing so, but we shall get away with it. This has been government policy with regard to transportation for a hundred years—to pay the shot wherever there are losses but to let private enterprise take the profit where there is profit. This is what has bedevilled the whole of our transportation picture as far as the railways are concerned, and it will bedevil it in the air in just the same way unless we can do something to bring these people to their senses.

My hon. friend and colleague asked where private enterprise was when Air Canada was starting out. I was here in 1944, I think it was, when the Right Hon. C. D. Howe brought in a measure having to do with air policy which resulted in the setting up of Air Canada as a completely publicly-owned corporation. I said 1944, but perhaps it was in 1945 or 1946—it was around there somewhere. Mr. Howe was asked why it had to be a completely publicly-owned proposition; why the others had not been let in. And he, the apostle of private enterprise, organizer, entrepreneur, pragmatist as he was, stood in his place and said he had tried his best to get the CPR to come in along with the CNR in joint ownership, but failed. This was in the middle forties at a time when there was nothing to be made out of it; the others did not want any part of it, so this great public set-up was the result.

Mr. Howe said, when some of us supported his move, that he intended to make the corporation so strong that nothing could be done by either its enemies or its friends—that was a crack at us—to upset it. But we all know what has happened since then. I realize I am rambling, I am reminiscing, but I think I am not far from the truth about this whole transportation system and its history in Canada for a full hundred years. We have never been able to sit down and look at transportation as being an essential service which the country needs and which should therefore be provided by the people, preferably through public ownership, but if not, through a system of joint ownership. Anyway, it should be regarded as an essential service, not as an area in which huge profits should be made.

We have all made our street corner speeches—others call them that. We have our wild-eyed opinions. We have declared many times that this is the direction which greedy, private-enterprise capitalism takes. We do not have to say it in street corner terms. It is happening. The Canadian people today are faced with the prospect of losing something which is essential to the life of this country, that is, passenger train services, simply because the principle to which I have referred has been followed for a hundred years. When are we going to put a stop to it? When will we get a government which instead of bringing in this bill year after year decides to face up to the need for change in the whole policy?

I hope this debate will be one in which many hon. members will take part and express their views. I shall not mind if my views about public ownership are criticized from the right or from across the way, but for heaven's sake let us have some policy for coping with our transportation problem founded on the basis that transportation is a service, instead of patching things up for a year at a time. Let us, instead, come out with a policy which will see us through the years and the decades which lie ahead.

I believe it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Might I ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) whether he has consulted the ouija board, and if so, whether he can tell us the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The business for tomorrow will be a continuation, very briefly, I hope, of the bill we have been discussing, to be followed by the completion of the bill to amend the Canada Corporations Act. Then I would think we might change the order of business to the extent of calling as the third item the Elections Act resolution. As for the business for next week, one of the aspects of the ouija board was speaking while I was engaged in consultation, so I had better make an announcement tomorrow or at a better opportunity.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PENSIONS—FEDERAL SUPERANNUATES, RETIRED CNR EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 7, as reported in Hansard at page 646, I asked the following question:

Now that Christmas is only 48 days away, may I put a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Is the minister hopeful that a decision regarding pension increases for federal superannuates will be made in time so that these people might enjoy a happier Christmas than is in prospect for some of them?

The following exchange then took place:

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I think the hon. gentleman knows I am always full of hope.

Mr. Bell: Like Scrooge.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport? I should like to ask him whether he is hopeful that something might be done to increase the pensions of retired employees of the CNR, also before Christmas.

An hon. Member: Are you full of hope, too?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, and more of it.

That was a double-barrelled question directed at two ministers, so I suppose it gave me a choice as to which of them I might summon to a late show. Well, anyone would make the choice I have made: when one minister tells us he is full of hope and another says he has even more of it, we call on the one who has more of it.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I thought I would engage tonight a minister who is more full of hope than anybody else, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). Apparently it is not possible for him to be here this evening, but I see his genial parliamentary secretary. The Minister of Transport is a big man. His parliamentary secretary is, I think, even bigger, so perhaps he has more hope in his system than the minister himself. In any event, I hope that confidence will be expressed this evening.

As the House well knows, I have been pressing this question of increased pensions for retired CNR employees for many years. I have had expressions of hope and confidence from a long string of ministers. Without going back into ancient history, there was the present Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) when he was Minister of Transport; there was Jack Pickersgill when he was Minister of Transport; and there was the present hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). Then for a while the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) had the responsibility. We now have the hon. member for Newfoundland as Minister of Transport.

Quite frankly, I have felt that this minister is more concerned about this question than were some of the others. I think it bothers him that time goes on without this question being resolved. I like the things he said to me on the "late show" some months ago—on Thursday, June 19, 1969, to be precise. We were discussing this issue on that occasion and he expressed sympathy and concern. He said he knew what poverty was because he had only to think about the fishermen along the coast of Newfoundland. He went on to say that some of the CNR pensioners were at least better off than Newfoundland fishermen. I interrupted him at that point with the words, "It is still poverty", to which he replied:

> I cannot agree more with the hon. member that is far from adequate. But I am sure he also realizes that while this group has had a good deal of attention in terms of increases in the old age pension, we do wish to do more; and I believe that we will do more.

Those are the words of the Minister of Transport when addressing this House on the night of Thursday, June 19, 1969, as recorded in Hansard at page 10451. He said:

> —we wish to do more; and I believe that we will do more.

I know that this problem is linked to the problem of pensions of retired civil servants and all the other people on federal pensions; the whole question is tied together. But surely somebody in the government has to make a break somewhere, and I can think of no one better to make that break than the Minister of Transport. I hope he has deputized his parliamentary secretary tonight to say that this break will be made, that these pensions will be increased, and that this will be done before Christmas.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I must congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his tenacity and his perseverance regarding the pensions of old people, retired civil servants or retired C.N.R. employees.

As a matter of fact, while going through the records, we see that in 1964, when Mr. Pickersgill was Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a question similar to this one tonight, as well as to the question he raised last May and to which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) replied on June 19. The hon. member has just read part of the minister's reply.

The Minister of Transport is quite worried, as I am myself, about the present situation of the C.N.R. pensioners. We sympathize with them, we share the fears of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who worries and who is sorry for those people with Christmas coming. Unfortunately I do not have the favourable reply he was hoping to hear tonight, even if the C.N.R. authorities were to hold consultations and meetings with the pensioners. I was told this afternoon that talks are held now and then in an attempt to find some form of agreement formula which has yet to be achieved.

It must also be recognized that the government, in increasing the old age pension a few years ago, in granting it to persons of 65, has enabled many C.N.R. pensioners to avail themselves of these advantages and also of a supplement of $30 a month. This supplement is granted, as a general rule, to all retired employees, to all Canadian citizens of 65 and over who are in need of it and who can prove that their financial means are limited and that they are eligible. A few of these pensioners are getting part of this supplement of $30 and I think some must receive the greater part of it, because, in some cases, certain C.N.R. employees receive a meager pension. Unfortunately, that pension was paid for thirty or forty years ago, and then money did not have the same value as today. One readily admits that the amount is insufficient.

The government would like to please everybody. For my part, I represent a working-class constituency in Montreal. Already, I have received requests for Christmas parcels. I wish I could fill them.

The government would like to be able to say yes to all the requests made by citizens from the various social levels and even to requests from hon. members of the opposition. It would be much more agreeable to say yes and to accept suggestions than to say no and refuse—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member who had scarcely entered his peroration.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just say "oui".

Mr. Loiselle: Just say "oui"! Where do we get the money? Do you want to bankrupt the government?

PUBLIC SERVICE—ALLEGED LACK OF EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the other day during the question period I raised a question about the inequalities of salaries and employment advancement opportunities for the women of Canada who are employed in the federal public service. This question was inspired, if I might use that word, by a recent and excellent speech by Mr. Carson, chairman of the Public Service Commission of Canada. I addressed my question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), who I am delighted to see with us this evening. Possibly I did not phrase my question accurately enough to convey my real interest because the minister replied that he would be glad to send me a copy of Mr. Carson's speech. I did not consider that this was an adequate reply and I asked the minister whether he would consider taking a really serious look at the situation which is one that affects a great many women in Canada both in the public and private sector. This has been well outlined as far as our federal women employees are concerned by Mr. Carson.

I want to take advantage of the adjournment debate tonight to put a few more facts forward in illustration of what seems to be a need for a stepped-up effort on the part of our government to rid the employment service of this old and outworn prejudice against women in executive or foremost positions in the public service. Let me quote from the speech last week by Mr. Carson, the chairman of the Public Service Commission of Canada, in which he said:

> In 1967 for example, almost 60 per cent of all men in the public service made less than $6,000 a year, but no less than 90 per cent of all women ... so employed were under that level.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

He also states, as a result of a study undertaken on a comprehensive basis of men and women employed in the public service:

> Our study has computed that a male has 100 times the chance of reaching an annual salary of $14,000 than does a female in the public service.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I suggest these two quotations indicate that economic discrimination exists throughout the public service in respect of female employees. I am sure many people would agree with me when I suggest a similar prejudice exists in the private sector. I know, and I am sure the minister or whoever speaks tonight will say, that efforts are being made to meet the situation in the federal public service field and that the prejudice which involves women and retards their advancement to a higher salary or position is an intangible one. It is also said that this hangover from past ages has nothing to do with legislation. I agree, but I am sure the women across the country would agree with me when I say the federal authority in this field, representing the public of Canada, should be expected to give a lead in this regard and speed up efforts to correct the situation which prevails. If this is done, then I think the federal government will set an example for the rest of the country in accelerating the progress of women toward economic equality in our country at least so far as salary and employment are concerned.

In concluding my remarks I should like to remind hon. members that in reply to a question I asked in 1966 on a similar subject, the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, at that time said unequivocally yes to me when I asked whether appointments to bodies such as the Atlantic Development Board, other boards, the Economic Council of Canada, the judiciary, the diplomatic corps and the CBC would be made by the government on the basis of a due proportion being filled by qualified women. Three years ago Mr. Pearson said yes on that particular point. We have yet to see any real action to back up that undertaking. I wish to say to the minister and others that we do appreciate that the chairman of the Public Service Commission is aware of the situation in the public service. I ask the minister to do everything possible in supporting the chairman of that commission and expediting equality for women in the employment service.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. gentleman who has just spoken we subscribe both to the analysis and views expressed by the chairman of the Public Service Commission. I think this is an excellent analysis. As the hon. member suggests, we will do all that is reasonable to see that these hopes and aspirations are furthered. In quoting from one passage the hon. gentleman suggested, perhaps inadvertently, that there was inequality of salary between men and women, inequality in the sense that men on a quantitative basis draw higher salaries than women in the public service. Perhaps this carries the implication that women might be paid less than men for equivalent qualifications or equivalent jobs. I am sure he will appreciate this is not so. The law is quite explicit on this point. There is equal pay for equal work as between both sexes in the public service. There is no complaint on that score.

Apart from this I would be glad to say that, like Mr. Pearson, we want to see a greater participation by those of the fairer sex in the public service, and as the chairman of the Public Service Commission has indicated, he is conscious of the problems to be faced and is putting forth his best efforts to see that this proportion is increased.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—INCLUSION OF COST OF SCHOOL IN GRANT FOR BILINGUAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) today if the amount of $3 million earmarked for the building of the Civil Service School of Languages was included in the $50 million grant promised by the Federal Government for the bilingual programs.

I suggest this is an urgent question, because a great many Canadians are worried about the manner in which this amount of $50 million is going to be spent.

In view of the amount of money involved in learning a second language in Canada, this allocation of $3 million makes us wonder if the expenditures made in view of turning Canada into a bilingual country have been provided for or if the grant of $50 millions to bilingualism programs will be used also for the construction of language schools.

Speaking about Canadians' concern, a British Columbia citizen stated, and I shall quote an article published in Le Soleil of November 11th which was entitled: "The $50 millions from Ottawa should be used to improve the condition of the French-speaking minorities in this country", and I quote:

> We will have to see to it that the $50 millions Ottawa will contribute in order to promote bilingualism are not used by English-speaking provinces to help English-speaking Canadians to become bilingual but to improve the condition of their French-speaking minorities.
> This is the view expressed last week-end by a British Columbia French-speaking visitor to Lévis—
>
> Mr. Roméo Paquette, secretary of the British Columbia French-Canadian Association, was speaking especially of his province—

• (10:20 p.m.)

> At the present time there is no adequate machinery to ensure that the French Canadians will be properly represented on the school boards.
> Mr. Paquette wonders how the French-speaking people in his province will be able to work towards self-determination if the institutions are English and if English-speaking people decide on the solutions to the problems of the French-speaking people.

If western citizens are concerned about the disposal of the $50 million made available to Canadians, Quebecers are also justified in being worried and in asking questions which urgently require answers.

According to Quebec Minister of Cultural Affairs, Quebec had told Ottawa that if it intended to provide technical and financial assistance, it would naturally have to consider the whole situation, namely the efforts Quebec had made to set up an educational system favourable both to the French and the English people.

He added, and I quote:

> As for the premier, he concluded: In Toronto, the Education Minister (Mr. Davis) stated the government policy, at least some principles of the Ontario government, and he asked for retroactivity. If this has a retroactive effect, in Quebec, it will have to be for more than a hundred years.

All this, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that there is much to be done in the field of linguistic research, in order to do justice to everyone, because, in my opinion, individuals and peoples should not be judged according to how well they speak or write.

However, language remains, in my opinion, a privileged instrument for the moulding of the mind and character. A cripple or a sick person can be endowed with very lofty qualities. We must not conclude that physical disability is unimportant and that the spread of illness should be encouraged. To speak incorrectly and to write poorly is not only a discourtesy towards others, but a sin against oneself, according to Plato, who had nothing in common with a silly bluestocking or of a man for whom hair styling and whiteness of teeth are more important than friendship and courage.

As for that specific inquiry directed to the minister concerning the manner in which the amount of $50 million will be spent, I would like to quote what a professor of Matane—a town located east of Quebec City—Mr. Viateur Beaupré said, and I quote:

> The quality of the language is closely connected with a people's economic and political life. It is certain that our present federalism seriously threatens our culture and our language because, as an increasingly centralizing magnet, despite our protests, it strives consciously and unconsciously to establish unity and uniformity. The English-speaking majority cannot but work to build the country in its image and transcendence. The melody is sung by English tenors; French Canadians, Eskimos and others are asked not to spoil the concert or to learn the right lyrics. If we want to sing our own song, they will tell us that we cannot carry a tune and must have faith in them because, they say, we are fond of your "Alouette, gentille alouette" and we promise it will be respected from coast to coast. On a single condition: that you shall not sing another song while we are teaching "Alouette" in the Prairies and Baffin Land.
> But I will not insist on this aspect of the question, although it is of utmost importance. Whatever the political status of the province of Quebec, we will always have to make a gigantic effort to save the French language in North America. It will be saved or irreparably lost in a few years hence. And let there be firmly believed that if Ottawa proffers its hand, it is to grasp it later with both hands and compel us to follow its own dance. If we dance well, to the English rhythm, the French-Canadians outside the province of Quebec will be allowed to keep their folklore—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question of the hon. member is no. The cost of the Language Center of the Civil Service Commission located on Carson Road is paid from the budget of the Public Works Department.

The Department of Public Works bought the Saint-Jean Marie Vianney seminary last summer for $2,700,000. Renovations will bring the total cost to roughly $3 million by the end of the 1969-70 fiscal year.

The budget of the Public Service Commission provides for expenditures of $5,777,000 for language training in the year 1969-70. Operating expenses for the Centre are included in that amount.

With regard to the $50 million I mentioned here on November 6, that amount will be used to set up federal-provincial programs for the teaching of the minority language, that is the mother tongue of English minorities in Quebec, and of French minorities in the other provinces, and, as an adjunct to this, for the teaching of English and French as second tongue.

The hon. member may rest assured that the amount used for the purchase and the amount to be used for the operation of that new Public Service Commission Center were not taken out of the money voted towards the federal-provincial programs for the teaching of languages.

Mr. Speaker: The time has now come for the House to adjourn, and hon. members are invited to take up arms again tomorrow, at eleven o'clock in the morning.

TRADE

PROPOSED TARIFF PREFERENCES FOR EXPORTS FROM DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs I wish to advise the House that there is a growing realization that to bridge the gap that separates the rich and poor countries the export earnings of the latter must increase substantially. One of the means that could facilitate achieving this objective is to provide the exports of these countries preferential access to world markets. I wish to inform this House of recent progress that has been made toward the elaboration of a scheme of tariff preferences that could achieve this purpose.

At the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in New Delhi last year there was unanimous agreement to attempt to establish a system of special tariff reductions that the industrialized countries would offer the developing countries. Since then, we have been approaching the proposed system in two stages, initially, discussion within the OECD among prospective donor countries and, subsequently, discussion within UNCTAD between prospective donors and beneficiaries. We are about to move to the second stage.

The Secretary General of the OECD is today transmitting to the Secretary General of UNCTAD a report which summarizes the results of the extensive meetings that prospective donor countries have held during the past year. Attached to this report are the provisional proposals that the various governments which are prepared to consider extending preferences, that is, all developed countries of western Europe, North America, Australia, New Zealand and Japan, exchanged within the OECD in order to indicate the nature of the tariff preferences they were prepared to consider granting to developing countries.

Although the Canadian proposal that is being transmitted to UNCTAD, along with those of other donors, is no more than indicative hon. members will wish to be aware of its substance. In essence we have told our partners within the OECD, and now within the UNCTAD, that we are prepared to consider reducing the Canadian tariff on imports from developing countries of most manufactured and semi-manufactured goods either by one-third off the post-Kennedy round most-favoured-nation rate, or to the level of the present British preferential rate, whichever is lower. In addition, we would consider certain tariff reductions for imports from developing countries of a selected list of agricultural products that are of particular interest to developing countries. We envisage extending these preferential rates to imports from those developing countries that are entitled to MFN or British preferential treatment.

In order to assure that the scheme will not be disruptive to the Canadian economy, we have made it clear that we would not extend these reduced rates to products which we judge to be sensitive and for which we have negotiated or are asking for a quantitative restraint on exports to Canada from any country. Moreover, we, like other prospective donors, would insist on a safeguards procedure which would permit donors to alter at any time the nature of the preferences they are offering, to withhold the grant of a preference from the beginning or to withdraw a preferential rate which had been in effect.

We are confident that our indicative proposal contains the elements which will provide substantial new opportunities for developing country exporters. We would assure developing countries a preference of at least one-third off the MFN rate. However, since the present British preferential rate is in many instances less than two-thirds of the MFN rate, for those items we would be offering a preference considerably in excess of one-third of the MFN rate. In fact, for an extensive number of items we would be offering to remove the duty entirely on imports from developing countries. It will be realized that our purpose in offering to harmonize the proposed new preferences with our present British preferential rate is to equalize the treatment accorded by Canada to exports from all developing countries.

There is a great variety in the various indicative proposals of our OECD partners. Some of our OECD partners have said they are willing to offer a greater tariff reduction than we are proposing. However, unlike several other donor countries the linear cut in our tariff for imports from developing countries that we are proposing is not qualified by restrictions on the quantities to be imported, nor is it our intention to exclude whole sectors of trade from the scheme.

We wish to stress that our proposal is tentative and subject to revision following further discussion abroad and in Canada. One of the basic principles of the proposed scheme, accepted by all the industrialized countries that have stated a willingness to participate in it, is that the burden will be shared equitably amongst all donors. We have not yet completed our assessment of the various indicative proposals of our OECD partners. The details of the United States and Japanese proposals only became known to us last week. It is possible that the system of tariff preferences we hope in due course to put before the House for consideration and approval will differ from that which I just outlined.

However, in spite of the tentative nature of this proposal we believed that members would wish to be aware of its substance and the state of play of the efforts to elaborate an international scheme of tariff preferences for the exports of developing countries.

When the OECD document I referred to earlier in this statement becomes available in Ottawa I would be pleased to make it available for tabling.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I am glad to note, Mr. Speaker, that the government is consistent when it describes its proposals as being indicative and hypothetical. This is an apt description of most of its proposals.

Mr. Drury: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the word "hypothetical" was not used by me.

Mr. Baldwin: I can only say, in response to that non-question of privilege, that if the minister did not like the word he should not have used it.

Mr. Drury: I did not.

Mr. Baldwin: I followed very closely what the minister had to say. I usually listen to what he has to say, but I was handed this document just as I came into the House so today I did so with even greater interest.

Mr. Drury: Obviously not.

Mr. Baldwin: What the minister is saying, in a timid way, amounts to this: We must do something; we are not sure what we shall do, but if we do it we reserve the right to take back what we have given at any time.

I can understand the minister's position. This is a difficult and complex situation dealing, as it does, with a variety of tariff rates and structures. But in connection with questions of this kind, Canada has surely indicated in the past that it is dedicated to the principle of enlightened self-interest. A few years ago it was estimated that between $10 billion and $15 billion would be required in supplementation of the gifts already being made to these emerging countries if they were to be in a position to set up a capital structure upon which to base an entry into the world's trading markets.

I am glad to see that the government is interested to the extent of enlightened self-interest. We take the position that we should do all we can, consistent with our obligations to our own people in Canada and to our other international commitments, to ensure that the countries to which the hon. gentleman referred do develop to a point at which they will be beyond the type of violence in evidence in developing countries in so many parts of the world, in the hope that in due course they will become Canada's partners in trade and on the international scene. A further and more definite examination of what the government is suggesting will have to await the disclosure of more specific proposals.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I noticed that the minister, when reading the statement, dropped the word "hypothetical", but whether that changes the nature of the statement is another matter. Everyone who has studied international aid has recognized for many years that trade is one of the most important problems that developing countries have to face. This is repeated and emphasized in the recent report of the international committee of which the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson was chairman. Therefore, without any reservation I greet not only the government statement but also the statement that work is progressing on the part of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development to deal with this problem in some effective way.

I have but three comments to make. It is characteristic of the relationship between the developed and the developing countries and of the paternalistic attitude that we in the developed countries take that in all of the discussions that are taking place it is the developed countries that decide what they are going to present to the poor developing countries. We take unto ourselves the right unilaterally to withdraw, to withhold or to change any tariff arrangements that are made, and in all of these discussions the developing countries are treated like mendicants sitting at our feet as we hand out some largesse. This approach is evident throughout the statement that the minister made, and I object in the strongest possible language to this attitude that is taken by the rich countries of the world.

The developing countries have a right to participate in these discussions, to discuss with the donor countries what they would like to have done and to have some influence on the decisions that the donor countries make, instead of this club of the rich deciding what the poor are going to get, with the poor people given no opportunity to participate. It is particularly reprehensible to me that this attitude should come from a government that talks so much about participatory democracy at home. I suggest the same holds true on the international plan as it does within any one of our societies.

My second point is that not only are tariff reductions and preferential tariffs important to trade with the developing countries but equally important are the prices of some of the primary products that these countries may be able to export. The fact is that the rich countries of the world have taken the usual selfish advantage of the market situation and have depressed the price of many of these primary products to the level where their export would not do the developing countries much good.

Finally, I urge the minister that the House be given more information when he or the Secretary of State for External Affairs next makes a statement on this subject. I ask that we be told what products are being discussed, the countries that are involved and what general range of tariff reductions is being considered so that, instead of a general blurb such as the minister was handed by some officer to present to this House, Members of Parliament will have information that has some content and meaning.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, before I speak on the subject with which the minister dealt this morning, I would like to draw his attention to the most important fact that, in the opinion of the government, our federal institutions must be bilingual. I thank the minister for having relayed to me the text of his statement, but it was in English, and I would rather have had it in French. At any rate, I think that the departments should make sure that we are forwarded the French and English texts of the statements made by the ministers.

To come back to the matter discussed by the minister, namely the aid that developed countries can give to developing countries, I would like to recall some of the things he said in his statement, and I quote:

[English]

—we are prepared to consider reducing the Canadian tariff on imports from developing countries of most manufactured and semi-manufactured goods either by one-third off the post-Kennedy round ... or to the level of the present British preferential rate—

[Translation]

And later on, he said that we will import from developing countries.

[English]

—a selected list of agricultural products that are of particular interest to developing countries.

[Translation]

Of course, we support the government when it decides to help developing countries. But the minister should consider the situation and realize that, at the very moment when we are preparing to help developing countries, the government adopts legislation aimed at curtailing domestic assistance as much as possible, and this is a paradox.

In fact, we could help those countries while ensuring the normal growth of our own economy. For instance, we should examine the factors which prompt us to cut down our economic activities while we help developing countries by importing their products. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said earlier that the rich decide what the poor have to take, to accept from us, that the decision rests with us, all of which is not so very democratic, etc.

[Mr. Lewis.]

There I disagree with the hon. member for York South because it is clear that the prices of agricultural products and manufactured and semi-manifactured goods we import from those countries are much lower than those prevailing here in Canada. If we import them duty-free, we will be competing with our own economy, which is not logical.

I believe that in the circumstances it is not a matter of deciding what products developing countries should be forced to take from us. As a matter of fact, as the minister himself has said, we are ready to import goods from those countries if this is likely to help them. Nevertheless, I maintain my point, that in so doing we should beware of hampering our own economic development and we must see to improving our production and bringing our costs down through increased production.

We should not neglect our own economy while devising a foreign policy that would bring about unemployment and would confront our producers with rather unfair competition.

I suggest we should wait for the minister to draw up a list of farm products and manufactured or semi-manufactured goods to be purchased from those countries.

In any case, the statement holds that assistance should be extended to developing countries, and we agree to that as long as it is not at the expense of our own economic development.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might obtain the floor for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development intends to make a statement on motions regarding self-government or proposed self-government for the north, about which he is reported to have made some public statements outside the House?

• (11:30 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member has raised this matter on a point of order, but of course it is not regular to do so in the form of a question asked at this time. That should be reserved for the question period. The question having been asked, however, perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement to the House, but I am prepared to submit copies of the two speeches I made in Yellowknife and Whitehorse for the information of the House.

I think, however, that copies of these speeches have already been distributed to all hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might raise the matter during the question period.

Mr. Nesbitt: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday afternoon, as reported at page 768 of Hansard, the Prime Minister gave every indication to the House that the minister would today, when he had returned to the House, make some comments on his recent visit to the Yukon. The Prime Minister said this in reply to a question by the hon. member for Skeena who has just spoken. It seems very strange to me and to many hon. members that the minister would not make a statement so that members of the opposition would have a proper opportunity to comment, which we will not have during the question period.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the same question, I must take issue with the statement just made. I was asked yesterday whether I would convey a request to the minister. I said I would be very glad to convey that request. I discussed the matter with the minister and he told me what his position would be. I think it is a reasonable position. I do not think the hon. member is justified in alleging that I would ask the minister to make a statement.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister indicated that the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no question of privilege and I doubt whether there is a point of order. In normal circumstances the hon. member would wait until the end of the question period, at which time he would ask whether the minister proposed to ask leave to return to motions for the purpose of making a statement. I think that would be the regular way to bring up the matter.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the refusal of the minister and the government to reply to a legitimate request for information, might I ask the unanimous consent of the House to table later this day a document relating to our policy on self-government for the Northwest Territories, which is a little more valuable than the one we read about?

Mr. Baldwin: Is it under your own hand, Frank?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILE PACT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHANGES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce based on reports that early changes are expected in the Canada-U.S. automotive trade pact. Will the minister make a statement in the House as soon as possible and advise of the government's position with regard to any changes in the pact and whether it is the intention of the government to object to including in the new pact complete free trade in automobiles between the two countries?

An hon. Member: Nobody home.

Another hon. Member: Where is the government of this country?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I am prepared to answer for him. I regret to say I was not paying the attention I should have to the hon. member's question. I would ask him to reread it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to assist the wandering minister. Will the minister make a statement in the House as soon as possible and advise of the government's position with regard to any changes in the Canada-U.S. automotive trade pact and whether it is the intention of the government to object to including in the renewed pact complete free trade in automobiles between the two countries? I said that my question is based on reports that early changes are expected in this agreement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: On November 12 and 13 there were consultations in Washington regarding the auto pact. These are now concluded. In these discussions the United States' position in essence was that the time had now come to move to a rather freer trade position than had been the case up to the present. The Canadian position was that while great progress had been made under the automobile agreement in the establishment of an efficient and expanded Canadian automobile industry we could not feel assured yet that in the complete absence of any safeguards the progress could be continued. The discussions themselves came to no conclusion other than a statement of the positions. They will be renewed, we hope, in the new year.

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder whether the minister, on behalf of the government, can answer whether the government will undertake that no further protection will be given to the manufacturers without some basic assurance from them that the price differential will be eliminated?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I can assure the House that no further protection beyond that already accorded will be granted to the motor car manufacturers in the absence of the kind of assurances the hon. gentleman mentioned.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

MONTREAL BYLAW—REQUEST FOR TEST OF CONSTITUTIONAL VALIDITY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's deserved reputation in the past as a defender of civil liberties and in view of the fact that the first use of the Montreal bylaw was to ban a proposed peaceful march in connection with the moratorium against the war in Viet Nam is the government considering appropriate ways in which the validity of the bylaw may be challenged in the courts or referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for an opinion on its validity as provided in the Supreme Court Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice and I have discussed this matter on at least two occasions. His department is looking into procedures and precedents whereby the federal government might challenge on its own a municipal bylaw. It is my understanding that this is not a customary procedure, but nevertheless we are in the process of searching for precedents. Of course the bylaw can always be challenged by any individual and if a constitutional issue is involved the Attorney General would, of course, be free to exercise his usual right of being present at the proceedings and pleading the constitutionality or otherwise of that bylaw.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the Prime Minister's important proposal to include in the constitution of Canada certain fundamental rights which clearly, in my submission, are breached by this bylaw, would the Prime Minister not consider it appropriate for him as the leader of the country to state his distaste for this kind of bylaw in the hope that the city council of Montreal would not use it in the way it has been used?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in the proper form. I believe the hon. member is asking whether the Prime Minister would consider it appropriate to do something or other. A question asked in those terms is not acceptable.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase it without repeating the first part. Would the Prime Minister consider favourably expressing his distaste for this bylaw in view of the circumstances I have suggested?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you might allow me to answer the first part of the question relating to the proposal that the federal government has put forward for a bill of rights to be entrenched in the constitution. I would agree with the hon. member that perhaps the country should now be more aware than ever of the need for wholehearted support by all parties and all provinces for the federal proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The matter is again on the agenda for the December federal-provincial conference on the constitution. I repeat that I hope we will have the support of all parties in making a further advance with this idea.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that freedom of speech comes exclusively within the authority of the federal parliament and that there is a bill of rights providing for freedom of speech and no constitutional amendment is required in order to establish that right—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —what stand does the Prime Minister take regarding this very clear case of the invasion of the right of free speech and free assembly?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member may recall that the courts had occasion to look at the Canadian Bill of Rights which was introduced into Parliament and passed under the leadership of the right hon. member and that this bill has been judged in a specific case not to apply to municipal bylaws concerning certain cases of the right to assembly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what case that is. I have read all the cases and there is no case in which the Bill of Rights was determined not to have power over freedom of speech. The Prime Minister cannot get away with that here. This is just plain evasion.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORTED INQUIRY INTO SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Right Honourable Prime Minister.

In my opinion individual freedom should not encroach upon the freedom of others. Therefore, would the Prime Minister tell me whether he has held, say, since yesterday, consultations with Mr. Saulnier of Montreal, who said he had every reason to believe that the central government would soon launch an inquiry on subversive activities. Is the Prime Minister in a position to say, today, whether such an inquiry will take place, because I think it is high time that revolutionaries be prevented from infringing upon other people's freedom in Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I understood well the question, my answer will be no. I did not meet Mr. Saulnier yesterday. Nevertheless I had a talk with him about ten days ago. Afterwards a short statement was released to the press, indicating that we had discussed certain matters, but not that the federal government was about to launch an inquiry, as suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Since a parliamentary committee was established to inquire into the activities of the Company of Young Canadians, following the statements made by the chairman of the executive committee of the city of Montreal, does the Prime Minister intend to have Mr. Saulnier appear before the committee to substantiate his charges?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that the committee itself should deal with this matter.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should like to rephrase the hon. member's question—

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order. The hon. member cannot rephrase a question by raising a point of order.

I will recognize the hon. member in few moments and he may then ask another question.

TRANSPORT

TRUCKING—INCREASE IN RATES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. What action does the government plan to take with respect to the outrageous proposal of a 10 per cent increase in trucking costs in Ontario, Quebec and across the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As an experienced parliamentarian I am sure the hon. member recognizes that the question as asked is not in order. Perhaps he can formulate it in other words.

Mr. Bell: In the absence of the Minister of Transport, who should be here today, will the Prime Minister get his pal, the dictator of transportation, Mr. Pickersgill, on the telephone and tell him to hold back this increase?

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member that his second question is not a procedural improvement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—AID FOR STARVING CHILDREN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the revelations that have been made in the last two days over CBC television regarding the hideous increase in inhumanity in Biafra and the potential starvation that faces tens of thousands of children. Would the Prime Minister make a special effort, in view of the vast amount of wheat and flour we have on hand, to bring succour to those youngsters who, in the name of humanity, call upon people everywhere to preserve their lives?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman should know that the difficulty with the relief flights is based on the fact that the Biafran authorities do not permit daylight flights, that they are using the night flights of relief supplies in order to screen shipments of arms. The Biafran authorities apparently have followed a course directed at making sure that they receive arms rather than food or other medical supplies for the starving people through the air space controlled by them. In these circumstances we can only continue to make our appeals, such as those made by the Red Cross and which I believe the opposition should also make, to Colonel Ojukwu to be a little more humane and to think of the starving people to whom the right hon. gentleman properly made reference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is at present in that general area, would it be possible for him to divert a little from the accustomed track and make direct representations in the name of Canada? It would not take him much out of the way because he is close by.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he considers that his extremely partisan and narrow statement a minute ago is fair to the leaders of Biafra, and is there not something that should also be said about Nigeria's interference with these flights?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS—CALLING OF MR. SAULNIER

Mr. Fortin: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member for Shefford will put the question.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether a recommendation was made by the federal government to the chairman of the committee investigating the Company of Young Canadians to the effect that the chairman of the executive committee of the city of Montreal, Mr. Lucien Saulnier, should not be asked to appear.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—RECOMMENDATIONS OF CARRUTHERS COMMISSION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the bashful and uncommunicative Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister give immediate consideration to instituting at least some of the major recommendations of the Carruthers Commission made in 1966 with respect to procedures leading to self-government in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories? To date these recommendations appear to have been almost completely ignored.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should seek information before asking questions.

Up to now, we have implemented 19 of the recommendations of the Carruthers Commission. Besides, we have partially implemented five other such recommendations and only 4 have not been followed up by the government.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When I put my question to the minister perhaps he did not quite hear all of it. I asked him about the major recommendations of the Carruthers Commission.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question but I might preface it by saying that I have never known the minister to be so shy and bashful, just uncommunicative sometimes.

Mr. Baldwin: In the House.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister be prepared to use his authority or good offices to effect a meeting between the elected members of the territorial council of the Northwest Territories and the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the hope that by such a meeting something worth while might be accomplished in the field of northern development?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have had myself the opportunity to meet, after my speeches, the council members of the two territories, and I discussed the whole problem with them.

Of course I said that the government feels that the Yukon and the Northwest Territories are not ready to accede at this time to the status of provinces and that if we were to give them executive powers within the territories, we would in fact be creating provinces, which is not desirable at present, because the population is small and the income from provincial taxes would be too low.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Either as a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, or in any event to obtain the floor, may I say that is not what I asked the minister and he knows it. He is distorting the facts of the situation by continuing—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has a supplementary.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the strong protest from the elected council of the Yukon arising from the minister's announcement and in the interests of peace, order and good government in Canada, would the minister now assure the House that the reasonable resolutions of the Yukon council requesting greater responsibility and autonomy in that territory will be given priority over the recommendations of the bureaucracy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I went myself to the Yukon. I met the council members there and I invited them to dinner. When we parted, they said that even though we sincerely disagreed on some points, we could still be very good friends and we parted amicably.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the minister a supplementary question. Would he agree that his statement in Yellowknife indicates that the great white father from Ottawa has once more struck a blow for the continued colonial status of the territories?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE NICKEL AND COPPER PRICE INCREASES—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but because of the urgency of the matter I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. Due to the fact that the prolonged strike at the International Nickel Company in Sudbury could be settled today, since the union membership is voting on whether to accept or reject the proposed new contract which could result in a substantial increase in wages for the workers, would the Prime Minister advise the House what action the government contemplates to prevent a similar increase in the prices of nickel and copper, which would have a serious effect on the cost of living not only in that area but across the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the department will be answering questions on Monday, but in the meantime I shall ensure that the question is brought to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister has read of the whopping increase that the city of Hamilton council has given itself retroactive to January 1, 1969. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could make a comment on whether this is in keeping with responsible people exercising restraint in a time of inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the hon. member's question is in order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

STATUS OF WATERS BETWEEN ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON AND CANADA

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, Mr. Speaker. Have the minister or members of his department held any talks with French officials concerning the status of the waters lying between St. Pierre and Miquelon and Canada? If so, will fishing activities be permitted in this area within the traditional three-mile limit or will the 12-mile limit apply?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my department has not been in direct contact with French officials in regard to this matter but the Department of External Affairs has been actively concerned with the subject.

PESTICIDES

DDT—DISPOSAL OF STOCKS ON HAND

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the real public concern, can the government indicate what plans it has, following the ban on general use of DDT in Canada, for the safe disposal of stocks on hand?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, but I know there is some concern in the industry and even more widespread than that, in the public interest, as to what disposal will be made of these products. I should like to obtain advice from my department as a result of their conversations with the industry and then make a report to the House.

Mr. Danforth: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government giving consideration to the payment of compensation to holders of large stocks of this material in view of the fact that it was assembled under licence from the government?

Mr. Olson: I shall take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECRETARIAT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to establish a grains secretariat and is it expected that such a step will put an end to the reported intense wrangling between government departments on matters of grain policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the story which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning is, of course, merely speculation, without foundation in fact.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I directed my question to the Prime Minister in view of the fact that the subject involves at least three ministers and three government agencies. However, I am happy to hear answers from the Minister of Agriculture as well. But my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Prime Minister. In view of the analysis of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that the past crop year was one of the most difficult ever experienced in the history of agriculture in Saskatchewan and in view of reported fears of a worse crisis—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to caution hon. members that again we are running out of time. It seems to me that the question period is being taken up more by statements than by questions. I suggest that perhaps hon. members should make an effort to reduce the length of questions. The purpose of the question period is to seek information, not to give information to the House.

Mr. Burton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall certainly abide by your ruling. My question to the Prime Minister is whether he would consider placing all matters affecting grain and grain policy under the jurisdiction of one minister?

Mr. Baldwin: He could not handle it.

Mr. Burton: A further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: I regret having to suggest to the hon. member that perhaps we should go on to another subject at this time.

REQUEST THAT MR. SAULNIER APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. It seems that the parliamentary committee responsible for inquiring into the activities of the Company of Young Canadians refuses to call in Mr. Saulnier as a witness whereas many committee members would like to hear him, not for the purpose of putting him on trial, but in order to find out more details—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member like to put his question?

Mr. Caouette: Willingly, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister suggest to the committee to take the necessary steps which will enable members sitting on this committee to hear Mr. Saulnier's testimony?

Mr. Speaker: I must suggest to the hon. member, or rather remind him, that this is a question which must be examined by the committee. It is not normal to discuss in the House the proceedings of a committee which is sitting at the present time.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Could the Prime Minister or the government extend the terms of reference of this committee to enable it to call in the witnesses whom the members wish to hear?

OIL

PROPOSED DRILLING IN GULF OF GEORGIA—RIGHTS OF PERMIT HOLDERS

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to allow the Minister of Finance to display some of the knowledge acquired in his recent immersion course in the petroleum industry. However, I shall direct this question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the opinion expressed in Vancouver on Wednesday by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry that drilling for gas and oil in the Gulf of Georgia ought not to be permitted, could the minister advise the House whether there has been any change in the policy of his department which would alter the rights that holders of permits from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources have heretofore enjoyed?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Is he considering bringing in legislation before the Christmas recess to set up a salt fish development corporation so that this important marketing agency can be operative in the next season?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would agree that this legislation should have a high priority.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, or perhaps it ought to be a point of order. On a number of occasions I have tried to elicit this information from the minister. A few days ago in St. John's the minister said that this legislation would not be brought in until the spring. I submit the minister's answer is completely misleading. I asked whether he would consider bringing in the legislation before the Christmas recess so that we would not have to wait until the spring. In the statement made in St. John's the minister said the legislation would be brought in at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: I have almost concluded, Mr. Speaker. Could this legislation not be brought in soon so that this important marketing agency could be operative by next spring?

[Later:]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will he make a statement in the House outlining the government's policy vis-à-vis a salt fish development corporation? At the same time will he tell the House when the government expects to introduce this legislation?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do this at the earliest opportunity.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE INCREASE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration being absent, I should like to direct to the Prime Minister an urgent question of national interest.

Considering the alarmingly high level of unemployment now prevailing in the province of Quebec, to wit 135,000 unemployed out of 330,000 in the whole country, could the Prime Minister tell us what immediate action his government intends to take to eliminate that evil which might well get worse this winter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I already pointed out to hon. members that such questions call for information usually passed on to the House by a minister through a statement on motions.

I suggest the hon. member might ask his question by following that procedure.

Mr. Valade: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he would be prepared to make a statement on motions concerning a very serious situation in Canada, especially in Quebec, or does the government intend to do nothing about it?

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister, if he makes this statement, indicate if the government has any weapon other than unemployment to deal with the question of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is hypothetical.

WHEAT—ARGENTINE CROP SHORTAGE—ACTION TO SUPPLY MARKETS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question was to have been directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In his absence may I direct it to the acting minister. In view of the report that the wheat crop in the Argentine this year is 17 per cent short of requirements, what steps if any is the government taking to fill any market vacuum in this area or to supply wheat to any of the regular or potential wheat customers of the Argentine?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Canadian Wheat Board and the minister of the responsible department attempt to maximize sales of Canadian wheat all the time.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the hon. gentleman inform the House when he will be setting up the grain sales agency that has been strongly advocated by western farmers for the past several years?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, when and if such an agency is set up, and if the federal government is involved in it, an announcement will be made in due course.

[Mr. Valade.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if we have a government at all.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I don't wonder. I know we have not.

OIL

GULF OF GEORGIA—STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Following the issuance of permits for seismic testing for oil in the Strait of Georgia by the government of British Columbia, has the minister made any public statement on this subject subsequent to the announcement made by the Parliamentary Secretary on November 6 in the House? If so, under what auspices was the statement made? Also, did it expand or differ in any way from the position taken by the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should think that the question as asked would be a good question for the Order Paper. The hon. member is asking whether statements were made by a minister subsequent to a certain date. I doubt very much whether that question would qualify as one to be asked during the oral question period.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I was not asking the minister to repeat any statement that was made. I should like to know, and I think there is urgent need for the information, whether the minister's statement if he made one, and there is some indication that he did, was on all fours with the position stated in the House by his Parliamentary Secretary. That is the gist of my question, and I hope you will permit an answer to be given.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Will he please stop fiddling with grains policy while the prairie farmer burns?

FINANCE

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance tell

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, this question could well be placed on the order paper.

RESEARCH

DISCONTINUANCE BY NASA OF PROGRAM AT FORT CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Subsequent to the announcement by NASA about the curtailment of their research program at Fort Churchill, was there any further consultation between federal government authorities or NRC authorities and NASA in an effort to have NASA reconsider this decision?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, endeavours have not been made because they are not regarded as likely to be productive in having NASA reconsider its decision not to participate in administration and operating costs on an annual basis at Churchill. However, the National Research Council, and other departments of government, have been endeavouring to persuade NASA of the advantages of conducting individual experiments on their own account at Churchill.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is consideration being given to increasing financial grants to NRC so as to allow that body to make a significant contribution financially, with NASA, as in the past?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure that I understand the significance of the question. NASA will, we hope, in future be conducting experiments either at its own expense or on a shared-cost basis with Canada at Fort Churchill. The nature of these will be determined by budgetary considerations and scientific needs. I am afraid I cannot be more specific than that.

[Later:]

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board in order to remove the impression left by the minister that he did not understand my first supplementary. In view of the fact it appears quite evident that the initial approach by NRC to NASA seeking a greater financial contribution to the program than they had hitherto been making sparked off NASA's decision—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member his supplementary is a form of participation in debate. I do not think it is acceptable.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—ASSURANCE OF FAIR RETURN TO PRODUCERS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. According to the report prepared by the Ontario Food Council, the processing mark-up on beef is now 2 cents more than it was previous to the beef price rise last spring. Formerly it was 17 cents and now it is 19 cents. My question is: Is the minister contemplating any action to ensure that beef producers get their fair share of the consumer beef dollar?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions we have expressed our concern and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has also expressed his concern over the difference between the price to the producer and the final retail price.

HOUSING

BUILDING SOCIETIES—REQUEST FOR FAVOURABLE TAX TREATMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Just over a week ago I asked the minister a question relating to building societies. At that time he did not have the answer to my question. Since he has now had an opportunity to meet representatives from the province of Ontario, I wonder if he would care to make a statement about the government's intentions in this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should think that the statement ought to be made on motions, unless the minister has a short answer.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can answer the question very briefly. I met Mr. Randall, told him to submit further details to the government through the minister in charge of housing and said that we would, of course, consider any specific proposals he might bring forward.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are we to infer that the minister is bending a sympathetic ear to the request of the province?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, there has been no specific request.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WASHINGTON DEMONSTRATION—CANCELLATION BY MURRAY HILL OF ARRANGEMENTS TO SUPPLY BUSES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister following my question of yesterday. Is he in a position to say anything further about the circumstances under which Murray Hill Limousine Service Limited cancelled certain arrangements it had made to supply buses for trips from points in the United States to Washington?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The question was conveyed to departments and I understand inquiries are still being made. I have received no information yet by way of reply.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS, AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES

The House resumed from Thursday, November 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray: that Bill C-7, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although I believe there are approximately ten minutes of my time left, I believe in my remarks last night I made the main points I wanted to express with regard to this country's transportation policy. Therefore, I will not launch into a further speech at this point. I just want to make one statement in order to urge something that I feel is very important.

We have before us legislation respecting the financing of the Canadian National Railways. We have this before us at a time when the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway have made applications to abandon most, if not all, of their passenger services. The point I want to make is related to a question I asked a few days ago, namely that the hearings before the Canadian Transport Commission on this issue should be public. This request has already been made by unions representing some of the employees who work for the railways. Surely we all agree that this issue is one that concerns the workers, communities and citizens of this country generally. I urge the government to use its good offices to see to it that the hearings on this very important question are held in public.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, we have to day before us another railway bill. This has become somewhat routine in the last few years since a similar bill has been introduced every session.

In fact, for several years now, the Canadian National Railways have been facing the same problems and every year, the government introduces almost similar bills which do not bring any answer to the problems facing this Crown Corporation.

Recently the CNR and the CPR have made representations in order to be granted permission to abandon a number of passenger services. The people of my area which I represent are particularly concerned with this application.

Among the services to be abandoned are those of the Abitibi and Lake St. John regions which are serviced by the CNR.

Among the other services which would fall victim to this measure are those between Montreal and Vancouver.

The justification for such applications lies in the losses incurred which are due to the fact that passengers are gradually discarding that means of transportation.

When we start considering how the CNR is run, we discover that there are far too many officials in this company and too few executives.

I have here before me an application which was made two or three years ago by agencies operating in the small northwestern town of Quebec where I live, I mean La Sarre. This application was made in the light of the fact that some other towns in this area such as Amos, Rouyn-Noranda, Val d'Or, Malartic and Senneterre enjoy free parcel delivery service, provided by the CNR, while La Sarre is excluded. The people of La Sarre were entitled to the same service provided in other communities, since this is a profitable service.

Therefore, I made representations to the CNR in order to get the same service for La Sarre. Here is the answer I received in a letter from Quebec, dated April 16, 1968 and signed by Mr. L. M. Poitevin, director of the Quebec area. I quote:

> In our answer dated September 26, 1967, we pointed out that according to a check of the volume of small shipments, there had been a fairly substantial decrease compared to the 1965 volume and also a decrease in comparison with 1966. We also said we wished to see the effect that the new rates coming into force at the beginning of September 1967 would have on volume. We added that a fairly substantial increase in shipments in La Sarre would be desirable in order to prove that the collecting and distributing service free of charge, but which would entail great expenditures, would still be profitable.

The ridiculous side of it all is that the CNR insist upon the patrons being sufficient in number before granting them services, while in private enterprise, it is quite the opposite. Good service is provided to people so that they will become customers.

While private enterprise gets good results through this method, public enterprise will not use it. It would like to be sure to have customers before offering them services. It is not surprising that the Canadian public, as much in Abitibi as elsewhere, should shun the services of the CNR which is thus pursuing a cheese-paring policy.

We find again the same situation in the passenger service on the line to Abitibi. To save money, the Montreal-Abitibi and Montreal-Lac Saint-Jean services have been merged through a transfer point at Hervey-Jonction. Then, there is complete disregard for the people who want to go to Abitibi or to the Lac Saint-Jean and come back.

And when the travelling public uses other means of transportation the company claims a deficit or a lack of users to abandon the service.

I think that any petition aimed at abandoning a service is really an application for subsidies. I ask the government to consider carefully the CNR application.

The annual report of the CNR for 1968 is full of interesting comments and figures.

In Bill C-7, the minister asks for the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the CNR system in Canada and Air Canada.

If the CN shows a deficit in some of its services, would it not be appropriate to investigate a little its financing methods?

The report emphasizes the fact that the operating revenues—rail operations, hotels and telecommunications operations and so on for the year 1968—showed a surplus of $41.2 million but because of the way it is run the CN had to pay $70.4 million in interest for that same year which turned a $41 million surplus into a $29.2 million deficit.

When we, of the Ralliement créditiste, ask as we have been doing for a long time, that publicly-owned companies at the federal, provincial and municipal levels, be financed interest-free by the Bank of Canada, some government members find our contention ridiculous.

However, such an approach would make it possible for the Crown corporations to show operating surpluses, instead of constantly operating in the red as they do now, because of the orthodox way in which the government finances its own Crown corporations.

We know that when the government bought the bonds of the CNR—its own company—it did so with borrowed money. The CNR pays 4 per cent interest on the bonds bought by the government of Canada. The revenue from the recent sale of bonds—the amount mentioned in the bill is $82 million—will be used to redeem bonds that have reached maturity. What are we to think then of the publicity in the newspapers and over the radio—which costs thousands of dollars—according to which the government is offering the "best ever" bonds? Those bonds bear an interest of 8¼. Money is borrowed from the public to grant a loan of $82 million to the C.N.R., at 4 per cent interest. Talk about a deal!

This is standard management practice: no wonder the government is always in the red.

On the last page of the CNR report, there is a complete list of statistics for the last 25 years which indicate that the CNR had profits for 6 years and losses for 19 due to the interest payments. Over the last 25 year-period, the CNR paid $1,240,990,000 in interest on its debt.

Mr. Speaker, we know that interest, through the federal government, was channelled back, not to the government, but to those who lend money to the government, which in turn lends it to the CNR.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that that procedure is not only ridiculous but criminal. Some find the Créditistes proposals ridiculous, but I claim that this orthodox way of financing public services is criminal, because money is taken from the individuals and given to the various loan companies.

If the government financed the expenditures of the Canadian National Railways, Air Canada and the St. Lawrence Seaway—all three are in the same situation—through interest-free loans from the Bank of Canada, it would be possible to reduce passenger or freight rates or increase the wages of the employees of those companies. Thus, everyone would be satisfied, which is not the case today.

One provision of Bill C-7 provides for a sum of $19 million to be used for the construction of branch lines by the CNR Therefore, I would ask the Minister without portfolio who sponsors the bill, where the CNR intends to build branch lines.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I have been told that the CNR intends to build a branch line from Matagami to James Bay. I would like to ask the minister whether it is true and when the construction of that branch line is anticipated?

This is why I say that the bill should be referred to the committee, in order to be thoroughly studied.

The management of the Crown Corporations is not satisfactory and should be improved. I ask the government to take as soon as possible the necessary measures and not to introduce such bills every year—since that does not solve the problems of Crown Corporations—but a legislation to enable the Crown Corporations to serve the public in the best interests of the nation.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I must avail myself of this opportunity today to refer briefly to railway companies, and especially to the CN in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean region.

I know that this bill deals with the annual financing of CN operations and that it is not necessarily the right time to discuss all the policies of this company.

As it was announced recently that passenger services were to be dropped in our region and in other parts of Canada, I must add my voice to that of my hon. friend, the member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), since both our regions have already been affected by a recent decision of the CN.

The region of Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean, with its population of some 300,000 inhabitants, has only one railway service. In our region, there is no competition between the CN and the CP. The CN cannot therefore claim that competition prevented it from making any profit in the past.

If now the CN sees fit to reduce its passenger service because it is no longer patronized to the same extent as before, it is the first to blame, because in the past 15 years, the service has been getting worse all the time.

At present, to travel from the Saguenay region to Montreal, a distance of 300 miles, one has to spend more than 12 hours in CN trains.

How can you expect the public to support such a service? In short, if there is any competition in the area, it is within the CN. The company is striving by every means to make its service as unattractive as possible, as though some genius in their administration were trying to plan the service in such a way that people will give it up as soon as possible.

Let us, for instance, look at the sleeping-car service. The train only has one sleeping-car. Can it be used? Hardly, because during the past three years, the price of single roomettes has increased from $5 to $10, a double roomette now costs $20, just to spend a few hours in a bed. Moreover passengers are jostled from side to side which makes it difficult to sleep, because the line is in such a poor condition. How then can the public be expected to make use of the CN passenger service?

Mr. Speaker, my area is served by Quebecair and Air Canada. There are also bus services and we have good roads, but nevertheless, some people still travel by train and will do so as long as possible.

If this company treated its customers better, I am sure things would turn out differently. As a matter of fact, the experience has already been made. A few years ago, a Mr. Delagrave had been appointed vice president in charge of CN passenger service. He had taken it upon himself to increase the number of passengers travelling on the CN, and he actually achieved his goal. But in view of this man's achievement, the authorities make life impossible for him in order to force him to seek employment elsewhere. So he left the CN and now works for another company, because he realized that his policy was totally at variance with that of CN authorities who obviously wanted to do away with the passenger service.

We can only oppose the policy of the Canadian National Railways designed to curtail the passenger service. I do not object to my hon. friend from Abitibi or any citizen of that part of western Quebec travelling aboard the train I am on, because I believe that is how one meets very interesting people. I am sure that the merger of services in our two areas is quite possible. However, I do not think it was necessary to lengthen the trip by an hour and a half, as is the case since both services were merged.

As far as the Lac-Saint-Jean people are concerned, we have to wait an hour and a half on the train. Such an arrangement simply indicates poor planning of the time table for the trains from Abitibi. There are no reasons for both trains, the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean line and the Abitibi line, not to arrive at the same time at Hervey-Jonction. It is a simple question of planning, but they have made it so that they shall not meet, in order that one or the other be forced to wait for an hour and a half.

In view of this, I personally object to the Canadian National Railways being granted the right to reduce or completely discontinue its services in the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean region and the Abitibi region as well.

I object to that for many reasons. Both our regions are designated areas under the government policy. They need additional assistance. If I understand the assistance policy scheme to designated areas, assistance is needed in the establishment of a substructure, in order that these regions may prove more attractive to industries interested in settling there.

Now, it is certainly not by reducing the services that exist now or by simply eliminating them as the Canadian National Railways intends to do that we are going to improve the substructure in the Saguenay-Lac-St-Jean and Abitibi regions which are designated areas, parts of which will be considered special. Then, why reduce service while other departments are trying through millions of dollars in subsidies to improve the situation and raise the employment level in these regions?

In addition to the passenger service, there is in the Saguenay, a transportation service for first class goods which must be delivered quickly. The elimination of this service will deprive certain enterprises in our region of these goods. They will have to find other ways of getting them at, of course, a higher cost.

I do not intend to delay further second reading of this bill so that it may be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications, but I join those who spoke before me in asking the government to pay close attention to the proceedings of the Canadian Transportation Commission to avoid that at this level of administration a unilateral decision be made, which would deprive Canadians of the services they are entitled to.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is almost one year ago that the last measure similar in nature and design to Bill C-7 was before the House. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) remarked last night, this bill rarely changes in form or concept. It is what could be termed an annual bill, a perfunctory measure which unfortunately in too many cases has received automatic and often swift passage through the House.

However, that does not apply this year—at least, I hope not. If my few words delay its passage a little, then I will feel I have succeeded; and I shall proceed to tell the House why I would not want the bill to go through without my having made some observations about it.

We had considerable discussion on this measure last year because at that time the people of my province were confronted with an accomplished fact, namely the abandonment by the Canadian National Railways of its rail passenger services in that province. I well recall saying at the time—my colleagues voiced similar sentiments—that there but for the grace of God go other provinces. Today, we see that other provinces are indeed going to lose all, or certainly part, of their railway passenger services. In this connection, I need only refer to the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the very impressive remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

When the legislation goes to the committee, Mr. Speaker, I hope the members of the committee will exercise the right that is theirs to examine the reasons for the decisions that have been made, and to exercise that control over the operations of railways in this country, especially the operations of the Canadian National Railways, that should be ours but which in actual fact is not. During the Committee hearings I intend to press for those reasons underlying the applications now before the Canadian Transport Commission to abandon rail passenger service in certain parts of the country. We are especially interested in my part of the country because we were the reluctant guinea pigs. They tried out this idea on us first. Perhaps the House might be interested in knowing what the position is in Newfoundland at the present time.

In accordance with the directives of the Canadian Transport Commission, the rolling stock of our rail passenger service is being held in reserve, supposedly to meet an emergency or to cope with adverse conditions brought on by weather or some other act of God which the bus services cannot handle. It is rather interesting that the old "Bullet" is not dead yet. During the recent Liberal leadership convention in Newfoundland, the Liberal party, which did so little to prevent this injustice to my province, suddenly discovered that the old "Bullet" still had one more useful function to perform. They dusted off the Pullman cars, took the boards off the windows, and used them to accommodate 200 or 300 delegates to that convention.

The premier himself, acting like the proletarian he likes to think he is, insisted that he should have an upper berth. I bet it is the first time he has had the privilege of sleeping in an upper berth, albeit a stationary one. Those who slept on the "Bullet" during the convention were boasting that they had slept on the "Bullet" with Joey. That is what became of our rail passenger service. It is being held in reserve for an act of God, and certainly the Liberal leadership convention should qualify. It could only be by Divine Providence that the Liberal party in Newfoundland finds itself in the mess it is today.

There are other aspects of the service about which we are concerned. We are concerned, for example, about the operation of the buses in Newfoundland. We want to be reassured that the bus service will be able to cope with weather conditions. We should like to know what complaints the railway is receiving from people who have to use this service. We want to know what their plans are to improve the service. We should like also to know what the intentions are regarding the coastal service in Newfoundland.

In my province, the CNR has the responsibility of providing mail and passenger service around the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador which is inaccessible by road or other modes of transportation. There are ominous signs that the railway company would like to discontinue this service as well; in fact, the wheels have already been set in motion. Two of the ships that were providing this service to the constituency represented by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) have been sold, with the result that today the people using the service, the only means by which one can travel along that south coast of Newfoundland, have to be piled in like cattle. There is no berth accommodation and there is no seating accommodation. Last summer I saw women and children literally sitting on the floor because the two vessels now are inadequate. The railway company knows this, as does the Minister of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission, yet nobody seems inclined to do anything about it. I serve notice on the CNR that I want answers to some of these questions.

I should like to know what the future is, if any, of the East Coast ferry service which was provided in accordance with the terms of union. It is now operating between eastern Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. There have been suggestions, indeed charges have been made, that this service is purposely being downgraded by the railway company. This complaint does not relate to the services offered, because this vessel provides excellent services. The service is being downgraded in respect of promotion and advertising. It seems to be the best kept secret in this country that there is a 10,000 ton vessel operating between Argentia, Newfoundland and Sydney, Nova Scotia, and that this vessel does in fact save at least 500 miles of driving. There is no evidence that this excellent service is promoted and there is no evidence of advertising. There have actually been cases of people applying in Sydney for passage over to Newfoundland who have been told the only way to get there was by crossing over from Sydney to Port-Aux-Basques and that there was no way of avoiding the long drive across Newfoundland. We should like to know why the railway company is not promoting or advertising this service.

More particularly, we should like to know why the rates are so high for this service. It costs $50 to put your car on this boat. By the time you pay for your own ticket, berth accommodation and meals it costs you about $100. Who can afford to use this service which is provided for tourists? No tourist is going to spend $100 when he knows he can save perhaps $50 by taking that long drive across Newfoundland. The railway company has made no move toward reducing the rates. I maintain the rates should be reduced by at least 25 per cent. There is very strong evidence that the company intends to remove this vessel from this service and place it in service elsewhere. We should like to know why this service is not promoted and why the railway company has not accepted recommendations from many people and organizations such as boards of trade, members of parliament and the travelling public to reduce the rates. A 25 per cent reduction would certainly have the effect of increasing the traffic and consequently would offset any loss of revenue. We want to know what the future of this service is and we want to be assured that this undertaking by the government of Canada, cemented as it is in the terms of union, will be carried out.

There is another matter of tremendous importance to Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces. It is so important and has such a tremendous effect on the cost of living and the inflationary trend that I am surprised it has not been alluded to by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). I refer to the lifting of the freeze on freight rates in the Atlantic provinces, in eastern Quebec or that area covered by the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I refer also to the consequential 11 per cent increase in rates announced the day after the freeze was lifted. Perhaps the record should note that this lifting of the freeze and the consequential increase in rates by the railway company—in other words this action on the part of the government—was contrary to the recommendations of the Atlantic premiers, contrary to the recommendations of the Maritime Transportation Commission, and contrary to the recommendations of boards of trade, shippers and almost everyone in the Atlantic provinces.

What did the Atlantic premiers have to say about this action in a statement released by the four premiers of the Atlantic provinces in March of this year? On page 23 of their statement, we read this:

• (12:50 p.m.)

> The reasons for the establishment of the freeze in the first instance are just as valid today as when the National Transportation Act was passed by Parliament. The Atlantic Provinces recommend, therefore, that the Federal Government take the necessary steps either by legislation or by agreement to maintain the freeze on Atlantic Provinces rail rates until such time as the new regional transportation policy is effected.

Of course, they are referring to the long awaited, many times promised, new policy on Atlantic transportation. That is what the four premiers recommended just a few months ago, yet the decision of the government, effective in September, was completely contrary to their recommendations. How did the premiers react when they learned that their recommendations to the federal government were totally and completely disregarded by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), and by his colleagues in the federal government? Their reaction was one of dismay, incredulity and shock. I shall quote now from the Globe and Mail of September 26:

> Premiers protest rate freeze
> The Atlantic Premiers Conference meeting here yesterday termed the federal government's decision to lift the Atlantic Provinces freight rate freeze as being "in conflict with the underlying philosophy of the federal Government's announced policy toward the alleviation of regional disparity."
> A strongly worded statement released at the end of the day-long meeting said the conference "vigorously protests the unilateral decision," which was made "without prior consultation with the governments of the Atlantic Provinces."

The story goes on to say that the premiers, to put it mildly, were surprised. They saw this action for what it was and were not hesitant in saying that this was a unilateral decision, without consultation with the Atlantic provinces, notwithstanding the fact that this government, the Minister of Transport and the other ministers from the Atlantic provinces knew full well the effect that a lifting of the freeze would have. They knew it would have a consequential effect in the form of a boost in the rates charged by the railways. These freight rate increases contribute greatly to the increased cost of living and the inflation which is already taking such a toll on the people who live in the regionally depressed areas of this country. What does the Evening Telegram say about it? In an editorial dated September 23 it termed this decision as a last straw. The lead editorial had this to say:

> Just in case things weren't bad enough in Newfoundland's cost of living another jolt is on the way. The freight rate for goods moving to this province is to be increased by 11 per cent beginning today.

Now we are told the freeze was lifted and the railways were permitted to increase the rates because the subsidies under the MFRA would be applied to the trucking industry under the new legislation. That is fine except for the fact—and the Minister of Transport knows this better than anyone—that there is no trucking into Newfoundland because the truckers cannot afford to pay the exorbitant freight rates across the gulf or on the east coast ferry, rates which were set to prevent the trucking industry from providing competition for the railways. So, there is no truck transportation of any consequence going into Newfoundland such as in the other three maritime provinces. Therefore, when the Minister of Transport tells the truckers to cut their freight rates, this has no meaning at all for us. It makes no difference whether they reduce their rates or increase them; we are still dependent to a very large extent on rail transportation.

In speaking of the trucking industry, my colleague the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) referred earlier today to the recently announced increase in trucking rates right across the country. This is the answer to the Minister of Transport from the trucking industry in the Atlantic provinces. He tells them the freeze has been taken off so that the railways will be happy. He tells them they have been given a subsidy to keep them happy, and then says to them that now they should play ball so that competition will be more properly distributed. He tells them to play ball with us and reduce the rates. Now, however, the rates are going up all across the country, and particularly in the Atlantic provinces because the truckers have their cake and can eat it too. They are receiving a subsidy under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and, in addition, are increasing their rates. The railways are happy because the freeze is lifted and they are permitted to raise their rates. Today, their rates are 11 per cent higher than they were before the freeze took place.

Every report I can find, and all the editorials by senior editors who have commented on this situation, contain the same opinion. Perhaps this opinion can best be summed up by reading a brief quotation from the Saint John Daily News of September 26:

> All this must be intimately related to the problem of regional economic disparity.

We have enough problems already in the Atlantic provinces. We also suffer the consequences of our geographical and regional disparity. These include the high cost of living, the excessively high unemployment and the continuing problem of excessively high freight rates. Now, we look to the government for some succour, for some relief. We look to the Minister of Transport who presents himself as the great spokesman for the Atlantic provinces. We look to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) and all the ministers from the Atlantic provinces. We look to the Minister without Portfolio and we look to the Prime Minister and his just society for some relief.

[Mr. McGrath.]

What do we get? We get a unilateral decision made by this government without consultation with either the Atlantic provinces, the Maritime Transportation Commission or anybody. They unilaterally break faith with the people of the Atlantic provinces by announcing a lifting of the freeze and by permitting the railways to increase their rates by 11 per cent, thereby adding to the already unbearable burden the people of the Atlantic provinces must carry because of the consequences of excessively high transportation rates.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment for lunch I was outlining to the House the disastrous effects on the economy and on the people of the Atlantic provinces of the government's decision to lift the freeze on freight rates and the consequential 11 per cent increase in the freight rates by the railways. During my remarks I referred to the brief entitled "The Basic Elements of an Atlantic Provinces Transportation Policy" which was presented in March to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) by the four premiers of the Atlantic provinces, in which certain specific recommendations were made to which the government arbitrarily refused to adhere. I referred to the government's attitude toward this brief and the reaction of the four premiers following the lifting of the freeze and the increase in the rates.

Now, I would like to refer to the reaction of the Maritime Transportation Commission and I should like to quote the Canadian Press dispatch of September 23, part of which reads as follows:

> Craig Dickson, chairman of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, said in Moncton August 22 that shippers throughout the Atlantic provinces will face rail freight increases of between 9 and 18 per cent.
> Mr. Dickson said the federal government should not have lifted the freeze until a comprehensive regional transportation policy for the Atlantic area had been implemented.

This is the reaction of the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, which is very similar to the recommendations of the four Atlantic premiers and similar indeed to all the recommendations and briefs of various groups in the Atlantic regions, such as boards of trade and chambers of commerce, with regard to the lifting of the freeze and the increase in the rates.

The board of trade in my own province of Newfoundland reacted very adversely. As a matter of fact, they suggested that the government had broken faith. I should like to quote from the dispatch in the St. John's Daily News of October 8, 1969, part of which reads as follows:

> The executive of the Newfoundland Board of Trade, A. G. Ayre said the Board was given to understand that the "freeze" would remain in effect until March 23 of next year—

That is 1970.

> —unless a more suitable rate formula for this area was forthcoming.
>
> Mr. Ayre pointed out that the Board of Trade is still waiting replies to its request to the Federal Minister of Transport, Hon. Don Jamieson. Apart from seeking information as to what action was taken to retain the freight rate "freeze," the reason for its removal was also requested.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Feelings in the Atlantic provinces on this matter are unanimous. These feelings are shared by responsible bodies in the Atlantic provinces, including the premiers and therefore the government of the four provinces, the Atlantic Transportation Commission, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, interested citizens and members of parliament with, of course, the notable exceptions of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen). The feeling is unanimous, yet the government elects to ignore it.

We were given to believe, and it was reasonable for us to expect, that with the appointment of the former minister of Transport, Mr. Pickersgill, as Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission and with the appointment of the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) as his successor as Minister of Transport, that at long last the importance of our plight would be understood. Arrangements must be made to hold the line on freight rates in the Atlantic region until the government announces its long-awaited and much heralded promise of a policy on Atlantic transportation.

The freeze has been lifted and the rates have been increased. Since Mr. Pickersgill became Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission, Newfoundland has lost its rail passenger service and is losing its coastal service. The maritime provinces are going to lose their rail passenger service into St. John's if the CPR has its way. The Minister of Transport, who is the new spokesman in the cabinet for the Atlantic provinces, instead of having some feeling and understanding of the problem, goes contrary to every responsible position taken by the governments of the four Atlantic provinces, and the Transportation Commission as well as all other interested bodies in the area. It seems evident, Mr. Speaker, that the Atlantic area of Canada would be much better off today if somebody other than Mr. Pickersgill were Chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission and if somebody other than the member for Burin-Burgeo were Minister of Transport.

I like the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that perhaps this House should refuse to vote this money until there is some pronouncement from the government respecting the future of rail passenger service in this country and, in particular, the transportation policy for the Atlantic provinces. I, for one, would be prepared to exercise that right under the proper circumstances or at least reduce the vote to $1. Perhaps then Canadian National Railways would not approach this House every year with their usual cavalier attitude, and perhaps the government would not take it for granted that the House would, in the usual perfunctory way, approve and pass the bill. Mr. Speaker, if the opportunity is given me I shall, at an appropriate time, move to refuse the grant.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, we are being asked to allocate funds for the Canadian National Railways and Air Canada, but I suggest that if the example set last winter by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in connection with the movement of grain from the prairies to Vancouver is typical, instead of increasing the grant we should fire the management for doing such a poor job of running their business.

In Saskatchewan, and on the prairies, we still have a mountain of wheat. Surely, only the present Liberal government with its extraordinary ability to organize could arrange things so that there would not be any grain in Vancouver when ships were there to move it. It is time this government realized they are short on organizing talent. If we complain, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) or even the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) can give 20 reasons for failure. This is just not good enough.

If the railways want more money, they must operate more efficiently. For instance, let us look at the set-up here. The bill is introduced by the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor, (Mr. Gray), acting for the Department of Finance. The Department of Transport looks after railways and in so far as grain is concerned, a subminister was appointed to look after this particular item. So, we have three different government departments supervising one function, the movement of grain. In addition the Wheat Board, the Winnipeg grain exchange and elevator companies and the railroads are involved in this movement. Now surely, Mr. Speaker, the involvement of all these departments and agencies, without sufficient coordination, is enough to ensure that farmers get the run-around.

Recently, I received a letter from a housewife about an item which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, and I shall read it:

> In today's issue of the Winnipeg Free Press an article stated that a large order of flax had been diverted to the States because there was none on hand at the Lakehead. An importer of flax said our transportation system was scandalous.
> This is an unbelievable situation, one that makes you want to sit down and cry! We're combining flax today and wondering where to put it. We haven't been able to haul in a single bushel of flax as the elevators have been plugged, of course, since spring.

This was dry flax which could have been moved by the railway but was not. What is the government doing to ensure that the railway system is properly organized? Is anyone in charge of this particular responsibility of government, Mr. Speaker? I know that the Minister without Portfolio from Windsor prides himself on being a businessman and knowing something about organization, but if he is going to handle this area of the government's responsibility I hope he manages to do something specific.

I should like to read one more paragraph from this letter, Mr. Speaker, and it is in the form of a direct question of the minister:

> Who on earth is responsible for directing traffic and what is it with these box cars?

The letter is from a Mrs. Coulter of Stranraer, Saskatchewan. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) for his intiative in at least trying to do something about box car distribution on the prairies. He is the only one on the other side of the House who seems to have any real idea of what this is all about. However, if a meeting is to be called I am not so sure that it should be a private meeting with the Minister of Transport leaning on railway officials, thereby ensuring that it is really a Liberal meeting. I believe that a committee composed of members from all parties in the House or an agricultural committee meeting would be a little more fair. However, I do give the hon. member for Assiniboia credit for realizing that there are problems in this area and that something must be done. If the minister in charge were half as interested, perhaps we would have had a little action by now.

• (2:20 p.m.)

A new system has been inaugurated with regard to shipping grain, the block system. Hopefully, this system will be an improvement and will ensure a more efficient distribution of box cars and a more efficient movement of grain. I have talked with several people who are involved at the local level with this particular system for the allocation of box cars. Since it is new, they are not prepared to comment on it one way or another. They say, "We are very optimistic about it; it will solve problems in certain areas but, apart from that, we prefer to reserve judgment." That is my position, Mr. Speaker, also. I commend responsible officials for this new idea. It is a new approach and may be successful in solving problems. At any rate, we see here evidence of initiative and energy on the part of our officials.

I suggest that the operation of our present facilities could be better managed and coordinated. A great many box cars are allocated to the movement of grain, yet there are indications that these box cars are not being adequatedly used. Many stay at sidings much longer than necessary and, as a result, cannot deliver grain at the lakehead or the west coast when that grain is needed. If some of these new ideas work, if we introduce unit trains and bigger box cars, then other commodities as well as grain will benefit. We shall move them more readily.

May I say something more in connection with the movement of grain? Surely to goodness, it is possible for our responsible people to be more farsighted about possible grain sales and have requisite grades of grain in forward positions, ready for sale. We should have in forward positions flax, requisite grades of grain, and so on. Last spring the committee, while on a tour of agriculture in western Canada, stopped at a grain terminal in Vancouver. Please remember, Mr. Speaker, this was after the winter during which we had so much trouble in agriculture. What did we find? We found that even in April the terminal was short of a particular variety of grain for which there was a demand. This is intolerable, especially when there are still so many varieties of grain for sale on the prairies. I hope the minister applies himself to solving this problem. I hope that activities in this area will be better managed and co-ordinated than they are today.

May I now comment on the subject of rail line abandonment? There are several lines which may be abandoned in my area. In particular, I am thinking of one area where there is a main railway line along one side of a river and on the other side a branch line. The authorities are proposing to abandon the branch line. Whoever built the branch line in the first place showed poor judgment—but that was not your fault, Mr. Speaker, nor mine. The question is, what are we to do about this? I suggest that instead of paying subsidies forever to the railway to enable them to run branch lines, the more practical approach would be for us to build a bridge across the river at a point where the bridge could best serve those who would be hurt most by the removal of the branch line. Then the branch line could be removed without anyone being hurt too much. Instead of paying subsidies to the railways to operate branch lines, I suggest the federal government might consider providing alternative methods of transportation. In the example I cited just now, a new bridge might provide a good way out of an awkward situation.

In other circumstances, perhaps a federal grant for a grid road system would solve the problem created by the abandonment of a branch line. Instead of continuing subsidies, perhaps the government might consider granting provincial authorities funds for the building of highways. Construction of highways would permit grain to be moved and the branch line would no longer be needed. Some of these alternatives would be acceptable in solving the problems created by rail line abandonment. Nevertheless, before significant numbers of branch lines are abandoned, I think an over-all plan should be worked out so that we can determine which lines will remain useful in the long run and which ones ought to be abandoned. I do not think the authorities should merely come to us and say, "Your branch line is to be abandoned." I would not agree to anything like that unless specific alternative means of transportation could be introduced to take the place of the branch line. As I said, the government ought to look at some of the alternatives open to it and do a little horse-trading. It could say, "We will help the railway remove this particular line, but we will offer you something specific in exchange for the abandoned line." That help might take the form of assistance to municipalities or provincial governments in the building of roads; or, the railway itself might be assisted in some way.

I have cited a number of areas in the transportation field that need particular attention. Now, I should like to deal briefly with something else that relates to box cars and grain handling. This morning's Globe and Mail referred to arguments between two departments of the government. In case anyone argues that the article in my hand is not related in any way to the question of railways, may I make the humble suggestion that it is. If the two departments of government mentioned cannot evolve an over-all policy for shipping grain, how on earth are we to expect the railways to evolve a consistent, organized and ideal method of moving it? The article in question refers to the Department of Industry and the Department of Agriculture, and reads in part:

> Rivalry between the grains divisions of these two departments has retarded development of an over-all grains policy—

I suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or the Minister without Portfolio might lean on their colleagues to ensure that something specific is done towards solving this awkward problem facing western Canada. I do not know whether either minister is aware of how awkward the problem of handling prairie grain is, but I am sure they are both interested in making sure that the government operates efficiently and in an organized way. I am sure both ministers will consider the matter in this light.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this legislation for the financing of the Canadian National immediately raises the question of a railway company's behaviour and how that squares with its obligation to the public. The implications of the recent request by both of Canada's major railways for wholesale abandonment of passenger service across the country are of tremendous national importance. They expose the very core of one of the greatest challenges our modern society faces, the challenge of providing transportation that is swift, economical and adequate.

At this time, I am more interested in the implications for the province of Manitoba arising from specific requests for abandonment of passenger services by both railroads—requests which, if granted, could deal a heavy social and economic blow to central and northern Manitoba. We have the Canadian Pacific Railway's request to abandon all passenger service, including the transcontinental service. Winnipeg is a vital point on the route. I am more particularly concerned about the Canadian National's request to suspend passenger service on the Winnipeg-Dauphin-The Pas-Gillam-Churchill run and on the Wabowden-Gillam-Churchill line. I agree that it is unfair and unrealistic for us to compel a system such as the Canadian National to operate at a deficit of more than $3 million a year, which is the loss claimed on the Winnipeg-Churchill service. The Canadian National, after all, is a publicly owned system that came into existence in the public interest after an amalgamation of a group of bankrupt railway companies. It is true that it has been a charge on the public purse ever since, and has received assistance from the public purse.

But the Canadian National Railway is in a very different position from the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway which received many great concessions from the people of Canada that enabled it to make tremendous profits over the years in lines of endeavour other than railway passenger service. For this reason, I believe the two groups of applications must be considered entirely separate. In my opinion, the CNR is using its applications to abandon passenger service on 13 runs across the country more as a signal for help than with the serious intent of dropping service.

The CPR, on the other hand, obviously wants out of the whole passenger carrying chore because it is no longer profitable. This railway wants the public that gave it the concessions which led to tremendous corporate development and handsome profits over the years to now allow it to get out of the obligations that were the reason for the concessions in the first place. These concessions included $25 million in cash before the turn of the century, plus 25 million acres of land. It was these concessions, given in return for a transcontinental rail line, that permitted the CPR to build hotels, get into land deals, mining and smelting and airlines, not to mention the very lucrative freight haulage business.

There is an excellent editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune of November 11 that deals with specific concessions given the CPR by Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg. In the matter of real property taxes, the CPR was given a perpetual exemption. Lawyers and management for the CPR have always argued that this original bargain should be kept. They are meticulous in making what payments they choose to make as an act of grace, not as a legal obligation. The CPR part of the bargain that led to these generous tax concessions was to supply rail service. What is sauce of the goose must be sauce for the gander. If the CPR expects the Canadian people and their various governments to abide strictly by the original bargain, then surely the CPR should be willing to abide by it.

Both railways have over the years been subsidized for losses incurred in supplying what are deemed to be necessary public services. This system is in the process of change, but the principle is still recognized and will be continued. In the light of this principle and the original bargain struck, I think the barefaced proposal of the CPR to pull out of all passenger service is farcical and insulting.

To return to my immediate concern which is Manitoba, and particularly the social and economic life of central and northern Manitoba, I believe the CNR should not be allowed to simply drop all passenger service to places such as Thompson, The Pas and Churchill, not to mention Dauphin and other centres. Although advances have been made in bus and air travel, the fact remains that there are many people who still prefer rail travel or, indeed, cannot use any other mode. They may not exist in sufficient numbers to make the service economically sound, but that is not a valid excuse for dropping that service. It is a necessary public service and should be regarded as such. If money is needed to sustain it, this should be forthcoming from the public purse. I have often suspected that to strengthen the economic argument the railways, the CPR at least, have deliberately discouraged passengers through poor and awkward service. This sort of thing is really not good enough when we consider the vital importance of transportation to national development and to meeting some of the tremendous problems of our modern urbanized and far-flung society.

In my opinion, the Canadian Transport Commission cannot possibly consent to these applications in their present form and still pretend to be protecting the public interest. I would rather see the CTC admit that there is little likelihood of necessary passenger service ever being economically profitable and start examining the problem, not negatively by allowing cancellations, but positively by looking for ways to make them economically sound. If both railways realized that they were in the passenger carrying business to stay, they might assist in positive research.

I have in mind such things as pioneering more modern, smaller passenger units. This has been done to a limited extent in the Toronto and Montreal areas where commuter business is the only paying passenger business the railways have. There are the Montreal commuter runs, the Rapido between Toronto and Montreal and the provincial government's commuter trains in and around metro Toronto. Something of this spirit should be carried into provincial, interprovincial and transcontinental travel.

In Britain, the government and British Railways are spending some $30 million in developing a high-speed, modern passenger train. When we consider that it takes an estimated $20 million to develop a new automobile and approximately $32 million to build a mile or so of elevated expressway, surely this amount of money spent on development and use of existing rail lines might well be a better investment of public money. We are going to have to transport more and more people every year, not fewer. We are going to have to pour more and more public money into providing assistance to provinces and communities to help to meet this problem of passenger transportation. It might be wise to look at what facilities already exist and what use may be made of them by adaption and improvement before we pour out money to construct new facilities that too often only add to the tangle, and complicate and aggravate the problem.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like simply to make the strongest protest, first, against the blanket proposal of the CPR to abandon all passenger service and, second, against the application of the CNR to isolate central and northern Manitoba from the mainstream of provincial and national life by dropping passenger service on the Winnipeg-Churchill line and its subsidiaries. Financing the CNR is an annual necessity, but it should be done with a clear restatement of the company's obligation to the Canadian public.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to make a few comments on the bill before us. Before doing so, I wish to endorse the comments made generally by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) when he was talking about the Canadian Pacific Railway.

At the outset, I wish to say I am quite disturbed by the recent activities of the CPR in attempting to drop as much passenger service as possible. We must look back to 1881 when the Canadian Pacific Railway Act was passed in this House. In that Act, we find many of the concessions that were given to the company at that time. Among these concessions were $25 million in money, which I remind hon. members was worth much more then than now. They were given a huge parcel of land and certain mineral concessions as well. In return for these, Canadian Pacific promised the people of Canada they would provide passenger service on an everlasting basis. We must ensure that this company continues to keep that promise to the people of Canada.

I am somewhat disturbed by recent indications that the Canadian National Railways wants to abandon some of its passenger services as well. The citizens all across Canada will need these services for many years to come.

The bill before us is similar to bills which have been presented to this House for many years to finance the operations of Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. Instead of just presenting this bill every year, Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the government talk about transportation policy, a policy which needs to be changed and needs to be flexible in our vast and ever-changing world.

There is one difference in the bill presented this year. If I understand correctly, the CNR is no longer handling money for Air Canada. I ask the minister, when he makes his remarks later this afternoon, to clarify this point. What does this actually mean? Why is the CNR no longer the middle man for Air Canada? Does this mean that Air Canada is going to be moving more and more toward decreasing public control of its operations? We have noticed suggestions to this effect in the press already.

I wish to quote from an article which appeared in the Financial Post of November 1, 1969. The headline reads, "Air Canada Wants to Win Confidence of Investors". I quote:

The exact shape of Air Canada's corporate financial future remains to be thrashed out between the airline and the government.

But in the meantime, as Air Canada's chairman and chief executive officer Yves Pratt puts it, Canada's largest airline is moving steadily toward becoming more profit-oriented.

The target is to get the company's earning picture up to the point where investors and lending institutions would consider it an attractive investment proposition. And that, it is generally held, means a return on investment of perhaps 10 per cent. Last year, a good one for Air Canada with a profit of $8.2 million turned up a return of 6.3 per cent.

• (2:40 p.m.)

When the minister replies I should like him to clarify this portion of the bill, because I think it is most important. The railways talk about getting out of their obligation to provide passenger service, and one of the reasons they give is that it is a losing proposition. Air Canada is making a profit. Let us make sure it continues to be publicly owned and that it is not sold to private interests.

At this point, I should like to quote from another article which I believe helps to emphasize the point I am trying to make. This is taken from the Gazette, of April 2, 1969, and the headline reads: "Air Canada Doubles Profit, Raises Rate of Return."

Air Canada had a net income of $8,184,000 in 1968, the sixth year in which it has shown a profit and double that reported in 1967, Transport Minister Paul Hellyer announced Tuesday.

The Crown-owned airline will need more than $300,000,000 in outside financing, however, to buy new equipment and property in the next five years, it was stated in the company's report tabled by Mr. Hellyer in the Commons.

The 1968 profit was the 15th for the airline in the last 18 years. It represented a return on investment of 6.3 per cent—up from 5.2 per cent the previous year.

A profit of $3,547,000 was reported during Canada's centennial year.

It is obvious that the airline is more than paying its way.

I should like to make one or two further brief comments before I close. First of all, I believe we must look at the transport situation generally and outline some of the basic objectives we wish to achieve. Above all, transportation in this country ought to be regarded as a service at all times. It must be run with social awareness and responsibility; it must be responsive to the needs of people in whatever part of Canada they live, whether the maritimes or on the prairies or in some industrial city. In addition, the transport system must be run as cheaply as possible, and in terms not of making a profit but of providing a service to the country. It must be highly efficient, and this means schedules which allow people to move as fast and as cheaply as possible.

One might ask how it would be possible to provide such a system in this country. First, it should, in my view, be publicly owned by the people of this country because only in this way would it be possible to draft a detailed and realistic plan for transportation in Canada. In the case of a publicly owned system, we could have some say as to the manner in which it should be set up, the rates which are charged, and so on. I believe that under public ownership the operation would be more efficient. Arrangements could be made for flights to smaller communities on a more regular basis, and schedules would correspond to the needs of the people much more closely than they do at present.

I wish to say a few words, now, about regional carriers; perhaps the minister could comment on this aspect when he replies. Let me say at the outset that I should like to see the regional carriers integrated as closely as possible with Air Canada and the domestic nation wide airline already in existence. If this were done, greater service to our people would result and I hope it is the intention of the government to encourage action on these lines. Regional carriers should be approved only when it is absolutely necessary to do so; if Air Canada can fly into the areas concerned it should provide the service there.

In conclusion, let me say this: to me, it appears the government is seeking to decrease public ownership in the transportation field by using the back door, and I would ask the minister to comment on this aspect of the legislation before us when he replies.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I wish to take the opportunity offered by this debate to put on record a few remarks about transportation matters in general, though I shall address myself in particular, of course, to the bill for second reading and reference to the committee with which we are now dealing.

Last night the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) dealt very ably with the overall transportation picture. He dealt, also, with this request for increased funds for Air Canada, and I was pleased to note that he made extensive reference to the efforts which have lately been made to make the corporation independent of the government. As we know, there is provision here for a method by which the corporation can obtain its own funds through the issuance of bonds. Many of us on this side have advocated for years, both in the House and in committee, that the company should be given an opportunity to stand on its own two feet, separate from the government, and compete with CPA and the other airlines of the world.

We believe this is a good corporation. We believe there are some disadvantages in its being tied to the government, and we hope that the measure of independence for which provision is made in these proposals will be expended further and that the day will come when Air Canada can become a separately-owned company with stock available to the public in some way.

A few months ago there was considerable talk about various reports which were to be made to the government. I recall that the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) was commissioned to deal with some sort of study concerning the question of Air Canada financing and the possibility of making the company a separate entity. I hope the minister, when he replies, will tell us about these reports: are they available, and what exactly did they say about Air Canada and its future? I am referring to the report which the Minister of Supply and Services was dealing with and to another interdepartmental report involving financing—I think the committee included among its members some people from financial circles in Montreal and Toronto. It is important that we should know exactly what the government has in mind when we are being asked once again for money for Air Canada.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) dealt extensively with the subject of transportation during his speech last night. It was a good review. I do not agree with his philosophy about public ownership, but as an old Conservative I am beginning to wonder just where the Canadian Pacific Railway fits into this picture nowadays. I have said before in this House, and I say again, that it is difficult to know where the responsibility of the Canadian Pacific Railway to maintain passenger services begins and ends. According to recent information from press releases we gather that applications are being made in the proper form by both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railway companies to abandon 31 passenger routes across the country. I do not know how sincere these applications are intended to be. It has been suggested in my home city of Saint John, and I am sure the thought has arisen elsewhere, that these may be applications put forward merely in the hope that an 80 per cent subsidy will be made available for allocation by the Transport Commission, as was mentioned last night by the hon. member for Crowfoot. On the other hand, I should like to know whether the two major railways seriously intend to do away with passenger service.

The last time such an application was made extensive hearings were held, and I thought it was then understood that within the foreseeable future, say 10 to 20 years, there would be no further applications made for passenger service discontinuance. The present proposal threatens a port city such as Saint John, dependent as it is on transportation. There is only one Canadian Pacific service to Saint John, from Montreal; the CN provides the other passenger link to Saint John from Moncton. Discontinuance of both these services is now being requested.

If the railways are serious about this, then it is a serious matter and something must be done about it. As I recall the recent legislation, provision is made for the Canadian Transport Commission to hold public hearings into such matters, and I for one make the request now that the transport commission be told to hold full hearings into the proposed application. I do not think this is a mandatory provision; nevertheless, I contend there should be full public hearings into the application to which I have referred in view of the serious economic cutbacks that would have to be made not only in Saint John but in the entire maritime region.

I am not simply talking about the abandonment of one extra railway line, Mr. Speaker; I am referring to something that is the lifeblood of the entire maritime community, the two remaining railway links between Saint John and the outside world which are now threatened with abandonment.

Reference was also made last night to the previous hearings held by our transportation committee. Two or three years ago the committee travelled west to conduct extensive hearings into the need for the service offered by "The Dominion". On this committee were members who were very interested in transportation matters. The committee's enquiry was also the forerunner of other committee studies. None of the recommendations made by this committee were pre-empted by the government, as has been the case with many other hearings recently. I give the government credit that they held back their decision until the committee were given a full opportunity to look into the future in the west of "The Dominion".

After considerable study the committee made some recommendations, one of which was that the service be continued. I think one of the reasons was that Expo '67 was approaching, but in any event the committee did not take a hard line. Although the CNR and CPR were offering another service in the area, the committee felt there was still a need for a transportation connection between various communities, though a full transcontinental connection of this nature was not required.

To a certain extent the railways took note of our recommendations. Railway representatives appeared before the committee and made a good impression. As we now begin to consider this new application during the next few months, I hope an opportunity will be given to the transportation committee to investigate fully, and that the government will not "jump the gun" by announcing its decision prematurely.

The Canadian Transport Commission also has a responsibility in such matters, though I am not quite sure where they fit into the picture. We all know the connection the present chairman of the transport commission has with this government. I do not know whether there is contact between the two, and I am not saying that there should not be; but I think practically everyone in Canada knows that the present chairman of the commission has been a supporter of the government for a long while.

I would think that the commission has some responsibility with regard to future policy. This morning I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about the recent increase in trucking rates in Ontario and Quebec. As I understand it, the truckers rate association has just approved increases that might total as much as 10 per cent in both provinces, and application is going to be made to the respective provincial boards for authority to make these increases. I should like to know where the Canadian Transport Commission fits in, and what action this government is taking. Is the government approaching the transport commission on this matter? In view of the inflationary nature of these increases I would think the board certainly has some responsibility in this connection.

Legislation was recently passed in the maritimes to give trucking companies some of the benefits conferred upon the railways under maritimes rates legislation. It was thought that the truckers would then be able to compete with the railways, and that the maritimes would be better off as a result. This seemed to make sense. But if the news I heard this morning is correct, it means that the maritimes will now be faced with a further increase in trucking costs. It seems the minute we give the truckers authority to compete with the railways, they apply for increases in their own rates. When is the price spiral going to end? This sort of thing does not make sense to me.

Although the Canadian Pacific Railway is going to apply for discontinuance of the only passenger service from Montreal to Saint John, it is ironic that at this very moment a new passenger station costing $500,000 is under construction in Saint John. When questioned about this the CPR officials were straightforward, and I give them credit for that. They said they did not know whether discontinuance would be granted, so they had to go ahead and build the new passenger terminal anyway. Perhaps they are really hoping for a subsidy if they continue to provide service, and they will then use this new passenger terminal.

I have been unable to determine exactly where the responsibilities of the CPR begin and end. I do not complain about the CPR as much as I used to because they are making a $20 million investment for the Bay of Fundy at the moment. Nevertheless, I should like to know whether a subsidy is going to be paid, for which provision is made, I think, in the regulations of the transport commission.

As I have said, the Canadian Transport Commission must take its full responsibility in these applications and conduct public hearings. A study is presently being conducted in the maritimes, and there have been numerous studies of sundry transportation matters.

We have had dozens of studies covering all field of transportation. We had a study last year when the government wanted us to accept temporary legislation in this area. The Atlantic region transport study committee was set up to deal with all future problems of transportation in the Atlantic region. We thought this was a good idea even though we knew it would result in a postponement of a solution to the major problem. That committee has had one meeting of not much importance. The members thought they should allocate selective assistance and they used many high-sounding words, some of which we have heard for a long time. In the meantime the increases have continued.

We had the surcharge increase in September, which has been mentioned in this House, and there is the possible increase in respect of Ontario and Quebec to which I referred a moment ago. We must face the fact that this increase may spread to the Maritimes. Still the studies continue. How do they all fit into the entire picture? I suggest very sincerely that we must know once and for all what the story is from the standpoint of Maritimes transportation.

We have been giving blanket approval each year of this type of legislation and have referred these matters to the appropriate committee. This is a desirable thing and there will be no effort on my part to hold up this legislation. The minister said it is similar to legislation passed in other years. I suppose that should satisfy us, but in view of the continuing increases and the indefiniteness of the transportation picture, particularly in the Maritimes, I take the opportunity to ask these questions with the hope that the minister will answer them.

We should have a statement in respect of the Air Canada picture and how it will be related to the many reports we have received. What are the possibilities of Air Canada becoming a privately-owned company? I am not talking about bond financing, as I realize that question has been dealt with, but what are the possibilities that Air Canada might become a privately-owned company with common stock available to the public?

I hope there will be an undertaking by the government about action to be taken in respect of increased transportation rates throughout the country. What does the government think about this situation? Is it going to take some action? I asked the minister the other day whether he would make a statement on wrapping up the complete problem in the Maritime provinces. I realize this legislation is usually handled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), but I think we have in the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) a minister from the Maritimes who should be sincerely interested in transportation. God only knows, transportation is our major problem. The minister comes from a province which is begging for consideration in respect of transportation. We have faith in him and will go along with his suggestions provided he keeps us up to date on what is happening.

The transport committee should have an opportunity to study the foreboding transportation problems which exist today, as evidenced by rate increases and the startling news of rail service discontinuance. That is a good committee of this House which has done excellent work in the past under the direction of good chairmen and with interested members. I hope it will be given full authority to deal with these matters. It should go into them intensively, travelling across the country by air, rail and ship to find out at first hand what the people require.

There is still a crying need for our elder citizens and people who do not like to travel by air, to have available other passenger services of their choice. The government has a responsibility through the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport, as well as others on the treasury benches, to forget about the costs involved and to see that service is given to the public. We have all heard about effective demand, wherever that phrase came from. Another phrase I do not like is "if it is viable". These phrases do not mean anything to me. In any event, the people of this country should have an opportunity to travel by rail and meet each other. We gave the CPR land in order that this country could be developed. What is the situation now? Is the CPR going to give us this land back and get out of its obligations? Somebody has to tell us how these things fit into the over-all picture. After we pass this legislation and send the matter to the committee, one of the challenges we should accept as members is that of finding out what is happening in respect of the over-all transportation situation in Canada.

Like other members, I often take constituents on tours through the House of Commons. Many hon. members take their guests to the memorial chamber, into the Senate, and so on. I always stop in the railway committee room and point out that this is one of the great rooms of this House of Commons. I tell them that in the old days it was here that the hearings took place when we were building the railways and developing Canada. I inform them that these meetings were exciting and often heated, but that this is where we decided how to lay out the railroads in order that this country might grow and bring us together. It is apparent that we are now trying to undo this good work. Regardless of my personal feelings, I think the transport committee should be put to work again in the railway committee room in order that we may find out where we are going with transportation and how we can get out of this mess.

[Translation]

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to comment briefly on Bill C-7, authorizing the provision of moneys to meet the CNR's and Air Canada's deficits.

It may seem strange for a representative of a district which is not on the CNR line to take the floor this afternoon but first of all I want to say that I do so in the interest of the people of my constituency and in the light of the gigantic developments now under way there.

• (3:10 p.m.)

This matter of transportation on the North Shore and of railroad connections has often been brought up in this House and in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Not so long ago, the committee members paid a visit to my constituency. They were able to see the tremendous developments taking place in my riding, but were also quite disappointed with the lack of direct communication lines with other areas. There are a road and a number of harbors. We have access to the ocean through deep water ports, but we have no railway link with the rest of the continent.

I do not see why the CN, instead of thinking of abandoning some branch lines, should not try instead to improve, in certain areas, the quality of the service and especially to look into development opportunities in a riding such as mine.

When the committee visited the North Shore in September, the question of using ferryboats to travel between the North and the South Shores of the St. Lawrence was brought up.

In the small industrial town of Baie-Comeau, work is nearing completion on the construction of a fourth paper mill worth some $54 million. When this mill begins operations, production of newsprint will exceed 600,000 tons per year.

The management of this firm does not see why it should be necessary to look into the possibility of establishing a ferry service between the South Shore and the North Shore so that this production may be brought to the large urban centres, to the American cities, by the regular CN railway lines.

On November 5, 1969, some representatives of the Quebec North Shore Paper Co. at Baie-Comeau handed me a brief entitled "Transportation needs on the North Shore of the Lower St. Lawrence". It reads as follows:

The availability of cheaper means of transportation is, today as in the past, an important factor of industrial development and expansion. Water transportation is now available year round in the Lower St. Lawrence region. But other and cheaper means of transportation—by water or by land—remain non-existent during the long winter months to move goods between localities on the North Shore and other points in Canada and North America.

This problem could be solved by establishing a train ferry service between Baie-Comeau and an economic railhead, and other points in Canada and North America.

In support of this proposal and on the assumption that composite shipments now carried on boats could be moved by rail, we respectfully ask you to consider the following facts.

In 1967, the shipping of composite shipments alone from Montreal and Quebec City to industrial communities on the North Shore amounted to 159,000 tons, which could be sent from Montreal and Quebec City by rail and then transferred to a train ferry as far as the North Shore. Bulk goods from Montreal and Quebec City to various points on the North Shore are generally forwarded by boat.

The combined volume of composite shipments from three ports on the North Shore to Quebec City and Montreal reached 14,000 tons in 1967. If to that westward trafic were added the 90,000 tons of newsprint which must now be shipped westward each year from Baie-Comeau through the St. Lawrence Seaway, it would create a balanced trafic of more than 100,000 composite cargo tons in both directions between localities on the North Shore and other western points.

We are presently studying the economic advantages of shipping our newsprint for places west of Baie-Comeau by rail—using train ferry operating all year round—in comparison with our present transportation system through the Seaway during the navigation season. Although the studies are not yet completed, we feel we should let you know the conclusions, since the possible establishment of a train ferry service would undoubtedly help you in your assessment of the transportation needs in the whole lower St. Lawrence area.

More than twenty years ago, one could still accept that the North Shore of the St. Lawrence had been forgotten in the construction of a system connecting the main centres essential to the development of Canada. Over the last two decades, however, the North Shore has become one of the regions of Canada which, per capita, contribute the most to the gross national product and this why it is no longer possible to ignore our area. In fact, the North Shore is an "island" without any rail connection east of the Saguenay River. This "insularity" is still emphasized by the St. Lawrence River which prevents the establishment of any rail connection with South Shore railways.

Considering that during the winter months, Canadian and North American markets remain inaccessible to the North Shore by more economical means of transportation, we suggest that the committee might consider the possibility of including the North Shore among the "select territories" under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act (17-18 Elizabeth II Chap. 52).

That is what was said in a brief I received recently. I do not raise this question for the first time. I think that we should give some attention to the problem. Once again, CN authorities might consider the potential development on the North Shore. When reference is made to rail service and connections between the North and the South Shores, the CN system serving the Maritimes is also involved. Instead of abandoning services, as is so often said, I do not see why the CNR management could not consider the possibility of buying the railroad connecting Mont-Joli with Matane, a distance of 40 miles, and add it to its system. A ferry service could then be operated from Matane to Baie-Comeau for the shipment of newsprint produced in the mill at Baie-Comeau.

• (3:20 p.m.)

It is only 28 miles from Matane to Baie-Comeau. A rail-boat could easily operate between the two cities and thus encourage considerable development in that region.

In 1964, here in the House, I raised the question and the newspapers suggested the establishment of a railway link between the South Shore and the North Shore, resorting almost to the same arguments as I have just used.

Yet, I do not know whether the studies were carried out further by the management of the Canadian National Railways; however, I am aware that on the other side of the river, that is in my constituency, on the North Shore, very serious profitability studies have been made in that respect by private companies on behalf of the Canadian National Railways.

When the Committee on Transport and Communications went to the North Shore to study transportation problems there, a Canadian National Railway representative appeared before us in almost all the towns visited by the committee. I do not know what has been done since then, but I know that some interest has been shown about the subject.

I should like to take this opportunity to deal with this problem because I know it will be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications. We should look into it. As a matter of fact, the rail transport problem has become so serious in our area that the briefs, studies and requests addressed to the government should be taken into consideration.

A few days ago, not far from my riding, in Labrador City to be more precise, a disastrous airplane crash took eight lives. It was not possible to reach the scene for two days, because flying was the only way to get there. They finally had to use the Quebec North Shore Labrador Railway, a private railway, to reach the scene of the accident.

I deplore such facts and I would like to say that a population of 128,000 and a region developing at a fantastic pace, bringing an extraordinary contribution at the national level, must not be left without permanent railway lines. This responsibility is the government's own.

This is a rather reasonable attitude from the CNR authorities who are at least prepared to consider the rail-boat system which could be established as a link between the South Shore and the North Shore and which could, as studies and reports have shown, be profitable.

I wanted to make these comments and I hope that, when this bill is submitted to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, it can be studied as a whole and more information can be obtained.

If CNR officers hear my plea, I hope they will make the effort of examining briefs already submitted and that they will try and do something to have both sides of the river connected by rail.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take too much of the time of the House in voicing my opinion on Bill C-7 entitled:

An Act to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System and Air Canada for the period from the 1st day of January, 1969, to the 30th day of June, 1970, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that this bill is a replica of a similar bill introduced in the fall of 1968 for the purpose of assisting the Canadian National Railways.

Now this morning, my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) pointed out that last year, the Canadian National Railways made profits of $40 million, which were converted into deficits due to the payment of interest charges of $70 million, thus showing a deficit of some $30 million. If we compute the amount paid in interests in the last 25 years, we get the astronomical figure of $1,200 million paid in interest only on the C.N.R. debt.

From the way that Crown Corporation is administered, and at the rate finance is used in this particular case, it is clear that in about 10 years hence, the Canadian National Railways will ask us to authorize the abandon of all its lines throughout Canada.

The C.P.R. is asking to abandon its Montreal-Toronto-Vancouver service, and now the C.N.R. is preparing to ask for permission to abandon its service to Lake St. John and from Abitibi to Montreal.

As for our region of Abitibi, it was born directly from the construction of what was then called the transcontinental railway.

• (3:30 p.m.)

People left the areas north of Quebec or Montreal, to come and settle in Abitibi, along the railroad that was being built through Barraute, Senneterre, Amos, La Reine, La Sarre and Cochrane. It was the only railway from Montreal to western Canada which was an important area then. Cities like Toronto were less important in 1912, in 1913, at the time when the C.N.R., the transcontinental railway, was being built.

Today, we are asked to abandon that line, under the pretext that last year there was a deficit of $2 million in the operation of passenger trains between Abitibi and Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, no one talks, however, of the profits accrued to the Canadian National Railways through the transportation of freight and wood.

If the passenger service is abandoned in that area, how will we transport our lumberjacks, for instance, who come from Kamouraska, Quebec, Cochrane, Hearst, and take them to Clova, Parent, Paradis, Bic, Senneterre, where there are still huge lumber operations.

Mr. Speaker, if the lumberjacks are unable to get to the operations, it will be pointless to continue the freight service since there will no longer be any wood to transport.

[Mr. Caouette.]

This morning, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard) spoke of the poor service given by the C.N.R. in his area, in our area, and he certainly was right. However, I was led to think, some seven or eight years ago, that if we had such bad service at home, if the prices were so frightfully high, if people did not care a bit for Abitibi or for Lac-Saint-Jean, it was because there were too many créditiste members in that area, and because we were not on the right side of the fence. I can recall the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean who was then a good Créditiste member, sitting on this side, with us; today, however he has turned Liberal.

In the Lac-Saint-Jean-Saguenay area, there are three Liberal members out of four, and instead of improving, services are deteriorating day after day, so that consideration is now being given to simply abandonning the line. It is worse than poor service: it is a total lack of it. However, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean was right this morning, when he referred to the poor service provided on the Abitibi and Saguenay lines. Service between Lac-Saint-Jean and Québec is so slow that it takes 12 hours to cover the distance. As for us, it takes us 17 hours because the distance is longer still.

Some lines have practically never been adjusted to the present needs allegedly, because it was too expensive. On the other hand, on the southern lines of the province and on some other lines there have been some improvements. Nothing is done for us. Quite recently, the passenger service between Rouyn-Noranda and Taschereau was abandoned, allegedly because it was unprofitable. Workers who had been with the C.N.R. 25 to 30 years were laid off; they were told the service had become uneconomic. And now it is going to be the turn of the Montreal-Abitibi-Rouyn-Noranda-Montreal-Lac - Saint-Jean-Saguenay line.

As for the cars, used in those areas, they are outdated equipment discarded by the Toronto-Montreal lines. Quite often, they use what we commonly call cattle cars in our area.

In days gone by, they used those cars for carrying oxen or cattle from the southern part of the province. We were given an old car, with separate seats, that was used 25 years ago in Montreal. Seats were repaired somehow or other. They finally got rid, about two years ago, of the little coal stove that was in a corner of the car.

That was the consideration given to our area. No wonder people do not travel by train any more. As for us, members of parliament, when we have to travel, we think it over twice before taking the train, because it is a 17-hour journey to Montreal.

We have to pay $22 now for a double bed. One can get accommodations at the Queen Elizabeth in Montreal for $18, and it is much more comfortable than the C.N.R. beds, especially in our area. It does not shake quite as much in the Queen Elizabeth unless you want it.

But aboard the train there is nothing you can do about it.

So I agree with what the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean said this morning and I hope that it is more than talk on his part.

A decision have to be made at one time or another as regards the Canadian National Railways. For instance, we must stand with all our might against the abandonment of those branch lines and, as I said a while ago, the C.N.R. was not established in order to make profits but to provide services. That was the reason for creating the Canadian National Railways, a public corporation.

We need those services in our area. As for the freight service, as I said earlier, the C.N.R. is making profits in our areas, but because they lose money in the passenger service, they think they should eliminate those lines. Is that the right thing to do? I ask the question. Some C.N.R. officials will read what I have just said.

What will happen to the lumberjacks who settled in that area? Are we going to transport them by helicopter as was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the last election campaign or will we find another means of transportation? Shall we transport them on the old wooden roads, in horse-drawn carriages because the motor car cannot be used? What shall we do with the lumberjacks since there are thousands of them in that area?

If there are no lumberjacks, the C.N.R. will have no wood to carry. This means that by suppressing at once the passenger service the day will come when they will suppress the freight cars and then the wood will not be moved to the large centres, such as Toronto, Montreal or Quebec.

Mr. Blouin: There will be no newsprint either.

Mr. Caouette: There will be no newsprint either. At home we have all that. We are a little short on paper mills. We are not as spoiled as the Saguenay riding. In fact, the Saguenay area has a lot of paper to be moved. I thought earlier that the hon. member would ask for a railway line just above the St. Lawrence river, about 30 miles long, a floating highway, so that the C.N.R. could engage in transport operations there. However, one problem remains and I endorse his request to the effect that ferries should be used in order to equip these areas with means of transportation necessary to the development of their economy.

This is what I had to say with regard to the bill which deals once more, as always, with the financing of the deficits caused by interests paid to financiers and not by losses incurred in our areas.

If we could manage to establish a railroad between the financiers and the C.N.R. by eliminating taxes and interests, I think that there would be no more problems for the Canadian National Railways. There would be no more problems with Air Canada either.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The government is borrowing funds and then lending them to the C.N.R. As my colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) said it so well this morning they borrow at a rate of interest of 8⅛, 8¼ or 8⅜ per cent, and they lend to the CN at a rate of 4½ or 4 per cent.

Then, the government is surprised that the CN is faced with financial difficulties. The CN is not the only one to have difficulties. The government has some also and has no solution whatsoever. Even if the Prime Minister says that we are repeating ourselves, we are not any more than the system under which we rub along, because for at least 15 years, we have been passing the same act every year asking parliament to appropriate funds in order to help the "poor" CN.

If we had a sound financial system, not a stupid one, but a sensible one. But no. We are told: you keep saying that the monetary question will solve everything. But what is wrong, if not the financial system? That is what is wrong.

Our operations yield a $40 million profit, but the interest swallows up $70 million, so there is a deficit of $30 million. Let us pass Bill C-7 to make up this deficit and safeguard financial interests. The people who need railway service can always walk. Such is the present system: it moves backwards instead of progressing and creating something positive, because the financial problem will always hold us back.

The minister can only say: Let us help the C.N.R. and Air Canada which are essential services. Yes, but at the same time let us stop financing those services through such ineffective and backward methods as those now used by the government.

This is our suggestion. The hon. member for Abitibi was quite right this morning; he quoted very accurate figures. Let us not forget that in 25 years from now, we will have to pay $1,200 million in interest only on the debt and no portion of the capital has been paid off. This reminds me of the notorious case of the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal, which cost $18 million, of which we have to date paid $21 million, in interest alone, and on which we still owe $14 million. When will the Jacques Cartier bridge be fully paid? If God does not know, our financial system can tell us!

As far as the railways are concerned, it is the same thing. The debt is never paid off, we cannot pay anything on it because our financial situation is bad. Inquiries of the president of the CN or of the president of Air Canada bring the answer that they cannot afford it, that they have no money. So, each year, a bill is introduced in the House and the members are told: Come to our help, we find ourselves in a dilemma, we are in debt, we must make up the deficit resulting from the interest on our debt! So, pass this bill, they tell us, in order that high finance may be protected and that the Canadian people be required to pay more taxes. That is exactly what it all comes to.

So, Mr. Speaker, we insist that the CN and Air Canada should be able to meet their obligations. But we hope that, at a given time, the government will come up with concrete proposals based on the system of monetary creation instead of superficial solutions based on the tax yield.

Let us go a little beyond this unscalable wall of human understanding which cannot see beyond taxation. The monetary system existed before taxes. Nowadays all our economic structure, including the structures of the CN and of Air Canada, is based on taxation instead of going to the root of matters and of relying on the creation scheme.

Then we say: Let us revert to the principle of creation. Why should we not call the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Louis Rasminsky, who is an expert on financial questions, before the committee on transport and communications? We could ask him if, with the permission of the Canadian government and all members, he would not advance the necessary funds to make up the deficit of Air Canada.

Then, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, will reply: If parliament tells me to do so, I certainly will.

Preventing the chartered banks from multiplying that creation fourteenfold would solve the problem. The losses of the CN and Air Canada would be paid off. Let us stop paying interest on a nominal debt. Let us start by becoming the masters of our own financial system; then we can say that our national undertakings, our Crown corporations belong to the Canadian people and not to those who stole from them by exacting interests of $1,200 million in the last 25 years.

Mr. Speaker, the minister who is listening to me is not mentally retarded; he is an intelligent man. He knows full well what I mean. He knows that I am right, but he cannot say so. He knows also that if the sovereign parliament asks the Governor of the Bank of Canada to create the necessary credits, the Governor will say that he is entitled to do so. If parliament instructs him to do so, he can do it. However, no one dares ask him. Mr. Rasminsky is allowed to welcome, in his office, the top representatives of the big financial institutions, of the chartered banks; transactions, plots, follow, to maintain the financial system which is making slaves of us.

Mr. Speaker, these are the few observations I wanted to make on the gaps created by a stupid system and on the means of correcting them, that is, by levying additional taxes. That is what it will come to: The Canadian people will have to pay more taxes to make up deficits.

Mr. Speaker, we do not object to everything. Far from it. We are opposed however to the CNR ceasing to provide service in the North, to the Lake St. John and Saguenay region. I ask that the CNR increase its services to attract customers, that its trains move a little faster and bring people from Rouyn, Amos, La Sarre or Chicoutimi to Montreal. In fact it should provide good service and make available to the public comfortable cars, attractive ones, with even television aboard as on planes nowadays. It should pay attention to the people. If the passenger service is good it might become more profitable and it could thus be possible to keep on assuring transportation to workers and lumbermen in a still very important region with regard to lumber operations. The CNR will continue to do business as long as these services are attractive and run for the benefit of the population.

[English]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, no subject will arouse in a Maritimes Member of Parliament more passion or justifiable outrage than the subject of transportation. Not 102 years ago but two years ago, on the 100th anniversary of the founding of this nation, we witnessed an event that sounded the death-knell for many industries in the Atlantic region. Notwithstanding all its talk about the just society and the elimination of regional disparities, this government did nothing to rectify what took place in the Atlantic region. Almost every month the Atlantic community hears more bad news about transportation. It is difficult, indeed almost impossible, for me to suggest how much longer the economy of our area can withstand the repercussions of freight rate increases, railway lay-offs and the elimination of services which industry in the Atlantic region needs in order to survive.

In August, 1967, the railways were given the right to increase non-carload tariffs within the Atlantic region. The increases took effect in September of that year and we objected to them as strongly as we could. Every area of the community lodged its objection with the government, but it was all without avail and the increases took effect. As a result, many businesses and jobs have been eliminated in the Atlantic provinces.

In time—and it took a lot of time—the government amended the Maritime Freight Rates Act to allow trucking firms in the Atlantic area certain subsidies which up until that time had been available only to the railways. This step was of major assistance to industry in the area because for the first time it was not a captive customer of the railways. I have not noticed any significant reduction in freight rates as a result of the extension of subsidies to the trucking industry. In fact, I do not believe that industry in our area is receiving the full benefit of the extension of these freight subsidies. Shippers in the Atlantic provinces should make their justifiable grievances known so that they receive a full measure of benefit from the extension of the freight rates subsidies. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) should watch closely what the trucking industry does with regard to freight rates in the region as a result of the extension of subsidies.

The shippers of the region should know there are teeth in the legislation which was passed, and that the trucking industry has a right to react in a favourable manner to those shippers. After all, the objective of the extension of the subsidies was to create a system of freight rates which would be more helpful for the survival of industry in the area. Soon after the government undertook to extend the freight rate subsidies to the trucking industry, it allowed the railways to remove the freeze on carload lot shipments. As a result, a still greater burden was placed on shippers in the Atlantic region. Recently, Canadian National Railways decided to take a further step. Without consultation with the Minister of Transport, I understand they decided to eliminate all less than carload lot traffic coming into the Atlantic region from the rest of Canada. When I learned of this action, I immediately contacted the Minister of Transport. The minister was quick to take action and as a result these freight rate changes were not allowed to take effect and the CNR was forced to continue providing an l.c.l. service to the Atlantic region. It would have been an additional blow to the industry in the region if the shippers who depend upon l.c.l. traffic to bring supplies in with which to manufacture goods, which often have to be shipped out of the region, had been forced to pay higher express rates. This would have happened had the CNR been allowed to continue with its objective of putting the new rates into effect on November 3 of this year.

I believe the Minister of Transport endeavours to do his best to protect the region. It is not his fault that we are without a transportation policy which would give protection and hope for the future of industry in the area. I think he is doing his best, but the cabinet is doing little to assist him. While all this is going on, employees of the railways in the region are suffering one cutback after another. We are told this is for the sake of efficiency. It is a shocking way to achieve efficiency. After 25 years of service, employees are suddenly finding themselves unemployed.

I have before me a communication which I received from Mr. Carl H. Hiltz, the educational chairman of local No. 9 of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. He informed me that men with as long as 30 years' service were released from their employment without more than two weeks' notice. I wrote the vice-president of the Atlantic region regarding this matter. He accepted the fact there may be problems in relation to the unemployment being created by the railway for the sake of efficiency and stated he would look into the matter. At the same time he informed me that the Atlantic region express operations of the CNR would be reduced from 50 locations to 17 or 18. That is more very bad news for the employees of that region.

This is just the beginning, Mr. Speaker, of the issues I wish to bring to the attention of the House with regard to this bill. I would now like to call it four o'clock.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I see the government whip has just entered the chamber. I believe I can say that there is an understanding that the first seven orders might be allowed to stand and that we proceed with order No. 8, Bill C-20.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the first seven orders will be stood at the request of the government, and the Chair will put No. 8, Bill C-20?

Some hon. Members: Agreed

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROVISION TO ASSURE PUBLIC RIGHT OF ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved that Bill C-20, to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of Bill C-20, an act to better assure the public's right to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration, it seems that I could hardly do so at a more timely juncture. It is just over a year ago that the same bill was talked out in this chamber by government members. At that time one or two government members, when adding their voices to the debate, pointed out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was no doubt concerned about participatory democrary and in his enthusiasm for a well-informed public had set up a task force on government information.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, the task force has reported and its report, from pages 25 to 34, contain a detailed examination and criticism of the hush-hush secrecy now observed by the government together with some excellent comparisons between Canada's outmoded procedures in this area and those of other countries, notably Sweden. So my hopes soar high today that hon. members opposite will be heartened by these events, and disposed to allow this bill to go to an appropriate committee where it may be treated as raw material useful in helping to bring Canada up-to-date by opening the windows and unbarring the doors of official reticence.

As the bill states in its explanatory note, it is being presented in aid of the public right to know in what manner the government is administering the public duties entrusted to it by the people. The key clause states:

> Every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time.

The measure provides for certain specific exemptions to this provision where these would be in the public interest. In brief, it puts into words—words which I hope will become law—the basic parliamentary, democratic principle that public affairs must be conducted publicly. Is it not incongruous that though, according to the task force on government information, close to $150 million is expended annually on circulating the type of information which the government wants to put out, many motions placed on the order paper of this House by private members call in vain for the production of the type of information which the public wants and which apparently the government denies? My hon. friend the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) stated recently:

> It is ironic that the Prime Minister co-authored a manifesto in 1964 entitled an Appeal for Realism in Politics which said that democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information".

Further, I would remind the House that within the last two months the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) himself stated:

> Government secrecy is sometimes legitimized as the state's right to privacy but it may well be a denial of the public right to know.

A great deal has been published on this general subject by the press of Canada. To quote but one opinion, the Toronto Globe and Mail in an editorial entitled "It is the public's business" had this to say:

> One bad side effect of the prodigious growth of government in this century is that it has become exceedingly difficult to keep track of. Not only are governments themselves much more deeply and widely involved in the life of the people, but their tasks have become so numerous that they have had to delegate much of their authority to boards and commissions. Accompanying this governmental growth has been a disinclination on the part of governments and their creatures to keep the public informed about what they are doing.
> A private bill has been presented to the House of Commons which could do much to open these many closed doors and keep the public informed about what is, after all, its own business. The bill would require that "every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time".
> Exceptions would be made for matters of national security, matters exempted by statute from disclosure, trade secrets, commercial information obtained from private persons and subjects of private interest "to the degree that the right to personal privacy excludes the public interest".

It is my idea, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill becomes law the enforcing agency should be the Exchequer Court of Canada. In urging that the House allow the subject matter of the bill to go to a committee, I feel this is in line with the expressed sentiments of government leaders, as well as with the findings of the task force on government information, and that what it proposes could be a potent ingredient of improved parliamentary democracy in Canada.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather). He frequently introduces a philosophical note into our debates in this House, and if I might be permitted to be personal about an hon. member for a moment, he possesses another characteristic, that of a great tenacity. He has chosen certain areas of special concern, for example, the field of auto safety and items such as the one he has brought before us today. I have had the pleasure of serving on committees at which he was present and I know of his concern about the effects of smoking on health. It seems logical that today he should introduce Bill C-20 to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration.

As the hon. member has told us, this bill is concerned with opening windows and unbarring doors. It is based on the idea that public affairs must be conducted publicly, to use the words which are to be found in the explanatory notes of the measure we are considering. I am forced immediately to consider what would be the results for the government, for the House of Commons, and indeed for the citizens of this country, if we were to follow generally such practices as are now followed when the government presents documents called, somewhat oddly it appears to me, white papers. In recent weeks two important white papers have been published, one on veterans affairs and another on taxation. These documents, both of which are likely to become famous if they are not so already, represent attempts by the government to carry on its business in the open. It seems to me that they are genuine attempts—indeed, the attempt has become an accomplished fact—to place before the people of the country the issues as the government sees them and then to wait for response and reaction.

This morning I happened to listen to a radio program on this very subject, and I want to refer to it briefly. The program is entitled "Dialogue", and on the program this morning there were two individuals well known to the Canadian public, especially those who listen to the media, Pierre Berton and Charles Templeton. They were discussing not so much the white paper on taxation but what this bill is all about, namely whether or not a government ought to carry on its business openly before the public.

They were using the white paper on taxation as a kick-off for the discussion, and an interesting thesis was put forward, one that sort of surprised me at first, as I am sure it will surprise many hon. members of this House. This thesis was that government should not be guided by the public's reaction to its statements of intention.

I must interject that Bill C-20 does not say that all the business of government should be made known to the public, but that most things should, with some exceptions listed in the bill.

When the business of government is done before the public, it was the contention of these two gentlemen that it is those who are wealthy and powerful who raise the loudest protests and are best able to finance and mount campaigns against a certain aspect of a government program or other programs that will work to their own detriment or to the detriment of their vested interests. In other words, by virtue of the fact that government makes a statement of intention or opens its books to the public, it is giving the wealthy an advantage over the poor.

These two gentlemen also suggested that if government should happen to listen to the response that it gets—and there was a real argument that it ought not listen to the response it gets for the reason I have just put forward—it will always receive an impression that is heavily weighted in favour of the strong, in favour of the established and the wealthy. Equally this results in creating an impression that is to the disfavour of the voiceless poor, those who are disestablished in society at any given point in time but constitute a very important segment of society, one that ought to be getting priority from government if total social justice is to be done.

This point seems to me to be exactly on the subject that is before the House for debate this afternoon. I would have to draw some conclusions about this question, and my conclusions are as follows: First, it would seem to me that government should make its actions and its statements of intention public. It would seem to me that the policy that is being carried out by the present government of issuing white papers, for example, is a very good one. Second, the response of the public to such statements of intention must always be treated with a healthy degree of skepticism. Third, it would seem to me that good government does not simply depend on open government; rather, it depends on responsible actions on the part of those who are entrusted to do the nation's business in the people's name.

As I suggested at the outset, this bill raises, for me at least two very basic philosophical and psychological questions. The first is: Is it true that all power corrupts? And to finish that off: Is it true that absolute power corrupts absolutely?

An hon. Member: Like the Liberals.

Mr. McBride: Well, we will not have to test that. If it is the case that all power does tend to corrupt, then it is incumbent upon people in positions of authority, if there is to be any sort of justice done, that there be some kind of built-in system of checks and balances; that there be a system in our nation—since we are talking about the government of the country—whereby the persons in whose hands power lies can be called to account for their administration and their action.

Surely we who make up government in Canada are called to account. No one can go through an election campaign and not be intimately, bitterly, personally and joyfully aware of how we are called to account. On the same point of power corrupting, and so on, may I elaborate further and point out that we live in a society where people pride themselves very much on being open-minded. Similarly, this bill suggests that we ought to have open government for open-minded people. There is a kind of "put down" for people who keep pushing the open-minded idea which goes as follows, that you can be so open-minded that all your brains fall out. The point here is that to tolerate everything and to object to nothing is a good pushed to its logical extreme. If you push a good to its logical extreme, it comes out as an evil.

Similarly, as far as Bill C-20 is concerned, although open government is a good thing, I submit that it is possible to be so "open-governed" that action on any issue could become almost impossible. Some segments of society would be displeased by it. If this idea were enshrined in law, it would be possible to be so open-governed that all the power would fall out of government. Government stripped of the power to govern must surely be a contradiction in terms.

This bill also underscores something near and dear to the hearts of all those who deal with people. It seems to me that no one has more to do with all varieties of human nature than the politician, those of us who represent the people of Canada in this House.

The big cry today—it is also the underlying idea in this bill—is that we should all be for participatory democracy. Participatory democracy has become a kind of sacred cow and no one "knocks" or questions it. However, I wonder whether it ought not to be held up to a little ridicule once in a while. It seems to me that participatory democracy is based on the assumption that everybody ought to have a share in running everything all the time. It is very fortunate—or unfortunate, depending on your point of view—that most people have neither the time nor the competence to run everything all the time. Therefore, if one is to be realistic, as long as human nature is human nature and societies are societies, power will inevitably tend gradually to migrate into the hands of a few.

This small group into whose hands the power to govern passes consists of those who are believed to be the most capable and meritorious by their benefactors and supporters; or, on the other side of the coin, those who are considered to be the shrewdest charlatans by their detractors and opponents. So it depends what side of the fence you are on whether you think those into whose hands the power has fallen are the worst people in the world or the best. Let me read a quotation from John Stuart Mill. I want to read this into the record because I think it has a direct bearing on the bill before us. He said:

• (4:20 p.m.)

We owe our capacity to bear with the passing errors of society to man's faculty of rectifying his own mistakes, not by experience alone. There must be discussion to show how experience is to be interpreted.

By way of interjection here let me say that that surely would be a useful definition of what Parliament or the House of Commons is all about.

Mill goes on to say:

The whole strength and value of human judgment depends upon one property, that it can be set right when it is wrong, reliance can be placed upon it only when the means to set it right are kept constantly at hand.

I would draw the attention of the chamber this afternoon to the final words, "only when the means to set it right are kept constantly at hand." Surely, some of the means which are available to us in Canada to set things right are the ballot-boxes and the education of our citizens. Surely, we also agree that to educate the people of Canada, for example to make my constituents or the constituents of any other member of this House fully aware of the intricacies of the issues before Parliament at any time, would be and is a full-time job. If I were to do a proper job of educating my constituents about what is going on here I would not have time to do anything else; indeed, I would not have time to appear here or carry on the work expected of a member.

Therefore, I am pleased that the report of the task force on government information states that governments themselves, indeed this government in particular, must spend more of its resources educating the people. In this sense I am sure the hon. member for Surrey is pleased with the task force report. Indeed, he made reference to it. Knowing the hon. member personally, to some extent, I am sure he is aware that we have two things to consider. The first is, what is is not necessarily what seems to be. Every one who is in public life is aware that these things do not always coincide; what actually is, is not always what seems to be.

One of the things that most impressed me when I became a member of this House in 1968 was that in regard to the members that Canadians hold in very high regard in the mythology of our country we find when we come into this House as backbenchers—I was going to say humble backbenchers, and you have to be humble if you are a backbencher—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McBride: One ought to be, in any event. We find that they are not always the same people who in this House deserve the impression that has been created in the mythology of this country. One is well aware that certain members work very hard and obviously do excellent work. However, through the news media, which is a kind of "bitch" goddess of our times, we never hear of them; they are never seen or complimented. Other members of Parliament who in some ways do far less seem always to be before the public. This in itself seems to be a powerful argument for conveying more and better information to the citizens of Canada. It is important that our people should be better informed. Simply giving access to the documents of government, as Bill C-20 suggests, will not do this. We need to adopt some of the recommendations contained in the report of the task force. I should like to read one section and its principal recommendation, which appears in volume 1 at page 61. The recommendation is as follows:

We recommend that:

1. The right of Canadians to full, objective and timely information and the obligation of the state to provide such information about its programs and policies be publicly declared and stand as the foundation for the development of new government policies in this field. This right and obligation might be comprehended within a new constitution in the context of freedom of expression.

I agree with this entirely. However, at the moment, lacking full and efficient means of spreading government information—you can call it propaganda if you will, or information as to what government is all about—we are thrown to the mercies of the news media as it now exists. Let me conclude by giving one illustration which demonstrates to me at least that we are in very fickle hands. The government's white paper on taxation came out just a week ago. Headlines in some papers said essentially, "Higher taxes" and then in fine print, "for the well to do". One might just as well say, "lower taxes for those on lower incomes". Which is right? The truth is that both are right. I hesitate to name newspapers so I shall not do so, but the two newspapers which I read followed this pattern. One essentially ran a headline which could be summarized in two words, "Tax increases". Thousands of readers of that paper are not in government and do not really know what is going on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let's hear about the other paper.

Mr. McBride: The other newspaper ran a headline pointing out that taxation for those on lower incomes would be lowered and therefore lower taxes would be paid. I appreciate the graciousness of the House in allowing me a moment or two to complete my remarks. As I said a moment ago, unless someone spent the time to read all the fine print he would see an absolute contradiction. If an agency which disseminated information put forward the full story, namely, that those on lower incomes will pay less taxes and those on higher incomes will pay more taxes, we would give the whole picture. This would create a better balance and would be much more worth while.

I do not wish to abuse the courtesy of the House by taking up more time. I will terminate my speech on that point.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to be here this afternoon to hear the very interesting speech by the hon. member for Lanark and Renfrew (Mr. McBride). We are now beginning to understand what the government intends to do about the task force report. The hon. member—who I am quite convinced is not an humble backbencher, having listened to him this afternoon—quoted with some degree of exuberance the remarks of a distinguished Liberal pundit and former aspirant to leadership in the province of Ontario, Charles Templeton. We find from two different spheres an indication that this government will extract and squeeze from the report of the task force those things it likes and put to one side those it rejects. I need no further proof than the example—

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is a bumble backbencher.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. McBride: I am greatly honoured that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) would imply that I speak for the government. Surely, however, he will realize that I am not a member of the treasury benches and speak only for myself.

Mr. Baldwin: I accept the fact that the hon. member is now on his way. Certainly I would suggest there are a great many places where he could sit with more honour and distinction than is merited by some of the present occupants of the treasury benches. As reported at page 550 of Hansard, my distinguished colleague the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this question:

> Mr. Speaker, have the Prime Minister and his colleagues taken note of the recommendations of the task force on government information which state there is a specific need for the government to provide more informative replies to questions raised in Parliament than has been the tradition and, if so, what does he plan to do about it?

Of course, we found the usual movement toward secrecy on the part of the Prime Minister, who wiggled and evaded the question. The hon. member used the word "educate" or "lead". The government is to lead this country into adopting that part of the task force report which will enable the government, having erected this slick, glossy apparatus, to give hand-outs of the kind it sees fit in its inimitable desire to educate the public. Educate the public for what? For those things that the government thinks the people ought to know. What the government intends to do with this task force is as plain as the hand I see before me. God help this unfortunate country when that comes about. Any government should be an open government, particularly this government which slinks and crawls on its devious, sly and crooked path among the shady nooks of concealment.

An hon. Member: Beautiful! You are a poet.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member who introduced the bill spoke about the state having a right to privacy. The state has no right to privacy. It is in no better nor worse position than the people who place the government in power and give it a limited opportunity to govern. Any taxpayer is entitled to say to the government, "This is my money that you are spending to secure this information. Why should you hide it from me?" I recognize there are exceptions. The hon. member has placed some of these exceptions in the second clause of his bill. I could think of others, but think particularly of the exemption provided under subparagraph (b) concerning matters that are exempted by statute from disclosure.

If this government, which has the onus of justifying to Parliament that there are special reasons, can say there are special reasons—and places those reasons before us—why matters to which it may become privy should not be made public, I am sure the exception would be granted by Parliament. But I believe the fundamental rule is that the state has no inherent right to privacy. I take that position with all the strength at my command. Unfortunately, many governments are moving not in the direction of a greater degree of openness but more in the direction of secrecy.

I had the honour to be a member of a committee which on the last day of the last session filed a report dealing with statutory instruments. It was a remarkable experience to be a part of that committee. We listened to distinguished members of the civil service who appeared before us and gave evidence concerning the measure of secrecy which prevails in respect of the origin and actual promulgation of many orders in council and ministerial decrees which affect to a large extent the lives and fortunes of very many citizens of this country. I was amazed, as I think anyone would be who read the record, at the inherent and implied criticism of the processes of government which were laid open as a result of the deliberations and the report of that committee.

Finally, as a member of the bar who has spent a great many years engaged in the art of advocacy, while there are many ways in which the administration of justice and the practice before the courts could be improved I wonder just how far we would have gone in the settlement of disputes between citizen and citizen or between citizen and the state if the old practices of the Star Chamber at the time of Strafford and Laud were still in effect. There is a rule that unless one of the parties to a trial is able to convince the court that a matter should be held in camera, all judicial proceedings are open. The participants, the accused person if it should be a criminal trial, and the witnesses are exposed to the full light of publicity before their fellow citizens in the community. The evidence is given under oath in the pitiless glare of publicity in open court. If that practice did not prevail, Mr. Speaker, the cases of injustice perpetrated on the people of our country would be magnified greatly.

It is because justice is open that justice generally is good. There is great room for improvement and I believe we are moving in this direction, but if that provision of openness, which I think is the fundamental one were not present, I wonder where we would be in respect of the administration of justice in this or any country.

I have one final point which concerns our good friends who look down upon us and tell the public what happens in this chamber. One reason they are not here in great numbers when they should be, particularly to hear this debate, is that they are compelled to wander from building to building and from minister to minister seeking scraps of information. If everything were made public as it should be, the members of the press gallery would be here and our proceedings would be more widely and elaborately reported. That is one reason I am glad, on behalf of gentlemen of the press gallery, to support this bill. I am sure from the smiles opposite that the government will support the bill, that it will receive second reading and go on to be duly dealt with in the other place.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) who, incidentally, is a journalist and therefore brings to the subject matter of this bill a particular knowledge which I think merits considerable respect from all parts of the House.

I am sure it is no coincidence that this bill comes before us almost contemporaneously with the tabling of the recent task force report on government information entitled "To Know and Be Known". I think that possibly this bill proffers some solutions and recommendations in an area where the report of the task force did a very find job of identifying and recognizing problems without coming forward with specific recommendations.

The subject matter of this bill covers an area of direct concern which is not perhaps the major item covered by the task force report but is one major item in it. I confess that I have not read the entire report of the task force because I found that in an effort to be "with it" and to be "now", the literary style of the task force report in effect made it rather tedious reading; before I had read many chapters I found it rather heavy going. I think they have adopted a rather strange literary style so as to attract attention. While it may be rather effective for several paragraphs or even a couple of chapters, it tends to be boring as one goes through a book-length document. Not having completed it, I would not pretend to suggest that the same fault lies with the conclusions reached, but I certainly find it hard going and I am sure this was not what the drafters intended.

The task force report, in an area particularly relevant to this bill, pointed out that governments, like people, are very much subject to their heredity and their environment. Although we are living in a day where participatory democracy is a prominent phrase—hopefully, considerably more than a slogan and certainly something which many people and institutions in this country are attempting to achieve—we are also living with a tradition or an heredity of administrative secrecy which is not compatible with the concept of participatory democracy.

The report of the task force goes on to cite the United States experience. It points out that of necessity the congressional system has caused a breakdown of secrecy because in fact the administration must, in justifying its programs and conclusions to the legislative branch, disclose the processes by which it has arrived at those recommendations and conclusions. The democratic system and functions of government in the United States do not appear to have suffered tremendously from their ability to get along without this type of secrecy which we have inherited probably from the days of absolute monarchy.

We have probably also inherited this type of secrecy from the closed-family governing classes of Great Britain which were prominent in the early part of the last century.

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Fortunately, I think my friends in the New Democratic Party can cite the Swedish tradition with considerably more validity so far as I am concerned, and I accept it as having more validity than many of the other parallels in Sweden which they cite. The right of access by the citizen to public information is a matter of constitutional right in Sweden and one which the government agency choosing to deny access to public documents can only exercise after having proved that the interest of the country is better served by not making the disclosure.

The task force report also reviews the experience in Great Britain on this matter. I think this, again, is an experience parallel to the one which our task force presents to us; it is one where the problem is well identified and recognized but to which no solution is offered. Following the original report to the British government, a government white paper was filed in which, again, great difficulty was encountered when it came to finding practical solutions to this very real problem.

As I said before, the task force report offers no recommendations in this area. Perhaps, considered concurrently with the hon. member's bill, we may have the start of a substantial recommendation in the solution of this problem. I hope sincerely that together with the task force report this bill will receive second reading and be referred to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting coincidence, that this bill introduced by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) should come before the House just about two weeks after the task force on government information tabled its report.

Still, I believe that there are few distinctions to be made. The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather)—and I congratulate him for his initiative and for his interest in this question—has introduced Bill C-20, an Act to better assure the Public's Rights to Freedom of Access to Public Documents and Information about Government Administration (Administrative Disclosure).

We read, in the explanatory note, and I quote:

> This bill is in aid of the public's right to know in what manner a government is administering the public duties entrusted and delegated to it by the people: save for exceptions that are in the public interest, the bill enacts Bentham's basic parliamentary Rule that public affairs must be conducted publicly.

I understand that the task force's report on government information services advocates an information policy.

There is nothing concerning an information policy in the bill presented today by the hon. member for Surrey, but the bill deals with the rights to freedom of access to public documents and information. I do not quarrel with the rights to freedom of access to public documents and information, when need arises, for that was also pointed out in the task force's report.

I believe I can tell the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) what the government is going to do with the task force's report on information services.

And I think I am in a position to do it by quoting comments that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is reported as having made in 1964 when he was not yet a member of parliament.

In an article published in an issue of Cité Libre in 1964, under the title: "Pour une politique fonctionnelle", he stated:

Progress in democracy requires the availability of accurate and complete information so as to enable the people to assess government policies with full knowledge of the facts. Otherwise, obscurantist autocracy prevails. Yet in many sectors, it is very difficult, if not impossible, for citizens to make sound political judgments.

You will tell me that the Prime Minister is not alone in the cabinet! No, I agree, although he may give an impetus to the policy that he intends to pursue. But shortly before the report of the task force on information was published, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) told the Canadian Bar Association, about two months ago:

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

If individual privacy is a foundation of democracy the citizen's right to know is fundamental to any participatory democracy.

The public cannot be expected to dialogue meaningfully—still less decide—if it is refused the very information which would make such a dialogue and decision-making possible.

[Translation]

Another member of the cabinet, the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), stated not so long ago, and I quote:

[English]

I'm willing to publish any and all documents that show gaps in our organization except those which contain critical comments about specific people.

[Translation]

Another minister of this government, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) said not so long ago, and I quote:

[English]

I don't see why we shouldn't be able to quote public servants any less than we quote consultants. These people are professionals.

[Translation]

And the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry added:

[English]

You don't suppress something because you don't want it exposed to counter argument. This is lethal in the long-term. You don't suppress reports drawn up by competent people at the public expense.

[Translation]

I could go on quoting several other statements made by ministers of this government. This shows that this government had and still has the intention of promoting a policy on information. I am sure, in the light of what the ministers have already said, that the task force report will be used as a basis for the establishment of a policy on information.

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to give you a summary of the task force report, since the previous speakers did so, but it must be known that the right to information is not the sole prerogative of newspapermen. I am not saying that this is what the hon. member for Surrey had in mind. I am just expressing a personal opinion. The right to information does not only belong to newspapermen or mass media, but to the public at large.

What about the interpretation of information? This is a very important element. The general public receives its information through the large media which often colour it somehow. Can we then say that it is information? I do not think so.

Who will therefore decide which type of information should be available to the public? Should we divide citizens into categories? Should we give different information to the members of parliament and to the newspapermen? Should we give another type of information to other news, media, and still another type to the general public?

This report leads the way. It contains advice and proposals and I am sure these will be given serious consideration by the government when it tables legislation in this field.

Should Canada leave it to a minister of Information to decide what information should be given? Should such decisions be left to a minister, to a committee of ministers, or, as is done in Sweden, to administrative commissions quite distinct from the legislative power? The question is a vital one and I know that the hon. member of the New Democratic Party was right to raise it. Anyway, we are not prepared to make this decision specially since, as I am practically sure, most if not all members either have not read the whole report or have not assimilated it.

Therefore, I am not prepared to make a decision. Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CMHC CAPITAL BUDGET

Question No. 3—Mr. Gilbert:

1. Has the Government of Canada imposed a five-year freeze on the capital budget of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. If not, is any type of freeze on CMHC's capital budget contemplated?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. No.

ONTARIO MEDICARE PLAN—DESIGNATION OF PRIVATE COMPANIES AS CARRIERS

Question No. 8—Mr. Gilbert:

Has the federal government agreed to the provisions in the Ontario medicare plan regarding (a) the designation of the private insurance companies as the public carriers for the plan and (b) the financial arrangement between the Ontario Government and the private insurance companies on administrative costs of the plan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): (a) Private insurance companies do not function as agents of the Ontario provincial authority. Healthco, a non-profit corporation made up of private insurance companies and other bodies, acts as the agent of the provincial authority. (b) A contract between the Ontario authority and its non-profit agent, Healthco meets the requirements of the Medical Care Act.

2. What was Mr. Fullerton's annual salary as Chairman of DEVCO?

3. When did the Government of Canada indicate to Mr. Fullerton that it wished to appoint him as Chairman of the National Capital Commission?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. July 2, 1969.

3. Toward the end of July, 1969.

4. The Government's arrangement with Mr. Fullerton provides that he devote 75 percent of his time to the function of Chairman of the National Capital Commission. His salary based on an annual rate of $30,000, is $22,500.

CBC—ADVERTISING POLICY

Question No. 25—Mr. Broadbent:

1. Is the CBC changing its commercial advertising policy with four rather than three minutes of commercial time per half-hour on television now being available?

2. If so, what are the reasons for this change in policy?

Questions

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: 1. Prior to the present programming year, the allowable commercial content for all sponsored programs on the French Television Network and English Metro-Net (CBC-owned stations) and for selectively sponsored programs on both English and French CBC-owned television stations was four minutes per half-hour. Full English network sponsors were limited to three minutes plus billboards after 6:00 p.m. With the beginning of the 1969/70 program season the "four-minute format" was extended to all sponsored half-hour programs on the full English Television Network, as has been the case on the French TV Network.

2. The increase in allowable commercial content on the full English network not only brings all phases of the Corporation's commercial operations into line but it also puts the CBC in step with all private segments of the television industry in Canada, both on a network and selective basis. Since the four-minute format is now the rule, rather than the exception, Canadian advertisers have oriented their sales and marketing strategy accordingly. The extra minute results in both the major and minor sponsor on alternate weeks receiving an equal amount of advertising time in each program, i.e., two minutes for each half hour of programming. This provides the kind of continuous program identification that advertisers have come to expect from alternate week sponsorship.

NATO COMMUNICATIONS RESEARCH PROGRAM

Question No. 26—Mr. Broadbent:

1. What countries are participating in the NATO communications research program established in 1967?

2. What have been the total expenditures for this program for the years 1967, 1968, 1969 and the estimated expenditures for 1970, 1971 and 1972?

3. For each of the above past years, what has been the respective expenditure contribution by Canada and the other seven countries?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Belgium, Canada, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway and the United States of America.

2. Total expenditures are not known as this is not a commonly funded program. Participating countries provide their own ground equipment for testing purposes using a satellite made available by the United States.

3. Expenditures by Canada for ground equipment are as follows: 1967-68, $50,000.00; 1968-69, $438,754.46; 1969-70, $147,000.00.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

AGRICULTURE——FINAL REPORT OF TASK FORCE

Question No. 36—Mr. Gleave:

When is it anticipated that the federal Task Force on Agriculture will submit its final report to the federal government?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The Task Force is expected to submit its report to the Minister by December 1969.

STANDARDS FOR SALE AND PURCHASE OF MEAT PRODUCTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): In so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned: Established standards for the carcasses of beef, veal, lamb and mutton, hogs and poultry are set out in regulations under the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, Order-in-Council P.C. 1958-991, 1958-1058, 1968-2279 and 1959-1211. Under the Meat Inspection Act, prescribed standards are established to ensure wholesomeness of imported meat products and domestic meat or meat food products moved into interprovincial or export trade.

1. Which countries have submitted requests to the Government of Canada to share in the use of Canada's space satellites Alouette I and Alouette II?

2. Which countries presently have working agreements with Canada regarding the use of Canada's space satellites?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. As a result of the offer by the Government of Canada to share in the use of the Canada's Alouette I and II satellites, representatives of nine countries have expressed a definite interest. They are: Peru, Spain, Nigeria, Denmark, Israel, Taiwan, South Africa, Poland and Finland.

2. The countries which presently have a formal working agreement with Canada regarding the use of Canada's space satellites Alouette and ISIS are: USA, UK, France, Norway, Japan, Australia and India.

DRUG INFORMATION BULLETIN

Question No. 72—Mr. Saltsman:

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BIAFRA—AID FOR STARVING—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 26 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood, the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the Prime Minister's answer to a question on Friday, reported at page 824 of Hansard, stating that the Biafran authorities do not permit daylight flights and are using night flights of relief supplies in order to screen shipments of arms. I might say that the concluding words have been changed from the words actually used by the Prime Minister, which were "bring in shipments of arms".

In view of the fact that this statement may seriously prejudice the longstanding Canadian tradition of neutrality, as well as endanger the extensive relief operation upon which the lives of millions of civilians depend, I ask Your Honour to give consideration to allowing this motion to be put.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has proposed to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a statement made by the Prime Minister on Friday last. As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal knows, and as all hon. members know, what the Chair has to determine is not whether the matter itself is one of importance but whether the House should be adjourned for an emergency debate under the terms of Standing Order 26.

The Standing Order cannot be invoked to initiate a debate about an issue which is of a continuing nature. It would appear that even when one takes into full account the observation by the Prime Minister to which the hon. member alluded, the essence of the problem is one which hon. members have had in mind for many months and, indeed, have debated in this House on several occasions. Even if it were argued that a new dimension has been added, the substance of the matter remains the same and, unfortunately, is likely to remain the same for a while yet.

The Standing Order also requires the Chair to pay regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means. I should think there will be a number of such opportunities. For these reasons I must rule, with some regrets, that the hon. member's proposed motion cannot be submitted to the House at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NIGERIA-BIAFRA—POSITION ON CIVIL WAR, RELIEF AND ARMS SHIPMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the right hon. gentleman's comment on Friday accusing the Biafran authorities of using relief agencies to bring in arms shipments, or to screen arms shipments. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether this extremely partisan denunciation of Colonel Ojukwu indicates that Canada has abandoned its posture of non-involvement or neutrality in connection with the civil war and that the government is now committed to full support of the position of General Gowon and the federal Nigerian authorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have always taken the position, Mr. Speaker, that General Gowon headed the legitimate government in Nigeria and that Colonel Ojukwu was the leader of a secessionist group. The Canadian government has always managed to stay out of this civil war despite the proddings of both opposition parties to become involved, through the use of our aircraft and so on, on the secessionist side. Our position has not changed, but as observers of this civil war we feel that we have reached the stage at which it is obvious to this government and, perhaps, to more Canadians than previously, that Colonel Ojukwu is really not interested in allowing daylight flights.

The suggestion regarding daylight flights has been put to him in a variety of ways by this government, by the United States government and by other governments, not directly but by making available to him ways in which the Red Cross could commence daylight flights. Colonel Ojukwu has never seen his way clear to receive such flights, and that is why we regretfully draw the conclusion that Colonel Ojukwu is less concerned with starving children in Biafra than he is with receiving arms and perhaps scoring political propaganda victories across the world.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister stated that the Biafran authorities are using night flights for the purpose of bringing in arms. I should like to know whether this statement is based on surmise or upon information provided by relief agencies working in the area. Would the Prime Minister indicate from where he gets his information, in view of the fact that our observer teams seem only to have visited that part of Nigeria controlled by the federal authorities. Would the Prime Minister indicate on what source of information he bases these very serious charges?

Mr. Trudeau: The source is Colonel Ojukwu himself and the Biafran authorities, who seem to be intent on cooking up reasons for not accepting daylight flights. The I.C.R.C.—the International Committee of the Red Cross—the Canadian Red Cross, the Canadian government, the United States government and other governments, have been proposing ways in which supplies of food, drugs and other medicines can be brought into Biafra if only the Biafran authorities would allow the airstrip to be used during daytime.

The I.C.R.C. have been negotiating with the Nigerian authorities an agreement whereby the forces of Nigeria would let daylight flights take place for the purpose of bringing in relief supplies. The Canadian government has discussed the possibility of supplying observers on the I.C.R.C. flights to make sure that these flights bring in food and medical supplies only, thereby guaranteeing to the Nigerians that the daylight flights would not be used to bring in arms. Always, for one reason or another, the Biafran authorities have refused these daylight flights. I suggest that if the members of the opposition and other people in this country who are sympathetic to the plight of the Biafran civilian population would only look at the situation objectively they might cease swallowing Biafran propaganda and make it easier for the I.C.R.C. to bring in daylight flights with relief supplies.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has indicated that his charge against Colonel Ojukwu is based simply upon surmise, not upon information that in fact the Biafran authorities are using night flights for the purpose in bringing in arms. Am I correct in thinking that the Prime Minister's statement is surmise?

Mr. Trudeau: It is not a question of surmise, Mr. Speaker. It is known that night flights do bring in arms to Biafra. There is no surmise involved here.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I put this question to the Prime Minister. Leaving General Ojukwu out of the picture and without assessing blame either on the part of Nigeria or Biafra, does the Prime Minister's statement mean that the government has ceased to consider or has turned down requests by Canairelief for assistance in saving the starving people of Biafra, or is he using his view regarding General Ojukwu's propaganda as an excuse for not doing anything about it?

Mr. Trudeau: Not at all, Mr. Speaker. We are prepared to consider other ways of getting supplies to the starving people of Biafra. We have suggested other ways, including airdrops, use of helicopters, river crossings and so on. It always happens that the Biafran authorities do not see their way clear to accepting these alternative ways. As I said the other day, the question is not the availability of supplies. It is not as though there is nothing available to send in the way of food and other supplies to Biafra. It is the way of getting them in which poses the problem. The hon. member should not draw the conclusion that we are not interested in making supplies available. We have not yet come up with any more sensible way of doing this than by bringing supplies in by day, and I am surprised that the opposition does not support us on this.

Mr. Brewin: Will the government not consider using the available means now being used, namely, Canairelief and joint churchaid which are actually doing the job now but need the help of this government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have always taken the position that we were supporting the International Red Cross. The International Red Cross did bring in supplies for a long period of time. It is now their judgment that the best way of bringing them in would be by day. We do not want to stand in their way in finding ways of bringing supplies in by day. It is recognized that the amount of supplies which could be brought in would be multiplied manyfold if Colonel Ojukwu would allow daylight flights to take place. If in any event the Red Cross throws up its hands and says nothing else can be done, then we will consider alternate ways of helping the starving population. I repeat that the easiest way of doing so would be to permit daylight flights, and we can see no sensible argument beyond the propaganda one for refusing such daylight flights.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

A few months ago the Prime Minister mentioned that children from Biafra could emigrate to Canada. I would like to ask him whether he has had a favourable response from Canadian families or institutions willing to receive these children and whether his invitation still stands.

Mr. Trudeau: To place my reply within the proper context, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the question had been whether Hercules aircraft transporting foodstuffs to Biafra could also be used to bring children out of that country. I replied that I had no objection to this if accommodation could be found for the children and I suggested that there might possibly be offers of hospitality from volunteer homes.

I must say that I received no offer, nor did I hear of Canadians having volunteered in significant number to keep Biafran children. But on the contrary I heard arguments to the effect that this would not help Biafra, our climate being adverse, and so on.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister be good enough to indicate what relief agencies now supported by the Canadian people and organizations are being used, to use his expression, to bring arms into Biafra?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is known that air flights during the night are bringing in arms, and it is known that Colonel Ojukwu is refusing daylight flights. It is obvious, and it has also been reported by pilots flying on these runs, that the arms flights and the food flights are intermingled. Therefore I have no identification of the particular planes where arms have been intermingled. We do know this is the way arms get in, under cover of the relief supply flights.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in response to questions by the Leader of the Opposition earlier I wonder whether the Prime Minister was not overstating the case a bit when he indicated that Biafra had come to no agreement on daylight flights? In the course of the many negotiations which have taken place with both Biafra and Nigeria in the last few months there have been times of agreement by one side or the other but never by both sides at once. Perhaps the Prime Minister would agree with that.

Coming to the important part of my question, during the Prime Minister's speech in the debate in reply to the Throne Speech a few weeks ago he indicated that if the objections now stopping flights into Biafra were not removed the government would be prepared to take further measures. Can he qualify this statement and indicate whether he has received any specific suggestions or how long the government plans to wait before—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: On the second part of the question, I have been discussing with the Secretary of State for External Affairs these future possible steps. He is returning from his trip tonight and I will ask him if he has in mind announcing any further steps within the next little while. The steps have been discussed by the minister and myself. It is a matter of deciding when we can usefully take them.

On the first part of the question, I suppose the best answer would be to refer the House to the White House statement issued on November 12 which disclosed the various steps that the United States government has taken in order to ensure that daylight flights would come into being. They sought and obtained the assurance of the government of Nigeria that no hostile military action would be taken against the I.C.R.C. relief flights. Additionally, and in consultation with other governments including the Canadian government, they were prepared to discuss the supply of impartial observers to accompany such I.C.R.C. aircraft. Third, Ambassador Ferguson was sent by President Nixon to give the Biafrans the specific pledge of the federal government of Nigeria as to the inviolability of the I.C.R.C. daylight relief flights.

So, this is not only the Canadian government's view. The United States government's experience as well has been that they have gone to the Biafran authorities with reasonable propositions for bringing in daylight flights to Uli airport and the Biafrans have said no. They have given military reasons for this. They give the reason that they do not want other countries to know where Uli airstrip is situated because it would harm the military effort, the effort they are making to bring in arms by night, so—

An hon. Member: This is a war.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course it is a war. But the question is, do Colonel Ojukwu and the opposition think that arms are more important than food for starving children?

An hon. Member: What do you think?

Mr. Trudeau: The point has been reached where we have to make up our minds; otherwise we are using the starving children to—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder at this point whether the purpose envisioned by the proposed motion of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal has not been at least partly served. In any event, before going to another subject I understand the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has a further supplementary. Perhaps this supplementary might be allowed and then we will go on to another subject.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government has been asked for financial assistance by Canairelief in order to fly medical and food supplies into Biafra and whether that request for financial assistance has been refused? If so, has it been refused because the government insists that these flights be daylight flights or is the government refusing it because it considers the Red Cross to be the only agency that can do this work despite the fact that the Red Cross has given up this project since last June?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak of any recent request. There may have been some; I do not know. But if there have been any recent requests I would venture to say we have not refused them flatly. It is true that earlier in past months we did take the position that the International Red Cross was the proper vehicle for bringing in the supplies because the International Red Cross was recognized as a non-partisan body, the Nigerian government had authorized such supplies and that it was therefore natural for the Canadian government to use this vehicle. Now, since it appears as though the International Red Cross itself is in difficulty in bringing in supplies, I repeat that we are looking at alternate means.

I do want to make it clear that there is no suspicion on our part that Canairelief or the churches are effectively bringing in arms. That is perhaps why the blues were changed without my knowledge—

An hon. Member: Ah ha!

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, ah ha—to replace the words "under the cover of" by "screening". There was no intention on my part—and I hope the House understood that—to indicate that the night flights of Canairelief were actually bringing in arms. What I did indicate was that the night flights of food supplies were serving as a cover for arms supplies, and I still stand by this statement.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are other hon. members who have supplementary questions. I suggest to the House that the time has come to move on to another subject. Hopefully we might return to this subject matter if there is time at the end of the question period. Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has a question on another subject.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEEL AND AUTOMOBILE PRICE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but I see he has left the chamber. Therefore I will direct it to the Prime Minister. I see the minister coming in now; he must be emerging from his cocoon. May I ask the minister when he expects to report to the House on his department's investigation into the recent increases in the price of steel and automobiles, or report on the results of the investigation by the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): My understanding of the inquiry being conducted by the Prices and Incomes Commission is that they are now engaged in it and hope to report as quickly as possible.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister anticipate that this report will be made fairly soon, and will the report of the commission be made public or will the minister himself report to the House on the basis of the information he receives from the commission?

Mr. Basford: There is no doubt that the report will be made public.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the consumer price index rose again in October and is now 4.4 per cent higher than in October, 1968, the rise having been brought about by recent increases in the prices of gasoline, refrigerators, hydro, housing, clothing and health care in the three provinces without medicare—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that this is not a question but a statement. Last week I took the liberty of bringing to the attention of hon. members the fact that questions being posed by them sounded more like statements than questions. Perhaps hon. members may like to bear this in mind.

Mr. Crouse: I should like to ask whether the minister or any of his officials had consultations with the 25 manufacturing industries in Canada that signed contracts in the third quarter involving wage gains averaging 9.3 per cent before they did so?

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker, but, as I pointed out to the House before, the Prices and Incomes Commission is endeavouring to work out a package of restraint with employers, trade unions, landlords and all the economic interests in the country to pledge themselves to a certain program of restraint.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us if he has had consultations with provincial authorities in this regard and is he able to report on such consultations?

Mr. Basford: I have not but the Prices and Incomes Commission has.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My supplementary question is with regard to the general policy of restraint. In view of the minister's statement in the House last week about a specific increase in Shell Oil prices, is the minister prepared now to give his views about the reported increase in nickel prices in the world market as a result of the settlement at Inco which was confirmed over the weekend, as he indicated on November 12 he might be prepared to do?

Mr. Basford: The latest report I have—this was why I was out of the House a moment ago—is that under the Ontario labour law some voting is still taking place, and I think any comment from me at this time would be inappropriate.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the voting is concluded can we expect the minister to make a statement in the House in the same vein, depending on how he wants to state the case, about both the Inco problem and the Shell Oil problem?

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he will instruct the Prices and Incomes Commission to investigate the effect that these increases in oil and steel are going to have on costs in the farming sector which has been unable to increase its prices to consumers?

Mr. Basford: The Prices and Incomes Commission is examining the whole question of increases in steel prices and, I am sure, will take into account any effect they may have on the tremendously important farming community in Canada. With regard to oil, all the companies have not implemented price increases.

INFLATION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question which I should like to address to the minister. Last week, in answer to an inquiry, the minister stated that he would confer with the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission as to the desirability of the minister making a statement in the House on motions about the progress which the commission has made in persuading management to keep down prices and labour leaders to keep down wage demands. As a result of those conversations with the chairman, is the minister now prepared to make such a statement on motions?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the hon. member's question I discussed the idea of making an additional statement in the House with the chairman of the commission who felt that at the moment such a statement would not add to the situation, but the chairman did hope to be able to make further statements as time went on as to the progress that he and the commission will be making.

Mr. Hees: I have a further supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As voluntary methods now appear not to be effective in preventing prices and wages from rising, is the Prime Minister planning to introduce the other measures which he indicated the government would be prepared to introduce if voluntary methods proved to be ineffective?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, we are planning in the sense that we believe in long-range planning.

Mr. Hees: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that we believe in short-range planning also, is the Prime Minister going to do what he said he was going to do—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

VANCOUVER—NEW PROJECT AND "PROJECT 200"

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. I gave him notice of the question last week and I understand that with your consent, Your Honour, he is prepared to answer it today. Can the minister state if any preparations are under way for a new federal building in Vancouver, and is consideration being given to the interests of the adjacent "Project 200" property?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be put on the Order Paper. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that an exception cannot be made with regard to this question on a very important building in his constituency because such questions would be asked every day. The question, therefore, should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Winch: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WORK OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, would the minister consult his colleague so that a statement can be made in the House concerning the progress that may have been made by the intergovernmental committee on immigration matters, particularly with regard to immigration curbs placed by United States legislation on Canadians entering that country, and also indicating what kind of representations have been made to the United States government with respect to this problem?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will be glad to discuss this question with my colleague and have him report on it.

GRAIN

PRODUCTION GUIDELINES FOR WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that western farmers are being urged to adjust their future grain production to potential markets, is the government giving consideration to issuing production guidelines before the crop is planted next spring?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): In a few days there will be what we call an outlook conference in Ottawa involving the Department of Agriculture, all the provincial Departments of Agriculture and representatives of many farm organizations, at which time I hope some guidelines will be forthcoming from that conference along the lines suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I have supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in regard to guidelines for farm production. Is it the intention of the minister to report on the recent meeting in Rome on world food supplies and what markets we can expect will be available to agricultural producers in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the minister is to make a statement it should be made on motions.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, will the minister be making a statement on motions in regard to the meeting in Rome?

Mr. Olson: I will consider that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the forthcoming outlook conference. Will the recommendations of that conference be any more reliable than the ones made in January, 1967?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

OILSEEDS—MOVEMENT TO MARKET POSITION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that market reports at the end of last week showed that farmers and exporters are still frustrated by lack of ability to move oilseeds into market positions, can he give the House some assurance that steps are being taken to see that flax and rapeseed can move to market outlets, particularly for export?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are doing everything we can. The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) replied a few days ago that some of the allegations made in the press respecting some of these oilseeds were not true, or at least they were not completely factual. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the channels also have to be kept open, at least to some extent, for the people who have wheat, oats and barley to sell.

PESTICIDES

DDT—DISPOSAL OF STOCKS ON HAND

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to reply to a question addressed to me last Friday respecting the disposal of stocks of DDT because of the restrictions placed on the use of this pesticide. I shall be very brief. The program that was announced was one of planned reduction in the use of DDT and some uses are still permitted. We expect that stocks of this material will be directed to those uses still permitted. Finally, I want to say that the preliminary survey by my department of total stocks of DDT in Canada indicates that they are much less than some of the reports in the press would indicate.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the survey included stocks of DDT held by government departments, and whether or not there is any intention to continue to call for tenders for the sale of these stocks to the public?

Mr. Olson: Yes, the survey of stocks included them. In reply to the second part of the question, I will have to check.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON ARCTIC DEVELOPMENT—REPRESENTATION BY ESKIMOS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I apologize for directing it to him but in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I have no option because there is some urgency involved. Will representatives of the Eskimos of Canada be present at the meetings of the International Congress on Arctic Development and the Future of Eskimo Societies, to be held in France next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this question as notice.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, since the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken the question as notice, perhaps he might also take a supplementary question as notice. If the answer to the first question is yes, can we be told who or what groups of Eskimos will be representing Canada?

[Translation]

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO MUNICIPAL LAW

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): I wish to direct a question ot the Minister of Justice.

Has he received representations from individuals or organizations asking that steps be taken by his department in connection with the bylaw adopted by the city of Montreal to ban demonstrations?

Mr. Speaker: I think that one or several similar questions were asked last week.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

PREVOST COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING GAMBLING

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice.

Is he acquainted with the fifth part of the final report of the Prévost Commission in the province of Quebec concerning the Criminal Code? If so, has his attention been held by some recommendations to turn gambling into a social and legal operation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I am acquainted with it, Mr. Speaker, but I have not read it yet.

MANPOWER

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FORMER FAIREY AVIATION EMPLOYEES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Can he indicate what steps his department is taking in connection with what appears to be widespread hiring discrimination on account of age in connection with the large lay-offs which took place some weeks ago at Fairey Aviation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would need more details before I could make a sensible answer. I think the subject of fair standards is under the administration of the Department of Labour. In this particular case it may be under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

[Later:]

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Would he, in co-operation with his colleagues and anyone else who might be involved, take a look at the practice of firms in the Halifax-Dartmouth area of rejecting for employment, simply because they happen to be over 45 or 50 years of age, long-term employees laid off by Fairey Aviation?

PUBLIC WORKS

CHURCHILL—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT OF TOWNSITE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can he advise the House when he may be in a position to announce the plans of the federal government in relation to future development of the townsite of Churchill?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think that would depend entirely on our relations with the province of Manitoba. Discussions are now under way with provincial officials.

Mr. Simpson: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, can the minister say whether or not he has been able to present to cabinet the submission which his department hoped to have ready by November 15?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE INCREASE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It arises out of reports of the increase in the unemployment rate, particularly in the disadvantaged areas of Canada, reports which the Minister of Finance appears to have admitted on a television program last night. In view of this trend, can the minister tell the House what specific programs, if any, his department has evolved to deal with increasing unemployment in the disadvantaged areas of Canada this winter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again I would think this is the kind of statement which should be made on motions. The question might be asked in those terms and the minister might care to reply.

Mr. Lewis: I accept your comment, Mr. Speaker, and indeed could not criticize it. May I ask the minister whether in the next few days he will make a statement on motions to the House on plans he has, if he has any, to deal with unemployment in the disadvantaged areas this winter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware, I believe, of the programs I administer and by the end of the month, as I did last month, I shall table in the House the list of applications received and approved by the department regarding the settlement of new industries. The hon. member will then see the improvement in that field, improvement which will certainly reduce part of the unemployment now existing in the underprivileged regions.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Do I gather from the minister's answer that there are no programs to deal specifically with growing unemployment in the disadvantaged areas?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely why my department exists.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because of the importance of the growing unemployment rate to the disadvantaged areas, would the minister give consideration to discussing with his colleague, the government House leader, the possibility of referring this matter to the Standing Committee on Regional Development?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, that is definitely something that I am ready to discuss with the House leader.

POST OFFICE

DECEMBER SATURDAY DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to that constitutional diplomat, the Postmaster General. As it has apparently been found necessary to resume Saturday mail delivery in order to move the heavy volume of Christmas mail, could the minister advise if he is giving consideration to reinstating regular Saturday mail service in order to speed up mail delivery throughout the year and possibly diminish heavy overtime costs at Christmas?

Mr. Speaker: I have to suggest to the hon. member that essentially he is repeating a question which he has already asked. I would not think that the circumstance mentioned in his question of today changes the situation. I would think that the question could be put on the order paper.

Mr. Macquarrie: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—POSITION OF EXTRADITION APPLICATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's great desire to see justice carried out overcome his desire to avoid the disclosure of an unsavoury association with the government and as a result does he intend now to make a second application for the extradition of Hal Banks, as suggested by the United States State Department?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is not in order.

DRUGS

ALLEGED INEFFECTIVENESS OF PRESCRIPTION PRODUCT—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he say how soon he will be making his statement on the alleged ineffectiveness of certain prescription drugs, which on October 22 he said he would make on motions at the first opportunity?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The statement is about ready; I hope to make it this week.

PUBLIC SERVICE

POLICY AS TO WORKING LANGUAGE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Secretary of State extending government policy beyond present practice when he said, as reported, at the opening of the Public Service language school that some units within the Public Service will eventually use French as the working language?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen the statement, Mr. Speaker. I will look at it.

PENITENTIARIES

DORCHESTER—EXTENSION OF WORK OF JAYCEES WITH PAROLEES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Solicitor General. It relates to the outstanding work being done by the Moncton Jaycees in connection with the establishment of a Jaycee unit in Dorchester Penitentiary and their work with day parolees, of which the minister is aware, I believe, because of his own telegram of congratulations last Saturday night. Could the minister inform the House whether this kind of excellent community involvement is to be extended to other institutions of incarceration across the country and whether assistance will be given to the Moncton Jaycees in obtaining a half-way house for more work of the kind they are doing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be debated at the time of adjournment.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF THIRD VOLUME OF COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Some time ago I asked the Prime Minister when we could expect volume 3 of the B and B Commission report. He undertook to look into the matter and report to the House.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did make inquiries. As I recall, the third volume will be in two parts. The first part, volume 3A, is being printed now and will soon be ready for distribution, whereas volume 3B is being prepared for printing and will be presented to the government as soon as completed. Therefore the one will be available very soon and the other, soon.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL REPORT—CHANGE IN ANSWER OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to refer briefly to a point of order that arose during the question period. It relates to the answer given by the Prime Minister on page 824 of Hansard to a question on Biafra. I submit that the words actually spoken by the Prime Minister were "to bring in arms supplies." Those words were changed in Hansard to read: "to screen shipments of arms."

The change in Hansard was such that an entirely different interpretation could be taken from the answer. An entirely different view became apparent from the wording printed in Hansard, and the words printed were not the ones spoken by the Prime Minister.

During his reply the Prime Minister stated that there was a change but that it was not made with his authority. The point of order I raise is: Who is entitled to change Hansard other than the hon. member who spoke the words? If the Prime Minister himself did not make the change, I believe it should not have been made by anyone on his behalf. I think this is fundamental to our procedure. My second point is: To what extent can any change be made in Hansard which would alter completely the sense of an answer that has been given? I raise these questions because the Prime Minister may wish to expand upon the statement he made earlier.

I do think this question should bear some consideration. If the Prime Minister did not make this change and if he admits that it was made, it ought to be stated who made it and on what authority. If the Prime Minister would clarify this point I think it would be of some assistance for future reference. If he is unable to do so I would appreciate it if Your Honour would give consideration to this matter and decide just who, other than the hon. member who speaks the words, is authorized to make such changes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, essentially the answer is that the change did not change the sense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Essentially, the statement could be interpreted in two ways. The statement was that the Biafran authorities are using the night flights. I said that the difficulty with relief flights is based on the fact that the Biafran authorities do not permit daylight flights and that they are using the night flights of relief supplies in order to bring in shipments of arms, which statement I still stand by. If, as I explained earlier, they are using other night flights in order to bring in shipments of arms, then obviously they are not using Canairelief flights to bring in arms but are using the night flights for food supplies and so on in order that they may be able to bring in arms supplies.

This is a perfectly valid statement by which I stand. Obviously it could have been interpreted to mean that all night flights were being used to bring in arms. It is because of this ambiguity that someone in my office, who has authority to correct my grammar sometimes and put in commas and clarify my statements when that does not change the sense has obviously put in the words, "screen shipments—"

Mr. Lewis: But that is not the question.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the question—whether the change changes the sense of the words. I assure the House that I do not spend my nights reading the Hansard blues. I have better things to do.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO BILL C-3

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, prior to Your Honour calling order No. 5 for consideration, may I raise a point of order with respect to today's procedure in dealing with the bill. There have been discussions among representatives of the parties with regard to limiting the debate on today's business under Standing Order 75A to the present days sitting. Unfortunately, unanimous agreement of the representatives of the parties could not be obtained. I wonder, nevertheless, if the House would be prepared to consider making a special order confining debate on that bill to the present day's sitting. We would limit debate on second reading of the bill to today and, as a condition thereof, suspend private members' hour for today.

If there is general agreement I would propose that the House make an order that at 10 p.m. today Mr. Speaker shall interrupt proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion for second reading and reference of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and that for that purpose proceedings on private members' business shall be suspended for this day. Perhaps the House might be prepared to make that order.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, we of this party are agreeable to that. We can put forward our position in that period of time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say that we were also prepared to agree to this under Standing Order 75A. Since that was not possible, we hope there may be general agreement in the House to do what the minister has now proposed with the understanding, of course, that we shall postpone private members' hour and thus have a full day's debate on this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on principle, we cannot accept standing order 75A or 75B, nor any such rule.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill, which received first reading on October 27, proposes a number of significant amendments to the Criminal Code. I think hon. members on both sides of the House will concede that the bill has enjoyed the benefit of a long legislative history. As far back as January, 1965, the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Guy Favreau, whose passing we all regret, announced the appointment of a special committee to study and report upon the problems related to the dissemination of varieties of hate propaganda and hate literature in this country.

It is a matter of record that a very distinguished committee, under the chairmanship of the then Dean of Law at McGill University, Maxwell Cohen, studied at length the questions relating to hate literature and hate propaganda. In addition to Dean Cohen the following persons comprised the committee: Dr. J. A. Corry, Principal, Queens University; l'abbé Gérard Dion, Faculty of Social Sciences, Laval University; Mr. Saul Hayes, Q.C., Executive Vice-President, Canadian Jewish Congress; Professor Mark R. MacGuigan, Association Professor of Law, University of Toronto, now the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville; Mr. Shane MacKay, Executive Editor, Winnipeg Free Press and Professor Pierre Elliott Trudeau, as he then was, Associate Professor of Law, University of Montreal.

Following the committee's report in November, 1965, the bill was introduced as Bill S-49. This was during the 27th parliament, 1966-67. On November 7, that bill was given first reading and on March 20 it was read a second time on division in the other place and referred to a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons for consideration. The 12 members of this House nominated to serve on that joint committee were Messrs. Baldwin, Forest, Klein, Gauthier, Leboe, Lewis, Mandziuk, Mongrain, Nasserden, Reid, Tolmie and Walker. However, the session ended on May 8, 1967 without Bill S-49 being further considered.

In the second session of the 27th parliament the provisions of Bill S-49 were introduced as Bill S-5. That bill also received first and second reading and on November 21, 1967 and was referred to a special committee of the Senate, which had already been appointed on November 2, 1967. The special committee of the Senate met and heard evidence on three occasions early in 1968. I believe the dates were February 14 and 29 and March 7. However, the 27th parliament came to an end on April 23, before the bill could be further considered.

The bill was again introduced in the same form as previous bills in the first session of the 28th parliament, as Bill S-21, was again given first and second readings and referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The standing committee held 11 public meetings, heard 32 witnesses and received representations from some 17 organizations. The Senate committee presented its report, which was adopted on June 17, 1969, and on the same day the Senate read the bill a third time on division and passed it. The bill was given first reading in the House of Commons on June 19, 1969.

It should perhaps be mentioned here that Bill S-21, as passed by the Senate, was amended in certain respects. By way of general comment only, and without getting into the details of the bill, by way of a trespass upon the rules of this House, the offence of advocating genocide was modified so as to include two acts and not five. In addition, that offence was made referable to an "identifiable group" which is to be tested or determined by reference to "religion" as well as by the other tests of colour, race or ethnic origin. The definition of an identifiable group was changed by the addition of the term "religion". In addition, a new definition was added to safeguard freedom of expression on a religious subject and this addition was tied in with the addition of "religion" as one of the tests of an identifiable group. The requirement of the consent of the Attorney General was added in relation to the offences of advocating or promoting genocide, of wilful promotion of hatred and contempt and also in relation to the in rem forfeiture provisions. I pointed out that the present Bill C-3 is in exactly the same form as Bill S-21 which received first reading in the House of Commons last June 19, as I previously mentioned.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

At this point I would like to summarize briefly the main effects of this bill. If the bill is enacted by parliament, it will create three new offences: First, the offence of advocating or promoting genocide; second, the offence of public incitement of hatred and contempt likely to lead to a breach of the peace; third, wilful promotion of hatred or contempt. In addition, the bill provides for in rem proceedings that will permit the seizure and forfeiture of hate propaganda publications.

The bill defines genocide so as to include two specific acts, namely the killing of members of any identifiable group or the deliberate inflicting of conditions of life calculated to bring about the physical destruction of an identifiable group. The offences of public incitement, of hatred and contempt and wilful promotion of hatred and contempt are constituted by "communicating statements." "Communicating statements" is broadly defined so as to include all forms of audible or visual communication.

The consent of the Attorneys-General of the provinces will be required for prosecution of the offences of advocating genocide and wilful promotion of hatred. It will also be required for the institution of the in rem proceedings. However, prosecution of the public incitement offence, that is to say public incitement of hatred and contempt likely to lead to a breach of the public order or peace, does not require the consent of the Attorney-General. Obviously, if the probable effect would be calculated to involve the public order, then the reason for requiring the consent of the Attorney-General would not be as pertinent since the essence of the offence is the likelihood of a breach of the peace.

While no statutory defence is provided in the case of the public incitement offence, in the case of the wilful promotion offence, three statutory defences are provided. The first is related to the expression of opinion on a religious subject. The second and third can be regarded as the standard defamatory libel defences of truth or, alternatively, reasonable belief in the truth of the statement combined with public interest in the statement.

I am of course fully aware of the significant objections that have been taken against this bill by a number of very prominent persons who are as vitally concerned as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I are with the problem of civil rights. Some of these persons have said that the bill is not necessary and that the criminal law process should not be used for this purpose. In the alternative, they say that the provisions of the Criminal Code are sufficient to deal with the problems as they now stand.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. gentleman answer a question at this stage?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will entertain a question at the end of what I have to say; I shall not be long.

Notwithstanding the very cogent arguments which have been advanced against the bill both in the Senate and publicly, the government, after a good deal of analysis, accepts as sound the conclusions of the special committee under the chairmanship of Dean Cohen regarding the present inadequate state of the criminal law in Canada. I would mention in this regard the conclusions set out at page 49 of the report to the effect, and I quote:

> —it is evident that the Criminal Code, even on the widest interpretation, does little or nothing to protect groups from the evils of hate propaganda.

At the committee stage, if this bill is referred to a committee, we shall undoubtedly wish to consider this measure in detail as it affects civil rights and the purposes for which it is intended. In the circumstances, the bill is intended to deal with a special problem which can arise in our society because of excessive reactions to identifiable groups within our community. It is my belief that the present bill treads wisely and warily in this difficult and frequently controversial area of human relations.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I had intended to ask the hon. gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps I was a little hasty. He has, in fact, answered the question I had in mind, though I may say I do not agree with his views.

The first part of the bill, which the minister outlined so carefully, makes it a crime for anyone to advocate or promote genocide. The second part of the measure has to do with incitement of hatred or contempt against an identifiable group. I had been about to ask the minister whether he does not feel that the Criminal Code did not already cover that part.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would be prepared to meet arguments on that point in committee. Briefly, however, we feel that the provisions of the Code, as they stand, are inadequate to meet the purposes of the three clauses of this bill and that it would be appropriate to spell out Parliament's intention more specifically.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you.

I may say at the outset that we support the principle of the bill. I do not think there will be any argument from our side as far as the first part of the bill is concerned, that is to say, the part which states that anyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years. Nevertheless, some questions arise with reference to the concluding clauses, and this is why their provisions will have to be studied with extreme care.

The rationale behind this bill, it seems to us, is that on the balance of public convenience and inconvenience the state should use the criminal law to curtail the right of freedom of speech and the right to privacy in order to prevent the defamation of identifiable groups on the grounds that such defamation might:

1. intimidate or cause mental anguish to a member of such a group; 2. foster a public opinion which, in a suitable combination of sociological, economic and political circumstances, might enable a State to commit genocide against such a group; and

3. in a particular instance, be likely to cause a disturbance in a public place either by inciting violence against a group or violence by the group against the defamer.

I think we need to look at history in order to understand the background of this legislation. In our own generation, in our own lifetime, we have witnessed what is probably the most brutal, barbaric and inhuman treatment of a certain race, of people belonging to a certain religion, in the course of which they were virtually wiped out in several states in Europe. With this in mind, one is bound to support those provisions of the bill which deal with the subject of genocide.

Until the establishment of the United Nations, civil libertarians concentrated their efforts on attaining and enshrining the fundamental freedoms of speech, press, religion, assembly and association. Since then, and to a large extent because of the influence through the United Nations of the newly independent countries of Africa and Asia, increasing emphasis has been placed on the establishment of the right of everyone to equal treatment, regardless of race, religion, colour, sex, national or ethnic origin.

Here in Canada, I feel, we can take some pride in having to a large extent achieved these aims. This emphasis on the right to equal treatment has been asserted not only against governments and public institutions, but also against private individuals and organizations. The focus has been on removing the overt acts of discrimination such as the denial of civic and economic equality, and the denial of equal access to employment and accommodation. However, more recently it has been asserted that one of the major lessons we should have learned from the Hitler era was that the ideal of an egalitarian society may be impossible to achieve when the dissemination of racist ideas is permitted. The promotion of hatred against identifiable groups in our society, even if the number of hate propagandists is small, constitutes a danger to a modern democratic society. There has been advocacy of restricting such vilification, even if this is achieved only by restricting certain basic rights of expression.

I do not think there is anything in the Code which directly covers the first part of the bill, though, of course, once an overt act takes place, committed by any person or group of persons, it would, under the Code, constitute murder. Let me draw attention to section 166, which deals with the spreading of false news. This is to be found in Crankshaw's 1959 edition—the latest edition—at page 227. We read:

> Every one who wilfully publishes a statement, tale or news that he knows is false and that causes or is likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

This is the old offence under common law, prosecutions for which seem to have fallen out of fashion. In 1778 there was a case of this kind in which the defendant was indicted for having unlawfully, wickedly and maliciously published false news whereby discord might grow between the King and his subjects or the great men of the realm, by publishing and placarding a printed paper or notice falsely announcing that an order-in-council had been made by the King proclaiming war with France. This is an old case, referred to as Scott's case; it is to be found in the New Newgate Calendar. It has been decided in Canada that publication of a placard stating that settlers from the United States are not wanted in Canada is an injury to the public interest and that the person wilfully and knowingly publishing such false statements was guilty of spreading false news. This is the case of R. v. Hoaglin. It has further been held that an accused who has been acquitted on a charge of publishing a seditious libel cannot afterward be prosecuted in respect of the same publication of spreading false news and that the words "whereby injury or mischief is occasioned to any public interest" in the latter section must contemplate a seditious intention, since the section is included under the general heading "Seditious Offences".

• (3.20 p.m.)

So, the subject is at least partially covered by the Code at the present time. One of the complaints which has been received is that the bill does not really follow the Cohen report. The minister himself told us that when the measure was before the Senate many people attacked it because in their view it would destroy the greatest civil right enjoyed by any democracy, namely, freedom of speech. This is something at which the committee must take a serious look.

As I pointed out at the beginning, I want to make it very clear that we agree with the principle contained in the first part of the bill without any reservation whatever, particularly in view of what happened in Europe during our generation.

However, I should like to quote from an article in the Globe and Mail that deals with a matter that the committee must approach with great care and study. This article deals with a position that was taken by many witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee, people from across Canada who had distinguished themselves not only as lawyers but in the field of sociology and other fields. This article reads in part:

> There is every indication that a Canadian hate bill would have the same effect.

That is a reference to what happened in Great Britain, where the legislation, instead of helping the people it was intended to serve, worked against them.

> It could become one of the most iniquitous and oppressive pieces of legislation in the books. There are several volatile issues in Canada. Language is one: religious differences between Protestants and Catholics constitute another. Walk into an urban renewal area in almost any city and you'll find residents who are trigger-tense. The greatest potential the bill has is for backfiring.

In other words, the bill may work against the group that we are trying to protect.

> The ludicrous aspect of the hate bill is that the laws of criminal libel provide the same protection against dissemination of hate while, at the same time, offering safeguards to freedom of speech and guarantees against unjust prosecution that the hate bill doesn't have.
> Too often the bill is characterized by its supporters as legislating against the virulent kind of hate that leads to genocide. That is a false picture. The bill contains a section making it a crime to advocate or promote genocide.

That is on all fours with what I say about the principle of this bill.

The remaining sections deal with inciting or promoting hatred or contempt of any group that can be identified by race, colour, religion or ethnic origin.

If I may just pause there. As the minister knows, the bill that was before the Senate made no provisions regarding religious groups, but this has been remedied by the new bill. I think this change resulted from the evidence given by the witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee, particularly by the Very Reverend Ernest Marshall Howse of the United Church. The Globe and Mail article continues:

There's a world of difference between promoting contempt and advocating genocide.

The widespread concern expressed during the three years that the bill has been contemplated should demand second thoughts from members of parliament, now that the bill has been introduced in the House.

These second thoughts are going to be shared by the committee. Let me tell the minister that we have a good standing committee. We work well together. Members of all parties generally agree with most amendments that are made to the Criminal Code. I hope that in this case the committee will be able to hear evidence, as did the Senators, regarding incitement of hate and contempt with which the second part of the bill deals.

At this point, may I bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a matter of concern to those on this side of the House. I refer to a particular philosophy that is becoming increasingly evident on the part of the government. In fact, the minister himself touched on this matter when he addressed the Canadian Bar Association and talked about placing control over wire tapping in the hands of the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorneys General of the various provinces.

According to the amendment contained in clause 1, no proceeding for an offence under Section 267A shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General. That is a proceeding connected with genocide. The same provision is made in the proposed section 267B which deals with public incitement of hatred.

My fear about this provision is this. Take the case of a group of persons who are charged under this section because the Attorney General of Canada or the Attorney General of a province thinks they are committing genocide or inciting hatred. Another group of persons may act in identical fashion, but the Attorney General, in his own good graces, for political or other reasons, does not feel they are inciting hatred or committing genocide, and thus no charges are laid.

This is a situation that could occur and I submit that these provisions establish a very dangerous precedent. If these provisions are accepted, then the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorneys General of the provinces are given too much power. After all, such appointments are made by the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers of the provinces. Basically, these appointees are responsible within their own jurisdictions for the administration of justice in Canada. Nevertheless, they are elected by political parties, and to that extent are partisan. They are appointed by cabinets and are political animals. They are appointed by governments to administer justice as well as they can. I also suggest that far too much power is given the Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General of the various provinces in the matter of freedom of speech, which is one of the great civil liberties of any democracy.

We are all aware of the fact that the present Minister of Justice will not always be minister, and I do not question his integrity here. But I repeat that certain groups may be charged under the first part of the bill or under the second part simply because the Attorney General of Canada or the Attorneys General of the provinces feel a charge should be laid, whereas another group performing identical acts may be let off the hook. This is one of the first problems, as far as I can see, with which the committee will have to come to grips when it begins study of the bill.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Is the hon. member aware that the provision about which he is talking, namely the necessity for obtaining the consent of the Attorney General to institute a proceeding, was introduced into the bill as a result of an amendment made in the other place?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not question that at all. However, I am not making my arguments in the other place. I have not got there yet and many of us never will. I am talking about the bill that has been presented to the House of Commons. If this bill receives second reading, goes to committee and returns unchanged, then in view of the way Liberals vote it will receive third reading and become the law of Canada.

I should like to make reference at this point to the Cohen report. The bill does not follow that report. I should like to refer to what Professor Walter Tarnopolsky had to say when writing for the University of British Columbia "Law Review".

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Would my friend give me the year?

Mr. Woolliams: The 1967 edition, page 55. He said:

> If the wording of the Cohen Committee had been adopted, although it would probably not change our substantive law, at least we could be more certain that the crime of genocide was an act intended to bring about physical destruction, put out of existence, take the lives of, put to death, kill, etc. the members of a specifically defined "readily identifiable group". If parliament were to adopt the wording of section 267A, would it not thereby make it a crime to advocate abortions to "destroy" the "group of persons" who could be described as "seriously deformed babies"? I do not suggest that one should advocate such destruction, but are we prepared to make advocacy of such acts an indictable offence punishable with imprisonment for up to five years? Could not Christian Scientists and Jehovah's Witnesses argue that the act of declaring their children to be wards of the court for the purpose of giving them blood transfusions is an act committed with intent to "destroy" them as a group, i.e. "forcibly transferring children of the group to another group"? Could not the Sons of Freedom Doukhobour argue that acts like transferring the Freedomite children from the control of their parents to the control of a group of public officials, is an act committed with intent to "destroy" their way of life, i.e. to "destroy in whole or in part any group of persons?"
>
> The Cohen committee stressed that the definition of genocide should be restricted to "the annihilation of identifiable groups for no other reason than they are what they are". The committee did not want to include advocacy and promotion of revolution against constituted authority because it was prepared to concede "as a philosophical argument that there may be a genuine social interest in not totally excluding advocacy and promotion of violence against state authorities—"

• (3:30 p.m.)

Of course, we see today that the protest movement has grown as never before, and States are now accepting open protests. There is no doubt about the fact that democracy is working in the streets. That is why there has been some criticism of the right to freedom of speech, to speak one's mind. There has been some criticism of what is taking place today in a city in Canada. There have been similar protests to those that took place in the United States and, whether or not you agree with those who are protesting they were quiet, orderly and peaceful. This right to protest constitutes one form of freedom of speech. Of course, freedom of speech means not only the right to speak, but also the right to be silent. That, in itself, is freedom of speech.

Let me once again emphasize that we are in favour of the first part of the bill. We are in favour of the principle of the bill because the principle is that, on a balance of public convenience and inconvenience, the State should use the criminal law to curtail the right to freedom of speech and the right to privacy in order to prevent the crime of genocide. We are on all fours in that respect.

We must examine very carefully the second part of the bill, because in a democratic State one of the most important civil liberties is the right to freedom of speech. The Globe and Mail states that the ludicrous aspect of the hate bill is that the laws of criminal libel provide the same protection. I should like to hear witnesses appearing before the committee set out fully the law with regard to that particular subject as it now exists in the Criminal Code. I am sure the members of this party want to be assured that this Provision is not a duplication or an extension of a Provision which is already contained in the law. If it is an extension, I should like to know that it is not really taking away freedom of speech, particularly in a democratic State such as we have.

I also hope that the committee members will study very carefully the submissions made by all the witnesses at the Senate hearings so there will be no duplication. We should have a look at what Professor Scott had to say as reported at page 202 of the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, number 9. He was called as a witness and dealt with this particular aspect of freedom of speech as related to these sections. He said:

> There are two positions. We had crisis legislation in 1919 following the Winnipeg strike, which was a crisis. In the other case, the "Padlock Act", there was no crisis at all; just general legislation against propagating Communism, in 1938.
> Then we come to that great legal decade of the fifties when the Supreme Court of Canada enlarged the concept of human rights in a series of magnificent cases, of which this country should be proud. I will mention only a few. There was the Boucher case, which defined the law of sedition and eliminated precisely the factor this bill would re-introduce. That is why I say that this bill is retrograde. The law has advanced and this will take it back.

Then, there was a question asked by Senator Phillips who said:

> Would you develop that a little more, Professor Scott, for a few moments?

Then, Professor Scott stated:

> The old law, sedition, counted as an element in sedition the raising of ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects, and dividing one class from another. This could be dividing a race from another. That used to be sufficient, in itself, to constitute sedition. The Supreme Court in the Boucher case said it was not sufficient in itself to constitute the crime of sedition unless it was accompanied with words or provocations or incitements which were likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

So, basically when the Supreme Court interpreted the law on sedition, it actually covered most of what is contained in this bill. Professor Scott went on to state:

> In other words, under the Boucher decision we were told in Canada that we could publish or utter statements that might have an incidental effect of making people angry and causing a certain amount of ill-will, but it was not illegal until it reached that point where the peace was threatened.

This is like civil law where there has to be a trespass before you can start an action. You just cannot say there will be a trespass, there actually has to be an overt act. The same rule applies here; the peace must be threatened or there must be a reasonable belief that the peace is threatened.

If this bill passes the state of the law will be back to what it was before the Boucher case. I will never forget how delighted all my friends were when the Supreme Court came out with what we thought was a clarification of the law regarding freedom of speech, yet still provided us in Canada with adequate protection against the real danger. In other words, Professor Scott is saying, that a retrograde step was actually taken in respect of those people who dared to stand up to management in 1919. He suggests it would be a backward step if we were to return to the Padlock Law. There must be some over act, as a result of which the peace is threatened.

Let me come back to the peaceful protests that took place in Canada. This is a form of action taken to express an opinion. One need not agree with the people in universities or the people in the streets who protest, but providing the protest is peaceful and the aim of those who protest is not to damage property or to run slipshod over the civil rights of other people, then such protests fall within the right to freedom of speech. This is a right of the people to express themselves, as the people in the United States recently expressed their opinion against the war in Viet Nam. The recent protest march in Washington was one of the largest, but it was quiet and peaceful.

The people in Canada and other democracies must have the right to this kind of protest and must have the right to freedom of speech. If you take away this right you are setting the law back several years, in fact to the last century. As the Globe and Mail suggested, we can go along with the first part of the bill, but the second part might erode or take away freedom of speech not only in respect of our newspapers, radio and television, but in respect of those who assemble in our streets to protest.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this party or most of its members at least, will support this bill. We propose to suggest modifications which we hope will be given full consideration by the committee and will be considered by the minister even before we reach the committee stage. I will outline later on the modifications I propose.

In my view, this bill is directed toward a real, a very great and palpable evil, the evil of deliberate and wilful dissemination of racial hatred. In my view it is the duty of parliament, now that it has the opportunity, to declare that the purposeful incitement of hatred of racial groups is contrary to the moral sense of the Canadian community and ought to be prescribed by law. I am fully aware, as other speakers have said, that there are many staunch defenders of civil liberties who are uneasy about this legislation. My view, on balance, is that this legislation merely prescribes the reasonable limit, by any fair and sensible interpretation, of the ordinary freedom of speech and freedom of expression. There is a real problem. The problem that faces the legislature in dealing with hate propaganda is how to balance freedom of expression on the one hand against abuse by incitement of hatred and violence on the other. There are admittedly two contrary views. The first stresses the danger to freedom of critical expression which we all admit and proclaim is fundamental to our whole system.

It is said that this danger is inherent in any attempt to prohibit or penalize controversial or even offensive modes of speech or writing. According to this school of thought, the disseminators of hate propaganda are only of trifling influence. It is said that unbalanced individuals are more likely to be encouraged by martyrdom, suppression and the attendant publicity, than they are to be deterred. They simply do not deserve to be or are not worthy to be noticed by the law. It is argued that the dangers of hate propaganda are minimal in Canada. It is said the attitudes of mind revealed by such publications and those likely to be affected by them should be dealt with by education and not by legislation. Legislation, it is argued, cannot be adequately and precisely framed in such a way as not to infringe on legitimate freedom of expression.

I want to put forward the other side of the argument which stresses the grave consequences revealed by history of racial hatred in a world compelled by technology to become a "neighbourhood". This side of the argument emphasizes the historic and necessary recognition of limitations to such concepts as freedom of speech which no more than any other concept or freedom can be interpreted as an absolute. It is said there is a widespread but generally latent tendency to hostility toward other groups which can be, and is, exploited by systematic and sometimes skilful promotion of hatred. It is argued on this side—and I accept this argument—that there is an important educative effect in positive legal pronouncements and sanctions and it is an error to keep legislation and education as mutually exclusive alternatives. Both are necessary to deal with this evil.

It is my view that there is need for remedial legislation and that this legislation does not in fact impinge upon any reasonable interpretation of freedom of speech. I do accept the broadest definition of freedom of speech. Indeed, I should like to quote to this House the words of Mr. Justice Rand in the Boucher case already referred to by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). In that case, Mr. Justice Rand said:

> Freedom in thought and speech and disagreement in ideas and beliefs, on every conceivable subject, are of the essence of our life. The clash of critical discussion on political, social and religious subjects has too deeply become the stuff of daily experience to suggest that mere ill-will as a product can strike down the latter with illegality.

If it were not disrespectful I would say to Mr. Justice Rand, "Hear, hear". I subscribe to that. What is involved in this legislation is the deliberate fomenting of hatred on the basis of races, groups and religions. That I suggest is quite a different thing from merely ill will. Some people are very exercised about infringement on freedom of speech. Surely, they must recognize that from time immemorial there have been necessary limitations upon freedom of speech. Our laws of libel and slander are the clearest exposition of that. They apply to private individuals. It is recognized that I have no right to destroy my neighbour's reputation by repeating falsehoods about him. By what reasoning then can it be said that the destruction of the reputation and good name of a group of people should not also be condemned. This is just as dangerous in its implication and just as harmful and painful to the victims or recipients as individual defamation. But this for some reason or other is said to be sacrosanct and should be preserved in the name of freedom of speech.

I suggest that our ready and proper acceptance of limitations in respect of the laws of libel apply to group libel as much as private libel. It is said that some of us, including myself, in this party have suggested that the recently passed by-law in Montreal should be submitted to the courts and that we are opposed to its as an infringement of civil liberties. The question then is asked, is it consistent with that view to come forward in this House now and support this bill? I say there is all the difference in the world between these things. In our view, the Montreal by-law is clearly criminal law which is exclusively within the powers of parliament. It is our view that the Montreal by-law clearly infringes upon the legitimate and traditional exercise of the right of demonstration and free speech which has been said by the courts to be the breath of life of parliamentary institutions. But the legislation we are discussing can hardly be said to be other than criminal law and, therefore, its constitutionality cannot be questioned.

There is no parliamentary right to defame and incite hatred against whole groups of people. The Montreal legislation is clearly unnecessary because there is already adequate legislation. I agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that the same cannot be said in this particular field. The question may be asked, why should we bother with legislation unless there is a real threat. I should like to read one paragraph or two from the report on hate propaganda prepared, as the minister told us, by Professor Cohen with some distinguished colleagues including the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). I should like to read from page 12 of that report which tells about what is happening in Canada, not somewhere else:

> The current hate campaign dates from early 1963, when it began in the Toronto area. Since then it has extended to several other centres in Ontario, and to at least seven other provinces: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec; but the main activities have been essentially in Ontario and to a lesser extent in Quebec and in British Columbia. From 1963 on there was and continues to be a steady dissemination of hate propaganda, mainly anti-Jewish, anti-Negro and neo-Nazi in nature. The propaganda has been plastered and displayed in conspicuous places, distributed at public gatherings, placed in apartment mailboxes, sent through the regular mails, and scattered from the upper floors of downtown buildings to the streets below.

The printed, mimeographed and other written materials seem to be obtained in large measure, although not exclusively, from American sources. In many instances it is mailed directly from Arlington, Virginia, the headquarters of the American Nazi Party and the World Union of National Socialists, and from Birmingham, Alabama—

And so on. So, there cannot be any doubt that this country has witnessed a sustained campaign to disseminate hate literature. I shall not go into the details of this, but I believe that anyone who intends to speak on this subject should take the trouble to read some of the literature appended to this report. If they do so, I think they will find that it is clearly of a poisonous nature. It is not in any sense of a political nature but contains the poison of racial hatred.

There is another aspect of this matter not yet mentioned; that is the international aspect. In passing this bill, Parliament will be giving effect to the United Nations declaration on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination passed unanimously at the UN General Assembly on November 23, 1963. Article 9 of the declaration reads as follows:

• (3:50 p.m.)

1. All propaganda and organizations based on ideas or theories of the superiority of one race or group of persons of one colour or ethnic origin with a view to justifying or promoting racial discrimination in any form shall be severely condemned.

2. All incitement to or acts of violence, whether by individuals or organizations, against any race or group of persons of another colour or ethnic origin shall be considered an offence against society and punishable under law.

Therefore, in 1963, on the unanimous recommendation of the nations of the United Nations, Canada undertook to promote legislation of the sort that we are dealing with here. I suggest that we are merely fulfilling our international obligations by passing this legislation.

I mentioned earlier that there were some modifications in this legislation that I wanted to see adopted. I want to speak about those at the present time. The first and most important modification that I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and to the House is that instead of relying exclusively on purely penal consequences, such as imprisonment and fines, it would be perfectly proper and possible to introduce into this legislation what I call an injunctive process or a cease and desist order. This would be a far more flexible and far less penal method of dealing with this subject. If the minister has not considered such a possibility very fully so far, he might say that this is a civil remedy which is not open to us when we are dealing with the criminal law. I think the minister probably will recall—if he does not, no doubt some of his assistants will help him recall it—the Goodyear case which was dealt with under the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act. In that case, the Supreme Court of Canada clearly and explicitly held that the injunctive process is a proper means of enforcing criminal law.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Would the hon. member permit a question? Has he considered the difficulty that would arise, even if one were to concede that the injunctive proceeding falls clearly under criminal law, because in order to obtain an injunction one has virtually to prove the case in the same way as one would have to establish the case for a prosecution?

Mr. Brewin: I appreciate the fact that the legislation must be based on criminal law to bring it within federal jurisdiction, but I am suggesting what should be an appropriate penalty. I suggest to the minister that to say to some offender who may be relatively innocent, an ignorant and misguided fellow, "look, you have made a mistake, don't do it again" is better than putting him in jail or fining him a large sum of money. However, if he continued his actions, he would be guilty of contempt of court and a much more severe punishment would be justified. This injunctive procedure is more flexible.

Another reason for advocating the injunctive procedure is that once you have an injunction, it would apply not only to the accused but to his servants, agents and others working with him. Once you have an injunction against this criminal activity, you have the ability to enforce it and if some agent or servant continued the activity you would not require a further prosecution. I suggest to the minister quite seriously that this suggestion of mine deserves careful consideration. I offer it to him because I want to make his legislation work. I am not making the suggestion in a critical way, but I think it will reduce some of the sting of the legislation. As I said, I appreciate the necessity of dealing with hate propaganda under the heading of criminal law, but once you have it under that heading the type of remedy you choose makes a difference. It would be possible for the courts dealing with such cases under this injunctive procedure to do so in a more gentle fashion and not feel obliged to express their disapproval of the crime in question by a jail sentence or some heavy fine. It works the other way around also. A small fine may be considered a sort of licence fee, whereas a restraining order would have the whole majesty of the law behind it and would have to be obeyed. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion.

My other suggestion to the minister is to look again at the definitions. The British race relations act, which was passed fairly recently, requires a specific intent to stir up hatred against any section of the public distinguished by colour, race or ethnic or national origins. The word "wilful" is included in section 3. It is my view that the word "wilful" and the minister knows this very well—can be interpreted in many different ways by the Courts and sometimes means one thing and sometimes another. If you have to find a specific intent, as the British act specifies, to stir up hatred against some section of the public or identifiable group then, I suggest, you have an additional safeguard to those already in the act, and perhaps a better one. However, I appreciate that this discussion is one that can take place appropriately in the committee. I want to say to the minister that I prefer the British definition.

While I am referring to the British legislation, may I mention that some people have asked me whether we should not just rely on the common law and whether this type of legislation is not really unnecessary. One point that I would like to make in that connection is that this is a viewpoint strongly held within Great Britain. They have a long tradition of dealing with matters by common law and yet they found it necessary to bring in their race relations act, which is a parallel to this bill, and almost every thoroughly democracy, would adopt legislation of this similar provisions. I ask those who are so fearful of its effect on civil liberties to inquire whether countries like the United Kingdom and the Scandinavian countries, which have had a long tradition of civil liberty and democracy, would adopt legislation of this sort if it were truly a threat to civil liberty.

There is another suggestion which I should like to make to the minister which he might consider at a later date. I think the working out of a law such as this one should be under constant review, and I hope that from time to time perhaps the parliamentary Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs would regularly review how this legislation is applied and how often the Attorneys General have been asked and have refused to act. I do not think this suggestion should necessarily be incorporated in the law but perhaps included in a statement of intent which the minister might give so as to relieve the fears of those who feel that perhaps this may be an invasion of our liberties. Indeed, if it turns out that this law is used as a cover to suppress legitimate freedom of speech or anything of that sort, I would be one of the first to say that it should be repealed right away; some such undertaking by the Minister might relieve the fears of those who are dubious about it.

Therefore, on the ground that there is here a clear and palpable evil which has reared its head in the country, on the ground that we are not in any substantial manner interfering with the freedom of speech, on the ground that the moral sense of Canadians requires this type of legislation, and on the ground of the educative effects of Parliament saying to our younger people, this racial hatred is abhorrent to Canadians, I urge this House to accept the bill.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, once more we can see the government rushing an imperfect bill through, which seems to indicate an intention to act quickly. That is why we must say that we support this bill in principle—

[English]

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I regret I have to ask that someone turn on the translation system. The hon. member's speech is not being translated at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Naturally, we want to condemn hate literature but, in practice, an analysis of the clauses of the bill makes us realize that what it proposes to do is very good, very noble and very commendable since, for instance, the purpose of section 267A is more or less to prohibit wars.

Even if Nigeria passed legislation against genocide, the government of that country would itself be accused of this crime!

How can the present government accuse itself of genocide against Biafra? I wonder. For this reason, I feel the first part of the bill aims at forbidding wars since genocide is committed particularly, during wars and generally, the belligerents in such conflicts try to exterminate one another.

This very pious measure, at least in that regard, seeks to prevent genocides. Of course, we are in favour of it in principle. However, what would it achieve?

I would like to point out some special aspects of the bill. For example, section 267A (2) reads as follows and I quote:

(2) In this section "genocide" includes any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part any identifiable group, namely:
(a) killing members of the group, or

And this is the clause which I want to point out:

(b) deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction.

The clause would have been more practical if reference had been made to moral destruction, because when the group is physically destroyed, nothing can be done to remedy the condition, since it no longer exists.

Moral destruction could occur and, then, we would have to charge ourselves with having caused, in a large measure, the genocide of the Indians and the Eskimos, because, from a moral standpoint, these peoples have practically been destroyed by our action during a number of years. It is therefore easy to see where this can lead us.

It is distressing and unfortunate to realize that such destructions, both physical and moral, can take place even in 1969. Evidence of this can be found in the wars now being waged in Viet Nam and Biafra. In principle, we are opposed to genocide.

It seems to me, judging by such comments, that the government is expecting some catastrophes to strike Canada in the near future. Which part of the country or what group of citizens are threatened with physical destruction, I do not know, but some catastrophes appear to be expected, and this bill practically marks the beginning of the end of the world.

In principle we agree to be against genocide but, as I tried to show, we consider that it is equivalent to day-dreaming, that it is a very nice bill, but a bill which does not really get us anywhere; rather it promotes distrust among Canadians, since it does not give us the opportunity to go to Biafra to solve the conflict. What have we to do with all this?

If I consider only the bill, I tend to think that its purpose is to prevent physical annihilation of the Indians and the Eskimos who are a part of the Canadian people. At first glance I do not see anything else in it. But, as I think it over, I say to myself: why should we try to stir up the fire, to add fuel to the fire at a time when the situation is such that the Quebec Minister of Justice is taking the bit between his teeth about everything and deciding when remarks are hateful?

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, the way things have been going for some time, anyone who dislikes the Quebec Minister of Justice will wind up behind bars. It is not under such circumstances that things should be stirred up even more and that such a bill should be introduced. Whom does it protect? What does it provide? In other words, what problem does it solve? Those are the questions I am asking myself.

I object to sections 267B and 267C of this bill for several reasons. I object to them because if they were strictly enforced, several among us would already have been indicted.

We have all been through election campaigns and we all know that in Quebec, particularly, they are sometimes waged in a rather unconventional way. Much hateful talking is done, depending on how this expression is interpreted. In a public meeting, it may happen that an individual's words seem insulting to someone attending that meeting to the point of causing violence.

Our Prime Minister himself (Mr. Trudeau) went through this. Is it possible for us to control the emotions, the feelings, the susceptibilities of the people attending a meeting? It is unthinkable!

Man as a free agent must assume responsibility for his actions and it is childish to let oneself be manipulated by some character trying to stir up violence.

How are we to interpret this piece of legislation? How are we to determine when a statement is of a heinous nature? Several persons will certainly have to suffer greatly from that situation, taking into account the succeeding political leaders. A statement will be considered heinous by some, and not so by others. Where will that lead us? This will create even more violence, if there is any. We must indeed agree on the meaning of that word.

There are at present great fears arising from certain things which are happening, particularly in Quebec. Such things have been happening at all times. I repeat at all times.

In my youth, I often heard political debates, during the famous contradictory meetings. They often led to lively fights. It has ever been so.

Nowadays, there are demonstrations, unplanned, but which nevertheless take place. We should not panic to the extent of opposing one of the most sacred and inviolable of rights, the right of speech, the right of the individual to express his opinion.

How many authors, even among the greatest, have promoted hate within the meaning of the law? It all depends on who hear them. When it comes to hate, it is important to make a distinction between the object and the subject of hate.

There is another matter which I would like to point out, and it is found at page 2. I quote:

(3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under subsection (2)

(a) for expressing in good faith and in decent language, or attempting to establish by argument used in good faith and conveyed in decent language, an opinion upon a religious subject;

There, the cat is out of the bag. An exception is made for a religious subject because it is expected that it is not this subject that may be the object of the enforcement of the law in Canada.

Yet if there is a subject which all through the ages has sown the seeds of hatred and engendered religious conflicts and wars, that is the one! However, the law does nothing about it.

It is not necessary to go back very far in time, since in 1969 people still come to blows for religious differences.

Here, we eliminate this, even though paragraph 3 of section 267B appears to be somewhat less rigorous than preceding ones and I say "somewhat", because it seems to mitigate what comes before, and I quote:

(a) for expressing in good faith and in decent language—

(i) that the statements communicated were true, or

(ii) that they were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit, and that on reasonable grounds he believes them to be true.

How does one decide that public interest is involved? If a crowd of 4,000 or 5,000 gives a standing ovation to a speaker and that, afterwards, his words are called hate propaganda by the Attorney General, what meaning should be given to "public interest"? Will a referendum be held each time to determine whether the public interest was involved? In my opinion, this question is extremely difficult if not impossible to solve.

This bill can lead to unjustifiable abuses. I am amazed that the Prime Minister, who not so long ago defended so strongly the cause of freedom, was seen with Michel Chartrand, for instance, inciting the Asbestos workers to resist the Quebec provincial police in the Duplessis era. I am surprised to see the Prime Minister forget his principles about human freedom, individual freedom, that he always fiercely defended.

For all these reasons, we cannot accept this bill as it stands now.

I repeat once more that we are obviously against hate propaganda and that, jointly with the federal government, we would like to eliminate, if possible, this kind of propaganda. But how are we to know what such propaganda is? Several cases, if not all, are already covered by the law. Indeed, if somebody feels he is being attacked by hate remarks he may always defend himself and this is what he does ordinarily.

I fail to see then the reason for this bill. It is too dangerous to accept it, especially in the present circumstances since it seems to represent a means found by the federal government to prevent I do not know what catastrophe in this country. I feel that it has a very poor opinion of Canadians whom I believe to be quite responsible. A few remarks judged hateful will not turn the people away from the real objectives to which must tend a society which considers itself "just" as advocated during the last session.

Hate propaganda really exists and I know it. Right now, the law even provides for the imposition of penalties in that respect because if the nature of hate propaganda were to be determined here, the so-called obscene propaganda would be considered to be the worst.

Obscene propaganda exists in this country. It runs free and, at the present time, abominable things can be read in the small papers published by students in high schools and in Quebec CEGEPs. Their material really amounts to hate propaganda; yet, nobody will curb it. Why? Because that propaganda precisely strikes at this country's fundamental principles, that is the Christian principles.

It is left to run free and, in consequence, we reach a point where we have to put up with hate propaganda of all kinds. Fortunately, the existing legislation is designed to preclude that, but nobody takes action.

The Postal service is sometimes used to dissiminate such propaganda; yet, some postal service regulations were enacted to check such occurrences. Nobody cares about that. On the other hand, if an individual dares promote a new political doctrine or question the constitution of this country, that is considered dangerous.

Mr. Speaker, if we ever witness the catastrophes that this bill seems to anticipate, they will be attributable to the excessive liberty we have allowed newspapers and writers, while the law provides penalties against such writings and the arrest of their authors.

I do not believe this bill will improve the situation any, but, it may offend a good number of people. As a matter of fact, this country will become more and more a police state and a dictatorship, something we all denounce and do not want to happen in Canada.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is not the purpose of this bill to abolish hatred. I do not believe man will ever get rid of hatred and vengeance. I agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) that racial hatred has reared its ugly head in this country and should be stopped, but I do not believe the purpose of this bill is to get rid of that very human instinct called hatred. Of all creatures, man alone has the instinct of hatred and vengeance. Curiously enough it is man alone who thinks he is more than animal. Man is the only creature who has the contention he is not animal, but something more than animal.

If Messrs. Martin and Fox, the United States anthropologists, Messrs. Martin and Forest, and Mr. Tiger from Montreal are correct, we must accept that racial differentiation, or at least the identification of groups, forms part of our civilization. It is not the purpose of the bill to create racial, ethnic or religious groups because these groups will merge and disappear. Even coloured races one day will merge into one.

Surely, the purpose of the bill is to protect the individual in a group so that the smearing, hatred and all that overshadows the whole group will not hurt the individual. We recognize this situation is bad for Canada. It is bad for national unity. It is an impossible and intolerable way of life. This bill has a purpose, but that purpose is not going to change, in general terms, the nature of man.

By law, we will restrict the use of communications and the printed word when they have no other purpose than to incite people to behave in an evil manner. Some hon. members have suggested this is not possible. Of course there will be many problems. The questions have been asked: What do we do with a child who makes statements? What do we do with the printed word? How do we define these terms? We will have many problems in deciding the application of this law, nevertheless throughout the history of civilization legislation has been very effective in controlling those instincts of man which do not contribute to civilized living.

With regard to vengeance, I am sure hon. members are knowledgeable enough in history to know that prior to the Samarian culture vengeance was unlimited. If you were a member of a neighbouring tribe and someone stole your property, you were at liberty to eliminate his whole family, tribe and even nation. This condition did not change until the Samarians enacted laws based on the principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, which idea still prevails.

We must not consider legislation to be ineffective. It is effective. It proved effective in Ontario in the field of rental loans. At that time there were many complaints. The suggestion was made that legislation would never work because after all it was an interference with our individual liberty to rent properties as we saw fit. However, this legislation has worked. The majesty of law is very powerful if it is properly applied.

There is one issue I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. Although we have accepted the principle put forward that racial hatred and the dissemination of communications dealing with racial hatred shall not be used to the prejudice of any group, race or colour, nevertheless for some unknown reason we still accept the common law principle of truth as a defence. I am a lawyer. I have been trained in the common law. This great sanctity for the truth seems to be an excuse for everything. The minister should ask himself whether truth is an excuse for infringement of privacy.

Section 267B (3) states:

No person shall be convicted of an offence under subsection (2) . . .

(b) if he establishes

(i) that the statements communicated were true,—

How many ways are there, Mr. Speaker, in which the truth can be used for the very purpose this bill is seeking to eliminate? Truths and half-truths have always been used by demagogues. Is it not true when certain people in the United Kingdom state their jobs have been taken over by coloured men from the West Indies? Is this not true? Of course, it is. Is the statement not true that in many large Canadian cities a certain professional group, or at least the majority of it, are of a certain religious belief?

• (4:30 p.m.)

What is the purpose of that? It is true, and under this bill the making of such a statement becomes an offence. It is the use of true statements, or the misuse of true statements which will make this law to some extent ineffective. There are more problems in connection with laws which contain loopholes than arise when there are no laws at all. Can the minister explain how anyone could be found to be prejudiced when he speaks the truth when one of the subsections provides a good defence if it can be shown his statements were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit?

If anyone has a defence which establishes public benefit, surely he does not need the extra defence of truth. After all, the question "What is truth?" is one which will not be settled for generations to come. This will be the cyst which holds all the illness in the body of this legislation and will make this law ineffective since so much will depend upon the judge or upon the political temper of the times.

The common law concept is that no matter what you say, or about whom you say it, if you speak the truth you are exonerated. Nobody has questioned the reason for uttering these so-called truths. I would ask the minister and the committee to examine the sanctified word "truth" as it relates to a defence under this bill or under any bill.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, while I do not agree with this bill in its entirety, I do wish to make it abundantly clear at the outset that I see no reason at all why hate propaganda should be ignored. Discrimination of any kind on grounds of race, colour, religion or ethnic origin certainly cannot be tolerated. Any thinking person would surely agree with this view.

I notice that the bill omits the phrase "national origin" though it was included in the report of the special committee as one of the areas in which discrimination should not be exercised. There is probably a reason for the omission of those words and perhaps the minister will take the opportunity to explain it when he comes to reply. I think it is agreed by all that in no circumstances must we allow the malicious abuse of any group, or person. The promotion of hatred constitutes without question a grave danger to our democratic system. Although the number of persons engaged in doing so may be relatively small, we cannot afford to ignore their activities.

I was interested and pleased to note on reading the report of the Cohen Committee that the promotion of hatred does not exist at all as a problem in my own province of Prince Edward Island. This is something of which I believe we can be justly proud; according to the committee there are only two provinces in which no such problem is encountered—the Province of Newfoundland and the Province of Prince Edward Island. I am very happy it is not a problem in my own province. Nevertheless, though it may not directly affect us, I wish to assure the House that I am vitally interested in the subject.

We all agree, I think, that we must be able to exercise maximum freedom of expression. But freedom of expression does not include the right to vilify or the right to defame. We agree with the Cohen Committee that freedom of expression is not an absolute right. The Canadian Bill of Rights guarantees freedom of expression to our people but at the same time we have laws which prohibit seditions, defamatory, libelous or obscene literature. Adequate provision is made in the Criminal Code to cover these areas.

Bearing in mind the principle that preference must always be exercised on the side of freedom of speech, I seriously suggest that when this bill gets to the committee we shall need to examine most carefully the question just how much speech is free speech. This is, in my view, the crucial question. As I mentioned before, those who advocate or promote genocide must, in my opinion, definitely fall outside the bounds of free speech; they cannot be protected by the argument that freedom of expression is allowed.

Turning to the bill itself, I note that clause 267A prohibits the advocacy and promotion of genocide. Genocide was, of course, prohibited under a convention of the United Nations ratified by Canada in 1952. This convention prohibited not only genocide but conspiracy to commit genocide, attempts to commit genocide, and incitement to commit genocide. These things are already adequately covered. What the present bill attempts to do is to prevent the advocacy or the promotion of genocide. My chief concern is whether or not the intent of the whole measure is not already covered by the provisions of the Criminal Code as they stand.

I have examined the bill carefully, together with the corresponding sections of the Criminal Code, and I am convinced that the committee, when it comes to study this measure, will need to hear the testimony of experts as to whether or not all the things which this legislation purports to prevent are not already, with one exception, punishable under the Criminal Code.

It is interesting to note that in 1952, when Canada ratified the United Nations convention on the prevention of genocide, the then minister of justice, the Hon. Mr. Lesage, made the following statement before the Committee on External Affairs which was considering the subject in question. I quote from the report of the committee:

> The opinion of the deputy minister of justice, which is accepted by the Canadian Government, is that the provisions of the Criminal Code as they are now, cover all the possibilities and are such that any of the acts mentioned in articles II and III are punishable under our law.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I suggest that it was obviously the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice in 1952, concurred in by the Minister of Justice himself, that all of the things that articles II and III of the convention attempted to do were adequately covered by the Criminal Code. I suggest to this minister—and I will make this suggestion to the committee—that quite probably the very provisions the bill attempts to make are already adequately dealt with by the Criminal Code.

Let me examine the bill to see whether I can make this point. The proposed section 267A provides as follows:

> (1) Everyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment—

The subsection goes on to provide a penalty of five years.

I suggest that section 407 of the Criminal Code makes the same provision. In fact, it goes further and provides for an even more severe penalty. I should like to place on the record the wording of section 407:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided by law, the following provisions apply in respect of persons who counsel, procure or incite other persons to commit offences namely,
> (a) every one who counsels, procures or incites another person to commit an indictable offence is, if the offence is not committed, guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to the same punishment to which a person who attempts to commit that offence is liable;—

Does that provision not cover the situation here? Section 267A provides that every one who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years. The other section is differently worded; instead of "advocates or promotes" the wording is "counsels, procures or incites". Why cannot a man who promotes genocide be charged under section 407 of the Criminal Code?

I think the committee should look into this question, because if a man can be charged and convicted under section 407, the penalty is more severe than that provided by the proposed section 267A.

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McQuaid: Certainly.

Mr. Walker: Is there any reference to the advocacy of group genocide in that section?

Mr. McQuaid: The hon. member is anticipating me; I intend to deal with that point. I agree the section does not deal with group defamation, and so on. However, I am dealing with the case of the individual. My argument is that the proposed section 267A provides imprisonment for every one who advocates or promotes genocide. If the committee receives expert testimony that convinces the members of the committee that the words "advocates or promotes" carry a different meaning from the words "counsels, procures or incites", then it may be that section 407 would not conflict. But there seems to be very little difference between the wording. As I say, a man charged under section 407 with incitement to commit genocide can be convicted under that section regardless of the provisions of section 267A.

Let me now deal with the proposed section 267B, which provides:

> (1) Every one who, by communicating statements in any public place, incites hatred or contempt against any identifiable group where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, is guilty of
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years; or
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Under that provision the choice apparently rests with the prosecution whether someone is charged with an indictable offence or with an offence punishable on summary conviction. In the latter case, the accused is not entitled to trial by jury, to be tried by his peers. I think a person charged with an offence as serious as this should be guaranteed the right to be tried and judged by a jury, rather than by a judge or magistrate alone.

I suggest that this provision in the bill is also included in the Criminal Code. Bearing in mind that the proposed section 267B provides that every one who, by communicating statements, incites hatred or contempt is guilty of an offence, section 160(a)(i) provides:

> Every one who
> (a) not being in a dwelling house causes a disturbance in or near a public place,
> (i) by fighting, screaming, shouting, swearing, singing or using insulting or obscene language . . .
> is guilty of an offence—

In essence, is this not the same provision as the proposed section 267B, which refers to persons communicating statements—in other words, speaking—in a public place that incite hatred or contempt? Section 160 uses the words "insulting or obscene language". I suggest that insulting or obscene language would in all probability lead to the inciting of hatred or contempt.

This is another point on which the committee must hear the opinion of experts. It is my firm conviction that anybody charged under the proposed section 267B could just as effectively be charged under section 160(a)(i) of the Criminal Code.

I come now to the proposed section 267B(2), which provides:

> Everyone who, by communicating statements, wilfully promotes hatred or contempt against any identifiable group is guilty of > (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years; or
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

As has been pointed out, this is a new provision. That is what is described by the Cohen committee as group defamation. We have not anything in our present law which covers group defamation. That section, as it is presently drafted, is to me a very dangerous section, and herein lies the danger. It provides:

• (4:50 p.m.)

> Everyone who, by communicating statements, wilfully promotes hatred or contempt against any identifiable group is guilty of > (a) an indictable offence—

[Mr. McQuaid.]

Let me point out that the communicating statements do not have to be made in a public place. In other words, if I made such statements in my own home, I would be liable to a charge under this section. Surely, the minister would agree that the section is wide enough to include what I might say in my own home in the presence of my own family. Surely, that is dangerous. It has been said here many times that the law has no place in the bedrooms of the nation. Certainly, it has no place in the living rooms of the nation.

I do not think we should restrict expression of opinion so drastically that we cannot express our opinions within the confines of our own home. To be liable, as I read it and I am subject to correction by the minister, what I say does not have to be said and what I do does not have to be done, in a public place.

Even more serious is the penalty section. What may happen to me if I do say something of this nature within the confines of my own home? Subsection (4) of this proposed section reads:

> Where a person is convicted of an offence under Section 267A of subsection (1) or (2)—

It is subsection (2) of this section which makes it an offence to say these things in your own home. Let me repeat what it provides:

> Where a person is convicted of an offence under Section 267A or subsection (1) or (2) of this section, anything by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed, may, in addition to any other punishment imposed, be ordered by the presiding magistrate or judge to be forfeited to Her Majesty—

Does that mean if this offence is committed in my home that my home is liable to seizure and forfeiture to Her Majesty? It says "anything by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed". If the offence was committed in my home, then it is in relation to my home that the offence was committed and there is a possibility that my home could be seized. The minister smiled, but I am sure this is not a smiling matter. There is some reason for looking carefully into this provision.

Surely, the minister and members of the committee will agree that this section as it is worded could prevent me from free discussion in my home or free expression of my opinion to the members of my family. I suggest further, and again I am subject to correction if I am wrong, that subsection (4) imposes a very heavy penalty when it provides that "anything by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed" may be seized and forfeited to Her Majesty. The section also indicates, and this is a very clear departure from the present law, that this type of defamation includes spoken words and gestures. What is meant by the word "gestures"? How do I offend against this law by gestures?

Another provisions of the bill with which I strongly disagree, and this has been mentioned this afternoon, is that part which leaves it to the discretion of the Attorneys General of the provinces whether or not an offence should be prosecuted. This is wrong and the discretion should not be left with the Attorneys General. Certainly if I were an Attorney General I would not want to have to shoulder that burden. I am confident that if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) polled the Attorneys General of the Provinces he would find they prefer not to have that burden placed upon them, and they would make that decision for obvious reasons. The Attorneys General are subject to all the vagaries of politics and, if they can avoid it, do not like to cause ill will or discontent among those they perhaps later on will have to turn to in search of support at the polls.

The Cohen committee has indicated that this Provision is included to avoid frivolous and vexatious prosecutions. I seriously suggest there is another very effective way of preventing frivolous and vexatious prosecutions. The magistrate or justice of the peace before whom one goes to swear an information and complaint, if he fulfils his duties and does what he is required to do under the Criminal Code before signing such a document, would make inquiries as to the circumstances surrounding the alleged offence. If he felt that the charge was vexatious or frivolous he would choose not to issue that information and complaint by simply saying: No, I am sorry, but in this case the circumstances as they appear to me do not warrant the issuing of such a charge.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 44, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—grain, boxcar distribution, opportunity for opposition members to meet railway officials; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—post office, request for reduction of rates on non-profit publications; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Serré)—the Canadian economy, possible nickel and copper price increases, action by the government.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely Notices of Motion and Public Bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

CUSTOMS ACT

PROVISION OF QUALIFIED PERSONNEL AT AIRPORTS

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of making regulations, pursuant to paragraph (r) of section 273 of the Customs Act, so as to facilitate airplane tourist traffic at Canadian airports of entry by providing for the deputizing of qualified personnel now employed as management or administrative officers to handle customs clearance to such tourist traffic.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during my submission to the House of Commons today I hopefully propose to provide sufficient information regarding Canada's general aviation industry to lay a base for the support of my motion to recruit airport managers and their assistants to act as customs officers to handle customs clearance for flying tourists at airports of entry.

I know from personal experience that the vast majority of Canadians are unaware of the volume of light plane traffic using Canada's air space today. I refer to light planes as single engine and multi-engined, propeller, turbo-prop or jets capable of carrying from 2 to 15 passengers per aircraft. Their access to air space while travelling east and west is relatively unhampered. However, southbound traffic across the border and return has been and still is seriously handicapped by lack of customs and immigration service at non-airline and non-international airports of entry.

I hasten to state categorically at the outset that under no circumstances should my statements be construed as a criticism of our Canadian customs and immigration officials. I am confident that I can say without fear of contradiction that allowing for a few minor exceptions we receive courteous and efficient service from customs and immigration officials. I congratulate both the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) on their personnel officers charged with the responsibility of selecting staff who daily serve the Canadian public. Perhaps a short explanation regarding international aircraft tourist travel would serve to acquaint hon. members with some problems which could be resolved by the adoption of this motion.

Aircraft returning to Canada or United States aircraft coming to Canada are required to file flight plans at points of departure in the United States. The intended Canadian port of entry and estimated time of arrival are stipulated, plus request for customs clearance The flight plan is passed to the Department of Transport radio service office nearest to the port of entry. The Department of Transport notifies the local customs officer who endeavours to meet the aircraft on arrival. It is unnecessary for the pilot to clear with United States customs when departing from the United States. There is a similar situation the other way. This system worked well at international airports and reasonably well at airports of entry where customs offices are located nearby during the period when seven day per week clearance was available at all points of entry. This is no longer the case. The average time involved in clearing an aircraft is less that 15 minutes. However, travel to and from airports is time-consuming and inconvenient. Nevertheless, aircraft tourist traffic has steadily increased during the past number of years when customs clearance was available on a more or less sunrise to sunset basis. The nominal mileage fee paid by the pilot has been acceptable to flying tourists.

How many of us realize that more than 12,000 United States airplanes visited Expo '67? During the Abbotsford Air show, held annually in August, 1,400 aircraft from the United States visited Canada for the three day event in 1969 alone. In Canada today there are 10,000 registered aircraft. Light aircraft account for all but a few hundred. However, when we look at our tourist potential the figures are most impressive. There are 700,000 licensed pilots in the United States. Of the 130,000 registered airplanes in the United States, 98 per cent are owned by general aviation or non-airline people. The Federal Aviation Administration in the United States estimates that 50 per cent of all air passengers in the United States are carried by non-airline airplanes. Therefore, flying tourist traffic offers great potential, but lack of customs clearance assurance at Canadian ports of entry, other than international airports of entry, discourages our United States friends from travelling to Canada in light aircraft.

It is true there was a time when only the idle rich could afford private airplanes. This concept is no longer valid. Canadians and Americans in all walks of life are registered owners and pilots. The flying farmers association utilizes various types of aircraft as operational vehicles to facilitate emergency trips to centres for repair parts, fence inspections, aids to round-up of cattle, crop spraying, and so on. Since most airports are located some distance from the urban centres, the general public is unaware of the ever increasing light plane traffic. In fact, light plane traffic has been increasing so rapidly during the past few years that governments, in their wisdom, have been endeavouring to entice light airplane traffic away from major international airports in the interest of easing congestion. Governments have also been increasing aid for development of smaller airports in both urban and rural areas.

It should also be pointed out that light planes can be equipped with navigational and radio aids equal in sophistication to those on the largest jet transports. While this is most helpful on cross-country flights, approaching and landing procedures at large international airports can become congested as a result of the wide difference in speed between light aircraft and jet transports. Light plane pilots appreciate the policy of the Department of Transport to build and improve more small airports. This allows a pilot to elect to avoid high density areas. The recent reduction of customs service to smaller airports of entry must therefore be considered to be in conflict with government policy.

I am sure we all commend the government on its recent policy of taking positive steps to reduce government spending. We can readily agree to the abandonment of costly projects as commanding lower priority to essential services. It is not my intention today to suggest that revisions of regulations in respect of customs and excise to downgrade essential custom service to the Canadian public should be reinstated. On the contrary, my motion, if approved, would provide an alternative which would not only serve to upgrade customs clearance service at airports of entry, but would do so without—and I emphasize this—additional cost to the federal treasury. Mr. Speaker, the flying public's greatest concern centres around the fact that the alternate proposal of providing service from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. five days per week is unrealistic.

Flying tourist traffic reaches its peak between Friday afternoon and Sunday evening. During a discussion with the vice-president of American Owners and Pilots Association, I was advised that, in his opinion, American pilots will avoid trips to Canada as a result of the recent change of policy. Service on week ends is available at a few large airports but is available to most airports of tourist destination only on payment of heavy travelling fees. One airport in my constituency which has provided unlimited customs service for the past 20 years is now denied service after 5 p.m. and on holidays, Saturdays and Sundays.

If a pilot arrives a few minutes late or inadvertently files a flight plan requesting customs service after 5 p.m. he is forced to pay more than $22 for not more than 15 minutes attention. The amount represents travelling mileage cost from the closest automobile port of entry. No wonder the vice-president of AOPA, representing over 500,000 pilots in the United States, is of the opinion that Canada will be on the taboo list for American flying tourists.

On September 9, a well known executive of Smith Falls, Ontario, attempted to land at his home airport after filing a flight plan from his departure point in the United States requesting customs clearance. Radio contact informed him that the local customs official was unavoidably detained and unable to clear him even though he was arriving during the prescribed period. This situation forced him to continue his flight to Ottawa for clearance and he lost an hour of valuable time, plus the additional cost of aircraft operation.

Similar incidents are being reported daily across Canada. Aviation associations are presently appraising the damage to our flying tourist trade as well as complaints of unfair treatment resulting from the arbitrary downgrading of service by the Department of National Revenue. They are also pressing the industry to find an alternative. I submit that this motion could very well serve this purpose.

True pioneers spawned and developed aviation throughout the years. Obstruction to normal aviation has been in evidence since Orville Wright got off the ground at Kitty Hawk. The aviation industry is conditioned to opposition and has been travelling upstream for years. It is now conceded that modern aircraft are the safest, fastest and most reliable means of transportation today when calculated on a passenger mile basis. Sophisticated navigational and pilot aids have reduced the accident rate well below any other method of travel in proportion to passenger miles. The air passenger explosion has been astronomical, and governments throughout the world are endeavouring to decentralize airports and control zones to accommodate the increasing number of daily arrivals and departures. Some uninformed officials advocate elimination of light planes in the airspace. This attempt will be as successful as a similar one would be to ban automobiles from highways in favour of buses and trucks, even though the high incidence of accidents on highways would indicate more justification for a ban.

Mr. Allmand: Would the hon. member permit a question? Could he tell us how many smaller aircraft are licenced in Canada and the United States, and how many people are involved in the ownership and the licencing of these aircraft in both countries?

Mr. Pringle: I brought this out earlier in my speech. There are 10,000 registered airplanes in Canada and 130,000 registered airplanes in the United States, and 98 per cent of all the aircraft in the United States are owned by non-airline people, while 50 per cent of all the traffic in the United States is estimated by the federal aviation administration to be carried by general aviation or light airplanes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pringle: I previously mentioned that aviation is the offspring of pioneers—pioneers who have never been satisfied to rest on their laurels. All fliers and those associated with aviation have an inherent desire to assist development whenever and wherever possible. It is, therefore, only natural that when a problem arises seriously threatening development, the industry seeks to find a logical and practical solution. The excellent co-operation of the Department of Transport notwithstanding, there are those of us who feel that the accelerated aviation development, other than that of airlines, took place more in spite of government intervention than because of it.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence in permitting me to lay the foundation in support of my motion. The industry now stands ready to suggest to Parliament a solution which could alleviate problems relating to customs clearance at most airports of entry.

Practically all airports of entry are owned by cities or municipalities or a combination of both. Airport boards of directors employ managers and assistants to collect fees and rents, to supervize airport maintenance and safety regulations, and generally to act as policemen of administration. Their duties are usually performed between sunrise and sunset. The men and women so involved are responsible people, more than capable of handling the very limited requirements for customs clearance of non-commercial aircraft and I stress the word "non-commercial". I am referring to tourist aircraft. They are already gainfully employed at airports and are oriented to performing and enforcing disciplinary rules as set out by the Department of Transport and civic authorities. They would be ideal customs officer deputies who would faithfully perform their duties as prescribed by oath on a seven day per week basis. Travelling costs between customs offices and airports would be eliminated. These officers would be subject to periodic inspection and would be responsible to the closest customs office where regular reports could be submitted. Customs officers would be relieved of the inconvenient trips to airports during office hours, which would improve their office efficiency.

I reiterate that there would be no added cost to the federal treasury. The actual time required to clear tourist aircraft is usually less than 15 minutes.

Mr. Allmand: May I ask the hon. member another question?

Mr. Pringle: I will be glad to answer the question after I conclude my speech in a minute or two. Should costs be incurred, the existing user charge for custom officers' transportation would probably cover them.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I sum up my points for the consideration of this House.

First, the anomaly of forcing light aircraft to clear customs at busy international airports of entry at a time when the Department of Transport is encouraging pilots to use smaller airports is ludicrous.

Second, in view of the fact that many non-trained personnel such as university students are now being deputized as customs officers during the busy summer months, any argument that a precedent would be established is nullified.

Third, American flying tourists intent on visiting Canadian outlying areas would be able to plan their flights on a more practical direct route which would aid the economic development of small centres.

Fourth, the reduction of customs service which has recently taken place at a time when aviation activity is on the increase is a severe deterrent to Canadian tourist trade.

Fifth, a survey of airports of entry in Canada indicates that many growth centres will suffer needlessly unless this motion is adopted and implemented. The number is impressive but I list a few of the cities which will be in trouble, such as St. John, N.B., Quebec City, St. Jean, Quebec, Smiths Falls, Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon, Florenceville, Swift Current, Lethbridge, Cranbrook, Castlegar, Penticton, Chilliwack, and Pitt Meadows. Areas such as Portage La Prairie in Manitoba are now severely handicapped inasmuch as Winnipeg is the closest airport of entry.

There are many more points I would like to raise but time does not permit. I submit that the aviation industry stands ready through the many administrative officers to accept the challenge of participatory democracy. Responsible Canadians are prepared to serve this government and assist in reducing the heavy costs of governing. The practical approach suggested in this motion in no way reduces the effectiveness of customs and immigration control. On the contrary, the proposal contributes to increased air safety, now uppermost in the minds of us all.

A challenge is also presented to Canada's civil service, one of seriously placing the needs of the people of Canada in a priority position. It is my sincere opinion that the public service will rise to the occasion in the interests of essential services to Canadians at the grass roots level, and support my motion now before the house.

Mr. Allmand: May I ask the hon. member a question? Has he made a check to see whether the implementation of his proposal would conflict with any collective agreements that are now in force which would cover administrative and support personnel at the airports? In other words, he is suggesting that these people be also used as customs officers. As we know that many of our people working in transport now are unionized or under collective agreements, has he checked whether his proposal would violate any of these collective agreements?

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Pringle: I have done some checking and I would tell the hon. member that there are instances at the present time in Canada where non-customs employees are performing this service. I would also say that from my association with various flying associations and clubs, and from contact with private pilots I know, there is sufficient personnel at airports, in close proximity to customs offices, who would be quite prepared to do this work. If the hon. member is suggesting that a union matter is involved and that union spokesmen would say, "We are not going to do it, and neither are you," that may be so, but I feel that the public service would rise to the occasion and help the industry in the interests of progress in Canada.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). I think it is an excellent one. However, I do not want to get caught in the crossfire between two government supporters. But I do wish to say that I am completely at a loss to understand the reasons behind the interruptions of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). Undoubtedly later on he will explain just what is bothering him. Perhaps he did not pay too much attention when the hon. member for Fraser Valley East began his address.

I believe that the mover of the motion has raised an important point. It is not something earthshaking, but if adopted his proposal would be beneficial at a lot of smaller airports. I go further to suggest that at airstrips in northern parts of the provinces officers of the Lands and Forests Department might very well be deputized to handle customs matters.

As the hon. member for Fraser Valley East has said, the volume of tourists coming from the United States, particularly by air, is increasing. I know this from personal experience with the Muskoka airport. At the present time, it is served by a customs officer stationed in the nearby town of Bracebridge. When an incoming small aircraft from across the border intends to land there, the pilot must notify the Canadian customs of his expected time of arrival. Then, the customs officer has to close down his small office in Bracebridge, hire a taxi to take him to the airport, and often has to keep the taxi waiting for 15 minutes to an hour until the aircraft lands and he has fulfilled his duties.

The result is that the incoming pilot has to pay a considerable amount for the transportation and waiting period of the officer in order to get customs clearance. In some cases when he has nothing to declare, the whole procedure is a waste of time. Yet he has to pay the bill for the time wasted. During this period the local customs office is closed and regular customers must wait for the return of the customs officer.

I see no reason why local people at such airports could not be deputized to handle customs matters. On a recent trip overseas I was quite amazed on landing at London, England, to find two doors in the arrivals area, one with a notice on it "Articles to Declare," and the other with a notice, "Nothing to Declare." It just happened that I had nothing to declare and so I went through the second door. I looked around for somebody to whom I could declare nothing. There was no one there but a sweeper. I asked him, "To whom do I make my declaration". He said, "You came in through the door "Nothing to Declare" and I said yes. He said, "Well, go on." To my mind this was a very strange situation, but it has an interesting parallel.

I do not know the percentage involved, but I do know that a large number of people passing through customs have nothing to declare, especially people who come into Canada in small aircraft. It is a waste of time to have a customs officer attend at an airport just to have some person say, "I have nothing to declare." At Muskoka airport the customs officer is doing his job as well as he can, but often he has to explain to irate, incoming tourists why they have to pay a bill for customs officer's transportation even though they have nothing to declare.

For some two years Hammond Transportation has been applying to have a customs warehouse for both highway and air transport authorized at Bracebridge, but for some reason or another the Department of National Revenue has been very hesitant about the matter. If anybody at all in that department happens to read the report of this debate, and I trust somebody will, I hope he will look over the file of Hammond Transportation and decide on this customs warehouse. It would be a great convenience to tourists.

There is another side to the coin, Mr. Speaker. For some time I have been hearing complaints at various conferences about

United States tourists who come to Canada in light aircraft which land on lakes in the northern parts of the province. These tourists then set up hunting and fishing camps, having brought in their own provisions and supplies. When they have completed their hunting or fishing, they head back to the United States without ever seeing a customs officer. As I say, this is not an occasional thing. It is becoming so serious that many hunting and fishing outfitters are concerned. Further, people interested in conservation are concerned at the catch which these people take out of the country.

This traffic is not all illegal because in most cases there is a Lands and Forests man in the area from whom they can get hunting and fishing licences. But having done that, these people feel no further responsibility to this country, and are of no benefit to it. We do not know what they bring in or what they take out. If a Lands and Forests officer were deputized to take customs declarations from these people, the situation would be covered. It would remove the fear of illegality or improper action with respect to hunting and fishing parties.

In the province of Ontario there is now a program to provide landing strips. In many cases these are just landing strips on a piece of level ground, with only a windsock as equipment. This program is designed exactly for that situation. In many cases lands and forests agents are present and could carry out the necessary duties in legally admitting people to the country and taking their customs declarations. They could also deal with people when they were leaving.

I support completely the hon. member's notice of motion and think there is a perfectly good case for someone on behalf of the government standing up and saying that the motion will be accepted. I for one, and I think I speak for many of my colleagues, agree with this proposal. It is not a bill, but a resolution expressing an idea. Few notices of motions are accepted. I think this is a very good one which ought to be accepted. If accepted, it would draw to the attention of the government and the Department of National Revenue a situation that ought to be attended to. Departmental officials would know that the House of Commons is interested in this matter. If departmental officials want to draft the legislation differently, I suppose no one would object. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a perfectly good example of a notice of motion which ought to be accepted.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think this notice of motion certainly deserves general support. I am glad that an hon. member on the government side of the House raised this matter. I wish to call to the attention of the House the fact that the Saskatoon Board of Trade wrote to me in September—I beg your pardon; not to me but to Mr. Sidney Oliver, Director of Operations.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member may have made a mistake, but I think it was he who obtained the action.
